(4) The linguistic argument is a technical matter of the use of Gr words that cannot well be discussed here. The general differences of style, the longer "turgid" sentences, the repetitions on the one hand; the lack of argument, the full, swelling periods on the other, find their counterpart in portions of Rom. The minute differences which show themselves in new or strange words will be much reduced in number when we take from the list those that are due to subjects which the author does not discuss elsewhere (e.g. those in the list of armor in 6 13 ff). Holtzmann (Einf., 25) gives us a list of these hapax legomena (76 in all). But there are none of these which, as Lock says, St. Paul could not have used, though there are certain which he does not use elsewhere and others which are only found in his accepted writings and here. The following stand out as affording special ground for objection. The phrase "heavenly places" (ta epourania, 1 3,20; 2 6; 3 10; 6 12) is peculiar to this epistle. The phrase finds a partial in 1 Cor 15 49 and the thought is found in Phil 3 20. The devil (ho diabolos, 4 27; 6 11) is used in place of the more usual Satan (satanas). But in Acts St. Paul is quoted as using diabolos in 13 10 and satanas in 26 18. It is at least natural that he would have used the Gr term when writing from Rome to a Gr-speaking community. The objection to the expression "holy" (hagios) apostles (3 5) falls to the ground when we remember that the expression "holy" (hagios) is St. Paul's common word for Christian and that he uses it of himself in this very epistle (3 8). In like manner "mystery" (mysterion), "dispensation" (oikonomia) are found in other epistles in the same sense that we find them in here.

The attack on the epistle fails, whether it is made from the point of teaching or language; and there is no ground whatever for questioning the truth of Christian tradition that St. Paul wrote the letter which we know as the Epistle to the Ephesians.

II. Place and Date of Writing.—The time and place of his writing Eph turn on the larger question of the chronology of St. Paul's life (see PAUL) and the relation of the Captivity Epistles to each other; and the second question whether they were written from Caesarea or Rome (for this see PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO). Suffice it here to say that the place was undoubtedly Rome, and that they were written during the latter part of the two years' captivity which we find recorded in Acts 28 30. The date will then be, following the later chronology, 63 or 64 AD; following the earlier, which is, in many ways, to be preferred, about 58 AD.

III. Destination.—To whom was this letter written? The title says to the Ephesians. With this the witness of the early church almost universally agrees. It is distinctly stated in the Muratorian Fragment (106, l. 20); and the epistle is quoted as to the Ephesians by Irenaeus (Adv. Haer., v.14, 3; 24, 3); Tertullian (Adv. Marc., v.11, 17; De Praesc., 36; De Monag., v); Clement of Alexandria (Strom., iv.65; Paed., i.18) and Origen (Contra Celsum, iii.20). To these must be added the evidence of the extant MSS and VSS, which unite in ascribing the epistle to the Ephesians. The only exception to the universal evidence is Tertullian's account of Marcion (cir 150 AD) who reads Ad Laodiceanos (Adv. Marc., v.11: "I say nothing here about another epistle which we have with the heading 'to the Ephesians,' but the heretics 'to the Laodiceans' . . . [v.17]: According to the true belief of the church we hold this epistle to have been dispatched to the Ephesians, not to the Laodiceans; but Marcion had to falsify its title, wishing to make himself out a very diligent investigator").

This almost universal evidence for Ephesus as the destination of our epistle is shattered when we turn to the reading of the first verse.

2. The Inscription Here according to TR we read "Paul unto the saints which are at Ephesus [en Ephesō] and to the faithful in Christ Jesus." When we look at the evidence for this reading we find that the two words en Ephesō are lacking in Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Vaticanus, and that the corrector of the cursive known as 67 has struck them out of his copy. Besides these a recently described MS, Cod. Laura 184, giving us a text which is so closely akin to that used by Origen that the scribe suggests that it was compiled from Origen's writings, omits these words (Robinson, Ephesians, 293). To this strong manuscript evidence against the inclusion of these two words in the inscription we must add the evidence of Origen and Basil. Origen, as quoted in Cramer's Catena ad loc., writes: "In the Ephesians alone we found the expression 'to the saints which are,' and we ask, unless the phrase 'which are' is redundant, what it can mean. May it not be that as in Exodus He who speaks to Moses declares His name to be the Absolute One, so also those who are partakers of the Absolute become existent when they are called, as it were, from non-being into being?" Origen evidently knows nothing here of any reading en Ephesō, but takes the words "which are" in an absolute, metaphysical sense. Basil, a century and a half later, probably refers to this comment of Origen (Contra Eun., ii.19) saying: "But moreover, when writing to the Ephesians, as to men who are truly united with the Absolute One through clear knowledge, he names them as existent ones in a peculiar phrase, saying 'to the saints which are and faithful in Christ Jesus.' For so those who were before us have handed it down, and we also have found [this reading] in old copies." In Jerome's note on this verse there is perhaps a reference to this comment on Origen, but the passage is too indefinitely expressed for us to be sure what its bearing on the reading really is. The later writers quoted by Lightfoot (Bib. Essays, 384 f) cannot, as Robinson shows (Eph., 293), be used as witnesses against the Textus Receptus. We may therefore conclude that the reading en Ephesō was wanting in many early MSS, and that there is good ground for questioning its place in the original autograph.

But the explanations suggested for the passage, as it stands without the words, offend Pauline usage so completely that we cannot accept them. To take "which are" in the phrase "the saints which are" (tois oúsin) as absolute, as Origen did; or as meaning "truly," is impossible. It is possible to take the words with what follows, "and faithful" (kai pistois), and interpret this latter expression (pistois) either in the NT sense of "believers" or in the classical sense of "steadfast." The clause would then read either "to the saints who are also believers," or "to the saints who are also faithful," i.e. steadfast. Neither of these is wholly in accord with St. Paul's normal usage, but they are at least possible.

The determining factor in the question of the destination of the epistle lies in the epistle itself. We must not forget that, save perhaps Corinth, there was no church with which Paul was so closely associated as that in Ephesus. His long residence there, of which we read in Acts (chs 19, 20), finds no echo in our epistle.

There is no greeting to anyone of the Christian community, many of whom were probably intimate friends. The close personal ties, that the scene of Acts 20 17-38 shows us existed between him and his converts in Ephesus, are not even hinted at. The epistle is a calm discussion, untouched with the warmth of personal allusion beyond the bare statement that the writer is a prisoner (3 1; 4 1), and his commendation of Tychicus (6 21.22), who was to tell them about St. Paul's condition in Rome. This lack of personal touch is intensified by the assumption underlying chs 3 and 4 that the readers do not know his knowledge of the mysteries of Christ. In 3 2 and 4 21.22 there is a particle (etge, "if indeed") which suggests at least some question as to how far St. Paul himself was the missionary through whom they believed. All through the epistle there is a lack of those elements which are so constant in the other epistles, which mark the close personal fellowship and acquaintance between the apostle and those to whom he is writing.

This element in the epistle, coupled with the strange fact of Marcion's attributing it to the Laodiceans, and the expression in Col 4 16

4. Conclusion that points to a letter coming from Laodicea to Colosse, has led most writers of the present day to accept Ussher's suggestion that the epistle is really a circular letter to the churches either in Asia, or, perhaps better, in that part of Phrygia which lies near Colosse. The readers were evidently Gentiles (2 1; 3 1.2) and from the mission of Tychicus doubtless of a definite locality, though for the reasons given above this could not well be Ephesus alone. It is barely possible that the cities to whom St. John was bidden to write the Revelation (Rev 1-3) are the same as those to whom St. Paul wrote this epistle, or it may be that they were the churches of the Lycus valley and its immediate neighborhood. The exact location cannot be determined. But from the fact that Marcion attributed the epistle to Laodicea, possibly because it was so written in the first verse, and from the connection with Colossians, it is at least probable that two of these churches were at Colosse and Laodicea. On this theory the letter would seem to have been written from Rome to churches in the neighborhood of, or accessible to, Colosse, dealing with the problem of Christian unity and fellowship and the relations between Christ and the church and sent to them by the hands of Tychicus. The inscription was to be filled in by the bearer, or copies were to be made with the name of the local church written in, and then sent to or left with the different churches. It was from Ephesus, as the chief city of Asia in all probability, that copies of this circular letter reached the church in the world, and from this fact the letter came to be known in the church at large as that from Ephesus, and the title was written "to the Ephesians," and the first verse was made to read to the "saints which are in Ephesus."

IV. Relation to Other New Testament Writings.—Eph raises a still further question by the close resemblances that can be traced between it and various other NT writings.

The connection between Eph and 1 Pet is not beyond question. In spite of the disclaimer of as careful a writer as Dr. Bigg (ICC) it 1. 1 Peter is impossible to follow up the references given by Holtzmann and others and not feel that St. Peter either knew Eph or at the very least had discussed these subjects with its author. For, as Dr. Hort tells us, the similarity is one of thought and structure rather than of phrase. The following are the more striking passages with their parallels in 1 Pet: Eph 1 3 (1 Pet 1 3); 1 18-20 (1 Pet 1 3-5); 2 18-22 (1 Pet 2 4-6); 1 20-22 (1 Pet 3 22); 3 9 (1 Pet 1 20); 3 20 (1 Pet 1 12); 4 19 (1 Pet 1 14). The explanations that 1 Pet and Eph are both from the pen of the same writer, or that Eph is based on 1 Pet, are overthrown, among other reasons, by the close relation between Eph and Col.

The connection with the Apocalypse is based on Eph 2 20 as compared with Rev 21 14; Eph 3 5 and Rev 10 7; Eph 5 11 and Rev 18 4, and the figure of the bride of the Lamb (Rev 19 7; cf Eph 5 25). Writings Holtzmann adds various minor similarities, but none of these are sufficient to prove any real knowledge of, let alone dependence on Eph. The contact with the Fourth Gospel is more positive. Love (agápē) and knowledge (gnōsis) are used in the same sense in both Eph and the Gospel. The application of the Messianic title, the Beloved (Eph 1 6), to Christ does not appear in the Gospel (it is found in Mt 3 17), but the statement of the Father's love for Him constantly recurs. The reference to the going up and coming down of Christ (Eph 4 9) is closely akin to Jn 3 13 ("No man hath ascended into heaven, but he," etc.). So, too, Eph 5 11.13 finds echo in Jn 3 19.20; Eph 4 4.7 in Jn 3 34; Eph 5 6 in Jn 3 36. Eph 5 8 f is akin to 1 Jn 1 6 and Eph 2 3 to 1 Jn 3 10.

When we turn to Col we find a situation that is without parallel in the NT. Out of 155 verses in Eph, 78 are found in Col in varying degrees of identity. Among them are these: Eph 1 6 || Col 1 13; Eph 1 16 ff || Col 1 9; Eph 1 21 ff || Col 1 16 ff; Eph 2 16 || Col 2 20; Eph 4 2 || Col 3 12; Eph 4 15 || Col 2 19; Eph 4 22 || Col 3 9; Eph 4 32 || Col 3 12 ff; Eph 5 5 || Col 3 5; Eph 5 19 ff || Col 3 16 ff; Eph 6 4 || Col 3 21; Eph 6 5-9 || Col 3 22-4 1. For a fuller list see Abbott (ICC, xxiii). Not only is this so, but there is an identity of treatment, a similarity in argument so great that Bishop Barry (NT Comm. for Eng. Readers, Ellicott) can make a || analysis showing the divergence and similarity by the simple device of different type. To this we must add that there are at least a dozen Gr words common to these two epistles not found elsewhere. Over against this similarity is to be set the dissimilarity. The general subject of the epistles is not approached from the same standpoint. In one it is Christ as the head of all creation, and our duty in consequence. In the other it is the church as the fulness of Christ and our duty—put constantly in the same words—in consequence thereof. In Eph we have a number of OT references, in Col only one. In Eph we have unique phrases, of which "the heavenly spheres" (ta epourania) is most striking, and the whole treatment of the relation of Jew and Gentile in the church, and the marriage tie as exemplified in the relation between Christ and the church. In Col we have in like manner distinct passages which have no || in Eph, esp. the controversial section in ch 2, and the salutations. In truth, as Davies (Ep. St. Paul to Eph, Col, and Phil) well says: "It is difficult indeed to say, concerning the patent coincidences of expression in the two epistles, whether the points of likeness or of unlikeness between them are the more remarkable." This situation has given rise to various theories. The most complicated is that of H. Holtzmann, who holds that some passages point to a priority of Col, others to that of Eph; and as a result he believes that Col, as we have it, is a composite, based on an original epistle of St. Paul which was expanded by the author of Eph—who was not St. Paul—after he had written this epistle. So Holtzmann would give us the original Col (Pauline), Eph (based on it), and the present Col (not Pauline) expanded from the former through the latter. The theory falls to the ground on its fundamental hypothesis, that Col as it stands is interpolated. The most reasonable explanation is that both Col and Eph are the work of St. Paul, written at practically the same time, and that in writing on the same subjects, to different people, there would be just the differences and similarity which we have in these epistles. The objection that St. Paul could not repeat himself and yet differ as these two letters do is purely imaginary. Zahn shows us that men do just this very thing, giving an account of Bismarck's speaking on a certain subject to a group of officers and later to a large body of men, and yet using quite different language. Moreover, St. Paul is not averse to repeating himself (cf Rom and Gal and 1 Tim and 2 Tim) when to do so will serve his purpose. "Simultaneous authorship by one writer," and that writer St. Paul, is the only explanation that will satisfy all the facts in the case and give them due proportion.

V. The Purpose.—If our interpretation of the circumstances, composition and destination of Eph be right, we are now in a position to look beneath the surface and ask why the apostle wrote it. To understand its central theme we must remember that St. Paul, the prisoner of the Lord, is writing in the calm of his imprisonment, far from the noise and turmoil, the conflict and strife, that marked his earlier life. He is now able to look out on the church and get a view of it in its wholeness, to see the part it is to play in God's scheme for the restoration of the human race, to see God's purpose in it and for it and its relation to Him. With this standpoint he can write to the churches about Ephesus on the occasion of Tychicus' return to Colosse, not to correct false views on some special point, but to emphasize the great central truth which he had put in the very forefront of his letter. God's eternal purpose is to gather into one the whole created universe, to restore harmony among His creatures and between them and Himself. The apostle's whole prayer is for this end, his whole effort and desire is toward this goal: that they may have full, clear knowledge of this purpose of God which He is working out through Christ Jesus, who is the head of the church, the very fulness of Him who is being fulfilled all over the world. Everything, for the apostle, as he looks forth upon the empire, centers in the purpose of God. The discord between the elements in the church, the distinction between Jew and Gentile, all these must yield to that greater purpose. The vision is of a great oneness in Christ and through Him in God, a oneness of birth and faith and life and love, as men, touched with the fire of that Divine purpose, seek to fulfil, each in himself, the part that God has given him to play in the world, and, fighting against the foes of God, to overcome at last.

It is a noble purpose to set before men this great mystery of the church as God's means by which, in Christ, He may restore all men to union with Himself. It is an impossible vision except to one who, as St. Paul was at the time, is in a situation where the strife and turmoil of outside life can enter but little, but a situation where he can look out with a calm vision and, in the midst of the world's discord, discern what God is accomplishing among men.

VI. Argument.—The Argument of Eph is as follows:

1 1-2: Greeting.
1 3-10: Hymn of praise to God for the manifestation of His purpose for men in Christ Jesus, chosen from the beginning to a holy life in love, predestined to adoption as sons through Jesus Christ, in whom as the Beloved He has given us grace (vs 3-6). Redeemed by the blood of Christ by whom we have forgiveness of sins through His grace abounding in us and making us know the mystery of His purpose, viz. to unite all in one, even the entire universe (vs 7-10).

1 11-14: For this Israel has served as a preparation, and to this the Gentiles are come, sealed unto salvation by the Holy Spirit of power.

1 15-16a: Thanksgiving for their faith.

1 16b-21: Prayer that they may, by the spirit of wisdom and revelation, know their destiny and the power of God to fulfil it.

1 22-2 10: Summary of what God has done in Christ. Christ's sovereignty (vs 22, 23), and headship in the church (vs 22, 23); His work for men, quickening us from a death of sin into which man has sunk, and exalting us to fellowship with Christ by His grace, who has created us for good works as part of His eternal purpose (2 1-10).

2 11-13: The contrast between the former estate of the Gentiles, as strangers and aliens, and their present one, "near" by the blood of Christ.

2 14-18: Christ, who is our peace, uniting Jew and Gentile and reconciling man to God through the cross; by whom we all have access to the Father.

2 19-22: This is theirs who as fellow-citizens of the saints, built up on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, become a sanctuary of God in the Spirit.

2 21: A digression on the "mystery," i.e. the revelation to St. Paul, together with a prayer that men may grasp it. The "mystery" is that all men, Jews and Gentiles, are partakers of the promise. Of this St. Paul is a minister, to whom has been given the stewardship of that mystery, unfolding to all creatures God's wisdom, in accord with His eternal purpose (vs 1-13). Prayer that they may live up to their opportunities (vs 14-19). Doxology (vs 20, 21).

2 1-6: The outcome of this privilege, the fulfilment of the Divine purpose, must show itself in unity of life in the Christian fellowship.

2 7-16: The different gifts which the Christians have are for the upbuilding of the church into that perfect unity which is found in Christ.

2 17-24: The spiritual darkness and corruption of the old gentile life set over against the enlightenment and purity and holiness of the new life in Christ.

2 25-3 9: Special features of the Christian life, arising out of the union of Christians with Christ and making for the fellowship in the church. On the side of the individual: sins in word (2 25-30); of temper (vs 31-32); self-sacrifice as opposed to self-indulgence (2 1-8); the contrast of the present and the past repeated (vs 9-14); general behavior (vs 15-20); on the side of social relations: husband and wife exemplified in the relation of Christ and the church (vs 23-33); children and parents (2 1-4); servants and masters (vs 5-9).

2 10-20: The Christian warfare, its foes and armor and weapons.

2 21-24: Conclusion.

VII. Teaching.—The keynote to the doctrinal basis of the epistle is struck at the very outset. The hymn of praise centers in the thought of God, the Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ. It is to Him that the blessing is due, to Him, who had chosen us from the beginning, in whom there is redemption (1 3-7). God as the very heart and soul of everything, "is over all, and through all, and in all" (2 4). He is the Father from whom all revelation comes (1 17), and from whom every human family derives its distinctive characteristics (2 15). But He is not only Father in relation to the universe: He is in a peculiar sense the Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ (1 3). The eternity of Our Lord is distinctly asserted (vs 4, 5) as of one existing before the foundation of the world, in whom everything heavenly as well as earthly is united, summed up (ver 10; cf 2 12; 4 18). He is the Messiah (the Beloved [1 6] is clearly a Messianic term, as the voice from heaven at Christ's baptism, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," shows [Mt 3 17]). In Him we are quickened (2 5). He is made flesh (ver 15). He died on the cross (ver 16), and by His blood (1 7) we have redemption (2 30), and reconciliation with God (2 16). He whom God raised from the dead (1 20), now is in heaven (1 20; 4 8) from which place He comes (4 8), bringing gifts to men. (This interpretation makes the descent follow the ascent, and the passage teaches the return of Christ through His gifts of the Spirit which He gave to the church.) He who is in heaven fills all things (ver 10); and, from a wealth which is unsearchable (2 8), as the Head of the church (1 22), pours out His grace to free us from the power of sin (2 1). To this end He endues us with His Spirit (2 16). This teaching about God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, is no abstract theorizing. It is all intensely practical, having at its heart the purpose of God from the ages, which, as we saw above, is to restore again the unity of all things in Him (1 9, 10); to heal the breach between man and God (2 16, 17); to break down the separation between Jew and Gentile, and to abolish the enmity not only between them, but between them and God. This purpose of God is to be accomplished in a visible society, the one church, built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets (ver 20), of which Jesus Christ is the head of the corner, into which men are to be admitted by holy baptism, where they own one Lord, hold to one faith, in one God and Father of all who is above all and through all (2 4-7).

The teaching as to the church is one of the most striking elements of the epistle. In the first place we have the absolute use of the term, which has been already discussed. The apostle sees the whole Christian community throughout the world bound together into a unity, one fellowship, one body. He has risen to a higher vision than man had ever had before. But there is a further teaching in the epistle. Not only is the church throughout the world one body, but it is the body of Christ who is its Head (1 21 f). He has, as Lightfoot suggests, the same relation to the church which in ver 10 He has to the universe. He is its Head, "the inspiring, ruling, guiding, combining, sustaining power, the mainspring of its activity, the center of its unity, and the seat of its life." But the relation is still closer. If, as the evidence adduced would necessitate, one accepts J. Armitage Robinson's explanation of plērōma, as that without which a thing is incomplete (Eph, 255 f), then the church, in some wonderful mystery, is the complement of Christ, apart from which He Himself, as the Christ, lacks fulness. We are needed by Him, that so He may become all in all. He, the Head of restored humanity, the Second Adam, needs His church, to fulfil the unity which He came upon earth to accomplish (cf Stone, Christian Church, 85, 86). Still further, we find in this epistle the two figures of the church as the Temple of the Spirit (2 21 ff), and the Bride of Christ (2 23 ff). Under the latter figure we find the marriage relation of the Lord to Israel, which runs through the OT (Hos 2 16, et al.), applied to the union between Christ and the church. The significance is the close tie that binds them, the self-sacrificing love of Christ, and the self-surrender of obedience on the part of the church; and the object of this is that so the church may be free from any blemish, holy and spotless. In the figure of the Temple, which is an expansion of the earlier figure in 1 Cor 3 16; 2 Cor 6 16, we see the thought of a spiritual building, a sanctuary, into which all the diverse elements of the churches grow into a compact unity. These figures sum up the apostle's thought of that in which the Divine purpose finds its fulfilment. The progress forward to that fulfilment is due to the combined effort of God and man. "The church, the society of Christian men . . . is built and yet it grows. Human endeavor and Divine energy coöperate in its development" (Westcott). Out of this doctrinal development the apostle works out the practical life by which this Divine purpose can find its fulfilment. Admitted into the fellowship of the church by baptism, we become members one of another (4 25). It is on this basis that he urges honesty and patience and truth in our intercourse with each other, and pleads for gentleness and a forgiving spirit (vs 25-32). As followers of God we are to keep free from the sins that spring from pride and self-indulgence and any fellowship with the spirit of evil (5 1-14). Our life is to be lived as seeking the fulfilment of God's purpose in all the relationships of life (5 15-6 9). All is to be done with the full armor of the Christian soldier, as is fitting for those who fight spiritual enemies (6 10 ff.). The epistle is preeminently practical, bringing the significance of the great revelation of God's will to the everyday duties of life, and lifting all things up to a higher level which finds its ideal in the indwelling of Christ in our hearts, out of which we may be filled with all the fulness of God (3 17-19).

CHARLES SMITH LEWIS

EPHESUS, ἐφέσους (Ephesus, "desirable"): A city of the Rom province of Asia, near the mouth of the Cayster river, 3 miles from the western coast of Asia Minor, and opposite the island of Samos. With an artificial harbor accessible to the largest ships, and rivaling the harbor at Miletus, standing at the entrance of the valley which reaches far into the interior of Asia Minor, and connected by highways with the chief cities of the province, Ephesus was the most easily accessible city in Asia, both by land and sea. Its location, therefore, favored its religious, political and commercial development, and presented a most advantageous field for the missionary labors of Paul. The city stood upon the sloping sides and at the base of two hills, Prion and Coremsus, commanding a beautiful view; its climate was exceptionally fine, and the soil of the valley was unusually fertile.

Tradition says that in early times near the place where the mother goddess of the earth was born, the Amazons built a city and a temple in which they might worship. This little city of the Amazons, bearing at different times the names of Samorna, Trachea, Ortygia and Ptelea, flourished until in the early Gr days it aroused the cupidity of Androclus, a prince of Athens. He captured it and made it a Gr city. Still another tradition says that Androclus was its founder. However, under Gr rule the Gr civilization gradually supplanted that of the Orientals, the Gr language was spoken in place of the Asiatic; and the Asiatic goddess of the temple assumed more or less the character of the Gr Artemis. Ephesus, therefore, and all that pertained to it, was a mixture of oriental and Gr. Though the early history of the city is obscure, it seems that at different times it was in the hands of the Carians, the Leleges and Ionians; in the early historical period it was one of a league of twelve Ionian cities. In 500 BC it came into the possession of the Lydians; 3 years later, in 537, it was taken by the Persians; and during the following years the Greeks and Persians were constantly disputing for its possession. Finally, Alexander the Great took it; and at his death it fell to Lysimachus, who gave it the name of Arminoe, from his second wife. Upon the death of Attalus II (Philadelphus), king of Pergamos, it was bequeathed to the Rom Empire; and in 190, when the Rom province of Asia was formed, it became a part of it. Ephesus and Pergamos, the capital of Asia, were the two great rival cities of the province. Though Pergamos was the center of the Rom religion and of the government, Ephesus was the more accessible, the commercial center and the home of the native goddess Diana; and because of its wealth and situation it gradually became the chief city of the province.

It is to the temple of Diana, however, that its great wealth and prominence are largely due. Like the city, it dates from the time of the Amazons, yet what the early temple was like we now have no means of knowing, and of its history we know little excepting that it was seven times destroyed by fire and rebuilt, each time on a scale larger and grander than before. The wealthy king Croesus supplied it with many of its stone columns, and the pilgrims from all the oriental world brought it of their wealth. In time the temple possessed valuable lands; it controlled the fisheries; its priests were the bankers of its enormous revenues. Because of its strength the people stored there their money for safe-keeping; and it became to the ancient world practically all that the Bank of England is to the modern world.

In 336 BC, on the very night when Alexander the Great was born, it was burned, and when he grew to manhood he offered to rebuild it at his own expense if his name might be inscribed upon its portals. This the priests of Ephesus were unwilling to permit, and they politely rejected his offer by saying that it was not fitting for one god to build a temple to another. The wealthy Ephesians themselves undertook its reconstruction, and 230 years passed before its final completion.

Not only was the temple of Diana a place of worship, and a treasure-house, but it was also a museum in which the best statuary and most beautiful paintings were preserved. Among the paintings was one by the famous Apelles, a native of Ephesus, representing Alexander the Great hurling a thunderbolt. It was also a sanctuary for the criminal, a kind of city of refuge, for none might be arrested for any crime whatever when within a bowshot of its walls. There sprang up, therefore, about the temple a village in which the thieves and murderers and other criminals made their homes. Not only did the temple bring vast numbers of pilgrims to the city, as does the Kaaba at Mecca at the present time, but it employed hosts of people apart from the priests and priestesses; among them were the large number of artisans who manufactured images of the goddess Diana, or shrines to sell to the visiting strangers.

Such was Ephesus when Paul on his 2d missionary journey (Acts 18 19-21) first visited the city, and when, on his 3d journey (19 8-10; 20 31), he remained there for two years preaching in the synagogue (19 8, 10), in the school of Tyrannus (19 9) and in private houses (20 20). Though Paul was probably not the first to bring Christianity to Ephesus, for Jews had long lived there (3 9; 8 9), he was the first to make progress against the worship of Diana. As the fame of his teachings was carried by the pilgrims to their distant homes, his influence extended to every part of Asia Minor. In time the pilgrims, with decreasing faith in Diana, came in fewer numbers; the sales of the shrines of the goddess fell off; Diana of the Ephesians was no longer great; a Christian church was founded there and flourished, and one of its first leaders was the apostle John. Finally in 262 AD, when the temple of Diana was again burned, its influence had so far departed that it was never again rebuilt. Diana was dead. Ephesus became a Christian city, and in 341 AD a council of the Christian church was held there. The city itself soon lost its importance and decreased in population. The sculptured stones of its great buildings, which were no longer in use and were falling to ruins, were carried away to Italy, and esp. to Constantinople for the great church of Saint Sophia. In 1308 the Turks took possession of the little that remained of the city, and deported or murdered its inhabitants. The Cayster river, overflowing its banks, gradually covered with its muddy deposit the spot where the temple of Diana had once stood, and at last its very site was forgotten.

The small village of Ayasaluk, 36 miles from Smyrna on the Aidin R.R., does not mark the site of the ancient city of Ephesus, yet it stands nearest to its ruins. The name Ayasaluk is the corruption of three Gr words meaning "the Holy Word of God." Passing beyond the village one comes to the ruins of the old aqueduct, the fallen city walls, the so-called church of St. John or the baths, the Turkish fort which is sometimes called Paul's prison, the huge theater which was the scene of the riot of Paul's time, but which now, with its marble torn away, presents but a hole in the side of the hill Prion. In 1863 Mr. J. T. Wood, for the British Museum, obtained permission from the Turkish government to search for the site of the lost temple of Diana. During the eleven years of his excavations at Ephesus, $80,000 were spent, and few cities of antiquity have been more thoroughly explored. The city wall of Lysimachus was found to be 36,000 ft. in length, inclosing an area of 1,027 acres. It was 10½ ft. thick, and strengthened by towers at intervals of 100 ft. The six gates which pierced the wall are now marked by mounds of rubbish. The sites and dimensions of the various public buildings, the streets, the harbor, and the foundations of many of the private houses were ascertained, and numerous inscriptions and sculptures and coins were discovered. Search, however, did not reveal the site of the temple until January 1, 1870, after six years of faithful work. Almost by accident it was then found in the valley without the city walls, several feet below the present surface. Its foundation, which alone remained, enabled Mr. Wood to reconstruct the entire temple plan. The temple was built upon a foundation which was reached by a flight of ten steps. The building itself was 425 ft. long and 220 ft. wide; each of its 127 pillars which supported the roof of its colonnade was 60 ft. high; like the temples of Greece, its interior was open to the sky. For a further description of the temple, see Mr. Wood's excellent book, Discoveries at Ephesus. E. J. BANKS

EPHLAL, ef'lal (עִפְלָל, 'ephāl, "judgment"): A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 2 37).

EPHOD, ef'od (עִפְדִּים [28 t], עִפְדִּים [20 t], 'ephōdh; LXX ἐπομῆς, epōmīs, ἐφόδ, ephōth, ἐφόδ, ephōd, ἐφοῦδ, ephōūd, σκολή ἐξάλλος, skolē éxallos, σκολή βυσσίνη, skolē bussinē):

(1) A sacred vestment originally designed for the high priest (Ex 28 4 ff; 39 2 ff), and made "of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen," held together by two shoulderpieces and a skilfully woven band which served as a girdle for the ephod. On the shoulderpieces were two onyx stones on which were engraved the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. It is not known whether the ephod extended below the hips or only to the waist. Attached to the ephod by chains of pure gold was a breastplate containing twelve precious stones in four rows. Underneath the ephod was the blue robe of the ephod extending to the feet of the priest. The robe of the ephod was thus a garment comprising, in addition to the long robe proper, the ephod with its shoulderpieces and the breastplate of judgment.

(2) From the historical books we learn that ephods were worn by persons other than the high priest. Thus the boy Samuel was girded with a linen ephod while assisting the aged high priest (1 S 2 18); the priests at Nob, 85 in number, are described as men wearing a linen ephod (22 18); and David was girded with a linen ephod when he danced in the procession that brought the ark into Jerus (2 S 6 14). The ephod was considered appropriate for the king on this solemn and happy occasion; but it would be reading into the narrative more than it contains to infer that lay worshippers were regularly clothed with the ephod; nor are we to suppose that priests other than the high priest were accustomed to wear ephods as rich and elaborate as that of the high priest. Abiathar, who became high priest after the assassination of his father by Doeg, probably brought to the camp of David the ephod worn by the high priest in his ministrations at Nob (1 S 23 6), and through this ephod David sought in certain crises to learn Jeh's will (23 9; 30 7). Some have argued that the ephod, which Abiathar brought in his hand, was an image rather than a priestly garment, but there seems no sufficient reason for regarding it as other than a vestment for the high priest. The ephod behind which the sword of Goliath was kept wrapped in a cloth may well have been a garment suspended from the wall or itself wrapped in a protecting cloth (21 9).

(3) The ephod mentioned in Jgs 17 5; 18 14 f; Hos 3 4 is associated with teraphim and other idolatrous images. We may frankly confess that we do not know the shape, size and use of the ephod in these cases, though even here also the ephod may well have been a priestly garment. The same remark holds good of the ephod made by Gideon, and which became an object of idolatrous worship in Israel (Jgs 8 27). It has been argued that a vestment would not cost seventeen hundred shekels of gold. Possibly Gideon set up an apparatus of worship containing other articles, just as the mother of Micah began with the promise to make a graven image and a molten image, and afterward added an ephod and teraphim (17 1-5). Moreover, if gems and brilliants were put on Gideon's ephod, who can say that it did not cost seventeen hundred shekels?

EPHOD, ef'od (עִפְדִּים, 'ephōdh): Father of Haniel, prince of Manasseh (Nu 34 23).

EPHPHATHA, ef'a-tha, ef-ā' tha (עִפְפָּתָה, Ephphathā): Aram. word used by Christ (Mk 7 34), the 'Ethpa'al imper. of Aram. pethah (Heb pāthah), translated, "Be [thou] opened"; cf Isa 35 5. The Aram. was the sole popular language of Pal (HJP, IIg, 9) and its use shows that we have here the graphic report of an eyewitness, upon whom the dialectic form employed made a deep impression. This and the corresponding act of the touch with the moistened finger is the foundation of a corresponding ceremony in the Roman Catholic formula for baptism.

EPHRAIM, ʿfra-im, ʿfrā-im (עֲפְרַיִם, ephrayim, "double fruit"): The younger of the two sons of Joseph and Asenath, born in Egypt.

1. The Patriarch He and his brother Manasseh were adopted by Jacob, and ranked as his own sons, each becoming the ancestor of a tribe in Israel. In blessing his grandchildren, despite their father's protest, Jacob preferred the younger, foreshadowing the future eminence of his descendants (Gen 41 50 ff; 48 20 ff). In the Blessing of Jacob, however, the two are included under the name of Joseph (49 22 f).

At the first census on leaving Egypt, Ephraim's men of war numbered 40,500; and at the second census they are given as 32,500 (Nu 1 33; 26 37). See, however, art. NUMBERS.

2. The Tribe The head of the tribe at the Exodus was Elishama, son of Ammi-hud (1 10). With the standard of the tribe of Ephraim on the W. of the tabernacle in the desert march were Manasseh and Benjamin (2 18 ff). The Ephraimite among the spies was Hoshea (i.e. Joshua), the son of Nua (13 8). At the division of the land Ephraim was represented by prince Kemuel, son of Shiphtan (34 24). The future power of this tribe is again foreshadowed in the Blessing of Moses (Dt 33 17). When Moses died, a member of the tribe, Joshua, whose faith and courage had distinguished him among the spies, succeeded to the chief place in Israel. It was natural that the scene of national assemblies, and the center of the nation's worship, should be chosen within the land occupied by the children of Joseph, at Shechem and Shiloh respectively. The leadership of Ephraim was further emphasized by the rule of Samuel. From the beginning of life in Pal they enjoyed a certain prestige, and were very sensitive on the point of honor (Jgs 7 24; 8 1; 12 1 ff). Their acceptance of and loyalty to Saul, the first king chosen over Israel, may be explained by his belonging to a Rachel tribe, and by the close and tender relations existing between Joseph and Benjamin. But they were never reconciled to the passing of the scepter to Judah in the person of David (2 S 2 8 f). That Israel would have submitted to the sovereignty of Absalom, any more than to that of David, is not to be believed; but his revolt furnished an opportunity to deal a shrewd blow at the power of the southern tribe (15 13). Solomon's unwisdom and the crass folly of Rehoboam in the management of the northern tribes fanned the smoldering discontent into a fierce flame. This made easy the work of the rebel Jeroboam; and from the day of the disruption till the fall of the Northern Kingdom there was none to dispute the supremacy of Ephraim, the names Ephraim and Israel being synonymous. The most distinguished of Ephraim's sons were Joshua, Samuel and Jeroboam I.

The central part of Western Pal fell to the children of Joseph; and, while the boundaries of the territory allotted to Ephraim and Manasseh respectively are given in Josh 16; 17 1 ff, it seems to have been held by them in common for some time (17 14).

3. The Territory The Canaanites in certain cities of both divisions were not driven out. It was probably thought more profitable to enslave them (16 10; 17 13). The boundaries of Ephraim cannot be followed with accuracy, but roughly, they were as follows: The southern boundary, agreeing with the northern border of Benjamin, started from Bethel, and passed down westward by nether Beth-horon and Gezer toward the sea (16 3; in ver 5 it stops at upper Beth-horon); it turned northward to the southern bank of the brook Kanah (Wādy Kānāh) along which it ran eastward (17 10) to Michmethath (the plain of Mukhneh); thence it went northward along the western edge of the plain to Shechem. It then bent eastward and southward past Taanath-shiloh (Ta'ana), Janoah (Yanūn) to Ataroth and Naarah (unidentified) and the Jordan (16 7). From Ataroth, which probably corresponds to Ataroth-addar (ver 5), possibly identical with the modern el-Trūneh, the southern border passed up to Bethel. Along the eastern front of the land thus defined there is a steep descent into the Jordan valley. It is torn by many gorges, and is rocky and unfruitful. The long slopes to the westward, however, furnish much of the finest land in Pal. Well watered as it is, the valleys are beautiful in season with cornfields, vineyards, olives and other fruit trees. The uplands are accessible at many points from the maritime plain; but the great avenue of entrance to the country runs up Wādy esh-Sha'ir to Nāblus, whence, threading the pass between Gerizim and Ebal, it descends to the Jordan valley. In this favored region the people must have lived in the main a prosperous and happy life. How appropriate are the prophetic allusions to these conditions in the days of Ephraim's moral decay (Isa 28 14; Jer 31 18; Hos 9 13; 10 11, etc.)! W. EWING

EPHRAIM:

(1) A position apparently of some importance, since the position of Baal-hazor (probably = Tell 'Asūr), where Abraham's sheep-farm was located, is determined by relation to it (2 S 13 23). That it lay N. of Jerus seems to be indicated in ver 34. It may be identical with the Ephraim of Onom, 20 Rom miles N. of Jerus, and therefore to be sought somewhere in the neighborhood of Sinjil and el-Lubbān. Connected with this may have been the name Aphaerema, a district in Samaria mentioned in 1 Macc 11 34; Ant, XIII, iv, 9.

(2) The town near the wilderness to which Jesus retired after the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11 54). This probably corresponds to Ephrem of Onom (s.v. "Afra") 5 Rom miles E. of Bethel. This may be the place named along with Bethel by Jos (BJ, IV, ix, 9). It probably answers to el-Taiyebah, a large village about 4 miles N. of Beitin. The antiquity of the site is attested by the cisterns and rock tombs. It stands on a high hill with a wide outlook including the plains of Jericho and the Dead Sea. See EPHRON. W. EWING

EPHRAIM, FOREST OF (עֵרְאֵל עֲפְרַיִם, ya'ar 'ephrayim): The word ya'ar (Heb) probably agrees in meaning with the Arab. wa'r, which indicates a rough country, abounding in rocks, stones and scrub, with occasional trees; not a "forest," as we understand the term. Here Absalom was defeated and slain (2 S 18 6 ff, AV "wood of Ephraim"). It must be sought, therefore, E. of the Jordan, in the neighborhood of Mahanaim; but no identification is yet possible.

EPHRAIM, GATE OF. See JERUSALEM.

EPHRAIM, MOUNT (הַר עֲפְרַיִם, har 'ephrayim): Means that part of the mountain which fell to Ephraim (Josh 19 50, etc). The natives speak today of Jebel Nāblus, Jebel Šafed, etc, meaning that section of the central range which is subject to each city. It is better therefore to retain the rendering of AV, and not to read with RV "hill-country of Ephraim."

EPHRAIM, WOOD OF. See EPHRAIM, FOREST OF.

EPHRAIMITE, ʿfra-im-it (עֲפְרַיִת, ephrayim; sing. עֲפְרַיִתִי, ephraṭhī): A member of the tribe of Ephraim (Josh 16 10, etc). See also EPHRAIMITE.

EPHRAIN, ʿfra-in (2 Ch 13 19), RV EPHRON, which see.

EPHRATH, ef'rath, ʿfrath (עֲפְרַתָּה, 'ephraṭhā; 'Eppāthā, 'Ephraṭhā; Gen 35 16; 48 7); EPHRA-THAH, ef'ra-tha, ef-rā'tha (עֲפְרַתָּה, 'ephraṭhāh, in the other references: Josh 15 59 [in added ver of LXX only]; Ruth 4 11; 1 Ch 2 19.24.50; Ps 132 6; Mic 5 2, AV "Ephratah"): The name either of Bethlehem itself or of a district in which Bethlehem was situated. A man of this place was called an Ephrathite (Ruth 1 2; 1 S 17 12). It is held by many authorities that the Ephrath where Rachel was buried (Gen 35 16; 48 7) was a different place, the words "the same is Bethlehem" being a gloss. The reading in Ps 132 6 is doubtful; RVm has "Ephraim." E. W. G. MASTERMAN EPHRATHITE, ef'rath-It, ʿfrath-It. See EPH-RATH.

EPHRON, ʿfron (עֲפְרֹן, 'ephron, "fawnlike"): The Hittite of whom Abraham bought the field and cave of Machpelah (Gen 23 8 ff; 25 9; 49 30). The transaction was conducted in true oriental fashion, with excessive courtesy; but the large sum of 400 shekels' weight of silver was in the end required (cf 33 19; 1 K 16 24). See also MONEY; MONEY, CURRENT.

EPHRON, ʿfron (עֲפְרֹן, 'ephron; 'Eppōn, 'Ephron):

(1) 2 Ch 13 19: "And Abijah pursued after Jeroboam, and took cities from him, Beth-el with the towns thereof, and Jeshanah with the towns thereof, and Ephron with the towns thereof." Another reading is "Ephraim" (RVm). This is thought by many to be identical with Ophrah (עֲפְרָה, 'ophrah, Josh 18 23) and perhaps with Ephraim (עֲפְרַיִם, 'ephraim, 2 S 13 23) which both have been localized at the lofty town of et Tairibeh.

(2) A city E. of the Jordan between Carnion (Ashteroth-karnaim) and Scythopolis (Beisan): "Then Judas gathered together all the Israelites that were in the country. . . . Now when they came unto Ephron (this was a great city in the way as they should go, very well fortified) they could not turn from it either on the right hand or on the left, but they must needs pass through the midst of it" (1 Macc 5 45.46 AV; Ant. XII, viii, 5; also 2 Macc 12 27). Buhl and Schumacher propose Kasr Wady el Ghafr, a ruined tower which completely commands the deep Wady el Ghafr, but the ruins appear to be scanty.

(3) Mt. Ephron: The border of Judah is described (Josh 15 9): "It went out to the cities of Mount Ephron." The position will depend on that of Nephtoah and of Kiriath-jearim.

The Epicureans with the Stoics (q.v.) encountered Paul in Athens (Acts 17 18). They were the followers of Epicurus, a philosopher who was born in Samos in 341 BC, and who taught first in Asia Minor and afterward in Athens till his death in 270 BC. His system, unlike most philosophies, maintained its original form, with little development or dissent, to the end of its course. The views of Paul's opponents of this school may therefore be gathered from the teaching of Epicurus.

The conditions for the rise of Epicureanism and Stoicism were political and social rather than intellectual. Speculative thought had reached its zenith in the great constructive ideals of Plato, and the encyclopaedic system of Aristotle. Criticism of these would necessarily drive men back upon themselves to probe deeper into the meaning of experience, as Kant did in later times. But the conditions were not propitious to pure speculation. The breaking up of the Gr city-states and the loss of Gr independence had filled men's minds with a sense of insecurity. The institutions, laws and customs of society, which had hitherto sheltered the individual, now gave way; and men demanded from philosophy a haven of rest for their homeless and weary souls. Philosophy, therefore, became a theory of conduct and an art of living.

Epicurus deprecated the pursuit of knowledge for its own sake, whether as philosophy or science, and directed his inquiries to the two practical questions: What is the aim of life? and How to attain to it? Philosophy he defined as "a daily business of speech and thought to secure a happy life."

His ethical teaching is therefore the central and governing factor of Epicurus' philosophy. It belongs to the type generally described as Egoistic Hedonism. The same general principles had been taught by Aristippus and his school, the Cyrenaics, a century earlier, and they were again revived in the 17th cent. in England by Thomas Hobbes.

The aim and end of life for every man is his own happiness, and happiness is primarily defined as pleasure. "Wherefore we call pleasure the Alpha and Omega of a blessed life. Pleasure is our first and kindred good. It is the starting-point of every choice and of every aversion, and to it we come back, inasmuch as we make feeling the rule by which to judge every good thing" (Epicurus, Letter to Menaeceus). So far Epicurus might seem to be simply repeating the view of the Cyrenaics. But there are important differences. Aristippus held the pleasure of the moment to be the end of action; but Epicurus taught that life should be so lived as to secure the greatest amount of pleasure during its whole course. And in this larger outlook, the pleasures of the mind came to occupy a larger place than the pleasures of the body. For happiness consists not so much in the satisfaction of desires, as in the suppression of wants, and in arriving at a state of independence of all circumstances, which secures a peace of mind that the privations and changes of life cannot disturb. Man's desires are of various kinds: "Some are natural, some are groundless; of the natural, some are necessary as well as natural, and some are natural only. And of the necessary desires, some are necessary if we are to be happy, some if the body is to be rid of uneasiness, some if we are even to live." Man's aim should be to suppress all desires that are unnecessary, and esp. such as are artificially produced. Learning, culture, civilization and the distractions of social and political life are proscribed, much as they were in the opposite school of the Cynics, because they produce many desires difficult to satisfy, and so disturb the peace of the mind. This teaching has been compared to that of Rousseau and even of Buddha. Like the former, Epicurus enjoins the withdrawal of life from the complexities and perplexities of civilization, to the bare necessities of Nature, but he stops short of the doctrine of Nirvana, for life and the desire to live he regards as good things. He even rises above to Nature Naturalism to a view that has some kinship with modern Spiritualism, in his affirmation of the mastery of mind over adverse circumstances. "Though he is being tortured on the rack, the wise man is still happy."

Epicurus' definition of the end of life and of the way to it bears a superficial resemblance to that of his opponents, the Stoics. The end

4. Ataraxy sought by both is ataraxia, "imperturbability," a peace of mind that transcends all circumstances, and the way to it is the life according to Nature. But Nature for Epicurus is purely physical and material, and the utmost happiness attainable is the complete absence of pain.

He justly protests against the representation of his teaching as gross and immoral. "When we say, then, that pleasure is the end and

5. Pleasure aim, we do not mean the pleasures of Is the Ab- the prodigal, or the pleasures of sensual- sence of ity, as we are understood to do by Pain some, through ignorance, prejudice or wilful misrepresentation. By pleasure we mean the absence of pain in the body and trouble in the soul" (Letter to Menaeceus). His own life was marked by a simplicity verging on asceticism, and by kindly consideration for his friends. But the theory was capable of serving the purposes of worse men to justify license and selfishness.

Justice and ordinary morality were recognized in the system as issuing from an original social compact, such as Hobbes and Rousseau

6. Social supposed, and resting upon the self- Contract interest and happiness of individuals who entered into the compact the better to gain those ends. Ordinary morality has therefore no stronger sanction than the individual's desire to secure his own happiness. Against public violations of the moral code, the sanction finds its agent in the social order and the penalties it inflicts; but the only deterrent from secret immorality is the fear of being found out, and the necessarily disturbing character of that fear itself. Friendship, the supreme virtue of Epicureanism, is based upon the same calculating selfishness, and is to be cultivated for the happiness it begets to its owners. The fundamental defect of the system is its extreme individualism, which issues in a studied selfishness that denies any value of their own to the social virtues, and in the negation of the larger activities of life.

Epicurus had no interest in knowledge for its own sake, whether of the external world, or of any ultimate or supreme reality. But he found men's minds full of ideas about the world, immortality and the gods, which disturbed their peace and filled them with vain desires and fears. It was therefore necessary for the practical ends of his philosophy to find a theory of the things outside of man that would give him tranquillity and serenity of mind.

For this purpose Epicurus fell back upon Democritus' atomic theory of the world. The original constituents

7. Atomic of the universe, of which no account could Theory be given, were atoms, the void, and motion. By a fixed law or fate, the atoms moved through the void, so as to form the world as we know it. The same uniform necessity maintains and determines the abiding condition of all that exists. Epicurus modified this system so far as to admit an initial freedom to the atoms, which enabled them to divert slightly from their uniform straight course as they fell like rain through space, and so to impinge, combine and set up rotatory motions by which the worlds, and all that is in them, came into being.

8. Ma- He did not follow the idea of freedom in terialism Nature and man beyond the exigencies of his theory, and the thoroughly materialistic nature of his universe precluded him from deducing a moral realm. By this theory he gets rid of the causes of fear and anxiety that disturb the human mind. Teleology, providence, a moral order of the universe, the arbitrary action of the gods, blind fate, immortality, hell, reward and punishment after death, are all excluded from a universe where atoms moving through space do everything. The soul, like the body, is made of atoms, but of a smaller or finer texture. In death, the one like the other dissolves and comes to its end.

From the same premises one would expect the complete denial of any Divine beings. But it is a curiosity

9. Theory of the system that a grossly materialistic of Ideas theory of knowledge should require the affirmation of the existence of the gods. Men's ideas are derived from thin material films that pass from the objects around them into the kindred matter of their minds. It follows that every idea must have been produced by a corresponding object. Men generally possess ideas of gods. Therefore, gods must exist to produce those ideas, which come to men in sleep and dreams. But they are not such gods as men generally believe to exist. They are constituted of the same atomic matter as men, but of a still finer texture. They dwell in the intermundia, the interspaces outside the worlds, where earthly cares and the dissolution of death cannot approach them. They are immortal and completely blessed. They cannot therefore know anything of the world, with its pain and its troubles, nor can they be in any way concerned with it. They are apotheoses of the Epicurean sage, entirely withdrawn from the world's turmoil, enjoying a life of calm repose, and satisfied with the bounty that Nature provides for them. "For the nature of the gods must ever in itself of necessity enjoy immortality with supreme repose, far removed and withdrawn from our concerns; since exempt from every pain, exempt from all dangers, strong in its own resources, not wanting aught of us, it is neither gained by favors nor moved by anger" (Lucretius). All religion is banned, though the gods are retained. Epicurus' failure to carry the logic of his system to the denial of the gods lies deeper than his theory of ideas. He was impressed by the fact

10. Epicu- that "a steadfast unanimity continues to rean Gods prevail among all men without exception" that gods exist. "A consciousness of god-head does not allow him to deny the existence of God altogether. Hence his attempt to explain the fact so as not to interfere with his general theory" (Wallace, Epicureanism, 209).

During his lifetime, Epicurus attracted a large following to his creed, and it continued to flourish far down into the Christian era. It was presented to the Rom world by the poet Lucretius in his poem De natura rerum, which is still the chief source for the knowledge of it. One OT writer, the author of Eccl, may have been influenced by its spirit, though he did not adopt all its ideas.

The personal charm and engaging character of Epicurus himself drew men to him, and elevated him into the kind of ideal sage who

12. Causes personified the teaching of the school, of Success as was the custom of all schools of philosophy. The system was clear-cut and easily understood by ordinary men, and it offered a plausible theory of life to such as could not follow the profounder and more difficult speculations of other schools. Its moral teaching found a ready response in all that was worldly, commonplace and self-seeking in men that had lost their high ideals and great enthusiasms. Above all it delivered men from the terrors of a dark superstition that had taken the place of religion. It is a remarkable revelation of the inadequacy of Gr religion that Epicurus should have relegated the gods from the visible world, without any sense of loss, but only the relief of a great deliverance.

It was inevitable that the teaching of Paul should have brought this school up against him. He came

13. Com- to Athens teaching a God who had plete An- become man, who had suffered and tithesis of died to accomplish the utmost self- Paul's sacrifice, who had risen from the dead and returned to live among men to Teaching guide and fashion their lives, and who at last would judge all men, and according to their deeds reward or punish them in a future world. To the Epicurean this was the revival of all the ancient and hated superstitions. It was

A written communication; a term inclusive of all forms of written correspondence, personal and official, in vogue from an early antiquity. As applied to the twenty-one letters, which constitute well-nigh one-half of the NT, the word "epistle" has come to have chiefly a technical and exclusive meaning. It refers, in common usage, to the communications addressed by five (possibly six) NT writers to individual or collective churches, or to single persons or groups of Christian disciples. Thirteen of these letters were written by St. Paul; three by St. John; two by St. Peter; one each by St. James and St. Jude; one—the epistle to the Hebrews—by an unknown writer.

As a whole the Epistles are classified as Pauline, and Catholic, i.e. general; the Pauline being divided into two classes: those written to churches and to individuals, the latter being known as Pastoral (1 and 2 Tim, and Tit; some also including Philem; see Lange on Romans, Am. ed, 16).

The fact that the NT is so largely composed of letters distinguishes it, most uniquely, from all the sacred writings of the world. The Scriptures of other oriental religions—the Vedas, the Zend Avesta, the Tripitaka, the Koran, the writings of Confucius—lack the direct and personal address altogether. The Epistles of the NT are specifically the product of a new spiritual life and era. They deal, not with truth in the abstract, but in the concrete. They have to do with the soul's inner experiences and processes. They are the burning and heart-throbbing messages of the apostles and their confrères to the fellow-Christians of their own day. The chosen disciples who witnessed the events following the resurrection of Jesus and received the power (Acts 1 8) bestowed by the Holy Spirit on, and subsequent to, the Day of Pentecost, were spiritually a new order of men. The only approach to them in the spiritual history of mankind is the ancient Heb prophets. Consequently the Epistles, penned by men who had experienced a great redemption and the marvelous intellectual emancipation and quickening that came with it, were an altogether new type of literature. Their object is personal. They relate the vital truths of the resurrection era, and the fundamental principles of the new teaching, to the individual and collective life of all believers. This specific aim accounts for the form in which the apostolic letters were written. The logic of this practical aim appears conspicuously in the orderly Epistles of St. Paul who, after the opening salutation in each letter, lays down with marvelous clearness the doctrinal basis on which he builds the practical duties of daily Christian life. Following these, as each case may require, are the personal messages and affectionate greetings and directions, suited to this familiar form of address.

The Epistles consequently have a charm, a directness, a vitality and power unknown to the other sacred writings of the world. Nowhere are they equaled or surpassed except in the personal instructions that fell from the lips of Jesus. Devoted exclusively to experimental and practical religion they have, with the teachings of Christ, become the textbook of the spiritual life for the Christian church in all subsequent time. For this reason "they are of more real value to the church than all the systems of theology, from Origen to Schleiermacher" (Schaff on St. Paul's Epistles, Hist of Christian Church, 741). No writings in history so unfold the nature and processes of the redemptive experience. In St. Paul and St. John, esp., the pastoral instinct is ever supreme. Their letters are too human, too personal, too vital to be formal treatises or arguments. They throb with passion for truth and love for souls. Their directness and affectionate intensity convert their authors into prophets of truth, preachers of grace, lovers of men and missionaries of the cross. Hence their value as spiritual biographies of the writers is immeasurable. As letters are the most spontaneous and the freest form of writing, the NT Epistles are the very life-blood of Christianity. They present theology, doctrine, truth, appeal, in terms of life, and pulsate with a vitality that will be fresh and re-creative till the end of time. (For detailed study of their chronology, contents and distinguishing characteristics, see arts. on the separate epistles.)

While the NT Epistles, in style and quality, are distinct from and superior to all other lit. of this class, they nevertheless belong to a form of personal and written address common to all ages. The earliest known writings were epistolary, unless we except some of the chronologies and inscriptions of the ancient Bab and Assyr kings. Some of these royal inscriptions carry the art of writing back to 3800 BC, possibly to a period still earlier (see Goodspeed, Kent's Historical Series, 42-43, secs. 40-41), and excavations have brought to light "an immense mass of letters from officials to the court—correspondence between royal personages or between minor officials," as early as the reign of Khammurabi of Babylon, about 2275 BC (ib, 33). The civilized world was astonished at the extent of this international correspondence as revealed in the Am Tab (1480 BC), discovered in Egypt in 1887, among the ruins of the palace of Amenophis IV. This mass of political correspondence is thus approximately synchronous with the Heb exodus and the invasion of Canaan under Joshua.

As might be expected, then, the OT abounds with evidences of extensive epistolary correspondence in and between the oriental nations. That a postal service was in existence in the time of Job (Job 9 25) is evident from the Heb term רָצִים, rācīm, signifying "runners," and used of the mounted couriers of the Persians who carried the royal edicts to the provinces. The most striking illustration of this courier service in the OT occurs in Est 3 13.15; 8 10.14 where King Ahasuerus, in the days of Queen Esther, twice sends royal letters to the Jews and satrap of his entire realm from India to Ethiopia, on the swiftest horses. According to Herodotus, these were usually stationed, for the sake of the greatest speed, four parasangs apart. Hezekiah's letters to Ephraim and Manasseh were sent in the same way (2 Ch 30 1.6.10). Other instances of epistolary messages or communications in the OT are David's letter to Joab concerning Uriah and sent by him (2 S 11 14.15); Jezebel's, to the elders and nobles of Jezreel, sent in Ahab's name, regarding Naboth (1 K 21 8.9); the letter of Ben-hadad, king of Syria, to Jehoram, king of Israel, by the hand of Naaman (2 K 5 5-7); Jehu's letters to the rulers of Jezreel, in Samaria (2 K 10 1.2.6.7); Sennacherib's letter to Hezekiah (2 K 19 14; Isa 37 14; 2 Ch 32 17), and also that of Merodach-baladan, accompanied with a gift (2 K 20 12; Isa 39 1). Approximating the NT epistle in purpose and spirit is the letter of earnest and loving counsel sent by Jeremiah to the exiles in Babylon. It is both apostolic and pastoral in its prophetic fervor, and is recorded in full (Jer 29 1.4-32) with its reference to the bitterly hostile and jealous letter of Shemaiah, the false prophet, in reply.

As many writers have well indicated, the Bab captivity must have been a great stimulus to letter-writing on the part of the separated Hebrews, and between the far East and Pal. Evidences of this appear in the histories of Ezra and Nehemiah, e.g. the correspondence, back and forth, between the enemies of the Jews at Jerus and Artaxerxes, king of Persia, written in the Syrian language (Ezr 4 7-23); also the letter of Tattenai (AV "Tatnai") the governor to King Darius (Ezr 5 6-17); that of Artaxerxes to Ezra (Ezr 7 11 ff), and to Asaph, keeper of the royal forest (Neh 2 8); finally the interchange of letters between the nobles of Judah and Tobiah; and those of the latter to Nehemiah (Neh 6 17.19; so Sanballat ver 5).

The OT Apoc contains choice specimens of personal and official letters, approximating in literary form the epistles of the NT. In each case they begin, like the latter, in true epistolary form with a salutation: "greeting," or "sendeth greeting" (1 Macc 11 30.32; 12 6.20; 15 2.16), and in two instances closing with the customary "Fare ye well" or "Farewell" (2 Macc 11 27-33.34-38; cf 2 Cor 13 11), so universally characteristic of letter-writing in the Hellenistic era.

The most felicitous and perfect example of official correspondence in the NT is Claudius Lysias' letter to Felix regarding St. Paul (Acts 23 25-30). Equally complete in form is the letter, sent, evidently in duplicate, by the apostles and elders to their gentile brethren in the provinces of Asia (Acts 15 23-29). In these two letters we have the first, and with Jas 1 1, the only, instance of the Gr form of salutation in the NT (χαίρειν, chairein). The latter is by many scholars regarded as probably the oldest letter in epistolary form in the NT, being in purport and substance a Pastoral Letter issued by the Apostolic Council of Jerus to the churches of Antioch, Syria and Cilicia. It contained instructions as to the basis of Christian fellowship, similar to those of the great apostle to the churches under his care.

The letters of the high priest at Jerus commending Saul of Tarsus to the synagogues of Damascus are samples of the customary letters of introduction (Acts 9 2; 22 5; cf 28 21; also 18 27). As a Christian apostle St. Paul refers to this common use of "epistles of commendation" (2 Cor 3 1; 1 Cor 16 3) and himself made happy use of the same (Rom 16 1 ff); he also mentions receiving letters, in turn, from the churches (1 Cor 7 1).

Worthy of classification as veritable epistles are the letters, under the special guidance of the Holy Spirit, to the seven churches of Asia (Rev 2 1-3 22). In fact, the entire Book of Rev is markedly epistolary in form, beginning with the benedictory salutation of personal and apostolic address, and closing with the benediction common to the Pauline epistles. This again distinguishes the NT lit. in spirit and form from all other sacred writings, being almost exclusively direct and personal, whether in vocal or written address. In this respect the gospels, histories and epistles are alike the product and exponent of a new spiritual era in the life of mankind.

This survey of epistolary writing in the far East, and esp. in the OT and NT periods, is not intended to obscure the distinction between the

7. Epistles letter and the epistle. A clear line of demarkation separates them, owing not merely to differences in form and substance, but to the exalted spiritual mission and character of the apostolic letters. The characterization of a letter as more distinctly personal, confidential and spontaneous, and the epistle as more general in aim and more suited to or intended for publication, accounts only in part for the classification. Even when addressed to churches Paul's epistles were as spontaneous and intimately and affectionately personal as the ordinary correspondence. While intended for general circulation it is doubtful if any of the epistolary writers of the NT ever anticipated such extensive and permanent use of their letters as is made possible in the modern world of printing. The epistles of the NT are lifted into a distinct category by their spiritual eminence and power, and have given the word epistle a meaning and quality that will forever distinguish it from letter. In this distinction appears that Divine element usually defined as inspiration: a vitality and spiritual endowment which keeps the writings of the apostles permanently "living and powerful," where those of their successors pass into disuse and obscurity.

Such was the influence of the NT Epistles on the lit. of early Christianity that the patristic and pseudepigraphic writings of the next

8. Patristic Epistles century assumed chiefly the epistolary form. In letters to churches and individuals the apostolic Fathers, as far as possible, reproduced their spirit, quality and style. See LITERATURE, SUB-APOSTOLIC.

Pseudo-epistles extensively appeared after the patristic era, many of them written and circulated in the name of the apostles and apostolic Fathers. See APOCRYPHAL EPISTLES. This early tendency to hide ambitious or possibly heretical writings under apostolic authority and Scriptural guise may have accounted for the anathema pronounced by St. John against all who should attempt to add to or detract from the inspired revelation (Rev 22 18.19). It is hardly to be supposed that all the apostolic letters and writings have escaped destruction. St. Paul in his epistles refers a number of times to letters of his that do not now exist and that evidently were written quite frequently to the churches under his care (1 Cor 5 9; 2 Cor 10 9.10; Eph 3 3); "in every epistle" (2 Thess 3 17) indicates not merely the apostle's uniform method of subscription but an extensive correspondence. Col 4 16 speaks of an "epistle from Laodicea," now lost, doubtless written by St. Paul himself to the church at Laodicea, and to be returned by it in exchange for his epistle to the church at Colosse.

EQUAL, ē'kwal (ἴσος, isos): In Ezk (18 25, 29; 33 17, 20), "The way of the Lord is not equal" translates Heb yillākhēn for tākhan, "to weigh," and means "is not adjusted to any fixed standard," "arbitrary," "fitful," and, therefore, "not equitable, fair, or impartial" (LXX "is not set straight"). Cf same Heb word in 1 S 2 3, where the Lord is said to 'weigh actions.' "Equal," therefore, is what will bear the closest investigation and strictest judgment. In Mt 20 12, "made them equal" means "put them upon the same footing," i.e. regarded their brief service as though it were the very same as our long hours of toil. In Lk 20 36 the context restricts the equality to a particular relation. The precise meaning of isos in Jn 5 18, "making himself equal with God," is clearly defined by the preceding clause, for Our Lord's opponents say that He has "called God his own Father" (Gr ἰδίον πατέρα, i.e. His Father in a peculiar and exclusive sense; cf ἰδίον υἱοῦ of Rom 8 32, applying the same adj. to the Son in His relation to the Father, i.e. His Son in a sense in which no one else can claim the title). They correctly interpreted the language of Jesus as declaring that He was the Son of God in a way that put Him on an equality with God. The charge against Him is not that He said that He was "like" (hómoios), but that He was "equal" (isos), i.e. of the very same rank and authority.

H. E. JACOBS

EQUALITY, ē-kwol'i-ti (ἰσότης, isótes): In 2 Cor 8 14, lit. "out of equality," i.e. "in equal proportion" or "that there may be equality." In Phil 2 6, it occurs in a paraphrase of Gr ὅς ἐστὶν ἰσὺς θεοῦ, "the being on an equality with God." In this much-discussed passage, isa, according to a not unusual Attic idiom, is construed adverbially (see Meyer on passage), meaning, therefore, not 'the being equal' (AV), which would require ison, but 'the having equal prerogatives and privileges.' The personal equality is one thing; the equality of attributes is another, and it is the latter which is here expressed (Lightfoot). The "being on an equality" and the "having equal prerogatives" are both deductions from the possession of "the form of God." The thought is that if He who had "the form of God" had under all circumstances exercised His Divine attributes, He would have been employing only what belonged to Him, and would in no way have derogated from what belongs only to God. We regard this as referring to the incarnate Son in His historical manifestation.

H. E. JACOBS

EQUITY, ek'wi-ti: Is synonymous with "uprightness," which is found in Prov 17 26; Isa 59 14; Mal 2 6 in place of AV "equity." Eccl 2 21 has "skilfulness" and RVm "success" for AV "equity." The context favors this tr of כִּשְׁרוֹן, kishrōn, which is derived from כָּשַׁר, kāshēr, "to succeed."

Equity is the spirit of the law behind the letter; justice is the application of the spirit of equity; honesty is the general everyday use of justice or fairness, equity being the interior or abstract ideal. The Court of Equity overrides the Court of Common Law, deciding not upon terms, but the spirit of the deed.

ER, ʾer (עֵר, 'ēr, "watcher"; חֵר, ēr):

(1) The eldest son of Judah, the son of Jacob, by Shua the Canaanite. Judah took for him a wife named Tamar. It is recorded that Er "was wicked in the sight of Jeh; and Jeh slew him" (Gen 38 3, 6, 7; 46 12).

(2) "Er the father of Lecah" is mentioned among "the sons of Shelah the son of Judah" (1 Ch 4 21).

(3) An ancestor of Jesus in St. Luke's genealogy in the 7th generation before Zerubbabel (Lk 3 28).

ERA, ʾra: We find no definite era in use in OT times, and such usage does not appear until we reach the period of the Maccabees. There are some references to important events that might have served as eras had they been generally accepted and constantly employed. Such was the Exodus; and this is referred to as the starting-point in fixing the date of the building of Solomon's temple (1 K 6 1), and also for the date of Aaron's death (Nu 33 38). An earthquake is referred to by Amos (1 1) as a well-known event by which to date the beginning of his prophetic career; and Ezekiel in two passages refers to the captivity of Judah as a date for marking certain events in his life. Of these the Exodus would have been the most appropriate event to use as an era, since it marked the birth of the Heb nation; but the universal custom of antiquity was to date from the regnal years of the kings, as we see in the history of Egypt and Babylonia and Assyria; this custom was followed by the Israelites as soon as the kingdom was established, and was continued down to the Captivity. After the return of the Jews they naturally adopted the regnal years of the Pers kings, under whose rule they were, until the overthrow of the kingdom by Alexander. After this event, the era that prevailed most widely in Syria was that of the Seleucid kingdom, which began in 312 BC, and must have been familiar to the Jews, and we have evidence that they made use of it. When Simon the Maccabee secured the independence of the Jews from the Seleucid king, Demetrius II, in 141-140, they began to date their instruments and contracts from this event as is stated in 1 Macc 13 41, 42; and we find that the year of their independence is fixed by reference to the Seleucid era, the first year of Simon being the 170th of that era (see Jos, Ant., XIII, vi, 7). After this they used the era of Simon, dating by his regnal years; but whether they used this as a permanent era during the Asmonean Dynasty or dated simply from the accession of each king, we do not know. There is no doubt that the Seleucid era continued to be used throughout the country for several centuries after the downfall of the Seleucid kingdom, as we have abundant evidence from inscriptions. When the Romans took possession of Syria and Pal, their era was of course employed by Rom officials, but this did not prevail among the people. The dynasty of the Herods sometimes employed their own regnal years and sometimes those of the emperors, as appears from their coins. The Jews must have been familiar with the eras employed by some of the Phoen towns, such as Tyre and Sidon. Tyre had a local era which began in 126 BC, and Sidon one beginning in 112 BC; and most of the towns on the coast used the era of Alexander, dating from the battle of Issus, until the establishment of the Seleucid era. The Jews would be familiar with these from their commercial connections with the coast towns, but we do not know that they used them. They did not adopt the era of the Creation until after the time of Christ. It was fixed at 4,000 years before the destruction of the later temple, or 3760 BC.

ERAN, ʾran (עֵרָן, 'ērān, "watcher," "watchful"; עֵדֵן, Edén): The son of Ephraim's oldest son Shuthelah (Nu 26 36). Eranites, the descendants of Eran (ib).

ERASTUS, ē-ras'tus ("Ἐραστός, Erastos, "beloved"): The name occurs three times, each time denoting a companion of Paul.

(1) Erastus was sent with Timothy from Ephesus into Macedonia while Paul remained in Asia for a while. They are designated "two of them that ministered unto him" (Acts 19 22).

(2) "Erastus the treasurer of the city" sent greetings to the Christians in Rome (Rom 16 23). He was apparently an important person in the Corinthian community, and with Gaius probably represented that church in these fraternal relations with the Rom community.

(3) Erastus is one who, in 2 Tim 4 20, "remained at Corinth."

We have no means of discovering whether one or more than one person is meant in these references. A. C. Headlam (HDB, s.v.) thinks it improbable that one who held an office implying residence in one locality should have been one of Paul's companions in travel. On the other hand Paul may be designating Erastus (Rom 16 23) by an office he once held, but which he gave up to engage in mission work. S. F. HUNTER

ERECH, ē'rek, er'ek (עֶרֶךְ, 'erekh; Ὀρεχ, Órech): The second of the cities founded by Nimrod, the others being Babel, Accad and Calneh (Gen 10 10). The derivation of the name is well known, Erech being the Sem-Bab Uruk, from the Sumerian Unug, a word meaning "seat," probably in the sense of "residential city." The character with which it is written enters into the composition of the Bab names of Larsa and Ur of the Chaldees.

Its identification with Warka, on the left bank of the Euphrates, half-way between Hillah (Babylon) and Korna, is beyond a doubt. It is thought that the Euphrates must have flowed nearer to the city in ancient times, as the Gilgames legend relates that that hero and his companion Enkidu washed their hands in the stream after having killed the divine bull sent by the goddess Ištar to destroy them. The shape of the ruin is irregular, the course of the walls of the N.E. having been seemingly determined by that of the Nile canal (Shatt-en-Nil), which flowed on that side. The extreme length of the site from N. to S. is over 3,000 yds., and its width about 2,800 yds. This space is very full of remains of buildings; and the foundations of the walls, with their various windings, gateways and defences, are traceable even now.

Two great deities, Ištar and Nanaa, were worshipped in this city, the temple of the former being Ē-anna, "the house of heaven" (or "of Anu," in which case it is probable that the god of the heavens, Anu, was also one of the patrons of the city). The shrine dedicated to Ištar is apparently now represented by the ruin known as Buwāriyya or "reed-mats," and so called on account of the layers of matting at intervals of 4 or 5 ft. This is the great temple-tower (ziggurat) of the place, called Ē-gipar-imina, "the house of 7 enclosures." The remains are situated in a large courtyard measuring 350 ft. by 270 ft. As in the case of other Bab erections, the corners are directed toward the cardinal points, and its height is about 100 ft. above the desert-plain.

As Erech is mentioned with Babylon, Niffer (Calneh) and Eridu, as one of the cities created by Merodach (Nimrod), it is clear that it was classed with the oldest foundations in Babylonia. It was the city of Gilgames, the half-mythical king of the earliest period, who seems to have restored the walls and temples. Its earliest known ruler of historical times was Enšag-kuš-anna, about 4,000 BC. The celebrated shrine of Ištar

4. History was already in existence in the time of the City's of Lugal-zaggesi, who came somewhat later. King Dungi (2600 BC) restored etc Ē-anna and built its great wall.

This was in the time of the great Ur Dynasty, but later the city seems to have come under the dominion of the kings of Isin, Libit-Ištar having apparently restored the sanctuary of Ištar on Ē-gipara. Another great ruler of the early period was Sin-gašid, king of Erech, who was a patron of Ē-anna; and when he restored this shrine, he endowed it with grain, wool, oil and 1 shekel of gold. There seems also to have been a shrine to Nergal, god of war, which was restored by King Sin-gamil. About 2280 BC Kudur-Nanḫunde, the Elamite king, plundered the city, and carried off the statue of the goddess Nanaa, which was only restored to its place by Aššur-bani-āpli, the Assyrian king, about 635 BC. Samsu-iluna seems to have surpassed his father Hammurabi (Amraphel) in the restoration of the city's temples, and other rulers who did not forget Erech were Nebuchadrezzar and Nabonidus.

Many tablets have been found on the site, and give promise of interesting discoveries still to come.

Having been the capital of the heroic king Gilgames, who saw the wonders of the wide world, spoke with the Babylonian Noah face to face, and almost attained immortality as a living man, it was always a place of romance. Poetical compositions concerning it exist, one of the most interesting being a lamentation possibly written after the invasion of Kudur-Nanḫundi, when famine was rife in the city, blood flowed like water in Ē-ulbar, the house of Ištar's oracle, and the enemy heaped up fire in all the goddess' lands as one heaps up embers.

The consideration in which the city was held is made plain by the geographical lists, from which it would seem that it had no less than 11 names, among them being Illab or City's Illag, Tir-anna, "the heavenly grove"; Numerous Ub-imina, "the 7 regions"; Uru-Names gipara-imina, "the city of the 7 enclosures"; and Uruk-supuri, "Erech of the folds" (the name which it always bears in the Gilgames legend), given to it either on account of its being a center where pastoral tribes gathered, or because of the flocks kept for sacrifice to its deities.

Besides the inscriptions of the kings already mentioned, tablets of the reigns of Nabopolassar, Nebuchadrezzar, Nabonidus, Cyrus, Darius and some of the Seleucids have been found on the site. In the ruins of the town and the country around, numerous glazed earthenware (slipper-shaped) coffins and other receptacles, used for and in connection with the burial of the dead, occur. These are mostly of the Parthian period, but they imply that the place was regarded as a necropolis, possibly owing to the sanctity attached to the site.

7. Tablets and Tombs of Late Date of the town and the country around, numerous glazed earthenware (slipper-shaped) coffins and other receptacles, used for and in connection with the burial of the dead, occur. These are mostly of the Parthian period, but they imply that the place was regarded as a necropolis, possibly owing to the sanctity attached to the site.

ERI, ē'ri, ERITES, ē'rits (עֵרִי, 'ēri, "watcher"): The fifth of the seven sons of Gad (Gen 46 16; Nu 26 16). Patronymic, Erites (ib), a clan of Gad.

ERI-AKU, er-i-a-kōō', ē-ri-ā-kū': This is the probable Sumerian reading of the well-known Bab name written with the characters for "servant" (Sem wardu or ardu) and the group standing for the Moon-god Sin (written En-zu = Zu-en), otherwise Aku, the whole meaning "servant of the Moon-god."

1. The Name and Its Etymology This ruler, who was king of Larsa (ELLASSAR—cf that art.), is generally identified with the ARIÖCH (q.v.) of Gen 14 9. Several Assyriologists read the name with the Sem Bab pronunciation of Warad-Sin; and, if this be correct, there would be a certain amount of doubt as to the generally received identification; though this, on the other hand, might simply prove that the ancient Hebrews obtained their transcription from a Sumerian source.

In addition to a number of contract-tablets, the following inscriptions mentioning Eri-Aku or Warad-Sin are known:

2. Inscriptions Mentioning Eri-Aku (1) A dedication, by Kudur-mabuk, "father of Martu" (Amurrû, the land of the Amorites), son of Simti-Silbak, of some sacred object to the Moon-god Nannar, for his own life and that of Eri-Aku, his son, the king of Larsa.

(2) A dedication, by Eri-Aku, to Ištar of Hallabu, for his own life and that of his father and begetter Kudur-mabuk. The text records the restoration of Ištar's sanctuary.

(3) A dedication, by Eri-Aku, to the god Nannar, for the preservation of his own life and that of his father, Kudur-mabuk. The restoration of several temples is referred to.

(4) An inscription of Eri-Aku, "the powerful man," "the nourisher of Ur [of the Chaldees], the king of Larsa, the king of Šumer and Akkad; son of Kudur-mabuk, the father of Ēmutbāla." The text records that he raised the wall of Ur, called "Nannar is the consolidator of the foundations of the land," high like a mountain.

(5) A dedication by Eri-Aku to Nin-insina (titles as above). It records the building of the temple Ē-u-namtila, for his own life, and the life of Kudur-mabuk, the father his begetter.

These inscriptions and others show that Eri-Aku belonged to an Elamite family which held the throne

3. The Nationality of His Family of Larsa, a state which, in common with Babylonia itself, acknowledged the suzerainty of Elam. Kudur-mabuk would seem, from motives of policy, to have given his sons Sumerian and Sem Bab names; and it is noteworthy that he did not retain the rule of Larsa for himself, but delegated it to his offspring, keeping for himself the dominion of Ēmutbāla and, as his own inscription shows, the land of the Amorites. With regard to these it may be noted, that the expression adda, "father," probably means simply "administrator."

Eri-Aku seems to have died while his father was still alive, and was succeeded by Rīm-Sin, who, as François Thureau-Dangin points out,

4. Eri-Aku and Rīm-Sin must have been his brother. As in the case of Eri-Aku, Kudur-mabuk inaugurated the reign of Rīm-Sin by a dedication; but there seems to be no inscription in which Rīm-Sin makes a dedication for the life of his father, implying that Kudur-mabuk died soon after his second son came to the throne.

And here the question of the identification of Eri-Aku with Eri-Eaku (var. -Ekua) claims consideration. This name occurs on certain tablets of late date from Babylonia, and is coupled with a name which may be read Kudur-laḫgumal (for Kudur-laḫgomar, i.e. Chedorlaomer), and Tud-ḫul,¹ the Bib. Tidal. These inscriptions are very mutilated, but from the smaller one it would seem that Eri-Eaku had a son named Durmah-lāni, who ravaged some district, and there were floods at Babylon. (But his son slaughtered him like a lamb, and old man and child [were slain] with the sword. Similar things seem to be said of Tudḫul or Tidal. The larger fragment gives further details of the life of Durmah-lāni, who had usurped royal power and had been killed with the sword. If the events recorded belong to this period, they must have taken place after the death of Eri-Aku (-Eaku, -Ekua), but before that of Kudur-laḫgumal. It is to be noted that, in accordance with Elamite usage, the crown did not pass to the eldest son after a king's death, but to the king's eldest brother. In Elam this led to endless conflicts, and the same probably took place in Larsa until incorporated with the states of Babylonia.

The fact that the history of Kudur-laḫgumal (?) forms the subject of a poetical legend suggests that the texts mentioning these kings may have belonged to a kind of historical romance, of which Chedorlaomer (Amraphel), Arioch, and Tidal were the heroes—and, in truth, this is implied by their style. That they are utterly apocryphal, however, remains to be proved.

To err is in the OT the tr of שָׁגָה, shāghāh, and טָאָה, tā'āh, both of which mean lit. "to wander," "to go astray." We have shāghāh in 1 S 26 21, "I have played the fool, and have erred"; Job 19 4, "Mine error remaineth with myself," i.e. "is my own concern," or, perhaps, "only injures myself"; Ps 119 118; Isa 28 7 AV (thrice); tā'āh, Ps 95 10; Prov 14 22; Isa 35 8. It means also "to cause to err" (Isa 3 12; 30 28, "a bridle that causeth to err"; Jer 23 13.32; "Their lies [i.e. the unreal deities, creatures of their own imagination] have caused them to err," Am 2 4).

In the NT the word is generally πλανόμαι, planōmai, "to wander" (Mk 12 24.27; He 3 10; Jas 5 19); astochéō, "to miss the mark," "to swerve," occurs twice (1 Tim 6 21; 2 Tim 2 18).

Error in the OT represents various words: shāghāhāh, "mistake," "oversight" (Eccl 5 6; cf Prov 20 25 and see INQUIRY); m'shūghāh, with the same meaning, "wandering" (Job 19 4; cf Ps 19 12); shal, "rashness," "mistake" (2 S 6 7, "God smote him there for his error," RVm "rashness"); shālū, Aram. "mistake" (Dnl 6 4); tā'āh, "injury" (Isa 32 6).

In the NT we have plānē, "wandering" (Rom 1 27; Jas 5 20; 1 Jn 4 6; Jude ver 11, "the error of Balaam"); agnōēma, "ignorance" (He 9 7, m Gr "ignorances"). For "is deceived" (Prov 20 1) RV has "ereth," m "or reeleth"; for "them that are out of the way" (He 5 2), "the ignorant and erring"; for "deceit" (1 Thess 2 3), "error."

The Eng. word "error" has the same original meaning as the Heb and Gr main words, being derived from erro, "to wander." "To err is human," but there are errors of the heart as well as of the head. The familiar phrase just quoted seems to have its equivalent in the marginal rendering of Gen 6 3, "in their going astray they are flesh." Errors through ignorance are in the Bible distinguished from errors of the heart and wilful errors (Lev 5 18; Nu 15 22; Ezk 45 20).

ESARHADDON, ʿsar-had'on (אֶשְׂרָחַדְדִּין, 'ēsar-haddōn; Assyrian Ašur-aḫ-iddina, "Ashur hath given a brother"): During his lifetime, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, made his favorite son, Esarhaddon (680-668 BC), the viceroy of Babylon; and although he was not the eldest son, he decreed that he should become the legal heir to the throne of Assyria. Sennacherib, having been slain in 681, apparently by two of his sons, who are called in the OT Adrammelech and Sharezer (2 K 19 37), Esarhaddon proceeded to Nineveh, where the rebellion which followed the death of his father collapsed, having existed for about a month and a half. The OT informs us that the murderers of his father fled to Armenia. This is corroborated by the inscriptions which say that at Melid, in the land of Hanirabbat, which can be said to be in Armenia, Esarhaddon fought the rebels and defeated them; whereupon he was proclaimed king. His father had been so displeased with Babylon that he had attempted to annihilate the city by making it a swamp. Esarhaddon, however, having been infatuated with the ancient culture of the Babylonians, adopted a conciliatory attitude toward the people. Immediately he planned to restore the city on magnificent proportions. The foundations of his work were laid with impressive ceremonies, and in every way he endeavored to ameliorate the inhabitants by his gracious deeds. Even at Nippur evidences of his work in restoring the ancient shrine of Ellil are seen. The kings of the West who became his vassals, among them being Manasseh of Judah, were required to furnish building materials for his operations in Babylonia. His work in that land explains why the Judean king was incarcerated at Babylon (2 Ch 33 11) instead of Assyria.

Esarhaddon was first compelled to defend the kingdom against the inroads of the hordes from the North. The Gimirra (perhaps referring to Gomer of the OT), who were called Manda, seemed to pour into the land. A decisive victory was finally gained over them, and they were driven back into their own country. Afterward, the Medes and the Chaldeans were also subjugated. He then directed his attentions toward the West. Sidon having revolted against Assyria, Esarhaddon laid siege to the city, which after three years was finally captured and destroyed. He built another city upon the same site, which he called Kar-Esarhaddon, and endeavored to revive its commerce. And, as is mentioned in Ezr 4 2; cf 10, he repopulated the city (Samaria) with captives from Elam and Babylonia.

The capture of Tyre was also attempted, but, the city being differently situated, a siege from the land was insufficient to bring about submission, as it was impossible to cut off the commerce by sea. The siege, after several years, seems to have been lifted. Although on a great monolith Esarhaddon depicts Ba'al, the king of Tyre, kneeling before him with a ring through his lips, there is nothing in the inscriptions to bear this out.

His work in Canaan was preparatory to his conquest of Egypt. Tirhakah, the Ethiopian king of Egypt, was attacked on the borders, but no victory was gained. Several years later he crossed the borders and gained a decisive victory at Iskhupri. He then proceeded to lay siege to Memphis, which soon capitulated; and Egypt, to the confines of Nubia, surrendered to Assyria. Esarhaddon reorganized the government, and even changed the names of the cities. Necho was placed over the 22 princes of the land. In 668, Egypt revolted and Esarhaddon, while on his way to put down the revolt, died. He had arranged that the kingdom be divided between two of his sons: Ashurbanipal was to be king of Assyria, and Shamash-shum-ukin was to reign over Babylonia. The nobles decreed, however, that the empire should not be divided, but Shamash-shum-ukin was made viceroy of Babylonia. A. T. CLAY

ESAU, ʿsô (עֵשָׂו, 'ēšāw, "hairy"; Hebrew, Ēsāu): Son of Isaac, twin brother of Jacob. The name was given on account of the hairy covering on his body at birth: "all over like a hairy garment" (Gen 25 25). There was a prenatal foreshadowing of the relation his descendants were to sustain to those of his younger brother, Jacob (ver 23). The moment of his birth also was signalized by a circumstance that betokened the same destiny (ver 26).

The young E. was fond of the strenuous, daring life of the chase—he became a skilful hunter, "a man of the field" ('ish sāddeh). His father warmed toward him rather than toward Jacob, because E.'s hunting expeditions resulted in meats that appealed to the old man's taste (ver 28). Returning hungry from one of these expeditions, however, E. exhibited a characteristic that marked him for the inferior position which had been foretold at the time of his birth. Enticed by the pottage which Jacob had boiled, he could not deny himself, but must, at once, gratify his appetite, though the calm and calculating Jacob should demand the birthright of the firstborn as the price (vs 30-34). Impulsively he snatched an immediate and sensual gratification at the forfeit of a future glory. Thus he lost the headship of the people through whom God's redemptive purpose was to be wrought out in the world, no less than the mere secular advantage of the firstborn son's chief share in the father's temporal possessions. Though E. had so recklessly disposed of his birthright, he afterward would have secured from Isaac the blessing that appertained, had not the cunning of Rebekah provided for Jacob. Jacob, to be sure, had some misgiving about the plan of his mother (Gen 27 12), but she reassured him; the deception was successful and he secured the blessing. Now, too late, E. bitterly realized somewhat, at least, of his loss, though he blamed Jacob altogether, and himself not at all (vs 34, 36). Hating his brother on account of the grievance thus held against him, he determined upon fratricide as soon as his father should pass away (ver 41); but the watchful Rebekah sent Jacob to Haran, there to abide with her kindred till E.'s wrath should subside (vs 42-45).

E., at the age of forty, had taken two Hittite wives, and had thus displeased his parents. Rebekah had shrewdly used this fact to induce Isaac to fall in with her plan to send Jacob to Mesopotamia; and E., seeing this, seems to have thought he might please both Isaac and Rebekah by a marriage of a sort different from those already contracted with Canaanitish women. Accordingly, he married a kinswoman in the person of a daughter of Ishmael (Gen 28 6, 9). Connected thus with the "land of Seir," and by the fitness of that land for one who was to live by the sword, E. was dwelling there when Jacob returned from Mesopotamia. While Jacob dreaded meeting him, and took great pains to propitiate him, and made careful preparations against a possible hostile meeting, very earnestly seeking Divine help, E., at the head of four hundred men, graciously received the brother against whom his anger had so hotly burned. Though E. had thus cordially received Jacob, the latter was still doubtful about him, and, by a sort of duplicity, managed to become separated from him, E. returning to Seir (Gen 33 12-17). E. met his brother again at the death of their father, about twenty years later (Gen 35 29). Of the after years of his life we know nothing.

E. was also called Edom ("red"), because he said to Jacob: "Feed me, I pray thee, with that same red pottage" (Gen 25 30). The land in which he established himself was "the land of Seir," so called from Seir, ancestor of the Horites whom E. found there; and called also Edom from E.'s surname, and, it may be, too, from the red sandstone of the country (Savoc).

"Eau" is sometimes found in the sense of the descendants of E., and of the land in which they dwelt (Dt 2 5; Ob vs 6. 8.18.19).

Eschatology of the OT (with Apocryphal and Apocalyptic Writings).—By "eschatology," or doctrine of the last things, is meant the

A) Scope of Article ideas entertained at any period on the future life, the end of the world (resurrection, judgment; in the NT, the Parousia), and the eternal destinies of mankind. In this art. it is attempted to exhibit the beliefs on these matters contained in the OT, with those in the Jewish apocryphal and apocalyptic writings that fill up the interval between the OT and the NT.

The subject here treated has been dealt with by many writers (see "Literature" below); by none more learnedly or ably than by Dr. R.

B) Dr. Charles's Work H. Charles in his work on Heb, Jewish and Christian eschatology (A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life in Israel, in Judaism, and in Christianity).

The present writer is, however, unable to follow Dr. Charles in many of his very radical critical positions, which affect so seriously the view taken of the literary evidence, and of the development of Israel's religion; is unable, therefore, to follow him in his interpretation of the religion itself. The subject, accordingly, is discussed in these pages from a different point of view from his.

Individual religion in Israel.—One special point in which the writer is unable to follow Dr. Charles in his treatment, which may be noticed at the outset, is in his idea—now so generally favored—that till near the time of the Exile religion was not individual—that Jeh was thought of as concerned with the well-being of the people as a whole, and not with that of its individual members. "The individual was not the religious unit, but the family or tribe" (op. cit., 58). How anyone can entertain this idea in face of the plain indications of the OT itself to the contrary is to the present writer a mystery. There is, indeed, throughout the OT, a solidarity of the individual with his family and tribe, but not at any period to the exclusion of a personal relation to Jeh, or of individual moral and religious responsibility. The pictures of piety in the Book of Gen are nearly all individual, and the narratives containing them are, even on the critical view, older than the 9th cent. Adam, Noah, Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, are all of them, to the writers of the history, individuals; Moses, Joshua, Caleb, are individuals; the deeds of individuals are counted to them for righteousness; the sins of others slay them. If there had been ten righteous persons in Sodom, it would have been spared (Gen 18 32). It was as an individual that David sinned; as an individual he repented and was forgiven. Kings are judged or condemned according to their individual character. It is necessary to lay stress on this at the beginning; otherwise the whole series of the OT conceptions is distorted.

1. Fundamental Ideas.—The eschatology of the OT, as Dr. Charles also recognizes, is dependent on, and molded by, certain fundamental ideas in regard to God, man, the soul and the state after death, in which lies the peculiarity of Israel's religion. Only, these ideas are differently apprehended here from what they are in this writer's learned work.

In the view of Dr. Charles, Yahwē (Jehovah), who under Moses became the God of the Heb tribes, was,

1. Idea national God, bound up with the land of God and with this single people; therefore,

"possessing neither interest nor jurisdiction in the life of the individual beyond the grave. . . . Hence, since early Yahwism possessed no eschatology of its own, the individual Israelite was left to his hereditary heathen beliefs. These beliefs we found were elements of Ancestor Worship" (op. cit., 52; cf 35). The view taken here, on the contrary, is, that there is no period known to the OT in which Jeh—whether the name was older than Moses or not need not be discussed—was not recognized as the God of the whole earth, the Creator of the world and man, and Judge of all nations. He is, in both Gen 1 and 2, the Creator of the first pair from whom the whole race springs; He judged the whole world in the Flood; He chose Abraham to be a blessing to the families of the earth (Gen 12 3); His universal rule is acknowledged (Gen 18 25); in infinite grace, displaying His power over Egypt, He chose Israel to be a people to Himself (Ex 19 3-6). The ground for denying jurisdiction over the world of the dead thus falls. The word of Jesus to the Sadducees is applicable here: "Have ye not read . . . I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the dead, but of the living" (Mt 22 31.32). The OT instances of resurrection in answer to prayer point in the same direction (1 K 17 21 ff; 2 K 4 34 ff; cf Ps 10 10; 49 15, etc; see further, below).

According to Dr. Charles, the OT has two contradictory representations of the constitution of man, and of the effects of death. The older or pre-prophetic view distinguishes between soul and body in man (pp. 37 ff, 45 ff), and regards the soul as surviving death (this is not easily reconcilable with the other proposition [p. 37] that the "soul or nephesh is identical with the blood"), and as retaining a certain self-consciousness, and the power of speech and movement in Sheol (pp. 39 ff). This view is in many respects identical with that of ancestor worship, which is held to be the primitive belief in Israel (p. 41). The other and later view, which is thought to follow logically from the account in Gen 2 7, supposes the soul to perish at death (pp. 41 ff). We read there that "Jehovah God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." The "breath of life" (nishmath hayyim) is identified with the "spirit of life" (ruah hayyim) of Gen 6 17, and is taken to mean that the soul has no independent existence, but is "really a function of the material body when quickened by the [impersonal] spirit" (p. 42). "According to this view the annihilation of the soul ensues inevitably at death, that is, when the spirit is withdrawn" (p. 43). This view is held to be the parent of Sadduceism, and is actually affirmed to be the view of Paul (pp. 43-44, 409)—the apostle who repudiated Sadduceism in this very article (Acts 23 6-9).

Body, soul and spirit.—The above view of man's nature is here rejected, and the consistency of the OT doctrine affirmed. The Bib. view has nothing to do with ancestor worship (cf the writer's POT, 135-36). In Gen 1 26.27 man is created in God's image, and in the more anthropomorphic narrative of Gen 2 7, he becomes "a living soul" through a unique act of Divine inbreathing. The soul (nephesh) in man originates in a Divine inspiration (cf Job 32 8; 33 4; Isa 42 5), and is at once the animating principle of the body (the blood being its vehicle, Lev 17 11), with its appetites and desires, and the seat of the self-conscious personality, and source of rational and spiritual activities. It is these higher activities of the soul which, in the OT, are specially called "spirit" (ruah). Dr. Charles expresses this correctly in what he says of the supposed earlier view ("the ruah had become the seat of the highest spiritual functions in man," p. 46; see more fully the writer's God's Image in Man, 47 ff). There is no ground for deducing "annihilation" from Gen 2 7. Everywhere in Gen man is regarded as formed for living fellowship with God, and capable of knowing, worshipping and serving Him. See SOUL; SPIRIT.

It follows from the above account that man is regarded in the OT as a compound being, a union of body and soul (embracing spirit),

3. Sin and Death both being elements in his one personality. His destiny was not to death, but to life—not life, however, in separation of the soul from the body (disembodied existence), but continued embodied life, with, perhaps, as its sequel, change and translation to higher existence (thus Enoch, Elijah; the saints at the Parousia). This is the true original idea of immortality for man (see IMMORTALITY). Death, accordingly, is not, as it appears in Dr. Charles, a natural event, but an abnormal event—a mutilation, separation of two sides of man's being never intended to be separated—due, as the Scripture represents it, to the entrance of sin (Gen 2 17; 3 19.22; Rom 5 12; 1 Cor 15 21.22). It is objected that nothing further is said in the OT of a "Fall," and a subjection of man to death as the result of sin. In truth, however, the whole picture of mankind in the OT, as in the NT, is that of a world turned aside from God, and under His displeasure, and death and all natural evils are ever to be considered in relation to that fact (cf Dillmann, Alttest. Theol., 368, 376 ff; God's Image in Man, 198 ff, 249 ff). This alone explains the light in which death is regarded by holy men; their longing for deliverance from it (see below); the hope of resurrection; the place which resurrection—"the redemption of our body" (Rom 8 23)—after the pattern of Christ's resurrection (Phil 3 21), has in the Christian conception of immortality.

II. Conceptions of the Future Life—Sheol.—It is usual to find it contended that the Israelites, in contrast with other peoples, had not the conception of a future life till near Israel No the time of the Exile; that then, Belief in a through the teaching of the prophets Future Life? and the discipline of experience, ideas of individual immortality and of judgment to come first arose. There is, however, a good deal of ambiguity of language, if not confusion of thought, in such statements. It is true there is development in the teaching on a future life; true also that in the OT "life" and "immortality" are words of pregnant meaning, to which bare survival of the soul, and gloomy existence in Sheol, do not apply. But in the ordinary sense of the expression "future life," it is certain that the Israelites were no more without that notion than any of their neighbors, or than most of the peoples and races of the world to whom the belief is credited.

Israel, certainly, had not a developed mythology of the future life such as was found in Egypt. There, life in the other world almost overshadowed the life that now is; in contrast with this, perhaps because of it, Israel was trained to a severer reserve in regard to the future, and the hopes and promises to the nation—the rewards of righteousness and penalties of transgression—were chiefly temporal. The sense of individual responsibility, as was shown at the commencement, there certainly was—an individual relation to God. But the feeling of corporate existence—the sense of connection between the individual and his descendants—was strong, and the hopes held out to the faithful had respect rather to multiplication of seed, to outward prosperity, and to a happy state of existence (never without piety as its basis) on earth, than to a life beyond death. The reason of this and the qualifications needing to be made to the statement will afterward appear; but that the broad facts are as stated every reader of the OT will perceive for himself. Abraham is promised that his seed shall be multiplied as the stars of heaven, and that the land of Canaan shall be given them to dwell in (Gen 12 1-3; 15); Israel is encouraged by abundant promises of temporal blessing (Dt 11 8 ff; 28 1-14), and warned by the most terrible temporal curses (28 15 ff); David has pledged to him the sure succession of his house as the reward of obedience (2 S 7 11 ff). So in the Book of Job, the patriarch's fidelity is rewarded with return of his prosperity (ch 42). Temporal promises abound in the Prophets (Hos 2 14 ff; 14; Isa 1 19.26; 35, etc); the Book of Prov likewise is full of such promises (3 13 ff, etc).

All this, however, in no way implies that the Israelites had no conceptions of, or beliefs in, a state of being beyond death, or believed the death of the body to be the extinction of existence. This was very far from being the case. A hope of a future life it would be wrong to call it; for there was nothing to suggest hope, joy or life in the good sense, in the ideas they entertained of death or the hereafter. In this they resembled most peoples whose ideas are still primitive, but to whom it is

2. A Future State not not customary to deny belief in a future state. They stand as yet, though with differences to be afterward pointed out, Therefore on the general level of Sem peoples in their conceptions of what the future state was. This is also the view taken by Dr. Charles. He recognizes that early Israelitish thought attributed a "comparatively large measure of life, movement, knowledge and likewise power (?) to the departed in Sheol" (op. cit., 41). A people that does this is hardly destitute of all notions of a future state. This question of Sheol now demands more careful consideration. Here again our differences from Dr. Charles will reveal themselves.

Belief non-mythological.—It would, indeed, have been amazing had the Israelites, who dwelt so long in Egypt, where everything reminded of a future life, been wholly destitute of ideas on that subject. What is clear is that, as already observed, they did not adopt any of the Egypt notions into their religion. The simplicity of their belief in the God of their fathers kept them then and ever after from the importation of mythological elements into their faith. The Egypt Amenti may be said, indeed, to answer broadly to the Heb Sheol; but there is nothing in Israelitish thought to correspond to Osiris and his assessors, the trial in the hall of judgment, and the adventures and perils of the soul thereafter. What, then, was the Heb idea of Sheol, and how did it stand related to beliefs elsewhere?

That the soul, or some conscious part of man for which the name may be allowed to stand, does not perish at death, but passes into another

3. Survival of Soul, or other state of existence, commonly conceived of as shadowy and inert, is Conscious a belief found, not only among the Part lower, so-called nature-peoples, but in all ancient religions, even the most highly developed. The Egypt belief in Amenti, or abode of the dead, ruled over by Osiris, is alluded to above; the Bab Arallu (some find the word "Sualu"—sh'ol), the land of death, from which there is no return; the Gr Hades, gloomy abode of the shades of the departed, are outstanding witnesses to this conception (the various ideas may be seen, among other works, in Salmond, Christian Doctrine of Immortality, I [ideas of lower races, Indian, Egypt, Bab, Pers and Gr beliefs]; in Sayce, Hibbert Lectures, Religion of Ancient Babylonians, and Gifford Lectures, Religions of Ancient Egypt and Babylonia; Dr. Charles, Eschatology, ch iii, on Gr conceptions). The Heb conception of Sheol, the gathering-place of the dead, is not in essentials dissimilar. "The resemblance," says Dr. Salmond, "between the Heb Sheol, the Homeric Hades, and Bab Arallu is unmistakable" (op. cit., 3d ed, 173). As to its origin, Dr. Charles would derive the belief from ancestor worship. He supposes that "in all probability Sheol was originally conceived as a combination of the graves of the clan or nation, and as thus its final abode" (op. cit., 33). It is far from proved, however, that ancestor worship had the rôle he assigns to it in early religion; and, in any case, the explanation inverts cause and effect. The survival of the soul or shade is already assumed before there can be worship of ancestors. Far simpler is the explanation that man is conscious from the first of a thinking, active principle within him which disappears when death ensues, and he naturally thinks of this as surviving somewhere else, if only in a ghost-like and weakened condition (cf Max Müller, Anthropological Religion, 195, 281, 337-38). Whatever the explanation, it is the case that, by a sure instinct, peoples of low and high culture alike all but universally think of the conscious part of their dead as surviving. On natural grounds, the Hebrews did the same. Only, in the Scriptural point of view, this form of survival is too poor to be dignified with the high name of "immortality."

It is not necessary to do more than sketch the main features of the Heb sh'ol (see SHEOL). The word, the etymology of which is doubtful (the commonest derivations are from roots meaning "to ask" or "to be hollow," shā'al), is frequently, but erroneously, tr^d in RV "grave" or "hell." It denotes really, as already said, the place or abode of the dead, and is conceived of as situated in the depths of the earth (Ps 63 9; 86 13; Ezk 26 20; 31 14; 32 18,24; cf Nu 16 30; Dt 32 22). The dead are there gathered in companies; hence the frequently recurring expression, "gathered unto his people" (Gen 25 8; 35 29; 49 33; Nu 20 24, etc), the phrase denoting, as the context shows, something quite distinct from burial. Jacob, e.g. was "gathered unto his people"; afterward his body was embalmed, and, much later, buried (Gen 50 2 ff). Poetical descriptions of Sheol are not intended to be taken with literalness; hence it is a mistake, with Dr. Charles, to press such details as "bars" and "gates" (Job 17 16; 38 17; Ps 9 14; Isa 38 10, etc). In the general conception, Sheol is a place of darkness (Job 10 21,22; Ps 143 3), of silence (Ps 94 17; 115 17), of forgetfulness (Ps 88 12; Eccl 9 5,6,10). It is without remembrance or praise of God (Ps 6 5), or knowledge of what transpires on earth (Job 14 21). Even this language is not to be pressed too literally. Part of it is the expression of a depressed or despairing (cf Isa 38 10 ff) or temporarily skeptical (thus in Eccl; cf 12 7,13,14) mood; all of it is relative, emphasizing the contrast with the brightness, joy and activity of the earthly life (cf Job 10 22, "where the light is as midnight"—comparative). Elsewhere it is recognized that consciousness remains; in Isa 14 9 ff the shades (r'phā'im) of once mighty kings are stirred up to meet the descending king of Babylon (cf Ezk 32 21). If Sheol is sometimes described as "destruction" (Job 26 6 m; 28 22; Prov 15 11 m) and "the pit" (Ps 30 9; 55 23), at other times, in contrast with the weariness and trouble of life, it is figured and longed for as a place of "rest" and "sleep" (Job 3 17 ff; 14 12,13). Always, however, as with other peoples, existence in Sheol is represented as feeble, inert, shadowy, devoid of living interests and aims, a true state of the dead (on Egypt, Bab and Gr analogies, cf Salmond, op. cit., 54-55, 73-74, 99 ff, 173-74). The idea of Dr. Charles, already commented on, that Sheol is outside the jurisdiction of Jeh, is contradicted by many passages (Dt 32 22; Job 26 6; Prov 15 11; Ps 139 8; Am 9 2, etc; cf above).

III. The Religious Hope—Life and Resurrection.—Such is Sheol, regarded from the standpoint of nature; a somewhat different aspect is presented when it is looked at from the point of view of grace. As yet no trace is discernible between righteous and wicked in Sheol; the element of retribution seems absent. Reward and punishment are in this world; not in the state beyond. Yet one must beware of drawing too sweeping conclusions even here. The state, indeed, of weakened consciousness and slumbrous inaction of Sheol does not admit of much distinction, and the thought of exchanging the joys of life for drear existence in that gloomy underworld may well have appalled the stoutest hearts, and provoked sore and bitter complainings. Even the Christian can bewail a life brought to a sudden and untimely close.

But even on natural grounds it is hardly credible that the pious Israelite thought of the state of the godly gathered in peace to their people as quite the same as those who perished under the ban of God's anger, and went down to Sheol bearing their iniquity. There is a pregnancy not to be overlooked in such expressions as, "The wicked shall be turned back unto Sheol" (Ps 9 17), a "lowest Sheol" unto which God's anger burns (Dt 32 22), "utmost parts of the pit" (Isa 14 15; Ezk 32 23) to which the proud and haughty in this life are consigned. Dr. Charles goes so far as to find a "penal character of Sheol" in Pss 49 and 73 (op. cit., 74). Consolation breathes in such utterances as, "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for there is a happy end to the man of peace" (Ps 37 37), or (with reference to the being taken from the evil to come), "He entereth into peace; they rest in their beds, each one that walketh in his uprightness" (Isa 57 2; cf ver 21: "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked"). Even Balaam's fervent wish, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his" (Nu 23 10), seems weakened when interpreted only of the desire for a green and blessed old age. It is possible to read too much into OT expressions; the tendency at the present time would seem to be to read a great deal too little (P. Fairbairn, Typology of Scripture, I, 173 ff, 422 ff, may profitably be consulted).

To get at the true source and nature of the hope of immortality in the OT, however, it is necessary to go much farther than the idea of any happier condition in Sheol. This dismal region is never there connected with ideas of "life" or "immortality" in any form. Writers who suppose that the hopes which find utterance in passages of Pss and Prophets have any connection with existence in Sheol are on an altogether wrong track. It is not the expectation of a happier condition in Sheol, but the hope of deliverance from Sheol, and of restored life and fellowship with God, which occupies the mind. How much this implies deserves careful consideration.

It has already been seen that, in the OT, Sheol, like death, is not the natural fate of man. A connection with sin and judgment is implied in it. Whatever Sheol might be like Death, to the popular, unthinking mind, to the reflecting spirit, that really grasped the fundamental ideas of the religion of Jeh, it was a state wholly contrary to man's true destiny. It was, as seen, man's dignity in distinction from the animal, that he was not created under the law of death. Disembodied existence, which is of necessity enfeebled, partial, imperfect existence, was no part of the Divine plan for man. His immortality was to be in the body, not out of it. Separation of soul and body, an after-existence of the soul in Sheol, belong to the doom of sin. Dr. Salmond fully recognizes this in his discussion of the subject. "The penal sense of death colours all that the OT says of man's end. It is in its thoughts where it is not in its words" (op. cit., 159; see the whole passage; cf also Oehler, Theol. of the OT, I, 242 ff, ET; A. B. Davidson, Theol. of the OT, 432 ff, 439 ff). The true type of immortality is therefore to be seen in cases like those of Enoch (Gen 5 24; cf He 11 5) and Elijah (2 K 2 11); of a bare "immortality of the soul," Scripture has nothing to say.

It is on all hands conceded that, so far as the hope of immortality, in any full or real sense, is found in the OT, it is connected with religious faith and hope. It has not a natural, but a religious, root. It springs from the believer's trust and confidence in the living God; from his conviction that God—his God—who has bound him to Himself in the bonds of an unchanging covenant, whose everlasting arms are underneath him (Dt 33 27; cf Ps 90

2. Religious 1), will not desert him even in Sheol. Root of —will be with him there, and will give Hope of him victory over its terrors (cf A. B. Davidson, Comm. on Job, 293–95; Salmond, op. cit., 175). Life is not bare existence; it consists in God's favor and fellowship (Ps 16 11; 30 5; 63 3). The relevant passages in Pss and Prophets will be considered after. Only, it is contended by the newer school, this hope of immortality belongs to a late stage of Israel's religion—to a period when, through the development of the monotheistic idea, the growth of the sense of individuality, the acute feeling of the contradictions of life, this great "venture" of faith first became possible. One asks, however, Was it so? Was this hope so entirely a matter of "intuitive ventures, and forecasts of devout souls in moments of deepest experience or keenest conflict," as this way of considering the matter represents?

Not necessarily late.—That the hope of immortality could only exist for strong faith is self-evident. But did strong faith come into existence only in the days of the prophets or the Exile? Exception has already been taken to the assumption that monotheism was a late growth, and that individual faith in God was not found in early times. It is not to be granted without demur that, as now commonly alleged, the Pss and the Book of Job, which express this hope, are post-exilic products. If, however, faith in a covenant-keeping God is of earlier date—if it is present in patriarchal and Mosaic days—the question is not, Why should it not give rise to similar hopes? but rather, How should it be prevented from doing so? If a patriarch like Abraham truly walked with God, and received His promises, could he, any more than later saints, be wholly distrustful of God's power to keep and deliver him in and from Sheol? It is hard to credit it. It is replied, there is no evidence of such hope. Certainly these ancient saints did not write psalms or speak with the tongues of prophets. But is there nothing in their quiet and trustful walk, in their tranquil deaths, in their sense of uncompleted promises, in their pervading confidence in God in all the vicissitudes of life, to suggest that they, too, were able to commit themselves into the hands of God in death, and to trust Him to see that it was, or would ultimately be, well with them in the future? Thus at least Jesus understood it (Mt 22 32); thus NT writers believed (He 11 13, 14). Faith might falter, but in principle, this hope must have been bound up with faith from the beginning.

This raises now the crucial question, What shape did this hope of immortality assume? It was not, as already seen, an immortality enjoyed in Sheol; it could only then be a hope connected with deliverance from the power of Sheol—in essence, whether precisely formulated or not, a hope of resurrection. It is, we believe, because this has been overlooked, that writers on the subject have gone so often astray in their discussions on immortality in the OT. They have thought of a blessedness in the future life of the soul (thus Charles, op. cit., 76–77); whereas the redemption the Bible speaks of invariably embraces the whole personality of man, body and soul together. Jesus, it may be remembered, thus interprets the words, "I am the God of Abraham," etc (Mt 22 32), as a pledge not simply of continued existence, but of resurrection. This accords with what has been seen of the connection of death with sin and its abnormality in the case of man. The immortality man would have enjoyed, had he not sinned, would have been an immortality of his whole person. It will be seen immediately that this is borne out by all the passages in which the hope of immortality is expressed in the OT. These never contemplate a mere immortality of the soul, but always imply resurrection.

(1) Not a late or foreign doctrine.—If the above is correct, it follows that it is a mistake to place the belief in resurrection so late as is often done, still more to derive it from Zoroastrianism (thus Cheyne, Origin of Psalter, lect viii) or other foreign sources. It was a genuine corollary from the fundamental Israelitish beliefs about God, man, the soul, sin, death and redemption. Professor Gunkel emphasizes "the immeasurable significance" of this doctrine, and speaks of it as "one of the greatest things found anywhere in the history of religion," but thinks "it cannot be derived from within Judaism itself, but must take its origin from a ruling belief in the Orient of the later time" (Zum religions-geschichtlichen Verständnis des NT, 32-33; for criticism of Gunkel's positions see the writer's Resurrection of Jesus, 255 ff). To make good his theory, however, he has to discount all the evidences for the belief furnished by the earlier OT writings, and this, it is believed, cannot be done successfully. It was before noted that cases of resurrection appear in the historical books (1 K 17 21 ff; 2 K 4 34 ff). It is not impossible that the reverent care of the patriarchs for their dead was, as with the Egyptians, inspired by some hope of this kind (Gen 23; 50 5.25; Ex 13 19; cf He 11 22). In any case an impartial survey of the evidence proves that the thought of resurrection colors all the later expressions of the hope of immortality (see IMMORTALITY; cf also the writer's appendix on the subject in Christian View of God, 200 ff).

(2) The Psalms.—The passages in the Pss in which faith rises to the hope of immortality are principally Ps 16 8-11; 17 15; 49 14.15; 73 24. There are a few others, but these are the chief, and so far as they are allowed to express a hope of immortality at all, they do so in a form which implies resurrection. Dr. Cheyne, believing them to be influenced by Zoroastrianism, formerly granted this (Origin of Psalter, lect viii); now he reads the passages differently. There is no good reason for putting these psalms in post-exilic times, and, taken in their most natural sense, their testimony seems explicit. Ps 16 8-11 (cited in Acts 2 24-31 as a prophecy of the resurrection of Christ) reads "My flesh also shall dwell in safety [or confidently, m]. For thou wilt not leave my soul to Sheol; neither wilt thou suffer thy holy one to see corruption [or the pit, m]. Thou wilt show me the path of life," etc. In Ps 17 15, the Psalmist, after describing the apparent prosperity of the wicked, says, "As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with beholding thy form" (AV, ERV, "with thy likeness"). Cheyne (op. cit., 406) refers this to the resurrection (cf Delitzsch, Perowne, etc.). Yet more explicit is Ps 49 14.15, "They [the wicked] are appointed as a flock for Sheol . . . and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning. . . . But God will redeem my soul from the power [hand, m] of Sheol; for he will receive me." The last clause, lit. "He will take me," has, as Perowne, Delitzsch, Cheyne (formerly), even Duhm, allow, allusion to cases like those of Enoch and Elijah. It cannot, however, contemplate actual bodily translation; it must therefore refer to resurrection. Similar in strain is Ps 73 24, "Thou wilt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory." Dr. Charles grants that, in Ps 49 and 73, "God takes the righteous to Himself" in heaven (pp. 76-77), but fails to connect this with the doctrine of resurrection which he finds appearing about the same time (p. 78).

(3) The Book of Job.—Before looking at the prophets, a glance should be taken at the Book of Job, which, irrespective of date (it is quite unwarrantably made post-exilic), reflects patriarchal conditions. Ch 14 raises the question, "If a man die, shall he live again?" (ver 14), and it is to be remarked that the form in which it does it, is the possibility of bodily revival. The appearances hostile to man's living again are enumerated (vs 7-12), then faith, reasserting itself, flings itself on God to accomplish the apparently impossible: "Oh that thou wouldst hide me in Sheol, that thou wouldst keep me secret, until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldst appoint me a set time and remember me. . . . Thou wouldst call and I would answer thee: thou wouldst have a desire to the work of thy hands" (vs 13-15; m reads "Thou shalt call," etc.). Dr. A. B. Davidson says, "To his mind this involves a complete return to life again of the whole man" (Cambridge Comm. on Job, in loc.). With this must be taken the splendid outburst in 19 25-27, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," etc, which, whatever doubts may attach to the precise rendering of certain clauses, undoubtedly expresses a hope not inferior in strength to that in the verse just quoted.

(4) The Prophets.—The presence of the idea of resurrection in the Prophets is not doubted, but the passages are put down to exilic or pre-exilic times, and are explained of "spiritual" or "national," not of individual, resurrection (cf Charles, op. cit., 128-29). It seems plain, however, that, before the figure of resurrection could be applied to the nation, the idea of resurrection must have been there; and it is by no means clear that in certain of the passages the resurrection of individuals is not included. Cheyne granted this regarding the passages in Isa (25 6-8; 26 19): "This prospect concerns not merely the church-nation, but all of its believing members, and indeed all, whether Jews or not, who submit to the true king, Jeh" (op. cit., 402). There is no call for putting the remarkable passages in Hos—"After two days will he revive us: on the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live before him" (6 2); "I will ransom them from the power of Sheol: I will redeem them from death: O death, where are thy plagues? O Sheol, where is thy destruction?" (13 14)—later than the time of that prophet. In them the idea of resurrection is already fully present; as truly as in the picture in Ezk 37 1-10 of the valley of dry bones. The climax is, however, reached in Isa 25 6-8; 26 19, above referred to, from which the individual element cannot be excluded (cf Salmond, op. cit., 211-12: "The theme of this great passage, 26 19, therefore, is a personal, not a corporate resurrection").

(5) Daniel—resurrection of wicked.—Finally, in the OT we have the striking statement in Dnl 12 2, "And many of them that sleep in the dust . . . shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament," etc. The peculiarity of this passage is, that in it, for the first time, is announced a resurrection of the wicked as well as of the righteous (cf in the NT Jn 5 28.29; Acts 24 15; Rev 20 12 ff). The word "many" is not to be understood in contrast with "all," though probably only Israel is in view. The event is connected with a "time of trouble" (ver 1) following upon the overthrow of Antiochus, here representative of Antichrist. The really difficult problem is, How did this conception of the resurrection of the wicked come about? The resurrection of the righteous, it has been seen, is a corollary from the covenant-faithfulness of Jeh.

But this does not apply to the wicked. Whence then does the idea come? It is given as a revelation, but even revelation connects itself with existing ideas and experiences. The resurrection of the wicked, certainly, does not arise, like that of the righteous, from the consciousness of an indissoluble union with God, but it may well arise from the opposite conviction of the judgment of God. As the sense of individuality grew strong—and it is granted that the teaching of the prophets did much to strengthen that feeling—and the certainty of moral retribution developed, it was inevitable that this should react on the conception of the future, in making it as certain that the wicked should be punished, as that the good should be rewarded, in the world to come. Naturally too, as the counterpart of the other belief, this shaped itself into the form of a resurrection to judgment. We are thus brought, as a last step, to consider the idea of judgment and its effects as found in the prophetic teaching.

IV. The Idea of Judgment—the Day of Jehovah.—It was seen that, under Mosaism, the promises and threatenings of God were mainly confined to the present life, and that the sense of distinctions in Sheol, though not absent, was vague and wavering. Through temporal dispensations men were trained to faith in the reality of moral retribution. Under the prophets, while the judgments of God on nations and individuals were still primarily viewed as pertaining to this life, there gradually shaped itself a further idea—that of an approaching consummation of history, or Day of Jehovah, when God's enemies would be completely overthrown, His righteousness fully vindicated and His kingdom established in triumph throughout the earth. The developments of this idea may now briefly be exhibited. In this relation, it need only be stated that the writer does not follow the extraordinary mangling of the prophetic texts by certain critics, accepted, though with some misgiving, by Dr. Charles.

The "Day of Jehovah," in the prophetic writings, is conceived of, sometimes more generally, as denoting any great manifestation of God's power in judgment or salvation (e.g. the locusts in Joel 2), sometimes more eschatologically, of the final crisis in the history of God's kingdom, involving the overthrow of all opposition, and the complete triumph of righteousness (e.g. Isa 2 2-5; Joel 3; Am 9 11 ff; Zec 14, etc.). The two things are not unconnected; the one is the prelude, or anticipatory stage, of the other. That feature of prophetic vision sometimes spoken of as the absence of perspective is very conspicuous in the fact that chronology is largely disregarded, and the "Day of Jehovah" is seen looming up as the immediate background of every great crisis in which the nation may for the time be involved (Assyrian invasions; Bab captivity; Maccabean persecution). The one thing ever certain to the prophet's mind is that the "Day" is surely coming—it is the one great, dread, yet for God's people joyful, event of the future—but the steps by which the goal is to be reached are only gradually revealed in the actual march of God's providence.

(1) Relation to Israel.—The "Day" is in its primary aspect a day of judgment (Isa 2 12); not, however, to be thought of as a day of vengeance only on the adversaries of Israel (Am 5 18 ff). Israel itself would be the first to experience the strokes of the Divine chastisement: "You only have I known of all the families of the earth: therefore I will visit upon you all your iniquities" (Am 3 2). God's judgments on Israel, while retributive, were also purifying and sifting; a "remnant" would remain, who would be the seed of a holier community (Isa 6 13; Am 9 9; Zeph 3 13, 20, etc.). The Book of Hos beautifully exhibits this aspect of the Divine dealings.

(2) To the nations.—Of wider scope is the relation of the "Day" to the gentile world. The nations are used as the instruments of God's judgments on Israel (Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians), but they, too, would in turn be judged by Jeh (cf the prophecies against the nations in Isa, Jer, Eek, Nah, Hab, etc.). The end would be, although this does not fully appear in every prophet, that a remnant of the heathen also would turn to Jeh, and be rescued from the judgment (Zec 14 16). More generally, an extension of the kingdom of God would take place till the earth was filled with God's glory (e.g. Isa 2 2-5, with Mic 4 1-5; Isa 42 4; 60; 66 3-6; Jer 12 14-16; 16 19-21; Ezk 16 53, 55, 61, God will turn the captivity of Sodom and her daughters; Am 9 11; Hab 2 14; cf Ps 22 27-31; 65 2, 5; 86 9; 87). These events, in prophetic speech, belong to "the latter days" (Isa 2 2; Jer 48 47; Ezk 38 16; Hos 3 5; Mic 4 1). In Daniel's great prophecy of the four kingdoms, these are represented as broken in pieces by the kingdom of heaven, symbolized by a stone cut out of the mountain without hands (Dnl 2 44, 45; cf 7 27). The kingdom is given by the Ancient of Days to one "like unto a son of man" (7 13). Haggai and Zechariah, the post-exilic prophets, share in these glowing hopes (Hag 2 6, 7; Zec 2 10; 8 20-23; 14 16). In Mal is found one of the noblest of all the prophetic utterances: "From the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same my name shall be great among the Gentiles," etc (1 11); and prophecy closes with the announcement of Him, Jeh's messenger, by whom this "great and terrible day of Jeh" is to be brought in (Mal 4).

The purview, in what is said of the "Day of Jehovah," is thus seen to be confined to earth, though the references to resurrection, and the passages in the close of Isa (65 17; 66 22) about "new heavens and a new earth" imply a further vista. The hope of immortality—of resurrection life—in the case of the righteous has already been considered. But what of judgment after death in the case of the wicked? Only dim premonitions of retribution, it was seen, are found in the earlier doctrine of Sheol. There are frequent references to "judgment" in the Pss, sometimes on the world (e.g. 96 13; 98 9; cf 50), sometimes on individuals (e.g. 1 5), but it is doubtful if any of them look beyond earth. Yet many things combined to force this problem on the attention.

(1) Incompleteness of moral administration.—There was the sharpening of the sense of individual responsibility in the prophetic age (Jer 31 29, 30; Ezk 18 2 ff), and the obvious fact of the incompleteness of the Divine moral administration in the present life, as respects the individual. The working of moral laws could be discerned, but this fell far short of exact individual retribution. Life was full of moral anomalies and perplexities (cf Job, Book of).

(2) Prosperity of wicked.—There was the special difficulty that the wicked did not always seem to meet with the punishment due to their misdeeds in time. On the contrary they often seemed to flourish, to have success in their schemes, to triumph over the godly, who were afflicted and oppressed. This was the enigma that so painfully exercised the minds of the psalmists (Pss 10, 17, 37, 49, 73, etc.). The solution they found was that the prosperity of the wicked did not endure. It came to a sudden end (Ps 37 35, 36; 73 18-20), while the righteous had a sure compensation in the future (Ps 17 15; 49 15; 73 24, etc.). It was not, however, always the case that the wicked were thus visibly cut off. Besides, a sudden end hardly seemed an adequate punishment for a long career of triumphant iniquity, and, if the righteous were recompensed hereafter, the thought lay near that the wicked might be, and should be, also.

(3) Suffering of righteous with wicked.—There was the kindred fact that, in the calamities that overtook the wicked, the righteous were often the involuntary sharers. The wicked did not suffer by themselves; the godly were involved in the storm of judgment (war, captivity, plagues) that broke upon them. Here was something else calling for redress at the hands of a God of righteousness.

From these causes the thought almost necessarily presented itself of the extension of retribution for the wicked into the state beyond

3. Retribution beyond death. Hence, as before seen, Sheol did come in the later age to assume something of a penal character for the unrighteous. There was a wrath of God that burned to the lowest Sheol (Dt 32 22; cf Charles, op. cit., 74). But this abode of the shades was not, for the evil any more than for the good, a fitting sphere for moral recompense. If, for the complete reward of the righteous, a resurrection-state was necessary, did not the same hold true for the wicked? It is questioned whether the very definite announcements of an individual judgment in Eccl 11 9; 12 14 refer to the state beyond death—it is probable that they do (cf Salmond, op. cit., 216–17). The first clear intimation of a resurrection of the wicked, however, is found, as already said, in Dnl 12 2, which likewise implies judgment. Perhaps a hint of the same idea is given in Isa 66 24: "They shall go forth [the prophet is speaking of the times of the new heavens and the new earth, ver 22], and look upon the dead bodies of the men that have transgressed against me: for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh." Dr. Charles connects this with the idea of Gehenna as "a place of punishment for rebellious and apostate Jews," which he thinks also to be implied in Isa 50 11 (op. cit., 158). It is the same word "abhorrence" (dēra'ôn), found in the above passage, which is rendered in Dnl 12 2 "contempt," and Dr. Charles says "the reference in both is to Gehenna," and the punishment "is conceived of as eternal" (pp. 158–59).

It is hardly possible to carry the subject farther within the limits of the OT. Further developments belong to the later Judaism.

V. Later Jewish Conceptions—Apocryphal, Apocalyptic, Rabbinical.—The sources of our knowledge of the eschatological concep-

1. Sources tions among the Jews in the immediately pre-Christian period are:

(1) Apocrypha.—The books of the OT Apoc (see APOCRYPHA), taken over, with the exception of 2 Esd, from the LXX. 2 Esd, better known as 4 Esd, is more properly classed with the apocalyptic writings. The original work consists only of chs 3–14, with a passage in ch 7 not found in the ordinary version. The book is post-Christian (c 80–96 AD).

(2) Apocalyptic literature (see art. under that head, II, i, 1; II, ii).—The remains of this lit. consist of the Sib Or (oldest parts, Book III, from 2d cent. BC), the Book En (see below), the Ps Sol (70–40 BC), with the Apoc Bar (50–100 AD), the Book of Jub, and XII P (see below), the Asm M (early 1st cent. AD), and the Asc Isa (before 50 AD). A good deal turns on the dating of some of these books. Several (Apoc Bar, Asm M, Asc Isa, with 4 Esd) are post-Christian.

The Book of Jub and XII P have also usually been regarded as such, but Dr. Charles argues for dates going back to the close of the 2d cent. BC for both. Late Jewish and Christian additions are recognized in the latter. Formerly Dr. Charles dated Jub "before 10 AD." The chief dispute relates to chs 37–70 (the "Similitudes") of the Book of En. These important sections are held by some (Dr. Stanton, etc) to be post-Christian (end of 1st cent. AD)—a view to which we incline; Dr. Charles and others place them in the 1st cent. BC. Most of the remaining portions of the book are assigned to dates in the 2d cent. BC. To the above should be added the notices of Jewish opinions in Jos.

(3) Rabbinical writings.—For rabbinical ideas, we are chiefly dependent on the Talmudic writings and the Tgs—sources whose late character makes their witness often doubtful (see TALMUD; TAGS).

It is only possible to summarize very briefly the varying and frequently conflicting conceptions on eschatological subjects to be gleaned

2. Description of Views from this extensive lit. The representation of and, so far as they are not genuine developments from OT ideas, have value only as they may be supposed to throw light on the teachings of the NT. With one or two exceptions, little is to be gathered from the apocryphal books, and it will be best to treat the subject under headings.

(1) Less definite conceptions.—In the apocryphal Ecclus (Wisdom of the Son of Sirach) we remain still on the old ground of Sheol as a place in which there is no remembrance, thanksgiving or retribution (17 27, 28; 41 3, 4, etc); a somewhat different note is heard in 21 10). It is the same in Bar (2 17) and Tob (3 6). In 1 Macc we have simply the OT phrases, "gathered to his fathers" (2 69), "gathered to his people" (14 30). In the Book of Wisd, the influence of Gr ideas is seen in a doctrine of the immortality of the soul only (2 23; 3 1–4; 4 13, 14; 15 3; not a resurrection), possibly of preëxistence (8 20). The wicked suffer punishment in Sheol (3 1–10; 5 1–14, etc).

(2) Ideas of Sheol.—Generally, however, in the apocalyptic books, a marked change is seen in the ideas of Sheol. It is still the place of the dead, but is regarded more as a state intermediate between death and the resurrection for such as shall be raised; in which righteous and wicked are separated; in which the wicked suffer punishment. The Book of En distinguishes four abodes for the departed—two for the righteous, and two for the wicked (21 1–13). One class of the wicked (those already punished in this life) remain there forever, while the others are raised, and pass to the torment of Gehenna (17 2). The righteous are in Paradise—"the garden of life" (61 12), "the garden of righteousness" (67 3). This character of Sheol as a place of punishment (intermediate or final) is met with frequently (Book of Jub 7 29; 22 22; 2 Macc 6 23; Ps Sol 14 6; 15 11; 16 2, etc). In certain places, Dr. Charles says, "Sheol has become an abode of fire, and therefore synonymous so far with Gehenna. . . . In several passages in the Similitudes, and throughout En 91–104, Sheol and Gehenna are practically identical" (op. cit., 237). Similar ideas are found in the Slavonic version of En (ib, 261 ff).

(3) The fallen angels.—Much prominence in the Book of En is given to the fallen angels (those who sinned with women, Gen 6 2). They are consigned in the judgment to ever-burning fire (En 21 1–6; 90 20–25).

(4) Resurrection.—Ideas of the resurrection vary. In En 22, the righteous and one class of the wicked are raised; elsewhere all the righteous are raised and none of the wicked (En 61 5; 90 33; Ps Sol 3 16); sometimes there is to be a resurrection of all, just and unjust (En 51 1.2). 2 Macc dwells much on the resurrection, which seems to embrace all Israel (3 16; 13 9; 7 9.14.23, etc.). For the Gentiles there is no resurrection (7 14.36). In En 90 38, the bodies of the righteous are described as "transformed" in the resurrection (cf in the "Similitudes," 39 7; 51 4; 62 15). The doctrine of the resurrection (universal) is taught in the Apoc Bar 30 2-5; 50, 51, and in 4 Esd 7 32-37. In Jos the Pharisees are said to have believed in the resurrection of the righteous only (Ant, XVIII, i, 3). This does not coincide with Paul's statement in Acts 24 15.

(5) Judgment.—The reality of a final judgment, supervening upon the intermediate judgment in Sheol, is strongly affirmed in most of the apocalyptic books. The Book of En speaks much of this final judgment. It describes it as "the great day," "the righteous judgment," "the great day of judgment," "the last judgment," "the judgment of all eternity" (10 6.12; 16 1; 19 1; 22 4.11; 25 4; 90 26.27, etc.). Wicked angels and men are judged, and sentenced to Gehenna—a doom without end.

The Messiah: An interesting point is the relation of the Messiah to this judgment. With the exception of 4 Esd, the apocryphal books are silent on the Messiah. In the apocalyptic books the Messiah does appear, but not always in the same light. In the Sib Or (3), Ps of Sol (17, 18), Apoc Bar (39, 40) and in 4 Esd (13 32 ff) the appearance of Messiah is associated with the overthrow and judgment of the ungodly worldly powers; in the older portions of En (90 16-25) God Himself executes this judgment, and holds the great assize—the Messiah does not appear till after. In the sec. of En, chs 37-70, on the other hand, the Messiah appears definitely as the judge of the world, and titles resembling those in the NT, "the Righteous One" (38 2; 53 6), "the Elect One" (40 5; 45 3. 4, etc.), above all, "the Son of Man" (46 2-4; 48 2, etc.), are given Him. It is these passages which suggest Christian influence, especially as the conception is not found elsewhere in pre-Christian Apocalypse, and the Book of Jub, which refers otherwise to En, makes no mention of these passages. Yet another idea appears in later Apocalypse, that, viz. of a limited reign of Messiah, after which take place the resurrection and judgment. 4 Esd has the extraordinary notion that, after a reign of 400 years, the Messiah dies (7 28.29). God in this case is the judge.

(6) The Messianic age and the Gentiles.—The Messianic age, when conceived of as following the judgment (the older view), is unlimited in duration, has Jerus for its center, and includes in the scope of its blessing the converted Gentiles (Sib Or 3 698-726; En 90 30.37; cf 48 5; 53 1; Ps Sol 17 32-35). The righteous dead of Israel are raised to participate in the kingdom. Already in En 90 28.29 is found the idea that the new Jerus is not the earthly city, but a city that comes down from heaven, where, as in 4 Esd, the Messianic reign is limited, the blessed life after resurrection is transferred to heaven.

(7) Rabbinical ideas.—Little is to be added from the rabbinical conceptions, which, besides being difficult to ascertain precisely, are exceedingly confused and contradictory. Most of the ideas above mentioned appear in rabbinical teaching. With the destruction of the hostile world-powers is connected in later rabbinism the appearance of "Armilus"—an Antichrist. The reign of Messiah is generally viewed as limited in duration—400 years (as in 4 Esd), and 1,000 years being mentioned (cf Schürer, Hist of Jewish People, Div II, Vol II, 179, ET). At its close takes place a renovation of the world, resurrection (for Israelites only, certain classes being excluded), judgment, and eternal heavenly happiness for the righteous. The punishments of the wicked appear mostly to be regarded as eternal, but the view is also met with of a limited duration of punishment (see authorities in Schürer, op. cit., 183; Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, app. XIX, and other works noted in "Literature" below).

LITERATURE

I. Doctrinal and Religious Significance.—The subject of eschatology plays a prominent part in NT teaching and religion. Christianity in its very origin bears an eschatological character. It means the appearance of the Messiah and the inauguration of His work; and from the OT point of view these form part of eschatology. It is true in Jewish theology the days of the Messiah were not always included in the eschatological age proper, but often regarded as introductory to it (cf Weber, Jüdische Theol., 371 ff). And in the NT also this point of view is to some extent represented, inasmuch as, owing to the appearance of the Messiah and the only partial fulfilment of the prophecies for the present, that which the OT depicted as one synchronous movement is now seen to divide into two stages, viz. the present Messianic age and the consummate state of the future. Even so, however, the NT draws the Messianic period into much closer connection with the strictly eschatological process than Judaism. The distinction in Judaism rested on a consciousness of difference in quality between the two stages, the content of the Messianic age being far less spiritually and transcendently conceived than that of the final state. The NT, by spiritualizing the entire Messianic circle of ideas, becomes keenly alive to its affinity to the content of the highest eternal hope, and consequently tends to identify the two, to find the age to come anticipated in the present. In some cases this assumes explicit shape in the belief that great eschatological transactions have already begun to take place, and that believers have already attained to at least partial enjoyment of eschatological privileges. Thus the present kingdom in Our Lord's teaching is one in essence with the final kingdom; according to the discourses in John eternal life is in principle realized here; with Paul there has been a prelude to the last judgment and resurrection in the death and resurrection of Christ, and the life in the Spirit is the first-fruits of the heavenly state to come. The strong sense of this may even express itself in the paradoxical form that the eschatological state has arrived and the one great incision in history has already been made (He 2 3.5; 9 11; 10 1; 12 22-24). Still, even where this extreme consciousness is reached, it nowhere supersedes the other more common representation, according to which the present state continues to lie this side of the eschatological crisis, and, while directly leading up to the latter, yet remains to all intents a part of the old age and world-order. Believers live in the "last days," upon them "the ends of the ages are come," but "the last day," "the consummation of the age," still lies in the future (Mt 13 39.40.49; 24 3; 28 20; Jn 6 39.44.54; 12 48; 1 Cor 10 11; 2 Tim 3 1; He 1 2; 9 26; Jas 5 3; 1 Pet 1 5.20; 2 Pet 3 3; 1 Jn 2 18; Jude ver 18).

The eschatological interest of early believers was no mere fringe to their religious experience, but the very heart of its inspiration. It expressed and embodied the profound supernaturalism and soteriological character of the NT faith. The coming world was not to be the product of natural development but of a Divine interposition arresting the process of history. And the deepest motive of the longing for this world was a conviction of the abnormal character of the present world, a strong sense of sin and evil. This explains why the NT doctrine of salvation has grown up to a large extent in the closest interaction with its eschatological teaching. The present experience was interpreted in the light of the future. It is necessary to keep this in mind for a proper appreciation of the generally prevailing hope that the return of the Lord might come in the near future. Apocalyptic calculation had less to do with this than the practical experience that the earnest of the supernatural realities of the life to come was present in the church, and that therefore it seemed unnatural for the full fruition of these to be long delayed. The subsequent receding of this acute eschatological state has something to do with the gradual disappearance of the miraculous phenomena of the apostolic age.

II. General Structure.—NT eschatology attaches itself to the OT and to Jewish belief as developed on the basis of ancient revelation. It creates on the whole no new system or new terminology, but incorporates much that was current, yet so as to reveal by selection and distribution of emphasis the essential newness of its spirit. In Judaism there existed at that time two distinct types of eschatological outlook. There was the ancient national hope which revolved around the destiny of Israel. Alongside of it existed a transcendental form of eschatology with cosmical perspective, which had in view the destiny of the universe and of the human race. The former of these represents the original form of OT eschatology, and therefore occupies a legitimate place in the beginnings of the NT development, notably in the revelations accompanying the birth of Christ and in the earlier (synoptical) preaching of John the Baptist. There entered, however, into it, as held by the Jews, a considerable element of individual and collective eudaemonism, and it had become identified with a literalistic interpretation of prophecy, which did not sufficiently take into account the typical import and poetical character of the latter. The other scheme, while to some extent the product of subsequent theological development, lies prefigured in certain later prophecies, esp. in Dnl, and, far from being an importation from Bab, or ultimately Pers, sources, as some at present maintain, represents in reality the true development of the inner principles of OT prophetic revelation. To it the structure of NT eschatology closely conforms itself. In doing this, however, it discards the impure motives and elements by which even this relatively higher type of Jewish eschatology was contaminated. In certain of the apocalyptic writings a compromise is attempted between these two schemes after this manner, that the carrying out of the one is merely to follow that of the other, the national hope first receiving its fulfilment in a provisional Messianic kingdom of limited duration (400 or 1,000 years), to be superseded at the end by the eternal state. The NT does not follow the Jewish theology along this path. Even though it regards the present work of Christ as preliminary to the consummate order of things, it does not separate the two in essence or quality, it does not exclude the Messiah from a supreme place in the coming world, and does not expect a temporal Messianic kingdom in the future as distinguished from Christ's present spiritual reign, and as preceding the state of eternity. In fact the figure of the Messiah becomes central in the entire eschatological process, far more so than is the case in Judaism. All the stages in this process, the resurrection, the judgment, the life eternal, even the intermediate state, receive the impress of the absolute significance which Christian faith ascribes to Jesus as the Christ. Through this Christocentric character NT eschatology acquires also far greater unity and simplicity than can be predicated of the Jewish schemes. Everything is practically reduced to the great ideas of the resurrection and the judgment as consequent upon the Parousia of Christ. Much apocalyptic embroidery to which no spiritual significance attached is eliminated. While the overheated phantasy tends to multiply and elaborate, the religious interest tends toward concentration and simplification.

III. Course of Development.—In NT eschatological teaching a general development in a well-defined direction is traceable. The starting-point is the historico-dramatic conception of the two successive ages. These two ages are distinguished as hoi tois ho aiōn, ho nūn aiōn, ho enestōs aiōn, "this age," "the present age" (Mt 12 32; 13 22; Lk 16 8; Rom 12 2; 1 Cor 1 20; 2 6.8; 3 18; 2 Cor 4 4; Gal 1 4; Eph 1 21; 2 2; 6 12; 1 Tim 6 17; 2 Tim 4 10; Tit 2 12), and ho aiōn ekeinos, ho aiōn mellōn, ho aiōn erchōmenos, "that age," "the future age" (Mt 12 32; Lk 18 30; 20 35; Eph 2 7; He 6 5). In Jewish lit. before the NT, no instances of the developed antithesis between these two ages seem to be found, but from the way in which it occurs in the teaching of Jesus and Paul it appears to have been current at that time. (The oldest undisputed occurrence is a saying of Johanan ben Zakḳay, about 80 AD.) The contrast between these two ages is (esp. with Paul) that between the evil and transitory, and the perfect and abiding. Thus to each age belongs its own characteristic order of things, and so the distinction passes over into that of two "worlds" in the sense of two systems (in Heb and Aram. the same word 'olām, 'ālam, does service for both, in Gr aiōn usually renders the meaning "age," occasionally "world" [He 1 2; 11 3], kósmos meaning "world"; the latter, however, is never used of the future world). Cf Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, I, 132-46. Broadly speaking, the development of NT eschatology consists in this, that the two ages are increasingly recognized as answering to two spheres of being which coexist from of old, so that the coming of the new age assumes the character of a revelation and extension of the supernal order of things, rather than that of its first entrance into existence. Inasmuch as the coming world stood for the perfect and eternal, and in the realm of heaven such a perfect, eternal order of things already existed, the reflection inevitably arose that these two were in some sense identical. But the new significance which the antithesis assumes does not supersede the older historico-dramatic form. The higher world so interposes in the course of the lower as to bring the conflict to a crisis. The passing over of the one contrast into the other, therefore, does not mark, as has frequently been asserted, a recession of the eschatological wave, as if the interest had been shifted from the future to the present life. Esp. in the Fourth Gospel this "de-eschatologizing" process has been found, but without real warrant. The apparent basis for such a conclusion is that the realities of the future life are so vividly and intensely felt to be existent in heaven and from there operative in the believer's life, that the distinction between what is now and what will be hereafter enjoyed becomes less sharp. Instead of the superseding of the eschatological, this means the very opposite, viz. its most real anticipation. It should further be observed that the development in question is intimately connected and keeps equal pace with the disclosure of the pre-existence of Christ, because this fact and the descent of Christ from heaven furnished the clearest witness to the reality of the heavenly order of things. Hence it is esp. observable, not in the earlier epistles of Paul, where the structure of eschatological thought is still in the main historico-dramatic, but in the epistles of the first captivity (Eph 1 3.20-22; 2 6; 3 9.10; 4 9.10; 6 12; Phil 2 5-11; 3 20; Col 1 15.17; 3 2; further, in He 1 2.3; 2 5; 3 4; 6 5.11; 7 13.16; 9 14; 11 10.16; 12 22.23). The Fourth Gospel marks the culmination of this line of teaching, and it is unnecessary to point out how here the contrast between heaven and earth in its christological consequences determines the entire structure of thought. But here it also appears how the last outcome of the NT progress of doctrine had been anticipated in the highest teaching of Our Lord. This can be accounted for by the inherent fitness that the supreme disclosures which touch the personal life of the Saviour should come not through any third person, but from His own lips.

IV. General and Individual Eschatology.—In the OT the destiny of the nation of Israel to such an extent overshadows that of the individual, that only the first rudiments of an individual eschatology are found. The individualism of the later prophets, esp. Jeremiah and Ezekiel, bore fruit in the thought of the intermediate period. In the apocalyptic writings considerable concern is shown for the ultimate destiny of the individual. But not until the NT thoroughly spiritualized the conceptions of the last things could these two aspects be perfectly harmonized. Through the centering of the eschatological hope in the Messiah, and the suspending of the individual's share in it on his personal relation to the Messiah, an individual significance is necessarily imparted to the great final crisis. This also tends to give greater prominence to the intermediate state. Here, also, apocalyptic thought had pointed the way. None the less the OT point of view continues to assert itself in that even in the NT the main interest still attaches to the collective, historical development of events. Many questions in regard to the intermediate period are passed by in silence. The OT prophetic foreshortening of the perspective, immediately connecting each present crisis with the ultimate goal, is reproduced in NT eschatology on an individual scale in so far as the believer's life here is linked, not so much with his state after death, but rather with the consummate state after the final judgment. The present life in the body and the future life in the body are the two outstanding illumined heights between which the disembodied state remains largely in the shadow.

But the same foreshortening of the perspective is also carried over from the OT into the NT delineation of general eschatology. The NT method of depicting the future is not chronological. Things lying widely apart to our chronologically informed experience are by it drawn closely together. This law is adhered to doubtless not from mere limitation of subjective human knowledge, but by reason of adjustment to the general method of prophetic revelation in OT and NT alike.

V. The Parousia.—The word denotes "coming," "arrival." It is never applied to the incarnation of Christ, and could be applied to His

1. Definition second coming only, partly because it had already become a fixed Messianic term, partly because there was a point of view from which the future appearance of Jesus appeared the sole adequate expression of His Messianic dignity and glory. The explicit distinction between "first advent" and "second advent" is not found in the NT. It occurs in Test. XII P, Test. Abr. 92 16. In the NT it is approached in He 9 28 and in the use of epiphaneia for both the past appearance of Christ and His future manifestation (2 Thess 2 8; 1 Tim 6 14; 2 Tim 1 10; 4 1; Tit 2 11.13). The Christian use of the word "parousia" is more or less colored by the consciousness of the present bodily absence of Jesus from His own, and consequently suggests the thought of His future abiding presence, without, however, formally coming to mean the state of the Saviour's presence with believers (1 Thess 4 17). Parousia occurs in Mt 24 3.37 .39; 1 Cor 15 23; 1 Thess 2 19; 3 13; 4 15; 5 23; 2 Thess 2 1.8; Jas 5 7.8; 2 Pet 1 16; 3 4.12; 1 Jn 2 28. A synonymous term is apokalupsis, "revelation," probably also of pre-Christian origin, presupposing the preexistence of the Messiah in hidden form previous to His manifestation, either in heaven or on earth (cf Apoc Bar 29 3; 30 1; 4 Ezer (2 Esd) 7 28; Test. XII P, Test. Levi 18; Jn 7 27; 1 Pet 1 20). It could be adopted by Christians because Christ had been withdrawn into heaven and would be publicly demonstrated the Christ on His return, hence used with special reference to enemies and unbelievers (Lk 17 30; Acts 3 21; 1 Cor 1 7; 2 Thess 1 7.8; 1 Pet 1 13.20; 5 4). Another synonymous term is "the day of the [Our] Lord," "the day," "that day," "the day of Jesus Christ." This is the rendering of the well-known OT phrase. Though there is no reason in any particular passage why "the Lord" should not be Christ, the possibility exists that in some cases it may refer to God (cf "day of God" in 2 Pet 3 12). On the other hand, what the OT with the use of this phrase predicates of God is sometimes in the NT purposely transferred to Christ. "Day," while employed of the parousia generally, is, as in the OT, mostly associated with the judgment, so as to become a synonym for judgment (cf Acts 19 38; 1 Cor 4 3). The phrase is found in Mt 7 22; 24 36; Mk 13 32; Lk 10 12; 17 24; 21 34; Acts 2 20; Rom 13 12; 1 Cor 1 8; 3 13; 5 5; 2 Cor 1 14; Phil 1 6; 2 16; 1 Thess 5 2.4 (cf vs 5.8); 2 Thess 2 2; 2 Tim 1 12.18; 4 8; He 10 25; 2 Pet 3 10.

The parousia is preceded by certain signs heralding its approach. Judaism, on the basis of the OT, had worked out the doctrine of "the woes of the Messiah," hebb'le ha-ma-shi'a, the calamities and afflictions attendant upon the close of the present and the beginning of the coming age being interpreted as birth pains of the latter. This is transferred in the NT to the parousia of Christ. The phrase occurs only in Mt 24 8; Mk 13 8, the idea, in Rom 8 22, and allusions to it occur probably in 1 Cor 7 26; 1 Thess 3 3; 5 3.

Besides these general "woes," and also in accord with Jewish doctrine, the appearance of the Antichrist is made to precede the final crisis. Without Jewish precedent, the NT links with the parousia as preparatory to it, the pouring out of the Spirit, the destruction of Jerus and the temple, the conversion of Israel and the preaching of the gospel to all the nations. The problem of the sequence and interrelation of these several precursors of the end is a most difficult and complicated one and, as would seem, at the present not ripe for solution. The "woes" which in Our Lord's eschatological discourse (Mt 24; Mk 13; Lk 21) are mentioned in more or less close accord with Jewish teaching are: (1) wars, earthquakes and famines, "the beginning of travail"; (2) the great tribulation; (3) commotions among the heavenly bodies; cf Rev 6 2-17. For Jewish parallels to these, cf Charles, Eschatology, 326, 327. Because of this element which the discourse has in common with Jewish apocalypses, it has been assumed by Colani, Weiffenbach, Weizsäcker, Wendt, et al., that here two sources have been welded together, an actual prophecy of Jesus, and a Jewish or Jewish-Christian apocalypse from the time of the Jewish War 68-70 (HE, III, 5, 3). In the text of Mk this so-called "small apocalypse" is believed to consist of vs 7.8.14-20.24-27.30.31. But this hypothesis mainly springs from the disinclination to ascribe to Jesus realistic eschatological expectations, and the entirely unwarranted assumption that He must have spoken of the end in purely ethical and religious terms only. That the typically Jewish "woes" bear no direct relation to the disciples and their faith is not a sufficient reason for declaring the prediction of them unworthy of Jesus. A contradiction is pointed out between the two representations, that the parousia will come suddenly, unexpectedly, and that it will come heralded by these signs. Esp. in Mk 13 30.32 the contradiction is said to be pointed. To this it may be replied that even after the removal of the assumed apocalypse the same twofold representation remains present in what is recognized as genuine discourse of Jesus, viz. in Mk 13 28.29 as compared with vs 32.33-37 and other similar admonitions to watchfulness. A real contradiction between ver 30 and ver 32 does not exist. Our Lord could consistently affirm both: "This generation shall not pass away, until all these things be accomplished," and "of that day or that hour knoweth no one." To be sure, the solution should not be sought by understanding "this generation" of the Jewish race or of the human race. It must mean, according to ordinary usage, the then living generation. Nor does it help matters to distinguish between the prediction of the parousia within certain wide limits and the denial of knowledge as to the precise day and hour. In point of fact the two statements do not refer to the same matter at all. "That day or that hour" in ver 32 does not have "these things" of ver 30 for its antecedent. Both by the demonstrative pronoun "that" and by "but" it is marked as an absolute self-explanatory conception. It simply signifies as elsewhere the day of the Lord, the day of judgment. Of "these things," the exact meaning of which phrase must be determined from the foregoing, Jesus declares that they will come to pass within that generation; but concerning the parousia, "that [great] day," He declares that no one but God knows the time of its occurrence. The correctness of this view is confirmed by the preceding parable, Mk vs 28.29, where in precisely the same way "these things" and the parousia are distinguished. The question remains how much "these things" (ver 29; Lk ver 31), "all these things" (Mt vs 33.34, Mk ver 30), "all things" (Lk ver 32) is intended to cover of what is described in the preceding discourse. The answer will depend on what is there represented as belonging to the precursors of the end, and what as strictly constituting part of the end itself; and on the other question whether Jesus predicts one end with its premonitory signs, or refers to two crises each of which will be heralded by its own series of signs. Here two views deserve consideration. According to the one (advocated by Zahn in his Comm. on Mt, 652-66) the signs cover only Mt 24 4-14. What is related afterward, viz. "the abomination of desolation," great tribulation, false prophets and Christs, commotions in the heavens, the sign of the Son of Man, all this belongs to "the end" itself, in the absolute sense, and is therefore comprehended in the parousia and excepted from the prediction that it will happen in that generation, while included in the declaration that only God knows the time of its coming. The destruction of the temple and the holy city, though not explicitly mentioned in vs 4-14, would be included in what is there said of wars and tribulation. The prediction thus interpreted would have been literally fulfilled. The objections to this view are: (1) It is unnatural thus to subsume what is related in vs 15-29 under "the end." From a formal point of view it does not differ from the phenomena of vs 4-14 which are "signs." (2) It creates the difficulty, that the existence of the temple and the temple-worship in Jerus are presupposed in the last days immediately before the parousia. The "abomination of desolation" taken from Dnl 8 13; 9 27; 11 31; 12 11; cf Sir 49 2—according to some, the destruction of the city and temple, better a desecration of the temple-site by the setting up of something idolatrous, as a result of which it becomes desolate—and the flight from Judaea, are put among events which, together with the parousia, constitute the end of the world. This would seem to involve chiliasm of a very pronounced sort. The difficulty recurs in the strictly eschatological interpretation of 2 Thess 2 3.4, where "the man of sin" (see SIN, MAN OF) is represented as sitting in "the temple of God," and in Rev 11 1.2, where "the temple of God" and "the altar," and "the court which is without the temple" and "the holy city" figure in an episode inserted between the sounding of the trumpet of the sixth angel and that of the seventh. On the other hand it ought to be remembered that eschatological prophecy makes use of ancient traditional imagery and stereotyped formulas, which, precisely because they are fixed and applied to all situations, cannot always bear a literal sense, but must be subject to a certain degree of symbolical and spiritualizing interpretation. In the present case the profanation of the temple by Antiochus Epiphanes may have furnished the imagery in which, by Jesus, Paul and John, anti-Christian developments are described of a nature which has nothing to do with Israel, Jerus or the temple, lit. understood. (3) It is not easy to conceive of the preaching of the gospel to all the nations as falling within the lifetime of that generation. It is true Rom 1 13; 10 13; 15 19-24; Col 1 6; 1 Tim 3 16; 2 Tim 4 17 might be quoted in support of such a view. In the statement of Jesus, however, it is definitely predicted that the preaching of the gospel to all the nations not only must happen before the end, but that it straightway precedes the end: "Then shall the end come" (Mt 24 14). To distinguish between the preaching of the gospel to all the nations and the completion of the gentile mission, as Zahn proposes, is artificial. As over against these objections, however, it must be admitted that the grouping of all these later phenomena before the end proper avoids the difficulty arising from "immediately" in Mt 24 29 and from "in those days" in Mk 13 24.

The other view has been most lucidly set forth by Briggs, Messiah of the Gospels, 132-65. It makes Jesus' discourse relate to two things: (1) the destruction of Jerus and the temple; (2) the end of the world. He further assumes that the disciples are informed with respect to two points: (1) the time; (2) the signs. In the answer to the time, however, the two things are not sharply distinguished, but united into one prophetic perspective, the parousia standing out more conspicuously. The definition of the time of this complex development is: (a) negative (Mk 13 5-8); (b) positive (vs 9-13). On the other hand in describing the signs Jesus discriminates between (a) the signs of the destruction of Jerus and the temple (vs 14-20); (b) the signs of the parousia (vs 24-27). This view has in its favor that the destruction of the temple and the city, which in the question of the disciples figured as an eschatological event, is recognized as such in the answer of Jesus, and not alluded to after a mere incidental fashion, as among the signs. Esp. the version of Lk 21 20-24 proves that it figures as an event. This view also renders easier the restriction of Mk 13 30 to the first event and its signs. It places "the abomination of desolation" in the period preceding the national catastrophe. The view that the two events are successively discussed is further favored by the movement of thought in vs 32 ff. Here, after the Apocalypse has been brought to a close, the application to the disciples is made, and, in the same order as was observed in the prophecy, first, the true attitude toward the national crisis is defined in the parable of the Fig Tree and the solemn assurance appended that it will happen in this generation (vs 28-31); secondly, the true attitude toward the parousia is defined (vs 32-37). The only serious objection that may be urged against this view arises from the close concatenation of the section relating to the national crisis with the section relating to the parousia (Mt 24 29: "immediately after . . . those days"; Mk 13 24: "in those days"). The question is whether this mode of speaking can be explained on the principle of the well-known foreshortening of the perspective of prophecy. It cannot be a priori denied that this peculiarity of prophetic vision may have here characterized also the outlook of Jesus into the future which, as ver 32 shows, was the prophetic outlook of His human nature, as distinct from the Divine omniscience. The possibility of misinterpreting this feature and confounding sequence in perspective with chronological succession is in the present case guarded against by the statement that the gospel must first be preached to all the nations (cf Acts 3 19.25.26; Rom 11 25; Rev 6 2) before the end can come, that no one knows the time of the parousia except God, that there must be a period of desolation after the city shall have been destroyed, and that the final coming of Jesus to the people of Israel will be a coming not of judgment, but one in which they shall hail Him as blessed (Mt 23 38.39; Lk 13 34.35), which presupposes an interval to account for this changed attitude (cf Lk 21 24: "until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled"). It is not necessary to carry the distinction between the two crises joined together here into the question as put by the disciples in Mt 24 3, as if "when shall these things be?" related to the destruction of the temple exclusively, as the other half of the question speaks of the coming of Jesus and the end of the world. Evidently here not the two events, but the events (complexly considered) and the signs are distinguished. "These things" has its antecedent not exclusively in ver 2, but even more in 23 38.39. The disciples desired to know not so much when the calamitous national catastrophe would come, but rather when that subsequent coming of the Lord would take place, which would put a limit to the distressing results of this catastrophe, and bring with it the re-acceptance of Israel into favor. This explains also why Jesus does not begin His discourse with the national crisis, but first takes up the question of the parousia, to define negatively and positively the time of the latter, and that for the purpose of warning the disciples who in their eagerness for the ultimate issue were inclined to foreshorten the preceding calamitous developments. That Jesus could actually join together the national and the cosmical crises appears from other passages, such as Mt 10 23, where His interposition for the deliverance of the fugitive disciples is called a "coming" of the Son of Man (Mt 16 28; Mk 9 1; Lk 9 27, where a coming of the Son of Man in His kingdom [Mt], or a coming of the kingdom of God with power [Mk], or a seeing of the kingdom of God [Lk] is promised to some of that generation). It is true these passages are frequently referred to the parousia, because in the immediately preceding context the latter is spoken of. The connection of thought, however, is not that the parousia and this promised coming are identical. The proximate coming is referred to as an encouragement toward faithfulness and self-sacrifice, just as the reward at the parousia is mentioned for the same purpose. The conception of an earlier coming also receives light from the confession of Jesus at His trial (Mt 26 64; where the "henceforth" refers equally to the coming on the clouds of heaven and to the sitting at the right hand of God; cf Mk 14 62; Lk 22 69). The point of the declaration is, that He who now is condemned will in the near future appear in theophany for judgment upon His judges. The closing discourses of Jn also have the conception of the coming of Jesus to His disciples in the near future for an abiding presence, although here this is associated with the advent of the Spirit (Jn 14 18.19.21.23; 16 16.19.22.23). Finally the same idea recurs in Rev, where it is equally clear that a preliminary visitation of Christ and not the parousia for final judgment can be meant (2 5.16; 3 3.20; cf also the pl. "one of the days of the Son of man" in Lk 17 22).

To the events preceding the parousia belongs, according to the uniform teaching of Jesus, Peter and Paul, the conversion of Israel (Mt 3. Events 23 39; Lk 13 35; Acts 1 6.7; 3 19. Preceding 21; where the arrival of "seasons of the refreshing" and "the times of restoration of all things" is made dependent on the [eschatological] sending of the Christ to Israel), and this again is said to depend on the repentance and conversion and the blotting out of the sins of Israel; Rom 11, where the problem of the unbelief of Israel is solved by the twofold proposition: (1) that there is even now among Israel an election according to grace; (2) that in the future there will be a comprehensive conversion of Israel (vs 5.25-32).

Among the precursors of the parousia appears further the Antichrist. The word is found in the NT in 1 Jn 2 18.22; 4 3; 2 Jn ver 7 only, but the conception occurs also in the Synoptics, in Paul and in Rev. There is no instance of its earlier occurrence in Jewish lit. Anti may mean "in place of" and "against"; the former includes the latter. In Jn it is not clear that the heretical tendencies or hostile powers connected with the anti-Christian movement make false claim to the Messianic dignity. In the Synoptics the coming of false Christs and false prophets is predicted, and that not merely as among the nearer signs (Mk 13 6), but also in the remote eschatological period (ver 22). With Paul, who does not employ the word, the conception is clearly the developed one of the counter-Christ. Paul ascribes to him an apokálypsis as he does to Christ (2 Thess 2 6.8); his manner of working and its pernicious effect are set over against the manner in which the gospel of the true Christ works (vs 9-12). Paul does not treat the idea as a new one; it must have come down from the OT and Jewish eschatology and have been more fully developed by NT prophecy; cf in Dnl 7 8.20; 8 10.11 the supernaturally magnified figure of the great enemy. According to Gunkel (Schöpfung und Chaos, 1895) and Bousset (Der Antichrist in der Überlieferung des Judentums, des NT und der alten Kirche, 1875) the origin of the conception of a final struggle between God and the supreme enemy must be sought in the ancient myth of Chaos conquered by Marduk; what had happened at the beginning of the world was transferred to the end. Then this was anthropomorphized, first in the form of a false Messiah, later in that of a political tyrant or oppressor. But there is no need to assume any other source for the idea of a last enemy than OT eschatological prophecy (Ezk and Dnl and Zec). And no evidence has so far been adduced that the Pauline idea of a counter-Messiah is of pre-Christian origin. This can only be maintained by carrying back into the older period the Antichrist tradition as found later among Jews and Christians. It is reasonable to assume in the present state of the evidence that the combination of the two ideas, that of the great eschatological enemy and that of the counter-Messiah, is a product of Christian prophecy. In fact even the conception of a single last enemy does not occur in pre-Christian Jewish lit.; it is found for the first time in Apoc Bar 40 1.2, which changes the general conception of 4 Esr to this effect. Even in the eschatological discourse of Jesus the idea is not yet unified, for false Christs and false prophets in the plural are spoken of, and the instigator of "the abomination of desolation," if any is presupposed, remains in the background. In the Epistle of Jn the same plural representation occurs (1 Jn 2 18.22; 2 Jn ver 7), although the idea of a personal Antichrist in whom the movement culminates is not only familiar to the author and the reader (1 Jn 2 18, "as ye heard that antichrist cometh"), but is also accepted by the writer (4 3, "This is the spirit of the antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it cometh; and now it is in the world already"; cf 2 Thess 2 7, "The mystery of lawlessness doth already work").

Various views have been proposed to explain the concrete features of the Pauline representation in 2 Thess 2 and that of Rev 13 and 17. According to Schneckenburger, JDT, 1859, and Weiss, SK, 1869, Paul has in mind the person whom the Jews will acclaim as their Messiah. The idea would then be the precipitate of Paul's experience of hostility and persecution from the part of the Jews. He expected that this Jewish Messianic pretender would, helped by Satanic influence, overthrow the Rom power. The continuance of the Rom power is "that which restraineth," or as embodied in the emperor, "one that restraineth now" (2 Thess 2 6.7). (For an interesting view in which the rôles played by these two powers are reversed, cf Warfield in Expos, 3d ser., IV, 30-44.) The objection to this is that "the lawless one," not merely from Paul's or the Christian point of view, but in his own avowed intent, opposes and exalts himself against all that is called God or worshipped. This no Jewish pretender to the Messiahship could possibly do: his very Messianic position would preclude it. And the conception of a counter-Christ does not necessarily point to a Jewish environment, for the idea of Messiahship had in Paul's mind been raised far above its original national plane and assumed a universalistic character (cf Zahn, Einleitung in das NT, I, 171). Nor does the feature that according to ver 4, "the lawless one" will take his seat in the temple favor the view in question, for the desecration of the temple by Antiochus Epiphanes and later similar experiences may well have contributed to the figure of the great enemy the attribute of desecrator of the temple. It is not necessary to assume that by Paul this was understood literally; it need mean no more than that the Antichrist will usurp for himself Divine honor and worship. Patristic and later writers gave to this feature a chiliastic interpretation, referring it to the temple which was to be rebuilt in the future. Also the allegorical exegesis which understands "the temple" of the Christian church has found advocates. But the terms in which "the lawless one" is described exclude his voluntary identification with the Christian church. According to a second view the figure is not a Jewish but a pagan one. Kern, Baur, Hilgenfeld and many others, assuming that 2 Thess is post-Pauline, connect the prophecy with the at-one-time current expectation that Nero, the great persecutor, would return from the East or from the dead, and, with the help of Satan, set up an anti-Christian kingdom. The same expectation is assumed to underlie Rev 13 3.12.14 (one of the heads of the beast smitten unto death and his death stroke healed); 17 8.10.11 (the beast that was, and is not, and is about to come up out of the abyss; the eighth king, who is one of the seven preceding kings). As to Paul's description, there is nothing in it to make us think of a Nero reappearing or redivivus. The parousia predicated of the lawless one does not imply it, for parousia as an eschatological term means not "return" but "advent." The Antichrist is not depicted as a persecutor, and Nero was the persecutor par excellence. Nor does what is said about the "hindering" or the "hinderer" suit the case of Nero, for the later Rom emperors could not be said to hold back Nero's reappearance. As to Rev, it must be admitted that the rôle here ascribed to the beast would be more in keeping with the character of Nero. But, as Zahn has well pointed out (Einleitung in das NT, II, 617-26), this interpretation is incompatible with the date of Rev. This book must have been written at a date when the earlier form of the expectation that Nero would reappear still prevailed, viz. that he would return from the East to which he had fled. Only when too long an interval had elapsed to permit of further belief in Nero's still being alive, was this changed into the superstition that he would return from the dead. But this change in the form of the belief did not take place until after Rev must have been written. Consequently, if the returning Nero did figure in Rev, it would have to be in the form of one reappearing from the East. As a matter of fact, however, the beast or the king in which Nero is found is said by Rev 13 1; 17 8 to have been smitten unto death and healed of the death stroke, to come up out of the sea or the abyss, which would only suit the later form of the expectation. It is therefore necessary to dissociate the description of the beast and its heads and horns entirely from the details of the succession of the Rom empire; the prophecy is more grandly staged; the description of the beast as partaking of several animal forms in 13 2 refers back to Dnl, and here as there must be understood of the one world-power in its successive national manifestations, which already excludes the possibility that a mere succession of kings in one and the same empire can be thought of. The one of the heads smitten unto death and the death stroke healed must refer to the world-power to be made powerless in one of its phases, but afterward to revive in a new phase. Hence here already the healing of the death stroke is predicated, not merely of one of the heads, but also of the beast itself (cf 13 3 with 13 12). And the same interpretation seems to be required by the mysterious statements of ch 17, where the woman sitting upon the beast is the metropolis of the world-power, changing its seat together with the latter, yet so as to retain, like the latter in all its transformations, the same character whence she bears the same name of Babylon (ver 5). Here as in ch 13 the beast has seven heads, i.e. passes through seven phases, which idea is also expressed by the representation that these seven heads are seven kings (ver 10), for, as in Dnl 7, the kings stand not for individual rulers, but for kingdoms, phases of the world-power. This explains why in ver 11 the beast is identified with one of the kings. When here the further explanation, going beyond ch 13, is added, that the beast was and is not and is about to come up out of the abyss (ver 8), and in vs 10.11 that of the seven kings five are fallen, one is, the other is not yet come, and when he comes must continue a little while, to be followed by the eighth, who is identical with the beast that was and is not, and with one of the seven, the only way to reconcile these statements lies in assuming that "the beast," while in one sense a comprehensive figure for the world-power in all its phases, can also in another sense designate the supreme embodiment and most typical manifestation of the world-power in the past; in respect to this acute phase the beast was and is not and is to appear again, and this acute phase was one of seven successive forms of manifestation, and in its reappearance will add to this number the eighth. Although a certain double sense in the employment of the figures thus results, this is no greater than when on the other view Nero is depicted both as "the beast" and as one of the heads of "the beast." Which concrete monarchies are meant by these seven phases is a matter of minor importance. For a suggestion of Zahn, op. cit., II, 624: (1) Egypt; (2) Assyria; (3) Babylon; (4) the Medo-Pers power; (5) the Graeco-Alexandrian power; (6) the Rom power; (7) a short-lived empire to succeed Rome; (8) the eighth and last phase, which will reproduce in its acute character the fifth, and will bring on the scene the Antichrist, the counterpart and, as it were, reincarnation of Antiochus Epiphanes. The seer evidently has his present in the Rom phase of the power of the beast, and this renders it possible for him to give in 17 9 another turn to the figure of the seven heads, interpreting it of the seven mountains on which the woman sits, but this apocalyptic looseness of handling of the imagery can furnish no objection to the view just outlined, since on any view the two incongruous explanations of the seven heads as seven mountains and seven kings stand side by side in vs 9 and 10. Nor should the mysterious number of 666 in 13 18 be appealed to in favor of the reference of the beast to Nero, for on the one hand quite a number of other equally plausible or implausible solutions of this riddle have been proposed, and on the other hand the interpretation of Nero is open to the serious objection, that in order to make out the required number from the letters of Nero's name this name has to be written in Heb characters and that with scriptio defectiva of Ḳesar (Nerōn Ḳesar) instead of Ḳaisar, the former of which two peculiarities is out of keeping with the usage of the book elsewhere (cf Zahn, op. cit., II, 622, 624, 625, where the chief proposed explanations of the number 666 are recorded). Under the circumstances the interpretation of the figure of the beast and its heads must be allowed to pursue its course independently of the mystery of the number 666 in regard to which no certain conclusion appears attainable.

The following indicates the degree of definiteness to which, in the opinion of the writer, it is possible to go in the interpretation of the prophecy. The terms in which Paul speaks remind of Daniel's description of the "little horn." Similarly Rev attaches itself to the imagery of the beasts in Dnl. Both Paul and Rev also seem to allude to the self-deification of rulers in the Hellenistic and Rom world (cf ZNTW, 1904, 335 ff). Both, therefore, appear to have in mind a politically organized world-power under a supreme head. Still in both cases this power is not viewed as the climax of enmity against God on account of its political activity as such, but distinctly on account of its self-assertion in the religious sphere, so that the whole conception is lifted to a higher plane, purely spiritual standards being applied in the judgment expressed. Paul so thoroughly applies this principle that in his picture the seductive, deceptive aspect of the movement in the sphere of false teaching is directly connected with the person of "the lawless one" himself (2 Thess 2 9-12), and not with a separate organ of false prophecy, as in Rev 13 11-17 (the second beast). In Rev, as shown above, the final and acute phase of anti-Christian hostility is clearly distinguished from its embodiment in the Rom empire and separated from the latter by an intermediate stage. In Paul, who stands at a somewhat earlier point in the development of NT prophecy, this is not so clearly apparent. Paul teaches that the "mystery of lawlessness" is already at work in his day, but this does not necessarily involve that the person of "the lawless one," subsequently to appear, must be connected with the same phase of the world-power, with which Paul associates this mystery already at work, since the succeeding phases being continuous, this will also insure the continuity between the general principle and its personal representative, even though the latter should appear at a later stage. It is impossible to determine how far Paul consciously looked beyond the power of the Rom empire to a later organization as the vehicle for the last anti-Christian effort. On the other hand, that Paul must have thought of "the lawless one" as already in existence at that time cannot be proven. It does not follow from the parallelism between his "revelation" and the parousia of Christ, for this "revelation" has for its correlate simply a previous hidden presence for some time somewhere, not an existence necessarily extending to Paul's time or the time of the Rom empire, far less a preexistence, like unto Christ's, in the supernatural world. Nor is present existence implied in what Paul says of "the hindering power." This, to be sure, is represented as asserting itself at that very time, but the restraint is not exerted directly upon "the lawless one"; it relates to the power of which he will be the ultimate exponent; when this power, through the removal of the restraint, develops freely, his revelation follows. According to ver 9 his "parousia is according to the working of Satan," but whether this puts a supernatural aspect upon the initial act of his appearance or relates more to his subsequent presence and activity in the world, which will be attended with all powers and signs and lying wonders, cannot be determined with certainty. But the element of the supernatural is certainly there, although it is evidently erroneous to conceive of "the lawless one" as an incarnation of Satan, literally speaking. The phrase "according to the working of Satan" excludes this, and "the lawless one" is a true human figure, "the man of sin" (or "the man of lawlessness," according to another reading; cf the distinction between Satan and "the beast" in Rev 20 10), ver 3. The "power" and "signs" and "wonders" are not merely "seeming"; the genitive pseudous is not intended to take them out of the category of the supernatural, but simply means that what they are intended to accredit is a lie, viz. the Divine dignity of "the lawless one." Most difficult of all is the determination of what Paul means by the hindering power or the hinderer in ver 7. The most common view refers this to the Rom authority as the basis of civil order and protection, but there are serious objections to this. If Paul at all associated the Antichrist in any way with the Rom power, he cannot very well have sought the opposite principle in the same quarter. And not only the hindering power but also the hindering person seems to be a unit, which latter does not apply to the Rom empire, which had a succession of rulers. It is further difficult to dismiss the thought that the hindering principle or person must be more or less supernatural, since the supernatural factor in the work of "the lawless one" is so prominent. For this reason there is something attractive in the old view of von Hofmann, who assumed that Paul borrowed from Dnl, besides other features, also this feature that the historical conflict on earth has a supernatural background in the world of spirits (cf Dnl 10). A more precise definition, however, is impossible. Finally it should be noticed that, as in the eschatological discourse of Jesus "the abomination of desolation" appears connected with an apostasy within the church through false teaching (Mk 13 22.23), so Paul joins to the appearance of "the lawless one" the destructive effect of error among many that are lost (2 Thess 2 9-12). The idea of the Antichrist in general and that of the apostasy in particular reminds us that we may not expect an uninterrupted progress of the Christianization of the world until the parousia. As the reign of the truth will be extended, so the forces of evil will gather strength, esp. toward the end. The universal sway of the kingdom of God cannot be expected from missionary effort alone; it requires the eschatological interposition of God.

In regard to the manner and attending circumstances of the parousia we learn that it will be widely visible, like the lightning (Mt 24 27; Lk 17 24; the point of comparison does not lie in the suddenness); of the manner of the parousia to the unbelieving it will come unexpectedly (Mt 24 37-42; Lk 17 26-32; 1 Thess 5 2.3). A sign will precede, "the sign of the Son of Man," in regard to the nature of which nothing can be determined. Christ will come "on the clouds," "in clouds," "in a cloud," "with great power and glory" (Mt 24 30; Mk 13 26; Lk 21 27); attended by angels (Mt 24 31 [cf 13 41; 16 27; Mk 8 38; Lk 9 26]; Mk 13 27; 2 Thess 1 7).

VI. The Resurrection.—The resurrection coincides with the parousia and the arrival of the future aeon (Lk 20 35; Jn 6 40; 1 Thess 4 16). From 1 Thess 3 13; 4 16 it has been inferred that the dead rise before the descent of Christ from heaven is completed; the sounds described in the later passage are then interpreted as sounds accompanying the descent (cf Ex 19 16; Isa 27 13; Mt 24 31; 1 Cor 15 52; He 12 19; Rev 10 7; 11 15; "the trump of God"—the great eschatological trumpet). The two words for the resurrection are egerein, "to wake," and anistánai, "to raise," the latter less common in the active than in the intransitive sense.

The NT teaches in some passages with sufficient clearness that all the dead will be raised, but the emphasis rests to such an extent on

1. Its Universality—the soteriological aspect of the event, esp. in Paul, where it is closely connected with the doctrine of the Spirit, that its reference to non-believers receives little notice. This was already partly so in the OT (Isa 26 19; Dnl 12 2). In the intervening Jewish lit. the doctrine varies; sometimes a resurrection of the martyrs alone is taught (En 90); sometimes of all the righteous dead of Israel (Ps Sol 3 10 ff; En 91-94); sometimes of all the righteous and of some wicked Israelites (En 1-36); sometimes of all the righteous and all the wicked (4 Ezr [2 Esd] 5 45; 7 32; Apoc Bar 42 8; 50 2). Jos ascribes to the Pharisees the doctrine that only the righteous will share in the resurrection. It ought to be noticed that these apocalyptic writings which affirm the universality of the resurrection present the same phenomena as the NT, viz. that they contain passages which so exclusively reflect upon the resurrection in its bearing upon the destiny of the righteous as to create the appearance that no other resurrection was believed in. Among the Pharisees probably a diversity of opinion prevailed on this question, which Jos will have obliterated. Our Lord in His argument with the Sadducees proves only the resurrection of the pious, but does not exclude the other (Mk 12 26.27); "the resurrection of the just" in Lk 14 14 may suggest a twofold resurrection. It has been held that the phrase, hē anástasis hē ek nekron (Lk 20 35; Acts 4 2), always describes the resurrection of a limited number from among the dead, whereas hē anástasis tōn nekron would be descriptive of a universal resurrection (Plummer, Comm. on Lk 20 35), but such a distinction breaks down before an examination of the passages.

The inference to the universality of the resurrection sometimes drawn from the universality of the judgment is scarcely valid, since the idea of a judgment of disembodied spirits is not inconceivable and actually occurs. On the other hand the punishment of the judged is explicitly affirmed to include the body (Mt 10 28). It cannot be proven that the term "resurrection" is ever in the NT eschatologically employed without reference to the body, of the quickening of the spirit simply (against, Fries, in ZNTW, 1900, 291 ff). The sense of Our Lord's argument with the Sadducees does not require that the patriarchs were at the time of Moses in possession of the resurrection, but only that they were enjoying the covenant-life, which would in due time inevitably issue in the resurrection of their bodies. The resemblance (or "equality") to the angels (Mk 12 25) does not consist in the disembodied state, but in the absence of marriage and propagation. It has been suggested that Hebrews contains no direct evidence for a bodily resurrection (Charles, Eschatology, 361), but cf 11 22.35; 12 2; 13 20. The spiritualism of the epistle points, in connection with its Pauline type of teaching, to the conception of a pneumatic heavenly body, rather than to a disembodied state.

The NT confines the event of the resurrection to a single epoch, and nowhere teaches, as chiliasm assumes, a resurrection in two stages,

2. The Millennium—one, at the parousia, of saints or martyrs, and a second one at the close of the millennium. Although the doctrine of a temporary Messianic kingdom, preceding the consummation of the world, is of pre-Christian Jewish origin, it had not been developed in Judaism to the extent of assuming a repeated resurrection; the entire resurrection is always placed at the end. The passages to which this doctrine of a double resurrection appeals are chiefly Acts 3 19-21; 1 Cor 15 23-28; Phil 3 9-11; 1 Thess 4 13-18; 2 Thess 1 5-12; Rev 20 1-6. In the first-named passage Peter promises "seasons of refreshing," when Israel shall have repented and turned to God. The arrival of these coincides with the sending of the Christ to the Jews, i.e. with the parousia. It is argued that Peter in ver 21, "whom the heavens must [present tense] receive until the times of restoration of all things," places after this coming of Jesus to His people a renewed withdrawal of the Lord into heaven, to be followed in turn, after a certain interval, by the restoration of all things. The "seasons of refreshing" would then constitute the millennium with Christ present among His people. While this interpretation is not grammatically impossible, there is no room for it in the general scheme of the Petrine eschatology, for the parousia of Christ is elsewhere represented as bringing not a provisional presence, but as bringing in the day of the Lord, the day of judgment (Acts 2 17-21). The correct view is that "the seasons of refreshing" and "the times of restoration of all things" are identical; the latter phrase relates to the prospects of Israel as well as the former, and should not be understood in the later technical sense. The present tense in ver 21, "must receive," does not indicate that the reception of Christ into heaven still lies in the future, but formulates a fixed eschatological principle, viz. that after His first appearance the Christ must be withdrawn into heaven till the hour for the parousia has come.

In 1 Cor 15 23-28 two τάγματα, "orders," of the resurrection are distinguished, and it is urged that these consist of "believers" and "non-believers." But there is no reflection here upon non-believers at all, the two "orders" are Christ, and they that are Christ's. "The end" in ver 24 is not the final stage in the resurrection, i.e. the resurrection of non-believers, but the end of the series of eschatological events. The kingdom of Christ which comes to a close with the end is not a kingdom beginning with the parousia, but dates from the exaltation of Christ; it is to Paul not future but already in operation.

In 1 Thess 4 13-18 the presupposition is not that the readers had worried about a possible exclusion of their dead from the provisional reign of Christ and from a first resurrection, but that they had sorrowed even as the Gentiles who have no hope whatever, i.e. they had doubted the fact of the resurrection as such. Paul accordingly gives them in ver 14 the general assurance that in the resurrection of Jesus that of believers is guaranteed. The vb. "precede" in ver 15 does not imply that there was thought of precedence in the enjoyment of glory, but is only an emphatic way of affirming that the dead will not be one moment behind in inheriting with the living the blessedness of the parousia. In ver 17, "so shall we ever be with the Lord," the word "ever" excludes the conception of a provisional kingdom. 2 Thess 1 5-12 contains merely the general thought that sufferings and glory, persecution and the inheritance of the kingdom are linked together. There is nothing to show that this glory and kingdom are aught else but the final state, the kingdom of God (ver 5).

In Phil 3 9-11, it is claimed, Paul represents attainment to the resurrection as dependent on special effort on his part, therefore as something not in store for all believers. Since the general resurrection pertains to all, a special grace of resurrection must be meant, i.e. inclusion in the number of those to be raised at the parousia, at the opening of the millennial kingdom. The answer to this is, that it was quite possible to Paul to make the resurrection as such depend on the believer's progress in grace and conformity to Christ, seeing that it is not an event out of all relation to his spiritual development, but the climax of an organic process of transformation begun in this life. And in ver 20 the resurrection of all is joined to the parousia (cf for the Pauline passages Vos, "The Pauline Eschatology and Chiliasm," PTR, 1911, 26-60).

The passage Rev 20 1-6 at first sight much favors the conception of a millennial reign of Christ, participated in by the martyrs, brought to life in a first resurrection, and marked by a suspension of the activity of Satan. And it is urged that the sequence of visions places this millennium after the parousia of Christ narrated in ch 19. The question of historic sequence, however, is in Rev difficult to decide. In other parts of the book the principle of "recapitulation," i.e. of contemporaneity of things successively depicted, seems to underlie the visions, and numbers are elsewhere in the book meant symbolically. These facts leave open the possibility that the thousand years are synchronous with the earlier developments recorded, and symbolically describe the state of glorified life enjoyed with Christ in heaven by the martyrs during the intermediate period preceding the parousia. The terms employed do not suggest an anticipated bodily resurrection. The seer speaks of "souls" which "lived" and "reigned," and finds in this the first resurrection. The scene of this life and reign is in heaven, where also the "souls" of the martyrs are beheld (6 9). The words "this is the first resurrection" may be a pointed disavowal of a more realistic (chilistic) interpretation of the same phrase. The symbolism of the thousand years consists in this, that it contrasts the glorious state of the martyrs on the one hand with the brief season of tribulation passed here on earth, and on the other hand with the eternal life of the consummation. The binding of Satan for this period marks the first eschatological conquest of Christ over the powers of evil, as distinguished from the renewed activity to be displayed by Satan toward the end in bringing up against the church still other forces not hitherto introduced into the conflict. In regard to a book so enigmatical, it were presumptuous to speak with any degree of dogmatism, but the uniform absence of the idea of the millennium from the eschatological teaching of the NT elsewhere ought to render the exegete cautious before affirming its presence here (cf Warfield, "The Millennium and the Apocalypse," PTR, 1904, 599-617).

The resurrection of believers bears a twofold aspect. On the one hand it belongs to the forensic side of salvation. On the other hand it belongs to the pneumatic transforming side of the saving process. Of the former, traces appear only in the teaching of Jesus (Mt 5 9; 22 29-32; Lk 20 35,36). Paul clearly ascribes to the believer's resurrection a somewhat similar forensic significance as to that of Christ (Rom 8 10,23; 1 Cor 15 30-32,55-58). Far more prominent with him is, however, the other, the pneumatic interpretation. Both the origin of the resurrection life and the continuance of the resurrection state are dependent on the Spirit (Rom 8 10,11; 1 Cor 15 45-49; Gal 6 8). The resurrection is the climax of the believer's transformation (Rom 8 11; Gal 6 8). This part ascribed to the Spirit in the resurrection is not to be explained from what the OT teaches about the Spirit as the source of physical life, for to this the NT hardly ever refers; it is rather to be explained as the correlate of the general Pauline principle that the Spirit is the determining factor of the heavenly state in the coming aeon. This pneumatic character of the resurrection also links together the resurrection of Christ and that of the believer. This idea is not yet found in the Synoptics; it finds expression in Jn 5 22-29; 11 25; 14 6,19. In early apostolic teaching a trace of it may be found in Acts 4 2. With Paul it appears from the beginning as a well-established principle. The continuity between the working of the Spirit here and His part in the resurrection does not, however, lie in the body. The resurrection is not the culmination of a pneumatic change which the body in this life undergoes. There is no preformation of the spiritual body on earth. Rom 8 10,11; 1 Cor

15 49; 2 Cor 5 1.2; Phil 3 12 positively exclude this, and 2 Cor 3 18; 4 7-18 do not require it. The glory into which believers are transformed through the beholding (or reflecting) of the glory of Christ as in a mirror is not a bodily but inward glory, produced by illumination of the gospel. And the manifestation of the life of Jesus in the body or in the mortal flesh refers to the preservation of bodily life in the midst of deadly perils. Equally without support is the view that at one time Paul placed the investiture with the new body immediately after death. It has been assumed that this, together with the view just criticized, marks the last stage in a protracted development of Paul's eschatological belief. The initial stage of this process is found in 1 Thess: the resurrection is that of an earthly body. The next stage is represented by 1 Cor: the future body is pneumatic in character, although not to be received until the parousia. The third stage removes the inconsistency implied in the preceding position between the character of the body and the time of its reception, by placing the latter at the moment of death (2 Cor, Rom, Col), and by an extreme flight of faith the view is even approached that the resurrection body is in process of development now (Teichmann, Charles). This scheme has no real basis of fact. 1 Thess does not teach an unpneumatic eschatology (cf 4 14.16). The second stage given is the only truly Pauline one, nor can it be shown that the apostle ever abandoned it. For the third position named finds no support in 2 Cor 5 1-10; Rom 8 19; Col 3 4. The exegesis of 2 Cor 5 1-10 is difficult and cannot here be given in detail. Our understanding of the main drift of the passage, put into paraphrase, is as follows: we feel assured of the eternal weight of glory (4 17), because we know that we shall receive, after our earthly tent-body shall have been dissolved (aor. subj.), a new body, a supernatural house for our spirit, to be possessed eternally in the heavens. A sure proof of this lies in the heightened form which our desire for this future state assumes. For it is not mere desire to obtain a new body, but specifically to obtain it as soon as possible, without an intervening period of nakedness, i.e. of a disembodied state of the spirit. Such would be possible, if it were given us to survive till the parousia, in which case we would be clothed upon with our habitation from heaven (=supernatural body), the old body not having to be put off first before the new can be put on, but the new body being superimposed upon the old, so that no "unclothing" would have to take place first, what is mortal simply being swallowed up of life (5 2.4). And we are justified in cherishing this supreme aspiration, since the ultimate goal set for us in any case, even if we should have to die first and to unclothe and then to put on the new body over the naked spirit, since the ultimate goal, I say, excludes under all circumstances a state of nakedness at the moment of the parousia (ver 3). Since, then, such a new embodied state is our destiny in any event, we justly long for that mode of reaching it which involves least delay and least distress and avoids intermediate nakedness. (This on the reading in ver 3 of ei ge kai endusamenoi ou gymnot heurethēsōmetha. If the reading ei ge kai ekdusamenoi be adopted the rendering of ver 3 will have to be: "If so be that also having put off [i.e. having died], we shall not at the end be found naked." If eiper kai ekdusamenoi be chosen it will be: "Although even having put off [i.e. having died] we shall not at the end be found naked." These other readings do not materially alter the sense.) The understanding of the passage will be seen to rest on the pointed distinction between being "clothed upon," change at the parousia without death (vs 2.4), to be "unclothed," loss of the body in death with nakedness resulting (ver 4), and "being clothed," putting on of the new body after a state of nakedness (ver 3). Interpreted as above, the passage expresses indeed the hope of an instantaneous endowment with the spiritual body immediately after this life, but only on the supposition that the end of this life will be at the parousia, not for the case that death should intervene before, which latter possibility is distinctly left open. In Rom 8 19 what will happen at the end to believers is called a "revealing of the sons of God," not because their new body existed previously, but because their status as sons of God existed before, and this status will be revealed through the bestowal upon them of the glorious body. Col 3 3.4 speaks of a "life . . . hid with Christ in God," and of the "manifestation" of believers with Christ in glory at the parousia, but "life" does not imply bodily existence, and while the "manifestation" at the parousia presupposes the body, it does not imply that this body must have been acquired long before, as is the case with Christ's body. In conclusion it should be noted that there is ample evidence in the later epistles that Paul continued to expect the resurrection body at the parousia (2 Cor 5 10; Phil 3 20.21).

The main passage informing us as to the nature of the resurrection body is 1 Cor 15 35-58. The difficulty Paul here seeks to relieve does 4. The Resurrection Body not concern the substance of the future body, but its kind (cf ver 35 "With what manner of body do they come?").

Not until ver 50 is the deeper question of difference in substance touched upon. The point of the figure of "sowing" is not that of identity of substance, but rather this, that the impossibility of forming a concrete conception of the resurrection body is no proof of its impossibility, because in all vegetable growth there appears a body totally unlike that which is sown, a body the nature and appearance of which are determined by the will of God. We have no right to press the figure in other directions, to solicit from it answers to other questions. That there is to be a real connection between the present and the future body is implied rather than directly affirmed. Ver 36 shows that the distinction between the earthly body and a germ of life in it, to be intrusted with it to the grave and then quickened at the last day, does not lie in the apostle's mind, for what is sown is the body; it dies and is quickened in its entirety. Esp. the turn given to the figure in ver 37—that of a naked grain putting on the plant as a garment—proves that it is neither intended nor adapted to give information on the degree of identity or link of continuity between the two bodies. The "bare grain" is the body, not the spirit, as some would have it (Teichmann), for it is said of the seed that it dies; which does not apply to the Pneuma (cf also ver 44). The fact is that in this entire discussion the subjective spirit of the believer remains entirely out of consideration; the matter is treated entirely from the standpoint of the body. So far as the Pneuma enters into it, it is the objective Spirit, the Spirit of Christ. As to the time of the sowing, some writers take the view that this corresponds to the entire earthly life, not to the moment of burial only (so already Calvin, recently Teichmann and Charles). In vs 42.43 there are points of contact for this, inasmuch as esp. the three last predicates "in dishonor," "in weakness," "a natural body," seem more applicable to the living than to the dead body. At any rate, if the conception is thus widened, the act of burial is certainly included in the sowing. The objection arising from the difficulty of forming a conception of the resurrection body is further met in vs 39-41, where Paul argues from the multitude of bodily forms God has at His disposal. This thought is illustrated from the animal world (ver 39); from the difference between the heavenly and the earthly bodies (ver 40); from the difference existing among the heavenly bodies themselves (ver 41). The structure of the argument is indicated by the interchange of two words for "other," allos and heteros, the former designating difference of species within the genus, the latter difference of genus, a distinction lost in the Eng. version. In all this the reasoning revolves not around the substance of the bodies but around their kind, quality, appearance (sdrz in ver 39 = sōma, "body," not = "flesh"). The conclusion drawn is that the resurrection body will differ greatly in kind from the present body. It will be heteros, not merely allos. The points of difference are enumerated in vs 42.43. Four contrasts are named; the first three in each case appear to be the result of the fourth. The dominating antithesis is that between the sōma psuchikōn and the sōma pneumatikōn. Still Paul can scarcely mean to teach that "corruption," "dishonor," "weakness" are in the same sense necessary and natural results of the "psychical" character of the earthly body, as the corresponding opposites are necessary and natural concomitants of the pneumatic character of the resurrection body. The sequel shows that the "psychical body" was given man at creation, and according to ver 53 corruption and death go together, whereas death is not the result of creation but of the entrance of sin according to Paul's uniform teaching elsewhere. Hence also the predicate sarkikōs is avoided in vs 46.47, where the reference is to creation, for this word is always associated in Paul with sin. The connection, therefore, between the "natural [psychical, m] body" and the abnormal attributes conjoined with it, will have to be so conceived, that in virtue of the former character, the body, though it need not of itself, yet will fall a prey to the latter when sin enters. In this lies also the explanation of the term "psychical body." This means a body in which the psychē, the natural soul, is the vitalizing principle, sufficient to support life, but not sufficient to that supernatural, heavenly plane, where it is forever immune to death and corruption. The question must be asked, however, why Paul goes back to the original state of man's body and does not content himself with contrasting the body in the state of sin and in the state of eternal life. The answer is found in the exigency of the argument. Paul wished to add to the argument for the possibility of a different body drawn from analogy, an argument drawn from the typical character of the original creation-body. The body of creation, on the principle of prefiguration, pointed already forward to a higher body to be received in the second stage of the world-process: 'if there exists a psychical body, there exists also a pneumatic body' (ver 44). The proof lies in Gen 2 7. Some think that Paul here adopts the Philonic doctrine of the creation of two men, and means ver 45b as a quotation from Gen 1 27. But the sequence is against this, for Paul's spiritual man appears on the scene last, not first, as in Philo. Nor can the statement have been meant as a correction of Philo's sequence, for Paul cannot have overlooked that, once a double creation were found in Gen 1 and 2, then Philo's sequence was the only possible one, to correct which would have amounted to correcting Scripture. If Paul does here correct Philo, it must be in the sense that he rejects the entire Philonic exegesis, which found in Gen a twofold creation (cf 1 Cor 11 7). Evidently for Paul, Gen 2 7 taken by itself contains the proof of his proposition, that there is both a psychical and a pneumatic body. Paul regarded the creation of the first Adam in a typical light. The first creation gave only the provisional form in which God's purpose with reference to man was embodied, and in so far looked forward to a higher embodiment of the same idea on a higher pneumatic plane (cf Rom 5 14): "The first man is of the earth, earthy: the second man is of heaven" (1 Cor 15 47); "of" or "from heaven" does not designate heavenly material, for even here, by not giving the opposite to choikōs, "earthly," Paul avoided the question of substantiality. A "pneumatic" body is not, as many assume, a body made out of pneuma as a higher substance, for in that case Paul would have had pneumatikōn ready at hand as the contrast to choikōn. Only negatively the question of substance is touched upon in ver 50: "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," but the apostle does not say what will take their place. Cf further, for the non-substantial meaning of pneumatikōs, Rom 15 27; 1 Cor 9 11; 10 3.4; Eph 1 3; 5 19; 6 12; Col 1 9. The only positive thing which we learn in this direction is formal, viz. that the resurrection body of the believer will be the image of that of Christ (ver 49).

VII. The Change of Those Living at the Parousia.

—This is confined to believers. Of a change in the body of non-believers found living or raised at the parousia the NT nowhere speaks. The passages referring to this subject are 1 Cor 15 51-53; 2 Cor 5 1-5; Phil 3 20.21. The second of these has already been discussed: it represents the change under the figure of a putting-on of the heavenly body over the earthly body, in result of which what is mortal is swallowed up so as to disappear by life. This representation starts with the new body by which the old body is absorbed. In 1 Cor 15 and Phil 3, on the other hand, the point of departure is from the old body which is changed into a new. The difference between the resurrection and the change of the living is brought out in 2 Cor 5 1-5 in the two figures of "putting on" and "putting on over," endúsasthai and ependúsasthai. Some exegeses find in 1 Cor 15 51-53 the description of a process kept in such general terms as to be equally applicable to those raised and to those transformed alive. If this be adopted it yields new evidence for the continuity between the present body and the resurrection body. Others, however, find here the expectation that Paul and his readers will "all" survive until the parousia, and be changed alive, in which case no light is thrown on the resurrection-process. The more plausible exegesis is that which joins the negative to "all" instead of to the vb., and makes Paul affirm that "not all" will die, but that all, whether dead or surviving, will be changed at the parousia; the difficulty of the exegesis is reflected in the early attempts to change the reading. In Phil 3 20.21 there are no data to decide whether the apostle conceives of himself and his readers as living at the moment of the parousia or speaks generally so as to cover both possibilities.

VIII. The Judgment.—The judgment takes place on a "day" (Mt 7 22; 10 15; 24 36; Lk 10 12; 21 34; 1 Cor 1 8; 3 13; 2 Tim 4 8; Rev 6 17), but this rests on the OT conception of "the day of Jehovah," and is not to be taken literally, whence also "hour" interchanges with "day" (Mk 13 32; Rev 14 7). While not confined to an astronomical day the judgment is plainly represented as a definitely circumscribed transaction, not as an indefinite process. It coincides with its parousia. Of a judgment immediately after death, the NT nowhere speaks, not even in He 9 27.28. Its locality is the earth, as would seem to follow from its dependence on the parousia (Mt 13 41.42; Mk 13 26.27), although some infer from 1 Thess 4 17 that, so far as believers are concerned, it will take place in the air. But this passage does not speak of the judgment, only of the parousia and the meeting of believers with Christ. The judge is God

(Mt 6 4.6.14.18; 10 28.32 ff=Lk 12 8 ff; 21 36; Acts 10 42; 17 30.31; Rom 2 2.3.5.16; 14 10; 1 Cor 4 3-5; 5 13; He 12 25; 13 4; 1 Pet 1 17; 2 23; Rev 6 10; 14 7), but also Christ, not only in the great scene depicted in Mt 25 31-46, but also in Mk 8 38; 13 26 ff; Mt 7 22=Lk 13 25-27; Acts 17 31; 2 Cor 5 10; Rev 19 11, whence also the OT conception of "the day of Jehovah" is changed into "the day of the Lord" (1 Cor 5 5; 2 Cor 1 14; 1 Thess 5 2; 2 Pet 3 10). In the sense of the final assize the judgment does not in earlier Jewish eschatology belong to the functions of the Messiah, except in En 51 3; 55 4; 61 8 ff; 62 1 ff; 63. Only in the later apocalypses the Messiah appears as judge (4 Ezr [2 Esd] 13; Apoc Bar 72 2 [cf Sib Or 3 286]). In the more realistic, less forensic, sense of an act of destruction, the judgment forms part of the Messiah's work from the outset, and is already assigned to Him by the Baptist and still more by Paul (Mt 3 10.11.12=Lk 3 16.17; 2 Thess 2 8.10.12). The one representation passes over into the other. Jesus always claims for Himself the judgment in the strictly forensic sense. Already in His present state He exercises the right to forgive sin (Mk 2 5.10). In the Fourth Gospel, it is true, He denies that His present activity involves the task of judging (Jn 8 15; 12 47). That this, however, does not exclude His eschatological judgeship appears from 5 22.27 (notice the article in ver 22 "the whole judgment," which proves the reference to the last day). But even for the present, though not directly, yet indirectly by His appearance and message, Christ according to Jn effects a judgment among men (8 16; 9 39), which culminates in His passion and death, the judgment of the world and the Prince of the world (12 31; 14 30; 16 11). A share of the judgment is assigned to angels and to the saints (Mt 13 39.41.49; 16 27; 24 31; 25 31; 1 Thess 3 13; 2 Thess 1 7; Jude vs 14 f). In regard to the angels this is purely ministerial; of believers it is affirmed only in 1 Cor 6 1-3 that they will have something to do with the act of judgment itself; passages like Mt 19 28; 20 23; Lk 22 30; Rev 3 21 do not refer to the judgment proper, but to judging in the sense of "reigning," and promise certain saints a preëminent position in the kingdom of glory. The judgment extends to all men, Tyre, Sidon, Sodom, as well as the Galilean cities (Mt 11 22.24); all nations (25 32; Jn 5 29; Acts 17 30.31; Rom 2 6.16; 2 Cor 5 10). It also includes the evil spirits (1 Cor 6 3; 2 Pet 2 4; Jude ver 6). It is a judgment according to works, and that not only in the case of non-believers; of believers also the works will come under consideration (Mt 25 34 ff; 1 Cor 4 5; 2 Cor 5 10; Rev 22 12). Side by side with this, however, it is taught already in the Synoptics that the decisive factor will be the acknowledgment of individuals by Jesus, which in turn depends upon the attitude assumed by them toward Jesus here, directly or indirectly (Mt 7 23; 19 28; 25 35-45; Mk 8 38). By Paul the principle of judgment according to works is upheld, not merely hypothetically as a principle preceding and underlying every soteriological treatment of man by God (Rom 2), and therefore applying to non-Christians for whose judgment no other standard is available, but also as remaining in force for Christians, who have already, under the soteriological régime of grace, received absolute, eternal acquittal in justification. This raises a twofold problem: (a) why justification does not render a last judgment superfluous; (b) why the last judgment in case of Christians saved by grace should be based on works. In regard to (a) it ought to be remembered that the last judgment differs from justification in that it is not a private transaction in foro conscientiae, but public, in foro mundi. Hence Paul emphasizes this element of publicity (Rom 2 16; 1 Cor 3 13; 2 Cor 5 10). It is in accordance with this that God the Father is always the author of justification, whereas as a rule Christ is represented as presiding at the assize of the last day. As to (b), because the last judgment is not a mere private but a public transaction, something more must be taken into account than that on which the individual eternal destiny may hinge. There can be disapproval of works and yet salvation (1 Cor 3 15). But the trial of works is necessary for the sake of the vindication of God. In order to be a true theodicy the judgment must publicly exhibit and announce the complete overthrow of sin in man, and the complete working out in him of the idea of righteousness, including not merely his acquittal from the guilt, but also his deliverance from the power, of sin, not merely his imputed righteousness, but also his righteousness of life. In order to demonstrate this comprehensively, the judgment will have to take into account three things: faith (Gal 5 5), works done in the Christian state, sanctification. Besides this the works of the Christian appear as the measure of gracious reward (Mt 5 12.46; 6 1; 10 41.42; 19 28; 20 1-16; 25 14-45; Mk 9 41; Lk 6 23.35; 1 Cor 3 8.14; 9 17.18; Col 2 18; 3 24; He 10 35). These works, however, are not mechanically or commercially appraised, as in Judaism, for Paul speaks by preference of "work" in the singular (Rom 2 7.15; 1 Cor 3 13; 9 1; Gal 6 4; Eph 4 12; Phil 1 6.22; 1 Thess 1 3; 2 Thess 1 11). And this one organic product of "work" is traced back to the root of faith (1 Thess 1 3; 2 Thess 1 11, where the gen. πίστεως is a gen. of origin), and Paul speaks as a rule not of poietn but of præsein, i.e. of the practice, the systematic doing, of that which is good.

The judgment assigns to each individual his eternal destiny, which is absolute in its character either of blessedness or of punishment, though admittedly of degrees within these two states. Only two groups are recognized, those of the condemned and of the saved (Mt 25 33.34; Jn 5 29); no intermediate group with as yet undetermined destiny anywhere appears. The degree of guilt is fixed according to the knowledge of the Divine will possessed in life (Mt 10 15; 11 20-24; Lk 10 12-15; 12 47.48; Jn 15 22.24; Rom 2 12; 2 Pet 2 20-22). The uniform representation is that the judgment has reference to what has been done in the embodied state of this life; nowhere is there any reflection upon the conduct or product of the intermediate state as contributing to the decision (2 Cor 5 10). The state assigned is of endless duration, hence described as aiônios, "eternal." While this adjective etymologically need mean no more than "what extends through a certain aeon or period of time," yet its eschatological usage correlates it everywhere with the "coming age," and, this age being endless in duration, every state or destiny connected with it partakes of the same character. It is therefore exegetically impossible to give a relative sense to such phrases as πῦρ αἰώνιον, "eternal fire" (Mt 18 8; 25 41; Jude ver 7), κόλασις αἰώνιος, "eternal punishment" (Mt 25 46), ὀλεθρὸς αἰώνιος, "eternal destruction" (2 Thess 1 9), κρίσις αἰώνιος or κρίμα αἰώνιον, "eternal judgment" (Mk 3 29; He 6 2). This is also shown by the figurative representations which unfold the import of the adj.: the "unquenchable fire" (Mt 3 12), "the never-dying worm" (Mk 9 43-48), "The smoke of their torment goeth up for ever and ever" (Rev 14 11), "tormented day and night forever and ever" (Rev 20 10). The endless duration of the state of punishment is also required by the absolute eternity of its counterpart, ζωὴ αἰώνιος, "eternal life" (Mt 25 46).

In support of the doctrine of conditional immortality it has been urged that other terms descriptive of the fate of the condemned, such as apōleia, "perdition," phthorā, "corruption," olethros, "destruction," thánatos, "death," point rather to a cessation of being. This, however, rests on an unscriptural interpretation of these terms, which everywhere in the OT and the NT designate a state of existence with an undesirable content, never the pure negation of existence, just as "life" in Scripture describes a positive mode of being, never mere existence as such. Perdition, corruption, destruction, death, are predicated in all such cases of the welfare or the ethical spiritual character of man, without implying the annihilation of his physical existence. No more support can be found in the NT for the hypothesis of an apokatastasis pánτων, "restoration of all things," i.e. absolute universalism implying the ultimate salvation of all men. The phrase occurs only in Acts 3 21, where, however, it has no cosmical reference but relates to the fulfilment of the promises to Israel. Jos uses it of the restoration of the Jews to their land after the Captivity, Philo of the restoration of inheritances in the year of jubilee (cf Mal 4 6; Mt 17 11; Mk 9 12; Acts 1 6). Absolute universalism has been found in Rom 5 18; 1 Cor 15 22,28; Eph 1 10; Col 1 20, but in all these passages only a cosmical or national universalism can be found, not the doctrine of the salvation of all individuals, which latter would bring the statements in question in direct contradiction to the most explicit deliverances of Paul elsewhere on the principle of predestination and the eternity of the destiny of the wicked.

IX. The Consummate State.—Side by side with "the future age," and characterizing it from a less formal point of view, the phrase "kingdom of God" designates the consummate state, as it will exist for believers after the judgment. Jesus, while making the kingdom a present reality, yet continues to speak of it in accordance with its original eschatological usage as "the kingdom" which lies in the future (Mt 13 43; 25 34; 26 29; Mk 9 47; Lk 12 32; 13 28,29; 21 31). With Paul the phrase bears preponderatingly an eschatological sense, although occasionally he uses it of the present state of believers (Rom 14 17; 1 Cor 4 20; 6 9,10; 15 24,50; Gal 5 21; Eph 5 5; Col 1 13; 4 11; 1 Thess 2 12; 2 Thess 1 5; 2 Tim 4 1,18). Elsewhere in the NT the eschatological use occurs in He 12 28; Jas 2 5; 2 Pet 1 11; Rev 11 15. The idea is universalistic, unpolitical, which does not exclude that certain privileges are spoken of with special reference to Israel. Although the eschatological kingdom differs from the present kingdom largely in the fact that it will receive an external, visible embodiment, yet this does not hinder that even in it the core is constituted by those spiritual realities and relations which make the present kingdom. Still it will have its outward form as the doctrine of the resurrection and the regenerated earth plainly show. Hence the figures in which Jesus speaks of it, such as eating, drinking, reclining at table, while not to be taken sensually, should not on the other hand be interpreted allegorically, as if they stood for wholly internal spiritual processes: they evidently point to, or at least include, outward states and activities, of which our life in the senses offers some analogy, but on a higher plane of which it is at present impossible to form any concrete conception or to speak otherwise than in figurative language. Equivalent to "the kingdom" is "life." But, unlike the kingdom, "life" remains in the Synoptics an exclusively eschatological conception. It is objectively conceived: the state of blessedness the saints will exist in; not subjectively as a potency in man or a process of development (Mt 7 14; 18 8,9; 19 16,29; 25 46; Mk 10 30). In Jn "life" becomes a present state, and in connection with this the idea is subjectivized, it becomes a process of growth and expansion. Points of contact for this in the Synoptics may be found in Mt 8 22 (=Lk 9 60); Lk 15 24; 20 38. When this eschatological life is characterized as aiōnios, "eternal," the reference is not exclusively to its eternal duration, but the word has, in addition to this, a qualitative connotation; it describes the kind of life that belongs to the consummate state (cf the use of the adj. with other nouns in this sense: 2 Cor 5 1; 2 Tim 2 10; He 5 9; 9 12,15; 2 Pet 1 11, and the unfolding of the content of the idea in 1 Pet 1 4). With Paul "life" has sometimes the same eschatological sense (Rom 2 7; 5 17; Tit 1 2; 3 7), but most often it is conceived as already given in the present state, owing to the close association with the Spirit (Rom 6 11; 7 4,8,11; 8 2,6; Gal 2 19; 6 8; Eph 4 18). In its ultimate analysis the Pauline conception of "life," as well as that of Jesus, is that of something dependent on communion with God (Mt 22 32=Mk 12 27=Lk 20 38; Rom 8 6,7; Eph 4 18). Another Pauline conception associated with the consummate state is that of dóxa, "glory." This glory is everywhere conceived as a reflection of the glory of God, and it is this that to the mind of Paul gives it religious value, not the external radiance in which it may manifest itself as such. Hence the element of "honor" conjoined to it (Rom 1 23; 2 7; 8 21; 9 23; 1 Cor 15 43). It is not confined to the physical sphere (2 Cor 3 18; 4 16,17). The outward doxa is prized by Paul as a vehicle of revelation, an exponent of the inward state of acceptance with God. In general Paul conceives of the final state after a highly theocentric fashion (1 Cor 15 28); it is the state of immediate vision of and perfect communion with God and Christ; the future life alone can bring the perfected sonship (Rom 6 10; 8 23,29; cf Lk 20 36; 2 Cor 4 4; 5 6,7,8; 13 4; Phil 1 23; Col 2 13; 3 3,4; 1 Thess 4 17).

The scene of the consummate state is the new heaven and the new earth, which are called into being by the eschatological palingenesis "regeneration" (Mt 5 18; 19 28; 24 35; 1 Cor 7 31; He 1 12; 12 26,27; 2 Pet 3 10; 1 Jn 2 17; Rev 21 1, in which last passage, however, some exegetes understand the city to be a symbol of the church, the people of God). An annihilation of the substance of the present world is not taught (cf the comparison of the future world-conflagration with the Deluge in 2 Pet 3 6). The central abode of the redeemed will be in heaven, although the renewed earth will remain accessible to them and a part of the inheritance (Mt 5 5; Jn 14 2,3; Rom 8 18-22; and the closing visions of the Apocalypse).

X. The Intermediate State.—In regard to the state of the dead, previously to the parousia and the resurrection, the NT is far less explicit than in its treatment of what belongs to general eschatology. The following points may here briefly be noted:

(1) The state of death is frequently represented as a "sleeping," just as the act of dying as a "falling asleep" (Mt 9 24; Jn 9 4; 11 11; 1 Cor 7 39; 11 30; 15 6,18,20,51; 1 Thess 4 13,15; 2 Pet 3 4). This usage, while also purely Gr, rests on the OT. There is this difference, that in the NT (already in the apocryphal and pseudepigraphical books) the conception is chiefly used with reference to the righteous dead, and has associated with it the thought of their blessed awaking in the resurrection, whereas in the OT it is indiscriminately applied to all the dead and without such connotation. With Paul the word always occurs of believers. The representation applies not to the "soul" or "spirit," so that a state of unconsciousness until the resurrection would be implied. It is predicated of the person, and the point of comparison is that as one who sleeps is not alive to his surroundings, so the dead are no longer en rapport with this earthly life. Whatever may have been the original implications of the word, it plainly had become long before the NT period a figurative mode of speech, just as egerein, "to wake," was felt to be a figurative designation of the act of the resurrection. Because the dead are asleep to our earthly life, which is mediated through the body, it does not follow that they are asleep in every other relation, asleep to the life of the other world, that their spirits are unconscious. Against the unconsciousness of the dead of Lk 16 23; 23 43; Jn 11 25.26; Acts 7 59; 1 Cor 15 8; Phil 1 23; Rev 6 9-11; 7 9. Some have held that the sleep was for Paul a euphemism employed in order to avoid the terms "death" and "to die," which the apostle restricted to Christ. 1 Thess 4 16 shows that this is unfounded.

(2) The NT speaks of the departed after an anthropomorphic fashion as though they were still possessed of bodily organs (Lk 16 23.24; Rev 6 11; 7 9). That no inference can be drawn from this in favor of the hypothesis of an intermediate body appears from the fact that God and angels are spoken of in the same manner, and also from passages which more precisely refer to the dead as "souls," "spirits" (Lk 23 46; Acts 7 59; He 12 23; 1 Pet 3 19; Rev 6 9; 20 4).

(3) The NT nowhere encourages the living to seek converse with the dead. Its representation of the dead as "sleeping" with reference to the earthly life distinctly implies that such converse would be abnormal and in so far discountenances it, without explicitly affirming its absolute impossibility. Not even the possibility of the dead for their part taking knowledge of our earthly life is affirmed anywhere. He 12 1 does not necessarily represent the OT saints as "witnesses" of our race of faith in the sense of spectators in the literal sense, but perhaps in the figurative sense, that we ought to feel, having in memory their example, as if the ages of the past and their historic figures were looking down upon us (Lk 16 29; Acts 8 9; 13 6 ff; 19 13 ff).

(4) As to the departed saints themselves, it is intimated that they have mutual knowledge of one another in the intermediate state, together with memory of facts and conditions of the earthly life (Lk 16 9.19-31). Nowhere, however, is it intimated that this interest of the departed saints in our earthly affairs normally expresses itself in any act of intercession, not even of intercession spontaneously proffered on their part.

(5) The NT does not teach that there is any possibility of a fundamental change in moral or spiritual character in the intermediate state. The doctrine of a so-called "second probation" finds in it no real support. The only passages that can with some semblance of warrant be appealed to in this connection are 1 Pet 3 19-21 and 4 6. For the exegesis of the former passage, which is difficult and much disputed, cf SPIRITS IN PRISON. Here it may simply be noted that the context is not favorable to the view that an extension of the opportunity of conversion beyond death is implied; the purport of the whole passage points in the opposite direction, the salvation of the exceedingly small number of eight of the generation of Noah being emphasized (3 20). Besides this it would be difficult to understand why this exceptional opportunity should have been granted to this peculiar group of the dead, since the contemporaries of Noah figure in Scripture as examples of extreme wickedness. Even if the idea of a gospel-preaching with soteriological purpose were actually found here, it would not furnish an adequate basis for building upon it the broad hypothesis of a second probation for all the dead in general or for those who have not heard the gospel in this life. This latter view the passage is esp. ill fitted to support, because the generation of Noah had had the gospel preached to them before death. There is no intimation that the transaction spoken of was repeated or continued indefinitely. As to the second passage (1 Pet 4 6), this must be taken by itself and in connection with its own context. The assumption that the sentence "the gospel [was] preached even to the dead" must have its meaning determined by the earlier passage in 3 19-21, has exercised an unfortunate influence upon the exegesis. Possibly the two passages had no connection in the mind of the author. For explaining the reference to "the dead" the connection with the preceding verse is fully sufficient. It is there stated that Christ is "ready to judge the living and the dead." "The living and the dead" are those who will be alive and dead at the parousia. To both the gospel was preached, that Christ might be the judge of both. But that the gospel was preached to the latter in the state of death is in no way indicated. On the contrary the telic clause, "that they might be judged according to men in the flesh," shows that they heard the gospel during their lifetime, for the judgment according to men in the flesh that has befallen them is the judgment of physical death. If a close connection between the passage in ch 3 and that in ch 4 did exist, this could only serve to commend the exegesis which finds in the earlier passage a gospel-preaching to the contemporaries of Noah during their lifetime, since, on that view, it becomes natural to identify the judgment in the flesh with the Deluge.

(6) The NT, while representing the state of the dead before the parousia as definitely fixed, nevertheless does not identify it, either in degree of blessedness or punishment, with the final state which follows upon the resurrection. Although there is no warrant for affirming that the state of death is regarded as for believers a positively painful condition, as has been mistakenly inferred from 1 Cor 11 30; 1 Thess 4 13, nevertheless Paul shrinks from it as from a relatively undesirable state, since it involves "nakedness" for the soul, which condition, however, does not exclude a relatively high degree of blessedness in fellowship with Christ (2 Cor 5 2-4.6.8; Phil 1 23). In the same manner a difference in the degree or mode of punishment between the intermediate state and the age to come is plainly taught. For on the one hand the eternal punishment is related to persons in the body (Mt 10 28), and on the other hand it is assigned to a distinct place, Gehenna, which is never named in connection with the torment of the intermediate state. This term occurs in Mt 5 22.29.30; 10 28=Lk 12 5; 18 9; 23 33; Mk 9 43.45.47; Jas 3 6. Its opposite is the eschatological kingdom of God (Mk 9 47). The term abussos differs from it in that it is associated with the torment of evil spirits (Lk 8 31; Rom 10 7; Rev 9 1.2; 11 7; 20 1), and in regard to it no such clear distinction between a preliminary and final punishment seems to be drawn (cf also the vb. tartaroun, "to bind in Tartarus"; of evil spirits in 2 Pet 2 4). Where the sphere of the intermediate state is locally conceived, this is done by means of the term Hades, which is the equivalent of the OT She'ol. The passages where this occurs are Mt 11 23; 16 18; Lk 16 23; Acts 2 27.31; 1 Cor 15 55 (where others read "death"); Rev 1 18; 6 8; 20 13.14). These passages should not be interpreted on the basis of the Gr classical usage, but in the light of the OT doctrine about She'ol. Some of them plainly employ the word in the non-local sense of the state of death (Mt 16 18; possibly Acts 2 27.31; 1 Cor 15 55 [personified]; Rev 1 18; 6 8 [personified]; 20 13 [personified]). The only passage where the conception is local is Lk 16 23, and this occurs in a parable, where aside from the central point in comparison, no purpose to impart topographical knowledge concerning the world beyond death can be assumed, but the imagery is simply that which was popularly current. But, even if the doctrine of Hades as a place distinct from Gehenna should be found here, the terms in which it is spoken of, as a place of torment for Dives, prove that the conception is not that of a general abode of neutral character, where without blessedness or pain the dead as a joint-company await the last judgment, which would first assign them to their separate eternal habitations. The parable plainly teaches, whether Hades be local and distinct from Gehenna or not, that the differentiation between blessedness and punishment in its absolute character (ver 26) is begun in it and does not first originate at the judgment (see further, HADES).

1. The Name δρᾶλόν, Esdrailōn, 'Εσραήλόν, Esraēlōn, 'Εσραχᾶν, Esrechōn): The Gr name of the great plain in Central Pal (Jth 3 9; 7 3, etc.). It is known in Scripture by the Heb name "valley of Jezreel" (Josh 17 16; Jgs 6 33, etc.). It is called 'emek in Jgs 6 15, which properly denotes "a depression," or "deepening," and is used more commonly of the vale running eastward between Gilboa and Little Hermon. Bē'āh is the term usually employed (2 Ch 35 22, etc.), which accurately describes it, "an opening," a level space surrounded by hills. The modern name is Merj

2. Position and Description ibn 'Amr, "meadow of the son of Amr." It lies between Gilboa and Little Hermon on the E., and Mt. Carmel on the W. It is inclosed by irregular lines drawn from the latter along the base of the foothills of Nazareth to Tabor; from Tabor, skirting Little Hermon and Gilboa to Jenin, and from Jenin along the N. edge of the Samaritan uplands to Carmel. These sides of the triangle are, respectively, about 15, 15 and 20 miles in length. N. of Jenin a bay of the plain sweeps eastward, hugging the foot of Mt. Gilboa. An offshoot passes down to the Jordan valley between Gilboa and Little Hermon; and another cuts off the latter hill from Tabor. The average elevation of the plain is 200 ft. above the level of the Mediterranean. The Vale of Jezreel between Zer'in and Beisān, a distance of about 12 miles, descends nearly 600 ft., and then sinks suddenly to the level of the Jordan valley. The chief springs supplying water for the plain are those at Jenin and at Megiddo. The former are the most copious, and are used to create a "paradise" on the edge of the plain. Those at Megiddo drive mills and serve for irrigation, besides forming extensive marshes. The springs near Zer'in, three in number, ʿAin Jalūd, possibly identical with the well of Harod, being the most copious, send their waters down the vale to the Jordan. The streams from the surrounding heights are gathered in the bed of the Kishon, a great trench which zig-zags through the plain, carrying the water through the gorge at Carmel to the sea. For the most of its course this sluggish stream is too low to be available for irrigation. The deep, rich soil, however, retains the moisture from the winter rains until far on in the year, the surface only, where uncovered by crops, being baked to brick in the sun. When winter sets in it quickly absorbs the rain, great breadths being turned to soft mud. This probably happened in the battle with Sisera: the northern cavalry, floundering in the morass, would be an easy prey to the active, lightly armed foot-soldiers. The fertility of the plain is extraordinary: hardly anywhere can the toil of the husbandman find a greater reward. The present writer has ridden through crops of grain there, when from his seat on the saddle he could no more than see over the tops of the stalks. Trees do not flourish in the plain itself, but on its borders, e.g. at Jenin, the palm, the olive and other fruit trees prosper. The oak covers the slopes of the hills N. of Carmel.

"Gideon's Fountain" in the Plain of Esdraelon.

This wide opening among the mountains played a great part in the history of the land. This was due to the important avenues of communication between N. and S. that lay across its ample breadths. The narrow pass between the promontory of Carmel and the sea was not suitable for the transport of great armies: the safer roads over the plain were usually followed. So it happened that here opposing hosts often met in deadly strife. Hardly an equal area of earth can so often have been drenched with the blood of men. No doubt many conflicts were waged here in far-off times of which no record remains. The first battle fought in the plain known to history was that in which Sisera's host was overthrown (Jgs 5 20). The children of the East were surprised and routed by Gideon's 300 chosen men in the stretches N. of Zer'in (Jgs 7). Near the same place the great battle with the Philis was fought in which Saul and his sons, worsted in the plain, retired to perish on the heights of Gilboa (1 S 31). In the bed of the Kishon at the foot of Carmel Elijah slaughtered the servants of Baal (1 K 18 40). Dark memories of the destruction of Ahab's house by the furiously driving Jehu linger round Jezreel. Ahaziah, fleeing from the avenger across the plain, was overtaken and cut down at Megiddo (2 K 9). In the vale by Megiddo Josiah sought to stay the northward march of Pharaoh-necoh, and himself fell wounded to death (2 K 23 30; 2 Ch 35 20 ff). The army of Holofernes is represented as spreading out over all the southern reaches of the plain (Jth 7 18.19). Much of the fighting during the wars of the Jews transpired within the circle of these hills. It is not unnatural that the inspired seer should place the scene of war in "the great day of God" in the region so often colored crimson in the history of his people—the place called in the Heb tongue "Har-Magedon" (Rev 16 14.16).

Esdraelon lay within the lot of Issachar (Josh 19 17). The Canaanite inhabitants were formidable with their chariots of iron (17 16.18). The tribe does not appear to have prosecuted the conquest with vigor. Issachar seems to have resumed the tent life (Dt 33 18), and ignobly to have secured enjoyment of the good things in the land by stooping to "taskwork" (Gen 49 14 f).

Through many centuries the plain was subject to raids by the Arabs from the E. of the Jordan.

4. Arab Raids The approach was open and easy, and the rich breadths of pasture irresistibly attracted these great flock masters. The Romans introduced some order and security; but with the passing of the eastern empire the old conditions resumed sway, and until comparatively recent times the alarm of an Arab invasion was by no means infrequent.

The railway connecting Haifa with Damascus and Mecca crosses the plain, and enters the Jordan valley near Beisān.

LITERATURE

In some of the Gr uncials (B, etc) of the LXX the book is called 'Εσδρας Α, Esdras A (or Πρῶτον, Prōton); so in the editions of Fritzsche,

1. Name Tischendorf, Nestle and Swete. It is absent from Cod Sin (N) and in A its name is 'Ο 'Ιερεῖς, Ho Hierēis=The Priest, i.e. Ezra, who is emphatically the priest. It is also called 1 Esd in the old Lat and Syr VSS, as well as in the Eng., Welsh and other modern trs. In the Eng. and other Protestant Bibles which generally print the Apoc apart, this book stands first in the Apoc under the influence partly of its name, and in part on account of its contents, as it seemed a suitable link between the canonical and the apocryphal writings. The Eng. 2 Esd is the apocalyptic Esd and stands immediately after the Eng. and Gr 1 Esd. The Vulg, following Jerome's version, gave the names 1, 2 and 3 Esd to our Ezr, Neh, and 1 Esd, respectively, and in editions of the Vulg down to that of Pope Sixtus (d. 1590) these three books appear in that order. The name 3 Esd is, therefore, that current in the Roman church, and it has the sanction of the 6th article of the Anglican Creed and of Miles Coverdale who in his tr follows the Vulg in naming the canonical Ezr, Neh and the apocryphal 1 Esd, 1, 2 and 3 Esd, respectively. Other reformers adhered to these titles. In Fritzsche's commentary on the Apoc 3 Esd is preferred and he treats this book first. In Kautzsch's Ger. ed of the Apoc and in most recent Ger. works the Lat designation 3 is revived. The Eng. commentators Bissell (Lange) and Wace (Speaker's Comm.) follow the custom of the Bible and speak of 1 Esd, placing the book first in the collection, and this is the prevailing custom among Eng. Protestant theologians. The name 2 Esd has also been given to this book, the canonical Ezr and Neh being then counted as one—1 Esd. See Origen quoted by HE, V, 25; Zuns, Der Gottesdienst, Vorträge Berlin, 1832, 15.

With the exception of § 1—5 6—the incident of the royal banquet and the contest for a prize of the three young men—the present books

2. Contents agree in everything essential, down to the minutest details, with the canonical Ezr and part of 2 Ch and Neh. Before discussing the relation between 1 Esd and the Bib. books named (see next section), it will be advantageous to give an outline of the book now specially under consideration, with reference to the || passages in the corresponding parts of the Canon. It will be seen that practically the whole of Ezr is concerned, and for explanations of the parts common to this book and to Neh reference may be made to the Century Bible Commentary on Ezr, Neh, and Est.

1. Ch 1—2 Ch 35 1—36 21 and may be analyzed thus:
 - 1 1-20—2 Ch 35 1-19: Josiah's great Passover.
 - 1 21 f has no exact parallel.
 - 1 23-31—2 Ch 35 20-27: The death of Josiah. This took place on the battlefield at Megiddo according to 2 K 23 29, but 1 Esd 1 31 and 2 Ch 35 24 say he died at Jerus.
 - 1 32-58—2 Ch 36 1-21, closing years of the monarchy followed by the exile in Babylon.
2. § 1-15—Ezr 1 1-11: The return from Babylon through the edict of Cyrus.
3. § 16-26—Ezr 4 7-24: Certain Pers officials in Samaria induced King Artaxerxes I (d. 424 BC) to stop the work of rebuilding the temple, which is not resumed until the second year of the reign of Darius Hystaspis (519 BC).
4. § 1—5 6 has no || in any part of the OT.

King Darius (Hystaspis?) makes a great feast, after which he returns to his bedchamber but finds sleeping very difficult. Three young men belonging to his bodyguard resolve each to make a sentence to be written down and placed under the king's pillow, so that upon rising from his bed he might hear the three sayings read to him. The question which each one seeks to answer is, What in this world is strongest? The first says it is "wine," the second, that it is "the king." The reply of the third is "woman, though strongest of all is truth" (from this arose the Lat saying Magna est veritas et prevalebit). The third is declared the best, and as a reward the king offers him whatever he might wish. This young man happened to be Zerubbabel (Zorobabel), and the request that he makes is that King Darius might perform the vow which he made on coming to the throne to rebuild Jerus and its temple and to restore the sacred vessels removed to Babylon. This request is at once granted, and there follows an account of the home-coming of Jews exiled in Babylon and the protection accorded them by the Pers government similar to what we read of in ch 1 as taking place in the reign of Cyrus. But many things in this narrative are striking and indeed odd. Zerubbabel is called a young man. Among those mentioned in 5 5 Zerubbabel is not named, though his son Joakim is. In the very next verse (5 6) this Joakim is identified with the young man (Zerubbabel) who won the king's prize for writing the wisest sentence, though the sense is not quite clear; perhaps Zerubbabel is meant in ver 6. Fritzsche argues that Joakim can alone be meant. This whole episode stands in no organic connection with the rest of 1 Esd, and if it is omitted the narrative is continuous. Besides this the account given of the return from Babylon contradicts what is said in ch 1 and the corresponding part of Esr. We must regard 3 1-5 6 as a Jewish haggada which at an early time was written in the margin as supplying illustrative matter and then got incorporated into the text. Nevertheless from a literary point of view this part of the book is the gem of the whole.

5. 5 7-73 - Esr 2-4 1-5: The names of those who returned with number of animals (horses, etc.) (5 7-43); altar of burnt offering erected (ver 48); sacrifices offered on it (ver 50). Foundation of the temple laid (vs 56 f.). The Jews refuse the offer of the Sam party to help in the rebuilding of the temple, with the result that this party had the work stopped (vs 66-73). Esr 4 6-24 finds its place in 1 Esd 2 16-30 (see above). 1 Esd 2 30 and 5 73 are evidently duplicates.
6. 6 1-7 15 - Esr 5 1-6 22: Building of the temple resumed through the preaching of Haggai and Zechariah (6 1 f.). Pers officials unsuccessfully oppose the work (vs 3-34) which is soon completed, the temple being then dedicated (7 1-11). Observance of the Passover (vs 12-15).
Between chs 7 and 8 there is an interval of some 60 years, for ch 8 begins with the arrival of Ezra (458 BC).
7. 8 1-67 - Esr 7 1-8 36: Journey of Ezra and his party from Babylon to Jerus bearing letters of authority from King Artaxerxes I (d. 424 BC) (8 1-27); list of those who return (vs 28-40); gathering together of the party by the river Ahava; incidents of the journey; the arrival (ver 41).
8. 8 68-90 - Esr 9: Ezra's grief on hearing of the marriage of some Jews with foreign wives (vs 68-73). His confession and prayer (vs 74-90).
9. 9 91-9 36 - Esr 10: The means used to end the mixed marriages; lists of the men (priests and others) who had married strange wives.
10. 9 37-55 - Neh 7 73b-8 12: The reforms of Ezra. In the Canonical Scriptures Neh 7 73b-10 gives the history of Ezra, not that of Nehemiah—the two never labored or lived together at Jerus. (The name Nehemiah in Neh 8 9 and 10 1 is an evident interpolation.) In 1 Esd Nehemiah is not once mentioned in this section. In 9 49 (1 Neh 8 9) "Attharates" is the word used, and as a proper name (see 1 Esd 5 40, "Nehemiah and Attharates"). The majority of modern scholars assign this section to Ezra, adding it to Esr 10, or incorporating it into the Ezra narrative. So Ewald, Wellhausen, Schrader, Klostermann, Baudissin, Budde and Rysael. The present writer defends this view in the Century Bible in Esr-Neh, Est, 242 f. In this case 1 Esd borrows from Ch and Esr alone and not from Neh. It should be remembered however that Esr-Neh formed originally but one book. Some will say that Ch preceded Esr-Neh as a single book, but for this there is no evidence (see Century Bible, 4). The last verse of 1 Esd in all MSS ends in the middle of a sentence: "And they assembled . . ." showing that the closing part of the book has been lost. The present writer suggests that the missing part is Neh 8 13-10, which begins, "And on the second day were gathered together (assembled) the heads of fathers' houses," etc, the same verb being used in the LXX Gr of both passages with a very slight difference (ἐκκλησίαν in Esr, ἐκκλησίαν in Esr and Esd respectively).

Since Neh 7 73b-8 12 belongs to the Book of Esr (see above) describing the work of Ezra, not that of Nehemiah, the contents of 1

3. The Relation Between 1 Esd and Ch, Esr, Neh
Esd are || with those of Ezra alone with the exception of ch 1 which agrees with 2 Ch 35 1-36 21. Various explanations have been offered, the following being the principal: (1) that 1 Esd is a compilation based on the LXX of Ch, Esr and Neh: so Keil, Bissell and formerly Schürer (GJV, II, ii, 179 f;

Herzog³, I, 496); the arguments for this opinion are well marshaled by Bissell in his Comm. on the Apoc (Lange); (2) that 1 Esd is an independent Gr tr from a now lost Heb (or Aram.) origin in many respects superior to our MT: so Whiston, Pohlmann, Herzfeld, Fritzsche, Ginsburg, Cheyne, Thackeray, Nestle, Howarth, Torrey and Bertholet. Most of these writers hold that the original 1 Esd included the whole of Ch, Esr and Neh; (3) the bulk of those who support view 2 argue that the original 1 Esd formed the real LXX version of Ch, Esr and Neh, what exists in our present LXX being another Gr tr, probably by Theodotion (fl. about 150 AD), just as we now know that what up to 1772 (the date of the publication in Rome of the Codex Chisianus) was considered as the LXX of Dnl is really Theodotion's version. Howarth (see arts. in the Academy, 1893; PSBA, XXIX, etc), and Torrey (Ezra Studies) stoutly champion this view. The evidence offered is of two kinds, external and internal:

(1) External evidence.—(a) Jos uses this version as his source for the period, though for other OT books he follows the LXX. (b) In the foreword to the Syr version of 1 Esd in Walton's Polyglot it is said that this version follows the LXX, which surely counts for nothing since copies of the LXX known to us contain both 1 Esd and the Gr tr reckoned up to recently as the true LXX. (c) Howarth maintains, but without proof, that in Origen's Hexapla, 1 Esd takes the place of our LXX version, and that the same is true of the Vetus Italia.

(2) Internal evidence.—(a) It is said by Dr. Gwyn, Thackeray and Howarth that the Gr of the true LXX of Dnl and that of 1 Esd are very similar in character, which however only goes to prove that one man tr^d both. (b) Howarth holds that the Gr of Dnl and Esr in the orthodox LXX version is very literal, as was all Theodotion's tr work. But such statements have to be received with very great caution, as in judging of style so much depends on the personal equation. The present writer has compared carefully parts ascribed with confidence to Theodotion and the LXX without reaching the above conclusions. At the most the matter has not been set at rest by any facts or reasoning as yet supplied. It must be admitted that 1 Esd and Jos preserve the true sequence of the events chronicled in Neh 7 73b-10, the MT and the Gr version based on it having gone wrong at this point, probably through the mixing of Heb skins or leaves. Those who see in 1 Esd the true LXX agree almost to a man that 1 Esd 3 1-5 6 is a late interpretation, never having had a Heb original. This may account in a large degree for the vigor and elegance of the Gr. Howarth, however, parts company with his friends Torrey, Bertholet, etc, by arguing strenuously for this part. (See more fully in Century Bible, Esr, etc, 27 ff.)

1 Esd exists in the following ancient VSS in addition to the Gr text which may or may not be a tr (see 3 above):

- 4. Versions
(1) Latin: (a) Jerome; (b) Vulgate.
(2) Syriac: (a) The Pesh, given in Walton's Polyglot and with a critically revised text by Lagarde (Libri Veteris Testamenti Apocrypha Syriacae, 1861); (b) The Hexaplar Syr version. For details of MSS, etc, see "Literature" below.

Nothing is known or can be conjectured as to the author or translator of 1 Esd, nor can anything be positively affirmed as to the date. If

5. Date and the work be the genuine LXX text Authorship this would give it an earlier origin than the view which makes it depend on the LXX. But this is to say but little. As Jos (d. 95 AD) used this book it must have been written some years before he wrote his history (say 67 AD). We must assume that it existed some time before the beginning of our era. Ewald, on account of some resemblances to the earliest of the Sibylline Books, dates 1 Esd about 190 BC. But admitting dependence in this matter—which is doubtful—it is impossible to say which is dependent and which is independent in such cases.

LITERATURE.—The most important books have been named at the end of the general art. on APOCALYPHA (q.v.). Recent contributions by Howarth and Torrey have been mentioned in the course of the foregoing article.

LITERATURE

This book was not received by the Council of Trent as canonical, nor has it ever been acknowledged as such by the Anglican church.

The book is not found in the LXX and no complete copy of the Gr text is known, though at one time it did exist. The oldest extant

1. Name name is "The Prophet Ezra" (Ἐσδρας ὁ προφήτης, Esdras ho prophētēs; see Clem. Alex., Strom., iii.16): It has been often called the Lat Esd because it exists more completely in that language; cf the name Gr Esd for 1 Esd.

3 Esd is the designation in old editions of the Vulg, 1 Esd being Esr and Neh, 2 Esd denoting what in Eng. is called 1 Esd. But in editions of the Vulg later than the Council of Trent, and also in Walton's Polyglot, Esr is called 1 Esd, Neh 2 Esd, 1 Esd = 3 Esd, the present book (the Lat Esd) being known as 4 Esd. In authorized copies of the Vulg, i.e. in those commonly used, this book is lacking. On account of its contents, Westcott, following the example of Anastasius Sinaita (bishop of Antioch from 559 AD), called the book the "Apocalypse of Esdras." But as Tischendorf in 1866 edited a later and inferior work with this title the present writer suggests the name "The Apocalyptic Esdras." Of all the Jewish apocalypses this is the sublimest and most pleading; see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, II, i, 5.

The original work consists of chs 3-14, chs 1f and 15f being late additions. The entire book of 16 chapters exists in the Lat version

2. Contents only, the other VSS containing chs 3-14 only. The real 2d (apocalyptic) Esd, consisting of chs 3-14, is made up of 7 visions given to Ezra in exile 30 years after the destruction of Jerus by the Babylonians. The drift of these visions is, How can a just and loving God allow His own people to suffer so much? The problem thus raised is fully and beautifully dealt with. For lack of space the present writer must refer for a fuller analysis to the art. APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, I, 5, and the lit. there cited. For chs 1f and 15f see under ESDRAS 5 AND 6.

Though no complete text even of chs 3-14 has survived, a careful examination of the Lat shows that it has been made from a Gr original. (1) Some fragments of the Gr can be traced, as 5 35 in Clement of Alexandria and 8 23 in the Apoc Const. (2) The order of the twelve prophets in 1 39f follows that in the LXX.

3. Original Language (3) The Lat version bears throughout clear traces of Gr idiom. Thus the gen. is used with the comparative (5 3; 11 29); we have the gen. (not abl.) absolute in 10 3, the double negative and the use of de (Gr ἐκ) and ex (Gr ἐκ) with the gen. in various parts. But there are cogent reasons for concluding that the Gr version implied in the Lat itself implies a Heb original, and the proof is similar to that of a Gr version as the basis of the Lat. In the Gr there are idioms which are Heb. not Gr.

the lost Gr except one of the two extant Arab. tr. The number and variety of VSS show that 2 Esd was widely circulated. By the Gr and Lat Fathers it was quoted as a genuine prophetic work. Its importance in the estimation of the mediaeval Roman church is vouched for by the fact that it has reached us in a number of well-known MSS of the Scriptures, and that it was added to the authorized Vulg as an appendix.

Two main views may briefly be noted: (1) That of Kabisch (Das vierte Buch Esra, 1889) who holds that the editor of the book freely used

5. Origin of a goodly number of sources, abstracting, adding and altering to suit his purpose. He gives a list of probable sources. R. H. Charles (Enc Brit, X, 107) is inclined to adopt this analysis. (2) Gunkel (loc. cit.) maintains and tries to prove that the book is the production of a single writer. Yet he admits that the book contains a large number of inconsistencies which he explains by assuming that the editor made free use of oral and written traditions. The two views do not therefore stand very far apart, for both take for granted that several sources have been used. It is simply a question of more or less.

Wellhausen is probably right in saying that the author of 2 (4) Esd had before him the Apoc of Bar, written under the impression awakened by the destruction of Jerus in 71 AD.

The opinion of the best modern scholars is that the book was written somewhere in the East in the last decade of the 1st cent. of our era.

6. Date This conclusion rests mainly on the most likely interpretation of the vision of the Eagle and the Lion in 11 1-12 51; but also on the fact that Clement of Alexandria (d. 217 AD) quotes the Gr of 5 35.

ESDRAS (or 4 Esr) 5 AND 6: These names have been applied respectively to the first two and the last two chs of 2 (4) Esd in the Lat Bible of 1462. In matter these chapters, which are of Christian origin, agree in the main with the genuine parts of 2 (4) Esd. See foregoing article.

ESDRIS, es'dris, es'dris (Ἐσδρας, Esdras): A leader mentioned in 2 Macc 12 36 in best texts and adopted in RV for Gorgias of AV. Grotius conjectured "men of Ephron" from ver 27.

ESEBON, es'-ē-bon (Jth 5 15) = HESHBON (RV), the chief city of the Ammonites.

ESEBRIAS, es'-ē-bri'as, ē-sē'bri-as. See ESEBRIAS; SHEREBIAH.

ESEK, ē'sek (עֶסֶק, 'ēsek; LXX Ἀδικία, Adikia): The name given by Isaac to a well dug by his servants, for the use of which the herdmen of Gerar strove with them—"contention" (Gen 26 20). It lay in the neighborhood of Rehoboth and Gerar: but the site is not identified.

ESEREBIAS, es-er-ē-bī'as ('Εσερεβίας, Eserēbias): One of the chiefs of the priests (1 Esd 8 54).

ESHAN, ē'shan (עֶשָׂן, 'esh'an; 'Εσάν, Esán; AV Eahean): A town of Judah in the uplands of Hebron (Josh 15 52). No satisfactory identification has yet been suggested. Some think the name may be a corruption of Beersheba (EB s.v.).

ESHBAAAL, esh'bā-al. See ISHBOSHETH.

ESHBAN, esh'ban (עֶשְׁבָּן, 'eshbān; perhaps "thoughtful," "intelligent"; Ἀσβάν, Asbān): Name of a chief of the Horites (Gen 36 26; 1 Ch 1 41).

ESHCOL, esh'kol (עֶשְׁכּוֹל, 'eshkōl, "cluster"; 'Εσχόλ, Eschōl): The brother of Mamre and Aner, the Amorite allies of Abraham who took part with him in the pursuit and defeat of Chedorlaomer's forces (Gen 14 13,24). He lived in the neighborhood of Hebron (13 18), and may have given his name to the valley of Eshcol, which lay a little N. of Hebron (Nu 13 23).

ESHCOL, esh'kol (עֶשְׁכּוֹל, 'eshkōl; Φάραγξ βότρυος, Pháragx bótruos, "a cluster of grapes"): The spies came to Hebron "and they came unto the valley of Eshcol, and cut down from thence a branch with one cluster of grapes" (Nu 13 23,24; 32 9; Dt 1 24). It was a valley near Hebron rich in vineyards. Fruitful vineyards are still the most characteristic feature of the environs of Hebron, esp. on the N. No particular valley can be identified, though popular tradition favors the wide and fertile valley, near the traditional site of "Abraham's oak," a little to the W. of the carriage road just before it enters the outskirts of Hebron. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

ESHEAN, esh'ē-an, ē'shē-an. See ESHAN.

ESHEK, ē'shek (עֶשֶׁק, 'eshēk, "oppressor"): A descendant of Jonathan, son of Saul, first king of Israel (1 Ch 8 39).

ESHKALONITE, esh'ka-lon-it. See ASKELONITE.

ESHTAOL, esh'tā-ol (עֶשְׁתָּאֵל, 'esh'tā'ōl; Ἀσ-ταῖλ, Ashtail): A town in the Shephelah of Judah named next to Zorah (Josh 15 33; 19 41). Between these two cities lay Mahaneh-dan (the camp of Dan) where the Spirit of the Lord began to move Samson (Jgs 13 25), and where he was buried (16 31). A contingent from Eshtaol formed part of the 600 Danites who captured Laish (18 2,11). It is probably represented by the modern Ashū'a, about a mile and a half E. of Zorah, the modern Šar'ah.

ESHTAOLITES, esh'tā-ol-its (עֶשְׁתָּאֵלִי, esh'tā'ōlī, lit. "the Eshtaolite"; AV Eshtaolites, esh-tā'ōlits): Inhabitants of Eshtaol, named among the descendants of Shobal, the son of Caleb (1 Ch 2 53).

ESHTEMOA, esh-tē-mō'a, esh'tē-mō-a (עֶשְׁתֵּמוֹא, 'esh'tē-mō'a): A Levitical city in the hill country of Judah (Josh 21 14; 1 Ch 6 57); Eshtemoh (עֶשְׁתֵּמוֹה, 'esh'tē-mōh, Josh 15 50). In 1 Ch 4 17, 19, Eshtemoa is said to be a Maacathite and "son" of Ishbah. David after routing the Amalekites sent a present to his friends in (among other places) Eshtemoa (1 S 30 28). It is now es-Semū'a, a considerable village of evident antiquity some 8 miles S. of Hebron.

ESHTEMOH, esh'tē-mō. See ESHTEMOA.

ESHTON, esh'ton (עֶשְׁתֹּן, 'esh'tōn, "uxorious"): A name found in the genealogical table of Judah (1 Ch 4 12).

ESLI, es'li ('Εσλί, Eslēi, 'Εσλί, Eslī; probably for Heb עֲדַלְיָהוּ, ʿadalyāhū): An ancestor of Jesus in St. Luke's genealogy, the 10th before Joseph, the husband of Mary (Lk 3 25).

ESORA, ē-sō'ra. See AESORA.

ESPOUSAL, es-pouz'al, ESPOUSE, es-pouz': In AV these words, following Eng. usage of an earlier day, are used to signify either marriage or betrothal, while the ARV discriminates, and uses them only for marriage. For example, in 2 S 3 14, "I espoused to me" (Heb ʿerasiti li) becomes "I betrothed to me." So also, in Mt 1 18; Lk 1 27; 2 5 which refer to the relation between Joseph and Mary before the birth of Jesus, "espoused" (μνηστεύω, mnēsteuō) becomes "betrothed." On the other hand, "espoused" is retained in Cant 3 11 ("the day of his espousals"—that is, day of marriage); in Jer 2 2 ("the love of thine espousals"—that is, the love of married state); and in 2 Cor 11 2 ("I espoused [ἡρμοσάμην, hērmosāmēn] you to one husband"). E. J. FORRESTER

ESPY, es-pī': "Espy" in modern Eng. means "to catch sight of," rather than "to explore secretly." RV therefore retains it in Gen 42 27, "He espied his money" (Heb ra'ah, "see"), while in Josh 14 7 "espy out the land" (AV) becomes "spy out the land." RV substitutes "watch" for "espy" in Jer 43 19, and "searched out" for "espied" in Ezk 20 6, with a gain in accuracy of rendering (cf the context).

ESRIL, es'ril, ez'ril: RV EZRIL (which see).

ESROM, es'rom, ez'rom ('Εσρώμ, Esrōm): AV, the Gr form of Hebron (thus RV) (Mt 1 3; Lk 3 33).

LITERATURE

When Jos describes the sects of the Jews, he devotes most of his time and attention to the third of these sects, the Essenes. Strangely enough, although there are frequent references in the NT to the other two sects, the Sadducees and Pharisees, no reference has been found to the Essenes. Notwithstanding this silence of the Gospels, the prominence of this third sect is undeniable. Even in Egypt they are known. Philo, the Jewish philosopher, gives an account of these Essenes in terms that, while in the main resembling those used in Jos, yet differ enough to prove him clearly an independent witness. Another contemporary, Pliny the Naturalist, also mentions these Essenes. Approximately a century later we have a long account of the habits and tenets of these sectaries in Hippolytus' Refutation of All Heresies. A century and a half later still Epiphanius describes these under various titles. Despite the fact that no reference to the Essenes can be found in the Gospels or the Acts, at all events under that name, there can be no doubt of their existence. Would one understand the Pal in which Our Lord's ministry was carried on, he must comprehend the place occupied by the Essenes.

I. The Name.—This assumes several forms in different authors—indeed sometimes two forms appear in the same author. Jos uses most frequently the form of the name which stands at the head of this art., but sometimes he speaks of individuals as "Essaeans" (BJ, II, vii, 3; viii, 4). This latter form is that preferred by Philo, a form that is adopted by Hegeippus as quoted by Eusebius, IV, 22. Pliny in his Natural History, v.15 writes "Essaeans." Hippolytus also has "Essenus." Epiphanius has mixed his information so that this sect appears with him under several names as "Ossaei" and "Jessaiei."

It is clear that the name is not primarily Gr.—It has passed into Gr from another tongue, since none of the forms has any easy derivation in Gr. Notwithstanding, there have been attempts to derive it from some Gr root, but all are preposterous as etymologies. The etymology must be sought either in Heb or its cognate, Aram. The usage in regard to the tr of proper names is our only guide.

Reasoning from the practice as seen in the Gr tr of the Scriptures and in Jos, we can deduce that the first letter of the original word must have been one of the gutturals \aleph or \aleph' . That the second letter was a sibilant is certain, and the last was probably η , for the final α in the common form of the name is due to the desire to render the word suitable for Gr accidence. We may say that to us the two most likely derivations are $\aleph\eta\eta\eta$, 'dsyd', "doers" or $\aleph\eta\eta\eta$, 'dsyd', "healers." Our preference is for the latter, as one of the characteristics of the Essenes dwelt upon by Jos is the fact that they were healers by means of herbs and incantations (BJ, II, viii, 6). This view is held by the great mass of investigators, as Bellerman, Gfrörer, Hamburger, Herzfeld, Dähm, etc. The name "Therapeutae" given by Philo to the kindred sect in Egypt supports this etymology, as it would be in one of its senses a tr of it. Lightfoot's objection that it is improbable that the ordinary name of the sect "should have been derived from a pursuit which was merely secondary and incidental" does not follow analogy. The term "Methodist" was derived from a purely temporary characteristic of the society that gathered round Wesley. The extreme probability, from the fact that the name is not found in the NT, is that it was the nature of a nickname, like "Quakers" applied to the Society of Friends. The multitude that followed Our Lord affords evidence of the influence that a reputation for healing gave to one.

II. The Authorities for the Tenets of the Essenes.—Philo and Jos, as contemporaries and Jews, are necessarily our principal sources of information.

Next is Pliny, though a contemporary of the sect, yet as a Roman, of necessity receiving his information second-hand. There is next in point of date Hippolytus in his work Refutation of All Heresies, written more than a century after the fall of the Jewish state and the disappearance of the Essenes. One point in his favor as an authority is his habit of quoting from sources that would be reckoned good even now. He seems to have founded to some extent on Jos, but he appears to have made use of some other source or sources as well. Slightly later is Porphyry. He avowedly draws all his information from Jos. The latest of the ancients who may be reckoned as authorities is Epiphanius. Writing in the 4th cent., and naturally of a somewhat confused intellect, any statement of his unsupported by other authority is to be received with caution.

In estimating the evidence that Philo gives concerning the Essenes, we must remember that he was living in Alexandria, not shut up in a 1. Philo Ghetto, but mingling to some extent with the scholars and philosophers of that city. The Jewish community there appears to have been more completely Hellenized than any other assemblage of Jews. The object of Philo's numerous works seems to have been the twofold one of commending Jewish religious thought to the Gr philosophic society in which he mingled, and of commending Gr philosophy to his Jewish kinsmen. The geographic distance from Pal may be to some degree neglected from the frequent communications between it and Egypt. The work in which Philo devotes most attention to the Essenes is his early work, Quod Omnis Probus Liber, "that every good man is free." This treatise is intended for a gentile audience—the "Lawgiver of the Jews" is introduced casually first, and then more emphatically, till he is named. The Essenes are brought forward as the very flower and perfection of Mosaism.

(1) Description of Essenes from "Quod Omnis Probus Liber."—"There is a portion of that people called Essenes—over four thousand in my opinion. They are above all servants [therapeutai] of God. They do not sacrifice animals but study to preserve the sanctity of life. They live in villages, avoiding all cities on account of the lawlessness of those that inhabit them. Some of these men cultivate the soil, others live by peaceful arts and so benefit themselves and all their neighbors. They do not lay up treasures of gold or silver for themselves, judging contentment and frugality the great riches. With them are no makers of arms or of military engines and no one is occupied with anything connected with war. They all avoid commerce and navigation, thinking that these employments make for covetousness. They possess no slaves, holding all men to be free and all are expected to aid one another as real [gnatsois] brethren. They devote their attention to the moral part of philosophy—to the neglect of logic—using, as instructors, the laws of their country which it would have been impossible for the human mind to devise save by Divine inspiration. They abstain from all work on the seventh day, which they look on as sacred. On it they assemble in sacred buildings which are called synagogues and, seated in order according to age, they hear the Scriptures [ids biblou] read and expounded. They are thus taught to choose what is right and to avoid what is wrong. They use a threefold criterion—love of God, love of virtue, love of man. They carefully avoid oaths and falsehood—they regard God as the author of all good. They all dwell in companies, so that no one has a dwelling absolutely his own. They have everything in common, their expenses, their garments, their food. When they work for wages they do not retain these for themselves, but bring it into the common stock. The sick are not neglected when they are unable to contribute to the common store. They respect their seniors as if they were their parents. Such men never can be enslaved. As a proof of this none of the many oppressors of their land were able to bring any accusation against the Holy Essenes."

The above is a very much condensed summary of the passage on the Essenes in Philo, QOPL. No one can fail to be struck with the resemblance all this has in the first place to the teaching of the Sermon on the Mount and the practice of the early church. Although celibacy is not mentioned it is implied in the picture here presented of the Essenes.

There is another account in a passage quoted from Philo by Eusebius, Preparatio Evangelica, VIII, 11:

(2) Philo's Account.—"Our lawgiver trained [theissen, "anointed"] ten thousands of his followers and formed them into a community called Essenes from their holiness. They dwell in numerous communities in many cities and villages of Judaea." It will be observed that this contradicts the statement above that there were only 4,000 Essenes and that they avoided cities. "This sect is not hereditary. There are no children nor youths among the Essenes as such persons are unstable. No one among them has property of his own. They regard all possessions as part of a common stock. They all dwell in the same place, forming themselves into clubs and societies. They do everything for the benefit of the whole society, but different members, laboring ceaseless sunrise they go to their set. Some are tillers of land, some are artists received their wages give who purchases what is gathered eat at the same table also is common. In winter summer light mantles. When anyone falls sick he sources. Old men, even are as if they had a nu children. They repudiate on woman as a selfish jealousy and hypocrisy brotherhood. A man by his affection, is no lo 1 Cor 7 1. St. Paul in regard to wedlock).

(3) Philo on the "Therapeutae."—In his Treatise De Vita Contemplativa Philo, commencing with a reference to the Essenes, passes on to describe a similar class of cenobites who have their settlements near the Moerotic Lake. These he calls Therapeutae, or in the fem., Therapeutrides, a title which he interprets as "healers." While there are many points of resemblance, there are also not a few features of difference. We shall give as full an extract as in the previous instances.

It is related that they have separate houses and only come together for worship or for feasts. They have parallel societies for men and for women. As in the case of the Essenes there is a reading of ancient sacred books and an exposition of the passage read. The name Therapeutae, with the explanation of the name given by Philo, affords a link, as said above, with the Essenes, if the etymology of their name which we have seen reason to prefer be the true one. There seems also to be some connection between these Jewish monks and the Christian monks of some three centuries later. It ought to be remarked that many suspicions have been thrown on the authenticity of De Vita Contemplativa. Although critical names of authority may be named on that side, yet it may be doubted whether the reasons are sufficient. Lucius, who is the main opponent, does so mainly to invalidate the existence of the Therapeutae. He thinks De Vita Contemplativa was composed by a Christian to give an antiquity to the Christian monks. To prove a practice to have been Jewish would be far from commending it to Christians. But more, the resemblance to the Christian monks, although close on some points, in others of importance the difference is equally prominent. While the common feast suggests the Agapae of the early church, we must remember that this was not a monastic peculiarity. The fact that a female community existed alongside of the male and joined with them in worship is out of harmony with what we know of early monasticism. The feast of the 50th day has no parallel in Christianity.

Like Philo, Jos wrote for a non-Jewish audience. In Rome the philosophic ideas held in the Hellenic world were prevalent, so he, as much

2. Josephus as Philo, had a temptation to be silent on any subject which might shock the sensibilities or provoke the ridicule of his masters. In particular, in describing the habits and tenets of the Essenes, for whom he professed so high an admiration, he would need to be specially careful to avoid causes of offence, as in such a case he would be liable to be involved in their condemnation. In dealing with the notices he gives of the Essenes we would consider the descriptions at length first, and then the incidental notices of individual Essenes.

The description which comes earliest in history—not, however, the earliest written—is in Antiquities of the Jews, XVIII, in connection with the census and survey under Quirinius (Cyrenius) and the resistance to it by Judas of Gamala.

He there (Ant, XVIII, 1, 5) begins by referring to their theological position, that they believed in the most absolute preordination. They teach the immortality of souls and a state of rewards and punishments. Although they dedicated gifts to the temple they offered no sacrifices, presumably bloody sacrifices, as they have offerings of their own. A singular statement is made that "they are on this account excluded from the common court" (koinos temenistatos). They occupy themselves with husbandry. "They excel in justice all other men." They have all things in common. They neither marry wives nor keep slaves. He says, as does Philo, that they number over four thousand men. They appoint "good men priests who should receive the fruits of their labor for the sake of corn and food."

vice. lutely espise nk oll elect Jairs, ircles them state- hat of When id the / were when a city would they apone ad at they sons. which then hour, ments is set meet, meat, 'Both God. ar not than octety they clety. One thing is to be observed: "they are bound by oath to preserve the sacred books of their sect, to hair-sheds outin biblia, and the names of the angels." They utter predictions by means of their sacred books, which predictions are generally fulfilled. There is, however, another sort of Essenes who do not avoid marriage.

The philosopher Porphyry mentions that Jos had an account of the Essenes in the second book against the Gentiles. If this means Contra Apionem, no such passage is to be found in that work now. It may, however, be some work of Jos which has not come down to us, which Porphyry has misnamed, though this is unlikely.

This is not, however, the whole of the information concerning the Essenes which we can gather from Jos. The earliest of these incidental notices occurs under the reign of Jonathan (Ant, XIII, v, 9), when the historian mentions the three sects of the Jews, when the only peculiarity he assigns to the Essenes is that they believe that everything happens according to fate. Next, in relating the fate of Antigonus, he tells how Judas, an Essene teaching in the temple, when he saw Antigonus, declared that he was proved a false prophet, as he had foretold that Antigonus was to die that day at Strato's tower (Caesarea), and he was now six hundred furlongs off from there. Here the statement that the Essenes were excluded from the temple seems directly contradicted. In the days of Herod (XV, x, 4.5) Josephus relates that while Herod demanded oaths of submission from others he excused the Essenes, from the favor he had to them on account of one Menahem, a member of this sect, who foretold his reign. This Essene seems to have been about the court and to have nothing of the coenobitic agriculturist about him. The Essenian fame for prediction and the interpretation of dreams is related in regard to Archelaus, the son of Herod (BJ, II, vii, 3). Archelaus had a dream, and applied to an Essene, Simon or Simeon, who foretold the end of his reign. In singular contrast to what had been said by Philo of the objection the Essenes had in regard to everything connected with war, one of the leading generals of the Jews when they rebelled against the Romans was John the Essene, who was made governor of certain toparchies in the North (BJ, II, xx, 4). He was killed in the battle near Ascalon with which the war began, which ended in the capture of Jerus by Titus (BJ, III, ii, 1). There is also mention of a gate of the Essenes in Jerus, which seems to imply that a number of them permanently resided there.

Pliny speaks of the Essenes in his Natural History (v.17) in somewhat rhetorical terms. They dwell on the west side of the Dead Sea—"a

3. Pliny wonderful race without women, without money, associates of the palms." They are recruited by those wearied of life, broken in fortunes. "Thus a race is eternal through thousands of ages [seculorum] in which no one is born; so fruitful to them is repentance of life in others." He refers to the fertility of Engedi and adds, "now burned up."

There is an enigmatical passage quoted by Eusebius from Hegesippus in which the Essaeans (Essenes), the Galileans, Hemerobaptists, Masbotheans, Samaritans and Pharisees are declared to hold different opinions about circumcision among the sons of Israel "against the tribe of Judah and of Christ" (κατὰ τὰς φυλὰς Ιουδα καὶ Χριστοῦ).

Porphry's note regarding the Essenes is simply taken from Jos.

In the great work of the mysterious bishop, Hippolytus, discovered some sixty years ago, there is a description of the Essenes. Although the work is a Refutation of All Heresies,

6. Hippolytus implying that the opinions maintained were erroneous and required to be refuted, the author does nothing to exhibit the erroneousness of the Essene tenets or habits.

In regard to the gnostic heresies Hippolytus endeavored to reach original sources; presumably he did so in the present case. Although there is no doubt of his indebtedness to Jos, yet for the features where he differs from Jos, or supplements him, we may assume that he has behind his statements some authority which he regarded as valid. In some cases there may be a suspicion that in his eagerness to show that certain heresies were derived from this or that heathen philosophical system he has modified the heresy to suit the derivation he has supposed. This, however, does not apply to the Essenes.

In the ninth book of his Refutation of All Heresies, Hippolytus takes up Jewish sects (haireseis) which, following Jos, he reckons as three. The first he discusses is the Essenes. They are very devotional and temperate and eschew matrimony. They despise wealth, and from sharing with the destitute they do not turn away (cf Mt 5 42; the vb. used is the same). Anyone joining the sect must sell all that he has (cf Mt 19 21; the same words are used in Acts 4 32.37). Overseers (epimeletai) are chosen by show of hands (cheirotomēn) (Acts 14 23). They do not stay in one city but many settle in every city. They dress always in white, but do not own two cloaks or two pairs of shoes, much as Our Lord's instructions to His apostles when He sent them out two and two (Mt 10 10). Their daily course of conduct is described very much in the same terms as those used by Jos. Before dawn they begin their day by prayer and singing a hymn. They return from their work before midday, at the fifth hour, and bathe themselves in cold water and clothe themselves in garments of white linen. After that they repair into the common apartment. They seat themselves in silence; the cook places food before each individual. The priest prays and pronounces a blessing on the food. At the end of the meal the priest again prays, and those who have partaken join in singing a hymn of thanksgiving. They lay aside their white linen garments, and resume their ordinary clothing and betake themselves again to their occupations. Supper at sunset is conducted in a similar manner. All obey the president (proestēs) in whatever he enjoins. No one amongst them is in the habit of swearing. They are careful to read the law and the prophets. Other works of faithful men they also study. All that join the sect are put on probation. The entrant receives a white robe and a linen girdle, and is supplied with an axe for the purposes mentioned in Dt 23 13. He has to take solemn oaths to worship God, to be just, not to hate anyone who injures him, but to pray for him (cf Mt 5 44). He promises also to show respect to all in authority, as all authority is from God (1 Pet 2 13). He is not to divulge the secret doctrines of the society. There follows a description of the fate of those expelled from the society and the mode of conducting trials, borrowed from Jos. Hippolytus proceeds to give an account of four different subsets of the Essenes, all seeming of more than even the wonted fanaticism of the Essenes. One sect would not use coins because of the image of the Emperor on them, inasmuch as this was of the nature of idolatry. Others were prepared to enforce circumcision at the point of the sword. According to Hippolytus the Zealots were Essenes. Later he mentions the class that were freer and did not abjure marriage. A very marked point of difference between the tenets of the Essenes, as described by Philo and Jos, and those attributed to them by Hippolytus, is in regard to the doctrine of the resurrection. Hippolytus affirms that they did believe in the resurrection of the body. The others, while not in terms denying that they did believe in it, ignore it in such a way as might lead the reader, as indeed it did Bishop Lightfoot, to think that they denied it altogether. The treatment Paul received at Athens when he preached the resurrection showed how incongruous this doctrine seemed to the Greeks. Philo and Jos wrote for Gr audiences—for the Romans, so far as culture went, were Greeks—and had to consider their taste. Another point held in abeyance by both those writers was the Messianic hopes that we know from the NT were so prevalent. Hippolytus says "all sections look for the Messiah," but held that He was to be merely man born in the ordinary way. The reason of Philo's silence and that of Jos is easily understood. They had commended the Essenes so highly; if they mentioned that they had treasonable hopes of a Messiah who should rule the world, their own personal loyalty would become doubtful. For our part we should regard all the positive elements in Hippolytus' description as worthy of acceptance.

The last authority to whom we would refer is Epiphanius. In his anxiety to make up the number of heresies, the Essenes figure repeatedly

7. Epiphanius under different names. He declares the Essenes to be a sect of the Samaritans closely associated with the Sebuans and Gortheni. Among the Jews he has three sects whom he calls Hemerobaptistae, Nazaraei and Osseni. Besides he has a sect called Sampseans, evidently also Essenes, which he mixes up with the followers of Elkaïsa. He does not seem to have any clear idea about their tenets or habits. The Samaritan sects differ about the three Jewish feasts, but he does not make it clear in what they differ. The Sebuans seem to have reversed the order of the Jewish feasts, but whether the Essenes and Gortheni did so likewise is not clear. That the Essenes whom we are considering were not Samaritans appears to be as certain as anything about this enigmatic sect can be. The obscure sentence quoted by Eusebius from Hegesippus might be interpreted as supporting this statement of Epiphanius, but it is too enigmatic to be pressed. As to the three Jewish sects the first named—Hemerobaptistae—suits the daily washings of the Essenes, but he asserts that they agree with the Sadducees in denying the resurrection. The Nazareans or Nazarenes are not to be confounded with a Christian sect of nearly the same name. They resided in the district E. of Jordan. They held with the Jews in all their customs, believing in the patriarchs, but did not receive the Pent, though they acknowledged Moses. The Osseni are the likeliest to the Essenes, as they are said to dwell near the Dead Sea, only it is on the side opposite to Engedi. Epiphanius leaves them to denounce Elxai and his brother Jexais, of which latter nothing further is known.

III. Deductions and Combinations.—From the characteristics so many, so confusing, indeed, in some respects so contradictory, it is difficult to get a consistent picture. They are said to be only four thousand, yet they are many ten thousands. They reside in Engedi, a company of coenobites. They dwell in villages and avoid towns, yet they dwell many in every city and in populous communities. They avoid everything connected with war, yet one of their number is one of the trusted generals of the Jews in their rebellion against the Romans. They keep away from the Temple, yet one of them, Judas, is teaching in the Temple when he sees Antigonus, whose death he had foretold. The only way in which any consistency can be brought into these accounts is by taking advantage of what Jos and Hippolytus say about the subsections into which the Essenes were distinguished.

A parallel the present writer has elsewhere used of the Methodists is illuminative. While the most prominent body of Methodists are Arminians, there are the Calvinistic Methodists. While Wesleyan Methodists do not allow women to preach, the Primitive Methodists do. This is so far confirmed by the fact that while the abjuring of marriage is a marked feature in the representation of Philo, yet the latter says that one class of the Essenes not only do not themselves oppose matrimony but regard those that do oppose it as enemies of the human race. The residents in Engedi formed but a small proportion of the Essenes. It is probable that of them the statement, found alike in Philo and Jos, that they were 4,000, applies. All the features of the picture of the daily common meals, rising before sunrise, joint devotions, may be true in their fulness only of the community by the Dead Sea. What Philo says (quoted by Eusebius, Prep. Evan., VIII, 11), that among the Essenes "there are no youths or persons just entering on manhood, only men already declining towards old age," would indicate that the settlement at Engedi was an asylum for those who, having borne the burden and heat of the day, now retired to enjoy repose.

They had communities apparently all over Pal, if not also beyond its bounds, over each of which there was a president appointed (Hip., IX, 15). This would mean that in towns of any size they would have a synagogue. They appear to have had houses of call, though it may have been that every member of the Essene community kept open house for all members of their sect who might be traveling. The traveler, when he came to a city, would inquire for any that were Essenes, as the apostles were commanded by their Lord, in similar circumstances, to inquire ("search out") who in a city were "worthy." The common meals might to some extent be observed in these different scattered communities, probably at intervals, not daily as at Engedi. At these the secret sacred books, read and studied with so great regularity at Engedi, would also be read. In this synagogue not only would the canonical books be preserved but also those other books which gave them the names of the angels, as now in the synagogues of Pal the library preserved in the synagogue may be used by those connected with it throughout the week. The head of the community at Engedi might have some suzerainty over all the different communities, but in regard to this we have no information. One external feature which would at once make the Essenes known to each other was the fact that they always dressed in white linen. They had priests probably in every one of their communities. The Jewish exorcists in Ephesus, in whom Bishop Lightfoot (Col., 93) recognizes Essenes, were the sons of one Sceva, a high priest (archiereus, Acts 19 14). The high-priesthood was evidently not connected with the temple at Jerus, for no such name appears in the list of high priests. It thus most probably was an Essenian high-priesthood.

In regard to their tenets, their belief in the absolute preordination by God of everything appears the feature in the doctrinal position

2. Doctrines which most appealed to Jos. Hippolytus affirms in terms their belief in the resurrection of the body. This point, as above noted, Philo and Jos ignore. The passage in Hippolytus is the more striking from the fact that the latter portion so closely resembles the passage in Jos. Jos, as we have suggested above, avoided crediting the Essenes with belief in resurrection because of the ridicule to which it would expose not only the Essenes, his protégés, but also himself. Hippolytus, writing with information other than what might be got from Jos or Philo and as, writing for Christian readers, without the fear of ridicule, in regard to the resurrection of the body, boldly and in terms ascribes that doctrine to them. The silence of our two main witnesses as to the Essenes cherishing any Messianic hopes cannot be pressed, as their silence may be explained as above mentioned by fear of the suspicions of Rome in regard to any such hopes. The statement of Hippolytus that all the Jews had these expectations may be said to cover this case. The abjuring of marriage and the shunning of everything connected with war seem to be prominent opinions in some sections of the Essenes, but not held by others.

IV. History and Origin.—There is much in Essenism that is difficult to understand. We have seen contradictory features assigned to the Essenes by different authorities; but even in the case of those features concerning which there is least dubiety the new difficulty emerges as to how it appeared as a characteristic of a Jewish sect. This is esp. the case in regard to abstinence from marriage. Easterners always have an earnest desire to have sons to keep their memory green, for on a death many of them had and still have ceremonies which only the son of the dead can perform. Yet despite this they avoided marriage. The Jews with their Messianic hopes desired children, as no one knew but that his child might prove the child of promise, the Christ of God.

The earliest note of the existence of the Essenes, as of the Pharisees and Sadducees, is under the pontificate of Jonathan, the successor of Judas Maccabaeus (Ant., XIII, v, 9). Jos says "at this time there were three sects of the Jews," and proceeds to name them. If this, however, were precisely true, it is singular that there is no mention

1. Essenes of any of these sects in either of the and books of the Maccabees. The only Hassidim sect named is the Hasidæans (hāsīdīm) who are called (1 Macc 2 42) "mighty men of Israel, every one that offered himself willingly for the law" (AV "voluntarily devoted himself to the law"; Gr hekousiazómenos). These again are not mentioned by Jos. The meaning of the word is "saints," and in this sense it appears frequently in the Pss. A parallel in modern history to their warlike activity and their claim to saintliness may be found in the Cameronians of "society folk" in Scotland toward the end of the 17th cent. They were Peden's "praying folk," yet they fought and won battles. When William of Orange came they formed the Cameronian regiment which helped to quell the clans and checked their advance after Killiecrankie. Some have identified these Hasidæans with the Pharisees (as W. Robertson Smith, art. "Assidæans," EB, and others). Hitzig would regard their successors as the Essenes. The great resemblance there was between the Pharisees and the Essenes renders it not improbable that originally they were really one sect and split off. If Jos is to be trusted this division must have occurred, if not before the Maccabean struggle, at least early during its continuance. The Sadducean authors of 1 Macc may have grouped them together. According to Jos, John Hyrcanus was a Pharisee, from which it may be presumed that Judas Maccabæus and his brethren belonged to the same sect of the Jews. The Assidæans deserted Maccabæus, so that it would seem at least possible that by that time the separation had become complete, so that the Hasidæans are now to be regarded as Essenes. It would seem as if they deserted the Maccabæans when they—the Maccabæans—made alliances with heathen powers like Rome. Then they objected to the high-priestly family being passed over for the Hasmoneans, hence their foolish surrender to Bacchides because Alcimus (called by Jos Jacimus = Jehoiakim) was with him, a descendant of the race of the high priests. All this is utterly unlike the quiet contemplative lives of the coenobites in Engedi. It would seem that the thousand who died in the wilderness themselves, their wives, their children and their cattle (1 Macc 1 29-38), were more like the inhabitants of Engedi. Before leaving the Hasidæans it must be said that the representation of the connection of the Hasidæans with Judas Maccabæus put in the mouth of Alcimus by the writer of 2 Macc (14 6) is not trustworthy. After this desertion of the Maccabæans the more religious of them retired to Engedi, while the rest of the party were scattered over the country in the various cities and villages.

As above mentioned the earliest mention of Essenes is by Jos (Ant, XIII, v, 9) while Jonathan was high priest. The next is the

2. Position story of Judas the Essene seated in the of Essenes Temple surrounded by his scholars in Josephus "who attended him [parémēnon] in order to learn the art of foretelling," thinking that the appearance of Antigonus in the Temple courts proved his prophecy false that he was that day to die in Strato's tower (Caesarea). Judas is evidently a resident in Jerus and meets his pupils in the Temple courts. This would imply that he had no horror of the Temple nor was debarred from its courts. He had no repugnance for residence in cities. Menahem, the next figure that presents itself, shows a man who is mingling in court circles. He inflicts on Herod, the son of the favorite counsellor of the high priest, a playful domestic chastisement and prophesies his future greatness. Herod, as we are told, always favored the Essenes in consequence. Later Archelaus consults Simon or Simeon, an Essene, as to the interpretation of a dream. He is at all events resident in Jerus and known in the court circles. He may have been Simeon of Lk 2 25-35. It must, however, be observed that the name is one of the commonest among the Jews at that time. After this they disappear, unless Hippolytus' identification of the Zealots with a section of the Essenes is admitted. Those in Engedi were aside from the course of the war, though if Pliny's representation is to be taken as accurate the vines and palm trees of Engedi had been burned and the settlement had been rendered desolate. They may have betaken themselves to Pella like the Christians, so as not to be involved in the destruction of the city and the Temple. The communities of the sect in Asia Minor disappear also. To all appearance they are absorbed in the church.

Owing to the fact that so many of the doctrines and practices attributed to the Essenes have no resemblance to anything else in Juda-

3. Doctrinalism the question of origin has a special Affinities meaning in regard to them. Although like all Easterners the Jews have a desire for progeny—indeed the man who has no child occupies a secondary place in social esteem—yet the Essenes, or at all events some of them, shunned marriage. Despite the elaborate system of animal sacrifices that claimed to originate with Moses whom they venerated, they abjured bloody sacrifices. Although the seed of Aaron were anointed priests, they set up priests of their own. Their habit of morning and evening prayer, timed by the rising and setting of the sun, suggested sun-worship. The external resemblance of these tenets of the Essenes to those of the Pythagoreans impressed Jos, and was emphasized by him all the more readily, since thus he brought himself and his nation into line with Gr thought. This suggestion of Jos has led some, e.g. Zeller, to the deduction that they were Jewish neo-Pythagoreans. The features of resemblance are formidable when drawn out in catalogue. He shows (Philos. der Griechen, I. Theil, II, 239-92) that like the Pythagoreans the Essenes regarded asceticism a means of holiness. Both abstained from animal food and bloody sacrifices, admired celibacy and, dressing in white linen garments, had frequent washings. Both prohibited oaths; both formed a corporate body into which admission was had by act of initiation and after probation. Community of goods was the custom in both. Both believed in transmigration of souls. The value of this formidable list is lessened by the fact that there is something of uncertainty on both sides as to the precise views and customs. Philo and Jos unquestionably Hellenized the views of the Essenes when they presented them before readers educated in Gr culture; further the views of Pythagoras have come down to us in a confused shape. As to the assertion that the Pythagoreans

4. Essenes dressed in white linen, Diogenes Laertius says that linen was not yet invented. Zeller has no sufficient evidence that the Essenes avoided the flesh of animals as food, and Diogenes Laertius expressly says that Pythagoras ate fish, though rarely (VIII, 18). While there seems no doubt as to the Pythagorean belief in the transmigration of souls, it seems certain that this was not a doctrine of the Essenes. Neither Philo nor Jos attribute this view to them. This is the more striking that, immediately after dealing with the Essenes, Jos proceeds to take up the doctrines of the Pharisees to whom he does attribute that view. Moreover the distinctive views of the Pythagoreans as to numbers and music have no sign of being held by the Essenes. On the other hand the fact that Pythagoras had a wife seems to throw doubt on their alleged preference for celibacy. Another chronological difficulty has to be met. The Pythagoreans as a society were put down in the 5th cent. before Christ. They may be regarded as having disappeared, till in the 2d cent. AD they reappear as prominent neo-Pythagoreans. It is true that Cicero and Seneca mention Pythagoreans, but only as individuals who would claim to be the followers of Pythagoras, and not as members of a sect: they were without influence even in Italy.

Chronology is equally against the view favored by Hilgenfeld that the influence of Buddhism may be traced in Essenism. As late as the

5. Bud- end of the 2d cent. AD, Clement of dhism and Alexandria, although acquainted with Essenism the name Buddha, is ignorant of his tenets and of divisions of his followers.

The Alexandria which Hilgenfeld identified with Alexandria of Egypt, in which there was a Buddhist settlement, was really to be found in Bactria, where a Buddhist settlement was likely.

There is more to be alleged in favor of Parsee influence being traceable. Neither geography nor

6. Parsee- chronology protests against this inism and fluence. The Jews were for centuries Essenism under the domination of the Persians, who were followers of Zoroaster.

They seem on the whole to have been favored by the Pers rulers, a state of matters that would make the Jews all the more ready to view with sympathy the opinions and religion of these masters. Moreover the Pers worship had spread away to the west, far beyond Syria. At the same time it is easy to exaggerate the points of resemblance. The dualism alleged to be a leading feature in Essenism is more a matter of deduction than of distinct statement. Indeed the proofs alleged by Zeller are almost ludicrous in their insufficiency, since Philo says that the Essenes shun marriage because women are selfish (philantous), and Jos, that they do so because women are addicted to excess (aselgeia); that therefore they regard the female generally as under the dominion of the evil principle, the fact being that this is really a part of the Hellenizing which the Essene views underwent at the hands of Philo and Jos. The alleged sun-worship is scarcely more worthy of credit: it is a deduction not even plausible. When carefully looked at the evidence points the other way. Their first prayer is offered not at sunrise but before it (BJ, II, viii, 5); in other words, they work while it is day. Their evening orisons are offered after the sun has set. At the same time their elaborate angelology seems to be due to the influence of the Zend-Avesta, but in this the Essenes merely shared with the rest of the Jews. We know that the Jews brought the names of the angels with them from Babylon.

The most singular feature in Essenism is really a feature of Judaism emphasized out of proportion.

It was unlike the Jews to shun marriage, yet in seasons when special holiness was required intercourse between the sexes was forbidden (Ex 19 15; 1 S 21 5). The whole act of sexual intercourse was regarded as unclean (Lev 15 16-18). In the Pauline Epistles uncleanness is used as equivalent to fornication (Rom 1 24; 6 19, etc). So also in 2 Pet 2 10. Such a view naturally led to the idea which soon became regnant in Christianity that the state of virginity was one of special sanctity (Rev 14 4). The respect they gave to the unmarried state may be exaggerated. If Philo's representation (quoted in Euseb., Prep.

Evan., VIII, 11) be correct, men were not admitted until maturity was attained and passed, when, therefore, such desires had begun to die down. Their avoidance of marriage is a matter of less importance. Their extreme reverence for the Sabbath is of a piece with their celibacy. Their avoidance of the Temple sacrifices, so far as they did so, may well be due to something of more than contempt for the religion of the Sadducean high-priestly party. Moreover the long residence of Israel in Babylon, when the Temple worship had to be in abeyance, and the consequent prevalence of synagogue worship, tended to lessen the importance of the sacrifices of the Temple. Thus it would seem that the Essenes were really a Jewish sect that had retained more of the Zoroastrian elements than had the rest of the Jews.

V. Relation to the Apocalyptic Books.—Among the features of Essenism which seem to have impressed Jos most was the fact that they had sacred books of their sect which they preserved, as also the names of the angels, thus bringing the Essenian special books into connection with angelology. These books their proselytes were bound by oath to preserve (BJ, II, viii, 7). Concerning the kindred sect of the Therapeutae, Philo says, "They have also writings of ancient men" (De Vita Contemp., III). On the other hand we have a mass of writings the same in character, dependent on one another, all apparently proceeding from one school of Jewish thought. Of the three sects of the Jews from which alone they could have proceeded the Sadducees are excluded because, while the apocalyptic books are full of angels, they believe neither in angel nor spirit (Acts 23 8). While doctrinally the Pharisees might suit, the fact that practically there is no reference to any of these books in the Talm, which proceeded from the Pharisaic school, renders them unlikely to have been the authors. The Essenes seem to us to have been the school from which these apocalyptic works proceeded. The sect, at the fall of the Jewish state, disappeared in Christianity, and in the

the Apoc- of morality, so that the composition of alypses pseudonymous writings, literary forgeries, might seem right. As seen in the study of the apocalyptic books there is the undue prominence given to sexual sin—a prominence that seems to be symptomatic of the unhealthy mental state engendered by celibacy. These writings are the product of a school that professed to have secret sacred books. In 2 (4) Esd 14 45.46 we have an account of how, while 24 of the sacred books were published to the multitude, 70 were retained for the "worthy," that is, for some inner circle, some brotherhood like the Essenes. In the Asm M, Joshua is commanded to place the revelations given him "in certain vessels and anoint them with oil of cedar." Such an order would be held as explaining at once the disappearance of the book for the years succeeding Moses and its opportune reappearance. On the one hand we have a sect that professes to have secret sacred books, and on the other we have sacred books that have been composed by a school that must have had many features which we recognize as Essenian. Further the Essenes disappeared in the Christian church, and in the Christian church and not among the Jews are these books preserved.

The main objection to this ascription is the prominence of the Messianic hope in the apocalyptic books, and the absence of any notice in Jos and Philo that the Essenes had this hope. But from neither of these writers could be discovered that any of the Jews cherished this hope. Yet from the NT we know that this hope was a prominent feature in national aspirations. Philo, associating perpetually with Greeks, would be sensitive to the ridicule to which such views would expose him, and how it would undo much of his laborious efforts to commend Judaism to the Greeks as a higher philosophy. Jos had not only that motive, but the more serious one of personal safety. To have enlarged on Messianic hopes and declared these hopes to have been cherished by these Essenes whom he had praised so much would be liable to bring him under suspicion of disloyalty to Rome. The silence of these two writers proves nothing because it proves too much; and further we have easy explanation of this silence. The assumption of Dr. Charles that the Essenian ideal was ethical and individualistic is pure assumption. There is another objection that while the doctrine of resurrection is recognized in these books we know nothing of the Essenes holding it. That the Greeks and their scholars in philosophy, the Romans, looked at the idea of resurrection from the dead as a subject for ridicule would be reason sufficient for Philo and Jos to suppress such a feature in their description of the Essenes. From them it could not be learned that the Pharisees ever had any such belief. It is also objected that while the Essenes held the preexistence of souls, there is no trace of this belief in the apocalyptic books. Jos, however, does not really assert that they believed in the prior existence of individual souls, but rather in a soul-stuff from which individual souls were separated. Thus both positively and negatively we think there is a strong case for the Essenes being regarded as the authors of the apocalyptic books. Further objections are brought forward by Dr. Charles as applicable to the Aasm M specially. One is the interest manifested in the Temple by the writer while, so says Dr. Charles, "the Essene was excluded from its courts," and refers to Jos, Ant, XVIII, i, 5. He must have forgotten, while penning this sentence, Ant, XIII, xi, 2, in which Judas, the Essene, is represented as teaching in the Temple. His objection that Jos credits the Essenes with a belief in a paradise beyond the ocean like the Gr Islands of the Blest, appears to us to lay too much stress on what is in both cases fig. language. Moreover, in En the description of Paradise (chs 24-26) would almost seem to be the original from which Jos (BJ, II, viii, 11) drew his picture. He seems to regard our ignorance of how far the Essenes agreed with the rest of their countrymen in considering the enemies of Israel "the wicked," as evidence that they disagreed with them on that point.

2. Objections Answered

VI. The Essenes and Christianity.—That there were many points of resemblance between the Essenes and the church in its earliest form cannot be denied. The Essenes, we are told, maintained a community of goods and required anyone who joined their society to sell all he had and present it to the community (Hippolytus, Adv. Heret., ix; x; Jos, BJ, II, viii, 3), just as so many of the primitive Christians did in Jerus (Acts 4 37). Another peculiarity of the Essenes—noted by Jos (BJ, II, viii, 4)—that they moved about from city to city, and wherever they went found accommodation with members of their order, although perfect strangers, may be compared with Our Lord's instructions to His disciples when He sent them forth (Mt 10 11): "Into whatsoever city or village ye shall enter, search out who in it is worthy." When one thinks of who those worthy persons could be, and what was the evidence by which their worthiness was expected to be established, one is almost obliged to suppose that it was some specially easily recognized class that was so designated. If the worthiness in question was the moral quality, there are so many ideas of moral worth that when the apostles inquired, on entering a city, who was worthy, before they could act on the answer they would need to discover what was the criterion of worthiness in the mind of him from whom they had inquired. If, however, this term was the private designation of the members of a sect, one by which they, in speaking of each other, indicated that they were co-members, as the "Quakers" speak of each other as "Friends," the inquiry for those who were worthy would be simple enough. If the Essenes were "the worthy," then identification would be complete, but we cannot assume that. The majority of the points in which the Essenes resembled the primitive Christians are noted above in connection with each feature as it appears in the passage or passages of the authorities that record it, and to these we refer our readers.

At the same time, although there are thus many points of likeness, it is not to be denied that there are also many features in Essenism

2. Points of Difference which are at variance with the practice of the early church and the teaching of Our Lord and His apostles. The most prominent of these is the difference of attitude toward marriage and the female sex. Our Lord sanctified marriage by His presence at the marriage at Cana of Galilee, although He himself never married. He used the festivities of marriage again and again as illustrations. He drew women to Him and had none of the contempt of the sex which Jos and Philo attribute to the Essenes. The apostles assume the marriage relationship as one into which Christians may be expected in due course to enter, and give exhortations suited to husbands and wives (1 Pet 3 1-7; Eph 5 22-33; Col 3 18,19). The apostle Paul uses the relation of husband and wife as the symbol of the relation of Christ to His church (Eph 5 32). The writer of the Epistle to the He declares, "Marriage is honourable in all" (He 13 4 AV).

Another point in which the Essenes differed from the practice of Our Lord and His disciples was the exaggerated reverence the former gave to the Sabbath, not even moving a vessel from one place to another on the seventh day. Our Lord's declaration, "The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath" (Mk 2 27), cuts at the feet of that whole attitude. The point of His conflict with the Pharisees was His disregard of the Sabbath as fenced by their traditions. The Essenes shrank from contact with oil, which Our Lord certainly did not do. On the contrary He rebuked the Pharisee for his neglect (Lk 7 46). He was twice anointed by women, and in both cases commended the deed. The purely external and material bulked largely in the opinions of the Essenes. Our Lord emphasized the internal and spiritual. Many have held and do hold that Our Lord was an Essene. If at the beginning of His career He belonged to this sect He must have broken with it long before the end of His ministry.

Why Our Lord never meets the Essenes.—There are some phenomena which, irrespective of these resemblances and differences, have a bearing on the relation between Essenism and Christianity. The first is the fact that Our Lord, who met so many different classes of the inhabitants of Pal—Pharisees and Sadducees, Zealots and Herodians, publicans, Samaritans, Greeks—never is recorded to have met an Essene. The common answer, which satisfied even Bishop Lightfoot, is that they were so few and lived so retired that it was no marvel that He never encountered any of them. They had little or no effect on the national life. This mistaken answer is due to forgetting that though both Jos and Philo say the Essenes were 4,000 they also declare that they were "many in every city," that there were "ten thousands of them." Our Lord must have met them; but if the name "Essene" was a designation given from without like "Quakers," then they may appear in the Gospels under another name. There is a class of persons three times referred to—those "that waited for the consolation of Israel" (Lk 2 25 AV), "looking for the redemption" (2 38), "waited for the kingdom of God" (Mk 15 43 AV; Lk 23 51 AV). There are thus Simeon and Anna at the beginning of His earthly life, and Joseph of Arimathea at the end, connected with this sect. If, then, this sect were the Essenes under another name, the difficulty would be removed. If, further, in any sense Our Lord belonged, or had belonged, to the Essenes, then as He would be perpetually meeting and associating with them, these meetings would not be chronicled. A man cannot meet himself. If they are the authors of the apocalyptic books, as we contend, then the title "waiters for the kingdom of God" would be most suitable, full as these books are of Messianic hopes. If this opinion is correct Our Lord's assumption of the title "Son of Man" is significant, taken in connection with the prominence given to that title in the Enoch books.

3. Disappearance of Essenism in Christianity foot, in his dissertation on the Colossian Heresy (Comm. on Col, 21-111), proves that it was Essenism. These Essenes must have been baptized into Christ, or they could not have got entry into the Christian communities which had been drawn to Christ from heathenism. But that is not the only heresy that is connected with the Essenes. The Ebionites seem to have been Essenes who had passed over into Christianity. In the Apos Const the Ebionites and Essenes are brought into very close connection. Epiphanius, in his confused way, mixes up the various names under which the Essenes appear in his works with a certain Elkaisa, a connection also to be found in Hippolytus, an earlier and better authority. But Elkaisa claimed to be a Christian. His leading follower, Alcibiades, appeared in Rome and was resisted by Hippolytus. The Clementine Homilies, a religious novel of which St. Peter is the hero, has many Essenian features. It is assumed to be Ebionite, but that only makes the evidence that the Essenes had become Christians all the more convincing. The Ebionites were Christians, if defective in their views, and the presence of Essenian features in a work proceeding from them emphasizes the identity. See EBIONISM.

There is another phenomenon, more extensive and important than those we have considered above—the presence of Monachism in the church. Notwithstanding that Our Lord prayed "not that" the disciples be taken "out of the world," but that they be kept "from the evil" (Jn 17 15), implying that they were not to retire into solitude, and that the apostle Paul regards it as demonstrating the falsity of our possible interpretation of an exhortation of his that it would imply that the disciples "must needs go out of the world" (1 Cor 5 10); yet the monks did retire from the world and regarded themselves as all the holier for so doing, and were regarded so by others. The apostle Paul declares the "forbidding to marry" one of "the doctrines of demons," yet very soon asceticism set in and virginity was regarded as far holier than the married state. Retirement from the world and asceticism were the two cardinal characteristics of Monachism. Despite that these were in antagonism to the teachings of Christ and His apostles, within little more than a century after Our Lord's ascension Monachism began to appear, and prevailed more and more and continues to this day. These characteristics, retirement from the world and asceticism, esp. forbidding to marry, were marked features of Essenism. The wholesale entrance of the Essene sect into the church would explain this. On the other hand this wholesale passing over into Christianity of so intensely Jewish a sect implies a historic connection or affinity. It is true that the catechetical school of Alexandria praises the contemplative life, so admired by their contemporaries, the neo-Platonists, and that philosophy which had been looked at askance by the church was, so to say, taken under their protection by the Alexandrian school, and the retirement of solitaries into the deserts or the formation of monasteries served to promote this contemplation. This led to all the extravagances of the monks being regarded as heights of philosophy. Such views were a cause, but as certainly were they also effects. The cause of these effects as it seems to us was to some extent the admiration extended by Philo, the Alexandrian, to the Essenes and Therapeutae, and the influence of Philo on his Christian successors in Alexandria.

LITERATURE.—Sources: Philo, Jos, Pilny, Hegesippus, Porphyry, Hippolytus, Epiphanius.

Secondary literature: Besides works specially on the Essenes, the following are mentioned: Frankel, Die Essder; Lucius, Der Essenismus; Ginsburg, Essenes; and portions of books, as Delaunay, Moines et Sibylles, 1-88; Thomson, Books Which Influenced Our Lord, 74-122; Ritschl, Die Entstehung der alt-katholischen Kirche, 179-203; Lightfoot, Comm. on Col, 7-111, 347-417.

There are in histories of the Jews discussions of the questions in order. Of these may be noted: Ewald, Hist of Israel, V, 370-71; Grätz, Geschichte der Juden, III, 657-63; Schürer, The Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, II, ii, 188-218, tr. This opens with a fairly full account of the lit. up to the date of the 2d German ed.; Zeller, Geschichte der Philos. der Griechen, III, ii, 2, pp. 235-93. There are also arts. in various Bible and theological dictionaries, as Smith and Wace, Dict. of Eccles Biography; Smith and Fuller, Dict. of the Bible; HDB; Jew Enc; RE; Schenkel, Bibel-Lexikon; M'Clin-tock, Theological Dict.

At the same time, while submitting these as a sample, and only as a sample, of the vast lit. of the subject, we agree in the advice given by F. C. Conybeare—in HDB, s.v.: "The student may be advised to study for himself the very limited documentary sources relating to the Essenes and then to draw his own conclusions." We feel the importance of this advice all the more that perusal has shown us that most of these secondary writers have considered exclusively the coenobite community at Engedi to the neglect of the wider society. After the student has formed opinions from a careful study of the sources he may benefit by these secondary works.

ESTATE, es-tāt': While AV uses both "estate" and "state" with the meaning of "condition," ARV distinguishes, using "state" for the idea of condition, "estate" for position; and replaces "estate" of AV by more definite expressions in many cases. Cf Col 4 7 AV, "All my state shall Tychicus declare unto you," but ver 8, AV "might know your estate," RV "may know our state"; Lk 1 48 AV and RV "the low estate" (of the Lord's hand-maiden); Mk 6 21, AV "chief estates," RV "chief men"; Dnl 11 7.20.21.38, AV "his estate," RV "his place," both with m "his office."

ESTEEM, es-tēm' (עָשָׂה, hāshabbh; ἡγεύμαι, hēgeōmai): "To esteem" means sometimes simply "to think" or "reckon"; in other connections it means "to regard as honorable" or "valuable." We have examples of both senses in the Bible. The word oftenest so tr^d in the OT is hāshabbh, meaning perhaps originally, "to bind" hence "combine," "think," "reckon" (Job 41 27 AV; Isa 29 16.17; 53 4; Lam 4 2). In Isa 53 3 we have the word in the higher sense, "We esteemed him not." This sense is expressed also by ʾarakh, "to set in array," "in order" (Job 36 19, AV "Will he esteem thy riches?" ERV "Will thy riches suffice?" m "Will thy cry avail?" which ARV adopts as the text); also by qāphan, "to hide," "to conceal" (Job 23 12, AV "I have esteemed the words of his mouth," RV "treasured up"); kālāh, "to be light," is tr^d "lightly esteemed" (1 S 18 23, "I am a poor man, and lightly esteemed"), also kālal, same meaning (1 S 2 30, "They that despise me shall be lightly esteemed"). In the NT, hēgeomai, "to lead out," is used in the sense of "counting honorable," etc (Phil 2 3, RV "counting"; 1 Thess 5 13; perhaps He 11 26, but RV has simply "accounting"); krinō, "to judge," is used in the sense of "to reckon" (Rom 14 5 bis); also logizomai, "to reckon" (Rom 14 14, RV "accounteth"); hupsēlos, "high," "exalted," is rendered "highly esteemed" in Lk 16 15 AV, but in RV "exalted"; exouthenō, "to think nothing of," is tr^d "least esteemed" (1 Cor 6 4 AV, RV "of no account").

The following changes in RV are of interest: for "He that is despised and hath a servant, is better than he that honoreth himself and lacketh bread" (Prov 12 9), "Better is he that is lightly esteemed"; for "Better is he than both they, which hath not yet been" (Eccl 4 3), "Better than them both did I esteem him," m "Better than they both is he"; for "Surely your turning of things upside down shall be esteemed as the potter's clay" (Isa 29 16), "Ye turn things upside down!" (m "Oh your perversity!"), "Shall the potter be esteemed [ERV "counted"] as clay," etc—in this connection a forcible assertion of the necessary possession of knowledge by the Creator of man.

ESTHER, es'tēr (אֶסְתֵּר, ʾes'tēr, akin to the Zend stara, the Sanskrit stri, the Gr αστήρ, astēr, "a star," ἑσθήρ, Esthēr): Esther was a Jewish orphan, who became the queen of Xerxes, in some respects the greatest of the Pers kings. She was brought up at Susa by her cousin Mordecai, who seems to have held a position among the lower officials of the royal palace. Vashti, Xerxes' former queen, was divorced; and the most beautiful virgins from all the provinces of the empire were brought to the palace of Susa that the king might select her successor. The choice fell upon the Jewish maiden. Soon after her accession a great crisis occurred in the history of the Jews. The entire people was threatened with destruction. The name of Esther is forever bound up with the record of their deliverance. By a course of action which gives her a distinguished place among the women of the Bible, the great enemy of the Jews was destroyed, and her people were delivered. Nothing more is known of her than is recorded in the book which Jewish gratitude has made to bear her name.

The change in the queen's name from Hadassah (חַדַּסָּה), "a myrtle," to Esther, "a star," may possibly indicate the style of beauty for which the Pers queen was famous. The narrative displays her as a woman of clear judgment, of magnificent self-control, and capable of the noblest self-sacrifice. See ESTHER, BOOK OF.

ESTHER, BOOK OF:

1. The Canonicity of Esther
2. Its Authorship
3. Its Date
4. Its Contents
5. The Greek Additions
6. The Attacks upon the Book
7. Some of the Objections
8. Confirmations of the Book

This book completes the historical books of the OT. The conjunction ʾ, "and," with which it begins, is significant. It shows that the book was designed for a place in a series, the ʾ linking it on to a book immediately preceding, and that the present arrangement of the Heb Bible differs widely from what must have been the original order. At present Est follows Eccl, with which it has no connection whatever; and this tell-tale "and" like a body-mark on a lost child, proves that the book has been wrenched away from its original connection. There is no reason to doubt that the order in the Sept follows that of the Heb Bible of the 3d or the 4th cent. BC, and this is the order of the Vulg, of the Eng. Bible, and other VSS. The initial ʾ is absent from Gen, Dt, 1 Ch and Neh. The historical books are consequently arranged, by the insertion and the omission of ʾ, into these four divisions: Gen to Nu; Dt to 2 K; 1 Ch to Ezr; Neh and Est.

Of the canonicity of the book there is no question. That there was a distinct guardianship of the Canon by the Jewish priesthood has figured

1. The less in recent discussions than it should. Canonicity Jos shows that there was a Temple of Esther copy which was carried among the Temple spoils in the triumph of Vespasian. The peculiarities of the Heb text also prove that all our MSS are representatives of one standard copy. In the Jewish Canon Est had not only a recognized, but also a distinguished, place. The statement of Junilius in the 6th cent. AD that the canonicity of Est was doubted by some in his time has no bearing on the question. The high estimation of the book current among the ancient Jews is evident from its titles. It is usually headed "M^gillath Esther" (the volume of Est), and sometimes "M^gillāh" (the volume). Maimonides says that the wise men among the Jews affirm that the book was dictated by the Holy Spirit, and adds: "All the books of the Prophets, and all the Hagiographa shall cease in the days of the Messiah, except the volume of Est; and, lo, that shall be as stable as the Pent, and as the constitutions of the oral law which shall never cease."

By whom was the book written? This is a point in regard to which no help is afforded us either by the contents of the book or by any reliable tradition. Mordecai, whose Authorship claims have been strongly urged by some, is excluded by the closing words (10 3), which sum up his life work and the blessings of which he had been the recipient. The words imply that when the book was written, that great Israelite had passed away.

Light is thrown upon the date of the book by the closing references to Ahasuerus (10 2): "And all the acts of his power and of his might,

3. Its Date . . . are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia?" The entire history, therefore, of Xerxes was to be found in the state records when the book was written. In other words, Xerxes had passed away before it saw the light. That monarch was assassinated by Artabanus in 465 BC. This gives us, say 460 BC, as the highest possible date. The lowest possible date is the overthrow of the Pers empire by Alexander in 332 BC; for the royal records of the Median and Pers kings are plainly in existence and accessible, which they would not have been had the empire been overthrown. The book must have been written, therefore, some time within this interval of 128 years. There is another fact which narrows that interval. The initial waw shows that Est was written after Neh, that is, after 430 BC. The interval is consequently reduced to 98 years; and, seeing that the Pers dominion was plainly in its pristine vigor when Est was written, we cannot be far wrong if we regard its date as about 400 BC.

The book is characterized by supreme dramatic power. The scene is "Shushan the palace," that portion of the ancient Elamitic capital which formed the fortified residence of the Pers kings. The book opens with the description of a high festival.

4. Its Contents

All the notabilities of the kingdom are present, together with their retainers, both small and great. To grace the occasion, Vashti is summoned to appear before the king's guests; and, to the dismay of the great assembly, the queen refuses to obey. A council is immediately summoned. Vashti is degraded; and a decree is issued that every man bear rule in his own house (ch 1). To find a successor to Vashti, the fairest damsels in the empire are brought to Shushan; and Hadassah, the cousin and adopted daughter of Mordecai, is of the number. The chapter (2) closes with a notice of two incidents: (1) the coronation of Hadassah (now and henceforth named "Esther") as queen; (2) Mordecai's discovery of a palace plot to assassinate the king. Ch 3 introduces another leading personage, Haman, the son of Hammedatha, whose seat the king had set "above all the princes that were with him." All the king's servants who are at the king's gates prostrate themselves before the powerful favorite. Mordecai, who is not a trained courtier but a God-fearing Jew, refrains. Though expostulated with, he will not conform. The matter is brought to Haman's notice for whose offended dignity Mordecai is too small a sacrifice. The whole Jewish people must perish. Lots are cast to find a lucky day for their extermination. The king's consent is obtained, and the royal decree is sent into all the provinces fixing the slaughter for the 13th day of the 12th month.

The publication of the decree is followed by universal mourning among the Jews (ch 4). News of Mordecai's mourning is brought to Esther, who, through the messengers she sends to him, is informed of her own and her people's danger. She is urged to save herself and them. She eventually decides to seek the king's presence at the risk of her life. She presents herself (ch 5) before the king and is graciously received. Here we breathe the atmosphere of the place and time. Everything depends upon the decision of one will—the king's. Esther does not attempt too much at first: she invites the king and Haman to a banquet. Here the king asks Esther what her petition is, assuring her that it shall be granted. In reply she requests his and Haman's presence at a banquet the following day. Haman goes forth in high elation. On his way home he passes Mordecai, who "stood not up nor moved for him." Haman passes on filled with rage, and unbosoms himself to his wife and all his friends. They advise that a stake, fifty cubits high, be prepared for Mordecai's impalement; that on the morrow he obtain the royal permission for Mordecai's execution; and that he then proceed with a merry heart to banquet with the queen. The stake is made ready.

But (ch 6) that night Xerxes cannot sleep. The chronicles of the kingdom are read before him. The reader has come to Mordecai's discovery of the plot, when the king asks what reward was given him. He is informed that the service had received no acknowledgment. It is now early morn, and Haman is waiting in the court for an audience to request Mordecai's life. He is summoned to the king's presence and asked what should be done to the man whom the king desires to honor. Believing that the king can be thinking only of him, he suggests that royal honors be paid him. He is appalled by the command to do so to Mordecai. Hurrying home from his lowly attendance upon the hated Jew, he has hardly time to tell the mournful story to his wife and friends when he is summoned to Esther's banquet. There, at the king's renewed request to be told her desire, she begs life for herself and for her people (ch 7). The king asks in astonishment, who he is, and where he is, who dared to injure her and them. The reply is that Haman is the adversary. Xerxes, filled with indignation, rises from the banquet and passes into the palace garden. He returns and discovers that Haman, in the madness of his fear, has thrown himself on the queen's couch, begging for his life. That act seals his doom. He is led away to be impaled upon the very stake he had prepared for the Jew. The seal of the kingdom is transferred to Mordecai (ch 8). Measures are immediately taken to avert the consequence of Haman's plot (chs 9-10). The result is deliverance and honor for the Jews. These resolve that the festival of Purim should be instituted and be ever after observed by Jews and proselytes. The decision was confirmed by letters from Esther and Mordecai.

The Sept., as we now have it, makes large additions to the original text. Jerome, keeping to the Heb text in his own tr., has added these at the end. They amount to nearly seven chapters. There is nothing in them to reward perusal. Their age has been assigned to 100 BC, and their only value consists in the indication they afford of the antiquity of the book. That had been long enough in existence to perplex the Heb mind with the absence of the name of God and the omissions of any reference to Divine worship. Full amends are made in the additions.

The opponents of the Book of Est may undoubtedly boast that Martin Luther headed the attack.

In his Table-Talk he declared that he was so hostile "to the Book of Est that I would it did not exist; for it Judaizes too much, and has in it a great deal of heathenish naughtiness." His remark in his reply to Erasmus shows that this was his deliberate judgment. Referring to Est, he says that, though the Jews have it in their Canon, "it is more worthy than all" the apocryphal books "of being excluded from the Canon." That repudiation was founded, however, on no historical or critical grounds. It rested solely upon an entirely mistaken judgment as to the tone and the intention of the book. Luther's judgment has been carried farther by Ewald, who says: "We fall here as if from heaven to earth; and, looking among the new forms surrounding us, we seem to behold the Jews, or indeed the small men of the present day in general, acting just as they now do." Nothing of all this, however, touches the historicity of Est.

6. The Attacks upon the Book

The modern attack has quite another objective. Semler, who is its real fons et origo, believed Est to be a work of pure imagination, and as establishing little more than the pride and arrogance of the Jews. DeWette says: "It violates all historical probability, and contains striking difficulties and many errors with regard to Pers manners, as well as just references to them." Dr. Driver modifies that judgment. "The writer," he says, "shows himself well informed on Pers manners and institutions; he does not commit anachronisms such as occur in Tob or Jth; and the character of Xerxes as drawn by him is in agreement with history." The controversy shows, however, no sign of approaching settlement. Th. Nöldeke (EB) is more violent than De Wette. "The story," he writes, "is in fact a tissue of improbabilities and impossibilities." We shall look first of all at the main objections urged by him and others and then at the recent confirmations of the historicity of Esther.

(1) "There is something fantastic, but not altogether unskilful," says Nöldeke, "in the touch whereby Mordecai and Haman are made to inherit an ancient feud, the former being a member of the family of King Saul, the latter a descendant of Agag, king of Amalek." It is surely unworthy of a scholar to make of the book responsible for a Jewish fable. There is absolutely no mention in it of either King Saul or Agag, king of Amalek, and not the most distant allusion to any inherited feud. "Kish, a Benjamite" is certainly mentioned (2 5) as the great-grandfather of Mordecai; but if this was also the father of Saul, then the first of the Israelitish kings was a sharer in the experiences of the Bab captivity, a conception which is certainly fantastic enough. One might ask also how an Amalekite came to be described as an Agagite; and how a childless king, who was cut in pieces, became the founder of a tribe. But any semblance of a foundation which that rabbinic conceit ever had was swept away years ago by Oppert's discovery of "Agag" in one of Sargon's inscriptions as the name of a district in the Pers empire. "Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite" means simply that Haman or his father had come from the district of Agag. (2) The statement that 2 5.6 represents Mordecai as having been carried away with Jeconiah from Jerus, and as being therefore of an impossible age, is unworthy of notice. The relative "who" (2 6) refers to Kish, his great-grandfather. (3) "Between the 7th and the 12th years of his reign, Xerxes' queen was Amestris, a superstitious and cruel woman (Herod. vii.114; ix.112), who cannot be identified with Esther, and who leaves no place for Esther beside her" (Driver). Scaliger long ago identified Esther with Amestris, an identification which Prideaux rejected on account of the cruelty which Herodotus has attributed to that queen. Dr. Driver has failed to take full account of one thing—the striking fact that critics have leveled this very charge of cruelty against the heroine of our book. It is quite possible that Esther, moving in a world of merciless intrigue, may have had to take measures which would form a foundation for the tales recorded by the Gr historian. (4) The aim of the book is said to be the glorification of the Jews. But, on the contrary, it is merely a record of their being saved from a skilfully planned extirpation. (5) The description of the Jews (3 8) as "dispersed among the peoples in all the provinces of" the kingdom is said to be inapplicable to the Pers period. That argument is based upon an ignorance of the ancient world which investigation is daily correcting. We now know that before the time of Est Jews were settled both in Eastern and in Southern Egypt, that is, in the extreme west of the Pers empire. In the troubles at the end of the 7th and of the 6th cents. BC, multitudes must have been dispersed, and when, at the latter period, the ties of the fatherland were dissolved, Jewish migrations must have vastly increased. (6) The Heb of the book is said to belong to a much later period than that of Xerxes. But it is admitted that it is earlier than the Heb of Ch; and recent discoveries have shown decisively that the book belongs to the Pers period. (7) The suggestion is made (Driver) "that the danger which threatened the Jews was a local one," and consequently, that the book, though possessed of a historical basis, is a romance. But against that are the facts that the observance of the feast has from the first been universal, and that it has not been observed more fully or more enthusiastically in any one place than in the others. (8) There is no reference to it, it is urged, by Ch, Ezr or Ben Sira (Ecclus). But Ch ends with the proclamation of Cyrus, granting permission to the Jews to return and to rebuild the Temple. There is little to be wondered at that it contains no reference to events which happened 60 years afterward. In Ezr, which certainly covers the period of Esther, reference to the events with which she was connected is excluded by the plan of the work. It gives the history of the return, the first part under Zerubbabel in 536 BC, the second under Ezra himself, 458 BC. The events in Est (which were embraced within a period of a few months) fell in the interval and were connected with neither the first return nor the second. Here again the objector is singularly oblivious of the purpose of the book to which he refers. There is quite as little force in the citation of Ecclus. In dealing with this time Ben Sira's eye is upon Jerus. He magnifies Zerubbabel, "Jesus the son of Josedek," and Nehemiah (49 11-13). Even Ezra, to whom Jerus and the new Jewish state owed so much, finds no mention. Why, then, should Esther and Mordecai be named who seem to have had no part whatever in rebuilding the sacred city? (9) The book is said to display ignorance of the Pers empire in the statement that it was divided into 127 provinces, whereas Herodotus tells us that it was partitioned into 20 satrapies. But there was no such finality in the number, even of these great divisions of the empire. Darius in his Behistun inscriptions gives the number as 21, afterward as 23, and in a third enumeration as 29. Herodotus himself, quoting from a document of the time of Xerxes, shows that there were then about 60 nations under the dominion of Persia. The objector has also omitted to notice that the m'dhīnāh ("province") mentioned in Est (1 1) is not a satrapy but a subdivision of it. Judaea is called a m'dhīnāh in Ezr 2 1, and that was only a small portion of the 5th satrapy, that, namely, of Syria. But the time is past for objections of this character. Recent discoveries have proved the marvelous accuracy of the book. "We find in the Book of Esther," says Lenormant (Ancient Hist of the East, II, 113), "a most animated picture of the court of the Pers kings, which enables us, better than anything contained in the classical writers, to penetrate the internal life and the details of the organization of the central government established by Darius."

These discoveries have removed the discussion to quite another plane—or rather they have ended it. Since Grotefend in 1802 read the name of Xerxes in a Pers inscription and found it to be, letter for letter, the Ahasuerus of Est, research has heaped up confirmation of the historical character of the book. It has proved, to begin with, that the late date suggested for the book cannot be maintained. The language belongs to the time of the Pers dominion. It is marked by the presence of old Pers words, the knowledge of which had passed away by the 2d cent. BC, and has been recovered only through the decipherment of the Pers monuments. The Sept translators were unacquainted with them, and consequently made blunders which have been repeated in our own AV and in other trs. We read (Est 1 5.6 AV) that "in the court of the garden of the king's palace," "were white, green, and blue hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple," etc. As seen in the ruins of Persepolis, a marked feature in the Pers palace of the period was a large space occupied by pillars which were covered with awnings. It may be noted in passing that these were situated, as the book says, in the court of the palace garden. But our knowledge of the recovered Pers compels us now to read: "where was an awning of fine white cotton and violet, fastened with cords of fine white linen and purple." White and blue (or violet) were the royal Pers colors. In accord with this we are told that Mordecai (8 15) "went forth from the presence of the king in royal apparel of blue and white." The highly organized postal system, the king's scribes, the keeping of the chronicles of the kingdom, the rigid and elaborate court customs, are all characteristic of the Persia of the period. We are told of the decree obtained by Haman that "in the name of King Ahasuerus was it written, and sealed with the king's ring" (or signet). It was not signed but sealed. That was the Pers custom. The seal of Darius, Xerxes' father, has been found, and is now in the British Museum. It bears the figure of the king shooting arrows at a lion, and is accompanied by an inscription in Pers, Susian and Assyri: "I, Darius, Great King." The identification of Ahasuerus, made by Grotefend and which subsequent discoveries amply confirmed, placed the book in an entirely new light. As soon as that identification was assured, previous objections were changed into confirmations. In the alleged extravagances of the monarch scholars saw then the Xerxes of history. The gathering of the nobles of the empire in "the third year of his reign" (1 3) was plainly the historical assembly in which the Grecian campaign was discussed; and "the seventh year," in which Esther was made queen, was that of his return from Greece. The book implies that Susa was the residence of the Pers kings, and this was so. The proper form of the name as shown by the inscriptions was "Shushan"; "Shushan the Palace" indicates that there were two Susas, which was the fact, and birah ("palace") is a Pers word meaning fortress. The surprisingly rigid etiquette of the palace, to which we have referred, and the danger of entering unbidden the presence of the king have been urged as proof that the book is a romance. The contrary, however, is the truth. "The palace among the Persians," says Lenormant, "was quite inaccessible to the multitude. A most rigid etiquette guarded all access to the king, and made it very difficult to approach him. . . . He who entered the presence of the king, without having previously obtained permission, was punished with death" (Ancient Hist of the East, II, 113-14; cf Herodotus i.99). But a further, and peculiarly conclusive, testimony to the historical character of the book is afforded by the recovery of the palace of Xerxes and Esther. An inscription of Artaxerxes Mnemon found at Susa tells us that it was destroyed by fire in the days of Artaxerxes Longimanus, the son and successor of Xerxes. Within some 30 years, therefore, from the time of Esther, that palace passed from the knowledge of men. Nevertheless, the references in the book are in perfect accord with the plan of the great structure as laid bare by the recent Fr. excavations. We read (ch 4) that Mordecai, clad in sackcloth, walked in "the broad palace of the city, which was before the king's gate." The ruins show that the House of the Women was on the E. side of the palace next to the city, and that a gate led from it into "the street of the city." In 5 1, we read that Esther "stood in the inner court of the king's house, over against the king's house." "The king," we also read, "sat upon his royal throne in the royal house, over against the entrance of the house," and that from the throne he "saw Esther the queen standing in the court." Every detail is exact. A corridor led from the House of the Women to the inner court; and at the side of the court opposite to the corridor was the hall, or throne-room of the palace. Exactly in the center of the farther wall the throne was placed and from that lofty seat the king, overlooking an intervening screen, saw the queen waiting for an audience. Other details, such as that of the king's passing from the queen's banqueting-house into the garden, show a similarly exact acquaintance with the palace as it then was. That is a confirmation the force of which it is hard to overestimate. It shows that the writer was well informed and that his work is characterized by minute exactitude.

The utter absence of the Divine name in Est has formed a difficulty even where it has not been urged as an objection. But that is plainly part of some Divine design. The same silence is strictly maintained throughout in regard to prayer, praise and every approach toward God. That silence was an offence to the early Jews; for, in the Sept additions to the book, there is profuse acknowledgment of God both in prayer and in praise. But it must have struck the Jews of the time and the official custodians of the canonical books quite as painfully; and we can only explain the admission of Est by the latter on the ground that there was overwhelming evidence of its Divine origin and authority. Can this rigid suppression be explained? In the original arrangement of the OT canonical books (the present Heb arrangement is post-Christian), Est is joined to Neh. In 1895 I made a suggestion which I still think worthy of consideration: More than 60 years had passed since Cyrus had given the Jews permission to return. The vast majority of the people remained, nevertheless, where they were. Some, like Nehemiah, were restrained by official and other ties. The rest were indifferent or declined to make the necessary sacrifices of property and of rest. With such as these last the history of God's work in the earth can never be associated. In His providence He will watch over and deliver them: but their names and His will not be bound together in the record of the labor and the waiting for the earth's salvation. JOHN URQUHART

LITERATURE

Introductory.—The Book of Est in the oldest MSS of the LXX (B,A,N, etc) contains 107 verses more than in the Heb Bible. These additions are scattered throughout the book where they were originally inserted in order to supply the religious element apparently lacking in the Heb text. In Jerome's version and in the Vulg, which is based on it, the longest and most important of these additions are taken out of their context and put together at the end of the canonical book, thus making them to a large extent unintelligible. In Eng., Welsh and other Protestant VSS of the Scriptures the whole of the additions appear in the Apoc.

In the EV the full title is "The Rest of the Chapters of the Book of Esther, which are found neither in the Hebrew, nor in the Chaldee."

1. Name Since in the LXX, including the editions by Fritzsche, Tischendorf and Swete, these chapters appear in their original context, they bear no separate title. The same is true of Brereton's Eng. tr of the LXX; but in Thompson's tr the whole of the Apoc is omitted, so that it is not strictly a tr of the whole LXX.

In Swete's edition of the LXX the interpretations constituting "the Rest of Esther" (sometimes given as "Additions to Esther") are

2. Contents designated by the capital letters of the alphabet, and in the following enumeration this will be followed. The several places in the Gr Bible are indicated in each case.

A (Lat, Eng., 11 2—12 6): Mordecai's dream; how he came to honor. Precedes Est 1 1.

B (Lat, Eng., 13 1-7): Letter of Artaxerxes. Follows Est 3 13.

C (Lat, Eng., 13 8—14 19): The prayers of Mordecai and Esther. Follows Est 4 17.

D (Lat, 15 4-19; Eng., 16 1-16): Esther visits the king and wins his favor. Follows C, preceding immediately Est 5.

E (Lat, Eng., 16 1-24): Another letter of Artaxerxes. Follows Est 8 12.

F (Lat, Eng., 10 4-11): Epilogue describing the origin of the Feast Purim. Follows Est 10 3.

But besides the lengthy interpolations noticed above there are also in the LXX small additions omitted from the Lat and therefore from the Eng., Welsh, etc, Apoc. These short additions are nearly all explanatory glosses.

In the Century Bible (Ezr, Neh, Est) the exact places where the insertions occur in the LXX are indicated and described in the notes dealing with the relevant passages of the canonical text. With the help thus given any Eng. reader is able to read the additions in their original setting. Unless they are read in this way they are pointless and even in most cases senseless.

All scholars agree that "The Rest of Esther" was written originally in Gr. Both external and internal evidence bears this out. But the Gr text has come down to us in two recensions which differ considerably.

3. Original Language

(1) The commonly received text supported by the MSS B.A.N., and by Jos (Ant, XI, 1).

(2) A revision of (1) contained in the MSS 19, 93a and 108b. In the last two MSS both recensions occur. This revised text has been ascribed by many recent scholars (Lagarde, Schürer, R. H. Charles) to Lucian. In his Libr. Vet. Test. Canon. Graece, Pars Prior, 1853 (all published), Lagarde gives on 11 pages both recensions with critical notes on both. The two Gr texts are also given by Fritzsche (1871) and Swete (1891) in

4. Versions their editions of the LXX, and also by Scholz in his Ger. Comm. on the Book of Est (1892).

For the ancient VSS see "Esther Versions."

Practically all modern scholars agree in holding that "The Rest of Esther" is some decades later than the canonical book. In his comm.

5. Date on Est (Century Bible) the present writer has given reasons for dating the canonical Est about 130 BC. One could not go far astray in fixing the date of the original Gr of the Ad Est at about 100 BC. It is evident that we owe these interpolations to a Jewish zealot who wished to give the Book of Est a religious character. In his later years John Hyrcanus (135-103 BC) identified himself with the Sadducean or rationalistic party, thus breaking with the Pharisee or orthodox party to which the Maccabeans had hitherto belonged. Perhaps we owe these additions to the zeal aroused among orthodox Jews by the rationalizing temper prevailing in court circles. R. H. Charles (Enc Brit, XI, 797b) favors a date during the early (?) Maccabean period; but this would give the Ad Est an earlier date than can be ascribed to the canonical Est.

ESTIMATE, es'ti-māt, ESTIMATION, es-ti-mā'shun (עֲרִכָּה, 'ārakh, עֲרִכָּה, 'erekh): These words, meaning "to set in order," "valuation," are used in connection with the priestly services in Lev 5 15, 18; 6 6; 27 14, and frequently; Nu 18 16.

ESYELUS, ē-sī-ē'lus (Ἑσυῖλος, Ἐσυῖλος, Ἑστέλος, Ἐσιέλος; AV Syelus): One of the governors of the Temple in the time of Josiah (1 Esd 1 8); called "Jehiel" in 2 Ch 35 8.

ETAM, ē'tam (עֵתָם, 'ēām; A, Ἀπάν, Ἀπάν, B, Ἀράν, Aṭān):

(1) Mentioned in LXX along with Tekoa, Bethlehem and Phagor (Josh 15 59). In 2 Ch 11 6 it occurs, between Bethlehem and Tekoa, as one of the cities built "for defence in Judah" by Rehoboam. Jos writes that "there was a certain place, about 50 furlongs distant from Jerus which is called Ethan, very pleasant it is in fine gardens and abounding in rivulets of water; whither he [Solomon] used to go out in the morning" (Ant, VIII, vii, 3). Mention of 'Ain 'Aṭān, which is described as the most elevated place in Pal, occurs in the Talm (Z'bhāhīm 54b), and in the Jer. Talm (Yōmā' 3 fol 41) it is mentioned that a conduit ran from 'Aṭān to the Temple.

The evidence all points to 'Ain 'Aṭān, the lowest of the springs supplying the aqueduct running to Solomon's pools. The gardens of Solomon may very well—by tradition, at any rate—have been in the fertile valley below 'Urtas. The site of the ancient town Etam is rather to be looked for on an isolated hill, with ancient remains, a little to the E. of 'Ain 'Aṭān. 1 Ch 4 3 may also have reference to this Etam.

(2) A town assigned to Simeon (1 Ch 4 32). Mentioned with EN-RIMMON (q.v.), identified by Conder with Khurbet 'Aṭūn in the hills N.W. of Beersheba.

(3) The rock of Etam, where Samson took up his dwelling after smiting the Philis "hip and thigh with a great slaughter" (Jgs 15 8.11), was in Judah but apparently in the low hill country (ib). The rocky hill on which lies the village of Beit 'Atab, near Sur'ah (Zorah), was suggested by Conder, but unless (3) is really identical with (1), which is quite possible, the cavern known as 'Arak Isma'in, described by Hanauer (PEFS, 1886, 25), suits the requirements of the story better. The cavern, high up on the northern cliffs of the Wady Isma'in, is a noticeable object from the railway as the train enters the gorge.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

ETERNAL, ē-tūr'nal (עוֹלָם, 'ōlām; αἰώνος, αἰώνιος, from αἰών, aion): The word "eternal" is of very varying import, both in the 1. 'Olām Scriptures and out of them. In the OT, the Heb word 'ōlām is used for "eternity," sometimes in the sense of unlimited duration, sometimes in the sense of a cycle or an age, and sometimes, in later Heb, in the signification of world. The Heb 'ōlām has, for its proper NT equivalent, aion, as signifying either time of particular duration, or the unending duration of time in general. Only, the Heb term primarily signified unlimited time, and only in a secondary sense represented a definite or specific period. Both the Heb and the Gr terms signify the world itself, as it moves in time.

In the NT, aion and aionios are often used with the meaning "eternal," in the predominant sense of futurity. The word aion primarily

2. Aion, signifies time, in the sense of age or Aionios generation; it also comes to denote all that exists under time-conditions; and, finally, superimposed upon the temporal is an ethical use, relative to the world's course. Thus aion may be said to mean the subtle informing spirit of the world or cosmos—the totality of things. By Plato, in his Timaeus, aion was used of the eternal Being, whose counterpart, in the sense-world, is Time. To Aristotle, in speaking of the world, aion is the ultimate principle which, in itself, sums up all existence. In the NT, aion is found combined with prepositions in nearly three score and ten instances, where the idea of unlimited duration appears to be meant. This is the usual method of expressing eternity in the LXX also. The aionios of 2 Cor 4 18 must be eternal, in a temporal use or reference, else the antithesis would be gone.

In Rom 1 20 the word aidiōs is used of Divine action and rendered in AV "eternal" (RV "everlasting"), the only other place in the NT where the word occurs being Jude ver 6, where the rendering is "everlasting," which accords with classical usage. But the presence of the idea of eternal in these passages does not

3. Aídios cal usage. But the presence of the idea of eternal in these passages does not impair the fact that aíōn and aíōnios are, in their natural and obvious connotation, the usual NT words for expressing the idea of eternal, and this holds strikingly true of the LXX usage also. For, from the idea of aeonian life, there is no reason to suppose the notion of duration excluded. The word aíōnios is sometimes used in the futurist signification, but often also, in the NT, it is concerned rather with the quality, than with the quantity or duration, of life. By the continual attachment of aíōnios to life, in this conception of the spiritual or Divine life in man, the aeonian conception was saved from becoming sterile.

In the use of aíōn and aíōnios there is evidenced a certain enlarging or advancing import till they come so to express the high and complex fact of the Divine life in man. 4. Enlarge- ment of Idea In Gr, aíōnes signifies ages, or periods or dispensations. The aíōnes of He 1 2, and 11 3, is, however, to be taken as used in the concrete sense of "the worlds," and not "the ages," the world so taken meaning the totality of things in their course or flow.

Our Lord decisively set the element of time in abeyance, and took His stand upon the fact and quality of life—life endless by its own nature. Of that eternal life He is Himself the guarantee—"Because I live, ye shall live also" (Jn 14 19). Therefore said Augustine, "Join thyself to the eternal God, and thou wilt be eternal." See ETERNITY.

LITERATURE

Eternity is best conceived, not in the merely negative form of the non-temporal, or immeasurable time, but positively, as the mode

1. Contrast with Time Absolute Ground of the universe. The flux of time grows first intelligible to us, only when we take in the thought of God as eternal—exalted above time. Timeless existence—being or entity without change—is what we here mean by eternity, and not mere everlastingness or permanence through time. God, in His internal being, is raised above time; in His eternal absoluteness, He is throned above temporal development, and knows, as the Scriptures say, no changeableness. The conception of eternity, as without beginning or ending, leaves us with but a negation badly in need of filling out with reality. Eternity is not a mere negative idea; to make of eternity merely a blank and irrelevant negation of temporality would not satisfy any proper theory of being; it functions as the positive relation to time of that eternal God, who is King of all the aeons.

In the OT, God's eternity is only negatively expressed, as implying merely indefinitely extended time (Gen 21 33; Dt 33 27), though

2. In the OT Isa 40 28 takes more absolute form. Better is the view of eternity, objectively considered, as a mode of being of God in relation to Himself. For He was eternal, while as yet the world and time were not. But even in the NT, the negative form of expression prevails. Time, with its succession of events, helps to fill out such idea as we

3. In the NT can form of the eternal, conceived as an endless progress. But, as finite beings, we can form no positive idea of eternity. Time is less contradictory of eternity, than helpful in revealing what we know of it. Plato, in his Timaeus, says that time is the "moving image of eternity," and we may allow that it is its type or revelation. Not as the annulment of time, though it might be held to be in itself exclusive of time, is eternity to be taken, but rather as the ground of its reality.

Eternity might, no doubt, be taken as just time no longer measured by the succession of events, as in the finite universe. But, on a strict view, there is something absurd in an eternity that includes time, and an eternity apart from time is a vain and impossible conception. Eternity, as a discharge from all time limits, is purely negative, though not without importance. Eternity, absolutely taken, must be pronounced incommensurable with time; as Aquinas said, non sunt mensurae unius generis. Eternity, that is to say, would lose its character as eternal in the very entering into relations with the changeful or becoming. Eternity, as in God, has, since the time of Augustine and the Middle Ages, been frequently conceived as an eternal Now. The Schoolmen were wont to adopt as a maxim that "in eternity is one only instant always present and persistent." This is but a way of describing eternity in a manner characteristic of succession in time; but eternal Deity, rather than an eternal Now, is a conception far more full of meaning for us.

To speak of God's eternity as an eternal Now—a present in the time-sense—involves a contradiction. For the eternal existence is

5. Defect of This View no more described by the notion of a present than by a past or a future.

Such a Now or present presupposes a not-now, and raises afresh the old time-troubles, in relation to eternity. Time is certainly not the form of God's life, His eternity meaning freedom from time. Hence it was extremely troublesome to the theology of the Middle Ages to have a God who was not in time at all, supposed to create the world at a particular moment in time.

Spinoza, in later times, made the eternity of God consist in His infinite—which, to Spinoza, meant

6. Philosophical Views His necessary—existence. For contingent or durational existence would not, in Spinoza's view, be eternal, though it lasted always. The illusoriness or unreality of time, in respect of man's spiritual life, is not always very firmly grasped. This wavering or uncertain hold of the illusiveness of time, or of higher reality as timeless, is still very prevalent; even so strong-souled a poet as Browning projects the shadow of time into eternity, with rarely a definite conception of the higher life as an eternal and timeless essence; and although Kant, Hegel and Schopenhauer may have held to such a timeless view, it has by no means become a generally adopted doctrine so far, either of theologians or of philosophers. If time be so taken as unreal, then eternity must not be thought of as future, as is done by Dr. Ellis McTaggart and some other metaphysicians today. For nothing could, in that case, be properly future, and eternity could not be said to begin, as is often done in everyday life.

The importance of the eternity conception is seen in the fact that neo-Kantian and neo-Hegelian thinkers alike have shown a general tendency to regard time-conceptions as unfit, in metaphysics, for the ultimate explanation of the universe.

Eternity, one may surely hold, must span or include, for God's eternal consciousness, the whole of what happens in time, with all of past, present or future, that lies within the temporal succession. But we are by no means entitled to say, as does Royce, that such wholeness or totality of the temporal constitutes the eternal, for the eternal belongs to quite another order, that, namely, of timeless reality. Eternity is not to be defined in terms of time at all. For God is to us the supra-temporal ens perfectissimum, but One whose timeless self-sufficiency and impassable aloofness are not such as to keep Him from being strength and helper of our temporal striving. Our metaphysical convictions must not here be of barren and unfruitful sort for ethical results and purposes.

Eternity is, in our view, the form of an eternal existence, to which, in the unity of a single insight, the infinite series of varying aspects or processes are, together-wise, as a totum simul, present. But this, as we have already shown, does not imply that the eternal order is nowise different, essentially, from the temporal; time is not to be treated as a segment of eternity, nor eternity regarded as interminable duration; the eternal cannot pass over into the temporal; for, an eternal Being, who should think all things as present, and yet view the time-series as a succession, must be a rather self-contradictory conception. For the Absolute Consciousness, time does not exist; the future cannot, for it, be thought of as beginning to be, nor the past as having ceased to be.

After all that has been said, however, eternity and time are not to be thought of as without connection. For the temporal presupposes the eternal, which is, in fact, its positive ground and its perpetual possibility. These things are so, if only for the reason that the Divine mode of existence does not contradict or exclude the human mode of existence.

The continuity of the latter—of the temporal—has its guaranty in the eternal. The unconditioned eternity of God brings into harmony with itself the limitations and conditions of the temporal. For time is purely relative, which eternity is not. No distinctions of before and after are admissible in the eternity conception, hence we have no right to speak of time as a portion of eternity. Thus, while we maintain the essential difference between eternity and time, we at the same time affirm what may perhaps be called the affinity between them. The metaphysics of eternity and its time-relations continue to be matter of proverbial difficulty, and both orders—the eternal and the temporal—had better be treated as concrete, and not left merely to abstract reflection. Our idea of the eternal will best be developed, in this concrete fashion, by the growth of our God-idea, as we more completely apprehend God, as actualised for us in His incarnate Son.

Thus, then, it is eternity, not as immeasurable time, but rather as a mode of being of the immutable God, who is yet progressively revealing Himself in time, which we have here set forth. This is not to say that the religious consciousness has not its own need of the conception of God as being "from everlasting to everlasting," as in Ps 90 2, and of His kingdom as "an everlasting kingdom" (Dnl 4 3). Nor is it to make us suppose that the absolute and self-existent God, who so transcends all time-dependence, is thereby removed far from us, while, on the contrary, His very greatness makes Him the more able to draw near unto us, in all the plenitude of His being. Hence it is so truly spoken in Isa 57 15, "Thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy: I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite." Hence also the profound truthfulness of sayings like that in Acts 17 27, 28, "He is not far from each one of us: for in him we live, and move, and have our being." After all that has been said, our best knowledge of eternity, as it exists in God, is not developed in any metaphysical fashion, but after the positive and timeless modes of the spiritual life—the modes of trust and love.

ETHAM, ʾētham (עֶתָם, 'etham; 'Otham, Othom, Ex 13 20; Bethar, Bouthan, Nu 33 6, 7; in 33 8 the LXX has a different reading, "in their wilderness," showing another pointing for the word): The name used to be explained as the Coptic Atum, "border of the Sea" (Geenius, Lex., s.v.) which would agree with the Heb (Nu 33 8) where the "wilderness of Etham" is noticed instead of that of Shur (Ex 15 22) E. of the Red Sea (see Suua). At Etham (Ex 13 20), the Hebrews camped in the "edge," or at "the end," of the desert W. of the sea that they were to cross (see Exodus). This camp was probably near the N. end of the Bitter Lakes, a march from Succoth. Brugsch (Hist. Egypt, II, 359) would compare Etham with the Egyp Khetam ("fort"), but the Heb word has no guttural. The word Khetam is not the name of a place (see Pierret, Vocab. hiéroglyph., 453), and more than one such "fort" seems to be noticed (see Pithom). In the reign of Seti II a scribe's report mentions the pursuit of two servants, apparently from Zoan, to the fortress of I-k-u southward, reaching Khetam on the 3d day; but if this was the "Khetam of Ramees II," or even that "of Minephthah," it would not apparently suit the position of Etham. See Middol.

LITERATURE

In this article, which proposes to be of a general and introductory character, we shall first deal with the nature and function of ethics generally, showing its difference from and relation to other cognate branches of inquiry. Secondly, we shall sketch briefly the history of ethics in so far as the various stages of its development bear upon and prepare the way for Christian ethics, indicating also the subsequent course of ethical speculation. Thirdly, we shall give some account of Biblical ethics; treating first of the main moral ideas contained in the OT, and enumerating, secondly, the general principles and leading characteristics which underlie the ethical teaching of the NT.

I. Nature and Function of Ethics.—Ethics is that branch of philosophy which is concerned with human character and conduct. It deals with man, not so much as a subject of knowledge, as a source of action. It has to do with life or personality in its inward dispositions, outward manifestations and social relations. It was Aristotle who first gave to this study its name and systematic form. According to the Gr signification of the term, it is the science of customs (ἥθικα, ethiká, from ἥθος, ēthos, "custom," "habit," "disposition"). But inasmuch as the words "custom" and "habit" seem to refer only to outward manners or usages, the mere etymology would limit the nature of the inquiry. The same limitation exists in the Lat designation, "moral," since mores concerns primarily manners.

Men live before they reflect, and act before they examine the grounds of action. So long as there is a congruity between the habits of an

1. Rise of individual or a people and the practical requirements of life, ethical questions do not occur. It is only when difficulties arise and new problems appear as to right and duty in which the existing customs of life offer no solution, that doubt awakes, and with doubt reflection upon the actual morality which governs life. It is when men begin to call in question their past usages and institutions and to readjust their attitude to old traditions and new interests that ethics appears. Ethics is not morality but reflection upon morality. When, therefore, Aristotle, following Socrates and Plato, employed the term, he had in view not merely a description of the outward life of man, but rather the sources of action and the objects as ends which ought to guide him in the proper conduct of life. According to the best usage the names Moral Philosophy and Ethics are equivalent and mean generally the rational explanation of our nature, actions and relations as moral and responsible beings. Ethics therefore may be defined as the systematic study of human character, and its function is to show how human life must be fashioned to realize its end or purpose.

But accepting this general definition, how, it may be asked, can we speak of a science of conduct at all? Has not science to do with

2. Ethics necessary truths, to trace effects from as a causes, to formulate general laws Science according to which these causes act, and to draw inevitable and necessary consequences? But is not character just that concerning which no definite conclusions can be predicted? Is not conduct, dependent as it is on the human will, just that which cannot be explained as the resultant of calculable forces? If the will is free then you cannot decide beforehand what line it will take, or predict what shape character must assume. The whole conception of a science of ethics, it is contended, must fall to the ground if we admit an invariable and calculable element in conduct. But this objection is based partly upon a misconception of the function of science and partly upon a too narrow classification of the sciences. Science has not only to do with cause and effect and the laws according to which phenomena actually occur. Science seeks to deal systematically with all truths that are presented to us; and there is a large class of truths not belonging indeed to the realm of natural and physical events which, however, may be studied and correlated. Ethics is not indeed concerned with conduct, as a natural fact, as something done here and now following from certain causes in the past and succeeded by certain results in the future. It is concerned with judgments upon conduct—the judgment that such conduct is right or wrong as measured by a certain standard or end. Hence a distinction has been made between the physical sciences and what are called normative sciences.

The natural or physical sciences are concerned simply with phenomena of Nature or mind, actual

3. A Normative Science occurrences which have to be analyzed and classified. The normative sciences, on the other hand, have to do not with mere facts in time or space, but with judgments about these facts, with certain standards or ends (norms, from norma, "a rule") in accordance with which the facts are to be valued. Man cannot be explained by natural law. He is not simply a part of the world, a link in the chain of causality. When we reflect upon his life and his relation to the world we find that he is conscious of himself as an end and that he is capable of forming purposes, of proposing new ends and of directing his thoughts and actions with a view to the attainment of these ends, and making things subservient to him. Such an end or purpose thus forms a norm for the regulation of life; and the laws which must be observed for the attainment of such an end form the subjects of a normal or normative science. Ethics therefore has to do with the norm or standard of right or wrong, and is concerned primarily with the laws which regulate our judgments and guide our actions.

Man is of course a unity, but it is possible to view his self-consciousness in three different aspects, and to regard his personality as constituted of an intellectual, sentient and

4. Relation to Cognate Sciences volitional element. Roughly corresponding to these three aspects, one in reality but separable in thought, there arise three distinct though interdependent mental sciences: metaphysics, which has to do with man's relation to the universe of which he forms a part; psychology, which deals with the nature, constitution and evolution of his faculties and feelings as a psychical being; and ethics, which treats of him as a volitional being, possessing will or determining activity.

(1) Ethics and metaphysics.—Ethics, though distinct from, is closely connected with metaphysics on the one hand, and psychology on the other. If we take metaphysics in its widest sense as including natural theology and as positing some ultimate end to the realization of which the whole process of the world is somehow a means, we may easily see how it is a necessary presupposition or basis of ethical inquiry. The world as made and governed by and for an intelligent purpose, and man as a part of it, having his place and function in a great teleological cosmos, are postulates of the moral life and must be accepted as a basis of all ethical study. The distinction between ethics and metaphysics did not arise at once. In early Gr philosophy they were closely united. Even now the two subjects cannot be completely dissociated. Ethics invariably runs back into metaphysics, or at least into theology, and in every philosophical system in which the universe is regarded as having an ultimate end or good, the good of human beings is conceived as identical with or included in the universal good (see Ziegler, Gesch. der christlichen Ethik; also Sidgwick, History of Ethics).

(2) Ethics and psychology.—On the other hand ethics is closely associated with, though distinguishable from, psychology. Questions of conduct inevitably lead to inquiries as to certain states of the agent's mind, for we cannot pronounce an action morally good or bad until we have investigated the qualities of intention, purpose, motive and disposition which lie at the root of the action. Hence all students of ethics are agreed that the main object of their investigation must belong to the psychical side of human life, whether they hold that man's ultimate end is to be found in the sphere of pleasure or they maintain that his well-being lies in the realization of virtue. Questions as to existence, evolution and adequacy of a moral faculty (see CONSCIENCE); as to the relation of pleasure and desire; as to the meaning of validity of voluntary action; as to the historical evolution of moral customs and ideals, and man's relation at each stage of his being to the social, political and religious institutions, belong indeed to a science of ethics, but they have their roots in psychology as a study of the human soul.

The very existence of a science of ethics depends upon the answers which psychology gives to such questions. If, for example, we decide that there is no such faculty in man as conscience and that the moral sense is but a natural manifestation which has gradually evolved with the physical and social evolution of man (Darwin, Spencer); or if we deny the self-determining power of human beings and assume that the freedom of the will is a delusion, or in the last resort a negligible element, and treat man as one of the many phenomena of a physical universe, then indeed we may continue to speak of a science of the moral life as some naturalistic writers do, but such a science would not be a science of ethics as we understand it. Whatever be our explanation of conscience and freedom, no theory as to these powers must depersonalize man, and we may be justly suspicious of any system of psychology which undermines the authority of the moral sense or paves the way for a complete irresponsibility.

The "ought."—Ethics is based on the assumption that man is a person possessing rights and having duties—responsible therefore for his intentions as well as his actions. The idea of personality involves not only a sense of accountability but carries with it also the conception of a law to which man is to conform, an ideal at which he is to aim. The end of life with all its implications forms the subject of ethics. It is concerned not simply with what a man is or does, but more particularly with what he should be and do. Hence the word "ought" is the most distinctive term of ethics. The "ought" of life constitutes at once the end or ideal and the law of man. It comprises end, rule and motive of action. Thus the problem of ethics comes to be regarded as the highest good of man, the τὸ ἀγαθόν, tó agathón, of the Greeks, the summum bonum of Lat philosophy.

If ethics generally is based upon the postulates of philosophy and psychology, and at each stage of human consciousness grounds its prin-

5. Relation of Christian Ethics to Moral Philosophy ciples of life upon the view of the world of Christian and of man to which it has attained, Christian ethics presupposes the Christian view of life as revealed by Christ, and its definition must be in harmony with the Christian ideal. Christian ethics is the science of morals conditioned by Christianity, and the problems which it discusses are the nature, laws and duties of the moral life as dominated by the Supreme Good which Christians believe to have been revealed in and through the life and teaching of Jesus Christ. Christian ethics is thus a branch or particular application of general ethics. So far from being opposed to moral philosophy it is the inevitable outcome of the evolution of thought. For if the revelation of God through Christ is true, then it is a factor, and the greatest in life and destiny, which must condition man's entire outlook and give a new value to his aims and duties.

(1) Not an opposition.—In Christianity we are confronted with the motive power of a great Personality entering into the current of human history, and by His preëminent spiritual force giving a direction to the moral life of man. This means that the moral life can only be understood by reference to the creative power of this Personality. If there is any place at all for a distinct science of Christian ethics, that place can be indicated only by starting from the ethical ideal embodied in Christ, and working out from that point a code of morality for the practical guidance of the Christian life. But while this truth gives to Christian ethics its distinctive character and preëminent worth, it neither throws discredit upon philosophical ethics nor separates the two sciences by any hard-and-fast lines. They have much in common. A large domain of conduct is covered by both. The so-called pagan virtues have their worth for Christian character and are in the line of Christian virtues. Man even in his natural state is constituted for the moral life and is not without some knowledge of right and wrong (Rom 1 20). The moral attainments of the ancients are not simply "splendid vices." Duty may differ in content, but it is of the same kind under every system. Purity is purity, and benevolence benevolence, and both are excellences, whether manifested in a heathen or a Christian. While therefore Christian ethics takes its point of departure from the revelation of God and the manifestation of man's possibilities in Christ, it accepts and uses the results of moral philosophy in so far as they throw light upon the fundamental facts of human nature. As a system of morals Christianity claims to be inclusive. It takes cognizance of all the data of consciousness, and assumes all ascertained truth as its own. It completes what is lacking in other systems in so far as their conclusions are based on an incomplete survey of facts. Christian morals, in short, deal with personality in its highest ranges of moral power and spiritual consciousness, and seek to interpret life by its greatest possibilities and loftiest attainments as they have been revealed in Christ.

(2) Philosophical postulates.—As illustrating what has just been said two distinctive features of Christian morals may be noted, of which philosophical ethics takes little or no account:

(a) Christian ethics assumes a latent spirituality in man awaiting the Spirit of God to call it forth. "Human nature," says Newman Smyth, "has its existence in an ethical sphere and for moral ends of being." There is a natural capacity for ethical life to which man's whole constitution points. Matter itself may be said to exist ultimately for spirit, and the spirit of man for the Holy Spirit (cf Rothe, Theologische Ethik, I, 459). No theory of man's physical beginning can interfere with the assumption that man stands upon a moral plane and is capable of a life which shapes itself to spiritual ends. Whatever be man's history and evolution, he has from the beginning been made in God's image, and he bears the Divine impress in all the lineaments of his body and soul. His degradation cannot wholly obliterate his nobility, and his actual corruption bears witness to his possible holiness. Christian morality is therefore nothing else than the morality prepared from all eternity, and is but the highest realization of that which heathen virtue was striving after. This is the Pauline view of human nature. Jesus Christ, according to the apostle, is the end and consummation of the whole creation. Everywhere there is a capacity for Christ. Man is not simply what he now is, but all that he is yet to be (1 Cor 15 47-49).

(b) Connected with this peculiarity is another which further differentiates Christian ethics from philosophical—the problem of the re-creation of character. Speculative systems do not advance beyond the formation of moral requirements; they prescribe what ought ideally to be done or avoided. Christianity, on the other hand, is primarily concerned with the question, By what power can I achieve the right and the good? (cf Ottley, Christian Ideas and Ideals, 22). It regards human nature as in need of renewal and recovery. It points to a process by which character can be restored and transformed. It claims to be the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth (Rom 1 16). Christian ethics thus makes the twofold assumption, and in this its contrast to philosophical ethics is disclosed, that the ideal of humanity has been revealed in Jesus Christ and that in Him also there is supplied a power by which man may become his true self, all that his natural life gives promise of and potentially is.

(3) Method.—Passing from a consideration of the data of Christian ethics to its method, we find that here again there is much that is common to philosophy and Christian morals. The method in both is the rational method. The Christian ideal, though given in Christ, has to be examined, analyzed and applied by the very same faculties as man employs in regard to speculative problems. All science must be furnished with facts, and its task is to give a consistent explanation of them. While the speculative thinker finds his facts in the constitution of the moral world at large, the Christian discovers his in Scripture, and more particularly in the teachings of Christ. But it is sufficient to point out that while the NT is largely occupied with ethical matters, there is no attempt at a scientific formulation of them. The materials of systematic treatment are there, but the task of co-ordinating and classifying principles is the work of the expositor. The data are supplied but these data require to be interpreted, unified and applied so as to form a system of ethics. Consequently in dealing with his facts, the same method must be employed by the Christian expositor as by the student of science. That is the method of rational inquiry and inductive procedure—the method imposed upon all mental problems by the essential nature of the mind itself. The authority to which Christian ethics appeals is not an external oracle which imposes its dictates in a mechanical way. It is an authority embodied in intelligible forms and appealing to the reasoning faculties of man. Christian ethics is not a cut-and-dried, ready-made code. It has to be thought out by man and brought to bear, through the instrumentality of his thinking powers, upon all the relationships of life. According to the Protestant view, at least, ethics is no stereotyped compendium of rules which the Bible or the church supplies to save a man from the trouble of thinking. It is a complete misapprehension of the nature of Scripture and of the purpose of Christ's example and teaching to assume that they afford a mechanical standard which must be copied or obeyed in a slavish way. Christ appeals to the rational nature of man, and His words are life and spirit only as they are apprehended in an intelligent way and become by inner conviction and personal appropriation the principles of thought and action.

Within the domain of theology the two main constituents of Christian teaching are dogmatics and ethics, or doctrine and morals. Though it is convenient to treat these separately, they really form a whole, and are but two sides of one subject. It is difficult to define their limits, and to say where dogmatics ends and ethics begins.

The distinction has sometimes been expressed by saying that dogmatics is a theoretic, while ethics is a practical science. It is true that ethics stands nearer to everyday life and deals with methods of practical conduct, while dogmatics is concerned with beliefs and treats of their origin and elucidation. But on the other hand ethics discusses thoughts as well as actions, and is interested in inner judgments not less than outward achievements. There is a practical side to all doctrine; and there is a theoretic side of all morals. In proportion as dogmatic theology becomes divorced from practical interest there is a danger that it may become mere pedantry. Even the most theoretic of sciences, metaphysics, while, as Novalis said, it bakes no bread, has its justification in its bearing upon life. On the other hand, ethics would lose all scientific value and would sink into a mere enumeration of duties if it had no dogmatic basis and did not draw its motives from beliefs. The common statement that dogmatics shows what we should believe and ethics what we should do is only approximately true and is inadequate. For moral laws and precepts are also objects of faith, and what we should believe involves a moral requirement and has a moral character.

(1) The connection.—Schleiermacher has been frequently charged with ignoring the differences between the two disciplines, but with scant justice; for while he regards the two studies as but different branches of Christian doctrine and while emphasizing their intimate connection, he by no means neglects their differences (cf Schleiermacher, Christliche Lehre, 1-24). Recent Christian moralists (Dorner, Martensen, Wuttke, Haering, Lemme) tend to accentuate the distinction and claim for them a separate discussion. The ultimate connection cannot indeed be overlooked without loss to both. It leads only to confusion to talk of a creedless morality, and the attempt to deal with moral questions without reference to their dogmatic implication will not only rob Christian ethics of its distinctive character and justification, but will reduce the exposition to a mere system of emotionalism. Dogmatics and ethics may be regarded as interdependent and mutually serviceable. On the one hand, ethics saves dogmatics from evaporating into unsubstantial speculation, and, by affording the test of life and workableness, keeps it upon the solid foundation of fact. On the other hand, dogmatics supplies ethics with its formative principles and normative standards, and preserves the moral life from degenerating into the vagaries of fanaticism or the apathy of fatalism.

(2) The distinction.—While both sciences form the complementary sides of theology, and stand in the relation of mutual service, ethics presupposes dogmatics and is based upon its postulates. Dogmatics presents the essence, contents and object of the religious consciousness; ethics presents this consciousness as a power determining the human will (Wuttke). In the one, the Christian life is regarded from the standpoint of dependence on God; in the other, from the standpoint of human freedom. Dogmatics deals with faith in relation to God, and as the receptive organ of Divine grace; ethics considers it rather in its relation to man as a human activity, and as the organ of conduct (cf Lemme, Christliche Ethik, I, 15). Doctrine shows us how our adoption into the kingdom of God is the work of Divine love; ethics shows us how this knowledge of salvation manifests itself in love to God and our neighbor and must be worked out through all the relationships of life (cf Haering).

(3) Theological postulates.—From this point of view we may see how dogmatics supplies to ethics certain postulates which may briefly be enumerated.

(a) Ethics assumes the Christian idea of God.

God is not merely a force or even a creator as He is presented in philosophy. Divine power must be qualified by what we term the moral attributes of God. We do not deny His omnipotence, but we look beyond it to "the love that tops the power, the Christ in God." Moreover we recognize a gradation in God's moral qualities: (a) benevolence or kindness; (b) more deeply ethical and in seeming contrast to His benevolence, Divine justice—not mere blind benevolence but a kindness which is wise and discriminating (cf Butler); (c) highest in the scale of Divine attributes, uniting in one comprehensive quality kindness and justice, stands Divine love or grace. The God whom dogmatics postulates to ethics is God in Christ.

(b) Ethics again presupposes the Christian doctrine of sin. It is not the province of ethics to discuss the origin of evil or propound a theory of sin. But it must see to it that the view it takes is consistent with the truths of revelation and in harmony with the facts of life. A false or inadequate conception of sin is as detrimental for ethics as it is for dogmatics, and upon our doctrine of evil depends very largely our view of life as to its difficulties and purposes, its trials and triumphs. Three views of sin have been held. According to some (e.g. the ancient Greeks) sin is simply a defect or shortcoming, a missing of the mark (ἀμαρτία, hamartia), the active principle, or ἀνδρογμία, hamartēma, the result); according to others, it is a disease, a thing latent in the constitution or at least an infirmity or limitation inherent in the flesh and resulting from heredity and environment (see EVOLUTION).

While there is truth in both of these views, by themselves, each separately, or both in combination, is defective. They do not sufficiently take account of the personal self-determinative element in all sin. It is a misfortune, a fate from which the notion of guilt is absent. The Christian view implies these conceptions, but it adds its own distinctive note which gives to them their value. Sin is not merely a negative thing, it is something positive, an inward dominating force. It is not merely an imperfection, or want; it is an excess, a trespass. It is not simply an inherited and inherent malady; it is a self-chosen perversion. It is not inherent in the flesh or animal impulses and physical passions: it belongs rather to the mind and will. Its essence lies in selfishness. It is the deliberate choice of self in preference to God. It is personal and wilful rebellion. It is to be overcome, therefore, not by the suppression of the body or the excision of the passions, but by the acceptance of a new principle of life and a transformation of the whole man. There are of course degrees and stages of wrongdoing, and there are compensating circumstances which must be taken into account in estimating the significance of evil; but in its last resort Christian ethics postulates the fact of sin and regards it as personal rebellion against the holiness of God, as the deliberate choice of self and the wilful perversion of all the powers of man into instruments of unrighteousness.

(c) A third postulate arises as a consequence from the Christian view of God and the Christian view of sin, viz. the responsibility of man. Christian ethics treats every man as accountable for his thoughts and actions, and therefore capable of choosing the good as revealed in Christ. While not denying the sovereignty of God or minimizing the mystery of evil and clearly recognizing the universality of sin, Christianity firmly maintains the doctrine of human freedom and accountability. An ethic would be impossible if, on the one side, grace were absolutely irresistible, and if, on the other, sin were necessitated, if at any single point wrongdoing were inevitable. Whatever be our doctrine on these subjects, ethics demands that freedom of the will be safeguarded.

At this point an interesting question emerges as to the possibility, apart from a knowledge of Christ, of choosing the good. Difficult as this question is, and though it was answered by Augustine and many of the early Fathers in the negative, the modern, and probably the more just, view is that we cannot hold mankind responsible unless we accord to all men the larger freedom. If non-Christians are fated to do evil, then no guilt can be imputed. History shows that a love for goodness has sometimes existed, and that many isolated acts of purity and kindness have been done, among people who have known nothing of the historical Christ. The NT recognizes degrees of depravity in nations and individuals and a measure of noble aspiration and earnest effort in ordinary human nature. St. Paul plainly assumes some knowledge and performance on the part of the heathen, and though he denounces their immorality in unsparring terms he does not affirm that pagan society was so utterly corrupt that it had lost all knowledge of moral good.

II. Historical Sketch of Ethics.—A comprehensive treatment of our subject would naturally include a history of ethics from the earliest times to the present. For ethics as a branch of philosophical inquiry partakes of the historical development of all thought, and the problems which it presents to our day can be rightly appreciated only in the light of certain categories and concepts—such as end, good, virtue, duty, pleasure, egoism and altruism—which have been evolved through the successive stages of the movement of ethical thoughts. All we can attempt here, however, is the baldest outline of the different epochs of ethical inquiry as indicating the preparatory stages which lead up to and find their solution in the ethics of Christianity.

(1) The Sophists.—All the great religions of the world—of India, Persia and Egypt—have had their ethical implicates, but these have consisted for the most part of loosely connected moral precepts or adages. Before the golden age of Gr philosophy there were no ethics in the strict sense. The moral consciousness of the Greeks takes its rise with the Sophists, and particularly with Socrates, who were the first to protest against the long-established customs and traditions of their land. The so-called "wise men" were in part moralists, but their sayings are but isolated maxims presenting no unity or connection. Philosophy proper occupied itself primarily with purely metaphysical or ontological questions as to the nature of being, the form and origin and primal elements of the world. It was only when Gr religion and poetry had lost their hold upon the cultured and the beliefs of the past had come to be doubted, that questions as to the meaning of life and conduct arose.

1. Greek Philosophy assisted for the most part of loosely connected moral precepts or adages. Before the golden age of Gr philosophy there were no ethics in the strict sense. The moral consciousness of the Greeks takes its rise with the Sophists, and particularly with Socrates, who were the first to protest against the long-established customs and traditions of their land. The so-called "wise men" were in part moralists, but their sayings are but isolated maxims presenting no unity or connection. Philosophy proper occupied itself primarily with purely metaphysical or ontological questions as to the nature of being, the form and origin and primal elements of the world. It was only when Gr religion and poetry had lost their hold upon the cultured and the beliefs of the past had come to be doubted, that questions as to the meaning of life and conduct arose.

(2) Socrates.—Already the Sophists had drawn attention to the vagueness and inconsistency of common opinion, and had begun to teach the art of conduct, but it was Socrates who, as it was said, first brought philosophy down from heaven to the sphere of the earth and directed men's minds from merely natural things to human life. He was indeed the first moral philosopher, inasmuch as, while the Sophists talked about justice and law and temperance, they could not tell, when pressed, what these things were. The first task of Socrates, therefore, was to expose human ignorance. All our confusion and disputes about good arise, says Socrates, from want of clear knowledge. He aimed, therefore, at producing knowledge, not merely for its own sake, but because he believed it to be the ground of all right conduct. Nobody does wrong willingly. Let a man know what is good, that is, what is truly beneficial, and he will do it. Hence the famous Socratic dictum, "Virtue is knowledge and vice is ignorance." With all his intellectualism Socrates was really a hedonist, believing that pleasure was the ultimate end of life. For it must not be imagined that he conceived of knowledge of virtue as distinct from interest. Everyone naturally seeks the good because the good is really identified with his happiness. The wise man is necessarily the happy man, and hence "to know one's self" is to learn the secret of well-being.

(3) Plato.—While Socrates was the first to direct attention to the nature of virtue, his one-sided and fragmentary conception of it received a more systematic treatment from Plato, who attempted to define the nature and end of man by his place in the cosmos. Plato thus brought ethics into intimate connection with metaphysics. He conceived an ideal world in which everything earthly and human had its prototype. The human soul is derived from the world-soul and, like it, is a mixture of two elements. On the one side, in virtue of reason, it participates in the world of ideas, or the life of God; and on the other, by virtue of its animal impulses, it partakes of the world of decay, the corporeal world. These two dissimilar parts are connected by an intermediate element, which Plato calls θυμός, thumós, embracing courage, the love of honor and the affections of the heart—a term which may be translated by the will. The constitution of the inner man is manifested in his outward organization. The head is the seat of reason, the breast of the heart and the affections, and the lower part of the body of the organs of animal desire. If we ask, Who is the just man? Plato answers, The man in whom the three elements just mentioned harmonize. We thus arrive at the scheme of the so-called "cardinal virtues" which have persisted through all ages and have given direction to all ethical discussion—wisdom, courage, temperance which, in combination, give us justice. It will thus be observed that virtue is no longer simply identified with knowledge; but another form of bad conduct besides ignorance is assumed, viz. the internal disorder and conflict of the soul, in which the lower impulses war with the higher. This, it will be seen, is a distinct advance on the one-sided position of Socrates, but in his attempt to reconcile the two movements in the conflict of life, Plato does not succeed in overcoming the duality. The inner impulses are ever dragging man down, and man's true well-being lies in the attainment of the life of reason. But though there are gleams of a higher solution in Plato, as a rule he falls back upon the idea that virtue is to be attained only by the suppression of the animal passions and the mortifying of the lower life. Plato affords us also the primal elements of social ethics. Morality as conceived by him is not something belonging merely to the individual, but has its full realization in the state. Man is indeed but a type of the larger cosmos, and it is not as an individual but as a citizen that he is capable of realizing his true life.

(4) Aristotle.—The ethics of Aristotle, while it completes, does not essentially differ from that of Plato. He is the first to treat of the subject formally as a science, which assumes in his hands a division of politics. For, as he says, man is really "a social animal"; and, even more decisively than Plato, he treats of man as a part of society. Aristotle begins his great work on ethics with the discussion of the chief good, which he declares to be happiness or well-being. Happiness does not consist, however, in sensual pleasure, or even in the pursuit of honor, but in a life of well-ordered contemplation, "an activity of the soul in accordance with reason" (Nic. Eth., I, ch v). But to reach the goal of right thinking and right doing, both favorable surroundings and proper instruction are required. Virtue is not virtue until it is a habit, and the only way to become virtuous is to practise virtue. It will thus be seen that Aristotle balances the one-sided emphasis of Socrates and Plato upon knowledge by the insistence upon habit. Activity must be combined with reason. The past and the present, environment and knowledge, must both be acknowledged as elements in the making of life. The virtues are thus habits, but habits of deliberate choice. Virtue is therefore an activity which at every point seeks to strike the mean between two opposite excesses. Plato's list of virtues had the merit of simplicity, but Aristotle's, though fuller, lacks system and consists generally of right actions which are determined in reference to two extremes. One defect which strikes a modern is that among the virtues benevolence is not recognized except obscurely as a form of liberality; and in general the gentler self-sacrificing virtues so prominent in Christianity have no place. The virtues are chiefly aristocratic and are impossible for a slave. Again while Aristotle did well, in opposition to previous philosophy, to recognize the function of habit, it must be pointed out that habit of itself cannot make a man virtuous. Mere habit may be a hindrance and not a help to higher attainment. You cannot reduce morality to a succession of customary acts. But the main defect of Aristotle's treatment of virtue is that he regards the passions as wholly irrational and immoral. He does not see that passion in this sense can have no mean. If you may have too much of a good thing, you cannot have even a little of a bad thing. In man the desires and impulses are never purely irrational. Reason enters into all his appetites and gives to the body and all the physical powers an ethical value and a moral use. We do not become virtuous by curbing the passions but by transfiguring them into the vehicle of good. Aristotle, not less than Plato, is affected by the Gr duality which makes an antithesis between reason and impulse, and imparts to the former an external supremacy.

(5) Stoics and Epicureans.—The two conflicting elements of reason and impulse which neither Plato nor Aristotle succeeded in harmonizing ultimately gave rise to two opposite interpretations of the moral life. The Stoics selected the rational nature as the true guide to an ethical system, but they gave to it a supremacy so rigid as to threaten the extinction of the affections. The Epicureans, on the other hand, seizing the doctrine that happiness is the chief good, so accentuated the emotional side of nature as to open the door for all manner of sensual enjoyment. Both agree in determining the happiness of the individual as the final goal of moral conduct. It is not necessary to dwell upon the particular tenets of Epicurus and his followers. For though both Epicureanism and Stoicism, as representing the chief tendencies of ethical inquiry, have exercised incalculable influence upon speculation and practical morals of later ages, it is the doctrines of Stoicism which have more specially come into contact with Christianity.

(6) Stoicism.—Without dwelling upon the stoic conception of the world, according to which the universe was a whole, interpenetrated and controlled by an inherent spirit, and the consequent view of life as proceeding from God and being in all its parts equally Divine, we may note that the Stoics, like Plato and Aristotle, regarded the realization of man's natural purpose as the true well-being or highest good. This idea they formulated into a principle: "Life according to Nature." The wise man is he who strives to live in agreement with his rational nature in all the circumstances of life. The law of Nature is to avoid what is hurtful and strive for what is appropriate; and pleasure arises as an accompaniment when a being obtains that which is fitting. Pleasure and pain are, however, to be regarded as mere accidents or incidents of life and to be met by the wise man with indifference. He alone is free, the master of himself and the world, who acknowledges the absolute supremacy of reason and makes himself independent of earthly desires. This life of freedom is open to all, for all men are equal, members of one great body. The slave may be as free as the consul and each can make the world his servant by living in harmony with it.

There is a certain sublimity in the ethics of Stoicism. It was a philosophy which appealed to noble minds and "it inspired nearly all the great characters of the early Rom empire and nerved every attempt to maintain the dignity and freedom of the human soul" (Lecky, History of European Morals, I, ch ii). We cannot, however, be blind to its defects. With all their talk of Divine immanence and providence, it was nothing but an impersonal destiny which the Stoics recognized as governing the universe. "Harmony with Nature" was simply a sense of proud self-sufficiency. Stoicism is the glorification of reason, even to the extent of suppressing all emotion. It has no real sense of sin. Sin is un-reason, and salvation lies in the external control of the passions, in indifference and apathy begotten of the atrophy of desire. The great merit of the Stoics is that they emphasized inner moral integrity as the one condition of all right action and true happiness, and in an age of degeneracy insisted on the necessity of virtue. In its preference for the joys of the inner life and its scorn of the delights of sense; in its emphasis upon duty and its advocacy of a common humanity, together with its belief in the direct relation of each human soul to God, Stoicism, as revealed in the writings of a Seneca, a Marcus Aurelius and an Epictetus, not only showed how high paganism at its best could reach, but proved in a measure a preparation for Christianity with whose practical tenets, in spite of its imperfections, it had much in common.

(7) Stoicism and St. Paul.—That there are remarkable affinities between Stoicism and Pauline ethics has frequently been pointed out. The similarity both in language and sentiment can scarcely be accounted for by mere coincidence. There were elements in Stoic philosophy which St. Paul would not have dreamt of assimilating, and features with which he could have no sympathy. The pantheistic view of God and the material conception of the world, the self-conscious pride, the absence of all sense of sin and need of pardon, the temper of apathy and the unnatural suppression of feelings—these were features which could not but rouse in the apostle's mind strong antagonism. But on the other hand there were certain well-known characteristics of a nobler order in Stoic morality which we may believe Paul found ready to his hand, ideas which he did not hesitate to incorporate in his teaching and employ in the service of the gospel. Without enlarging upon this line of thought (cf Alexander, Ethics of St. Paul), of these we may mention the immanence of God as the pervading cause of all life and activity; the idea of wisdom or knowledge as the ideal of man; the conception of freedom as the prerogative of the individual; and the notion of brotherhood as the goal of humanity.

It will be possible only to sketch in a few rapid strokes the subsequent development of ethical thought. After the varied life of the

2. Scholasticism—early centuries had passed, Christian ethic (so prominent in the Gospels and Epistles), like Christian theology, fell under the blight of Gnosticism (Alexandrian philosophy; cf Hatch, Hibbert Lectures) and latterly, of Scholasticism. Christian truth stiffened into a cumbersome catalogue of ecclesiastical observances. In the early Fathers (Barnabas, Clement, Origen, Gregory), dogmatic and ethical teaching were hardly distinguished. Cyprian discussed moral questions from the standpoint of church discipline.

The first real attempt at a Christian ethic was made by Ambrose, whose treatise on the Duties is an imitation of Cicero's work of the same title. Even Augustine, notwithstanding his profound insight into the nature of sin, treats of moral questions incidentally. Perhaps the only writers among the schoolmen, excepting Alcuin (Virtues and Vices), who afford anything like elaborate moral treatises, are Abelard (Ethica, or Scito te Ipsum), Peter Lombard (Sentences), and, above all, Thomas Aquinas (Summa, II).

Emancipation from a legal dogmatism first came with the Reformation which was in essence a moral revival. The relation of God and man came to be re-stated under the inspiration of Bib. truth, and the value and rights of man as man, so long obscured, were disclosed. The conscience was liberated and Luther became the champion of individual liberty.

Descartes and Spinoza.—The philosophical writers who most fully express in the domain of pure thought the protestant spirit are Descartes and Spinoza, with whom speculation with regard to man's distinctive nature and obligations took a new departure. Without following the fortunes of philosophy on the continent of Europe, which took a pantheistic form in Germany and a materialistic tone in France (though Rousseau directed the thought of Europe to the constitution of man), we may remark that in England thought assumed a practical complexion, and on the basis of the inquiries of Locke, Berkeley and Hume into the nature and limits of the human understanding, the questions as to the source of moral obligation and the faculty of moral judgment came to the front.

British moralists may be classified mainly according to their views on this subject. Beginning with Hobbes, who maintained that man was naturally selfish and that all his actions were self-regarding, Cudworth, More, Wallaston, Shaftesbury, Hutcheson, Adam Smith and others discussed the problem, with varying success, of the relation of individual and social virtues, agreeing generally that the right balance between the two is due to a moral sense which, like taste or perception of beauty, guides us in things moral. All these intuitionist writers fall back upon a native selfish instinct. Selfishness, disguise it as we may, or, as it came to be called, utility, is really the spring and standard of action. Butler in his contention for the supremacy and uniqueness of conscience took an independent but scarcely more logical attitude. Both he and all the later British moralists, Paley, Bentham, Mill, suffer from a narrow, artificial psychology which conceives of the various faculties as separate and independent elements lying in man.

Utilitarianism is a scheme of consequences which finds the moral quality of conduct in the effects and feelings created in the subject. With all their differences of detail the representatives of the theory are at one in regarding the chief end of man as happiness. Bentham and Mill made the attempt to deduce benevolence from the egoistic starting-point. "No reason can be given," says Mill (Utilitarianism, ch iv), "why the general happiness is desirable except that each person . . . desires his own happiness . . . and the general happiness therefore is a good to the aggregate of all persons." Late utilitarians, dissatisfied with this non-sequitur and renouncing the dogma of personal pleasure, maintain that we ought to derive universal happiness because reason bids us (cf Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, III, xiii). But what, we may ask, is this reason, and why should I listen to her voice?

The intuitionist theory has more recently allied itself with the hypothesis of organic evolution.

"These feelings of self-love and benevolence are really," says Spencer, "the products of development. The natural instincts and impulses to social good, though existent in a rudimentary animal form, have been evolved through environment, heredity and social institutions to which man through his long history has been subject." But this theory only carries the problem farther back, for, as Green well says (Proleg. to Ethics), "that countless generations should have passed during which a transmitted organism was progressively modified by reaction on its surroundings till an eternal consciousness could realize itself . . . might add to the wonder, but it could not alter the results."

The great rival of the pleasure-philosophy is that which has been styled "duty for duty's sake." This position was first taken by Kant whose principle of the "Categorical Imperative" utterly broke down the theory of "pleasure for pleasure's sake." For Kant, conscience is simply practical reason; and its laws by him are reduced to unity. Reason, though limited in its knowledge of objects to phenomena of the senses, in the region of practice transcends the phenomenal and attains the real. The autonomy of the will carries us beyond the phenomenal into the supersensible world. Here the "Categorical Imperative" or moral law utters its "thou shalt" and prescribes a principle of conduct irrespective of desire or ulterior end. In accordance with the nature of the Categorical Imperative, the formula of all morality is, "Act from a maxim at all times fit for law universal" (Kritik d. praktischen Vernunft and Grundlage zur Metaphysik der Sitten).

This principle is, however, defective. For while it determines the subjective or formal side of duty, it tells us nothing of the objective side, of the content of duty. We may learn from Kant the grandeur of duty in the abstract and the need of obedience to it, but we do not learn what duty is. Kant's law remains formal, abstract and contentless, without relation to the matter of practical life. To overcome this abstraction, to give content to the law of reason and find its realization in the institutions and relationships of life and society, has been the aim of the later idealistic philosophy which starts from Kant.

(1) Hegel.—Following Fichte, for whom morality is action according to the ideas of reason—self-consciousness finding itself in and through a world of deeds—Hegel starts with the Idea as the source of all reality, and develops the conception of Conscious Personality which, by overcoming the antithesis of impulse and thought, gradually attains to the full unity and realization of self in the consciousness of the world and of God. The law of Right or of all ethical ideal is, "Be a person and respect others as persons" (Hegel, Philosophie des Rechtes, sec. 31). These views have been worked out in recent British and American works of speculative ethics by Green, Bradley, Caird, McTaggart, Harris, Royce, Dewey, Watson.

Man as a self is rooted in an infinite self or personality. Our individual self-consciousness is derived from and maintained by an infinite eternal and universal self-consciousness. Knowledge is

Man as a self is rooted in an infinite self or personality. Our individual self-consciousness is derived from and maintained by an infinite eternal and universal self-consciousness. Knowledge is therefore, but the gradual discovery of mind in things, the progressive realization of the world as the self-manifestation of an infinite Personality with whom the finite intelligence of man is one. Hence morality is the gradual unfolding of an eternal purpose whose whole is the perfection of man.

(2) Watchwords: Pleasure and Duty.—We have thus seen that in the history of ethics two great rival watchwords have been sounded—pleasure and duty, or, to put it another way, egoism and altruism. Both have their justification, yet each taken separately is abstract and one-sided. The problem of ethics is how to harmonize without suppressing these two extremes, how to unite social duty and individual right in a higher unity. We have seen that philosophical ethics has sought a synthesis of these conflicting moments in the higher and more adequate conception of human personality—a personality whose ideals and activities are identified with the eternal and universal personality of God. Christianity also recognizes the truth contained in the several types of ethical philosophy which we have passed under review, but it adds something which is distinctively its own, and thereby gives a new meaning to happiness and to duty, to self and to others.

Christian synthesis: Christianity also emphasizes the realization of personality with all that it implies as the true goal of man; but while Christ bids man "be perfect as God is perfect," He shows us that we only find ourselves as we find ourselves in others; only by dying do we live; and only through profound self-surrender and sacrifice do we become ourselves and achieve the highest good.

III. Principles and Characteristics of Biblical Ethics.—The sketch of the history of ethics just offered, brief as it necessarily is, may serve to indicate the ideas which have shaped modern thought and helped toward the interpretation of the Christian view of life which claims to be the fulfilment of all human attempts to explain the highest good. We now enter upon the third division of our subject which embraces a discussion generally of Bib. ethics, dealing first with the ethics of the OT and next with the leading ideas of the NT.

The gospel of Christ stands in the closest relation with Heb religion, and revelation in the NT fulfils and completes the promise given in the OT. We have seen that the thinkers of Greece and Rome have contributed much to Christendom, and have helped to interpret Bible teaching with regard to truth and duty; but there is no such inward relation between them as that which connects Christian ethics with OT morality. Christ himself, and still more the apostle Paul, assumed as a substratum of his teaching the revelation which had been granted to the Jews. The moral and religious doctrines which were comprehended under the designation of "the Law" formed for them, as Paul said (Gal 3 24.25), a παιδαγωγός, paidagōgós, or servant whose function it was to lead them to the school of Christ. In estimating the special character of OT ethics, we are not concerned with questions as to authenticity and dates of the various books, nor with the manifold problems raised by modern Bib. criticism. While not forgetting the very long period which these books cover, involving changes of belief and life and embracing successive stages of political society, it is possible to regard the OT simply as a body of writings which represent the successive ethical ideas of the Hebrews as a people.

(1) Religious character of Hebrew ethics.—At the outset we are impressed by the fact that the moral ideal of Judaism was distinctly religious. The moral obligations were conceived as Divine commands and the moral law as a revelation of the Divine will. The religion was monotheistic. At first Jeh may have been regarded merely as a tribal Deity, but gradually this restricted view gave place to a wider conception of God as the God of all men; and as such He was presented by the later prophets. God was for the Jew the supreme source and author of the moral law, and throughout his history duty was embodied in the Divine will. Early in the Pent the note of law is struck, and the fundamental elements of Jewish morality are embedded in the story of Eden and the Fall. God's commandment is the criterion and measure of man's obedience. Evil which has its source and head in a hostile though subsidiary power consists in violation of Jeh's will.

(a) The Decalogue: First among the various stages of OT ethic must be mentioned the Mosaic legislation centering in the Decalogue (Ex 20; Dt 5). Whether the Ten Commandments issue from the time of Moses, or are a later summary of duty, they hold a supreme and formative place in the moral teaching of the OT. All, including even the 4th, are purely moral enactments. But they are largely negative, only the 5th rising to positive duty. They are also chiefly external, regulative of outward conduct, forbidding acts but not taking note of intent and desire. The 6th and 7th commandments protect the rights of persons, while the 8th guards outward property. Though these laws may be shown to have their roots and sanctions in the moral consciousness of mankind and as such are applicable to all times and all men, it is clear that they were at first conceived by the Israelites to be restricted in their scope and practice to their own tribes.

(b) Civil laws: A further factor in the ethical education of Israel arose from the civil laws of the land. The Book of the Covenant (Ex 20-23), as revealing a certain advance in political legislation and jurisprudence, may be regarded as of this kind. Still the hard legal law of retaliation—"an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth"—discloses a barbarous conception of right. But along with the more primitive enactments of revenge and stern justice there are not wanting provisions of a kindlier nature, such as the law of release, the protection of the fugitive, the arrangements for the gleaner and the institution of the Year of Jubilee.

(c) Ceremonial laws: Closely connected with the civil laws must be mentioned the ceremonial laws as an element in the moral life of Israel. If the civil laws had reference to the relation of man to his fellows, the ceremonial laws referred rather to the relation of man to God. The prevailing idea with regard to God, next to that of sovereign might, was holiness or separateness. The so-called Priestly Code, consisting of a number of ceremonial enactments, gradually took its place alongside of the Mosaic law, and was established to guard the being of God and the persons of the worshippers from profanation. These had to do (a) with sacrifices and offerings and forms of ritual which, while they typified and preshadowed the ideas of spiritual sanctity, often degenerated into superstitious practices (cf Am 5 25.26; Hos 6 6; Isa 1 11-13); (b) commands and prohibitions with regard to personal deportment—"meats and drinks and divers washings." Some of these had a sanitary significance; others guarded the habits of daily life from heathen defilement.

(d) Prophecy: The dominant factor of OT ethics lay in the influence of the prophets. They and not the priests were the great moralists of Israel. They are the champions of righteousness and integrity in political life, not less than of purity in the individual. They are the witnesses for God and the ruthless denouncers of all idolatry and defection from Him. They comment upon the social vices to which a more developed people is liable. They preach a social gospel and condemn wrongs done by man to man. Government and people are summoned to instant amendment and before the nation is held up a lofty ideal. The prophets are not only the preachers, but also the philosophers of the people, and they direct men's minds to the spiritual and ideal side of things, inveighing against worldliness and materialism.

Under their reflection, theories as to the origin and nature of evil begin to emerge, and the solemnity and worth of life are emphasized. While on the one hand the sense of individual responsibility is dwelt upon, on the other the idea of a hereditary taint of soul is developed, and it is shown that the consequences of sin may affect even the innocent. A man may inherit suffering and incur penalties, not apparently through any fault of his own, but simply by reason of his place in the solidarity of the race. Problems like these awaken deep perplexity which finds a voice not only in the Prophets but also in the Book of Job and in many of the Pss. The solution is sought in the thought that God works through evil, and by its effects evolves man's highest good. These conceptions reach their climax in the Second Isa, and particularly in ch 53. God is constantly represented as longing to pardon and reinstate man in His favor; and the inadequacy of mere ceremonial as well as the failure of all material means of intercourse with Jeh are repeatedly dwelt upon as preparing the way for the doctrine of salvation. In the Book of Pss—the devotional manual of the people reflecting the moral and religious life of the nation at various stages of its development—the same exalted character of God as a God of righteousness and holiness, hating evil and jealous for devotion, the same profound scorn of sin and the same high vocation of man are prevalent.

(e) Books of Wisdom: Without dwelling at length on the ethical ideas of the other writings of the OT—the Books of Wisd, Prov, Job, Eccl—we may remark that the teaching is addressed more to individuals than prophecy is; while not being particularly lofty it is healthy and practical, shrewd, homely common sense. While the motives appealed to are not always the highest and have regard frequently to earthly prosperity and worldly policy, it must not be overlooked that moral practice is also frequently allied with the fear of God, and the right choice of wisdom is represented as the dictate of piety not less than of prudence.

It is to the sapiential books (canonical and apocryphal) that we owe the most significant ethical figures of the OT—the wise man and the fool. The wise man is he who orders his life in accordance with the laws of God. The fool is the self-willed man, whose life, lacking principle, fails of success. The nature of wisdom lies not in intellectual knowledge so much as in the control of passion and the prudent regulation of desire. The idea of human wisdom is connected in these books with the sublime conception of Divine wisdom which colors both them and the Pss. In some of the finest passages, Wisdom is personified as the counsellor of God in the creation of the world (Prov 8; Wisd 10; Job 28), or the guide which guards the destinies of man (Wisd 10 15 ff).

If the sapiential books are utilitarian in tone the Book of Eccl is pessimistic. The writer is impressed with the futility of life. Neither pursuit of knowledge nor indulgence in pleasure affords satisfaction. All is vanity. Yet there is an element of submission in this book which only escapes despair by a grim and stolid inculcation of obedience to Divine command.

(f) Apocryphal books: In an art. on the Ethics of the Bible some allusion ought to be made to the spirit of the apocryphal books, reflecting as they do the ideas of a considerable period of Jewish history immediately before and contemporaneous with the advent of Christ. While in general there is a distinct recognition of true moral life and a high regard for the moral law, there is no system of ethics nor even a prevailing ethical principle in these books. The collection presents the ideas of no one man or party, or even of one period or locality. The moral ideas of each book require to be considered separately (see special arts.), and they ought to be studied in connection with the philosophy of Philo and generally with the speculation of Alexandria, upon which they exercised considerable influence. The Wisdom of Solomon is supposed by Pfeiderer and others to have affected the Hellenic complexion of Paul's thought and also to have colored the stoic philosophy.

The apocryphal books as a whole do not give prominence to the idea of an ancient covenant and are not dominated by the notion of a redemptive climax to which the other OT books bear witness. As a consequence their moral teaching lacks the spirituality of the OT; and there is an insistence upon outward works rather than inward disposition as essential to righteousness. While wisdom and justice are commended, there is a certain self-satisfaction and pride in one's own virtue, together with, on the part of the few select spirits which attain to virtue, a corresponding disparagement of and even contempt for the folly of the many. In Sir esp. this tone of self-righteous complacency is observable. There is a manifest lack of humility and sense of sin, while the attainment of happiness is represented as the direct result of personal virtue (Sir 14 14 ff).

The Book of Wisd shows traces of neo-Platonic influences and recognizes the four Platonic virtues (8 7), and while admitting the corruption of all men (9 12 ff) attributes the causes of evil to other sources than the will, maintaining the Gr dualism of body and soul and the inherent evil of the physical nature of man. The Book of Jth presents in narrative form a highly questionable morality. On the whole it must be recognized that the moral teaching of the Apoc is much below the best teaching of the OT. While Sir gives expression to a true piety, it manifests its want of depth in its treatment of sin and in the inculcation of merely prudential motives to goodness. In general the essence of love is unknown, and the moral temper is far inferior to the ethics of Jesus. It is a mundane morality that is preached. Hope is absent and righteousness is rewarded by long life and prosperity (Tob). Legalism is the chief characteristic (Bar), and Pharisaic ceremonialism on the one hand, and Sadducaic rationalism on the other are the natural and historical consequences of apocryphal teachings.

(2) Limitations of OT ethics.—In estimating the ethics of the OT as a whole the fact must not be forgotten that it was preparatory, a stage in the progressive revelation of God's will. We are not surprised, therefore, that, judged by the absolute standard of the NT, the morality of the OT comes short in some particulars. Both in intent and extent, in spirit and in scope, it is lacking.

(a) As to intent: The tendency to dwell upon the sufficiency of external acts rather than the necessity of inward disposition, may be remarked; though as time went on, particularly in the later Prophets and some of the Pss, the need of inward purity is insisted upon. While the ideal both for the nation and the individual is an exalted one—"Be ye holy for I am holy"—the aspect in which the character of God is represented is sometimes stern if not repellent (Ex 24; Nu 14 18; Gen 18; 2 S 24 17). But at the same time there are not wanting more tender features (Isa 1 17; Mic 6 8), and the Divine Fatherhood finds frequent expression. Even though the penal code is severe and the ceremonial law stern, a gentler spirit shines through many of its provisions, and protection is afforded to the wage-earner, the poor and the dependent, while the regulations regarding slaves and foreigners and even lower animals are merciful (Dt 24 14.15; Jer 22 13.17; Mal 3 5; Dt 25 4).

Material motives: Again we have already remarked that the motives to which the OT appeals are often mercenary and material. Material prosperity plays an important part as an inducement to moral conduct, and the good which the pious patriarch contemplates is earthly plenty, something which will enrich himself and his family. At the same time we must not forget that the revelation of God's purpose is progressive, and His dealing with men educative. There is naturally therefore a certain accommodation of the Divine law to the various stages of moral apprehension of the Jewish people, and on the human side a growing sense of the meaning of life as well as an advancing appreciation of the nature of righteousness. Gradually the nation is being carried forward by the promise of material benefits to the spiritual blessings which they enshrine. If even in the messages of the prophets there is not wanting some measure of threats and penalties, we must remember the character of the people they were dealing with—a people wayward and stubborn, whose imaginations could scarcely rise above the material and the temporal. We must judge prophecy by its best, and we shall see that these penalties and rewards which undoubtedly occupy a prominent place in OT ethics were but goads to spur the apathetic. They were not ends in themselves, nor mere arbitrary promises or threats, but instruments subservient to higher ideals.

(b) As to extent: With regard to the extent or application of the Heb ideal it must be acknowledged that here also OT ethics is imperfect as compared with the universality of Christianity. God is represented as the God of Israel and not as the God of all men. It is true that a prominent commandment given to Israel is that which Our Lord indorsed: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Lev 19 18). The extent of the obligation, however, would seem to be restricted in the language immediately preceding it: "Thou shalt not take vengeance, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people." It has been pointed out that the term רֵעִי, re'î is of wider signification than the Eng. word "neighbor," and expresses the idea of friend, and is applied to any person. The wider rendering is enforced by the fact that in vs 33.34 the word "stranger" or "foreigner" is substituted for neighbor. The stranger is thus regarded as the special client of God and is commended to look to Him for protection. However this may be, in practice at least the Jews were not faithful to the humanitarianism of their law, and generally, in keeping with other races of antiquity, showed a tendency to restrict Divine favor within the limits of their own land and to maintain an attitude throughout their history of aloofness and repellent isolation toward foreigners. At the same time the obligation of hospitality was regarded as sacred and was practised in early Heb life (Gen 18 1-9). Nor must we forget that whatever may have been the Jewish custom the promise enshrined in their revelation implies the unity of mankind (Gen 12 3), while several of the prophecies and Pss look forward to a world-wide blessing (Isa 61; Ps 22 27; 48 2.10; 87). In Isa 54 we even read, "God of the whole earth shall he be called." "Everything," it has been said, "is definitely stated except the equality of all men in God's love." The morality of bare justice is also in some measure transcended. The universal Fatherhood of God, if not clearly stated, is implied in many passages, and in Second Isa and Hos there are most tender revelations of Divine mercy though it is mercy to Israel only. But we know that the apostle Paul drew the inference from God's treatment of Israel that His mercy and salvation would extend to all.

We are now prepared to indicate briefly the distinctive features of the ethics of Christianity. As this art. is, however, professedly introductory, and as the ethics of Jesus of NT forms the subject of a separate treatment (see ETHICS OF JESUS), it will not be necessary to offer an elaborate statement of the subject. It will be sufficient to suggest the formative principles and main characteristics. What we have to say may conveniently be divided under three heads: (1) the Christian ideal; (2) the dynamic power; (3) the virtues, duties and spheres of Christian activity.

(1) Ethics of Jesus and St. Paul.—Before, however, entering upon these details, a few words may fittingly be said upon the relation of the ethics of Jesus to those of St. Paul. It has been recently alleged that a marked contrast is perceptible between the teaching of Jesus and that of Paul, and that there is a great gulf fixed between the Gospels and the Epistles. Jesus is a moralist, Paul a theologian. The Master is concerned with the conditions of life and conduct; the disciple is occupied with the elaboration of dogma. This view seems to us to be greatly exaggerated. No one can read the Epistles without perceiving the ethical character of a large portion of their teaching and noticing how even the great theological principles which Paul enunciates have a profound moral import. Nor does it seem to us that there is any radical difference in the ethical teaching of Christ and that of the Apostle.

(2) Character.—Both lay emphasis on character, and the great words of Christ are the great words of Paul. The inmost spring of the new life of love is the same for both. The great object of the Pauline dialectic is to place man emptied of self in a condition of receptiveness before God. But this idea, fundamental in Paul, is fundamental also in the teaching of Jesus. It is the very first law of the kingdom. With it the Sermon on the Mount begins: "Blessed are the poor in spirit." If we analyze this great saying it surely yields the whole principle of the Pauline argument and the living heart of the Pauline religion. In perfect agreement with this is the fundamental importance assigned both by Jesus and Paul to faith. With both it is something more than mental assent or even implicit confidence in providence. It is the spiritual vision in man of the ideal, the inspiration of life, the principle of conduct.

(3) Inwardness of motive.—Again the distinctive note of Christ's ethic is the inwardness of the moral law as distinguished from the externality of the ceremonial law. Almost in identical terms Paul insists upon the need of inward purity, the purity of the inner man of the heart. Once more both lay emphasis upon the fulfilment of our duties to our fellow-men, and both are at one in declaring that man owes to others an even greater debt than duty. Christ's principle is, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"; Paul's injunction is "Owe no man anything but to love one another." Christ transforms morality from a routine into a life; and with Paul also goodness ceases to be a thing of outward rule and becomes the spontaneous energy of the soul. For both all virtues are but the various expressions of a single vital principle. "Love is the fulfilling of the law." The dynamic of devotion according to Christ is, "God's love toward us"; according to Paul, "The love of Christ constraineth us."

Ideal of life: And if we turn from the motive and spring of service to the purpose of life, again we find substantial agreement: "Be ye perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect" is the standard of Christ; to attain to the perfect life—"the prize of the high calling of God in Christ"—is the aim of Paul.

(4) Ultimate end.—Nor do they differ in their conception of the ultimate good of the world. Christ's ethical ideal, which He worked for as the realization of the object of His mission, was a redeemed humanity, a reestablishment of human society, which He designated "the kingdom of God." Paul with his splendid conception of humanity sees that kingdom typified and realized in the Risen Life of his Lord. It is by growing up in all things unto Him who is the Head that the whole body will be perfected in the perfection of its members. And this is what Paul means when he sums up the goal and ideal of all human faith and endeavor—"till we all attain . . . unto a fullgrown man, unto . . . the fulness of Christ" (Eph 4 13). Paul everywhere acknowledges himself to be a pupil of the Master and a teacher of His ways (1 Cor 4 17). Without pursuing this subject there can be no doubt that in their hidden depths and in their practical life the precepts of the apostle are in essential agreement with those of the Sermon on the Mount, and have a common purpose—the presenting of every man perfect before God (cf Alexander, Ethics of St. Paul).

The ethical ideal of the NT is thus indicated. The chief business of ethics is to answer the question,

3. The Ethical Ideal What is man's supreme good? For what should a man live? What, in short, is the ideal of life? A careful study of the NT discloses three main statements implied in what Christ designates "the kingdom of God": man's highest good consists generally in doing God's will and more particularly in the attainment of likeness to Christ and in the realization of human brotherhood—a relation to God, to Christ and to man. The first is the pure white light of the ideal; the second is the ideal realized in the one perfect life which is viewed as standard or norm; the third is the progressive realization of the ideal in the life of humanity which is the sphere of the new life.

(1) Holiness as the fulfilment of the Divine will is, as we have seen, Christ's own ideal—Be ye perfect as your Father; and it is Paul's—This also we wish, even your perfection (2 Cor 13 11). The ideas of righteousness and holiness as the attributes of God are the features of the kingdom of God or of heaven, the realization of which Jesus continually set forth as the highest aim of man; and running through all the epistles of Paul the constant refrain is that ye might walk worthy of God who hath called you unto His kingdom and glory. To walk worthy of God, to fulfil His will in all sincerity and purity, is for the Christian as for the Jew the end of all morality. Life has a supreme worth and sacredness because God is its end. To be a man is to fulfil in his own person God's idea of humanity. Before every man, just because he is man with the touch of the Divine hand upon him and his Maker's end to serve, lies this ultimate goal of existence—the realization of the perfect life according to the idea of God.

(2) Christlikeness.—If Godlikeness or holiness is the end, Christlikeness is the norm or standard in which that end is presented in the Gospel. In Christianity God is revealed to us through Jesus Christ, and the abstract impersonal ideas of holiness and righteousness are transmuted into the features of a living personality whose spirit is to be reproduced in the lives of men. In two different ways Christ is presented in the NT as ideal. He is at once the Pattern and the Principle or Power of the new life.

(a) He is the Pattern of goodness which is to be reproduced in human lives. It would lead us to trench on the succeeding art. if we were to attempt here a portrayal of the character of Jesus as it is revealed in the Gospels. We only note that it is characteristic of the NT writers that they do not content themselves with imaginative descriptions of goodness, but present a living ideal in the historical person of Jesus Christ.

(b) He is also Principle of the new life—not example only, but power—the inspiration and cause of life to all who believe (Eph 1 19,20). Paul says not, "Be like Christ," but "Have the mind in you which was also in Christ." The literal imitation of an example has but a limited reign. To be a Christian is not the mechanical work of a copyist. Kant goes the length of saying that "imitation finds no place in all morality" (Metaphysics of Ethics, sec. ii). Certainly the imitation of Christ as a test of conduct covers a quite inadequate conception of the intimate and vital relation Christ bears to humanity. "It is not to copy after Him," says Schultz (Grundriss d. evangelischen Ethik, 5), "but to let His life take form in us, to receive His spirit and make it effective, which is the moral task of the Christian." It is as its motive and creative power that Paul presents Him. "Let Christ be born in you." We could not even imitate Christ if He were not already within us. He is our example only because He is something more, the principle of the new life, the higher and diviner self of every man. "He is our life"; "Christ in us the hope of glory."

(3) Brotherhood and unity of man.—The emphasis hitherto has been laid on the perfection of the individual. But both Christ and His apostles imply that the individual is not to be perfected alone. No man finds himself till he finds his duties. The single soul is completed only in the brotherhood of the race. The social element is implied in Christ's idea of the Kingdom, and many of the apostolic precepts refer not to individuals but to humanity as an organic whole. The church is Christ's body of which individuals are the members, necessary to one another and deriving their life from the head. The gospel is social as well as individual, and the goal is the kingdom of God, the brotherhood of man. Paul proclaims the unity and equality before God of Greek and Roman, bond and free.

In the dynamic power of the new life we reach the central and distinguishing feature of Christian ethics. Imposing as was the ethic of Greece, it simply hangs in the air. 4. The Dynamic Power of the New Life Plato's ideal state remains a theory only. Aristotle's "virtuous man" exists only in the mind of his creator. Nor was the Stoic more successful in making his philosophy a thing of actuality. Beautiful as these old-time ideals were, they lacked impelling force, the power to change dreams into realities. The problems which baffled Gr philosophy it is the glory of Christianity to have solved. Christian ethics is not a theory. The good has been manifested in a life. The Word was made flesh. It was a new creative force—a spirit given and received, to be worked out and realized in the actual life of common men.

(1) The dynamic on its Divine side.—The problem with Paul was, How can man achieve that good which has been embodied in the life and example of Jesus Christ? Without entering into the details of this question it may be said at once that the originality of the gospel lies in this, that it not only reveals the good but discloses the power which makes the good possible in the hitherto unattempted derivation of the new life from a new birth under the influence of the Spirit of God. Following his Master, when Paul speaks of the new ethical state of believers he represents it as a renewal or rebirth of the Holy Spirit. It is an act of Divine creative power.

Without following out the Pauline argument we may say he connects the working of the Holy Spirit with two facts in the life of Christ, for him the most important in history—the death and resurrection of Our Lord. Here we are in the region of dogmatics, and it does not concern us to present a theory of the atonement. All we have to do with is the fact that between man and the new life lies sin, which must be overcome and removed, both in the form of guilt and power, before reconciliation with God can be effected. The deed which alone meets the case is the sacrifice of Christ. In virtue of what Christ has achieved by His death a fundamentally new relationship exists. God and man are now in full moral accord and vital union.

But not less important as a factor in creating the new life is the resurrection. It is the seal and crown of the sacrifice. It was the certainty that He had risen that gave to Christ's death its sacrificial value. "If Christ be not risen ye are yet in your sins." The new creature is the work of Christ. But His creative power is not an external influence. It is an inner spirit of life. All that makes life life indeed—an exalted, harmonious and completed existence—is derived from the Holy Spirit through the working of the crucified risen Christ.

(2) The dynamic on its human side.—Possession of power implies obligation to use it. The force is given; it has to be appropriated. The spirit of Christ is not offered to free a man from the duties and endeavors of the moral life. Man is not simply the passive recipient of the Divine energy. He has to make it his own and work it out by an act of free resolution. When we inquire what constitutes the subjective or human element, we find in the NT two actions which belong to the soul entering upon the new world in Christ—repentance and faith. These are complementary and constitute what is commonly called conversion. Repentance in the NT is a turning away in sorrow and contrition from a life of sin and a breaking with evil under the influence of Christ. If repentance looks back and forsakes, faith looks forward and accepts. In general it is the outgoing of the whole man toward his Lord, the human power or energy by which the individual receives and makes his own the life in Christ. It is not merely intellectual acceptance or moral trust; it is above all appropriating energy. It is the power of a new obedience. As the principle of moral appropriation it has its root in personal trust and its fruit in Christian service. Faith, in short, is the characteristic attitude and action of the whole Christian personality in its relation to the spiritual good offered to it in Christ.

It but remains to indicate how this new power manifests itself in character and in practical conduct. Character is expressed in virtue, and duty is conditioned by station and relationships.

5. Virtues, Duties and Spheres of the New Life

(1) The virtues.—The systematic enumeration of the virtues is one of the most difficult tasks of ethics. Neither in ancient nor in modern times has complete success attended attempts at classification. Plato's list is too meager. Aristotle's lacks system and is marred by omission. Nowhere in Scripture is there offered a complete description of all the virtues that flow from faith. But by bringing Christ's words and the apostolic precepts together we have a rich and suggestive cluster (Mt 5, 6; Gal 5 22.23; Col 3 12.13; Phil 4 8; 1 Pet

2 18.19; 4 7.8; 2 Pet 1 5-8; 1 Jn 3; Jude). We may make a threefold classification:

(a) The heroic virtues, sometimes called the cardinal, handed down from antiquity—wisdom, fortitude, temperance, justice. While these were accepted and dwelt upon, Christianity profoundly modified their character so that they became largely new creations. "The old moral currency was still kept in circulation, but it was gradually minted anew" (Strong).

(b) The amiable virtues, which are not merely added on to the pagan, but being incorporated with them, give an entirely new meaning to those already in vogue. While Plato lays stress on the intellectual or heroic features of character, Christianity brings to the foreground the gentler virtues. Two reasons may have induced the Christian writers to dwell more on the self-effacing side of character: partly as a protest against the spirit of militarism and the worship of material power prevalent in the ancient world; and chiefly because the gentler self-sacrificing virtues more truly expressed the spirit of Christ. The one element in character which makes it beautiful and effective and Christlike is love—the element of sacrifice. Love evinces itself in humility which lays low all vaunting ambition and proud self-sufficiency. Closely allied to humility are meekness and its sister, long-suffering—the attitude of the Christian in the presence of trial and wrong. With these again are connected contentment and patience and forbearance, gentle and kindly consideration for others. Lastly there is the virtue of forgiveness. For it is not enough to be humble and meek; we have a duty toward wrongdoers. We must be ready to forget and forgive (Rom 12 20). "Be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving each other, even as God also in Christ forgave you" (Eph 4 32).

(c) The theological virtues or Christian graces—faith, hope, charity. Some have been content to see in these three graces the summary of Christian excellence. They are fundamental in Christ's teaching and the apostolic combination of them may have had its basis in some lost word of the Master (Harnack). These graces cannot be separated. They are all of a piece. He who has faith has also love, and he who has faith and love cannot be devoid of hope. Love is the first and last word of apostolic Christianity. No term is more expressive of the spirit of Christ. Love was practically unknown in the ancient world. Pre-Christian philosophy exalted the intellect but left the heart cold. Love in the highest sense is the discovery and creation of the gospel, and it was reserved for the followers of Jesus to teach men the meaning of charity and to find in it the law of freedom. It is indispensable to true Christian character. Without it no profession of faith or practice of good deeds has any value (1 Cor 13). It is the fruitful source of all else that is beautiful in conduct. Faith itself works through love and finds in its activity its outlet and exercise. If character is formed by faith it lives in love. And the same may be said of hope. It is a particular form of faith which looks forward to a life that is to be perfectly developed and completed in the future. Hope is faith turned to the future—a vision inspired and sustained by love.

(2) The duties.—Of the duties of the Christian life it is enough to say that they find their activity in the threefold relationship of the Christian to self, to his fellow-men and to God. This distinction is not of course quite logical. The one involves the other. Self-love implies love of others, and all duty may be regarded as duty to God. The individual and society are so inextricably bound together in the kingdom of love that neither can reach its goal without the other.

(a) Duties toward self are, however, plainly recognized in the NT. Our Lord's commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," makes a rightly conceived self-love the measure of love to one's neighbor. But the duties of self-regard are only lightly touched upon, and while the truth that the soul has an inalienable worth is insisted upon, to be constantly occupied with the thought of oneself is a symptom of morbid egoism and not a sign of healthy personality. But the chief reason why the NT does not enlarge upon the duty of self-culture is that according to the spirit of the gospel the true realization of self is identical with self-sacrifice. Only as a man loses his life does he find it. Not by anxiously standing guard over one's soul but by dedicating it freely to the good of others does one realize one's true self.

At the same time several self-respecting duties are recognized, of which mention may be made: (i) stability of purpose or singleness of aim; (ii) independence of other's opinion; (iii) supremacy of conscience and a proper self-estimate. In this connection may be noticed also the Christian's proper regard for the body which, as the temple of God, is not to be despised but presented as a living sacrifice; his attitude to worldly goods; his obligation to work; his right to recreation; and his contentment with his station—all of which duties are to be interpreted by the apostolic principle, "Use the world as not abusing it." The Christian ideal is not asceticism or denial for its own sake. Each must make the best of himself and the most of life's trust. All the faculties, possessions, pursuits and joys of life are to be used as vehicles of spiritual service, instruments which make a man a fit subject of the kingdom of God to which he belongs.

(b) Duties in relation to others, or brotherly love, are defined as to their extent and limit by the Christian's relation to Christ. Their chief manifestations are: (i) justice, involving (a) respect for others, negatively refraining from injury and positively yielding deference and honor, (β) truthfulness, in word and deed, "speaking the truth in love," (γ) just judgment, avoiding censoriousness and intolerance; (ii) kindness or goodness, embracing (a) sympathy, (β) service and (γ) practical beneficence which provides for physical need, administers comfort and gives, by example and direct instruction, edification; (iii) patience, comprising (a) forbearance, (β) peaceableness.

(c) Duties in relation to God: Here morality runs up into religion and duty passes into love. Love rests on knowledge of God as revealed in Christ, and expresses itself in devotion. Love to God is expressed generally in (i) thankfulness, (ii) humility, (iii) trustfulness; and particularly in worship (sacraments and prayers), and in witness-bearing—adorn- ing the doctrine by beauty of life.

(3) Spheres and relationships.—Of the various spheres and relationships in which the Christian finds opportunity for the exercise and cultivation of his spiritual life we can only name, without enlarging upon them, the family, the state and the church. Each of these spheres demands its own special duties and involves its own peculiar discipline. While parents owe to their children care and godly nurture, children owe their parents obedience. The attitude of the individual to the state and of the state to the individual are inferences which may be legitimately drawn from NT teaching. It is the function of the state not merely to administer justice but to create and foster those agencies and institutions which work for the amelioration of the lot and the development of the weal of its citizens, securing for each full liberty to make the best of his life. On the other hand it is the duty of the individual to realize his civic obligations as a member of the social organism. The state makes its will dominant through the voice of the people, and as the individuals are so the commonwealth will be.

Absoluteness, inwardness and universality.—In closing we may say that the three dominant notes of Christian ethics are, its absoluteness, its inwardness and its universality.

6. Conclusion—The gospel claims to be supreme in life and morals. For the Christian no incident of experience is secular and no duty insignificant, because all things belong to God and all life is dominated by the Spirit of Christ. The uniqueness and originality of the ethics of Christianity are to be sought, however, not so much in the range of its practical application as in the unfolding of an ideal which is at once the power and pattern of the new life. That ideal is Christ in whom the perfect life is disclosed and through whom the power for its realization is communicated. Life is a force, and character is a growth which takes its rise in and expands from a hidden seed. Hence in Christian ethics all apathy, passivity and inaction, which occupy an important place in the moral systems of Buddhism, Stoicism, and even mediaeval Catholicism, play no part. On the contrary all is life, energy and unceasing endeavor.

There are many details of modern social life with which the NT does not deal: problems of present-day ethics and economics which cannot be decided by a direct reference to chapter and verse, either of the Gospels or Epistles. But St. Paul's great principles of human solidarity; of equality in Christ; of freedom of service and love; his teachings concerning the church and the kingdom of God, the family and the state; his precepts with regard to personal purity, the use of wealth and the duty of work, contained the germs of the subsequent renewal of Europe and still contain the potency of social and political transformation.

LITERATURE

1. In the Synoptic Gospels.—If, following the custom prevalent at present, we adopt, as the general name for the teaching of Jesus in the Synoptists, the Kingdom of God, then the divisions of His ethical teaching will be (1) the Blessings of the Kingdom, (2) the Character of the Subjects, (3) the Commandments of the King.

(1) Nature of the kingdom.—"The Kingdom of God" was not a phrase invented by Jesus. It was used before Him by the Baptist. Its proximate source, for both Jesus and John, was the prophet Daniel, who uses it in very striking passages (2 44. 45; 7 13.14). The idea of a kingdom of God goes back to the very commencement of the monarchy in Israel, when the prophet Samuel told those who demanded a king that Jeh was their king, and that they should desire no other. Through all the subsequent history of the monarchy, which was, on the whole, so disappointing to patriotic and pious minds, the conviction lingered that, if God Himself were king, all would be well; and, when at length the Heb state was destroyed and the people were carried into captivity, the prophets still believed that for their country there was a future and a hope, if only Jeh would take to Himself His great power and reign. In the period between the OT and the NT such sentiments so greatly prevailed that Schürer has compiled, from the apocryphal literature, a kind of Messianic creed, embracing no fewer than eleven articles, which he supposes to have prevailed before the Advent. It may be doubtful how far such beliefs had taken possession of the general mind. Many of the Sadducees were too satisfied with things as they were to concern themselves about such dreams. But the Pharisees undoubtedly gave a large place in their minds to Messianic expectations, and for these the Zealots were ready to fight. It is, however, to the prosdachōmenoi, as they are called, because they were "waiting for the consolation of Israel," that we must look for the purest expression of this heritage derived from the piety of the past. In the hymns at the beginning of the Gospels of Mt and Lk, with which the birth of Jesus was greeted, we encounter an intense and lofty conception of the kingdom of God; and, as the earthly home in which Jesus grew up belonged to this select section of the population, there is little doubt that it was here He imbibed both His Messianic ideas and the phraseology in which these were expressed. His use of the term, the kingdom of God, has sometimes been spoken of as an accommodation to the beliefs and language of His fellow-countrymen. But it was native to Himself; and it is not unlikely that the very commonness of it in the circle in which He grew up rendered Him unconscious of the difference between His own conception and that which prevailed outside of this circle. For, as soon as He began to preach and to make known the sentiments which He included within this phrase, it became manifest that He and His contemporaries, under a common name, were thinking of entirely different things. They emphasized the first half of the phrase—"the kingdom"; He the second—"of God." They were thinking of the external attributes of a kingdom—political emancipation, an army, a court, subject provinces; He of the doing of God's will on earth as it is done in heaven. Even He had felt, at one stage, the glamor of their point of view, as is manifest from the account of the Temptation in the Wilderness; but He had decisively rejected it, resolving not to commence with an external framework on a large scale, to be subsequently filled with character, but to begin with the individual, and trust to time and Providence for visible success. The triumphal entry into Jerus proves that He never abandoned the claim to be the fulfiller of all the OT predictions about the kingdom of God; but His enemies not unnaturally interpreted the failure of that attempt as a final demonstration that their own view had been the correct one all along. Still, God was not mocked, and Jesus was not mocked. When, at the end of a generation, the Jewish state sank into ruin and the city by which Jesus was martyred had been destroyed, there were springing up, all over the world, communities the members of which were bound more closely to one another than the members of any other kingdom, obeyed the same laws and enjoyed the same benefits, which they traced up to a King ruling in the heavens, who would appear again on the great white throne, to be the Judge of quick and dead.

(2) Blessedness of the kingdom.—The enemies of Jesus may be said to have carried out to the bitter end their conception of the kingdom of God, when they nailed Him to a tree; but, in the face of opposition, He carried out His own conception of it too, and He never abandoned the practice of employing this phrase as a comprehensive term for all the blessings brought by Him to mankind. He used, however, other nomenclature for the same objects, such as Gospel, Peace, Rest, Life, Eternal Life, Blessedness. His exposition of the last of these, at the commencement of the Sermon on the Mount, is highly instructive. Seldom, indeed, has the structure of the Beatitudes been clearly understood. Each of them is an equation, in which "blessed" stands on the one side and on the other two magnitudes—the one contained in the subject of the sentence, such as "the poor in spirit," "the meek," and so on; and the other contained in a qualifying clause introduced by "for." Sometimes one of these magnitudes may be a minus quantity, as in "they that mourn"; but the other is so large a positive magnitude that the two together represent a handsome plus, which thoroughly justifies the predicate "blessed." It is remarkable that the first and the eighth of the reasons introduced by "for" are the same: "for theirs is the kingdom of heaven," justifying the statement that this is Christ's own name for the blessedness brought by Him to the world; and the sentences between these, introduced in the same way, may be looked upon as epexegetic of this great phrase. They embrace such great conceptions as comfort, mercy, the inheritance of the earth, the vision of God and sonship, which are all certainly blessings of the kingdom; and the list does not finish without mentioning a great reward in heaven—an immortal hope, which is the greatest blessing of all.

(3) Righteousness—its contrasts.—If the preacher of the Sermon on the Mount was to expound at length any one of these bright conceptions, it might have been expected to be the kingdom of God itself; and this we should have desired. But the one to which this honor fell has still to be mentioned. It is "righteousness." In one of the Beatitudes the speaker had promised that to be filled with this should be part of the blessedness which He was expounding; and, when He had finished the Beatitudes, He turned back to this conception and devoted the rest of His discourse to its interpretation. Nowhere else, in the reports of His preaching which have come down to us, is there to be found an exposition so sustained and thorough. There is no better way of describing a new thing, with which those who listen are unfamiliar, than to contrast it with something with which they are perfectly acquainted; and this was the method adopted by Jesus. He contrasted the righteousness with which the subjects of the kingdom were to be blessed with the figure of the righteous man familiar to them, first, in the discourses of the scribes, to which they were wont to listen in the synagogue, and secondly, in the example of the Pharisees, to whom they were wont to look up as the patterns of righteousness. It is well known what ample opportunities He found, by means of this felicitous disposition, for probing to the very depths of morality, as well as for covering His opponents with ridicule and exploding the honor in which they stood with the masses. The whole of this scheme is, however, exhausted long before the Sermon comes to a close; and the question is, whether, in the latter half of the Sermon, He still keeps up the exposition of righteousness by contrasting it with the ordinary course of the world. I am inclined to think that this is the case, and that the key to the latter half of the discourse is the contrast between righteousness and worldliness. The doctrine, at all events, which issues from the whole discussion is that the righteousness promised is distinguished by three characteristics—inwardness, as distinguished from the externality of those who believed morality to extend to outward words and deeds alone, and not to the secret thoughts of the heart; secrecy, as distinguished from the ostentation of those who blew a trumpet before them when they were doing their alms; and naturalness, like that of the flower or the fruit, which grows spontaneously from a healthy root, without forcing. See SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

(4) Apocalyptic theories.—This substitution of righteousness for the kingdom in the greatest public discourse which has come down to us is a significant indication of the direction in which the mind of Jesus was tending, as He drew away from the notions and hopes of contemporary Judaism. It is evident that He was filling the idea of the kingdom more and more with religious and moral contents, and emptying it of political and material elements.

There are scholars, indeed, at the present day, who maintain that His conception of the kingdom was futuristic, and that He was waiting all the time for an apocalyptic manifestation, which never came. He was, they think, expecting the heavens to open and the kingdom to descend ready made to the earth, like the New Jerusalem in the Apocalypse. But this is to assume toward Jesus exactly the attitude taken up toward Him in His own day by Pharisees and high priests, and it degrades Him to the level of an apocalyptic dreamer. It ignores many sayings of His, of which the parable of the Mustard Seed may be taken as an example, which prove that He anticipated for Christianity a long development such as it has actually passed through; and it fails to do justice to many passages in His teaching where He speaks of the kingdom as already come. Of the latter the most remarkable is where He says, "The kingdom of God is within you"—a statement preceded by a distinct rejection of the notion of an apocalyptic manifestation; for the word "observation," which He employs in describing the way in which the kingdom is not to come, is an astronomical term, describing precisely such a phenomenon as He is supposed by such scholars as John Weiss and Schweitzer to have been expecting. The more it became evident that He was not to command the homage of the nation, the more did He devote Himself to the education of the Twelve, that they might form the nucleus of His kingdom upon earth; and it was certainly not with apocalyptic visions that He fed their receptive minds.

(1) Conditions of entrance.—The righteousness described so comprehensively in the Sermon on the Mount is not infrequently spoken of as the condition of entrance to the kingdom of God; but this is altogether to misunderstand the mind of Jesus. 2. The Character of the Subjects of the Kingdom The righteousness described by Him is the gift of God to those who are already inside the kingdom; for it is the supreme blessing for the sake of which the kingdom is to be sought; and the condition imposed on those who are outside is not the possession of righteousness, but rather a bottomless sense of the want of it. The more utterly they feel their own lack of righteousness, the more ready are they for entrance into the kingdom. They must "hunger and thirst after righteousness." It has been remarked already that the description, in the Beatitudes, of the character of the candidates for the kingdom is sometimes of a negative character; and indeed, this is the account in the teaching of Jesus generally of those whom He attracts to Himself. They are drawn by a sense of boundless need in themselves and by the apprehension of an equivalent fulness in Him; He calls those "that labor and are heavy laden," that He may give them rest.

(2) Christ's attitude to sin.—The first word of the prophetic message in the OT was always the denunciation of sin; and only after this had done its work did the vision of a good time coming rise on the horizon. The same was repeated in the message of John the Baptist; and it did not fail to reappear in the teaching of Jesus, though His mode of treating the subject was entirely His own. He did not, like the prophets, take up much time with convicting gross and open sinners. Perhaps He thought that this had been sufficiently done by His predecessors; or, perhaps He refrained because He understood the art of getting sinners to convict themselves. Yet, in the parable of the Prodigal Son, He showed how profoundly He understood the nature and the course of the commonest sins. If, however, He thus spared transgressors who had no covering for their wickedness, He made up for this leniency by the vigor and even violence with which He attacked those who hid their sins under a cloak of hypocrisy. Never was there a prophetic indignation like that with which He assailed such sinners in Mt 23; and He shaped the same charges into an unforgettable picture in the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican. He never named the Sadducees in the same unreserved manner as He thus designated their antagonists; but in more parables than one it is possible that He had them in view. The Unjust Judge was probably a Sadducee; and so was the Rich Man at whose gate the beggar Lazarus was wont to sit. The sin of the Sadducees, at all events, did not escape His prophetic animadversion. In Lk esp. He alludes with great frequency to worldliness and the love of money as cankers by which the life of the human soul is eaten out and its destiny destroyed. Thus did Jesus exercise the prophetic office of denouncing all the sins of His time; and He showed what, in this respect, He thought of mankind in general when He began a sentence with, "If ye then, being evil" (Lk 11 13), and when He gave the dreadful description of the heart of man which begins, "Out of the heart come forth evil thoughts" (Mt 15 19).

(3) Attainment of righteousness.—To all serious students of the Sermon on the Mount it is well known that the popular notion of it, as containing a simple religion and an easy-going morality, is utterly mistaken; on the contrary, the righteousness sketched by the Preacher is far loftier than that ever conceived by any other religious teacher whatever. Not only, however, does He thus propose to conduct human beings to a platform of attainment higher than any attempted before, but He, at the same time, recognizes that He must begin with men lower than almost any others have allowed. It is here that the ethics of Jesus differ from those of the philosophers. He takes the task much more seriously; and, as the ascent from the one extreme to the other is much longer, so the means of reaching the goal are much more difficult. Philosophers, assuming that man is equal to his own destiny, lay the demands of the moral law before him at once, taking it for granted that he is able to fulfil them; but the path adopted by Jesus is more remote and humbling. There are in it steps or stages which, in His teaching, it is easy to discern.

(a) Repentance: The first of these is repentance. This was a watchword of all the prophets: after sin had been denounced, penitence was called for; and no hope of improvement was held out until this had been experienced. In the message of John the Baptist it held the same place; and, in one of the Gospels, it is expressly stated that Jesus began His ministry by repeating this watchword of His predecessor. Not a few of the most touching scenes of His earthly ministry exhibit penitents at His feet, the most moving of them all being that of the woman who was "a sinner"; and, in the parable of the Prodigal Son, we have a full-length picture of the process of repentance.

(b) Faith: The second step is faith—a word of constant recurrence in the teaching of Jesus. In many cases it is connected with His healing ministry; but this was a parable of a more interior ministry for the soul. In many cases it formed a school of preparation for the other, as in the case of the man borne of four, who was brought to Christ for the healing of his body, but was presented, in addition, with the gift of the forgiveness of his sins. In healing him Jesus expressly claimed the power of forgiving sins; and, in His great saying at the institution of the Lord's Supper, He showed the connection which this was to have with His own death.

(c) Imitation of Christ—Service: Instead of speaking of faith and of believing, Jesus frequently spoke of "coming" to Himself; and then followed the in-itation to "follow" Him, which, accordingly, is the third stage. Following Him meant, in many cases, lit. leaving home and occupation, in order to accompany Him from place to place, as He journeyed through the land; and, as this involved sacrifice and self-denial, He frequently combined with "following" the invitation to take up "the cross." But by degrees this literal meaning dropped away from the invitation, or at least became secondary to that of imitation, which must be the only meaning when St. Paul, adopting the language of his Master, calls upon men and women to be "followers" of him, as he was of Christ. It is seldom that Jesus, in so many words, calls upon others to imitate Himself; indeed, He does so less frequently than St. Paul; but it is implied in following Him, if not lit. expressed; and it was a direct consequence of keeping company with Him and coming under the influence of His example. It is highly characteristic that, in the only place where He directly calls upon others to "learn" from Him, the virtue to which He draws attention is meekness—"Learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart." The same quality was often emphasized by Him, when He was describing the character which He wished to see exhibited by others, "For every one that exalteth himself shall be humbled; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted" (Lk 14 11). In spite, however, of the importance thus attached by Him to humility, He not only combined with it, as has been pointed out by Bushnell, in his famous chapter on the character of Christ in Nature and the Supernatural, the most stupendous personal claims, but also attributed to His followers a position of personal distinction among men, and called upon them to perform services far beyond the reach of ordinary mortals, saying to them, "Ye are the salt of the earth," "Ye are the light of the world," and ordering them to make disciples of all nations. The principle by which this apparent contradiction is bridged over is another favorite idea of His teaching, namely, Service. He who is able to serve others on a large scale is, in a sense, superior to those he serves, because he is furnished with the resources of which they stand in need; yet he places himself beneath them and forgets his own claims in ministering to their necessities. There are few of the utterances of Jesus in which the very genius of His ethical system is more fully expressed than that in which He contrasts greatness as it is conceived among men of the world with greatness as He conceives it and His followers must learn to conceive it: "Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you: but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant." Of this difficult rule, He was able to add, He Himself had given, and was still to give, the most perfect illustration; for "even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many" (Mt 20 25 ff AV).

This reminds us that, while the character of the subjects of the kingdom is to be learned from the words of Jesus, it may be also derived from His example. That which He demanded from others He fulfilled in His own conduct; and thus the dry precepts of the moral law were invested with the charm of a living personality. Brief as the records of His life are, they are wonderfully rich in instruction of this kind; and it is possible, by going through them with study and care, to form a clear image of how He bore Himself in all the departments of human life—in the home, in the state, in the church, as a friend, in society, as a man of prayer, as a student of Scripture, as a worker, as a sufferer, as a philanthropist, as a winner of souls, as a preacher, as a teacher, as a controversialist, and so on. This is the modern imitation of Christ—that of the details of His earthly existence—the Imitation of a Kempis was an imitation of the cosmical history of the Son of God, as He moves on His Divine mission from heaven to the cross and back to the throne of the universe. See the writer's Imago Christi.

The great commandments.—In accordance with Scriptural usage, Jesus called by the name of "commandments" those actions which we call "duties"; and He has made this part of our subject easy by reducing the commandments to two: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the great and first commandment. And a second like unto it is this, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Mt 22 37-39). He did not invent either of these commandments; for both occur in the OT (Dt 6 5; Lev 19 18). There, however, they lie far apart and are buried out of sight. The second of them was still more deeply buried under a misinterpretation of the scribes, to which reference is made in the Sermon on the Mount. Jesus rescued them from oblivion; He showed the vital and indissoluble connection between the sentiments which they enforce—love of God and love of man—which had been long and violently separated; and He lifted them up into the firmament of ethics, to shine forever as the sun and moon of duty.

(a) Love to God: It has been denied by some writers on Christian ethics that there can be any such thing as duties to God, and by writers on philosophical ethics love to God is not generally regarded as coming within the scope of their science. But the duty of man is concerned with all the objects, and esp. all the beings, he is related to; and to Jesus the outflow of man's heart toward Him who is the author of his being and the source of all his blessings seemed the most natural of actions. "I love Jeh" was a sentiment to which mankind had risen even in the OT (Ps 116 1), where it corresponds with not a few expressions of the Divine love equally fervent; and it is not a figure of speech at all when Jesus demands love for His Father from heart and soul, strength and mind.

Love to God involves, however, love to what may be called the Things of God, toward which Jesus always manifested tenderness and honor. Those who are not themselves ecclesiastically minded have, indeed, taken it for granted that Jesus was indifferent, if not hostile, to the objects and actions by which the Almighty is honored; and it is often said that the only service of God which mattered in His eyes was the service of man. But, although, like the prophets before Him, Jesus exposed with withering rebuke the hypocrisy of those who put ritual in the place of righteousness, it requires no more than a glance at His sayings, and the other records of His life, to perceive that His mind was occupied no less with duties to God than with duties to men; indeed, the former bulk more largely in His teaching. The only arrangement of religion with which He seems out of sympathy is the Sabbath; but this was due to a peculiarity of the times; and it is quite conceivable that in other circumstances He might have been a strenuous supporter of Sabbath observance. If there had been in His day a Sadducean attempt to rob the people of the day of rest, He would have opposed it as strenuously as He did the Pharisaic attempt to make it a burden and a weariness to the common man. By declaring the Sabbath to have been made for man (Mk 2 27) He recognized that it was instituted at the beginning and intended for the entire course of man's existence upon earth. With the other things of God, such as His House, His Word, and His Worship, He manifested sympathy equally by word and deed; He frequented both the Temple and the synagogue; so imbued was His mind with the lit. of the OT that He spoke habitually in its spirit and phraseology, having its figures and incidents perfectly at command; and by both precept and example He taught others to pray.

Nothing is commoner than the statement that Jesus had nothing to do with the founding of the church or the arrangement of its polity; but this is a subjective prejudice, blind to the facts of the case. Jesus realized that the worship of the OT was passing away, but He was Himself to replace it by a better order. He did not merely breathe into the air a spirit of sweetness and light; if this had been all He did, Christianity would soon have vanished from the earth; but He provided channels in which, after His departure, His influence should flow to subsequent generations. Not only did He found the church, but He appointed the most important details of its organization, such as preaching and the sacraments; and He left the Twelve behind Him not only as teachers, but as those who were able to instruct other teachers also. There may be ecclesiastical arrangements which are worked in a spirit far removed from the love of God; and such are of course contrary to the mind of Christ; but the love of God, if it is strong, inevitably overflows into the things of God, and cannot, in fact, permanently exist without them.

(b) Duty to man: As has been hinted above, the sayings of Our Lord about the details of duty to man are less numerous than might have been expected, but what may be lacking in numbers is made up for in originality and comprehensiveness. Many single sayings, like the Golden Rule (Mt 7 12) and the lovely word about a cup of cold water given in the name of Christ (10 42), are revolutionary in the ethical experience of mankind; and so are such parables as the Good Samaritan, the Prodigal Son and the Unmerciful Servant. The commandment to love enemies and to forgive injuries (5 43-48), if not entirely novel, received a prominence it had never possessed before. The spirit of all such sayings of Jesus is the same: He seeks to redeem men from selfishness and worldliness and to produce in them a godlike passion for the welfare of their fellow-creatures. These they may bless with gifts of money, where such may be required, still more with sympathy and helpfulness, but most of all with the gospel.

Besides such directions as to the behavior of man to man, there are also among the words of Jesus memorable maxims about the conduct of life in the family, in the state, and in society; and here again He taught even more by example than by precept. As son, brother and friend, He fulfilled all righteousness; but He also, as teacher, determined what righteousness was. Thus He opposed the laxity as to divorce prevalent in His time, pointing back to the pure ideal of Paradise. His conception of womanhood and His tenderness toward childhood have altered entirely the conceptions of men about these two conditions. He was a patriot, glorying in the beauty of His native Galilee and weeping over Jerus; and though, from birth to death, He was exposed to constant persecution from the constituted authorities, He not only obeyed these Himself but commanded all others to do the same. Nothing moved Him more than the sight of talents unused, and, therefore, it lay deep in His system of thought to call upon everyone to contribute his part to the service of the body politic; but no less did He recognize the right of those who have done their part of the general task to share in the fruits of industry; "for the laborer is worthy of his hire" (Lk 10 7).

Priceless, however, as are the commandments of Jesus in regard to the things of man, as well as in regard to the things of God, it is not in these that we have to seek His ethical originality, but in the new motive brought into play by Him for doing the Divine will, when once it has been ascertained. As He made it easy to love God by revealing God's love, so did He make it easy to love man by revealing the greatness of man, as an immortal creature, who has come from God and is going to God. Whatever is done to man, good or evil, Jesus esteems as done to Himself; for the great saying to this effect, in the account of the Last Judgment in Mt 25, though applicable in the first place to Christians, may be extended to men in general. The corollary of the fatherhood of God is the brotherhood of men; and the second great commandment stands under the protection of the first.

II. In the Fourth Gospel.—In the Fourth Gospel Eternal Life takes the same place as the kingdom of God in the other three. The author is not, indeed, unaware that Jesus employed the latter phrase for the sum of the blessings brought by Him to the world; and it has already been remarked that the Synoptists occasionally employ "life" as an equivalent for the phrase they usually make use of. The reason of John's preference for his own phrase may have lain in some personal idiosyncrasy, or it may have been due to the gentile environment in which he wrote. But the phrase is one suggestive and instructive in itself in the highest degree. It had already entered deeply into the language of religion before the time of Christ; indeed, in every part of Holy Writ the idea is common that separation from God is death, but that union with Him is life.

In the teaching of Jesus, as this is found in Jn, the world lies in death, because it has become separated from God, and the children of men are in danger of perishing everlastingly as the punishment of their sin; but "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life" (3 16).

This life is, first, in God, who abides in everlasting blessedness; but it is not, even in Him, at rest, but agitated with an impulse to communicate itself. Then, it is in the Son—"For as the Father hath life in himself, even so gave he to the Son also to have life in himself" (5 26); not, however, for Himself alone, but for the purpose of being communicated to those destitute of it. For this reason He was made flesh and dwelt among us; and He communicated it through His words, which were "words of eternal life." The words of Jesus, as thus bringing life, are the "light" of the world; and they are the "truth"—two favorite expressions of this Gospel—or He of whom they speak is Himself the light and the truth; He said Himself, "I am the way, and the truth, and the life." He is in His word in such a way that, when it is received in the right spirit, He enters the soul personally—"ye in me, and I in you" (14 20). As food is taken into the body, to sustain life, so does He become the life of the soul; He is the "bread of life" and the "water of life" (6 35). As, however, bread has to be broken, before it is eaten, and water to be poured out, when it is drunk, so does the virtue which is in the Son of God only become available through His death—"I am the living bread which came down out of heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever: yea and the bread which I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world" (6 51).

The world lying dead in sin, a new birth is required for those who are to enter into life; and this is necessary even for so fine a character

4. Need of New Birth as Nicodemus (3 3.5.7). Without this change, the children of men are insensible to Divine revelations; and even the children of privilege, who had enjoyed the OT revelation, were indifferent to eternal life, when it came near to them in the person of Christ. Hence there was required a special drawing on the part of God to awaken the sleeping soul—"No man can come to me, except the Father that sent me draw him" (6 44); and, where this influence was not responded to, there might be the most violent and persistent opposition to Christ on the part of those who believed themselves to be the favorites of heaven. The new birth is accompanied with spiritual vision—"seeing the kingdom of God" (3 3)—and, throughout the Fourth Gospel, remarkable stress is laid on the virtue of such seeing or knowing. It leads so directly to faith that to "know" and to "believe" are virtually the same act (10 38). Faith is the reception into the soul of the life eternal, or of Him who has been discerned by the spiritual vision and who is Himself the life. It is the eating of the bread of life, the drinking of the water of life, and it makes and keeps alive.

Since faith is thus the means whereby the eternal life becomes a personal possession, it is the one thing needful and the sum of all the

5. Nature of Faith commandments—"This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent" (6 29). It is the unique commandment, comprehending all the commandments, and it "worketh by love" toward the fulfilment of them all. What these are is, however, less brought out in detail in this Gospel than in the others, for it is a peculiarity of the mind of Jesus, as recorded by John, to deal with central principles and to assume that the consequences will follow as a matter of course. Of the organization, for example, of the community which was to perpetuate His influence, after He had left the world, He says much less in this Gospel than even in the Synoptists; yet He characterizes the very essence of the new body in such words as this, "I in them, and thou in me, that they may be perfected into one; that the world may know that thou didst send me, and lovedst them, even as thou lovedst me" (17 23). In the last half of this saying there is a hint of the influence to be exerted on the outside world by the display of Christian character, with the result of producing belief; but this aim was to be sought more directly through testimony (15 27) and the "word" of the disciples (17 20). Thus would even the distant, "which are not of this fold," be brought in, so that there might be "one flock" and "one shepherd" (10 16). Inside the fold it is the greatest privilege and honor, as well as responsibility, to feed the "sheep" and to feed the "lambs" (21 15.16.17).

Character and conduct are, even for the disciples of Christ, "commandments," as, indeed, Jesus does not disdain to speak of the various

6. Fruits of Union with Christ parts of His own vocation by the same humble name, implying the necessity of moral effort and the temptation to failure (15 10). Therefore, they are also proper subjects for prayer. He prayed for the disciples, both that they might be kept from the evil in the world and that they might be sanctified through the truth (17 15.17), and doubtless He expected them to ask the same things for themselves, as theirs was to be a life of prayer (16 24). But, in the last resort, they are the fruits of union with Himself, and eternal life is not merely a gift of the future, to be given at the death of the body, but is enjoyed even now by those who abide in the vine.

JAMES STALKER

ETHIOPIA, ē-thi-ō'p-i-a (ኢትዮጵያ, kūsh; Αἰθιοπία, Aithiopia):

Critically speaking E. may refer only to the Nile valley above the First Cataract, but in ancient as in modern times the term was often

1. Location, used not only to include what is now Extent and known as Nubia and the Sūdān (Soudan), but all the unknown country farther W. and S., and also at times Northern, if not Southern, Abyssinia. While E. was so indefinitely large, yet the narrow river valley, which from the First to the Fifth Cataract represented the main agricultural resources of the country, was actually a territory smaller than Egypt and, excluding deserts, smaller than Belgium (W. Max Müller). The settled population was also small, since in ancient as in modern times Egypt naturally drew away most of the able-bodied and energetic youth as servants, police and soldiers. The prehistoric population of Northern Nubia was probably Egypt, but this was displaced in early historic time by a black race, and the thick lips and woolly hair of the typical African are as well marked in the oldest Egypt paintings as in the latest. But by the side of these natives of K'sh, the artist also represents various reddish-brown varieties; for from the beginning of historic time the pure Negro stock has been mixed with the fellaheen of Egypt and with the Sem population of the Arabian coast. The rulers of E. were generally of foreign blood. The Negroes, though brave and frugal, were slow in thought, and although controlled for centuries by cultivated neighbors, under whom they attained at times high official prominence, yet the body of the people remained uninfluenced by this civilization. The country which we now know as Abyssinia was largely controlled, from the earliest known date, by a Caucasian people who had crossed the Red Sea from Arabia. The true Abyssinians, as Professor Littmann shows, contain no Negro blood and no Negro qualities. In general they are "well formed and handsome, with straight and regular features, lively eyes, hair long and straight or somewhat curled and in color dark olive approaching brown." Modern discoveries prove their close racial and linguistic connection with Southern Arabia and particularly with the kingdom of Sheba (the Sabaeans), that most powerful people whose extensive architectural and literary remains have recently come to light. The Sabaeen inscriptions found in Abyssinia go back some 2,600 years and give a new value to the Bible references as well as to the constant claim of Jos that the queen of Sheba was a "queen of E." The Falashas are a Jewish community living near Lake Tsana, of the same physical type and probably of the same race as other Abyssinians. Their religion is a "pure Mosaism" based upon the Ethiopic version of the Pent, but modified by the fact that they are ignorant of the Heb language (Jew Enc). It is uncertain when they became Jews. The older scholars thought of them as dating back to the Solomonic era, or at least to the Bab captivity. Since the researches of Joseph Halévy (1868), some date within the Christian era has seemed preferable, notwithstanding their ignorance of Talmudic rules. However, the newly discovered fact that a strong Jewish community was flourishing at Syene in the 6th cent. BC makes it clear that Jewish influence may have been felt in E. at least that early. Although Abyssinians are noted for their strict adherence to ancient custom, Jewish characteristics are prominent all over the entire country. The opening formula of the king in every official letter—"The Lion of the Tribe of Judah has Conquered!"—is no more Jewish than scores of ordinary phrases and customs. Although it is barely possible that some rites, like circumcision and observance of the Sabbath, may have been received from the ancient Egyptians or Christian Copts (New Sch-Herz Enc) yet a strong Heb influence cannot be denied. All travelers speak of the "industry" of the Falashas and of the "kindliness and grave courtesy" of the Abyssinians. Besides those named above there are many communities of mixed races in E., but the ancient basis is invariably Negro, Sem or Egypt.

The ancient Gr writers are full of fantastic and fabulous stories about E. Sometimes they become so puzzled in their geography as to

2. History speak of E. as extending as far as India; their notes concerning the miraculous fauna and flora are equally Munchausian. Homer praises the Ethiopians as the "blameless race," and other writers rank them first among all men for their religious knowledge. This latter notion may have had its origin from a priestly desire to consider the Ethiopian reverence for the priesthood—which had the power of life and death over the kings—as the Divinely ordained primitive custom, or it may have sprung from the fact that the Egypt "Land of the Gods" was partly situated in Southern Abyssinia. It is suggestive that the Heb prophets never fell into these common errors but invariably "gave a very good idea of geographical and political conditions" (W. Max Müller). The oldest important historic document referring to E. is from the IVth Dynasty of Egypt when Sneferu laid waste the land, capturing 7,000 slaves and 100,000 cattle.

In the VIth Dynasty the Egyptians reached as far S. as the Second Cataract and brought back some dwarfs, but did not establish any permanent control. In the XIIth Dynasty Egypt's real occupation of E. began. Useratesen III records his contempt by saying: "The Negro obeys as soon as the lips are opened. They are not valiant, they are miserable, both tails and bodies!" Notwithstanding this satiric reference, these naked Ethiopians clad in skins and tails of wild animals, compelled the Pharaoh to make several campaigns before he could establish a frontier at the Second Cataract beyond which no Negro could come without a permit. That the natives were not cowardly may be seen from the songs of triumph over their subjection and from the fact that every later Pharaoh encouraged them to enlist in his army, until finally the very hieroglyphic for archer became a Nubian. The XVIIIth Dynasty pushed the frontier beyond the Third Cataract into the splendid Dongola district and often boasts of the rich tribute from E., in one case 2,667 "manloads" of ivory, ebony, perfumes, gold and ostrich feathers besides cattle, wild beasts and slaves. The chairs of ivory and the jewelry sometimes shown seem barbaric in style but excellent in workmanship. Copper and bronze factories and great iron foundries date also to a very early time in E. (PSBA, XXXIII, 96). The Ethiopian gold mines where hundreds of criminals toiled, with ears and noses mutilated, made gold in Egypt in the 15th cent. BC as "common as dust." The choicest son of the Pharaoh, next to him in power, was proud to be called "Prince of Kush." Amenhotep IV (1370 BC), the religious reformer, built his second greatest temple (the only one of his works now existent) in Nubia. The XIXth Dynasty sought to colonize E., and some of the most magnificent temples ever built by man can be seen as far S. as the Fourth Cataract. For over five cents. Egypt rule was maintained, until about 1000 BC a war for independence began which was so successful that the victorious Ethiopian kings finally carried their armies against Thebes and Memphis and for a century (763-663) ruled all Egypt from Napata—which in religious architecture became the Southern Thebes—and for another century (and even at times during the Ptolemaic era) controlled upper Egypt. While the leaders of this revolution were doubtless descendants of exiled priests from Thebes, yet the mixture of Ethiopian blood is plainly discernible and is perhaps also shown in their "Puritan morals" (Petrie, III, 276) and spirit of clemency, so different from the legitimate Pharaohs. Shabaka=So (715-707) and Taharka=Terhakah (693-667), both centuries thereafter Islam demanded a tribute of 360 slaves annually, and other treasure, though innumerable campaigns were necessary to collect it. The Nubian kings refused all overtures to become Moslems, and Christian churches multiplied along the banks of the Nile. In the 8th cent. Egypt was invaded by 100,000 Nubians to repay an insult given to the Coptic patriarch and to the sacred pictures in the Egypt Christian churches. In the 13th cent., David, king of Nubia, not only withheld tribute but invaded Egypt. He was terribly punished, however, by the Arabs, who sacked churches and tortured Christians clear to the Fourth Cataract. This was the beginning of the end. By the close of the 15th cent. almost every Christian altar was desolate and every church destroyed.

mentioned in the Bible, were the last great kings of E. When Tanutamen, son of Shabaka and nephew of Taharka (667-664), was forced by Ashurbanipal to give up his claim to Egypt and retire to the S., the influence of E. ceased. Cambyses (525-521) made E. tributary clear to the Third Cataract (cf. Ezk 30 4), while King Ergamenes, near the close of the 3d cent. BC, broke forever the power of the Egyptian priesthood. Though the Romans held a nominal protectorate over E., it was of so little importance as to be scarcely ever mentioned. After being expelled from Egypt the Ethiopians still continued to honor the gods of Thebes, but, as foreign influence ceased, the representations of this worship became more and more African and barbaric. Even after Christianity had triumphed everywhere else, the Nubians, as late as the 5th cent. AD, were still coming to Philae to give honor to the statue of Isis (Erman). In the 6th cent. AD a native king, Silko, established a Christian kingdom in the Northern Sūdān with Dongola as its capital. This raised somewhat the culture of the land. In the next century the Arabs made Nubia tributary, though it took an immense army to do it. For six Winckler long ago proved that the Assyrians designated a district in Northern Arabia by the same name which they ordinarily applied to E. Skinner (Genesis, 1910, 206) thinks the Hebrews also made this distinction and were therefore entirely right when they spoke of Nimrod as "son of Cush," since the earliest Bab dynasty had as a matter of fact a Sem origin. There may be other references to an Arabian district, but undoubtedly the African Kush must be the one generally designated. This is referred to once in the NT and over 40 times in the OT. Many secular monuments speak of the high honor paid to women in E., and Candace (Acts 8 27) seems certainly to have been an official or dynastic name for a number of Ethiopian queens. One of the pyramids of Merōe was Candace's—her picture can still be seen at Kaga—and to her belonged the wonderful treasure of jewelry found in 1834 by Ferhni and now in the Berlin museum. Petronius (24 BC) raided E. for Rome and stormed the capital, but Candace sent ambassadors to Rome and obtained peace. The "eunuch" who may have been the treasurer of this very queen was probably "no black proselyte but a Jew who had placed the business ability of his race at the service of the Nubian woman" (W. Max Müller). In the OT E. is spoken of with great respect, and several Bible characters are named Cush (2 S 18 21 AV; Jer 36 14; Zeph 1 1); even Moses married an Ethiopian wife (Nu 12 1), and Ebed-melek the Ethiopian is helper to Jeremiah (Jer 38 7). It is a great land situated beyond the frontiers of the civilized world (Ezk 29 10), yet with Jews in its farthest district (Zeph 3 10). It is very rich (Job 28 19; Isa 43 3); is engaged in trade with Arabia (45 14), and its citizens are proud of their nationality (Ps 87 4). Again and again the relation of Cush with Sheba is mentioned (Gen 10 7, 28; Isa 43 3, etc.), which latter statement is strangely corroborated by the recently discovered Sabaeen inscriptions throughout Abyssinia. Its typical inhabitants have a color as unchangeable as the leopard's spots (Jer 13 23), are careless (Ezk 30 9), but very warlike (Ezk 38 5; Jer 46 9), giving "infinite" strength to Nineveh (Nah 3 9), but who can be resisted by Israel because of Jeh's favor (2 Ch 16 8; Isa 20 5; 36 6). Jeh is interested in the history of E. as well as Egypt (Isa 20 3), loves the children of E. as the children of Israel (Am 9 7), and the time is coming when E. shall yet stretch out her hands to Jeh (Ps 68 31). Cush and Mizraim are correctly mentioned as a political unit (Isa 20 4 f), and several kings of E. are mentioned by name—Zerah (2 Ch 14 9), So (2 K 17 4) and Tirhakah (2 K 19 9; Isa 37 9). The statements concerning these kings have been pronounced incorrect because it seemed that Zerah could not possibly be an equivalent for Usarkon or So for Shabaka—the known kings of Egypt at those periods—and also because the reigns of Shabaka and Tirhakah did not begin until after the dates at which in the Heb records they were called "kings of E."

Recent information, however, makes it clear that both Shabaka and Tirhakah exercised royal authority in the Delta before they were given it farther south, and that the Heb transcription of names was very easy and natural. (See W. M. Flinders Petrie, Hist of Egypt, III, 280-309; Egypt and Israel [1911], 76-78.)

Sem influence entered Abyssinia at least as early as the 7th or 8th cent. BC (see above), and the kings of Axum claimed descent from Menelek, son of Solomon, but the first certain information concerning the kingdom of Abyssinia is that Axum comes from the middle of the 1st cent. AD, at which time Axum was a rich capital, and its ancient sacredness was so great that from that period clear down to the 19th cent. the kings of Abyssinia would travel there to be crowned. There is no reason to doubt that Frumentius (cir 330 AD) was the first to introduce Christianity. Merope of Tyre, according to the often-told story, when returning from India with his two nephews, was captured and killed off the Ethiopian coast, but the two boys were carried to the Abyssinian king; and although one perished the other, Frumentius, succeeded in converting the king and his people to Christianity, and later was himself consecrated by St. Athanasius of Alexandria as the first Metropolitan of E., taking as his title Abu Salama ("Father of Peace"). From that time until now, with but one single interruption, the Abuna ("Father") has always been appointed by the Patriarch of Alexandria and, since the 13th cent., has been by legal necessity not a native Abyssinian, but a Copt.

After the Council of Chalcedon (450 AD) condemned all as heretics who did not accept the "double nature" of Christ, both the Egypt and Abyssinian churches separated themselves from Rome, believing so thoroughly in the Deity of Christ as to refuse to accept His humanity as essential "nature." In the 5th cent. a great company of monks entered Abyssinia, since which time the monastic tendency has been strongly marked. About 525, Caleb, king of Axum, attacked the Homerites across the Red Sea—either for their persecution of Christians or their interference with his trade—and for some half a century controlled a large district of Arabia. At this time Abyssinian trade was extensive. Gr influence was also felt, and the Christian cathedral at Axum was a magnificent work of architectural art. The early churches were protected by heavy surrounding walls and strong towers. The invasion of Africa by Islam in the 7th cent. required 300 years of battle for the preservation of Abyssinian liberty and Christian faith. It alone of all the African states succeeded in preserving both—but its civilization was destroyed, and for 1,000 years it was completely hidden from the eyes of its fellow-Christians in Europe. Occasionally during those centuries a rumor would reach Europe of a "Prester John" somewhere in the Far East who was king of a Christian people, yet it was a thrilling surprise to Christendom when Pedro de Cavilham in the 15th cent. discovered this lost Christian kingdom of Abyssinia completely surrounded by infidel pagans and bigoted Mohammedans. When, early in the 16th cent., the Negus of Abyssinia sent an envoy to the king of Portugal asking his help against the Moslems, the appeal was met with favor. In 1520 the Portuguese fleet arrived in the Red Sea and its chaplain, Father Francisco Alvarez, 20 years later stirred the Christian world by his curious narratives. Not long afterward, when the Arabs actually invaded the country, another Portuguese fleet was sent with a body of military, commanded by Christopher de Gama. These 450 musketeers and the six little pieces of artillery gave substantial aid to the endangered state. Father Lobo tells the story. The Abyssinian king must have been grateful for such help, yet presently the strenuous efforts of the Portuguese clergy to convert him and his people to the Roman Catholic faith became so offensive that Bermudez, the most zealous missionary, was compelled to leave the country and the Jesuits who remained were mistreated. Other efforts to win the Abyssinian Christians to renounce the Monophysitic heresy and accept the doctrine and control of Rome were somewhat more successful. Early in the 17th cent. Father Pedro Paez, an ecclesiastic of much tact, won the king fully to his faith, and under his direction many churches were erected and advantageous government works carried on. However, his successor Mendez lacked his conciliatory ability and, although a punishment of seven years' chastisement was proclaimed against recalcitrants, the opposition became so violent and universal that the Negus Sysenus finally abdicated in favor of his son Fasildas, who in 1633 sent all Jesuits out of the country and resumed official relations with the Egypt church. Since then, although many efforts have been made, no controlling influence has ever been obtained by Rome. Once more, for over a century, Abyssinia became completely hidden from the eyes of the outside world until James Bruce, the explorer, visited the country, 1770-72, and made such a report as to arouse again the interest of Christendom. The tr of the Bible, which was made by his Abyssinian guide, was adopted and published by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and in 1829 the Church Missionary Society sent out Gobat and Kugler as the first Protestant missionaries to Abyssinia, who were followed shortly after by some Roman Catholics. Owing chiefly to the opposition of native priests the Protestants were expelled in 1838 and the expulsion of the Roman missionaries followed in 1854. In 1858 a Copt who had been influenced as a youth by a Protestant school, became Abuna, and Protestant missionaries were again admitted, but succeeded in doing little permanent work owing to the political disturbances while King Kessa (Theodore)—the Napoleon of Africa—was attempting to consolidate native resources and build up an African empire. At this period the influence of Great Britain began to be felt in Abyssinia. After the suicide of Theodore (1868) and esp. after Menelek II had succeeded in making himself emperor (1899), this influence became great. During the 20th cent. missionaries have been able to work in Abyssinia without much danger, but the Moslem influence is so preponderating that little has been attempted and little done. The religion of the Crescent seems now almost completely victorious over the strange land which for so many centuries, alone and unhelped, held aloft in Africa the religion of the Cross. (See esp. The Mohammedan World of Today, by Zwemer, Wherry, and Barton, 1907; Missionary World, 1910-11.)

In creed, ritual, and practice, the Abyssinian church agrees generally with the Coptic. There are seven sacraments and prayers for the dead,

5. Beliefs high honor is paid to the Virgin Mary and to the saints; fasts and pilgrimages are in much favor; adults are baptized by immersion and infants by affusion. A blue cord is placed about the neck at baptism.

An extract from one of the Gospels, a silver ring, an ear pick and a small cross, often very artistic, are also worn about the neck. No charms or beads or crucifixes ("graven images") are worn. The Jewish as well as the Christian Sabbath is kept sacred, and on an average every other day during the year is a religious holiday. The people are ignorant and superstitious, yet impress observers with their grave kindliness and seem at times eager to learn. The clergy can marry before but not after ordination. Priests must be able to read and recite the Nicene Creed (the "Apostles' Creed" is not known), but do not understand the Ge'ez language in which the liturgies are written. They conduct many and long services and attend to the ceremonial purifications. Deacons must also be able to read; they prepare the bread for the Holy Sacrament and in general help the priests. The monastic clergy have chief care of the education of the young—though this consists mainly in Scripture reading—and their head, the Etshege, ranks next to the Abuna.

The ancient churches were often basilican, but modern native churches are quadrangular or circular. The Holy of Holies always stands in the center, and is supposed to contain an ark. Tradition declares that the ark in the cathedral at Axum is the original ark from Solomon's temple. An outer court surrounds the body of the church, which is freely used by laymen and as a place of entertainment for travelers. Very crude pictures are common. These show both Egypt and European influence, and are probably not merely decorations but have a relation, as in Egypt thought, to spiritual advancement in this life or the next (cf Budge, Intro to Lives of Maba' Sëyôn and Gabra Krësôs, 1898). The services consist of chanting psalms, reading Scriptures and reciting liturgies.

The Abyssinian canon (Semanya Ahadu) consists of 46 OT and 35 NT books. Besides the usually accepted books, they count Shepherd

6. Abyssinian Literature—of Hermas, Synodos (Canons), Epistles of Clement, Macc, Tob, Jth, Wisd, Ecclus, Bar, 4 Ezr, Asc Isa, Book of Adam, Joseph ben Gorion, En and Jub. The Ethiopic texts of the two latter give these books in the most ancient form, and their discovery has led to much valuable discussion. The use of the Ge'ez language in which these are written dates back to a time shortly before the introduction of Christianity. From the 5th to 7th cents. AD, the lit. is almost exclusively tr^d from Gr writers or adaptations of such writings. Quotations abound from Basil, Gregory, Ignatius, Athanasius, Epiphanius, Cyril, Dioscurus, etc. The second literary period begins 1268, when the old "Solomonic" Dynasty regained its place and continues to the present; it consists mainly of tr^d from the Arabic. In both periods the topics are few: liturgies, hymns, sermons, the heroic deeds of the saints and their orthodoxy. Each saint uses the four Holy Gospels, as David his four stones, to kill every heretical Goliath (cf Goodspeed and Crum, Patrologia Orientalis, IV, 1908). A large place is given to miracles and magic prayers and secret names (cf Budge, Miracles of the Virgin Mary, 1900, and "Magic Book of Disciples," JAOS, 1904). The legends or histories are occasionally well written, as the famous "Magda Queen of Sheba" (ET by Mrs. J. Van Vorst, 1907), but usually are as inferior in style as in thought (cf Littmann, Bibliotheca Abessinica, 1904). A few specimens of "popular literature" and many Abyssinian "proverbs" are extant (JAOS, XXIII, 51-53; XXV, 1-48; Jour. asiatique, IV, 487-95).

The modern Nubian does not write, and his ancient predecessors wrote but little. Even in the days of the Pharaohs the hieroglyphics in most

Nubian temples were written so poorly as to be almost unintelligible, and in later pre-Christian monuments put up by native rulers the usual before our era the necessary monumental inscriptions began to be composed in the Nubian language, though still written in hieroglyphics. Shortly after the beginning of the Christian era a native cursive writing begins to be used on the monuments, closely resembling the Egypt demotic, from which undoubtedly its alphabet was derived (F. L. Griffith in Areika). Finally, after Nubia became Christian (6th cent.), another native system appears written in Gr and Coptic letters. Lepsius found two such inscriptions on the Blue Nile and numbers have since been discovered, but until 1906 these were as unreadable as the other two forms of Nubian writing. In that year Dr. Karl Schmidt found in Cairo two precious fragments of parchment which had been owned by some Nubian Christians of probably the 8th or 9th cent. One of these contained a selection of passages from the NT—as was ascertained by comparing it with the Gr and Coptic Scriptures. By the aid of bilingual cartouches several proper names were soon deciphered. New inscriptions are now being brought to light every few months, and undoubtedly the tr of this important tongue, which contains the "history of an African Negro dialect for some 2,000 years" and also the religious history of the long-lost Christian church of the Sūdān, will soon be accomplished. The other fragment found by Schmidt was a curious Hymn of the Cross, well representing the ancient Ethiopian hymnology:

"The cross is the hope of Christians;
The cross is the resurrection of the dead;
The cross is the physician of the sick;
The cross is the liberator of the slave," etc.

Scientific observation of Nubia began with Burckhardt (1813), Cailliaud, and Waddington (1821), and esp. with Lepsius (1844), but excavation

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH, ē-thi-ō'pi-an ū'nuk (εὐνοῦχος, eunouchos): A man who occupied a leading position as treasurer at the court of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, and who was converted and baptized by Philip the deacon (Acts 8 27-39). Being a eunuch, he was not in the full Jewish communion (cf Dt 23 1), but had gone up to Jerus to worship, probably as a proselyte at the gate. During his return journey he spent the time in studying Isaiah, the text which he used being that of the LXX

ANCIENT EGYPTIAN TEMPLE—PHILAE

(cf Professor Margoliouth, art. "Ethiopian Eunuch" in HDB). On meeting with Philip the deacon, who was on his way to Gaza, he besought of him to shed light upon the difficulties of the Scripture he was reading, and through this was converted. The place of his baptism, according to Jerome and Eusebius, was Bethsura: by some modern authorities, e.g. G. A. Smith, it has been located at or near Gaza. The verse containing the confession of the eunuch, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God," is omitted either in whole or in part by some texts, but Hilgenfeld, Knowling, etc, regard it as quite in keeping with the context. Tischendorf, WH, RV text, etc, uphold the omission. The verse occurs in the body of AV, but is given only as a footnote in RV and ARV. The diligence with which the eunuch pursued his reading, the earnestness with which he inquired of Philip, and the promptness with which he asked for baptism—all testify to the lofty nature of his character.

ETHIOPIC LANGUAGE, ʾē-thi-op'ik lan'gwāj: The language commonly called Ethiopic is the language in which the inscriptions of the kings of the ancient Aksumitic (Axumite) empire and most of the lit. of Christian Abyssinia are written. It is called lesāna Ge'ez, "the tongue of Ge'ez," by the Abyssinians themselves, most probably because it was originally the dialect of the Ge'ez tribe, who in antiquity must have dwelt in or near Aksum (Axum).

The names Ethiopia and Ethiopians have been used in many different meanings by various peoples. To the Greeks Ethiopia was a country S. of Egypt, and in this sense the word is generally used in the histories of Egypt. The Ethiopian kings came from that country which is now called Nubia in the Anglo-Egypt Sudan. In Hellenistic times the term received a wider meaning, and Ethiopia was the name of all the land between the Red Sea and the Nile, south of Egypt proper. Sometimes "Indian" and "Ethiopian" were synonymous, or Ethiopia was even considered to stretch as far as to the Atlantic Ocean in the W. But of these countries the Greeks and Romans had very little exact geographical knowledge. See ETHIOPIA.

The fact that Ethiopia at some time meant the country between the Red Sea and the Nile prompted the pagan kings of Aksum in northern Abyssinia to adopt this name for their own country and to give it a narrower sense than the one which it had at that time. Therefore in the bilingual inscription of King Aezanas, Aezanas ('Ēzānā), the word Αἰθιοπία, Aithiopia, is a rendering of the Sem Haba-shai ("Abyssinia," but here more specially referring to Northern Abyssinia). Under this same king, about 350 AD, Abyssinia became Christian; and after the Bible had been tr^d into the Ge'ez language, the Abyssinians found that Ethiopia was mentioned there several times. Their national pride was flattered by the thought that their country should be referred to in the Holy Scriptures, and for this reason they were all the more ready to apply the name in question to their own country. Up to the present day they call it Ethiopia ('Ītiōpiyā), and themselves Ethiopians; their legends speak even of an ancestor Ītiōpiā.

We may then, if we choose to do so, speak of a Nubian and an Abyssinian Ethiopia, but the term "Ethiopic language" has come into general usage as an equivalent of lesāna Ge'ez, and should therefore be applied only to the ancient literary language of Abyssinia.

This language is closely allied to the languages of Southern Arabia: it represents the southwestern branch of the southern division of the Sem languages. The most important branch of this division is, of course, the Arab. language, and with this Ethiopic has a great deal in common. On the other hand there are many words and forms in Ethiopic which are not found in Arab., but in Heb or even in Bab and Assy. It has been held that the home of the Semites was in Africa; and if that were the case, the people who spoke the Ethiopic language may never have migrated very much. But the majority of scholars who have expressed their opinion upon the subject believe that Asia was the home of the Semites; this is the opinion of the writer of this art. also. Then the Sem inhabitants of Abyssinia must have come from across the Red Sea. Their migration must have begun many centuries BC. It has hardly ever stopped, since Arabs in smaller, and sometimes in larger, numbers have been drifting into Abyssinia at all periods.

The Sem conquerors of Abyssinia found peoples of two different races in the country where they settled: (1) African aborigines and (2) Kushites, a branch of the Hamitic family. Their languages were different from each other and, of course, different from that of the Semites also; some of them are spoken up to the present day. When the Semites first came and formed their literary language, they did not allow the languages of the country to influence their own speech very much; but gradually this influence grew stronger and stronger, and it is very evident in the modern Sem languages of Abyssinia. An outline of the history of the Ethiopic language is as follows: Its oldest monument known so far is the Sem part of the bilingual inscription of King 'Ēzānā, which dates from the first half of the 4th cent. AD. Before that time Ethiopic must have been spoken, without doubt, but it was not written: Gr and Sabaeen were written instead. At the time of King 'Ēzānā the knowledge of the Sabaeen language seems to have been very little; but Sabaeen script was still used. The Sem part of the inscription just mentioned is in the Ethiopic language, but carved once in Sabaeen script and a second time in the native Ethiopic script which had been derived from the Sabaeen. In the first of these two "editions" two or three Sabaeen words are used instead of their Ethiopic equivalents. A few other ancient inscriptions found in the Aksumitic empire may also be dated from the same period.

Possibly in the same 4th cent. the tr of the Bible into Ethiopic was begun; and this fact marks the beginning of a real Ethiopic lit. Perhaps the Ps and the Gospels were tr^d first, being most needed in the service of the Christian church. The different books of the Scriptures were tr^d by different men, some of whom rendered literally, some more according to the sense, some having a good, some only a poor, knowledge of the language from which, and the language into which, they translated. Both Testaments were tr^d from the Gr by men whose mother-tongue was probably Aramaic. This is proved by the presence of Gr and Aram. words and by the forms in which the Heb names appear in Ethiopic transliteration. The oldest influences which the Ethiopic language experienced were therefore: (1) Sabaeen; a number of technical terms may have been adopted by the ancient Aksumites from the Sabaeen at the time when this was their literary language; (2) African, i.e. Kushite and native African; the Sem conquerors found a great many new animals and trees or plants, which they did not know, in their new country, and in many cases they adopted their African names; (3) Aramaic, i.e. Jewish and Christian; these are mostly words referring to religious or theological matters; (4) Gr; some of the Gr words found in Ethiopic refer to religious matters in the same way as the Aram., others denote objects or ideas which the ancient Abyssinians received from the civilized world, others again are mere transliterations of Gr words in the Bible and other religious books, which the translators did not understand.

The time of the Aksumitic empire was the time when the Ethiopic language flourished. This empire was overthrown probably in the 7th or 8th cent. AD; and we know very little indeed of the history of Abyssinia from about 700 until about 1300 AD. In 1270 the so-called Solomonic Dynasty came to the throne again; the seat of the empire, however, was no longer Aksum but Gondar, N. of Lake Tsānā. Meanwhile the literary language had become a dead language; new dialects had sprung up and taken its place in everyday conversation. But Ge'ez continued to be the sacred language; it was the language of the Bible and of the church, and when in the 14th and 15th cents. a revival of Abyssinian lit. came about, the literary language was Ge'ez. But it was influenced by the new dialects, esp. by the Amharic, the language of Amhara, where Gondar was situated and where most of the books were written or tr^d. This influence affected in particular the spelling of Ge'ez in those books which dealt with religious matters and which therefore had to be written in pure Ge'ez. In historical books a great many words were taken from the Amharic; and this language, called lesāna tārīk, "the tongue of the chronicles," has often the appearance of a mixed language.

In the 16th and 17th cents. European missionaries came to Abyssinia and tried to convert the monophysite Abyssinian Christians to Romanism. In order to come into close contact with the common people they used Amharic as a literary language, so that everybody, not only the learned, might understand their books. Their example was followed by the defenders of the native church; and since that time Amharic has become a recognized literary language in Abyssinia, although Ge'ez is still considered the real language of the church.

Amharic was derived from a sister language of the Ethiopic; the direct descendant of the Ethiopic language is modern Tigrīna; a language derived from a dialect very closely related to Ge'ez is modern Tigrā.

ETHIOPIIC VERSIONS, ē-thi-op'ik vūr'shun: Christianity was introduced into Abyssinia by Tyrian missionaries, who probably spoke Gr, about the time of Constantine the Great. The Bible was tr^d into Ethiopic, or, to use the native name, lesāna Ge'ez, the OT being from the LXX, between the 4th and 5th cents., by various hands, though the work was popularly ascribed to Frumentius, the first bishop. The fact of the Scriptures having been tr^d into Ethiopic was known to Chrysostom (Hom. II, in Joannem). The versions thus made were revised some time about the 14th cent., and corrected by means of the MT. The Ethiopic Scriptures contain the books found in the Alexandrine recension with the exception of the Books of Macc; but their importance lies in their pseudepigraphic writings, the Asc Isa, the Book of En and the Book of Jub. The 1st ed of the NT appeared at Rome in 1548–49 (reprinted in Walton), but a critical edition has yet to be made; one issued by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1830 contains many errors. The OT canonical books and Apoc have been edited by Dillmann (the Octoteuch and 1–4 Kings and Apoc), Bachmann (d. 1894) (Isa, Lam, Ob and Mal), and Ludolph (Pss). The Psalter has been often printed from 1513 on. The Book of En was first tr^d by Richard Laurence and published at Oxford in 1821, but the standard editions are those of Dillmann (Leipzig, 1853) and R. H. Charles (Oxford, 1893). The importance of this work lies in the fact that "the influence of En on the NT has been greater than that of all the other apocryphal and pseud-epigraphal books taken together" (Charles, 41). Not only the phraseology and ideas, but the doctrines of the NT are greatly influenced by it. Of the canonical books and Apoc the MSS are too poor and too late to be of any value for the criticism of the Gr text.

ETH-KAZIN, eth-kā'zin (ἔθ-κ-ζ-ῖ-ν, 'ittah kacin; AV Ittah Kazin): A town on the eastern border of Zebulun, mentioned between Gath-hepher and Rimmon (Josh 19 13). The site is not identified. "Ittah" of AV is due to misunderstanding of the ῖ locale.

ETHMA, eth'ma ('Εθμά Ethma), RV NOOMA (q.v.).

ETHNAN, eth'nan (ἔθ-ν-ᾱ-ν, 'ethnan, "gift" or "hire"; 'Εθναῖ, Ethnadai): A Judahite (1 Ch 4 7).

ETHNARCH, eth'nārk (2 Cor 11 32 m). See GOVERNOR.

ETHNI, eth'ni (ἔθ-ν-ῖ-ν, 'ethni, "gift"): An ancestor of Asaph, of the Gershom branch of the Levites (1 Ch 6 41).

ETHNOGRAPHY, eth-nog'ra-fi, ETHNOLOGY, eth-nol'ō-ji. See TABLE OF NATIONS.

EUBULUS, ū-bū'lus (Εὐβούλος, Eúboulos, lit. "of good counsel," 2 Tim 4 21): One of the members of the church in Rome at the time of Paul's second imprisonment in that city.

The apostle mentions how, at his first answer to the charges brought against him at the emperor's tribunal, the Rom Christians as a whole proved disloyal to him—"no one took my part, but all forsook me" (ver 16). In these circumstances when the desertion of Paul by the Christians in Rome was so disheartening, it is pleasing to find that there were some among them who were true, and Eubulus was one of these. Paul therefore in writing the last of all his epistles sends to Timothy a greeting from Eubulus.

Nothing more is known in regard to Eubulus. As his name is Gr, he was probably a Gentile by birth.

EUCCHARIST, ū'ka-risť. See LORD'S SUPPER.

EUMENES II, ū'me-nēz (Εὐμένης, Euménēs, "well-disposed"): King of Pergamus, son and successor of Attalus I (197 BC). He is mentioned in the Apoc (1 Macc 8 8) in connection with the league which Judas Maccabaeus made with the Romans. As their ally in the war against Antiochus the Great and in recognition of his signal service at the decisive battle of Magnesia (190 BC), E. was rewarded with such extensive tracts of country as raised him at once from comparative insignificance to be the sovereign of a great state. The statement in the Apoc describing his extension of territory differs from those of Livy, Polybius and Appian, and cannot be correct. The Romans are said to have taken "India, and Media and Lydia" from Antiochus and to have given them to E. Antiochus never had any possessions in India nor had any earlier king of Syria. He was obliged to give up only the countries on the side of Taurus toward Rome. No suggestion for the reading "India" in the narrative has met with acceptance (it may possibly have been a copyist's error for "Ionia"; see Livy xxvii.44). E. cultivated the Roman alliance carefully but became suspected in connection with the affairs of Perseus, the last king of Macedonia.

He never came to an open rupture with the Romans, and died in 159 BC, after a reign of 39 years.

EUNATAN, ù-ná'tan. See ENNATAN.

EUNICE, ù-ní'sē, ù'nīs (Εὐνίκη, Eunikē, is the correct reading, and not Εὐνίκη, Eunikē, which is read by the TR of Stephen, three syllables: Eu-ni-kē, lit. "conquering well"; 2 Tim 1 5): The mother of Timothy. Her name is Gr and this might lead to the inference that she was a Gentile by birth, but such a conclusion would be wrong, for we read in Acts 16 1 that she was a Jewess. Her husband however was a heathen Gr. She was in all probability a daughter of Lois, the grandmother of Timothy, for both of those Christian women are spoken of, in one breath, by Paul, and this in high terms of commendation.

Timothy had not been circumcised in childhood, probably because of his father's being a Gentile; but the mother and the grandmother

2. How She did all that lay in their power to train Timothy in the fear of God and in the knowledge of the Scriptures of the OT.

"From a child" Eunice had taught her boy to "know the holy scriptures" (2 Tim 3 15 AV). It is right therefore to connect this home training of Timothy in the fear of God, with his and his mother's conversion to the gospel. His name Timothy—chosen evidently not by the father, but by Eunice—signifies "one who fears God." The "wisdom" of the Hebrews consisted not in worldly prudence or in speculative philosophy, but in the fear of the Lord, as is shown in such passages as Ps 111 10, and in Job 28, and in Prov throughout. His name, as well as his careful home training, shows how he was prepared to give a welcome both to Paul and to the gospel proclaimed by him, when the apostle in his first great missionary journey came to Lystra, one of the cities of Lycaonia or Southern (?) Galatia, where Eunice and her family lived. This is implied in the account of Paul's second missionary journey (Acts 16 1), where we read that he came to Lystra, and found there a certain disciple named Timotheus, the son of a certain woman who was a Jewess, who believed.

It is therefore certain that Eunice and Timothy were not brought to a knowledge of the gospel at

3. Her Christians; she, "a believer"; he, "a disciple." This evidently means that to Christ Eunice, Lois and Timothy had been converted on Paul's former visit to Lystra. This conclusion is confirmed in 2 Tim 3 11, where Paul recalls to Timothy the fact that he had fully known the persecutions and afflictions which came to him at Lystra. The apostle repeats it, that Timothy knew what persecutions he then endured. Now this persecution occurred on Paul's first visit to that city. Eunice was therefore one of those who on that occasion became "disciples." And her faith in Christ, and her son's faith too, were genuine, and stood the test of the "much tribulation" of which Paul warned them (Acts 14 22 AV); and on Paul's next visit to Lystra, Eunice had the great joy and satisfaction of seeing how the apostle made choice of her son to be his companion in his missionary work. Eunice is not afterward mentioned in the NT; though it is a possible thing that there may be reference to her in what is said about widows and the children of widows in 1 Tim 5 4, 5.

JOHN RUTHERFURD

EUNUCH, ù'nuk (Εὐνοῦχος, ēunōchos; spūdōn, spūdōchos, eunotichos): Primarily and lit. a eunuch is an emasculated man (Dt 23 1). The Heb word šārīš seems, however, to have acquired a figurative meaning, which is reflected in EV where "officer" and "chamberlain" are found as renderings (cf Gen 37 36; 39 1, where š is applied to married men; Est 4 4). The barbarous practice of self-mutilation and the mutilation of others in this way was prevalent throughout the Orient. The religious disabilities under which men thus deformed labored under the Mosaic law had the effect of making the practice abominable to the Jews as a people (Dt 23 1; Lev 22 23-25). The law excluded eunuchs from public worship, partly because self-mutilation was often performed in honor of a heathen god, and partly because a maimed creature of any sort was deemed unfit for the service of Jeh (Lev 21 16 ff; 22 24). That ban, however, was later removed (Isa 56 4, 5). On the other hand, the kings of Israel and Judah followed their royal neighbors in employing eunuchs (1) as guardians of the harem (2 K 9 32; Jer 41 16), and (2) in military and other official posts (1 S 8 15 m; 1 K 22 9 m; 2 K 8 6 m; 23 11 AVm; 24 12, 13 m; 25 19 m; 1 Ch 28 1 m; 2 Ch 18 8 m; Jer 29 2; 34 19; 38 7; cf Gen 37 36; 40 2, 7; Acts 8 27). Jos informs us that eunuchs were a normal feature of the courts of the Herods (Ant, XV, vii, 4; XVI, viii, 1). From the single reference to the practice in the Gospels (Mt 19 12), we infer that the existence and purpose of eunuchs as a class were known to the Jews of Jesus' time. There is no question with Jesus as to the law of Nature: the married life is the norm of man's condition, and the union thereby effected transcends every other natural bond, even that of filial affection (Mt 19 5, 6). But He would have His hearers recognize that there are exceptional cases where the rule does not hold. In speaking of the three classes of eunuchs (ver 12), He made a distinction which was evidently well known to those whom He addressed, as was the metaphorical use of the word in application to the third class well understood by them (cf Lightfoot, Horae Heb et Talm; Schöttgen, Horae Heb, in loc.).

How Origen misunderstood and abused the teaching of this passage is well known (Euseb., HE, VI, 8), and his own pathetic comment on the passage shows that later he regretted having taken it thus lit. and acted on it. His is not the only example of such a perverted interpretation (see Talm. Shabbath 152a, and cf Midr on Eccl 10 7). The Council of Nicea, therefore, felt called on to deal with the danger as did the 2d Council of Arles and the Apos Canons (cir 21). (Of Bingham's Ant, IV, 9.)

It is significant that Jesus expresses no condemnation of this horrible practice. It was in keeping with His far-reaching plan of instilling principles rather than dealing in denunciations (Jn 3 17; 8 11). It was by His positive teaching concerning purity that we are shown the lines along which we must move to reach the goal. There is a more excellent way of achieving mastery of the sexual passion. It is possible for men to attain as complete control of this strong instinct as if they were physically sexless, and the resultant victory is of infinitely more value than the negative, unmoral condition produced by self-emasculation. These "make themselves eunuchs" with a high and holy purpose, "for the kingdom of heaven's sake"; and the interests created by that purpose are so absorbing that neither time nor opportunity is afforded to the "fleshly lusts, which war against the soul" (1 Pet 2 11). They voluntarily forego marriage even, undertake virtual "eunuchism" because they are completely immersed in and engrossed by "the kingdom of heaven" (cf Jn 17 4; 1 Cor 7 29, 33 f; 9 5 and see Bengel, Gnomon Novi Test, in loc. and Clem. Alex., Strom., iii, 1 ff). See MARRIAGE.

- EUODIA, ἠ-ὁ-δῖ-α (Ἠὸδία, Euodia, lit. "prosperous journey." The TR of Stephen reads Ἠ-ὁ-δῖ-α, Euodia, which means "fragrant,"

1. Women Prominent in Church at Philippi Phil 4 2. AV has transformed Euodia into Euodias, which is a man's name. The mistake is rectified in RV: A Christian woman, one of the members of the church in Philippi.

She and Syntyche, who is named in the same verse, were evidently persons of note, prominent in the work of the church there. At Philippi the gospel was first preached to women (Acts 16 13), and the church was first formed among women—evidently in the house of Lydia (vs 15.40). Paul here makes a request of Euodia and Syntyche. He requests—the word is never used of prayer from us to God—he asks, he beseeches Euodia, and then he repeats the word, he beseeches Syntyche, to be of the same mind in the Lord. Possibly, as Lightfoot suggests, they may have been deaconesses in the Philippian church, but whatever their position in this respect may have been, differences had arisen between them on some subject, we know not

2. The Difference Which Arose what. But whatever the subject in dispute was, it had become so serious that, instead of the breach being healed, matters had become chronic; and news regarding this lack of forbearance between Euodia and Syntyche had been carried to Paul in his captivity in Rome.

The state of Christian life in the church at Philippi gave Paul almost unmingled satisfaction. He regarded with joy their faith and steadfastness and liberality. There 3. Paul Entreats Them was no false teaching, no division, among them. The only thing which could cause him any uneasiness was the want of harmony between Euodia and Syntyche. He beseeches them to give up their differences, and to live at peace in the Lord. Such is the motive which he puts before them with a view to bring about their reconciliation; to live in dispute and enmity is not worthy of those who are "in the Lord," who have been redeemed by the Lord, and whose whole life should be an endeavor to please Him.

Paul proceeds to ask a certain person, unnamed, but whom he terms "true yokefellow," to assist them, that is, to assist Euodia and

4. The True Yoke-fellow Syntyche; for each of them, he says, "labored with me in the gospel." It is uncertain what is meant by "true yokefellow." He may refer to Epaphroditus, who carried the epistle from Rome to Philippi. Other names have been suggested—Luke, Silas, Timothy. It has been thought by some that Paul here refers to his own wife, or to Lydia. But such a suggestion is untenable, inasmuch as we know from his own words (1 Cor 7 8) that he was either unmarried or a widower. And the idea that the "true yokefellow" is Lydia, is equally wrong, because the word "true" is in the Gr masc. Another suggestion is that "yokefellow" is really a proper name—Syzygus. If so, then the apostle addresses Syzygus; or if this is not so, then he speaks to the unnamed "true yokefellow"; and what he says is that he asks him to help Euodia and Syntyche, inasmuch as their work in the gospel was no new thing. Far from this, when Paul brought the gospel to Philippi at the first, these two Christian women had been his loyal and earnest helpers in spreading the knowledge of Christ. How very

5. The Plea for Reconciliation sad then that any difference should exist between them; how sad that it should last so long! He asks Clement also, and all the other Christians at Philippi, his fellow-laborers, whose names, though not mentioned by the apostle, are nevertheless in the book of life, to assist Euodia and Syntyche; he asks them all to aid in this work of reconciliation. Doubtless he did not plead in vain. See SYNTYCHE; YOKEFELLOW. JOHN RUTHERFURD

EUPATOR, ἠ-πα-τορ (Ἠπάτορ, Eupátor, "of noble father"): The name given to Antiochus V who had succeeded his father Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), 164 BC, while still a child under the guardianship of Lysias (1 Macc 3 32; 6 17). In the absence of Philip, a friend and foster-brother of the child's father, whom on his deathbed he had appointed guardian for his son, Lysias continued his duty as guardian, set the king upon the throne and named him Eupator. Shortly after his accession he collected a large army and marched against Jerus, accompanied by Lysias, for the relief of a Syrian garrison that was hard pressed by Judas Maccabaeus (6 19 ff). Judas was repulsed at Bethzacharias and after a severe struggle Bethsura was captured (vs 31-50). The Jewish force in the temple was hard pressed and indeed reduced to the last extremity (ver 53), when Lysias, hearing that his rival Philip had returned from Persia and had made himself master of Antioch (Jos, Ant, XII, ix, 5 f), made a hasty peace and returned to meet Philip, whom he easily overpowered. In the following year (162 BC) Antiochus and Lysias were put to death by Demetrius Soter, son of Seleucus, in requital of wrongs inflicted upon himself by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc 7 2-4; 2 Macc 14 1.2; Jos, Ant, XII, x, 1). EUPHRATES, ἠ-φρά-της (Ἠφράτης, p'rāth; Ἠφράτης, Euphrátēs, "the good and abounding river"): The longest (1,780 miles) and most important stream of Western Asia, generally spoken of in the OT as "the river" (Ex 23 31; Dt 11 24). Its description naturally falls into 3 divisions—the upper, middle and lower. The upper division traverses the mountainous plateau of Armenia, and is formed by the junction of 2 branches, the Frat and the Murad. The Frat rises 25 miles N.E. of Erzerum, and only 60 miles from the Black Sea. The Murad, which, though the shorter, is the larger of the two, rises in the vicinity of Mt. Ararat. After running respectively 400 and 270 miles in a westerly direction, they unite near Keban Maaden, whence in a tortuous channel of about 300 miles, bearing still in a south-westerly direction, the current descends in a succession of rapids and cataracts to the Syrian plain, some distance above the ancient city of Carchemish, where it is only about 200 miles from the N.E. corner of the Mediterranean. In its course through the Armenian plateau, the stream has gathered the sediment which gives fertility to the soil in the lower part of the valley. It is the melting snows from this region which produce the annual floods from April to June.

The middle division, extending for about 700 miles to the bitumen wells of Hit, runs S.E. "through a valley of a few miles in width, which it has eroded in the rocky surface, and which, being more or less covered with alluvial soil, is pretty generally cultivated by artificial irrigation. . . . Beyond the rocky banks on both sides is the open desert, covered in spring with a luxuriant verdure, and dotted here and there with the black tent of the Bedouin" (Sir Henry Rawlinson). Throughout this portion the river formed the ancient boundary between the Assyrians and Hittites whose capital was at Carchemish, where there are the remains of an old bridge. The ruins of another ancient bridge occur 200 miles lower down at the ancient Thapsacus, where the Greeks forded it under Cyrus the younger. Throughout the middle section the stream is too rapid to permit of successful navigation except by small boats going downstream, and has few and insignificant tributaries. It here has, however, its greatest width (400 yds.) and depth. Lower down the water is drawn off by irrigating canals and into lagoons.

The fertile plain of Babylonia begins at Hit, about 100 miles above Babylon; 50 miles below Hit the Tigris and Euphrates approach to within 25 miles of each other, and together have in a late geological period deposited the plain of Shinar or of Chaldaea, more definitely referred to as Babylonia. This plain is about 250 miles long, and in its broadest place 100 miles wide. From Hit an artificial canal conducts water along the western edge of the alluvial plain to the Pers Gulf, a distance of about 500 miles. But the main irrigating canals put off from the E. side of the Euphrates, and can be traced all over the plain past the ruins of Accad, Babylon, Nippur, Bismya, Telloh, Erech, Ur and numerous other ancient cities.

Originally the Euphrates and Tigris entered into the Pers Gulf by separate channels. At that time the Gulf extended up as far as Ur, the home of Abraham, and it was a seaport. The sediment from these rivers has filled up the head of the Pers Gulf for nearly 100 miles since the earliest monumental records. Loftus estimates that since the Christian era the encroachment has proceeded at the rate of 1 mile in 70 years. In early times Babylonia was rendered fertile by immense irrigating schemes which diverted the water from the Euphrates, which at Babylon is running at a higher level than the Tigris. A large canal left the Euphrates just above Babylon and ran due E. to the Tigris, irrigating all the intervening region and sending a branch down as far S. as Nippur. Lower down a canal crosses the plain in an opposite direction. This ancient system of irrigation can be traced along the lines of the principal canals "by the winding curves of layers of alluvium in the bed" while the lateral channels "are hedged in by high banks of mud, heaped up during centuries of dredging. Not a hundredth part of the old irrigation system is now in working order. A few of the mouths of the smaller canals are kept open so as to receive a limited supply of water at the rise of the river in May, which then distributes itself over the lower lying lands in the interior, almost without labor on the part of the cultivators, giving birth in such localities to the most abundant crops; but by far the larger portion of the region between the rivers is at present an arid, howling wilderness, strewn in the most part with broken pottery, the evidence of former human habitation, and bearing nothing but the camel thorn, the wild caper, the colocynth-apple, wormwood and the other weeds of the desert" (Rawlinson). According to Sir W. Willcocks, the eminent Eng. engineer, the whole region is capable of being restored to its original productiveness by simply reproducing the ancient system of irrigation. There are, however, in the lower part of the region, vast marshes overgrown with reeds, which have continued since the time of Alexander who came near losing his army in passing through them. These areas are probably too much depressed to be capable of drainage. Below the junction of the Euphrates and the Tigris, the stream is called Shat el Arab, and is deep enough to float war vessels.

(Ἀκκός, Akkós; Neh 3 4.21, etc); was one of the two deputies sent by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc 8 17; 2 Macc 4 11) to Rome cir 161 BC to ask the help of the Romans against Demetrius. A critical estimate of the narrative (1 Macc 8 and Jos, Ant., XII, x, 6) of the first meeting of the representatives of the Jewish nation and the Romans will be found in Stanley, Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, III, 350 ff, where it is admitted that "inaccuracies of detail only confirm the general faithfulness of the impression." Keil (Comm., 14) further remarks on this point: "that the author of 1 Macc wrote from twenty to twenty-five years after the destruction of Corinth (146 BC) by the Romans; and that the Jews of Pal were not accurately informed concerning the wars of the Romans with the Greeks." E. has been identified with the historian of the same name quoted by Eusebius (Praep. Ev., IX, 17 ff); but there is no evidence that the historian was of Jewish origin. J. HUTCHISON

EURAQUILLO, ū-rak'wi-lō (RV εὐρακύλων, eura-kúlōn; AV εὐροκλύδων, eurolklúdōn; AV Euroclydon, ū-rok'li-don): The east or northeast wind which drove Paul's ship to shipwreck at Melita (Acts 27 14). The term seems to have been the sailor's term for that particular wind, and Paul uses the word which was used by them on that occasion. The difference in the text is explained by the fact that the term was not in general use and was therefore subject to being changed. The precise name is doubtful, but the Eurakillo is more easily explained as a compound of Gr euros, "east wind," and Lat aquilo, "northeast wind," hence eurakillo, "east northeast wind." This agrees with the experience of navigators in those waters. For a summary of the various readings see Sanday, Appendices ad NT, 140. Full discussion of the circumstances are given in the Lives of Paul by various writers.

EUTYCHUS, ū'ti-kus (Εὐτυχος, Eútuchos, "fortunate"): The story of Eutychus occurs in the "we" section of Acts, and is therefore related by an eyewitness of the incidents (Acts 20 7-12). On the first day of the week the Christians of Troas had met for an evening service in an upper chamber, and were joined by Paul and his company. As he was to leave in the morning, Paul "prolonged his speech until midnight." A youth named Eutychus, who was sitting at the open window, became borne down with sleep owing to the lateness of the hour, and ultimately fell through the opening from the third story. He "was taken up dead." This direct statement is evaded by De Wette and Olshausen, who translate "for dead." Meyer says this expresses the judgment of those who took him up. However, Luke, the physician, is giving his verdict, and he plainly believes that a miracle was wrought by Paul in restoring a corpse to life. The intention of Luke in relating this incident is to relate a miracle. Paul went down and embraced the youth while comforting the lamenting crowd, "Make ye no ado; for his life is in him." The interrupted meeting was resumed, the bread was broken, and the conversation continued till break of day. "And they brought the lad alive, and were not a little comforted."

EVANGELIST, ē-van'jel-ist: This is a form of the word ordinarily tr^d "gospel" (εὐαγγέλιον, euaggélion), except that here it designates one who announces that gospel to others (εὐαγγελιστής, euaggelistēs, "a bringer of good tidings"), lit. God Himself is an evangelist, for He "preached the gospel beforehand unto Abraham" (Gal 3 8); Jesus Christ was an evangelist, for He also "preached the gospel" (Lk 20 1); Paul was an evangelist as well as an apostle (Rom 1 15); Philip the deacon was an evangelist (Acts 21 8); and Timothy, the pastor (2 Tim 4 5); and indeed all the early disciples who, on being driven out of Jerus, "went everywhere preaching the word" (Acts 8 4 AV).

But Eph 4 11 teaches that one particular order of the ministry, distinguished from every other, is singled out by the Head of the church for this work in a distinctive sense. All may possess the gift of an evangelist in a measure, and be obligated to exercise its privilege and duty, but some are specially endowed with it. "He gave some to be apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers."

It will be seen that as an order in the ministry, the evangelist precedes that of the pastor and teacher, a fact which harmonizes with the character of the work each is still recognized as doing. The evangelist has no fixed place of residence, but moves about in different localities, preaching the gospel to those ignorant of it before. As these are converted and united to Jesus Christ by faith, the work of the pastor and teacher begins, to instruct them further in the things of Christ and build them up in the faith.

At a later time, the name of "evangelist" was given the writers of the four Gospels because they tell the story of the gospel and because the effect of their promulgation at the beginning was very much like the work of the preaching evangelist. In character, the Gospels bear something of the same relation to the Epistles as evangelists bear to pastors and teachers.

EVE, ēv, IN THE OT (חַוָּה, ḥawwāh, "life"; Ḕā, Eua; the name given, as the Scripture writer says, Gen 3 20 [Zōh, Zōh], from her unique function as "the mother of all living"): The first created woman; created secondarily from Adam (or man) as a "help meet for him" (2 18-22), and later named and designated as the mother of the human race.

For the literary type and object of the story of Eve, see under ADAM, I, 2.

Two names are given to her, both bestowed by the man, her mate. The first, חַוָּה, 'ishshāh, "woman" (lit. "man-ess"), is not strictly

1. The Names Given to Her a name but a generic designation, referring to her relation to the man; a relation she was created to fulfil in default of any true companionship between man and the beasts, and represented as intimate and sacred beyond that between child and parents (2 18-24). The second, Eve, or "life," given after the transgression and its prophesied results, refers to her function and destiny in the spiritual history or evolution of which she is the beginning (3 16, 20). While the names are represented as bestowed by the man, the remarks in 2 24 and 3 20b may be read as the interpretative addition of the writer, suited to the exposition which it is the object of his story to make.

As mentioned in the art. ADAM, the distinction of male and female, which the human species has in common with the animals, is given in

2. Her Relation to Man the general (or P) account of creation (1 27); and then, in the more particularized (or J) account of the creation of man, the human being is described at a point before the distinction of sex existed. This second account may have a different origin, but it has also a different object, which does not conflict with but rather supplements the other. It aims to give the spiritual meanings that inhere in man's being; and in this the relation of sex plays an elemental part. As spiritually related to the man-nature, the woman-nature is described as derivative, the helper rather than the initiator, yet equal, and supplying perfectly the man's social and affectional needs. It is the writer's conception of the essential meaning of mating and marriage. To bring out its spiritual values more clearly he takes the pair before they are aware of the species meanings of sex or family, while they are "naked" yet "not ashamed" (2 25), and portrays them purely as companions, individual in traits and tendencies, yet answering to each other. She is the helpmeet for him ('ezer k'negdō, "a help answering to him").

True to her nature as the being relatively acted upon rather than acting, she is quicker than the man to respond to the suggestion ini-

3. Her Part in the Change of Condition tiated by the serpent and to follow it out to its desirable results. There is eagerness of desire in her act of taking the fruit quite different from the quasi matter-of-course attitude of the man.

To her the venture presents itself wholly from the alluring side, while to him it is more like taking a desperate risk, as he detaches himself even from the will of God in order to cleave to her. All this is delicately true to the distinctive feminine and masculine natures. A part of her penalty is henceforth to be the subordinated one of the pair (3 16), as if for her the values of life were to be mediated through him. At the same time it is accorded to her seed to perpetuate the mortal antipathy to the serpent, and finally to bruise the serpent's head (ver 15).

After these opening chapters of Gen, Eve is not once mentioned, nor even specifically alluded to, in the canonical books of the OT. It was

4. In Subsequent History not in the natural scope of OT history and doctrine, which were concerned with Abraham's descendants, to go back to so remote origins as are narrated in the story of the first pair. The name Eve occurs once in the Apoc, in the prayer of Tobit (Tob 8 6): "Thou madest Adam, and gavest him Eve his wife for a helper and a stay; of them came the seed of men"; the text then going on to quote Gen 2 18. In 1 Eed 4 20, 21 there is a free quotation, or rather paraphrase, of Gen 2 24. But not even in the somber complaints of 2 Eed concerning the woe that Adam's transgression brought upon the race (see under ADAM IN OT, III, 2) is there any hint of Eve's part in the matter.

JOHN FRANKLIN GENUNG

EVE IN THE NT (Ḕā, Eua; WH, Ḕā, Heia): "Eve" occurs twice in the NT and both references are in the Pauline writings. In 1 Tim 2 12-14 woman's place in teaching is the subject of discussion, and the writer declares that she is a learner and not a teacher, that she is to be in quietness and not to have dominion over a man. Paul elsewhere expressed this same idea (see 1 Cor 14 34, 35). Having stated his position in regard to woman's place, he used the Gen account of the relation of the first woman to man to substantiate his teaching. Paul used this account to illustrate woman's inferiority to man, and he undoubtedly accepted it at its face value without any question as to its historicity. He argued that woman is inferior in position, for "Adam was first formed, then Eve." She is inferior in character, for "Adam was not beguiled, but the woman being beguiled hath fallen into transgression." See CHILD-BEARING. In 2 Cor 11 3, Paul is urging loyalty to Christ, and he uses the temptation of Eve to illustrate the ease with which one is corrupted. Paul seems to have had no thought but that the account of the serpent's beguiling Eve should be taken literally.

EVE, GOSPEL OF: A gnostic doctrinal treatise mentioned by Epiphanius (Haer., xxvi.2 ff) in which Jesus is represented as saying in a loud voice,

"I am thou, and thou art I, and wherever thou art there am I, and in all things I am sown. And from whencesoever thou gatherest me, in gathering me thou gatherest thyself." See LOGIA; and cf Ropes, Die Sprüche Jesu, 56.

EVEN, ʿv'n, EVENING, ʿv'ning, EVENTIDE, ʿv'n-tid' ('even,' 'evening,' עֶרֶב, 'erebh; ὥψια, opσία, ὥψι, opse; vide Thayer s.v.): The words are used in slightly different meanings: (1) The time of sunset, the beginning of the Heb day, as in Lev 15, where directions are given for the removal of uncleanness, which took place at sunset. (2) Twilight, the time of approaching darkness when lamps are lighted; Ex 30 8 (lit. "between the two evenings"); Jer 6 4 ("the shadows of the evening"). (3) The early part of the night (Prov 7 9; Ezk 12 7). The Gr opse is lit. "late" (Mk 11 19). The Gr hespéra, refers evidently to sunset, in Lk 24 29. "Eventide," עֶרֶב לַיְלָה, 'elh'erebh, "time of evening" (2 S 11 2; Isa 17 14). "Evening," used in connection with wolves (Jer 5 6; Zeph 3 3), is from the Heb עֶרְבָּה, 'arābhāh, which may mean "darkness" or "dark cloud," but more probably "plain" or "desert."

H. PORTER

EVENINGS, BETWEEN THE: The time of day (RV reads "at even," m "between the two evenings") when the Passover lamb was slain (Ex 12 6; Nu 9 3), or the offering made of the evening portion of the continual burnt offering (Nu 28 4). See preceding article.

EVENT, ʿ-vent': In Eccl 2 14; 9 2,3, the tr of מִקְרֵה, mikreh, "what happens," "lot," "fate." The Eng. word bore this sense at the time of AV. The meaning of "result," "outcome" (ἐκβάσεις, ekbáseis), attaches to it in Wisd 8 8, "events of seasons," RV "issues."

EVERLASTING, ʿv-ʿr-last'ing (עוֹלָם, 'olām, עָד, 'adh; αἰῶνος, aiōnos, αἰώνιος, aiōnios): "Everlasting," in strictness, is that which endures forever; either that which has no beginning and will have no end (in which sense it is applicable to God only), or that which, having a beginning, will have no end, but henceforth will exist forever (thus of beings created for immortality; see IMMORTALITY). Figuratively also the term is applied to objects of impressive stability and long duration, as mountains, hills (e.g. Gen 49 26; Hab 3 6).

Of the terms indicated as rendered by this word, 'olām in the OT and aiōnios in the NT, lit. "age-long," generally bear the full sense of "eternal" (always as applied to God, His mercy, His covenant, His kingdom and to the eternal life of believers). Hence in RV the rendering "everlasting" in AV is, in the NT, uniformly changed to "eternal" (e.g. Mt 18 8; 25 41,46; Lk 16 9; 18 30; Jn 3 16,36, etc.; Acts 13 46; Rom 6 22; 16 26; Gal 6 8; He 13 20). In the OT the rendering "everlasting" is usually retained in RV, and sometimes takes the place of other words or phrases, as "lasting" (Dt 33 15), "ever," "forever" (1 Ch 16 36; Neh 9 5), "perpetual" (Hab 3 6; Jer 50 5), "of old" (Hab 3 6 m). In Ps 100 5; 119 144, on the other hand, RV changes the word to "for ever." In much the larger number of places 'olām is tr'd "ever" or "for ever."

The word 'adh, in the two cases in which it is tr'd "everlasting" in AV (more frequently "for ever"), is in RV, in Isa 9 6, retained, with m, "Father of Eternity," and in Hab 3 6 is changed into "eternal." Another word, kedhem, with the meaning "ancient time," is rendered "everlasting" in Hab 1 12 ("Art not thou from everlasting?"). With the same meaning it occurs in Dt 33 27, "The eternal God is thy dwelling-place."

The word which strictly answers to "everlasting" in the NT is aiōnios (Rom 1 20; Jude ver 6), rendered by AV in the former passages "eternal," but correctly by RV in both passages, "everlasting." The sense of the word "everlasting," in application to future punishment, is considered in art. PUNISHMENT, EVERLASTING.

The term "everlasting" or "eternal," applied to God, describes Him as filling, or enduring through, all the "ages" of time. It is only thus that we can symbolically represent eternity. In reality, however, the eternity of God is not simply His filling of ever-flowing "ages," but rather that aspect of His being in which He is above time; for which time (the succession-form of existence) does not exist; to which the terms past, present and future do not apply. Yet, while God is not in time (rather holds time in Himself), time-sequence, as the form of existence of the world, is a reality for God. See ETERNAL; ETERNITY.

EVI, ʿvī (עֵי, 'ēvī, "desire"; Εὐει, Euei): One of the five kings, or chiefs of the Midianites, slain by Israel during their sojourn in the plains of Moab (Nu 31 8; Josh 13 21).

EVIDENCE, ev'i-dens, EVIDENT, EVIDENTLY, ev'i-dent-li (ἔργον, ērgon; ἀντὶς, antis, ἀντὶς, phanerōs): In Jer 32 10,11,12,14,16,44, ēphē, "a writing," is tr'd (AV) "evidence" (of the purchase of the field in Anathoth), RV "deed"; "evidence" is also the tr of elegchos, "conviction," in AV of He 11 1, "Now faith is . . . the evidence of things not seen." ERV "proving," m "or test," better, as ARV, "conviction," m "or test." The Gr word denotes "putting to the test," examining for the purpose of proof, bringing to conviction (Dr. W. F. Moulton). Thus if "test" or "proving" be adopted, a firm conviction of the reality of things not seen is implied as the result of putting to the proof. Trench remarks (NT Synonyms), "in juristic Gr elegchein is not merely to reply to, but to refute, an opponent." Hence the Vulg tr argumentum, followed by Wyclif and Rheims version; Tyndale and Cranmer have "certainty." (The sense of "conviction" appears in Jn 8 46, "Which of you convinceth [elegchet, RV "convicteth"] me of sin?"; 3 20, "reproved," RVm "convicted"; 16 8 AV "He will reprove the world of sin," RV "convict." Cf 1 Cor 14 24.) "Evident" is the tr of 'al pānim ("on the face") in Job 6 23, AV "Look upon me; for it is evident unto you if I lie," m "Heb before your face," RV "to your face," m "And it will be evident unto you if I lie," which is, perhaps, to be preferred to the text; dēlos, "manifest," is tr'd "evident" (Gal 3 11); katādēlos, "very manifest," is in He 7 15, AV "far more evident," RV "more abundantly evident"; prōdēlos, "manifest before-hand" (7 14), "evident." "Evidently" occurs only in Acts 10 3, as the tr of phanerōs, "openly," "manifestly," RV "openly."

It is important to note the true nature of faith according to the correct tr of He 11 1, as being the well-grounded and assured conviction of things not seen.

EVIL, ʿvīl, ʿvil (עָו, ra; πονηρός, ponērōs, κακός, kakós, κακόν, kakón): In the Bible it is represented as moral and physical. We choose to discuss the subject under these heads. Many of the evils that come upon men have not been intended by those who suffer for them. Disease, individual and national calamity, drouth, scarcity of food, may not always be charged to the account of intentional wrong. Many times the innocent suffer with, and even for, the guilty. In such cases, only physical evil is apparent. Even when the suffering has been occasioned by sin or dereliction of duty, whether the wrong is active or passive, many, perhaps the majority of those who are injured, are not accountable in any way for the ills which come upon them. Neither is God the author of moral evil. "God cannot be tempted with evil, and he himself tempteth no man" (Jas 1 13). See TEMPTATION.

By this term we refer to wrongs done to our fellow-man, where the actor is responsible for the action.

The immorality may be present when the action is not possible. "But if Evil that evil servant shall say in his heart"

(Mt 24 48.49), whether he shall smite his fellow-servants or not, the moral evil is present. See SIN. "All these evil things proceed from within, and defile the man" (Mk 7 21-23). The last six commandments of the Decalogue apply here (Ex 20 12-17). To dishonor one's parents, to kill, to commit adultery, to steal, to bear false witness and to covet are moral evils. The spiritual import of these commandments will be found in Mt 5 21. 22.27.28. "But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness" (6 23). Words and deeds are coined in the heart before the world sees or hears them (12 34.35). The word ought or its equal may be found in all languages; hence it is in the mind of all people as well as in our laws that for the deeds and words we do and speak, we are responsible. "Break off thy sins by righteousness" (Dnl 4 27) shows that, in God's thought, it was man's duty, and therefore within his power, to keep the commandment. "Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well" (Isa 1 16 f). We cannot think of God commanding men to do what He knew they had no ability to do! God has a standing offer of pardon to all men who turn from their evil ways and do that which is right (Ezk 33 11-14 f). Evil begins in the least objectionable things. In Rom 1 18-23, we have Paul's view of the falling away of the Gentiles. "Knowing God" (ver 21), they were "without excuse" (ver 20), but "glorified him not as God, neither gave thanks; but became vain in their reasonings, and their senseless heart was darkened" (ver 21). "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools" (ver 22). This led the way into idolatry, and that was followed by all the corruption and wrongdoing to be instigated by a heart turned away from all purity, and practised in all the iniquity to be suggested by lust without control. Paul gives fifteen steps in the ladder on which men descend into darkness and ruin (Gal 5 19-21). When men become evil in themselves, they necessarily become evil in thought and deed toward others. This they bring upon themselves, or give way to, till God shall give "them up unto a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not fitting" (Rom 1 28). Those thus fallen into habits of error, we should in meekness correct, that "they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, having been taken captive by him unto his will" (2 Tim 2 25.26).

Usually, in the OT the Heb word ra' is employed to denote that which is bad. Many times the bad is physical; it may have been occasioned by the sins for which the people Evil of the nation were responsible, or it may have come, not as a retribution, but from accident or mismanagement or causes unknown. Very many times the evil is a corrective, to cause men to forsake the wrong and accept the right. The flood was sent upon the earth because "all flesh had corrupted their way" (Gen 6 12). This evil was to serve as a warning to those who were to live after. The ground had already been cursed for the good of Cain (4 12). Two purposes seemed to direct the treatment: (1) to leave in the minds of Cain and his descendants the knowledge that sin brings punishment, and (2) to increase the toil that would make them a better people. God overthrew Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboim, cities of the plain, making them "an example unto those that should live ungodly" (2 Pet 2 6). In the Book of Isa the prophet, we find a number of "burdens": the burden of Babylon (13 1-22); the burden of Moab (15 1-9); the burden of Damascus (17 1-14); the burden of Egypt (19 1-17); the burden of the Wilderness of the Sea (21 1-10); the burden of Dumah (vs 11.12); the burden upon Arabia (vs 13-17); the burden of the Valley of Vision (22 1-25); the burden of Tyre (23 1-18); the burden of the Beasts of the South (30 6-14); the burden of the Weary Beast (46 1.2). These may serve as an introduction to the story of wrongdoing and physical suffering threatened and executed. Isa contains many denunciations against Israel: against the Ten Tribes for following the sin introduced by Jeroboam the son of Nebat; and the threatening against Judah and Benjamin for not heeding the warnings. Jeremiah saw the woes that were sure to come upon Judah; for declaring them, he was shut up in prison, and yet they came, and the people were carried away into Babylon. These were the evils or afflictions brought upon the nations for their persistence in sin. "I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil; I am Jeh, that doeth all these things" (Isa 45 7). These chastisements seemed grievous, and yet they yielded peaceable fruit unto them that were exercised thereby (He 12 11).

EVIL-DOERS, ḥ-v'l-dōō'ēr (מַעֲשֵׂי רָע, m'ē'īm; from רָע, rā'a'; κακοποιός, kakopoiós, always pl.): Malefactors or offenders of God's law. Used generally of the ungodly, as, "Fret not thyself because of e." (Ps 37 1). Sometimes also of personal offenders: "He hath delivered the soul of the needy from the hand of e." (Jer 20 13).

EVIL EYE (רַע אֵינָה, ra' 'āyin, "evil of eye"; ὀφθαλμὸς πονηρός, ophthalmós ponērós): The superstition of the influence of the "evil eye," so widely spread over the earth, has had a mighty influence on life and language in Pal, though direct references to it are not frequent in the Scriptures (Dt 15 9; 28 54.56; Prov 23 6; 28 22; Mt 20 15 [cf Mt 6 23; Lk 11 34]; Mk 7 22). In the Bible the expression is synonymous with envy, jealousy and some forms of covetousness. In comparing Rom 1 29 with Mk 7 22 we find that ophthalmós ponērós corresponds to φθόνος, phthónos. See Trench, NT Synonyms, s.v. The eye of the envious (as also the tongue of the invidious by an apparently appreciative word, which, however, only disguises the strong desire of possessing the object of comment or of destroying it for its rightful owner) was supposed to have a baneful influence upon the well-being of others, esp. of children. Therefore mothers bestowed constant care against the frustration of such fancied designs by means of innumerable sorts of charms. They often allowed their darlings to appear as unlovely as possible, through uncleanness or rags, so as to spare them the harmful rising of envy in the hearts of others. Lane, Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians, gives perhaps the most accessible account of this superstition as held at the present day in Egypt, and Thomson, The Land and the Book, does the same for Pal, while an equal amount of evidence might be collected from every other oriental country. Instances of the same superstition, though possibly slightly disguised, are by no means wanting among ourselves. Cf the expression, "green-eyed jealousy" (Othello, III, iii; Merchant of Venice, III, ii), etc.

LITERATURE.—F. T. Elworthy, The Evil Eye, London, 1895.

EVIL-FAVOREDNESS, ē-vī-fā'vēr-d-nēs: The word is the tr of the Heb עֵבֶר רָא', dābhār ra', lit. "evil thing," and refers to the ritual unfitness for sacrifice of any animal which, though included in the class of clean beasts, yet possesses a blemish (see the word), or otherwise lacks beauty of symmetry, or is lean-fleshed (Dt 17 1 AV; cf "ill blemish," Dt 15 21). We find these conditions combined in Gen 41 3,4,19,20,21,27, where the seven "ill-favored and lean-fleshed" kine of Pharaoh's dream are mentioned.

EVIL-MERODACH, ē-vil-me-rō'dak; -mer'ō-dak (עֵבֶר מְרֹדַח, 'ēvil m-rōdhakh; LXX Εὐερίμαρδοάκ, Eueialmarōdēk; so B in K, but B in Jer, and A and Q in both places much corrupted): The name of the son and immediate successor of Nebuchadnezzar II, king of Babylon. The Bab form of the name is Amelu-Marduk, that is, "man of Marduk." About 30 contract tablets dated in this reign have been found. They show that Evilmerodach reigned for two years and about five months. He is said by Berosus to have conducted his government in an illegal and improper manner, and to have been slain by his sister's brother, Nergal-shar-usur, who then reigned in his stead. Evilmerodach is said in 2 K 25 27-30 and in the || passage in Jer 52 31-34 to have taken Jehoiachin, king of Judah, from his prison in Babylon, where he seems to have been confined for 37 years, to have clothed him with new garments, to have given him a seat above all the other kings, and to have allowed him to eat at the king's table all the days of his life. It is an undesigned coincidence, that may be worthy of mention, that the first dated tablet from this reign was written on the 26th of Elul, and Jer 52 31 says that Jehoiachin was freed from prison on the 25th of the same month. R. DICK WILSON

EVIL ONE (ὁ πονηρός, ho ponērós): Nearly all peoples who have expressed their religious thought and feeling believe in a spirit that presides over the destinies of men for their good. They believe that there is also a spirit, a person, whose work it is to lead men into temptation: a spirit of light and a spirit of darkness. Feelings and preferences may have much to do with the conclusions. In Mt 5 37,39,45; 6 13, AV gives "evil," RV "the evil one," m "evil," the personal form referring to the enemy of the race known by various terms: Satan, "the adversary" or "the accuser," occurs 50 t; Beelzebub is found 7 t; devil, 35 t; it means "accuser," "calumniator." See SATAN.

EVIL-SPEAKING, ē-vī-spēk'ing: Occurs twice in EV: (1) 1 Pet 2 1 it is the tr of καταλαλιά, katalaliá, "a speaking against," rendered "backbiting" in 2 Cor 12 20; cf kátallalos, "backbiter" (Rom 1 30); the vb. katalaléō is rendered to "speak against" (1 Pet 2 12; Jas 4 11; 1 Pet 3 16); (2) of βλασφημία, blasphēmía, "what is hurtful to the good name of anyone," "detraction," "slander" (Eph 4 31 RV, "railing"; cf 1 Tim 6 4; Jude ver 9; Col 3 8); the vb. blaspheméō is rendered to "speak evil of" (Rom 14 16; 1 Cor 10 30; Tit 3 2, etc); to "speak evil" occurs in Mk 9 39 as the tr of kakologéō, "lightly [RV "quickly"] speak evil of me"; Acts 19 9 AV "spoke evil of that way." In Ps 140 11, we have "evil-speaker" as the tr of 'ish lāshōn, "a man of tongue"; so RV. The wrong thing condemned as evil-speaking seems to be essentially detraction, what is hurtful to the reputation, and it is often too lightly regarded even among Christians. See BLASPHEMY; RAILING; SLANDER.

EVIL SPIRIT. See DEMON; DEMONIAIC; COMMUNION WITH DEMONS; SATAN.

EVIL THING (τὸ κακόν, tó kakón, pl. in Lk 16 25): An evil thing or evil things may be the thoughts of evil men, their plans or their deeds; or the things men suffer for their own wrongs; or the evils consequent upon the errors of others. In the dark picture of fallen men in Rom 1 30, "inventors of evil things" appear. "The evil man out of his evil treasure bringeth forth evil [ponērós] things" (Mt 12 35). Men should not lust after evil (kakós) things (1 Cor 10 6). This fixing the mind upon, with desire, leads to increased wrong. "The mouth of the wicked poureth out evil [ra'] things" (Prov 15 28). The rich man had good things in his life, but did not use them to the glory of God or the good of men. The poor man had evil things: sickness, nakedness, hunger. The scene changes after death (Lk 16 25).

DAVID ROBERTS DUNGAN
EVOLUTION, ev-ō-lū'shun: Evolution is a scientific and philosophical theory designed to explain the origin and course of all things 1. The Idea in the universe. By origin, however, of Evolution is not understood the production or emergence of the substance and of the cause or causes of things, but that of the forms in which they appear to the observer. Sometimes the term is vaguely used to cover absolute origin in the sense just excluded. A moment's reflection will make it clear that such a view can never secure a place in the realm of pure science. The problem of ultimate origin is not one that science can solve. If it is solved at all, it must be by purely philosophical as distinguished from scientific or scientific-philosophical methods. Evolution, therefore, must be viewed in science purely and strictly as a process of orderly change in the form of things. As such it assumes the existence of substance or substances and of a force or forces working its successive transformations.¹

As an orderly change of the form of things, evolution may be viewed as operative in the field of inorganic matter, or in that of life. In the first, it is known and called cosmic evolution; in the second, organic evolution. Of cosmic evolution again there appear two aspects, according as the process, or law of transformation, is observed to operate in the realm of the lower units of matter (atoms and molecules), or is studied in the region of the great. In the first sphere, it is made to account for the emergence in Nature of the qualities and powers of different kinds of matter called elements. In the second, it explains the grouping together, the movements and transformations of the solar and of stellar systems. Similarly, of organic evolution there appear to be two varieties. The first occurs in the world of life including the vegetable and animal kingdoms. Evolution here accounts for the various forms of living beings building their bodies and passing from one stage to another in their existence as individuals, and for the course of the history of all life as it differentiates into species and genera. The second variety of evolution operates in the higher realm of intelligence, morality, social activity and religion.

The idea of a law of orderly change governing all things is not a new one. Historians of science find it in some form or other embodied in the philosophies of Heraclitus, Democritus, Lucretius and Aristotle. There are those who find it

2. Recent also in the system of Gautama (Buddha). But in none of these was there a sufficiently wide basis of fact inductively brought together, or a thorough enough digestion and assimilation of the material to give the view as presented by them a firm standing. Hegel's idealistic theory of Development is kindred to the evolution theory in its essence; but it too antedates the working out of the system upon the basis of the scientific induction of the phenomena of Nature.

Until the time of Herbert Spencer, the scientific use of the word evolution was limited to the narrow department of embryology. By him, the term was made synonymous with all orderly change in Nature. The notion that such change is the result of chance, however, was not a part of Spencer's teaching. On the contrary, that philosopher held that chance is but the expression of laws undiscerned by the human mind. Yet these laws are just as definite and rigid as those already discovered and formulated.

Since the appearance of the inductive method in scientific research, and the rise of the science of biology in particular, the idea of evolution has been elaborated into a great systematic generalization, and proposed as the philosophy of all perceptible phenomena. Beginning as a working hypothesis in a special narrow department, that of biology, it has been extended into all the sciences until all come under its dominance, and it is viewed no longer as a mere working hypothesis, but as a demonstrated philosophy with the force and certainty of fact.

It was natural that such an important proposition as the explanation of the present form of the whole universe by the theory of evolution should in its course have occasioned much controversy. On one

3. Evolution lution should in its course have occasioned much controversy. On one Bib- lical Truth side extravagant claims were bound to be put forth in its behalf, combined with a misconception of its field. On the other a stubborn denial of its sufficiency as an explanation, even in the narrow sphere where it first made its appearance, was destined to confront it. This challenge, too, was the result of the misconception of it as an all-sufficient theory of the universe as distinguished from a law or method of the operation of a cause ulterior and superior to itself. The period of this warfare is now nearly, if not altogether, over. The task which remains to be accomplished is to recognize the bearings of the theory on forms of thought arrived at apart from the light thrown on the world by itself.

Since such forms of thought are given in the Bible, certain problems arise which must be solved, if possible, in the light of evolution. These problems concern mainly the following topics: (1) The belief in a personal God, such as the Christian Scriptures present as an object of revelation; (2) The origin of the different species of living beings as portrayed in the Book of Gen; (3) The particular origin of the human species (the descent [ascend] of man); (4) The origin of morality and religion, and (5) The essential doctrines of the Christian faith, such as supernatural revelation, the idea of sin, the person of Christ, regeneration and immortality. Beyond the answers to these primary questions, it will be neither possible nor profitable to enter within the brief compass of the present article.

The relation of creation to evolution has been already suggested in the introductory explanation of the nature of evolution. If creation be the act of bringing into existence material or substance which did not previously exist, evolution does not touch the problem. It has nothing to say of a First Cause. The idea of a first cause may be regarded

4. Evolution and Creation as material for metaphysics or the ground of religious belief. It may be speculated about, or it may be assumed by faith. The theory of evolution begins with matter or substance already in existence. A fairly representative statement of this aspect of it is illustrated by Huxley's dictum, "The whole world living and not living is the result of the mutual attraction according to definite laws of the powers possessed by the molecules of which the primitive nebulosity of the universe was composed" (Life of Darwin, II, 210). This statement leaves two things unaccounted for, namely, molecules in the form of a "primitive nebulosity" and "powers possessed by these molecules." How did primitive nebulosity come to exist? How did it come to be composed of molecules possessed of certain powers, and how did there come to be definite laws governing these molecules? The agnostic answers, "We do not know, we shall not know" (ignoramus, ignorabimus, DuBois-Reymond). The pantheist says, "They are the substance and attributes of the Ultimate Being." The theist posits "an uncaused Cause who is greater than they, and possesses all the potentialities exhibited in them, together with much more (therefore at least a personal being), has brought them into existence by the power of His will" (cf. EPICUREANS).

Thus the believer in evolution may be an agnostic, a pantheist or a theist, according to his attitude toward, and answer to, the question of beginnings. He is an evolutionist because he believes in evolution as the method of the transformation of molecules under the control of the powers possessed by them. Conversely the theist (and by implication the Christian) may be an evolutionist. As an evolutionist he may be thoroughgoing. He may accept evolution either as a working hypothesis or as a well-established generalization, even in the form in which it is defined by Herbert Spencer: the integration of matter out of an indefinite incoherent homogeneity into definite coherent heterogeneity with concomitant dissipation of energy. (For the exact definition in its full length, see First Principles, 367.) In this definition, as in every other form of it, evolution is the name of a process of transformation, not a theory of absolute causation or creation ex nihilo. The human mind may leave the problem of initial creation uninvestigated; it may assume that there is no problem by regarding matter and energy as uncaused and ultimate realities or phases of one reality; or it may trace these back to a First Cause which has at least the powers and characteristics perceptible in the universe and particularly in itself as mind (i.e. individuality, intelligence and freedom), or in other words, to a personal God. In any of these contingencies it may hold to the theory of evolution.

Evolution is strongest in the realm of life. It is here that it first achieved its most signal conquests; and it is here that it was first antagonized most forcibly by the champions of religious faith. Here it proved irresistibly fascinating because it broke down the barriers supposed to exist between different species (whether minor or major) of life. It showed the unity and solidarity of the entire living universe with all its infinite variety. It reduced the life-process to one general law and movement. It traced back all present different forms, whether recognized as individuals, varieties, species, genera, families or kingdoms, to a single starting-point. In this realm the adjective "organic" has been prefixed to it, because the characteristic result is secured through organisation. One of its most enthusiastic supporters defines it as "progressive change according to certain laws and by means of resident forces" (LeConte).

5. Evolution and the Origin of Species

The proof for organic evolution is manifold. It cannot be given here at any length. Its main lines, however, may be indicated as follows: (1) The existence of gradations of structure in living forms beginning with the simplest (the amoeba usually furnishes the best illustration) and reaching to some of the most complex organisms (the human body). (2) The succession of living forms in time. This means that, according to the evidence furnished by geology, the simpler organisms appeared earlier on the face of the earth than the more complex, and that the progress of forms has been in general from the simpler to the more complex. (3) The parallelism between the order thus discovered in the history of life upon earth and the order observed in the transformations of the embryo of the highest living forms from their first individual appearance to their full development. (4) The existence of rudimentary members and organs in the higher forms.

The most striking of these proofs of evolution are the two commonly designated the paleontological and the ontogenetic. The first is based on the fact that in the strata of the earth the simpler forms have been deposited in the earlier, and the more complex in the later. This fact points to the growth in the history of the earth of the later, more complex forms of life, from earlier simpler ones. The second consists in the observation that each individual of complexly constructed species of organisms begins its life in the embryonic stage as the simplest of all living forms, a single cell (constituted in some cases out of parts of two preëxisting cells). From this beginning it advances to its later stages of growth as an embryo, assuming successively the typical forms of higher organisms until it attains the full form of its own species, and thus begins its individual post-embryonic life. It thus recapitulates in its individual history the history of its species as read in the paleontological records. This consideration shows that whatever the truth may be as to the species as a whole (for instance of man), each individual of the species (each man) has been evolved in his prenatal life. If not exactly from definitely known and identifiable species (anthropoid individuals perfectly formed), at least from foetal organisms apparently of the same type as those of anthropoids.

But assuming organic evolution to be true upon these grounds, and upon others of the same character, equally convincing to the scientific man, it must not be left out of account that it is to be distinguished quite sharply from cosmic evolution. These two phases of the law are identical at their basis, but become very different in their application according to the nature of the field in which they operate. Cosmic evolution works altogether through reactions. These are invariable in their cause and effect. Given material elements and conditions, they always issue in the same results. Their operations are grouped together under the sciences of chemistry and physics. Organic evolution works through processes to which the term "vital" is applied. Whether these are identical with the chemico-physical processes in the ultimate analysis is an open question among scientists. In the field of purely descriptive science, however, which limits itself to the observation of facts, it can scarcely emerge as a question, since the true nature of vitality is beyond the reach of observation. And upon the whole, the theory that there is an inner difference between vitality and physico-chemical attractions and affinities is supported by certain obvious considerations. But even if vitality should prove to be nothing more than a series of reactions of a chemical and physical nature, the type of evolution to which it yields is differentiated by broad characteristics that distinguish it from merely molecular attractions and affinities.

(1) Vital processes cannot be correlated with the chemico-physical ones. Heat, light, electricity, magnetism, gravitation, chemical affinity, are interchangeable and interchanged among themselves. But none of these can be converted into life as far as now known. (2) All life is from preëxisting life (omne vivum e vivo). Biogenesis still holds the field as far as experimental science has anything to say about it, and abiogenesis is at the most an attractive hypothesis. (3) The vital processes overcome and reverse the chemical and physical ones. When a living organism is constituted, and as long as it subsists in life, it breaks up and reconstitutes forms of matter into new forms. Carbon, nitrogen, hydrogen and oxygen, in combination with other elements, are separated from one another and reunited in new combinations in the tissues of the plant and the animal. On the other hand, the moment the vital process ceases, the chemical and physical resume their course. The organism in which the vital process has been annihilated is immediately put under the operation of chemical affinities, and reduced into its first elements. So long as the vital process is on, there seems to be a ruling or directive principle modifying and counteracting the normal and natural course of the so-called chemical and physical forces. (4) The vital process is characterized by the manifestation in matter of certain peculiarities that never show themselves apart from it. These are irritability, assimilation of non-living matter in the process of growth, differentiation or the power in each kind of living organism to develop in its growth regularly recurring characteristics, and (5) reproduction. The result of the vital process is the tendency in the organic product of it to maintain itself as a unity, and become more and more diversified in the course of its life.

These features of organic evolution make it necessary to account not only for the origin of the matter and the energy which are assumed in the cosmic form of evolution, but also for the origin and nature of the unknown something (or combination of things) which is called life in the organism, whether this be a unitary and distinct force or a group of forces. (It is interesting to notice the return to the notion of life as primal energy in the philosophy of Bergson [élan vital]; cf. Creative Evolution. The same view is advocated by Sir Oliver Lodge, Life and Matter.)

Furthermore, care must be taken not to confuse any special variety of evolutionary theory in the organic realm with the generic theory itself. Evolutionists hold and propound different hypotheses as to the application of the principle. The Lamarckian, the Darwinian, the Weismannian, the DeVriesian views of evolution are quite different from, and at certain points contradictory of, one another. They assume the law to be real and aim to explain subordinate features or specific applications of it as seen in certain given series of facts. They differ from one another in insisting on details which may be real or unreal without affecting the truth of the main law. Lamarckian evolution, for instance (revived recently under the name neo-Lamarckian), makes much of the alleged transmissibility through heredity of acquired traits. Darwinian evolution is based largely on the principle of accidental variations worked over by natural selection and the slow insensible accumulation of traits fitting individuals to survive in the struggle for life. Weismannian evolution posits an astonishingly complex germinal starting-point. DeVriesian evolution is built on the sudden appearance of mutations ("sports") which are perpetuated, leading to new species. It is unscientific to array any of these against the other in the effort to undermine the generic theory of evolution, or to take their differences as indicating the collapse of the theory and a return to the idea of creation by fiat. The differences between them are insignificant as compared with the gulf which separates them all from the conception of a separate creative beginning for each species at the first appearance of life upon earth. (On some differences between the primitive form of Darwinian and later theories of the same general type, see Rudolph Otto, in Naturalism and Religion [ET].)

With these limitations, the law of organic evolution may be taken into the Bib. account of creation as given in Gen, chs 1 and 2. The question raised at once is one of the relation of the doctrine to the Bib. account. If the evolutionary conception is true, it naturally follows that the Bib. account cannot be accepted in its literal interpretation. For the one of these accounts pictures the different species and general types as coming into existence gradually out of preëxisting ones, whereas the other (lit. interpreted) represents them as created by a Divine fiat. This difference it is true may be artificially exaggerated. Nowhere does the Bib. account explicitly ascribe the creation of each species to the fiat of God. The word "created" (bārā'), as used in Gen, does not necessarily exclude preëxisting matter and form. On the other hand, expressions such as "Let the earth bring forth" (1 11 AV) indicate a certain mediation of secondary powers in the elements ("resident forces," LeConte) through which organisms came into being. "After their kind" suggests the principle of heredity. "Abundantly" suggests the law of rapid and ample reproduction leading to the "struggle for life," "natural selection" and "survival of the fittest." But all efforts to harmonize Gen with science upon this basis lead at the best to the negative conclusion that these two are so far different in their purpose and scope as not to involve radical contradiction. A positive agreement between them cannot be claimed.

The difficulty vanishes in its entirety when it is borne in mind that the two accounts are controlled by different interests, treat primarily of different matters and, where they appear to cover the same ground, do so each in an incidental way. This means that their statements outside of the sphere of their primary interests are popularly conceived and expressed, and cannot be set over against each other as rivals in scientific presentation. Upon this basis the Gen account is the vehicle of religious instruction (not, however, an allegory); its cosmogonic accounts are not intended to be scientifically correct, but popularly adequate. For all that science is concerned, they may be traditional conceptions, handed down in the form of folklore, and purged of the grotesque, purely mythological element so apt to luxuriate in folklore. Between such accounts and the dicta of pure science, it would be absurd either to assume or to seek for harmony or discord. They are parallel pictures; in the one the foreground is occupied by the actual unfolding of the facts, the religious element is concealed deep by the figures in the foreground. In the other the background of haze and cloud is the domain of fact, the foreground of definite figures consists of the religious ideas and teachings. The evolutionary notion of the origin of living forms on the earth can thus in no way be assumed as in contradiction either to the letter or the spirit of the teaching of Gen.

A still more important problem arises when the evolutionary theory touches the origin of man upon earth. Here, too, not simply the Bib. account of the creation of Adam and Eve, and their primitive life in the Garden of Eden as recorded in Gen 2 is affected, but all that is said of man as a child of God, clothed with peculiar dignity and eternal worth.

(1) The difference between the Bib. and evolutionary records of the creation of man may easily be resolved if the Bib. account (Gen 2) is not viewed as a literal statement of actual occurrences, but as the vehicle of certain determinative thoughts designed to affiliate man in his proper relation to God. This means that what is essential in the Bib. account is that man as a distinctive and different being in the world came into existence as the result of a special act of will on the part of God, that he was created as the golden summit of the whole upward movement of life. He is not a mere creature of Nature, but the offspring of the Divine will, with power to know his Maker, to hold fellowship with Him and to carry in him the rational and moral image of the Creator of all. Against this view of the origin of man, evolutionary science has nothing to set over. It is concerned with the process through which the emergence of such a being as man was accomplished, and the time and circumstances in which it took place. These points it finds as it finds similar points affecting other living beings.

It would be easy of course to take materialistic forms of the evolutionary theory, such as that advocated by Haeckel, Guyeau, Ray Lankester, and establish an irreconcilable discord between them and the Bib. account; but such varieties of the theory are distinguished, not by the occurrence of the idea of evolution in them, but rather by the materialistic metaphysics underlying them: when, for instance, Haeckel defines the notion of evolution by excluding from it intelligence or purpose, and by obliterating differences between the lower animal creation and man, he does so not as an evolutionist in science, but as a materialist (Monist of the materialistic type) in metaphysics. The moment the evolutionist determines to limit himself to the scientific side of his task, and the interpreter of the Bib. account to the religious side of his task, the assumed discord in Gen 2 and the evolutionary theory totally vanishes.

(2) The more important point of contact between the theory of evolution and the Bib. conception of man, however, is that of the notion of the dignity and worth of man. The very existence of a Bible is based on the idea that man is of some consequence to the Creator. And through the Bible this idea not only appears early (Gen 1 26), "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness," followed by the statement, "And God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them," but is interwoven with every fundamental teaching.

It is contended that a representation like this is not compatible with the evolutionary conception of the origin of man from simian ancestors. The contention would be well supported if the evolutionary theory actually obliterated the line of distinction between man and the lower creation; and in any form of it in which such line is ignored, and man is regarded as a being of the same order (neither more or less) as those from which he sprang, it is not capable of being harmonized with the Bib. doctrine. But as a matter of fact, the whole drift and tendency of evolutionary thought ought to be and is the very opposite of belittling man. For according to it, man is the culmination and summit of a process whose very length and complexity simply demonstrate his worth and dignity as its final product. Accordingly, some of the most radical evolutionists, such as John Fiske (Through Nature to God) have extended and strengthened the argument for the immortality of man by an appeal to his evolutionary origin.

Kindred to the problem of the origin of man, and, in some aspects of it, a part of that problem, is the further problem of the origin and nature of religion. First of all, according to evolution, religion cannot be an exception to the general law of the emergence of the more complex from simpler antecedents. Accordingly, it must be supposed to have evolved from non-religious or pre-religious elements. But the very statement of the case in this form necessitates the clear con-

6. The Descent (Ascent) of Man Adam and Eve, and their primitive life in the Garden of Eden as recorded in Gen 2 is affected, but all that is said of man as a child of God, clothed with peculiar dignity and eternal worth.

7. The Origin and Nature of Religion First of all, according to evolution, religion cannot be an exception to the general law of the emergence of the more complex from simpler antecedents. Accordingly, it ception of the idea of religion. If religion is the sense in the human soul of an infinite and eternal being, or beings, issuing in influences upon life, then it is coeval with man and inseparable from the human soul. There never was a time when man was not religious. The very emergence of this sense in the mind of a prehuman ancestor of man would change the brute into the man.

We may speak of the states of the prehuman brute's mind as "materials for the making of religion," but not as religion. Their transformation into religion is therefore just as unique as the creation of the man himself. Whatever the mental condition of the brute before the emergence of the sense of an eternal reality and the dependence of itself upon that reality, it was not a religious being. Whatever the form of this sense, and whatever its first content and results, after the emergence of man it became religion. What caused it to appear at that particular moment and stage in the course of the onward movement? This is a question of causes, and its answer eludes the search of science, both pure and philosophical, and if undertaken by pure philosophy, leads to the same diversity of hypotheses as has been found to control the solution of the problem of beginnings in general (Agnosticism, Pantheism, Theism).

For the rest, that the general features hold true in the field of religion is obvious at a glance. Religious thought, religious practices, religious institutions, have undergone the same type of changes as are observed in the material universe and in the realm of life.

What is true of religion as an inner sense of a reality or realities transcending the outward world is equally, and even more clearly, true of the moral life which in one aspect of it is the outward counterpart of religion. To speak of the evolution of the conscience from non-ethical instincts is either to extend the meaning and character of the ethical into a region where they can have no possible significance, or to deny that something different has come into being when the sense of obligation, of duty, of virtue, and the idea of the supreme good have appeared.

In other particulars, the development of the moral nature of man, both in the individual and in the community, manifestly follows the process discerned in the material universe at large, and in the realm of organized life in particular. As an observed fact of history, the gradual growth of moral ideas and the mutual play of the inner controlling principle of the sense of oughtness ("the voice of God") and of social conditions and necessities, arising from the nature of man as a social being, are so manifest that they could neither be denied nor better explained in any other way than in accordance with the evolutionary view.

But the rise of the evolutionary theory calls for a new consideration not only of the questions of the origin and nature of religion and morality, but also of that of the content of the Gospel.

9. Christianity and the Gospel.
Christian Doctrine

(1) At the basis of Christianity lies the idea of revelation. The God whom Jesus presented to men is supremely concerned in men. He communicates to them His interest in and His wishes concerning them. This fact the followers of Jesus have in general called "revelation." Some have insisted and still do insist that such revelation must be supernatural. Setting aside the consideration that the term "supernatural" does not occur in Bib. phraseology, and that the notion is deduced by a process of interpretation which leaves a large flexibility to it, i.e. a possibility of conceiving it in a variety of ways, revelation itself is not necessarily bound up with any special method of the communication of the Divine will (cf REVELATION). Analogies drawn from human life furnish many different ways of making known to the minds of intelligent fellow-beings the thought of one's own mind. These include, first, the pragmatic resort to some act or attitude of a physical nature, as, for instance, the touch of the whip or the point of the spur on the horse; the frown or the smile for the higher class of understanding of the human type. Secondly, the linguistic, wherein by conventional, articulate, highly complex sounds, one tells in words what lies in his own consciousness. All such expression is necessarily partial, indirect and symbolic. Thirdly, the telepathic and mysterious method (whose reality some still doubt) by which communication takes place without the mediation of either language or action. The evolutionary view does not exclude the possibility of any of these methods conceived as ethical and psychological processes. It does exclude any and all of them if understood as magical or preternatural phenomena. There is nothing, however, in a proper interpretation of the facts of Christian revelation to force the magical interpretation of the coming of the Divine message.

On the contrary, there is everything in the gradual and progressive method of the formation of the Christian Scriptures to suggest that the law of evolution was not violated here. One of the latest writers in Scripture plainly represents the whole method of revelation from the Divine point of view as a cumulative delivery of knowledge in different and successive parts and aspects (He 1 1). Both at its inception and in the course of its history, the gospel shows conformity to this fundamental law.

(2) Evolution and incarnation: One of the strongest objections to the idea of an all-comprehensive generalization of the law of evolution has been said to be that such a law would destroy the uniqueness of the personality of Jesus Christ. This is, however, due to a confusion of thought. In reality it is no more a denial of uniqueness to say that the Son of God entered the world in accordance with the laws of the world as ordered by the Father, than to say that He was subject to those laws after He entered the world; for instance, that He hungered and thirsted, was weary and needed rest and sleep, that His hands and feet bled when they were pierced and that He ceased to breathe when His heart failed to beat. It is a denial of uniqueness as to the method of entrance into the world, but not a denial of uniqueness of character, of nature, even of essence in the Nicene sense. It behooved Him, in bringing many sons to perfection, "to make the captain of their salvation perfect through suffering." The question of the Virgin Birth of Jesus is definitely excluded from the discussion because it is one of historical evidence chiefly, and, in whatever way the evidence may solve it, the theory of evolution will have no difficulty to set over against the solution. See VIRGIN BIRTH.

From the evolutionist's point of view, the incarnation is the climax and culmination of the controlling process of the universe (see INCARNATION). Evolution demands such a consummation as the appearance of a new type of person, and particularly the type which appeared in Jesus Christ. This is not saying that other men can be or have been of the same nature and essence as the incarnate Saviour. It is saying simply that through the incarnation God brings into perfection the ideal embodied and unfolded in previous generations partially, and held in view as the goal through the whole process of previous struggle and attainment. In other words, the New Adam, in Jesus Christ, emerges in the course of the upward ascent of man as the Adam of Gen emerged in the upward ascent from the lower creation. Theology from the point of view of revelation must necessarily explain this as the voluntary entrance of the Son of God into humanity for purposes of redemption. In doing so it does not contradict the evolutionary view, but simply presents another aspect of the subject.

Assuming, as is done throughout, that the evolutionary theory concerns not causes and principles, but the processes of transformation of life, the idea of the world is not complete with the creation of man in the image of God. That image must be brought into perfection through the incoming of eternal life. But eternal life is the life of God lived in the species of time and space. It could only come in a personal form through fellowship with God. The bringing of it must therefore be the necessary goal to which all the age-long ascent pointed.

The Incarnation fulfils the conditions of the evolutionary process in that it inserts into the world by a variation the new type governed by the principle of self-sacrifice for others. This is a new principle with Christ, although it is constituted out of pre-existing motives and antecedents, such as the "struggle for others" (cf Drummond, The Ascent of Man) and "altruism" (in its noble instances in human history). It is a new principle, first, because in its pre-Christian and extra-Christian antecedents it is not real self-sacrifice, not being consciously consummated as the result of the outplay of the motive given in eternal life, and secondly, because it reverses the main stream of antecedent motive. It enthrones love by revealing God's supreme character and motive to be love. Thus viewed the Incarnation is the real entrance into the stream of cosmic movement of the Superman. Nietzsche's Superman would be exactly the contrary of this, i.e. the reversion of man to the beast, the denial of the supremacy of love, and the assertion of the supremacy of might.

(3) Another difficulty met by the harmonist of the Christian system with the evolutionary theory is that of the problem of sin. The method of the origin of sin in the human race, as well as its nature, are given in the Bib. account in apparently plain words. The first man was sinless. He became sinful by an act of his own.

As compared with this, according to one common conception of the law of evolution, all the bad tendencies and propensities in man are the survival of his animal ancestry. Cruelty, lust, deceitfulness and the like are but the "tiger and the ape" still lingering in his spiritual constitution, just as the vermiform appendix and the coccyx remain in the physical, mere rudiments of former useful organs; and just like the latter, they are apt to interfere with the welfare of the species later developed. Here, as in every previous stage of our survey, the difficulty arises from the failure to distinguish between that which appears in man as man, and the propensities in animals which lead to acts similar in appearance, but different in their place and function in the respective lives of those animals. As a matter of fact, the tendencies to cruelty, greed, lust and cunning in the brute are not sinful. They are the wholesome and natural impulses through which the individual and the race are preserved from extinction. They are sinful in man because of the dawn in the soul of a knowledge that his Maker is showing him a better way to the preservation of the individual and the race in the human form. Until the sense of the obligation to follow the better way has arisen, there can be no sin. But when it has come, the first act performed in violation of that sense must be regarded as sinful. As the apostle Paul puts it, "I had not known sin, except through the law." "I was alive apart from the law once: but when the commandment came, sin revived [was made to live] and I died" (Rom 7.9).

Instead of militating against the idea of a primitive fall, the discovery of the law of evolution confirms it by showing that at some time, as the moral sense in man arose, in the very earliest stage of his existence as man, by an act of his own will, he set aside the new and better principle of conduct presented to him in his inner consciousness (disobeyed the voice of God), and fell back to the prehuman non-moral rule of his life. If this is not the doctrine of the Fall expressed in the terms of present-day science, it would be hard to conceive how that doctrine could be formulated in modern words. (F. J. Hall, Evolution and the Fall; cf FALL, THE.)

According to this theory, it was possible for man as he first began his career upon the earth to have passed at once into the condition of perfect fellowship with God. Development might have been sinless. But it was not likely. And it was not desirable that it should be (see ADAM IN OT AND APOC). For moral character apart from struggle and victory is weak and only negatively perfect. The elimination of sin was to be accomplished by a process which according to the evolutionary philosophy everywhere and always produces higher and stronger types. It is only as progress is achieved by regeneration following degeneration that the best results are secured. Thus "where sin abounded," it was "in order that grace might superabound" (Rom 5.20). Yet neither is sin the less sinful nor grace the less supernatural. It would be reading an unwarrantable doctrine into Scripture to say that upon the whole an unfallen race would have been superior to a fallen and redeemed race. The world as it is is not a mistake but the wisest thought of God.

The mystery of evil in the world is thus left neither more nor less difficult to understand under the evolutionary conception than under any other. The difficulty of an unbroken continuity between the lower and the higher forms of life, culminating in the free will of man, with the necessary possibility of conflict with the will of God, is not treated by the evolutionary philosophy, even though it may not be materially relieved. To this extent, however, it is relieved, that the Divine action is here understood to be analogous and consistent with itself throughout, even though transcending in scope and extent the human intelligence.

(4) In the light of what has already been made clear, it will be easy to dismiss the correlative doctrine of salvation from sin as fully compatible with the idea of evolution. The Christian doctrine of salvation falls into two general parts: the objective mediatorial work of the Redeemer, commonly called the Atonement, and the subjective transforming work of the Holy Spirit, begun in regeneration and continued in sanctification.

The idea of the Atonement lies somewhat remote from the region where the law of evolution is most clearly seen to operate. At first sight it may be supposed to sustain no special relation to evolution either as offering difficulties to it or harmonising with it and corroborating it. Yet in a system whose parts are vitally interrelated, it would be strange if the acceptance of the evolutionary theory did not in some way and to some extent affect the conception. It does so by fixing attention on the following particulars: (a) That with the emergence of man as a personality, the relation of the creature to the Creator comes to be personal. If that personal relation is disturbed, it can be restored to its normal state in accordance with the laws observed in the relations of persons to one another. The Atonement is such a restoration of personal relations between God and man. (b) In achieving the goal of perfect fellowship with Himself on the part of creatures bearing His own image, the Creator must in a sense sacrifice Himself. This Divine self-sacrifice is symbolized and represented in the Cross. Yet the meaning of the Cross is not exhausted in mere external influence upon the sinful creature whose return to the holy Father is thereby aimed at. (c) Since the alienation of the creature by sin represents an offence to the person of the Creator, there is necessity that this offence should be removed; and this is done through the sacrifice of the Incarnate Son identifying Himself with, and taking the place of, the sinful creature.

The correlative doctrine of Regeneration stands much nearer the center of the thought of evolution. It has always been conceived and expressed in biological phraseology. The condition of sin postulated by this doctrine is one of death. Into this condition a new life is inserted, an act which is called the New Birth. Whatever life may be in its essence, it overcomes, reverses and directs the lower forces to other results than they are observed to achieve apart from its presence. In analogy to this course of life in the process of regeneration, a new direction is given to the energies of the new-born soul. But the analogy goes farther. Regeneration is from above as life is always from above. It is God's Spirit through the word and work of Christ that begets the new Christian life, nurtures, trains and develops it to its full maturity revealed in the image and stature of Christ Himself (see REGENERATION).

If the above considerations are valid, the evolutionary and the Christian views of the world cannot logically be placed against each other. 10. Conclusion.—As mutually exclusive and contradictory. They must be conceived as supplementing one another, and fulfilling each the promise and possibility of the other. Evolution is a scientific generalization which, kept within the limits of science, commends itself as a satisfactory explanation of the great law controlling all the movements of matter, life and mind. Christianity, so far as it enters into the intellectual life, is interested in the idea of God and of man's relation to God. It may confidently leave the facts in the lower world of processes of transformation to be schematized under the scientific generalization of evolution.

LITERATURE.—The lit. of the subject is vast. At the basis of the discussion stand the works of Darwin, Huxley, Wallace, Spencer, Weismann, Haeckel, Romanes and others. [EDITORIAL NOTE.—It will be understood, that while Professor Zenos has been asked and permitted to state his views on this question unreservedly, neither the publishers nor the editors are to be held as committed to all the opinions expressed.]

EWE, אֵלָה, rahēl, עֵזֶל, al, עֵז, seh, "a female sheep": Rahēl (cf pr. n. Rachel, and Arab. rahala, "to migrate") is the ordinary Heb word for ewe, but is tr^d "sheep," though with clear indication of sex in context, in Isa 53 7 and Cant 6 6 (RV "ewes"). Alōth, part. of al, "to suckle" (cf Arab. ghāl) is found in Ps 78 71 and Isa 40 11 (AV "are with young," ERV "that give suck," ARV "have their young"). In 1 S 6 7.10 occurs pārōth 'alōth, "milch kine." Seh, in Lev 22 28, while tr^d "ewe," might from the context be "ewe" or "she-goat" and indeed seems to be used here as a term applying equally to either, being used elsewhere for one of a flock of sheep or goats. See SHEEP.

(1) נָשָׂא, nāghas (Dt 15 23; 2 K 23 35; Isa 58 3), to secure by force or pressure interest or money for tribute, and perhaps, in Isa 58 3, labor or toil; but cf RVm "oppress all your laborers"; probably better with a slight change of text, "exact money lent on pledges" (reading for נָשָׂא, abhoṭ b'yedh'khem, נֶצְרִיקָם, ag'bhēkhem).

(2) נָשָׂא, nāshā, or נָשָׂה, nāshāh (Neh 5 7.10 [AV not RV] 11; Job 11 6 [but see below]; Ps 89 22), to demand interest, to be a harsh and importunate creditor, a practice which Nehemiah asks the Jews to forego. Job 11 6 better with RVm for "exact," "causeth to be forgotten."

(3) יָרַע, yōcē (2 K 15 20 [if text is correct]). Menahem secured the tribute which the king of Assyria demanded by levying a tax on the chief men of his kingdom.

(4) παράσσειν, prāssein (Lk 3 13 AV [cf Dnl 11 20 LXX]; 1 Macc 10 35 RV), to demand money or tribute or taxes of anyone.

WALTER R. BETTERIDGE

EXACTION, eg-zak'shun: (1) נָשָׂא, nāshāh (Neh 10 31), a demand for money lent on pledge, which the Jews agreed to forego in the seventh year; (2) גָּרַשָׁה, grūshāh (Ezk 45 9, "your exactions," RVm "expulsions"), eviction from house and home.

EXACTORS, eg-zak'tērs (נִשְׁרִיקִים, nōgh'sayikkh [Isa 60 17, RVm "taskmasters"; cf Ex 1 11; 3 7]): Righteousness personified is in Zion to take the place of the officials who oppress the people. In Isa 14 4 ARVm, Babylon is called an "exactress of gold."

EXALT, eg-zōlt' (רָם, rām, גָּבַהַּ, gābhah [mapptik hēl, נָשָׂא, nāshā; הִפְסֹד, hupsōd): The Heb word most often tr^d "exalt," "exalted," is rām, "to lift up," "to be or become high." It is used with reference to both God and man, e.g. Ex 15 2, "My father's God, and I will exalt him"; Ps 99 5.9, "Exalt ye Jeh our God"; cf 107 32; 118 28; 1 S 2 10, "Exalt the horn of his anointed"; Job 17 4, "Therefore shalt thou not exalt them"; cf Isa 13 2 AV; 14 13; gābhah, "to be high," fig. "to be exalted," occurs in Job 36 7; Prov 17 19 AV; Isa 5 16, etc; nāshā, "to lift up," occurs in Nu 24 7; 1 Ch 29 11, etc; other words are gālal, "to raise up" (Ex 9 17; Prov 4 8), sāghabh (Job 5 11; 36 22 AV; Isa 2 11.17; 12 4; 33 5), rāmam, "to be high" (Job 24 24; Ps 118 16).

In the NT "exalt" is the tr of hupsōd, "to elevate" (not used with reference to God) (Mt 11 23; 23 12; Acts 2 33; 2 Cor 11 7; 1 Pet 5 6, etc); also (twice) of epatrō, "to lift up, upon or against" (2 Cor 10 5; 11 20), once of hyperairō, "to lift up above" (2 Thess 2 4); in 2 Cor 12 7 bis, this word is tr^d "exalted above measure," RV "exalted overmuch"; hyperupsōd, "to lift up above" (Phil 2 9), is tr^d "highly exalted"; hūpsos, "elevation," is tr^d "exalted" (Jas 1 9, RV "high estate").

For "it increaseth" (Job 10 16), RV gives "and if my head exalt itself"; instead of "God exalteth by His power" (36 22), "God doeth loftily in his power"; for "though thou exalt thyself as the eagle" (Ob ver 4), "mount on high"; for "highly esteemed" (Lk 16 15), "exalted"; for "exalteth itself" (2 Cor 10 5), "is exalted"; for "He shall lift you up" (Jas 4 10), "He shall exalt you."

Self-exaltation is strongly condemned, esp. by Christ; humbleness is the way to true exaltation (Mt 23 12; Lk 14 11; 18 14; cf Jas 4 10; 1 Pet 5 6); the supreme example is that of Christ Himself (Phil 2 5-11).

EXAMINE, eg-zam'in, EXAMINATION, eg-zam-i-nē'shun: נִדְרָשׁ, dārash, "to follow," "inquire,"

"make inquisition" (Ezr 10 16); and חִפּוּ, bāhan, "to test," "investigate," "prove," "tempt" (Ps 26 2). The former was the judicial term. ἀνακρίω, anakrínō, "scrutinize," "investigate," "interrogate" (in court), "judge," "search" (Lk 23 14; Acts 4 9; 12 19; 28 18; 1 Cor 9 3); and ἀνέκρίτω, anēkítō, "to investigate" (judicially), "examine" (Acts 22 24.29). Also δοκιμάζω, dokimázō, "to test," "examine," "try" (1 Cor 11 28 AV); and πειράζω, peirázō, "scrutinize," "discipline" (2 Cor 13 5 AV). The noun ἀνάκρισις, anákrisis, "examination," "investigation," occurs in Acts 25 26. See also COURTS, JUDICIAL.

EXAMPLE, eg-zam'p'l (τύπος, týpos, "a pattern," ὑπόδειγμα, hypodeigma, "copy," "representation," ὑπογραμμός, hypogrammos, "a writing-copy," "example"): A typical, representative, or illustrative case; a pattern or model for imitation (hypodeigma, Jn 13 15; He 8 5 AV; Jas 5 10; hypogrammos, 1 Pet 2 21; typos, 1 Tim 4 12 AV) or warning (δειγμα, deigma, "a sample," "exhibition," Jude ver 7; cf 2 Pet 2 6; hypodeigma, He 4 11; typos, 1 Cor 10 6.11).

"Ensample" (typos, 2 Macc 6 28.31; Phil 3 17; 1 Thess 1 7; 2 Thess 3 9; 1 Tim 4 12; 1 Pet 5 3) and "example" have the same meaning, but the former is always suggestive of goodness.

EXCEED, ek-sēd', EXCEEDING, EXCEEDINGLY: The vb. is found in other than its present sense in Job 36 9 AV, "They have exceeded" (RV "behaved themselves proudly"); 1 S 20 41, "They . . . wept . . . until David exceeded" (AV and RV). In both these passages the idea is that of going too far, beyond proper bounds (Heb, respectively, gābhar, "be strong" [in Hithp.]; gādhā, "be great" [in Hiph.]). "Exceeding" (as an advb. with adjs. and rarely as an adj.) and "exceedingly" occur often as representing various expressions for the superlative in Heb and Gr.

EXCELLENCY, ek'se-len-si (גָּדְלָהּ, gā'dōn, גִּדְלָהּ, gā'dōhā; ὑπερβολή, hyperbolē): "Excellency" in the OT is chiefly the tr of gā'dōn, "mounting," "swelling" (Ex 15 7; Job 37 4 AV; Ps 47 4 AV; Isa 13 19 AV, etc); gā'dōhā, "rising," is thrice so rendered (Dt 33 26.29; Ps 68 34); s'ēh, "rising" (twice) (Job 13 11 AV; Ps 62 4 AV); yether, "superabundance" (twice) (Gen 49 3 AV; Job 4 21 AV), and hādhār, "honor," "beauty," "majesty" (twice) (Isa 35 2); gōbbah, "uplifted" (Job 40 10); yithrōn, "advantage" (Eccl 7 12); sī, "elevation" (Job 20 6, RV "height"). In the NT hyperbolē, "surpassing," "a casting beyond," occurs (2 Cor 4 7, "that the excellency of the power may be of God," RV "exceeding greatness"); hyperochē, "a holding over" or "beyond," is tr^d "excellency" (1 Cor 2 1), and tō hyperēchon, "the preëminence" (Phil 3 8), "the excellency of the knowledge of Christ."

Instead of "excellency" RV has "pride" (Isa 13 19; Ezk 24 21), "majesty" (Job 37 4 and ARV 13 11; 31 23), ARV has "preëminence" (Gen 49 3.4), "glory" (Ps 47 4), "dignity" (Ps 62 4); for "the fat of lambs" (Ps 37 20), ERV has "the excellency of the pastures," with m "the fat of lambs"; ARV retains the AV rendering with ERV in m; instead of "Doth not their excellency which is in them go away?" (Job 4 21), RV has "Is not their tent-cord plucked up within them?" m "Is not their excellency which is in them removed?"

EXCELLENT, ek'se-lent (גָּדְלָהּ, 'addir, גִּדְלָהּ, yallir [Aram.]; διαφορέτερος, diaphorōteros, κράτιστος, krátistos): The tr of various Heb words, chiefly of 'addir, "great," "honorable" (Ps 8 1.9; 16 3; 76 4); yallir, "surpassing," is Aram., occurring in Dnl 2 31; 4 36; 5 12.14; 6 3. Other words are bāhar, "to glow," "try," "choose" (Cant 5 15); gā'dōn, "mounting," "swelling" (Isa 4 2; see EXCELLENCY); gādhā, "to make or become great" (Isa 28 29), and other words occurring singly.

In the NT we have diaphorōteros, "greater," "better" (He 1 4; 8 6); krátistos, "most excellent," "most noble" (Lk 1 3; Acts 23 26); tá diaphéronta, "things that differ," "are preëminent" (Rom 2 18; Phil 1 10); megalo-prepēs, "becoming to the great" (2 Pet 1 17, AV "a voice to him from the excellent glory," ARV and ERV m "the Majestic Glory"); kath' hyperbolēn "very surpassing" (1 Cor 12 31, "Yet I show unto you a more excellent way," RV "most excellent"); pleiōn, "greater," "fuller" (He 11 4; see ABEL).

EXCOMMUNICATION, eks-ko-mū-ni-kā'shun: Exclusion from church fellowship as a means of personal discipline, or church purification, or both. Its germs have been found in (1) the Mosaic "ban" or "curse" (חֵרֶם, hērem, "devoted"), given over entirely to God's use or to destruction (Lev 27 29); (2) the "cutting off," usually by death, stoning of certain offenders, breakers of the Sabbath (Ex 31 14) and others (Lev 17 4; Ex 30 22-38); (3) the exclusion of the leprous from the camp (Lev 13 46; Nu 12 14). At the restoration (Ezr 10 7.8), the penalty of disobedience to Ezra's reforming movements was that "all his substance should be forfeited [hērem], and himself separated from the assembly of the captivity." Nehemiah's similar dealing with the husbands of heathen women helped to fix the principle. The NT finds a well-developed synagogal system of excommunication, in two, possibly three, varieties or stages. נִדְּבִי, niddūy, for the first offence, forbade the bath, the razor, the convivial table, and restricted social intercourse and the frequenting of the temple. It lasted thirty, sixty, or ninety days. If the offender still remained obstinate, the "curse," hērem, was formally pronounced upon him by a council of ten, and he was shut out from the intellectual, religious and social life of the community, completely severed from the congregation. שְׁמַמְלָה, shammālāh, supposed by some to be a third and final stage, is probably a general term applied to both niddūy and hērem. We meet the system in Jn 9 22: "If any man should confess him to be Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue" (ἀποσυναγωγός, aposynagōgós); Jn 12 42: "did not confess . . . lest they should be put out of the s."; and Jn 16 2: "put you out of the s." In Lk 6 22 Christ may refer to the three stages: "separate you from their company [ἀφορίσασιν, aphorísōsin], and reproach you [ὀνειδίσωσιν, oneidísōsin]=hērem, "malediction"], and cast out your name as evil [ἐκβάλωσιν, ekbálōsin]."

It is doubtful whether an express prescription of excommunication is found in Our Lord's words (Mt 18 15-19). The offence and the penalty also seem purely personal: "And if he refuse to hear the church also, let him be unto thee as the Gentile and the publican" out of the pale of association and converse. Yet the next verse might imply that the church also is to act: "Verily I say unto you, What things soever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven," etc. But this latter, like Mt 18 19, seems to refer to the general enunciations of principles and policies rather than to specific ecclesiastical enactments. On the whole, Jesus seems here to be laying down the principle of dignified personal avoidance of the obstinate offender, rather than prescribing ecclesiastical action. Still, personal avoidance may logically correspond in proper cases to excommunication by the church. 2 Thess 3 14: "Note that man, that ye have no company with him"; Tit 3 10: "A factious man . . . avoid" (ARV^m); 2 Jn ver 10: "Receive him not into your house," etc, all inculcate discreet and faithful avoidance but not necessarily excommunication, though that might come to be the logical result. Paul's "anathemas" are not to be understood as excommunications, since the first is for an offence no ecclesiastical tribunal could well investigate: 1 Cor 16 22, "If any man loveth not the Lord, let him be anathema"; the second touches Paul's deep relationship to his Lord: Rom 9 3, "I myself . . . anathema from Christ"; while the third would subject the apostle or an angel to ecclesiastical censure: Gal 1 8,9, "Though we, or an angel . . . let him be anathema."

Clear, specific instances of excommunication or directions regarding it, however, are found in the Pauline and Johannine writings. In the case of the incestuous man (1 Cor 5 1-12), at the instance of the apostle ("I verily, being absent in body but present in spirit"), the church, in a formal meeting ("In the name of our Lord Jesus, ye being gathered together"), carrying out the apostle's desire and will ("and my spirit"), and using the power and authority conferred by Christ ("and with the power of our Lord Jesus"), formally cut off the offender from its fellowship, consigning (relinquishing?) him to the power of the prince of this world ("to deliver such a one unto Satan"). Further, such action is enjoined in other cases: "Put away the wicked man from among yourselves." 2 Cor 2 5-11 probably refers to the same case, terminated by the repentance and restoration of the offender. 'Delivering over to Satan' must also include some physical ill, perhaps culminating in death; as with Simon Magus (Acts 8 20), Elymas (Acts 13 11), Ananias (Acts 5 5). 1 Tim 1 20: "Hymenaeus and Alexander . . . that they might be taught not to blaspheme," is a similar case of excommunication accompanied by judicial and disciplinary physical ill. In 3 Jn vs 9,10 we have a case of excommunication by a faction in control: "Diotrephes . . . neither doth he himself receive . . . and them that would he . . . casteth out of the church."

Excommunication in the NT church was not a fully developed system. The NT does not clearly define its causes, methods, scope or duration. It seems to have been incurred by heretical teaching (1 Tim 1 20) or by factiousness (Tit 3 10 (?)); but the most of the clear undoubted cases in the NT are for immoral or un-Christian conduct (1 Cor 5 1,11,13; perhaps also 1 Tim 1 20). It separated from church fellowship but not necessarily from the love and care of the church (2 Thess 3 15 (?)). It excluded from church privileges, and often, perhaps usually, perhaps always, from social intercourse (1 Cor 5 11). When pronounced by the apostle it might be accompanied by miraculous and punitive or disciplinary physical consequences (1 Cor 5 5; 1 Tim 1 20). It was the act of the local church, either with (1 Cor 5 4) or without (1 Cor 5 13; 3 Jn ver 10) the concurrence of an apostle. It might possibly be pronounced by an apostle alone (1 Tim 1 20), but perhaps not without the concurrence and as the mouthpiece of the church. Its purpose was the amendment of the offender: "That the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (1 Cor 5 5); and the preservative purification of the church: "Purge out the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, even as ye are unleavened" (1 Cor 5 7). It might, as appears, be terminated by repentance and restoration (2 Cor 2 5-11). It was not a complex and rigid ecclesiastical engine, held in terrorem over the soul, but the last resort of faithful love, over which hope and prayer still hovered.

EXECUTE, ek'sē-kūt, EXECUTIONER, ek-sē-kū'shun-ēr (ἑκ'εὐ, 'āsāh, "to do," ἵστημι, 'dīn, "to judge," "decide"; ποίεω, poieō, "to do"; σπεκουλάτωρ, spekoulatōr, Lat speculator, "an attendant"): "Execute" in the sense of "executing judgment," "vengeance," etc, is often found in the OT (Ex 12 12; Dt 10 18; Ps 149 7; Jer 22 3; Ezk 25 11; Mic 5 15; cf Jer 21 12, "Execute justice in the morning") and a few times in the NT (Jn 5 27; Rom 13 4 AV; Jude ver 15). In the sense of punishing capitally, by legal process, it is not found. "Executioner" is found only in Mk 6 27 AV, where Herod, the king, is said to have "sent an executioner" (spekoulatōr) to behead John the Baptist, but RV and ARV have instead, according to the stricter meaning of the text, "The king sent forth a soldier of his guard." The office of executioner, however, was a recognized office in all the great nations of antiquity.

EXEGESIS, ek-sē-jē'sis. See INTERPRETATION.

EXERCISE, ek'sēr-siz (ἑκ'εὐ, 'āsāh; γυμνάζω, gymnazō, ποίεω, poieō): "Exercise" (meaning originally, "to drive or thrust out") has different shades of meaning: It means (1) "to do," "to put into action" (Jer 9 24, 'āsāh, "to do," "Jeh who exerciseth lovingkindness"; Rev 13 12, poieō, "to do," "He exerciseth all the authority of the first"; Tob 12 9, RV "do"); (2) with violence implied, pāzal, "to take away violently," "have exercised robbery" (Ezk 22 29); "to act habitually" (Ps 131 1, hālakh, "to walk," "Neither do I exercise myself in great matters," RV^m "walk"; Acts 24 16, askōō, "to work up"; cf 2 Esd 15 8; Ecclus 50 28); (3) "to train" or "discipline," gymnazō, "to use exercise," "to train up" (1 Tim 4 7, "Exercise thyself unto godliness"; He 5 14; 12 11; 2 Pet 2 14; cf 1 Macc 6 30; 2 Macc 15 12); (4) "to afflict" (Eccl 1 13; 3 10, 'ānāh, "to be afflicted," "exercised therewith," "exercised in it"; in Mt 20 25; Mk 10 42, katakurieiō, "to lord it over," and katevousiō, "to exercise authority," are tr^d respectively "exercise dominion" and "exercise authority"; in Lk 22 25, the Gr words are kurieiō, "to be lord over" and exousiō, "to have power or authority over," RV "have lordship," "have authority." In 1 Tim 4 8 the noun, gymnasia, meaning gymnastic exercise, occurs (sōmatikē gymnasia), tr^d "bodily exercise," contrasted with "exercise unto godliness," RV "For bodily exercise is profitable for a little [in "for little"]; but godliness is profitable for all things," a saying to which the youth of all times would do well to give heed. In 2 Macc 4 9, Jason is said to have set up "a place of exercise" (gymnasion) in Jerus. In 1 Pet 5 2 RV, "exercising the oversight" is substituted for "taking the oversight."

W. L. WALKER

EXHORTATION, ek-sor-tā'shun (παράκλησις, paraklēsis): The Gr word tr^d "exhortation" (paraklēsis) signifies, originally, "a calling near or for" (as an advocate or helper who should appeal on one's behalf), and carries the twofold sense of "exhortation" and "consolation" (which see). In the LXX of the OT it is used in the sense of "consolation"; but in 2 Macc 7 24, it is tr^d "exhort," RV "appeal." The vb. parakalēō is also tr^d "exhortation" (1 Macc 13 3 AV) and "exhort" (2 Macc 9 26).

In the NT paraklēsis is tr^d "exhortation" (Acts 13 15; Rom 12 8, RV "exhorting"; 1 Cor 14 3, ERV "comfort," ARV m "or comfort"; 2 Cor 8 17; 1 Thess 3 3; 1 Tim 4 13; He 13 5; 13 22). ARV has also "exhortation," instead of "consolation" in Phil 2 1. In Lk 3 18, parakaleō, "to call near or for," is trd exhortation, "and many other things in his exhortation," RV "with many other exhortations," and in Acts 20 2, parakaleō legō polid is rendered (AV and RV), "had given them much exhortation."

EXILE, ek'sil, eg'sil (עֲלִיָּה, galah, גָּלָה, ga'dah): Occurs twice only in AV (2 S 15 19 [galah, "to remove"]; Isa 51 14 [ga'dah, "to be bowed down"]). In RV "exile" is substituted for "captivity" (Ezr 8 35 [sh'bhil], and Ezr 12 4 [galah]); "go into exile," for "remove and go" (Ezr 12 11); "exiles of Ethiopia" for "Ethiopian captives" (Isa 20 4); "He shall let my exiles go free" for "He shall let go my captives" (48 13); "an exile" for "a captive" (49 21). "The exile" is in AV and RV "the captivity" (q.v.).

I. The Route.—On the 14th Abib (early in April) the Hebrews were gathered at Rameses (Ex 12 37; Nu 33 5) where apparently the hostile Pharaoh was also living (Ex 12 31). From Ps 78 12, 43 it appears that the wonders preceding the Exodus occurred in the "field of Zoan," where the starting-point may be placed (see RAMESSES; ZOAN). Dr. Naville has suggested that the court was at Bubastis, not at Zoan, and that the route lay from near Zagazig down Wady Tumeildt—a line well fitted for a people driving flocks and herds. On the other hand, in favor of the starting-point having been at Zoan, we read that the "way of the land of the Philis" was "near" (Ex 13 17). This route, which was not taken lest the people should be discouraged by defeat at Gaza where the Egyptians always had troops, reached Egypt at Migdol (see MIGDOL, 2), and ran thence to Daphnai—some 15 miles—and to Zoan by a second march of the same length. The route from Bubastis to Daphnai (some 50 miles) is less likely to have been described as "near." Although an Arab will march 30 miles in a day on foot, yet when moving camp with camels, who travel only about 2 miles an hour, with women and children and herds, he only covers about 12 or 15 miles a day. We cannot suppose the Heb cattle to have covered more than this distance without water on any single march.

We are not told how many days were occupied on the way from Rameses to Succoth (q.v.), though the general impression is that the stages mentioned (Nu 33) represent a day's journey each. Measuring back from the first camp after crossing the Red Sea, we find that Succoth 2. Rameses probably lay in the lower part of Wady Tumeildt, where there was plenty of water and herbage. The direct route from Zoan leads to Phakouss (Tell Faṣṣa) by a march of 15 miles through well-watered lands. A second march, across the desert to Heroopolis and down the valley to Succoth, would be of the same length. The Hebrews departed "in haste," and no doubt made as long marches as they could. If the whole of the people were not in Rameses, but scattered over Goshen, it is possible that some came down the valley from near Bubastis, and that the whole force concentrated at Succoth.

The next march (Ex 13 20; Nu 33 6) led Israel to Etham, on the "edge of the wilderness" which lies W. of the Bitter Lakes, not 3. Succoth far from where the Nile water then to Etham entered them, and no doubt made them sweet. The intention of Moses probably was to reach the desert of Shur by rounding the head of this stretch of water; but we are told (Ex 14 2 f) that he was commanded to "turn"—evidently to the S.—and to encamp before "the mouth of the lakes" (see PI-HAHIROTH), in order that Pharaoh might conclude that the Hebrews were "entangled in the land," and shut in between the lakes on their left and the desert mountains on their right. This camp would seem to have been W. of the lakes, and some 10 miles N. of Suez. It was perhaps two days' journey from Etham, since the lakes are 30 miles long; or, if Etham was farther S. than the head of the lakes, the distance may have been covered by one forced march of 20 to 25 miles, the beasts being watered from the lakes if they were then filled with fresh water, as they would be when having an outlet to a tideless sea.

The sea which Israel crossed is not named in the actual account of the journey, but in the Song of Moses (Ex 15 4) it is called the "Red 4. Passage Sea" in the EV, following the LXX, of the Sea the Heb name being Yam Sūph, or "weedy sea," a term which applied not only to the Gulf of Suez (Nu 33 10), but also to the Gulf of Akabah (Dt 2 8; 1 K 9 26). We are also told that the route chosen was "the way of the wilderness by the Red Sea" (Ex 13 18). It is generally supposed that the head of the Gulf of Suez at the time of the Exodus was farther N. than at present; and, as the Bitter Lakes were then probably filled by the Nile waters flowing down Wady Tumeildt, they would no doubt have carried the Nile mud into this gulf, which mud had gradually filled up this Nile branch before 600 BC. The probable point of passage was the narrow channel (about 2 miles across) by which the lakes discharged into the sea, and was thus about 10 miles N. of Suez. We are told that the water was driven back by "a strong east (or "contrary") wind" in the night (Ex 14 21), and the sea (or "lake," as the word yam often means in the OT; see Gesenius, Lexicon, s.v.) was thus "divided," a shoal being formed and the waters being heaped up (Ex 15 8), so that when the wind ceased they rushed back; whereas, during the passage, they were a "wall" or "defence" (14 22) against any flank attacks by the Egyptians (cf 1 S 26 16, where David's men are said to have been a "wall" when defending Nabal's shepherds). The effect of the wind on shallow waters can be seen at the mouth of the Kishon, where a shoal exists which is dry with a west wind, but under water and impassable when the wind blows down the river. In 1882, Sir Alexander Tulloch saw the waters of Lake Menzaleh driven back more than a mile by the east wind. Thus, however opportune the occurrence, the drying up of the sea, as described in the Bible, was a perfectly natural phenomenon. The Hebrews crossed in the morning, and a march of 15 miles would bring them to the springs from which Suez is supplied, called 'Ain Nâba' and 'Ayyân Mâsa' ("the gushing spring" and "the spring of Moses"), from which point their wanderings in the desert of Shur would begin (see WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL).

This view of the Exodus route is practically the same as advocated by Dr. Robinson, by Dr. E. Naville, by Sir S. Warren, by Sir W.

5. Other Views of the Route Dawson, and by others who have visited the region in question. The view advocated by Brugsch, according to which the sea crossed was a lagoon near Pelusium, has found no supporters, because it directly conflicts with the statement that Israel did not follow the shore road to Philistia, but went by the wilderness of the Red Sea. Another theory (see SINAI), according to which the "Red Sea" always means the Gulf of 'Akabah, is equally discarded by most writers of experience, because the distance from Egypt to Elath on this gulf is 200 miles, and the Israelites could not have traversed that distance in four marches, especially as the route has hardly any water along it in springtime. As detailed above, the route offers no difficulties that would discredit the historical character of the narrative.

II. The Date.—The actual statements of the Books of K, giving | reigns from the time of Solomon's death down to the fixed date of the fall of Samaria in 722 BC, place the

1. OT Chronology Adopted foundation of the Temple within a few years of 1000 BC. It is true that this interval is reduced, by about 30 years, by scholars who accept the very doubtful identification of Ahabu of Sir-lai with Ahab of Israel; but this theory conflicts with the fact that Jehu was contemporary with Shalmaneser II of Assyria; and, since we have no historical account of the chronology of Heb kings other than that of the OT, for this period, and no monumental notice of Israel in Egypt, or of the Exodus, we must either adopt OT chronology or regard the dates in question as being unknown.

We have several statements which show that the Heb writers believed the conquest of Pal by Joshua to have occurred early in the 15th

2. Date of Conquest of Palestine cent. BC, and this date fully agrees with the most recent results of monumental study of the history of the XVIIIth (or Theban) Dynasty in Egypt, as about to be shown, and with the fact that Israel is noticed as being already in Pal in the 5th year of Minepthah, the successor of Rameses II. In 1 K 6 1 we read that the Temple was founded "in the 480th year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt," this referring to the Conquest and not to the Exodus, as appears from other notices. The LXX reads "440 years," but the details show that the Heb text is preferable. In Jgs 11 26 the first victory of Jephthah is said to have occurred 300 years after Joshua's conquest. The details given for this interval, in other passages of the same book, amount to 326 years; but the periods of "rest" may be given in round numbers, and thus account for this minor discrepancy. Samuel ruled apparently for 20 years (1 S 7 2), and Saul (the length of whose reign is not stated in our present text of this same book) very probably ruled for 20 years also, as Jos (Ani, VI, xiv, 9) states. Thus 175 years elapsed between Jephthah's victory and the foundation of the Temple—a total of 475 years, or rather more, from Joshua's conquest.

The popular belief that many of the judges were contemporary does not agree with these facts, and is indeed in conflict with ten definite statements in Jgs. In Acts 13 19,20 we read that after the Conquest there were judges about the space

3. Date of Exodus of 450 years, and this rough estimate (including the rule of Samuel) agrees pretty nearly with the 415, or 420, years of the various passages in the OT. According to the Pent and later accounts (Am 5 25; Acts 7 30), Israel abode in the desert 40 years. We therefore find that Joshua's conquest is placed about 1480 BC, and the Exodus about 1520 BC. According to the revised chronology of the XVIIIth Dynasty of Egypt (see HITTITES), which rests on the notices of contemporary Kassite kings in Babylon, it thus appears that the Pharaoh of the oppression was Thothmes III—a great enemy of the Asiatics—and the Pharaoh of the Exodus would be Amenophis II or Thothmes IV. If Moses was 80 at the time of the Exodus, he must have been born when Thothmes III was an infant, and when his famous sister Hatsu (according to the more probable rendering of her name by Fr. scholars) was regent, and bore the title Ma-ka-Ra. She therefore might be the "daughter of Pharaoh" (Ex 2 5) who adopted Moses—no king being mentioned in this passage, but appearing (ver 15) only when Moses was "grown"; for her regency lasted more than 20 years, till Thothmes III came of age.

As regards this date, it should be remarked that the theory of Lepsius, which has been adopted by

4. Other Views Brugsch and by many writers who accept his authority, is not accepted by every scholar. E. de Bunsen supposed that the Exodus occurred early in the times of the XVIIIth Dynasty; Sir Peter le Page Renouf said that "no materials have yet been discovered for fixing historical dates in periods of Egypt history as far back as the Heb Exodus"—which was true when he wrote. Professor J. Lieblein supposes the Exodus to have occurred late in the time of Amenophis III—also of the XVIIIth Dynasty (see Proc. Bib. Arch. Soc., 1890, 157–60; 1892, 60–62; 1898, 277; 1899, 53; 1907, 214). Dr. Hommel has also recently declared in favor of the view that the Exodus took place under the XVIIIth Dynasty (Expos T, February, 1899). Lepsius asserted that the Exodus occurred in 1314 BC, being the 15th year of Minepthah; but this is generally regarded as at least half a century too early for the year in question, and Israel was not in Egypt even ten years earlier in his reign.

The approximate dates given by Brugsch for the XVIIIth and XIXth Dynasties are very close to those which can be deduced from no-

5. Astro-nomical Calculations tices of contemporary kings of Babylon (Hist Egypt, II, 314). The later dates which Mahler based on certain astronomical calculations of the Fr. astronomer Biot (Académie des inscriptions, March 30, 1831, 597, 602–4) are not accepted by other Egyptologists. Brugsch says that on this question, "scientific criticism has not yet spoken its last word" (Hist Egypt, I, 36). Renouf (Proc. Bib. Arch. Soc., December, 1892, 62) more definitely states that "unfortunately there is nothing on Egypt documents which have as yet come down to us which can, by astronomical calculations, be made to result in a date." This judgment appears to be justified by recent discoveries, since Mahler's dates are about a century too late, as shown by the known history of the Kassites of Babylon. Biot's calculations were based on recorded observations of the rising of Sirius just before the sun, in certain years of certain Egypt kings. But Sirius is not in the plane of the earth's orbit, and its rising is not constant in retardation. The "heliacal" rising is now about 24 min. later each year, but about the date in question the retardation was about 12 min., so that a cycle of 1,461 years cannot be used by simple addition. Biot also assumed that the Egypt observations were as accurate as those made by a modern astronomer with a telescope, whereas, when using the naked eye, the Egypt observer may well have been a day wrong, which would make a difference of 120 years in the date, or even more. The Bab chronology thus gives a far safer basis than do these doubtful observations. On the basis of Biot's calculations the Exodus has been placed in 1214 BC, or even (by Dr. Flinders Petrie) in 1192 BC (Proc. Bib. Arch. Soc., December, 1896, 248). He thus cuts off more than three centuries in the period of the Judges, many of whom he regards as contemporary. Lepsius in like manner, in order to establish his date, accepted the chronology of the Talm, which is notoriously 166 years too late for the known date of the fall of Samaria, and he endeavored (while rejecting the OT statement as to the 480 years) to base himself on the number of generations before the Exodus, whereas it is well known that the Heb genealogies often give only the better-known names and skip several links.

As regards the relation between the earlier date for the Exodus (about 1520 BC) and the chronology of the Heb patriarchs, the Heb text gives an interval of 645 years, and the between Gr text of 430 years between the Exodus and the call of Abraham; and the Date of Exodus and call would thus be dated about 2165 BC Date of or 1950 BC. Abraham is very generally Patriarchs held to have been contemporary with Hammurabi of Babylon (Amraphel), whose accession dates (according to Dr. F. Peiser) in 2139 BC. Dr. Hommel and Mr. King prefer a later date, about 1950 BC, though Nabunahid (the last king of Babylon) places Hammurabi about 2140 BC. The longer reckoning is reconcilable with the Heb text, and the shorter with the Gr text, of Gen, without disturbing the approximate date for the Exodus which has been advocated above.

There is in fact no discrepancy between the actual results of monumental study and the chronology of the OT. If the Exodus occurred under 7. Agree- Thothmes IV, it would have been useless for Israel to attempt the entrance between into Pal by the "way of the land of Monuments the Philis," because at Gaza, Ashkelon and OT and in other cities, the road was still Chronology held by forces of Egypt chariots, which had been established by Thothmes III.

But about 40 years later the rebellion of the Amorites against Egypt began, in the time of the Egypt general Yankhamu, and general chaos resulted in Southern Pal. The Egypt garrison at Jerus (Amarna Tablets, Berlin, No. 102) was withdrawn in his time—about 1480 BC—and it is then (nos. 102-3-4-6, 199) that a fierce people coming from Seir, and called the 'Abiri or Habiri, are noticed by the Amorite king of Jerus as "destroying all the rulers" of the country. They are not named in any of the other Amarna letters (the term gum-gaz, or "man of war," though once applying probably to them, being used of other warriors as well); and the name is geographical for they are called (no. 199) "people of the land of the 'Abiri." The first sign has the guttural sounds 'A and H, and has not the sound K, which has been wrongly attributed to it, making the word to mean Kabiri, "or great ones." Nor can it be rendered "allies," for it is the name of a people, and quite another word is used for "allies" in this correspondence. The date agrees with that mentioned in the OT for the Heb conquest of Pal, and the only objection to the identification of the 'Abiri (who attacked Ajalon, Lachish, Ashkelon and other cities) with the Hebrews is, that it upsets the theory of Lepsius, and the popular views as to the date of the Exodus which he maintained.

Nor is this the only evidence which destroys his theory; for Dr. Flinders Petrie (Contemporary Review, May, 1896) has published an

8. A Text equally important text of the 5th year of Minep- of Minepthah, from Thebes. A slab thah of black syenite, bearing this text, was reused from a temple of Amenophis

III. In it Minepthah boasts of his conquest of the invaders who—as elsewhere stated—attacked the Delta, and penetrated to Belbeis and Heliopolis. He says that "Sutekh [the Hittite god] has turned his back on their chief"; "the Hittites are quieted, Pa-Kan'ana is ravaged with all violence"—this town being otherwise known to have been near Tyre—"the people of Israel is spoiled, it has no seed"; "Ruten has become as the widows of the land of Egypt." Thus, so far from the Exodus having occurred in the 15th year of Minepthah, Israel is noticed 10 years earlier in connection with a place near Tyre with Hittites yet farther N. Even if the Hebrews had only just arrived, they must have left Egypt 40 years before—in the reign of Rameses II—if we attach any value to OT statements; and all the dates variously given by followers of Lepsius are quite upset; whereas the notice of the 'Abiri, two centuries before Minepthah's accession, is quite in accord with this allusion to Israel, as well as with OT chronology.

III. The Theory of Lepsius.—The reasons which influenced Lepsius require, however, to be stated, and the objections to a date for the Heb Conquest about 1480 BC (or a little later) to be considered, since the theory that Rameses II was the Pharaoh of the oppression, and Minepthah the Pharaoh of the Exodus is often said to be a secure result of monumental studies, whereas it is really not so, because the only monumental allusions to Israel and the Hebrews are those just mentioned.

The arguments adduced in favor of the later date are as follows: In the first place, Lepsius (Letters from Egypt, 1842-44) held that no city

1. 1st Argu- called Rameses could have been so ment: City named, or built by the Hebrews, before Rameses the reign of Rameses II, and he placed the site at Heroopolis. This was a very doubtful assumption (see RAMSES), and his identification of the city is now abandoned. The theory always was vitiated by an objection which he seems to have overlooked: for the "land of Rameses" is noticed in the time of Jacob (Gen 47 11), and since it is impossible to suppose that Jacob lived in the time of Rameses II, the followers of Lepsius are obliged to regard this notice as an anachronism, which destroys their case, as it might equally be an anachronism in the account of the Exodus, though it is probably correct.

The second argument is based on the account by Manetho of the expulsion of leprous and unclean tribes from Egypt. Manetho was an

2. 2d Argu- Egypt priest who wrote about 268 BC, ment: Ma- and who evidently hated the Jews. netho's His account only reaches us second- Statements hand through Jos (Cap, I, 14, 15, 26-31), this Heb author rejecting it as fabulous. Manetho apparently said that, after the Hyksos kings had ruled for 511 years, and had fortified Avaris (see ZOAN), they agreed with King Thummosis to leave Egypt, and went through the desert to Jerus, being afraid of the Assyrians (who had no power in Pal at this time). He continued to relate that, after Armeses Miamon (Rameses II) had ruled 66 years, he was succeeded by an Amenophis whom Jos calls a "fictitious king"—and rightly so since the name does not occur in the XIXth Dynasty. Apparently Minepthah was meant—though perhaps confused with Amenophis II—and he is said by Manetho to have sent the leprous people to quarries E. of the Nile, but to have allowed them later to live in Avaris where the shepherds had been. They were induced by Osarsiph, a priest of Heliopolis, to renounce the Egyp gods, and this Osarsiph Manetho identified with Moses. They then induced the shepherds who had been expelled by Thummosis to return from Jerus to Avaris, and Amenophis fled to Memphis and Ethiopia. His son Rhampses (apparently Rameses III is meant) was sent later to expel the shepherd and polluted people, whom he met at Pelusium and pursued into Syria. This story Jos discredits, remarking: "I think therefore that I have made it sufficiently evident that Manetho, while he followed his ancient records, did not much mistake the truth of the history, but that, when he had recourse to fabulous stories without any certain author, he either forged them himself without any probability, or else gave credit to some men who spoke so out of their ill will to us"—a criticism sounder than that of Lepsius, who prefers the libelous account of a prejudiced Egyp priest of the 3d cent. BC, identifying Moses with a renegade priest of Heliopolis named Osarsiph, to the ancient Heb records in the Bible.

A thread of truth underlay Manetho's stories, but it has nothing to do with the Exodus, and the details to be found on Egyp monuments do not agree with Manetho's tale. The Hyksos rulers were not expelled by any Thothmes, but by Aahmes who took Avaris about 1700 BC, and who reopened the quarries of the Arabian chain. Minepthah, about 1265 BC, was attacked in Egypt by Aryan tribes from the N., who had nothing to do with Hyksos chiefs, being Lycians, Sardians and Cilicians. He repelled them, but they again attacked Rameses III (about 1200 BC), and were again driven to the N. No mention of Israel occurs in connection with any of these events.

The story of the leprous Jews was, however, repeated by other Gr writers. Cheremon (see CAP, I, 32) says that Rameses, the son of

4. Greek and Latin Writers Amenophis, defeated and expelled a diseased people led against him, at Pelusium, by Tisithen and Petesiph, whom he identified with Moses and Joseph. Lysimachus said that a scabby people were led by Moses through the desert by Judaea and Jerus in the time of Bocchoris (735 BC). Diodorus Siculus (Fr. of Bk, 34) repeats the tale, about 8 BC, saying that lepers were driven out of Egypt, and were led by Moses who founded Jerus, and "established by law all their wicked customs and practices," and again (Fr. of Bk, 40) that strangers in Egypt caused a plague by their impurity, and being driven out were led by Moses. Tacitus, about 100 AD (Hist, v.ii), believed the Jews to have fled from Crete to Libya and, being expelled from Egypt, to have been led by their "Captains Jerusalem and Judah." Again he says (v.iii) that under Bocchoris (735 BC) there was sickness in Egypt, and that the infected being driven out were led by Moses, and reached the site of their temple on the 7th day.

No true critic of the present time is likely to prefer these distorted accounts of the Exodus, or any of the Gr and Rom calumnies leveled

5. Condition of Egypt under Minepthah against the hated Jews, to the simple narration of the Exodus in the Bible. The historic conditions in the 5th year of Minepthah were very different from those at the time of Moses. The invaders of Egypt reached Belbeis and Heliopolis (see Brugsch, Hist Egypt, II, 117), and Minepthah states, in his text on the wall of the temple of Amon at Thebes, that he had to defend Heliopolis and Memphis against his foes from the E. The region was then "not cultivated but was left as pasture for cattle, on account of the foreigners. It lay waste from the time of our forefathers." The kings of upper Egypt remained in their entrenchments, and the kings of lower Egypt were besieged in their cities by warriors, and had no mercenaries to oppose them. But Israel, as Minepthah himself has told us now, was in Pal, not in Egypt, in this year of his reign; and, far from desiring to expel Asiatic pastoral peoples, the same Pharaoh encouraged their immigration into the region of Goshen (see PRTHOM) laid waste by the Aryan raid.

Objections to the view that the Exodus occurred two centuries and a half before the reign of Minepthah began, and attempts to explain away the statements on his monuments require some notice.

6. Explanations of Minepthah's Statements (1) Pithom was Heroopolis.—The first of these objections is due to the belief that Pithom was Heroopolis, and was a city founded by Rameses II; but this (see PITHOM) is too hazardous a conclusion to suffice for the entire neglect of OT chronology which it involves, since the site of this city is still very doubtful.

(2) Rameses II not named in Judges.—A second objection is made, that the OT shows complete ignorance of Egyp history if it makes Rameses II contemporary with Jgs because he is not named in that book. But OT references to foreign history are always very slight, while on the other hand it is quite probable that there are allusions, in this book, to the events which took place in the reigns of Rameses II, and of Minepthah. The Hebrews were then confined to the mountains (Jgs 1 19) and the Egyptians to the plains. No Pharaoh is mentioned by name in the OT till the time of Rehoboam. In his 8th year Rameses II took various towns in Galilee including Salem (N. of Taanach), Merom, Beth-Anath, Anem and Dapur (Daberath at the foot of Tabor). The revolt of Barak probably occurred about the 25th year of Rameses II, and began at Tabor. In the Song of Deborah (Jgs 5 2), the first words (bi-ph'ra' p'ra'oth), rendered by the LXX (Alex MS) "when the rulers ruled," may be more definitely tr'd "when the Pharaohs were powerful," esp. as Sisera—who commanded the Can. forces—bears a name probably Egyp (ses-Ra, or "servant of Ra"), and may have been an Egyp resident at the court of Jabin. So again when, about 1265 BC, Minepthah says that "Israel is ruined, it has no seed," the date suggests the time of Gideon when wild tribes swarmed over the plains, "and destroyed the increase of the earth, till thou come unto Gaza, and left no sustenance in Israel" (Jgs 6 4). The Midianites and Amalekites may have then joined the tribes from Asia Minor who, in the 5th year of Minepthah, ruined the Hittites and invaded the Delta.

(3) Some Hebrews were never in Egypt.—But another explanation of the presence of Israel in this year on the line of Minepthah's pursuit of these tribes after their defeat has been suggested, namely, that some of the Hebrews never went to Egypt at all. This of course contradicts the account in the Pent (Ex 1 1-5; 12 41) where we read that all Jacob's family (70 men) went down to Goshen, and that "all the hosts of the Lord" left Egypt at the Exodus; but it is supposed to be supported by a passage (1 Ch 7 21) where we read of one of the sons of Ephraim "whom the men of Gath born in the land slew, because they came down to take away their cattle." Ephraim however was born in Egypt (Gen 41 52), and his sons and "children of the third generation" (50 23) remained there. The meaning no doubt is that men of Gath raided Goshen; and there were probably many such raids by the inhabitants of Philistia during the times of the Hyksos kings, similar to those which occurred in the time of Minepthah and of Rameses III. The objections made to the OT date for the Exodus early in the reign of Amenophis III, or in that of his predecessor Thothmes IV, thus appear to have little force; and the condition of Egypt before the 5th year of Minepthah was unlike that which would have existed at the time of the Exodus. The theory of Lepsius was a purely literary conjecture, and not based on any monumental records. It has been falsified by the evidence of monuments found during the last 20 years, and these are fully in accord with the history and chronology of the OT.

IV. The Numbers.—The historic difficulty with respect to the Exodus does not lie in the account of plagues natural to Egypt even now, 1. Colenso's nor in the crossing of the Red Sea, but Criticism of in a single statement as to the numbers Large of Israel (Ex 12 37), 'about 600,000 Number footmen—strong men—with many children, and also many wanderers.' The women are not mentioned, and it has been supposed that this represents a host of 2,000,000 emigrants at least. The objection was urged by Voltaire, and the consequences were elaborately calculated by Colenso. Even if 600,000 means the total population, the "heroes," or "strong men on foot" would, it is urged, have been as numerous as the largest Assyrian army (120,000 men) employed in the conquest of Syria. With an army of more than half a million Moses would have held control over Egypt and Pal alike; and the emigrants, even in close column of companies, would have stretched for 20 miles; the births would occur every ten minutes; and the assembly before Sinai would have been impossible.

It is also difficult to suppose, on ordinary calculations of the increase of population, that in 430 years (Ex 12 40), or in 215 years as 2. Increase given in the LXX, a tribe of 70 males of Popu- (Gen 46 26 f; Ex 1 5; 6 14) could have increased to 600,000, or even 100,000 men. But on the other hand we are specially told (Ex 1 7-20) that the children of Israel "increased abundantly," and the comments of Dr Orr (Problem of the OT, 1906, 363-65) on this question should be studied. A young and vigorous nation might multiply much faster than is now usual in the East. Dr. Flinders Petrie has suggested that for "thousand" we should read "families"; but, though the word (elep) sometimes has that meaning (Jgs 6 15; 1 S 10 19; 23 23), it is in the sing., and not in the pl., in the passage in question (Ex 12 37).

It should not be forgotten that variations in numbers are very commonly found in various texts, VSS, and || passages of the OT. Thus for 3. Number instance (1 S 13 5) the Syr version a Cor- reads 3,000 for the 30,000 chariots ruption of mentioned in the Heb and Gr; and Original the LXX (1 K 5 11) gives 20,000 for Statement the 20 measures of oil noticed in the Heb text. The probable reason for these discrepancies may be found in the fact that the original documents may have used numeral signs—as did the Egyptians, Assyrians, Hittites and Phoenicians—instead of writing the words in full as they appear in the NT. These numeral signs—esp. in cuneiform—were apt to be misread, and the sign for "unity" could easily be confused with those denoting "sixty" (the Bab unit) and "an hundred"—if, in the latter case, a short stroke was added. In the opinion of the present writer the difficulty is due to a corruption of the original statement, which occurred during the course of some fifteen centuries, or more, of continued recopying; but the reader will no doubt form his own conclusions as to this question.

The general questions of the credibility of that history of the Exodus which is given us in the Pent., and of the approximate date of the 4. Review event, have been treated above in the light of the most recent monumental information. No reference has yet been found in Egypt records to the presence of Israel in the Delta, though the Hebrews are noticed as present in Pal before the 5th year of Minepthah. The Pharaohs as a rule—like other kings—only recorded their victories, and no doubt reckoned Israel only as a tribe of those "hostile Shasu" (or "nomads") whom the Theban kings of the XVIIIth Dynasty drove back into Asia. It would be natural that a disaster at the Red Sea should not be noticed in their proud records still extant on the temple walls in Egypt. See also WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

 2. Examination of Objections

LITERATURE
(NOTE.—For the signs J (Jahwist), E (Elohist), P or PO (Priest Codex), R (Redactor) cf art. GENESIS.)

1. In General.—The second book of the Pent bears in the LXX the name of Ἔξοδος, Exodos, in the Vulg accordingly Ex, on the basis 1. Name of the chief contents of the first half, dealing with the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt. The Jews named the book after the first words: וְאֵלֶּה שְׁמֵי מִדְּבָר (sh'mê mîd'vâr "and these are the names"), or sometimes after the first noun שְׁמֵי ("names"), a designation already known to Origen in the form of Ὀνόμασθ, Oualesmôth.

In seven parts, after the Introduction (1 1-7), which furnishes the connection of the contents with Gen, the book treats of (1) the sufferings of Israel in Egypt, for which mere 2. Contents human help is insufficient (1 8-7 7), while Divine help through human mediatorship is promised; (2) the power of Jeh, which, after a preparatory miracle, is glorified through the ten plagues inflicted on Pharaoh and which thus forces the exodus (7 8-13 16); (3) the love of Jeh for Israel, which exhibits itself in a most brilliant manner, in the guidance of the Israelites to Mt. Sinai, even when the people murmur (13 17-18 27); (4) making the Covenant at Mt. Sinai together with the revelation of the Ten Words (20 1 ff) and of the legal ordinances (21 1 ff) as the condition of making the Covenant (19 1-24 18); (5) the directions for the building of the Tabernacle, in which Jeh is to dwell in the midst of His people (24 18-31 18); (6) the renewal of the Covenant on the basis of new demands after Israel's great apostasy in the worship of the Golden Calf, which seemed for the time being to make doubtful the realization of the promises mentioned in (5) above (32 1—35 3); (7) the building and erection of the Tabernacle of Revelation (or Tent of Meeting) and its dedication by the entrance of Jeh (35 4—40 38). As clearly as these seven parts are separated from one another, so clearly again are they most closely connected and constitute a certain progressive whole.

In the case of the last four, the separation is almost self-evident. The first three as separate parts are justified by the ten plagues standing between them, which naturally belong together and cause a division between that which precedes and that which follows. Thus in the first part we already find predicted the hardening of the heart of Pharaoh, the miracles of Jeh and the demonstrations of His power down to the slaying of the firstborn, found in the 2d part (cf 2 23—7 7).

In part 3, the infatuation of Pharaoh and the demonstration of the power of Jeh are further unfolded in the narrative of the catastrophe in the Red Sea (14 4.17). Further the directions given with reference to the Tabernacle (chs 25—31 taken from P) presuppose the Decalogue (from E); cf e.g. 25 16.21; 31 18; as again the 6th section (chs 32 ff) presupposes the 5th part, which had promised the continuous presence of God (cf 32 34 J; 33 3.5.7 ff JE; vs 12.14—17 J; 34 9 J, with 25 8; 29 45 f P; cf also the forty days in 34 28 J with those in 24 18 P) as in 34 1.28 J and vs 11—27 J refers back to the 4th part, viz. 20 1 ff E; 21 1 ff E; 24 7 JE (Decalogue; Books of the Covenant; Making the Covenant). In the same way the last section presupposes the third, since the cloud in 40 34 ff P is regarded as something well known (cf 13 21 f JE; 14 19 E and J, 24 J). The entire contents of the Book of Ex are summarized in an excellent way in the word of God to Israel spoken through Moses concerning the making of the covenant: "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself. Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be mine own possession from among all peoples: for all the earth is mine: and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation" (Ex 19 4-6). Here reference is made to the powerful deeds of God done to the Egyptians, to His deeds of lovingkindness done to Israel in the history of how He led them to Sinai, to the selection of Israel, and to the conditions attached to the making of the covenant, to God's love, which condescended to meet the people, and to His holiness, which demands the observance of His commandments; but there is also pointed out here the punishment for their transgression. The whole book is built on one word in the preface to the ten commandments: "I am Jeh thy God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage" (20 2 E; cf 29 45 f P).

The events which are described in the Book of Ex show a certain contrast to those in Gen. In the first eleven chapters of this latter book we have the history of mankind; then beginning with 11 27, a history of families, those of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. In Ex we have following this the beginning of the history of the chosen people. Then there is also a long period of time intervening between the two books. If Israel was 430 years in Egypt (cf 12 40 f P; also Gen 15 13 J; see III, 4 below), and if the oppression began during the long reign of the predecessors of the Pharaoh, during whose reign Israel left the country (2 23; 1 8), then, too, several centuries must have elapsed between the real beginning of the book (1 8 ff), and the conclusion of Gen. Notwithstanding these differences, there yet exists the closest connection between the two books.

3. Connection with the Other Books of the Pentateuch

Ex 1 1-7 connects the history of the people as found in Ex with the family history of Gen, by narrating how the seventy descendants of Jacob that had migrated to Egypt (cf Ex 1 5; Gen 46 27) had come to be the people of Israel, and that God, who offers Himself as a liberator to Moses and the people, is also the God of those fathers, of whom Gen spoke (cf Ex 3 6 JE, vs 13 E, 15 f R; 4 5 J; 6 3 P). Indeed, His covenant with the fathers and His promises to them are the reasons why He at all cares for Israel (2 24 P; 6 8 P; 33 1 JE), and when Moses intercedes for the sinful people, his most effective motive over against God is found in the promises made to the patriarchs (32 13 JE).

As is the case with Gen, Ex stands in the closest connection also with the succeeding books of the Pent. Israel is certainly not to remain at Sinai, but is to come into the promised land (3 17 JE; 6 8 P; 23 20 ff JE; 32 34 J; 33 1 ff JE; vs 12 ff J; 34 9 ff J and D; cf also the many ordinances of the Books of the Covenant; 21 1 ff E; 34 11 ff D and J). In this way the narratives of the following books, which begin again in Nu 10 11 ff P and JE with the story of the departure from Sinai, continue the history in Ex. But the legislation in Lev also is a necessary continuation and supplement of the Book of Ex, and is prepared for and pointed to in the latter. The erection of the burnt-offering altar (27 1 ff; 38 1 ff), as well as the mention made of the different kinds of sacrifices, such as the burnt sacrifices and the sin offering (29 18.14) and of the heave offering (29 28), point to the promulgation of a law of sacrifices such as we find in Lev 1-7. The directions given in regard to the consecration of the priests (Ex 29) are carried out in Lev 8 f. The indefinite commands of 30 10 in reference to the atonement on the horn of the incense altar once every year renders necessary the special ritual of the Day of Atonement in Lev 16 as its supplement. The more complete enlargement in reference to the shewbread mentioned in 25 30 is found in Lev 24 5-9; and even the repetitions in references to the candlesticks (Ex 25 31 ff; Lev 24 1-4; Nu 8 1-4), as also the tāmidh ("continuous") sacrifices (cf Nu 28 3-8 with Ex 29 38-42), point to a certain connection between Ex and the following books. How close the connection between Dt and Ex is, both in regard to the historical narratives and also to their legal portions (cf the Decalogue and the Books of the Covenant), can only be mentioned at this place.

When we remember the importance which the exodus out of Egypt and the making of the covenant had for the people of Israel, and that these events signalized the birth of the chosen people and the establishment of the theocracy, then we shall understand why the echo of the events recorded in Ex is found throughout later lit., viz. in the historical books, in the preaching of the prophets and in the Pss, as the greatest events in the history of the people, and at the same time as the promising type of future and greater deliverances. But as in the beginning of the family history the importance of this family for the whole earth is clearly announced (Gen 12 1-3), the same is the case here too at the beginning of the history of the nation, perhaps already in the expression "kingdom of priests" (Ex 19 6), since the idea of a priesthood includes that of the transmission of salvation to others; and certainly in the conception 'first-born son of Jeh' (4 22), since this presupposes other nations as children born later.

The passages quoted above are already links connecting this book with Christianity, in the ideas of a general priesthood, of election and of sonship of God. We here make mention of a few specially significant features from among the mass of such relationships to Chris-clarity. How great a significance the Decalogue, in which the law is not so intimately connected with what is specifically Jewish and national, as e.g. in the injunctions of the Priest Codex, according to the interpretation of Christ in Mt 5, has attained in the history of mankind! But in Mt 5 17 ff Jesus has vindicated for the law in all its parts an everlasting authority and significance and has emphasized the eternal kernel, which accordingly is to be assigned to each of these legal behests; while Paul, on the other hand, esp. in Rom, Gal and Col, emphasizes the transitory character of the law, and discusses in detail the relation of the Mosaic period to that of the patriarchs and of the works of the law to faith, while in 2 Cor 3 he lauds the glory of the service in the spirit over that of the letter (cf Ex 34)—an idea which in reference to the individual legal institutions is also carried out in the Ep. to the He. Cf on this subject also the arts. LEVITICUS and DAY OF ATONEMENT. Then too the Passover lamb was a type of Jesus Christ (cf e.g. 1 Cor 5 7; Jn 19 36; 1 Pet 1 19). In Ex 12 the Passover rite and the establishment of the covenant (24 3-8) are found most closely connected also with the Lord's Supper and the establishment of the New Covenant. In the permanent dwelling of God in the midst of His people in the pillar of fire and in the Tabernacle there is typified His dwelling among mankind in Christ Jesus (Jn 1 14) and also the indwelling of the Holy Ghost in the Christian congregation (1 Pet 2 5; Eph 4 12) and in the individual Christian (1 Cor 3 16; 6 19; 2 Cor 6 16; Jn 14 23). The Apocalypse particularly is rich in thought suggested by the exodus out of Egypt. Unique thoughts in reference to the OT are found in the conceptions that the law was given through angels (Acts 7 53; Gal 3 19; He 2 2); further that the rock mentioned in Ex 17 6 followed, and was Christ (1 Cor 10 4); and that in He 9 4 the real connection of the altar of incense with the Holy of Holies appears as changed into a local connection (Ex 40 26,27), while the idea found in He 9 4 that the manna was originally in the Ark of the Covenant, is perhaps not altogether excluded by Ex 16 33; and the number 430 years, found in Gal 3 17, probably agrees with Ex 12 40,41, in so far as the whole of the patriarchal period could be regarded as a unit (cf on the reading of the LXX in Ex 12 40,41, III, 4 below).

5. Connecting Links with Christianity

II. Structure of the Book according to the Scriptures and according to Modern Analyses.—In the following section (a) serves for the understanding of the Bib. text; (b) is devoted to the discussion and criticism of the separation into sources. (a) The conviction must have been awakened already by the general account of the contents given in 1, 2 above, that in the Book of Ex we are dealing with a rounded-off structure, since in seven mutually separated yet intimately connected sections, one uniform fundamental thought is progressively carried through. This conviction will only be confirmed when the details of these sections are studied, the sections being themselves again organically connected by one leading thought. Since, in addition, the Book of Gen is clearly divided into ten parts by the ten tôl'dhōth ("generations") (cf also the division made by typical numbers in arts. LEVITICUS and DAY OF ATONEMENT), thus too the number seven, as itself dividing the Book of Ex into seven parts, is probably not accidental; and this all the less, as in the subordinate parts too, a division is to be found according to typical numbers, this in many cases appearing as a matter of course, and in other cases traced without difficulty, and sometimes lying on the surface (cf 10 plagues, 10 commandments). Yet in all of the following investigations, as is the case in the arts. GENESIS, LEVITICUS and DAY OF ATONEMENT, the demonstration of the fundamental thought must be the main thing for us. The division according to typical numbers is to be regarded merely as an additional confirmation of the literary unity of the book. We refer here first of all to a number of cases, where certain numbers independently of the separate chief parts combine the Bib. text into a unity. In Nu 14 22 R, Jeh states that Israel had now tempted Him and been disobedient to Him ten times: cf Ex 14 11 ff JE (?) (Red Sea); 15 23 f JE (Marah); 16 2,3 P; ver 20 JE; vs 27,28 R (Manna); 17 1 ff JE (Massah and Meribah); 32 1 ff JE (Golden Calf); Nu 11

1 ff JE (Taberah); vs 4 ff JE (Graves of Lust); 14 2 ff P and JE (Spies). Most of these cases are accordingly reported in the Book of Ex, but in such manner that in this particular a clearly marked progress can be noticed, as Jeh does not begin to punish until Ex 32; but from here on He does so with constantly increasing severity, while down to Ex 32 grace alone prevails, and in this particular, previous to Ex 32, there is found nothing but a warning (16 27). Ten times it is further stated of Pharaoh, in a great variety of forms of expression, that he hardened his own heart (7 13 P; ver 14 JE; ver 22 P; 8 15 P; ver 32 JE; 9 7,34,35 JE; 13 15 D); ten times the hardening is ascribed to God (4 21 JE; 7 3 P; 9 12 P; 10 1 R; ver 20 JE; ver 27 E; 11 10 R; 14 4,8 P; 17 P?). Here already we must note that within the narrative of the miracles and the plagues at first there is mention made only of the hardening by Pharaoh himself (7 13 P; ver 14 JE; ver 22 P; 8 11 ff; 8 15 P; ver 28 JE; 9 7 JE, i.e. seven times) before a single word is said that God begins the hardening; and this latter kind of hardening thereupon alone concludes the whole tragedy (14 4,8 P; 17 P?). Ten months cover the time from the arrival at Sinai (19 1 P) to the erection of the sacred dwelling-place of God (40 17 P). Since, further, exactly three months of this time are employed in 19 10,16 JE; 24 3 ff JE; ver 16 P (ten days); 24 18 P (40 days); 34 28 J (40 days), there remain for the building of the tabernacle exactly seven months.

(b) What has been said does anything but speak in favor of the customary division of Ex into different sources. It is generally accepted that the three sources found in Gen are also to be found in this book; in addition to which a fourth source is found in Ex 13 3-16, of a Deuteronomistic character. It is true and is acknowledged that the advocates of this hypothesis have more difficulties to overcome in Ex than in Gen, in which latter book too, however, there are insufficient grounds for accepting this view, as is shown in the art. GENESIS. Beginning with Ex 6 the chief marks of such a separation of sources falls away as far as P and J are concerned, namely, the different uses of the names of God, Elohim and Jeh. For, according to the protagonists of the documentary theory, P also makes use of the name Jeh from this chapter on; E, too, does the same from Ex 3 13 ff on, only that, for a reason not understood, occasionally the word Elohim is still used by this source later on, e.g. 13 17 ff; 18 1 ff. But as a number of passages using the name Elohim are unhesitatingly ascribed by the critics to J, this difference in the use of the name of God utterly fails to establish a difference of sources. To this is to be added, that J and E are at this place closely interwoven; that, while the attempt is constantly being made to separate these two sources, no generally accepted results have been reached and many openly acknowledge the impossibility of such a separation, or admit that it can be effected only to a very limited extent. Peculiarities which are regarded as characteristic of the different sources, such as the sin of Aaron in J, the staff of Moses in E, Sinai in J and P, Horeb in E, the dwelling of the Israelites in Goshen in J, but according to E their living in the midst of the Egyptians, and others, come to nought in view of the uniform text in the passages considered. This has been proved most clearly, e.g. by Eerdmans in his Alttestamentliche Studien, III ("Das Buch Exodus") in regard to many of these passages. Narratives of a similar character, like the two stories in which Moses is described as striking the rock to produce water (Ex 17 1; Nu 20 1 ff), are not duplicates, but are different events. Cf the different localities in Ex 17 7 and Nu 20 1, as also the improbability that Israel would without cause in the first passage have put into permanent form the story of its shame, and then in the latter there would have been an uncertainty as to the importance of this locality for the career of Moses; and finally, we must notice the distinction expressly made by the additional statement, "waters of Meribah of Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin," in Nu 27 12-14; Dt 32 51 (cf Ezk 47 19; 48 28). Then, too, these occurrences, if we accept the division into J and E at this place, are not reduced to a single event, since both sources would share in both narratives. The same condition of affairs is found in Ex 16 in so far as JE comes into consideration, and in Ex 18 in comparison with Nu 11. In the case of Nu 11 there is express reference made to a former narrative by the word "again," and in the second case all the details in their differences point to different occurrences. Concerning other so-called duplicates in Ex, see later in this article. But the acceptance of P in contradistinction to the text of JE does also not lead to tangible results, notwithstanding that there exists a general agreement with regard to the portions credited to P. Not taking into consideration certain that are peculiar, the following sections are attributed to this source: 1 1-7.13-15; 2 23b-25; 6 2-7 13 (6 28-30 R); 7 19.20a.21b.22; 8 1-3.11b-15; 9 8-12; 12 1-20.28.37a.40-50; 13 1-2.20; 14 1-4.8-10.15-18? 21aa.22-23.29; 16 1-3.9-14.15b-18.21-26.31-32.34a.35; 17 1a; 19 1.2a; 24 15-31 17; 34 29-40 38. It is claimed that in the Book of Gen these sources constitute the backbone of the whole work; but this is not claimed for Ex. The sections ascribed to P constitute in this place, too, anything but an unbroken story. In both language and substance they are, to a certain extent, most closely connected with the parts ascribed to JE, and in part they are indispensable for the connection whence they have been taken (cf for details below). It is absolutely impossible to separate on purely philological grounds in the purely narrative portions in Ex the portions belonging to P. That genealogies like 6 14 ff, or chronological notices like 12 40.41.51; 16 1; 19 1, or directions for the cultus like 12; 25 ff have their own peculiar forms, is justified by self-evident reasons; but this does not justify the acceptance of separate authors. It is the result of the peculiar matter found in each case. We must yet note that the passages attributed to P would in part contain views which could not be harmonized with the theological ideas ascribed to this source, which are said to include an extreme transcendental conception of God; thus in 16 10 the majesty of Jeh suddenly appears to the congregation, and in 40 34 ff this majesty takes possession of the newly erected dwelling. In 8 19 mention is made of the finger of God, and in 7 1 Moses is to be as God to Pharaoh. In Ex 12 12 the existence of the Egypt gods is presupposed and the heathen sorcerers are able to act in competition with Moses and Aaron for a while; 7 11.12.22; 8 3. P also describes the Passover, which on account of the handling of the blood in 12 7 cannot be regarded in any other light than as a sacrifice in the house, and in Nu 9 7.13, this act is expressly called a korban Jahwe ('sacrifice of Jeh'). Cf also the commands in Ex 12 10.43.48. But more than anything else, what has been said under (a) above goes to show that all these sources have been united in a way that characterizes the work of a systematic writer, and declares against any view that would maintain that these sources have been mechanically placed side by side and interwoven into each other. What has here been outlined for the whole book in general must now be applied to the different parts in particular.

(1) 1 8-7 7: (a) Everything that is narrated in this section, which in so worthy a manner introduces the whole book, is written from a standpoint of the Egypt oppression, from which human help could give no deliverance, but from which the mighty power of Jeh, working through human agency, offered this deliverance. It is a situation which demands faith (4 31). This section naturally falls into ten pericopes, of which in each instance two are still more closely connected. Nos. 1+2 (1 8-14.15-22), namely, the oppression through forced labor and the threat to take the life of the newly born males of the Israelites; and in contrast to this, the Divine blessing in the increase of the people in general and of the midwives in particular; nos. 3+4 (2 1-10.11-22), namely, the birth and youth of Moses stand in contrast. The child seems to be doomed, but God provides for its deliverance. Moses, when grown to manhood, tries to render vigorous assistance to his people through his own strength, but he is compelled to flee into a far-off country. Nos. 5+6 (2 23-4 17; 4 18-31) report the fact that also in the reign of a new Pharaoh the oppression does not cease, and that this causes God to interfere, which in 2 23-25 is expressed in strong terms and repeatedly, and this again leads to the revelation in the burning bush (3 1 ff). And at the same time the narrative shows how little self-confidence Moses still had (three signs, a heavy tongue, direct refusal). The sixth pericope and also the beginning of the last four, describe, from an external viewpoint, the return of Moses to Midian, and his journey from there to Egypt. Here, too, mention is made of the troubles caused by Pharaoh, which God must remove through His power. This deliverance is not at all deserved by Israel, since not even any son in a family had up to this time been circumcised. On the other hand, everything here is what can be expected. Those who sought the life of Moses had died; the meeting with Aaron at the Mount of the Lord; in Egypt the faith of the people. In an effective way the conclusion (4 31) returns to the point where the two companion narratives (2 24 ff) begin. After this point, constituting the center and the chief point in the introductory section, nos. 7+8 (5 1-6 1; 6 2-12), everything seems to have become doubtful. Pharaoh refuses to receive Moses and Aaron; the oppression increases; dissatisfaction in Israel appears; Moses despairs; even the new revelations of God, with fair emphasis on fidelity to the Covenant which is to unfold Jeh's name in full, are not able to overcome the lack of courage on the part of the people and of Moses. Nos. 9+10, introduced by 6 13 (6 14-27 and 6 28-7 7), show that after Moses and Aaron have already been mentioned together in 4 14.27 ff; 5 1 ff, and after it has become clear how little they are able of themselves to accomplish anything, they are now here, as it were, for the first time, before the curtain is raised, introduced as those who in the following drama are to be the mediators of God's will (cf the concluding verses of both pericopes, 6 27; 7 7), and they receive directions for their common mission, just at that moment when, humanly speaking, everything is as unfavorable as possible.

(b) The unity of thought here demonstrated is in this case too the protecting wall against the flood-tide of the documentary theory. For this theory involves many difficulties. In 1 13 f there would be an account of the oppression by P, but the motive for this can be found only in the preceding verses, which are ascribed to JE: 2 24 speaks of the Covenant of God with Isaac, concerning which P is said to have reported nothing in the Book of Gen, as in the latter book a reference to this matter is found only in 26 2-5 R; 26 24 J. In 6 2 ff Moses and Aaron are mentioned; but as the text of P reads we know absolutely nothing from this source as to who these men are. According to 7 1 ff Aaron is to be the speaker for Moses before Pharaoh. But according to P neither Moses nor Aaron speaks a single word. The omissions that are found by critics in documents J and E—which, if they are separated, have lines of demarcation claimed for the separation that are very unsettled—we here pass over in silence.

On the critical theory, the narratives of P. in the Book of Ex. as also in Gen. would have discarded many of the stereotyped formulas characteristic of this source (cf. § 23 ff.; § 2 ff.; 7 1 ff.), and in both form and contents would be made very similar to the rest of the text 1 9 10 12 JE; 1 20 E; 7 1 P; and to a great extent expressions similar to those are here found and in part refer to these. The same must be said concerning § 7 JE in its relation to § 23 ff. P; § 6 ff. (publisha) P in its relation to 1 11 JE; § 11 E; § 4 5 JE (in contrast to 13 14; § 23). JE, in § 9 for "dry land," makes use of the term le-yabba'ah, which in Gen 1 9 f and Ex 14 16 is ascribed to P, and a different expression is used for this thought by J in Gen 7 22. In reference to 7 1 P cf. 4 14 E (?). In reference to the hardening of Pharaoh, which is found in all the sources (7 3 P), see above under 1a; in reference to the miracles, and their purpose of making Yahweh known to the Egyptians (7 3-5 P) see the following paragraph. The four generations mentioned in 7 14 ff. P and their J in Gen 15 16 J (cf. 4 5 8 ff.); and the sons of Aaron mentioned in § 23 P, Nadab and Abihu, are mentioned also in the text of 24 19, ascribed to JE although, except in Lev 10 P, their names are not found elsewhere in the Pent. In reference to the repetitions, it must be said that 1 13 P is either the continuation (in so far as the Israelites instead of being compulsory laborers became slaves), or is a concluding summary, such as is found frequently. The new revelation of God in Ex 6 P, according to ch. 3 JE, finds its psychological and historical motive in the account of the failure described in § 1 ff. JE, and in the discouragement of the Israelites and of Moses resulting therefrom. In the same way the renewed mention by Moses of his difficulties of speech (§ 12 P; cf. with 4 10 ff. J+E (?)) is very characteristic of human ways, and this again necessitates the twice repeated consideration of this matter by God (§ 30 R; 4 10 ff. J+E (?); concerning the names of God, see Genesis: God, NAMES OF).

(2) 7 8-13 16: (a) This section is separated as a matter of course from the rest by the typical number of ten plagues. It is introduced by the transformation of the rod into a serpent in the presence of Pharaoh (7 8-13). To explain the fact that there were ten plagues on the ground of the accidental combination of sources, is from the very outset a precarious undertaking. To this must be added the following reasons that indicate a literary editing of the material. All of the plagues are introduced by the same formula (7 12 JE; § 1 J; ver 12 P; ver 16 JE; ver 20 JE; § 1 JE; ver 8 P; ver 13 JE; 10 1 12 JE; ver 21 E; 11 1 E), and in connection with each plague the hardening of the heart of Pharaoh is mentioned (cf. [1a] above); cf. 7 22 P; § 11 J; ver 15 P; ver 28 JE; § 7 JE; ver 12 P; ver 34 JE; ver 35 JE; 10 1 R; ver 20 JE; ver 27 E; 11 10 R; 13 15 D. As is the case in the first section, we find here too in each instance two plagues more closely connected, viz. nos. 1+2 already externally united by the double address of Jeh (cf. 7 14 JE; ver 19 P and 7 26 J; § 1 P), but also by the methods of punishment that are related to each other (water changed to blood and frogs); and, finally, by the extension of the plague (the Nile and beyond the river). In 3+4 we have to deal with insects (stinging flies and dung flies); in 5+6 with a kind of pest (pest among cattle, and boils); 7+8 are again formally joined by the repeated command of Jeh to Moses in § 13 22 JE and 10 1 12 JE, as also by the fulness of the account the two show and their similarity, in both also use being made of the staff (§ 23 f JE; 10 13 f JE), in the repetition of the emphasis put on the remarkable character of the plague (§ 18 24; 10 6 14 JE). By both plagues vegetation is destroyed; and in the plague of locusts special reference is made also to the hail (cf. 10 5 12 15). In the case of 9+10, the darkness constitutes a connecting link (cf. 10 21 E; 11 4 J; 12 12 P; 12 30 31 JE). By the side of the occasional rhythm formed of two members there is also one formed of three members (after the manner of a triole in a measure of two beats). In the case of each group of three plagues, two are announced beforehand (thus 1 JEP+2 JP; 4 JE+5 JE; 7 JE+8 JE; 10 EJ over against 3 P, 6 P and 9 E); the first of each group of three plagues, as 1, 4+7, is to be announced by Moses on the following morning to Pharaoh (7 15; § 20; § 13 JE). Also in regard to the impression caused by the plagues a distinct progress can be noticed, in this too, that the Egypt sorcerers are active only down to the third plague. Naturally, too, over against these facts, further peculiarities can be pointed out in the separate plagues, e.g. the fact that Goshen, or rather that Israel, is spared in the 4th, 5th, 7th-10th plagues (§ 22; § 6 26 JE; 10 23 E; 11 7 J); and in the mention made of the intercession in the 2d, 4th, 7th, 8th (§ 8 J; ver 12; § 28 33; 10 17 f JE) without thereby destroying the artistic construction of the whole that has been described above, or that in each such case of individuality of presenting the matter there is to be found a reason for claiming a separate source.

(b) In the same way, too, it is not a permissible conclusion, that in the first miracle and in the first three plagues mention is made of the fact that Aaron performed this miracle with his staff (7 8 ff. 19; § 5-20 ff. P). At any rate, in the parts ascribed to P, no absolute uniformity is to be found, since plagues 1 to 3 are commanded to Moses, while the 6th is commanded to Moses and Aaron (7 19; § 1. 20 over against § 8); and since, further, in the 6th plague (§ 8) it is Moses, and in the 10th (12 12) it is God Himself who really carries out the command, and not Aaron, as was the case in the introductory miracles and in the first three plagues. Further, according to JE (4 30), it appears that the presupposition is that we are to consider all of the addresses and actions in general as taking place through Aaron, even in those cases where this is not esp. mentioned.

Only the 1st plague (7 14 ff.) furnishes an apparent reason for the acceptance of two sources. In this case mention is made at times of the waters of the Nile only, and then of all other waters being changed into blood; and a separation from this point of view at least could be carried through. But this possibility disappears at once in the case of the 2d plague (frogs), where the passage § 1-3, ascribed to P, which verses contain the consummation of the plague announced in 7 26-29 J (Heb.), is altogether necessary for this connection; as otherwise the impression made upon Pharaoh by this plague, which is not mentioned in P at all, would be a torso. The similarity in the construction of the 2d and the 1st plague, however (cf. under [a] above), and the same difference in the mention made of the Nile and of the other waters in the 2d plague, make it possible and even advisable in the case of the first plague, too, to discard the hypothesis of a difference in sources, because in the 2d plague this difference cannot be carried out. Then, too, there would be other omissions found in P. According to the customary separation of sources, P would not contain the fulfilment of the threatened tenth plague announced in 12 12 at all. In the same way the statement in 12 28 refers to the carrying out of a command, the announcement of which to Israel in 12 21 ff. would be found in another source. Further in 12 37a we would have P, as when the parts belonging to P have been eliminated, the other sources too would contain omissions in 12 21 ff, mostly JE; ver 37b E; 13 3 ff D. In the same way the announcement of a large number of miracles (7 3 P; 11 9 R) is too comprehensive, if these verses refer only to the narratives found in P. In addition, there is a remarkable similarity found in all of the narratives of P with those parts which are ascribed to JE; cf the first miracle in 7 8 ff with 4 2 ff J; ver 17 E. In P, too, as is the case with JE, it is stated that the purpose of the miracle is, that Pharaoh, or the Egyptians, or Israel, are to recognize that Jeh is God and the Lord of the earth, or something to this effect (7 5 P; ver 17 JE; 8 10 R; ver 22; 9 14. 29.30 JE; 10 2 R; 11 7 J; cf from the next section, 14 4 P; ver 18 P, which at the same time is also the fundamental thought that forms the connecting link of the whole section). The position of 11 1-3 E between 10 28.29 E and 11 8 J constitutes a difficulty, because in the last-mentioned passages Moses is represented as standing continuously before Pharaoh. The announcement made by Jeh to Moses, that one more plague is to come, and that the Israelites should borrow articles of value from the Egyptians, must in reality have been made before, but for good reasons it is mentioned for the first time at this place, in order to explain the confident utterance of Moses, that he would not again appear before Pharaoh (10 29). But the fact that according to 12 31 JE Pharaoh does in reality once more cause Moses and Aaron to be called, can readily be explained on the ground of the events that happened in the meantime.

The structure of chs 12 f contains nothing that could not have been written by one and the same author. Only Moses naturally did not at once communicate (12 21 ff) to the leading men of Israel the command given in 12 15 ff concerning the unleavened bread, which command had been given for later generations; and not until 13 3 ff is this command mentioned in connection with the order given to the people in the meantime concerning the firstborn (13 1 f). The further fact, that the story of the exodus reaches a preliminary conclusion in 12 42 before the details of the Passover (vs 3 ff) have been given, is in itself justifiable. As far as contents are concerned, everything in chs 12 f, namely, the exodus, the festival of unleavened bread, the firstborn, and orders pertaining thereto, that the month of the exodus is to be regarded as the first month, etc., are closely connected with the Passover and the 10th plague. Because the latter had to be described more fully than the other plagues, we find already in 11 9.10, after the announcement of this plague and its results, a comprehensive notice concerning all the miracles through which Jeh demonstrated how He, amid great manifestations of power (7 4 P) and with a mighty hand (6 1 JE), has led His people forth.

(3) 13 17-18 27: (a) This section finds its connecting thought in the emphasis placed on the love of Jeh, on His readiness to help, and His long-suffering in the leading of His at times murmuring people on the road to and as far as Sinai. This section covers two months. What is narrated, beginning with ch 16 1, transpires even within a single two weeks (cf ch 19 1). No. 1 (13 17-22), describes the journey to Etham (out of love God does not lead the people the direct way, since He fears that they will become unfaithful in the event of a battle; Joseph's bones are taken along, since God now really is taking care of His people [cf Gen 50 24.26]; Jeh's friendly presence is shown in the pillar of fire). No. 2 (14 1-31) contains the passage through the Red Sea (Jeh the helper; cf vs 10.15. 13.14.30.21.24.26 f.31, notwithstanding the murmuring of Israel, vs 11 f). No. 3 (15 1 ff) contains the thanksgiving hymn of Moses for Jeh's help, with which fact each one of the four strophes begins (vs 1 ff.6 ff.11.16b ff). No. 4 (15 20 f) contains Miriam's responsorium. No. 5 (15 22-27) treats of Marah and Elim (Jeh proves Himself to be Israel's helper and physician [vs 25 f] notwithstanding the murmuring of Israel [ver 24]). No. 6 introduces the last five pericopes, with a designation of the time (16 1-36), and describes the miraculous feeding with manna and quails. (The murmuring is particularly emphasized in vs 2.7-9.12. Israel also gathers more than they have been directed to do [vs 16 f]; reserves some for the following day [vs 19 f]; collects some on the Sabbath [ver 27]; Jeh, who in vs 6-12 alone is mentioned in rapid succession no fewer than ten times, at first does not even utter a word of reproach, and when the Sabbath has been violated He does nothing more than reprove.) No. 7 (17 1-7) reports the help of Jeh (ver 4) at the Waters of Contention (Strife). He even appears on the rock (ver 6), notwithstanding the murmuring (vs 2-4.7). No. 8 (17 8-16) describes the victory over the Amalekites, which furnished the occasion for the erection of the memorial altar, called 'Jeh-my-Banner.' Possibly in this connection Joshua ('Jeh helps') was changed from Hosea (Nu 13 16). Cf Hengstenberg, Authentic. des Pentateuches, II, 395 f. No. 9 (18 1-12) shows in a constantly changing variety of expressions that emphasis is laid on the impression which the deeds of God in connection with Israel make on Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, while he was visiting the latter (vs 1.8-12). Effective in this connection is also the mention made of the symbolical names of the sons of Moses (Gershom, 'I have been a sojourner in a foreign land'; and Eliezer, 'The God of my father was my help, and delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh' [vs 3 f]). Further, the name Mount of God (ver 5; cf ver 12) probably is a reminder of the fulfilment of 3 12. No. 10 (18 13-17) shows how God helps Moses (cf ver 19) through the advice of Jethro to appoint judges. In this part, too, 13 17-18 27, we have ten sections, which can easily be arranged in groups of two and two. Thus nos. 1+2 are connected by their analogous beginnings (13 17.18 RE; 14 1.2 P) and by the cloud of fire (13 21 f JE; 14 19.24 J); nos. 3+4 by the responsive hymn; nos. 5+6, which already by the feeling of hunger and thirst are connected in thought, by their reference to the ordinances of Jeh (15 25 D; 16 4 JE?; ver 28 R); nos. 7+8 by the use made of Moses' staff (17 5.9 JE); nos. 9+10 by Jethro's person, and the close connection of their contents in point of time (18 13). Further, the Bib. text of this place is clearly presupposed in the list of stations, expressly stated to have been prepared at the command of Moses (Nu 33). This list, as is acknowledged on all sides, has the characteristics of P; and it takes into consideration not only the portions ascribed to this source, but also the text of JE. Cf 33 9 (Marah and Elim) with Ex 15 22-27, and Nu 33 14 (lack of water in Rephidim) with Ex 17 1 ff.

(b) Over against the analysis into different sources the following data in detail can also be advanced. In P the last demonstration of the power of Jeh over Pharaoh would be indeed endangered in 14 4.15 ff.21a, but afterward would not be related. In ch 16 1 we cannot find in P, unless we bring in also 15 27 from JE, how Israel came to be in Elim. On the other hand, in 16 4 ff (JE?) the promise of bread from heaven is groundless without the preceding verses, which are attributed to P; and without 17 1 P, we do not know to what the word "there" in ver 3 belonging to JE refers, and how in ver 8 JE the Israelites had come to Rephidim.

How entirely data taken from the language utterly fail here in establishing the separation of sources we see from the fact that in Ex the distribution of the different portions and verses between P and E becomes a matter of doubt, and also in Ex 16 a harmony of view has not been gained as to whether only P, or in addition also J, E or JE have contributed to the text. The hymn found in Ex 15 1 ff, which certainly is an old composition, presupposes passages which are assigned to different sources, and in this way speaks for the unity of the text. Cf 15 2 with 14 30 J; ver 13 JE (?); 15 3 with 14 14 JE (?); ver 25 J; ver 4a with 14 9 P; ver 4b with 14 7 JE; ver 8 with 14 22 EP; ver 29 P; with 14 9.

On the other hand, 14 19a and b cannot be utilized in favor of a division of sources E and J; but rather the analogous structure of this passage presupposes the same author, and there is only indicated what elsewhere is always a presupposition, namely, that God Himself has taken His abode somewhere in the cloud of fire (13 21.22 JE; 14 24 J; cf 40 34 ff P). Just as little are the two commands found in 14 16 to be divided between P and E and J, one stating what Moses does, and the other what Jeh does, since both rather belong together (cf 9 22 f with ver 33; 10 13). At first glance 16 6 ff does not appear to be in its proper place, as Moses and Aaron in vs 6.7 have already told Israel what only in vs 9 ff is revealed through the appearance of Jeh and His injunction to Moses. But these very verses are in harmony with the character of the whole section (cf under a above), since it is here stated that under all circumstances Israel is to be convinced of this, that Jeh has proven Himself to be Jeh, and has heard their murmuring. In addition, the appearance of Jeh in ver 10 is clearly announced by ver 7. Accordingly, vs 9 ff serve only to confirm and strengthen what is found in vs 6 ff. The fact that not until in 18 2 JE Jethro brings the wife and the sons of Moses, while the latter himself according to 4 20 J had taken them along when he joined Israel, finds a satisfactory explanation in 18 2b. He sent them back doubtless because of the conduct of Zipporah on the occasion of the circumcision of her son (4 25 J). The fact that Jethro comes to Moses at the Mount of God (18 5 JE), while the latter does not arrive at Mt. Sinai until 19 1 ff according to P and J, is no contradiction; for by the Mount of God is meant the whole chain of Horeb, which Moses has already reached according to 17 6 JE; but Mt. Sinai is a single mountain. The special legal ordinances and decisions mentioned in 18 20 JE before the giving of the law (19 ff E+JE) are in perfect harmony with 15 25 D; 16 4 JE (?); ver 28 R.

(4) 19 1–24 18a: (a) This fourth section contains the conclusion of the covenant at Mt. Sinai (cf 19 5 R at beginning; 24 7.8 JE toward the end). The contents cover a period of ten days (cf 19 10.11.16; 24 3.4 JE; ver 16 P). The text of this section can again be divided into ten pericopes. After the introduction (19 1–8), which contains a cardinal feature of Ex (cf under I, 2 above), nos. 1 and 2 (19 9–19.20–25) report the preparation for the conclusion of the Covenant. No. 2 in ver 23 refers expressly to no. 1, but is distinguished from no. 1 through the new addition in ver 20 after ver 18, as also through the express amplified application of the ordinances referring to purifications and the restriction of the prohibition to the priests (cf vs 22.21.24 with vs 10.12). Nos. 3+4 (20 1–17.18–26) contain the Decalogue and the directions for the cultus, together with a description of the impression made by the revelation of the law. Nos. 5+6 (21 1–23 13) expressly circumscribed by a sub-

ingly contain the laws or the conditions of the Covenant. Now follow in nos. 7+8 the promises of the Covenant (23 20–26.27–33), which in vs 20+27, 23+28 and 24+32 f correspond to each other. Nos. 9+10 (24 3–8.9–18a, combined more closely by vs 1.2) describe the conclusion of the Covenant and the Covenant congregation in different stages. Further, typical numbers at this place also appear in the laws, nos. 3–6. No. 4 (20 18 ff) contains five directions (vs 23a.23b.24.25.26); no. 6 (23 14–19) is divided into 2×5 ordinances (cf the anaphoristic addition in vs 14 and 17), viz. vs 14.15a.15b.16a.16b–17.18a.18b.19a.19b. No. 3 (20 1 ff, the Decalogue) contains, according to 34 28; Dt 4 13; 10 4, "ten words" m, according to the two tables doubtless divided into two groups of five each, no matter how in detail we may divide and number them. In the same way no. 5 (21 1–23 13) falls into ten sections, separate in form and contents, yet belonging together; and these again are divided into 2×5 groups, as will appear presently. Taken altogether then we have in nos. 3–6 (20 1–23 19) 17×5 legal ordinances or groups of laws. While in the historical sections the divisions into 5×2 pericopes was made, we here find three times the division into 2×5, although here too the beginning of the last five pericopes in the second and third sections is particularly noticeable (cf 9 8+16 1), and in the same way a new division can be made at 4 18. No. 5 (21 1–23 13) is, however, divided as follows: I+II (21 2–8.7–11) ordinances for the protection of slaves; III+IV (21 12–17.18–27) protection of life, or liberty, of the dignity of parents, and hygienic laws; V (21 28–22 3) harm to animals; VI (22 4–16) to property; VII (22 17–26) against witchcraft, against imitating the Canaanites, and lack of mercy; VIII (22 27–30) the relation to God; IX+X (23 1–5.6–12) ethical and humane law practice. I–IV accordingly contain laws pertaining to persons; V+VI those referring to things; VII–X, those referring to religion, morality, and administration of justice. But the chief line of demarcation is to be made after V; for I–V contain each four ordinances, VI–X each seven, which in the original text in almost each case are in their language separated from each other by particular conjunctions or by the construction. Only in VI (22 4–16) one command seems to be lacking; for only 22 4.5.6 f.9–12.13 f.15 f are distinguished by the "K" in the beginning; but the seventh ordinance is found in ver 8. Here too, in each case, II+I, two and two as a rule are more closely connected, after the manner of the division in the first three sections, 1 8–7 7; 7 8–13 16; 13 17–18 27; at least this is the case in I+II, III+IV–VII+VIII, IX+X.

(b) In this section, too, 19 1–24 18a, there is no real occasion for a division into sources. It is claimed that P is found only in 19 1.2a; 24 15–18; but 19 1.2a is indispensable for ver 2b on account of the word "there"; and before 24 15 ff there is an omission, if the preceding verses are to be ascribed to a different source. The duplicates 19 8.9; 19 18.20 are best explained by the assumption of a new beginning in ver 9 at ver 20 (cf above); 24 1.2, which at the same time introduces 24 9 ff, is placed before ver 3, because in point of time it belongs here. According to the original text, the tr at this place must read: "To Moses he spoke." In contrast to the ordinances which, in 21 1 ff, are addressed to the congregation of Israel. Certainly 24 3–8 is purposely formulated to show in almost the same words that ver 3 reports the violation and vs 4 ff the writing of the decision to obey on the part of Israel (vs 3b and 7b). It is not perfectly clear to the reader where Moses was during the promulgation of the Decalogue, whether upon the mountain or at the foot of the mountain (cf 19 24 f; 20 18 ff; but also Dt 5 6). In view of the importance of the matter itself and the vividness of the narrative and the continual change in the place where Moses abode, it is psychologically easily understood that the clearness of the account has suffered somewhat.

(5) 24 18b–31 18: (a) During the forty days which Moses tarries with God on the mountain, and at the conclusion of which he receives the two tables of the law (31 18), God converses with him seven times (25 1; 30 11.17.22.34; 31 1.12). No. 1 (25 1–30 10) contains directions in reference to the building of the Tabernacle, and laws for the priests serving in it. Nos. 2–6 bring a number of directions supplementing no. 1, namely, no. 2 (30 11–16), individual tax; no. 3 (30 17–21), copper washing vessels; no. 4 (30 22–33), oil for anointing; no. 5 (30 34–38), incense; no. 6 (31 1–11), the calling of Bezalel and Aholiab to be the master builders; additionally and in conclusion, no. 7 (31 12–17), the Sabbath command. It is probably not accidental that the Sabbath idea is touched upon 7 t, namely, in addition to the present passage, also in (a) 16 5 JE (?); vs 23–29 P+R; (b) 20 8–11 E; (c) 23 10–12 E; (d) 24 16 P; (e) 34 21 J; (f) 35 1–3 P, and that as is the case in this present passage, other passages too, such as 24 16 P; 35 1–3 P conclude a main section, and 22 10–22 a subordinate section, with this reference.

The first more complete pericope itself (25 1–30 10) is, however, divided into 12 pieces (we cannot at this place enter into details in reference to the typical numbers found so often in the measurements of the Tabernacle, but can refer only to the cubical form of the Holy of Holies on the basis of 10 cubits), viz. (1) contributions for the sanctuary (25 1–9); (2) the holy ark (25 10–22); (3) table of shewbread (25 23–30); (4) golden candlesticks (25 31–40); (5) tabernacle (26 1–37) in which at the same time the articles mentioned from 2 to 4 are placed (cf vs 33 ff); (6) altar for burnt sacrifices (27 1–8); (7) court (27 9–19) in which this altar stood (cf 40 29.33); (8) oil for the lights (27 20.21); (9) sacred garments for the priests (28 1–43); (10) consecration of priests (29 1–37); (11) the burnt sacrifices (29 38–46); (12) incense altar (30 1–10). The five articles included in 8 to 12 are combined into a contrast to the five in 1 to 7 by their express reference to the priests (cf in addition to 9+10 also 27 21; 29 44; 30 7 f.10). With the incense altar, which was of great importance, and of equal importance with the great altar on the Day of Atonement (30 10), this section closes (cf [b]).

Thus it will under all circumstances be better to search for an explanation for putting oil in the place of the candlesticks and of the incense altar, which at first seems surprising, than in the case of every difficulty to appeal to a redactor's working without system or order. However, the entire portion 24 18b–31 18 finds its explanation in the promise of 25 8 that Jeh will dwell in the midst of Israel (cf 29 45 f). He is enthroned on the ark, in which the accusing law as the expression of the Divine will is deposited (for this reason called hā-'ēdhūth; 25 16.21; 26 33.34), but above the atonement lid, the kappōreth, at which on the Day of Atonement, the atonement ceremony is carried out (cf 25 17–22; Lev 16; see DAY OF ATONEMENT).

(b) This whole section, with the exception of 31 18 E (?) is ascribed to P, although at this place, though without good reasons, different strata are distinguished. In regard to the contradiction claimed to exist in the different persons to be anointed (high priest, or all the priests; cf 29 7 over against 28 41; 29 21), see LEVITICUS. Also the duplicates of the āmīdā sacrifice and of the candlesticks (cf I, 3, above) are not at all the decisive factor in proof of a difference of sources within the parts treating of the priests, providing it can be shown that each passage stands where it belongs. With regard to the candlesticks, see LEVITICUS. In addition of passages like Mt 10 39+16 25; 10 22+24.13; 6 14 ff+18 35; 5 29 f+18 8 ff; 19 30+20 16. But as far as attributing certain passages to P in general is concerned, it is self-evident that ordinances referring to the cultus make use of technical terms pertaining to the cultus, without this fact justifying any conclusion as to a particular author or group of authors. On the other hand, it could not at all be understood how P could so often call the Decalogue hā-'ēdhūth, without having contained this all-important law itself (cf 25 16.21 f; 26 33 f; 34 29; 38 21, etc.). On the other hand, as is well known, the fourth commandment (Ex 20 8–11 E) expressly refers back to Gen 2 2.3, that is, to P; also 23 15 to 13 20.

(6) 32 1–35 3: (a) God's promise to dwell in the midst of Israel, the turning-point in the fifth section, seems to have become a matter of doubt, through the apostasy of Israel, but is nevertheless realized in consequence of the intercession of Moses and of the grace of God, which, next to His primitive holiness, is emphasized very strongly. This entire sixth section is to be understood from this standpoint. As was the case in the preceding section, the forty days are prominent in this too (cf 34 28 J with 24 18 P). We can divide the contents here also into ten pericopes. No. 1 (32 1–14) reports that Jeh tells Moses of the idolatry with the golden calf, that He is determined to destroy Israel, but is influenced to change this determination by the intercession of Moses. No. 2 (32 15–29) describes the wrath of Moses and the punishment through him. He breaks the tablets into pieces, grinds the golden calf into powder, reproves Aaron, dissolves through the Levites the curse which had for this reason impended over them since Gen 49 5–7 and causes this to be changed into a blessing: three thousand killed. No. 3 (32 30–35) reports that Jeh at the petition of Moses will send some of His angels, but later on will punish the people for their sins. No. 4 (33 1–6) reports that Jeh Himself no longer accompanies His people, which, on the one hand, is an act of grace, since the presence of God would even harm the people, but on the other hand is a punishment, and is felt as such by Israel. No. 5 (33 7–11) declares that God meets Moses only outside of the camp in a tent, but communes with him face to face. No. 6 introduces the last six pericopes in a natural way, since God's grace is appearing in constantly increasing glory (33 12–33). Here we have the petition of Moses to Jeh that He in person should accompany him and show him His glory (Jeh's grace is made esp. prominent in vs 12.13.16.17.19). No. 7 (34 1–10) describes the preparation for the new conclusion of the covenant; Jeh appears to Moses as the gracious, merciful, long-suffering kind, and faithful God, so that Moses again appeals to His grace. No. 8 (34 11–28) describes the new establishment of the covenant on the basis of the renewal of the Divine and grandiose promises of ordinances pertaining to religion and cultus, and the ten words. No. 9 (34 29–35) describes how, in consequence of his close communion with God, Moses' face shines. No. 10 (35 1–3) contains the Sabbath command (see [5a]). Nos. 9 and 10 give expression to the renewed covenant relationship. If we again in the larger group 1 to 8 take two and two together we find that each of these four groups contains a petition of Moses: 32 11 ff; 33 30–32; 33 12 ff; 33 8.9. The entire section brings out equally prominently the love and the holiness of God, and does this in such a way that both characteristics find their expression in each group of two of these ten numbers. The progress beyond the third section (leading Israel to Sinai) is noticeable, since the murmuring is in each case followed only by an expression of the love of God; but equally this present section stands in contrast to Nu 11 ff, where, on the occasion of the continuous murmuring of Israel the love of God is not indeed ignored, but it must take a place in the background as compared with His punitive holiness, which is particularly apparent in the story of the return of the spies in Nu 14 11 ff. Here is at once seen the great similarity with the present section of Nu 14 12.15.16.17 ff and with Ex 32 10.12; 34 6 f, but at the same time the great difference caused by a divergence of the events (cf Nu 14 21 ff). In contrast to this, 32 34 refers back to Nu 14, and 32 35 is a proleptic judgment based on this experience.

(b) It is incomprehensible how critics have found in the renewal of the covenant caused by the apostasy of Israel and in the conditions of this renewal, viz. in the Books of the Covenant and in the Decalogue, duplicates, which are distributed between E and J (Ex 20 1 ff; 21 ff; 24 8—34 1 ff. 28; 34 11—26; 34 27). But in Ex 34 11—26 there is no sign of the number ten being used in connection with the ordinances referring to the religion and the cultus. Goethe's attempt to find at this place the original Decalogue, which effort is constantly being repeated, is accordingly without any foundation, even in the use of the number ten. In ver 28b, according to ver 1 and tradition (cf Dt 10 2.4; also Ex 24 12; 31 18), Jeh is to be regarded as the subject. Again 33 4 and 5 ff are not duplicates. In ver 4 the people are described as having laid aside their ornaments a single time as a sign of repentance; according to vs 5.6 the people permanently dispense with these, a state of mind which makes it possible for God again to show His mercy. It is an arbitrary assumption that these ornaments were used in the construction of the Tabernacle, the building of which had been announced beforehand in Ex 25 ff, so that in front of 33 7 a || account to 35 ff P taken from JE would have been omitted. In 33 7 ff according to the text the author has in mind a tent already in existence, which up to this time had been standing within the camp and now had to be taken without, because Jeh for the present can no longer dwell in the midst of the people (32 34; 33 3.5), until Moses, through his intercession, again makes this possible (33 15—17; 34 9.10). And the promised tabernacle takes the place of the provisional tent (chs 35 ff), which, as is done by the LXX, is probably to be preferred to Moses' own tent. In P, to whom 34 29 ff is attributed, such a provisional arrangement is presupposed in ver 35, since already at this place, and before the building of the tabernacle in chs 35 ff, mention is made of the fact that Moses entered for the purpose of receiving the revelation of God. This accordingly presupposes what is reported in 33 7 ff. Even without the facts mentioned and for other reasons, too, an omission must be accepted before 34 29 ff; for ver 29 speaks of the tables of the Law, concerning the origin of which P has reported nothing; and in ver 32 concerning the commandments which Moses received on Mt. Sinai and had imparted to the people, which, however, do not refer to the directions that were given in 25 ff, since these, according to 35 4 ff, are yet to be expressly communicated to the people.

(7) 35 4—40 38: (a) The construction of the Tabernacle. This section is divided into four pericopes, each with four subdivisions (cf Structure of Leviticus 16 in DAY OF ATONEMENT). The same principle of division is found also in the history of Abraham and in Dt 12—26. No. I (35 4—36 7) describes the preparation for the construction: (1) 35 4—19 appeals for contributions for this purpose; (2) 35 20—29, contributions; (3) 35 30—36 1, characterization of the builders; (4) 36 2—7, delivering the contributions to the builders. Nos. II and III (36 8—38 31; 39 1—31) report the construction of the Tabernacle and the preparation of the priests' garments (cf 39 32.1); no. II: (1) 36 8—38, dwelling place; (2) 37 1—38 9, utensils; (3) 38 10—20, court; (4) 38 24—31, cost of 1—3; no. III (1) 39 2—7, shoulder garment; (2) vs 8—21, pocket; (3) vs 22—26, outer garment; (4) vs 27—31, summary account concerning coats, miter, bonnets, breeches, girdle, diadem. No. IV (39 32—40 38) reports the completion: (1) 39 32—43, consecration of these objects; (2) 40 1—15, command to erect; (3) vs 16—33, carrying out this command; (4) vs 34—38, entrance of the glory of Jeh. In this way the dwelling of Jeh, which had been promised in 25 8 P, and in chs 32—34 JE had been uncertain, has become a reality. The whole section is closely connected with chs 25—31, yet is independent in character. The full details found in both groups are completely justified by the importance of the object. It is self-evident that at this place, too, the language of the cultus is demanded by the object itself.

(b) The attempts to distribute this section among different authors are a total failure in view of the unity of the structure, which is independent also over against chs 25—31. Since the numbers given in 38 26 agree entirely with the numbers gathered later in Nu 2 32, it is evident that for the latter the lists for the contributions were used, which in itself is very probable because it was practical. In case this section is ascribed to P it is inexplicable how the writer can in 40 34 ff speak of the pillar of fire as of something well known, since this has not yet been mentioned in the parts ascribed to P, but has been in 13 21 f JE; 14 19.24 J.

III. Historical Character.—The fact that extra-Israelitish and esp. Egypt sources that can lay claim to historical value have reported

1. General Consideration nothing authentic concerning the exodus of Israel need not surprise us when we remember how meager these documents are and how one-sided Egypt history writing is. Whether the expulsion of the lepers and the unclean, who before this had desolated the country and acquired supremacy over it as reported by Manetho and other historians, is an Egypt version of the exodus of Israel, cannot be investigated at this place, but is to the highest degree improbable. If Israel was oppressed by the Egyptians for a long period, then surely the latter would not have invented the fable of a supremacy on the part of Israel; and, on the other hand, it would be incomprehensible that the Israelites should have changed an era of prosperity in their history into a period of servitude. Over against this the remembrance of the exodus out of Egypt not only is echoed through the entire lit. of Israel (cf I, 4, above), but the very existence of the people of God forces us imperatively to accept some satisfactory ground for its origin, such as is found in the story of the exodus and only here. In addition, the Book of Ex shows a good acquaintance with the localities and the conditions of Egypt, as also of the desert. It is indeed true that we are still in doubt on a number of local details. But other statements in the book have in such a surprising manner been confirmed by discoveries and geographical researches, that we can have the greatest confidence in regard to the other difficulties: cf e.g. Naville's The Store-city of Pithom (Ex 1 11). In general, the opening chapters of Ex, esp. the narratives of the different plagues, contain so much Egypt coloring, that this could scarcely have resulted from a mere theoretical study of Egypt, esp. since in the narrative everything makes the impression of resulting from recent experience. The fact that Israel from its very origin received ordinances in regard to religion, morality, law and cultus, is explained from the very conditions surrounding this origin and is indispensable for the explanation of the later development of the nation. None of the later books or times claim to offer anything essentially new in this respect; even the prophets appear only as reformers; they know of the election of Israel, and, on the other hand, everywhere presuppose as something self-evident the knowledge of a righteous, well-pleasing relation with God and chide the violation of this relation as apostasy. Ethical monotheism as the normal religion of Israel is reflected in the same way in all the sources of Israel's history, as has been proven in my work ("Die Entwicklung der alttestamentlichen Gottesidee in vorerilischer Zeit," in the May, 1903, issue of Beiträge zur Förderung christlicher Theologie). And the idea that an oriental people, esp. if they came out of Egypt, should have had no religious cultus, is in itself unthinkable. If all of these norms, also the direction for the cultus in the Books of Covenant, of the PC, or D, at least in the kernel, do not go back to the Mosaic times, then we have to deal with an insoluble problem (cf my work, Are the Critics Right?).

The Book of Ex is as a matter of fact from its first to its last page filled with miraculous stories; but in this characteristic these contents agree perfectly with the whole history of redemption. In this immediate and harmonious activity of God, for the purpose of establishing a chosen people, all these miracles find their purpose and explanation, and this again is only in harmony with other periods of sacred history. The reason is self-explanatory when these miracles are found grouped at the turning-points in this history, as is the case also in the critical age of Elijah and Elisha, and in the experiences and achievements of "Jonah," so significant for the universality of the Bib. religion. Above all is this true in the ministry of Jesus Christ; and also again in His return to judgment. And in the same way, too, we find this at the beginning of Israel as a nation (see my article in Murray's Dictionary). Cf in this respect the rapid numerical growth of the nation, the miracles, the plagues, in the presence of Pharaoh, the passage through the Red Sea, the miraculous preservation of the people in the desert, the many appearances of God to Moses, to the people, to the elders, the protection afforded by the cloud, the providential direction of the people of Israel and of the Egyptians, and of individual persons (Moses and Pharaoh). The fact that the author himself knows that Israel without the special care and protection of God could not have survived in the desert is in complete harmony with his knowledge of the geographical situation already mentioned.

If any part of the laws in Ex is to be accepted as Mosaic, it is the Decalogue. It is true that the ten commandments are found in two recensions (Ex 20; Dt 5). The original form is naturally found in Ex 20. 3. The Special Legal Parts Only Moses could regard himself as inwardly so independent of the Decalogue as it had been written by God, that he did not consider himself bound in Dt 5 by its exact wording. The legal ordinances in Ex 21 1 ff have found an analogy already in CH, more than 500 years older although moving in a lower sphere. As Israel had lived in Goshen, and according to Gen 26 12 Isaac had even been engaged in agriculture, and Israel could not remain in the desert but was to settle down in permanent abodes again, the fact of the existence of this law of Israel, which in a religious and ethical sense rises infinitely above the CH, is in itself easily understood. And again since the sacred ark of the covenant plays an important rôle also in the other sources of the Pent (Nu 10 33 ff; 14 44 JE; Dt 10 1-8; 31 9.25) and in the history of Israel (cf Josh 3; 6 6-8; 8 33; Jgs 20 27; 1 S 6 2 ff; 2 S 15 24 f; 1 K 3 15; 8 19; 8 1-9), then a suitable tent, such as is announced in Ex 25 ff, and was erected according to Ex 35 ff, was an actual necessity.

As the Paschal sacrifice, according to Ex 12 3 ff; vs 43 ff P; vs 21 ff JE (?) was to be killed in the houses, and this on the 14th of Nisan in the evening (12 6), and as P directs that a festival assembly shall be held on the next day at the sanctuary (cf Lev 23 6 ff; Nu 28 17 ff), these are conditions which can be understood only in case Israel is regarded as being in the wilderness. For this reason Dt 16 5 ff changes this direction, so that from now on the Passover is no longer to be celebrated in the houses but at the central sanctuary. In the same way the direction Ex 22 29, which ordered that the firstborn of animals should be given to Jeh already on the 8th day, could be carried out only during the wanderings in the desert, and is for this reason changed by Dt 14 23 ff; 15 19 ff to meet the conditions of the people definitely settled after this wandering. Cf my work, Are the Critics Right? 188-89, 194-95.

As is well known, the average critic handles the Bib. chronology in a very arbitrary manner and is not afraid of changing the chronology of events by hundreds of years. If we leave out of consideration some details that often cause great difficulties, we still have a reliable starting-point in the statements found in 1 K 6 1 and Ex 12 40 f. Accord-

4. Chronology ing to the first passage, the time that elapsed between the exodus of the Israelites and the building of the temple in the 4th year of Solomon was 480 years; and according to the second passage, the time of the stay in Egypt was 430 years. A material change in the first-mentioned figures is not permitted by the facts in the Book of Jgs, even if some particular data there mentioned are contemporaneous; and to reduce the 430 years of the stay in Egypt, as might be done after the LXX, which includes also the stay of the patriarchs in Canaan in this period, or to reduce the whole period from the entrance into Egypt to the building of the temple, is contrary to the synchronism of Hammurabi and Abraham (Gen 14). The first-mentioned could not have lived later than 2100 BC. The 430 years in Ex 12 40.41 P are also, independently of this passage, expressly supported by the earlier prediction of an oppression of Israel for 400 years from the time of Abraham (Gen 15 13 J); and the 480 years of 1 K 6 1 are confirmed by Jgs 11 26, according to which, at the time of the suppression by the Amorites and of Jephthah as judge, already 30 years must have elapsed since the east Jordan country had been occupied by the Israelites. According to this the exodus must have taken place not long after 1500 BC. And in perfect agreement with this supposition would be the condition of affairs in Pal as we know them from the Am Tab dating about 1450-1400 BC, according to which the different Canaanitish cities had been attacked by the Chabiri in the most threatening manner, as this is reported too in the Book of Josh. As is well known linguistically, too, the identification of the Chabiri with the Hebrews is unobjectionable. Finally, on the well-known Menepthah stele of the 13th cent. BC, Israel is mentioned in connection with Canaan, Ashkelon, Gezer, Y-nu'm (=Janoah, Josh 16 6.7 f), and accordingly is already regarded as settled in Canaan. A date supported in such different ways makes it impossible for me to find in Ramesses II the Pharaoh of the oppression, and in Menepthah the Pharaoh of the exodus (both between 1300 and 1200 BC). A conclusive proof that the name and the original building of the city Ramesses (Ex 1 11 JE; 12 37 P; Nu 33 3.5 P) necessarily leads back to Ramesses II can, at least at the present time, not yet be given (cf on this point also, Köhler, Lehrbuch der biblischen Geschichte des Alten Testaments, I, 238 ff).

All these attacks on the historical character of this book which originate only in the denial of the possibility of miracles, the Christian theologian can and must ignore. Such 5. Unjustifiable Attacks attacks do not stand on the ground of history but of dogma. Let us accordingly examine other objections. Thus, it is claimed that the number of men in Israel, which in Ex 12 37 is said to have been 600,000, is too high, because not only the desert but Goshen also would not have been able to support two million people, and Israel had been too short a time in Egypt to grow into so populous a nation. Yet Israel, beginning with the time of the oppression, which, according to 2 23; 1 8 continued many years and hence began before the highest number in population had been reached, had claims for support from the Egypt corn granaries; and the 430 years in 12 40 certainly cannot be reduced, as has been shown under (4) above. To this must be added that in Ex 1 7.9 f, 12.20 f the rapid numerical growth of Israel is represented as the result of a Divine blessing. Then, too, in the company of Jacob and his descendants, doubtless servants, male and female, came down to Egypt (cf the 318 servants of Abraham alone in Gen 14). The figures in Ex 12 37 P are further confirmed by Nu 11 21 (according to critics from JE) and by the results of the two enumerations, Nu 1 f (2 31; cf Ex 38 26 [603, 550]) and Nu 26 51 (601, 730). The attacks made also on the existence of the Tabernacle must be rejected as groundless. According to the Wellhausen school the Tabernacle is only a copy of the temple of Solomon dated back into the Mosaic times; and the fact that there is only one central seat of the cultus is regarded as a demand first made by the Deuteronomistic legislation in the 7th cent. Against this latter claim militates not only the impossibility of placing Dt at this time (cf my work Are the Critics Right? 1-55), but also the legislation of the Book of the Covenant, which, in 23 17.19; 34 23.24.26 presupposes a sanctuary, and which even in the passages incorrectly analyzed by Wellhausen, 20 24 (cf again, Are the Critics Right? 19, 48, 161 ff, 189 ff) speaks only of a single altar (cf also 21 14) and not of several existing at the same time. (The matter mentioned here is the building of an altar, according to a theophany, for temporary use.) Against the critical view we can quote the prophetic utterances of Amos, who condemns the cult in the Northern Kingdom (5 4 f), but teaches that God speaks out of Zion (1 2; cf probably also, 9 1); those of Isaiah (1 12; 2 2 ff; 4 5 f; 6; 8 18; 18 7; 30 29; 33 20; 14 32; 28 16); also the facts of history (cf esp. the central sanctuary in Shiloh, 1 S 1-4; Jgs 21 19, which is placed on the same level with Zion in Jer 7 12 ff; 26 6; Ps 78 60-72). To this must be added such statements as 2 S 7 6; Josh 18 1; 1 K 3 4; 8 4; 1 Ch 16 39.40; 2 Ch 1 3. All these facts are not overthrown by certain exceptions to the rule (cf LEVITICUS). But the whole view leads to conclusions that in themselves cannot possibly be accepted. What a foolish fancy that would have been, which would have pictured the Tabernacle in the most insignificant details as to materials, amounts, numbers, colors, objects, which in Nu 4 has determined with exact precision who was to carry the separate parts of the tent, while e.g. for the service of the Tabernacle, so important for later times, only very general directions are given in Nu 18 2.4.6; 8 22 ff. This complete picture would be entirely without a purpose and meaningless, since it would have no connection whatever with the tendency ascribed to it by the critics, but rather, in part, would contradict it. Cf my book, Are the Critics Right? 72 ff, 87 ff.

That particularly in the post-exilic period it would have been impossible to center the Day of Atonement on the covering of the ark of the covenant, since the restoration of this ark was not expected according to Jer 3 16, has already been emphasized in DAY OF COVENANT. If God had really determined to give to His people a pledge of the constant presence of His grace, then there can be absolutely no reason for doubting the erection of the Tabernacle, since the necessary artistic ability and the possession of the materials needed for the structure are sufficiently given in the text (cf also Ex 25 9.40; 26 30; 27 8-31 2 ff; 35 30 ff-12 35; 3 21.22; 11 2 f; Gen 15 14; Ex 33 4 ff). The examination of the separate passages in Ex, such as the relation of 20 24 (see above) to Dt, or the ordinances concerning the Passover and the firstborn (12 f), and other laws in the different codices, goes beyond the purpose of this article (cf however under 3 above, at the close).

IV. Authorship.—As the Book of Ex is only a part of a large work (cf I, 3 above), the question as to authorship cannot be definitely decided at this place, but we must in substance restrict ourselves to those data which we find in the book itself. In several parts it is expressly claimed that Moses wrote them. 1. Connection with Moses

He sang the hymn found in Ex 15, after the passage of the Red Sea, and it breathes the enthusiasm of what the author has himself experienced. Vs 13 ff do not speak against the unity of the hymn, but rather for it, since the perfects here found as prophetic perfects only give expression to the certainty that the Israelites will take possession of the land of promise. In the course of history the nations often acted quite differently from what is here stated and often antagonized Israel (cf Nu 14 39-45; 20 18 ff; 21 4.21-35; 22 6; Josh 6-12; also Ex 13 17). In Ex 15 13.17 not only Zion is meant, but all Canaan; cf Lev 25 23; Nu 35 34; Jer 2 7; for har, "mountain," cf Dt 1 7.20 ("hill-country"); 3 25; Ps 78 54.55. According to Ex 17 14 Moses writes in a book the promise of Jeh to destroy Amalek from the face of the earth. It is absolutely impossible that only this statement should have been written without any connecting thought and without at least a full description of the situation as given in Ex 17 8 ff. And as 17 14 linguistically at least can mean merely 'to write a sheet,' as Nu 5 23, it yet appears in the light of the connection of a comparison with related passages, such as Josh 24 26; 1 S 10 25, much more natural to think of a book in this connection, in which already similar events had been recorded or could at any time be recorded.

The Ten Words (Ex 20 1 ff) were written down by God Himself and then handed over to Moses; cf Ex 24 12; 31 18; 34 1 ff.28 (Dt 10 2.4). The laws and judicial ordinances beginning with Ex 21, according to 24 4, were also written down by Moses himself, and the same is true of the ordinances in 34 1 ff, according to 34 27.

The proof that formerly had to be furnished, to the effect that the knowledge of the art of writing in the days of Moses was not an anachronism, need not trouble us now, since both in Egypt and Babylon much older written documents have been discovered. But already from the passages quoted we could conclude nothing else than that Moses understood how to make use of different forms of literature—the poetical, the historical and the legal—unless the different statements to this effect by decisive reasons could be shown to be incorrect. In Nu 33, in the catalogue of stations, there is a portion ascribed to Moses that bears the express characteristics of the PC; and, finally Dt, with its hortatory, pastoral style, claims him as its author. Already in Ex 17 14 there were reasons to believe that Moses had written not only this statement which is there expressly attributed to him. Thus it becomes a possibility, that in general only in the case of particularly important passages the fact that Moses penned these also was to be made prominent, if it can be shown as probable that he in reality wrote more, as we find in || cases in the writings of the prophets (cf Isa 8 1; 30 8; Jer 30 2; Ezk 43 11; Hab 2 2). In addition, we notice in this connection that in the catalogue of stations mentioned above and ascribed to Moses (Nu 33), the close relation of which to the portions attributed to P is certain, not only this part, but also the other words from JE in the present Bible text from Ex 12-19 (see above) are regarded as self-evident as Mosaic (as is the case also later with the corresponding historical part), and this is an important witness in favor of the Mosaic authorship of the historical parts. But Ex 25-31, 35-40 also claim, at least so far as contents are concerned, to be the product of the Mosaic period. The entire portable sanctuary is built with a view to the wanderings in the desert. Aaron and his sons are as yet the only representatives of the priesthood (27 21; 28 4.12.41-43; 29 4 ff, etc.). In view of the relationship which Nu 33 shows with P, it is clear, if we accept the genuineness of this part, a matter that is in the highest degree probable, that this style was current in Moses' time, and that he had the mastery of it, even if other hands, too, have contributed to the final literary forms of these laws. In favor of the Mosaic authorship of the whole Book of Ex we find a weighty reason in the unity and the literary construction of the work as shown above. This indeed does not preclude the use and adaptation of other sources of historical or legal statements, either from the author's own hands or from others, if such a view should perhaps be suggested or made imperative by the presence of many hard constructions, unconnected transitions, unexpected repetitions, etc. But even on the presupposition of the Mosaic authorship, a difference in style in the different kinds of matters discussed is not impossible, just as little as this is the case with peculiarities of language, since these could arise particularly in the course of vivid narration of the story (cf the anacolouths in Paul's writings). But still more a reason for accepting the Mosaic authorship of Ex is found in the grand and deep conception and reproduction of all the events recorded, which presupposes a congenial prophetic personality; and finally, too, the natural and strong probability that Moses did not leave his people without such a Magna Charta for the future. This Mosaic authorship becomes almost a certainty, in case the Book of Dt is genuine, even if only in its essential parts. For Dt at every step presupposes not only P (cf Are the Critics Right? 171 ff), but also the history and the Books of the Covenant (Ex 21 ff; 34 11 ff) as recorded in Ex.

Against the Mosaic authorship of Ex the use of the third person should no longer be urged, since Caesar and Xenophon also wrote their works in the third person, and the use of this provision is eminently adapted to the purpose and significance of Ex for all future times. In Isa 20 1 ff; Ezk 24 24, we have analogies of this in prophetic lit. The statement (11 3) that Moses was so highly regarded by the Egyptians is entirely unobjectionable in the connection in which it is found. That the book was not written for the self-glorification of Moses appears clearly in 4 10-16; 6 12. In itself it is possible that some individual passages point to a later date, without thereby overthrowing the Mosaic authorship of the whole (cf also under [1]). In this case we are probably dealing with supplementary material. Ex 16 35 declares that Israel received manna down to the time when the people came to the borders of Canaan. Whether it was given to them after this time, too, cannot be decided on the basis of this passage (cf however Josh 5 12). If the entire Book of Ex was composed by Moses, then Ex 16 35 would be a proof that at least the final editing of the book had been undertaken only a short time before his death. This is suggested also by ver 34b, since at the time when the manna was first given the ark of the covenant did not yet exist; and the statement in 32 35 takes into consideration the later development as found in Nu 13 f. In the same way Ex 16 36 could be a later explanation, but is not necessarily so, if the 'omer was not a fixed measure, of which nothing further is known, and which probably was not to be found in every Israelitish household, but a customary measure, the average content of which is given in ver 36. If we take Ex alone there is nothing that compels us to go later than the Mosaic period (concerning the father-in-law of Moses, see under II, 2, 1 [1 8-7 7] at the close). The question as to whether there are contradictions or differences between the different legal ordinances in Ex and in later books cannot be investigated at this place, nor the question whether the connection of Ex with other books in any way modifies the conclusion reached under (1).

EXORCISM, ek'sor-siz'm, EXORCIST, ek'sor-sist ('Εξορκισμός, Exorkismos, from ἔξορκίζω, exorkizo, "to adjure" [Mt 26 63]): One who expels

1. Definition demons by the use of magical formulae. In the strict etymological sense there is no exorcism in the Bible. The term "exorcists" is used once (Acts 19 13) in a way to discredit the professional exorcists familiarly known both among Jews and Gentiles. The

2. Method method of Jesus in dealing with demons was not that of the exorcists. Demons in While it is said (Mt 8 16) that He the NT

"cast out the spirits with a word," it is abundantly clear that the word in question was not ritualistic but authoritative.

In Lk 4 35 we have a typical sentence uttered by Our Lord in the performance of His cures: "Hold thy peace, and come out of him." In Mk 9 29 we have Christ's own emphasis upon the ethical element in dealing with these mysterious maladies: "This kind can come out by nothing, save by prayer." In Mt 12 28 Jesus gives His own explanation of the method and power used in His cures: "But if I by the Spirit of God cast out demons, then is the kingdom of God come upon you."

In Lk 9 1 the terms "authority" and "power" are used in such a way as to show the belief of the evangelists that to cure demon-possession an actual power from God, together with the right to use it, was necessary. This group of passages gives the NT philosophy of this dread mystery and its cure. The demons are personal evil powers afflicting human life in their opposition to God. It is beyond man unaided to obtain deliverance from them. It is the function of Christ as the redeemer of mankind to deliver men from this as well as other ills due to sin. Miraculous cures of the same kind as those performed by Christ Himself were accomplished by His disciples in His name (Mk 16 17). The power attributed to "His name" supplies us with the opportunity for a most enlightening comparison and contrast.

Exorcism among ancient and primitive peoples rests largely upon faith in the power of magical formulas, ordinarily compounded of the

3. Exorcism names of deities and pronounced in in Ethnic connection with exorcistic rites, upon and Jewish the bodies of the afflicted. The words Writings themselves are supposed to have power over the demons, and the mere recital of the correct list of names is supposed to be efficacious.

Attention should be called again to the incantation texts of the Babylonians and Assyrians (see, for translations and full exposition of texts, Rogers, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, 146 ff). In this direction the absurdities and cruelties of superstition have carried men to extreme lengths. In the case of Jos we are amazed to see how even in the case of an educated man the most abject superstition controls his views of such subjects. In Ant. VIII, v, in speaking of the wisdom of Solomon, he says that "God enabled him to learn that skill which expels demons, which is a science useful and sanitative to him." He also describes, in the same connection, a cure which he alleges to have seen, "in the presence of Vespasian and his sons," performed in accordance with methods of incantation ascribed to Solomon. A ring to which was attached a kind of root mentioned by Solomon was placed at the nostrils of the demoniac and the demon was drawn out through the nostrils. The proof that exorcism had actually taken place was given in the overturning of a basin placed nearby.

The absurdities of this narrative are more than equaled by the story of exorcism told in the Book of Tob (see Lange, Apocrypha, 151-53) where the liver and heart of a fish, miraculously caught, are burned upon the ashes of incense, and the resulting smoke drives away a demon. This whole story is well worthy of careful reading for the light it throws upon the unrestrained working of the imagination upon such matters.

In the rabbinical writers the very limit of diseased morbidness is reached in the long and repulsive details, which they give of methods used in exorcism (see Whitehouse, HDB, art. "Demon" I, 592b; of 593b; Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, II, 775-76).

In most striking contrast with this stand the Bib. narratives. The very point of connection which we have noted is also the point of contrast. The mighty and efficacious word of NT and word with which Jesus rebuked and controlled demons was no exorcistic formula spoken by rote, but His own living word of holy power. "In the name of Jesus" did not mean that the sacred name formally uttered possessed magical power to effectuate a cure. The ancient Sem formula, "in the name of," given a deep ethical meaning in the OT, had a still deeper meaning in the NT. The proper and helpful use of it meant a reliance upon the presence and living power of Christ from whom alone power to do any mighty work comes (Jn 15 5).

This fundamental difference between the ideas and methods of Jesus and His disciples and current conceptions and usages becomes the more striking when we remember that the lower range of ideas and practices actually prevailed among the people with whom the Lord and His followers were associated. The famous passage (Mt 12 24 and ||) in which the Pharisees attribute to demoniacal influence the cures wrought by Jesus upon the demonized, usually studied with reference to Our Lord's word about the unforgivable sin, is also remarkable for the idea concerning demons which it expresses. The idea which evidently underlies the accusation against Jesus was that the natural way to obtain control over demons is by obtaining, through magic, power over the ruler of demons. In reply to this Jesus maintains that since the demons are evil they can be controlled only by opposition to them in the power of God.

It is most suggestive that we have in Acts 19 13 ff a clear exposition, in connection with exorcism, of just the point here insisted upon. According to this narrative a group of wandering professional Jewish exorcists, witnessing the cures accomplished by Paul, attempted to do the same by the ritualistic use of the name of Jesus. They failed ignominiously because, according to the narrative, they lacked faith in the living Christ by whose power such miracles of healing were wrought, although they were letter-perfect in the use of the formula. This narrative shows clearly what the NT understanding of the expression "in my name" implied in the way of faith and obedience.

Here as elsewhere, the chastened mental restraint under which the NT was composed, the high spiritual and ethical results of the intimacy of the disciples with Jesus, are clearly manifest.

Our Lord and His disciples dealt with the demoniacs as they dealt with all other sufferers from the malign, enslaving and wasting power of sin, with the tenderness of an illimitable sympathy, and the firmness and effectiveness of those to whom were granted in abundant measure the presence and power of God. EXPECT, eks-pekt', EXPECTATION, eks-pekt'shun: Of the three Gr words, tr^d in the NT by "expect," prosdokō, meaning to look forward toward what will probably occur, whether in hope or dread (Acts 3 5; Lk 3 15), is not as intense as ekdechomai (He 10 13), meaning to wait for that of the realization of which one is assured ("as the husbandman waits for the processes of Nature [Jas 5 7], and the patriarchs for the Divine promise," Westcott), or as vivid as the noun apokaradokia (Rom 8 19; Phil 1 20, "earnest expectation"), which describes the stretching forth of the head toward an object that is anticipated (see Ellicott on Phil 1 20). In the OT "expectation" always means that which is expected, as Prov 10 28, "The expectation of the wicked shall perish."

EXPECTATION, MESSIANIC, mes-i-an'ik. See CHRIST, FALSE; ESCHATOLOGY OF OT; JESUS CHRIST; MESSIAH.

EXPEDIENT, eks-pe'di-ent (συνφέρο, sumphéro): The Gr word tr^d "expedient" (sumphéro) means lit. "to bear or bring together"; with a personal reference, "to be well or profitable." In the NT it never means "profitable" or "convenient" as opposed to what is strictly right. It is tr^d "expedient" (Jn 11 50, "it is expedient for us," RV "for you"; 16 7, "It is expedient for you that I go away," i.e. "profitable," "for your good," 18 14; 1 Cor 6 12; 10 23; 2 Cor 8 10; 12 1). In Mt 19 10, instead of "not good to marry," RV has "not expedient." The modern sense of "expediency" as "hastening" or "acceleration," is not found in the NT, any more than its bad sense of "mere convenience." "Nothing but the right can ever be expedient" (Whately).

EXPERIENCE, eks-pe'ri-ens: This word is employed 3 t. In Gen 30 27 AV, Laban says to Jacob, "I have learned by experience [RV "divined"] that Jeh hath blessed me for thy sake." Here it translates the Heb שָׁחַח, nahash, "to observe diligently," as when one examines the entrails of a bird or animal for the purpose of divination.

In Eccl 1 16, the writer says, "I have gotten me great wisdom . . . ; my heart hath had great experience of wisdom and knowledge." Here the Heb (רָאָה) means "hath seen abundantly," and the idea seems to be that of a wide outlook combined with actual trial of the things discovered or known.

In Rom 5 4 AV, the Gr word δοκιμή, dokimē (ARV more correctly "approvedness"), means the proof or testing of a thing. We rejoice in tribulation because it works out or produces patience, while the latter develops an experience of God, i.e. it brings out as a proved fact His power and love toward us in our preservation in and deliverance from trial.

Thus it is seen the Bible use of the word is not different from the ordinary, which means "the sum of practical wisdom taught by the events and observations of life," or, to go a little farther, the personal and practical acquaintance with what is so taught. He 5 13 gives a good practical example. AV says, "Every one that useth milk is unskilful [dpeiros] in the word of righteousness: for he is a babe," while RV renders "unskilful" by "without experience of." The thought is that he who fails to search out the deep things of the word of God is so lacking in the exercise of his spiritual senses as to be unable really to know truth from error.

JAMES M. GRAY

EXPERIMENT, eks-per'i-ment (ἐκπείρω, dokimē, "approvedness," "tried character"): "The experiment of this ministration" (2 Cor 9 13 AV, RV "the proving of you by his ministration"), i.e. the sincerity of their Christian profession was evidenced by their liberal contribution.

EXPIATION, eks-pi-ā'shun: This word represents no Heb or Gr word not rendered also by "atonement." In Nu 5 7 it is employed in RV to translate hāṭath and in Dt 32 43, kippēr. This version also employs "expiate" in m of several passages, e.g. Ps 65 3; 79 9. Always its use in EV is somewhat more narrow and specific than "atonement" and has especial reference to specific uncleanness or sin. It will be sufficient to refer to ATONEMENT; SACRIFICE; PROPITIATION.

EXPOSURE, eks-pō'shur, TO WILD BEASTS. See PUNISHMENTS.

EXPRESS, eks-pres': In AV of He 1 3 "express" has the meaning "exactly resembling the original," as the impress of a seal resembles the figure engraved upon the seal. Thus "express image" in the ver referred to is a good tr (Gr χαρακτήρ, charaktēr, lit. "engraving" and hence "impression"); RV "the very image."

EXQUISITE, eks'kwi-sit (ἐκρίβης, akribēs): The Gr word means "accurate," "searched out," equivalent to exquisitus from which "exquisite" is derived. It also means in argument "close," "subtle." In Ecclus 18 29, we have, "They poured forth exquisite parables," RV "apt proverbs," and 19 25, AV and RV "There is an exquisite subtlety, and the same is unjust."

EXTINCT, eks-tinkt': In Job 17 1, "My days are extinct" (עָזָז, zā'akh [in Niphal]) and in Isa 43 17, "They are extinct" (עָזָז, dā'akh), the word "extinct" should be recognized as a form of the participle, equivalent to "extinguished," so that in both passages an action, not merely a state, is indicated.

EXTORTION, eks-tor'shun: This particular word occurs twice in AV: Ezk 22 12 (שָׁחַק, śshek), and Mt 23 25 (ἀπαρά, harpagē), and indicates that one who is an extortioner is guilty of snatching away from another by strife, greed and oppression that which does not lawfully belong to him. The element of covetousness and usury is involved in the meaning of this word; for it is greedily gotten gain. The publicans were considered as being specially guilty of this sin; this is clear from the Pharisee's deprecatory remark: "I am not . . . an extortioner . . . as this publican" (Lk 18 11). Paul classes extortion (pleonexia, lit. "over-reaching") among a category of the grossest crimes known to humanity

(1 Cor 5 10.11); indeed, so grievous is it that it closes the door of heaven in the face of the one guilty of it (6 10).

WILLIAM EVANS

EXTREME, eks-trēm', EXTREMITY, eks-trem'-i-ti: We have the adj. "extreme" in 2 Esd 5 14, "extreme fear," RV "trembling"; in Wisd 12 27, "extreme [térma] damnation," RV "the last end of condemnation"; in 2 Macc 7 42, "extreme [hyperballousas] tortures," RV "exceeding barbarities"; in Ecclus 42 8 it is used as an advb., "the extreme aged" (eschatogērōs), RV "of extreme old age."

Extremity: ὕψ, push; LXX παράπτωμα, paráptōma, occurs only in Job 35 15 AV, RV "arrogance," and ἀκμή, akmē, in 2 Macc 1 7.

EYE, I (ὄψ, 'ayin; ὀφθαλμός, ophthalmós):

(1) The physical organ of sight, "the lamp of the body" (Mt 6 22), one of the chief channels of information for man. A cruel custom therefore sanctioned among heathen nations the putting out of the eyes of an enemy or a rival, because thus his power was most effectually shattered (Jgs 16 21; 2 K 25 7; Jer 39 7). Such blinding or putting out of the "right eye" was also considered a deep humiliation, as it robbed the victim of his beauty, and made him unfit to take his part in war (1 S 11 2; Zec 11 17).

The eye, to be useful, was to be "single," i.e. not giving a double or uncertain vision (Mt 6 22=Lk 11 34). Eyes may grow dim with sorrow and tears (Job 17 7), they may "waste away with griefs" (Ps 6 7; 31 9; 88 9). They may "pour down" (Lam 3 49), "run down with water" (Lam 1 16; 3 48). Eyes may "wink" in derision (Ps 35 19; Prov 6 13; 10 10; cf also Prov 16 30; 30 17), and the harlot takes the lustling "with her eyelids" (Prov 6 25). To 'lift up the eyes' (Gen 13 10 et passim) means to look up or around for information and often for help; to 'turn away the eye' or 'hide the eyes' indicates carelessness and lack of sympathy (Prov 28 27); to 'cast about the eyes,' so that they "are in the ends of the earth" (Prov 17 24) is synonymous with the silly curiosity of a fool, and with the lack of attention of him who is everywhere but at his work. In the execution of justice the "eye shall not pity," i.e. not be deflected from the dictates of the law by favorable or unfavorable impressions (Dt 19 13 et passim), nor spare (Ezk 5 11 et passim), and the lex talionis demanded "life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot" (Ex 21 24; Dt 19 21).

(2) Figurative: The eye of the heart or mind, the organ of spiritual perception, which may be enlightened or opened (Ps 119 18). This is done by the law of God (19 8) or by the spirit of God (Eph 1 18), or it may be "darkened" and "holden" (Lk 24 16; cf Mt 13 13; 2 Cor 4 4).

(3) The eye as an index of the mind and disposition of man. The Bible speaks of the "good" m, or "bountiful" eye, i.e. the kindly disposition (Prov 22 9); of "proud," "haughty," "lofty eyes" (Ps 18 27; 131 1; Prov 6 17); of the 'lowly eyes' of the humble (Job 22 29 m; cf also Lk 18 13); of 'adulterous eyes,' "eyes which play the harlot" (Ezk 6 9, in the sense of idolatrous inclinations; 2 Pet 2 14). Rage or anger is shown by the "sharpening" of the eyes (Job 16 9).

(4) The eyes of God, as well as the "seven eyes" of the Lamb (Rev 5 6) and the "many eyes" of the four living creatures of the Apocalypse (Rev 4 6; also Ezk 1 18; 10 12) are figurative expressions for the omniscience of God (cf He 4 13; Ps 139 16) and of His watchfulness and loving care (Jer 32 19). As the human eye may, with the slightest glance or motion, give an indication, a command, so

God is able to "guide" or "counsel" His obedient child "with his eye" (Ps 32 8).

(5) Three Heb expressions are trd by "apple of the eye": (a) ʾishōn, lit. "the little man," which probably means the "pupil of the eye," it being the part of the eye in which the close onlooker may see his image reflected en miniature. Several oriental languages have very similar expressions (Dt 32 10; Ps 17 8; Prov 7 2). (b) bā-bhāh, lit. "the gate of the eye" (Zec 2 8). (c) bath-ayin, lit. "the daughter of the eye" (Ps 17 8; Lam 2 18). All these three phrases seem to indicate the pupil rather than the "apple of the eye," and designate the most sensitive part of the eye, which we protect with the greatest care. Thus the Scriptures declare, for our great comfort, that God will protect and care for those that are His own.

To eye (ʾayin, "to watch closely," "to look maliciously at"): "Saul eyed David from that day and forward" (1 S 18 9). See ENVY; EVIL EYE.

H. L. E. LÜERING

EYELID, ʾīlid: Eyes and eyelids in Heb are sometimes used synonymously, as in the parallelism of Prov 4 25 (cf 6 4; 30 13):

"Let thine eyes look right on,
And let thine eyelids look straight before thee."

(Cf Job 41 18; Ps 11 4; Jer 9 18.) The alluring power of the wanton woman is conceived of as centered in her eyes (Prov 6 25; Isa 3 16): "Neither let her take thee with her eyelids." Painting the eyelids was resorted to to intensify the beauty, antimony (q.v.) being used for darkening the lashes (2 K 9 30; Jer 4 30; Ezk 23 40).

EYEPAIN, ʾīpānt. See ANTIMONY; EYELID; KEREN-HAPPUCH.

EYESALVE, ʾīśāv (κολλούριον, kollourion; collyrium; Rev 3 18): A Phrygian powder mentioned by Galen, for which the medical school of Laodicea seems to have been famous (see Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia), but the figurative reference is to the restoring of spiritual vision.

EYES, BLINDING, blind'ing, OF THE. See EYE; PUNISHMENTS.

EYES, COVERING, kuv'ēr-ing, OF THE: In Gen 20 16, means forgetfulness of the past, a willingness to overlook the wrong to which Sarah had been exposed.

EYES, DISEASES, di-zēz'is, OF THE: Blindness, defects of sight and diseases of the eye are frequently mentioned in the Scriptures, but usually in general terms. It is probable that in the period covered by the Bible, ophthalmia was as common in Pal and Egypt as it is now. See BLINDNESS. The commonest of the diseases at present is the purulent conjunctivitis which is a highly infectious malady affecting people of all ages, but esp. children, and whose germs are carried from eye to eye by the flies, which are allowed to walk freely over the diseased eyes. This is one of the most disgusting sights in a Palestine village, but I have been told by mothers that it is esteemed unlucky to drive off the flies. In this manner the disease is propagated. The number of persons in any Palestine village whose eyes are more or less blemished by disease is on this account phenomenally large.

Blindness incapacitated a man from serving in the priesthood (Lev 21 16,18); even a blemish of the eye was regarded as a disqualification (Lev 21 20).

The cases in the NT of persons blind from their birth (as Jn 9 1) were probably the results of this ophthalmia, but may have been due to congenital malformation. The interesting psychological record of the difficulty of interpreting the new visual sensations by the blind man healed by Our Lord (Mk 8 22) indicates that it was probably not a case of congenital blindness, as the evangelist uses the word apokateslōthē ("restored"), but he had been so long blind that he had lost the power of appreciating the sense-impressions. This condition has been often discussed as a psycho-physical problem since the days of Molyneux and Locke (Essay on the Human Understanding, II, 9, 8).

The blindness of St. Paul was probably a temporary paralysis of the retina from the shock of a dazzling light accentuated by the intense emotion which accompanied his vision on the road to Damascus. The "scales" mentioned in Acts 9 18 were not material, but his sight was restored as if (hōsei) scales had fallen from his eyes. How far this left his eyes weak we do not know, but from his inability to recognize the high priest (Acts 23 5) and from his employing an amanuensis for transcribing his epistles (Rom 16 22), as well as from his writing in characters of large size (pēlikos; Gal 6 11), it is probable that his vision was defective, and this it has been conjectured was the "thorn in the flesh" of 2 Cor 12 7.

Senile blindness, the result either of cataract or retinal degeneration, is mentioned in the cases of Isaac (Gen 27 1), Jacob (Gen 48 10) and Eli (1 S 4 15). The frequency of such senile dimness of sight made the case of Moses the more remarkable that at the age of 120 his eye was not dim (Dt 34 7).

Tobit's blindness, caused by the irritation of the sparrow's dung (Tob 2 10), was a traumatic conjunctivitis which left an opacity. It is not said that the whiteness was itself sufficiently large to destroy vision. There was with it probably a considerable amount of conjunctival thickening, and it is possible that the remedy might have removed this. It certainly could not remove a cicatricial white spot of the nature of an albugo. The conjecture of a recent commentator that the gall, by coloring the spot, made the eye look as if sight was restored when it really was not, seems ludicrously inept. In any case the historical accuracy of the narrative is so problematical that explanation is unnecessary. See BLINDNESS.

ALEX. MACALISTER

EYESERVICE, ʾīśūr-vis (ὀφθαλμοδουλεία, ophthalmodouleia): A term coined by Paul to express the conduct of slaves, who work only when they are watched, and whose motive, therefore, is not fidelity to duty, but either to avoid punishment or to gain reward from their masters (Eph 6 6; Col 3 22). "A vice which slavery everywhere creates and exhibits. Hence the need for drivers and overseers" (Eadie).

I. The Prophet and His Book.—The name עֶזְקִיָּאל, y'hezqê'el, signifies "God strengthens."

The LXX employed the form 'Εζεκίας, Iezekiêl, from which the Vulg Person of took its "Ezechiel" and Luther "Heseekiel." In 1 3 the prophet is said to be the son of a certain Buzi, and that he was a priest. This combination of the priestly and prophetic offices is not accidental at a time when the priests began to come more and more into the foreground. Thus, too, Jeremiah (1 1) and Zechariah (1 1; cf Ezr 5 1; 6 14; Neh 12 4.16, and my art. "Zechariah" in Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary) were priests and prophets; and in Zec 7 3 a question in reference to fasting is put to both priests and prophets at the same time. And still more than in the case of Zechariah and Jeremiah, the priestly descent makes itself felt in the case of Ezekiel. We here already draw attention to his Levitical tendencies, which appear particularly prominent in chs 40-48 (see under II, 2 below), and to the high-priestly character of his picture of the Messiah (21 25 f; 45 22; see II, 3 below).

We find Ezekiel in Tel-abib (3 15) at the river Chebar (1 1.3; 3 15) on a Euphrates canal near Nippur, where the American expedition found the archives of a great business house, "Murashu and Sons." The prophet had been taken into exile in 597 BC. This event so deeply affected the fate of the people and his personal relations that Ezekiel dates his prophecies from this event. They begin with the 5th year of this date, in which year through the appearance of the Divine glory (cf II, 1 below) he had been consecrated to the prophetic office (1 2) and continued to the 27th year (29 17), i.e. from 593 to 571 BC. The book gives us an idea of the external conditions of the exiles. The expressions "prison," "bound," which are applied to the exiles, easily create a false impression, or at any rate a one-sided idea. These terms surely to a great extent are used figuratively. Because the Jews had lost their country, their capital city, their temple, their service and their independence as a nation, their condition was under all circumstances lamentable, and could be compared with the fate of prisoners and those in fetters.

The external conditions in themselves, however, seem rather to have been generally tolerable. The people live in their own houses (Jer 29 5). Ezekiel himself is probably the owner of a house (Ezk 3 24; 8 1). They have also retained their organization, for their elders visit the prophet repeatedly (8 1; 14 1; 20 1). This makes it clear why later comparatively few made use of the permission to return to their country. The inscriptions found in the business house at Nippur contain also a goodly number of Jewish names, which shows how the Jews are becoming settled and taking part in the business life of the country.

Ezekiel was living in most happy wedlock. Now God reveals to him on a certain night that his wife, "the desire of his eye," is to die through a sudden sickness. On the evening of the following day she is already dead. But he is not permitted to weep or lament over her, for he is to serve as a sign that Jerus is to be destroyed without wailing or lamentation (24 15 ff). Thus in his case too, as it was with Hosea, the personal fate of the prophet is most impressively interwoven with his official activity.

The question at what age Ezekiel had left Jerus has been answered in different ways. From his intimate acquaintance with the priestly institutions and with the temple service, as this appears particularly in chs 40 to 48, the conclusion is drawn that he himself must have officiated in the temple. Yet, the knowledge on his part can be amply explained if he only in a general way had been personally acquainted with the temple, with the law and the study of the Torah. We accept that he was already taken into exile at the age of 25 years, and in his 30th year was called to his prophetic office; and in doing this we come close to the statement of Jos, according to which Ezekiel had come to Babylon in his youth. At any rate the remarkable statement in the beginning of his book, "in the 30th year," by the side of which we find the customary dating, "in the 5th year" (1 1.2), can still find its best explanation when referred to the age of the prophet. We must also remember that the 30th year had a special significance for the tribe of Levi (Nu 4 3.23.30.39), and that later on, and surely not accidentally, both Jesus and John the Baptist began their public activity at this age (Lk 3 23).

It is indeed true that the attempt has been made to interpret this statement of Ezekiel on the basis of an era of Nabopolassar, but there is practically nothing further known of this era; and in addition there would be a disagreement here, since Nabopolassar ruled from 625 on, and his 30th year would not harmonize with the year 593 as determined by Ezk 1 2. Just as little can be said for explaining these 30 years as so many years after the discovery of the book of the law in 623, in the reign of Josiah (2 K 22 f). For this case too there is not the slightest hint that this event had been made the beginning of a new era, and, in addition, the statement in Ezk 1 1, without further reference to this event, would be unthinkable.

As in the case of the majority of the prophets, legends have also grown around the person of Ezekiel. He is reported to have been the teacher of Pythagoras, or a servant of Jeremiah, or a martyr, and is said to have been buried in the tomb of Shem and Arphaxad. He indeed did stand in close relationship to Jeremiah (see 2, 3 below). Since the publication of Klostermann's essay in the Studien und Kritiken, 1877, it has been customary, on the basis of 3 14 f. 26 f.; 4 4 ff.; 24 27, to regard Ezekiel as subject to catalepsy (cf the belief often entertained that Paul was an epileptic). Even if his condition, in which he lay speechless or motionless, has some similarity with certain forms of catalepsy or kindred diseases, i.e. a temporary suspension of the power of locomotion or of speech; yet in the case of Ezekiel we never find that he is describing a disease, but his unique condition occurs only at the express command of God (3 24 ff.; 24 25 ff.); and this on account of the stubbornness of the house of Israel (3 26). This latter expression which occurs with such frequency (cf 2 5 ff.; 3 9.27, etc) induces to the consideration of the reception which the prophet met at the hand of his contemporaries.

He lives in the midst of briars and thorns and dwells among scorpions (2 6). Israel has a mind harder than a rock, firmer than adamant (3 8 f). "Is he not a speaker of parables?" is cast up to him by his contemporaries, and he complains to God on this account (20 49); and God in turn sums up the impression which Ezekiel has made on them in the words (33 32): "Thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument; for they hear thy words, but they do them not." They consequently estimate him according to his aesthetic side (cf II, 1, below), but that is all.

(1) Its genuineness.—When compared with almost every other prophetic book, we are particularly favorably situated in dealing with the genuineness of the Book of Ezk

2. The Book (cf my work, Die messianische Erwartung der vorexilischen Propheten, zugleich ein Protest gegen moderne Textzersplitterung), as this is practically not at all called into question, and efforts to prove a complicated composition of the book are scarcely made.

Both the efforts of Zunz, made long ago (cf Zeitschrift der deutsch-morgenländischen Gesellschaft, 1873, and Die gottesdienstlichen Vorträge der Juden), and of Seinecke (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, II, 1 ff) to prove a Pers or even a Gr period as the time of the composition of the book; as also the later attempt of Kroetzmann, in his Comm. on Ezk, to show that there are two recensions of the book, have found no favor. The claim that chs 40-48 were written by a pupil of Ezekiel was made as a timid suggestion by Volz, but, judging from the tendency of criticism, the origin of these chapters will probably yet become the subject of serious debate. But in general the conviction obtains that the book is characterized by such unity that we can only accept or reject it as a whole, but that for its rejection there is not the least substantial ground. This leads us to the contents.

(2) Its structure.—The parts of the book are in general very transparent. First of all the book is divided into halves by the announcement of the fall of Jerus in ch 33; of which parts the first predominantly deals with punishments and threats; the other with comfort and encouragement. Possibly it is these two parts of the book that Jos has in mind when he says (Ant, X) that Ezekiel had written two books. That the introduction of prophecies of redemption after those of threats in other prophetic books also is often a matter of importance, and that the right appreciation of this fact is a significant factor in the struggle against the attacks made on the genuineness of these books has been demonstrated by me in my book, Die messianische Erwartung der vorexilischen Propheten (cf 39-40 for the case of Amos; 62 ff, 136 f, for the case of Hosea; 197 ff for Isa 7-12; 238 ff for Micah; see also my article in Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary).

Down to the time when Jerus fell, Ezekiel was compelled to antagonize the hopes, which were supported by false prophets, that God would not suffer this calamity. Over against this, Ezekiel persistently and emphatically points to this fact, that the apostasy had been too great for God not to bring about this catastrophe. There is scarcely a violation of a single command—religious, moral or cultural—which the prophet is not compelled to charge against the people in the three sections, 3 16 ff.; 8 1 ff.; 20 1 ff, until in 24 1 ff, on the 10th day of the 10th month of the 9th year (589 BC) the destruction of Jerus was symbolized by the vision of the boiling pot with the piece of meat in it, and the unlamented destruction of the city was prefigured by the unmourned and sudden death of his wife (see 1 above). After the five sections of this subdivision I, referring to Israel—each one of which subdivisions is introduced by a new dating, and thereby separated from the others and chronologically arranged (1 1 ff, with the consecration of the prophet immediately following it; 3 16 ff.; 8 1 ff.; 20 1 ff.; 24 1 ff)—there follow as a second subdivision the seven oracles against the Ammonites (25 1 ff); the Moabites (25 8 ff); the Edomites (25 12 ff); the Philis (25 15 ff); Tyre (26 1 ff); Sidon (28 20 ff); Egypt (29 1 ff), evidently arranged from a geographical point of view.

The most extensive are those against Tyre and the group of oracles against Egypt, both provided with separate dates (cf 26 1-29 1; 30 20; 31 1; 32 1.17). The supplement in reference to Tyre (29 17 ff) is the latest dated oracle of Ezekiel (from the year 571 BC), and is found here, at a suitable place, because it is connected with a threat against Egypt (chs 40-48 date from the year 573 according to ch 40 1). The number seven evidently does not occur accidentally, since in other threats of this kind a typical number appears to have been purposely chosen, thus: Isa 13-22, i.e. ten; Jer 46-51, also ten; which fact again under the circumstances is an important argument in repelling attacks on the genuineness of the book.

Probably the five parts of the first subdivision, and the seven of the second, supplement each other, making a total of twelve (cf the analogous structure of Ex 25 1-30 10 under Exopus, and probably the chiasitic structure of Ezk 34-48, with 7+5 pieces; see below). The oracles against the foreign countries are not only in point of time to be placed between ch 24 and 33 21, but also, as concerns contents, help splendidly to solve the difficulty suggested by ch 24, and in this way satisfactorily fill the gap thus made. The arrival of the news of the fall of Jerus, in 586 BC (cf 33 21 ff), which had already been foretold in ch 24, introduced by the mighty watchman's cry to repentance (33 1 ff), and followed by a reproof of the superficial reception of the prophetic word (see 1 above), concludes the first chief part of the book.

The second part also naturally falls into two subdivisions, of which the first contains the development of the nearer and more remote future, as to its inner character and its historical course (chs 34-39): (1) the true shepherd of Israel (ch 34); (2) the future fate of Edom (ch 35); (3) Israel's deliverance from the disgrace of the shameful treatment by the heathen, which falls back upon the latter again (36 1-15); (4) the desecration of the name of Jeh by Israel and the sanctification by Jeh (36 15-38); (5) the revival of the Israelitish nation (37 1-14); (6) the reunion of the separated kingdoms, Judah and Israel (37 15-28); (7) the overthrow of the terrible gentile power of the north (chs 38 f).

The second subdivision (chs 40-48) contains the reconstruction of the external affairs of the people in a vision, on the birthday of 573, "in the beginning of the year" (beginning of a jubilee year? [Lev 25 10]; cf also DAY OF ATONEMENT). After the explanatory introduction (40 1-4), there follow five pericopes: (1) directions with reference to the temple (of the subscription 43 12) (40 5-43 12); (2) the altar (43 13-46 24); (3) the wonderful fountain of the temple, on the banks of which the trees bear fruit every month (47 1-12); (4) the boundaries of the land and its division among the twelve tribes of Israel (47 13-48 29); (5) the size of the holy city and the names of its twelve gates (48 30-35).

In (3) to (5) the prominence of the number twelve is clear. Perhaps we can also divide (1) and (2) each into twelve pieces: (1) would be 40 5 ff. 17 ff. 23 ff. 39 ff. 43 ff.; 41 1 ff. 5 ff. 12 ff. 15 ff.; 42 1 ff. 15 ff.; 43 1 ff.; for (2) it would be 43 13 ff. 18 ff.; 44 1 ff. 4 ff. 15 ff.; 45 1 ff. 9 ff. 13 ff. 18 ff.; 46 1 ff. 16 ff. 19 ff.

At any rate the entire second chief part, chs 34-48, contains predictions of deliverance. The people down to 586 were confident, so that Ezekiel was compelled to rebuke them. After the taking of Jerus a change took place in both respects. Now the people are despairing, and this is just the right time for the prophet to preach deliverance. The most important separate prophecies will be mentioned and examined in another connection (II below).

The transparent structure of the whole book suggests the idea that the author did not extend the composition over a long period, but wrote it, so to say, at one stretch, which of course does not make it impossible that the separate prophecies were put into written form immediately after their reception, but rather presupposes this. When the prophet wrote they were only woven together into a single uniform book (cf also EXODUS, IV, 1, 2).

(3) His relation to Jeremiah.—As Elijah and Elisha, or Amos and Hosea, or Isaiah and Micah, or Haggai and Zechariah, so too Jeremiah and Ezekiel constitute a prophetic couple (cf 1 above); cf e.g. in later time the sending out of the disciples of Jesus, two by two (Lk 10 1), the relation of Peter and John in Acts 3 ff.; of Paul and Barnabas in Acts 13 ff.; of Luther and Melancthon, Calvin and Zwingli. Both prophets prophesy about the same time; both are of priestly descent (cf 1 above), both witness the overthrow of the Jewish nation, and with their prophecies accompany the fate of the Jewish state down to the catastrophe and beyond that, rebuking, threatening, warning, admonishing, and also comforting and encouraging.

In matters of detail, too, these two prophets often show the greatest similarity, as in the threat against the unfaithful shepherds (Ezk 34 2 ff.; Jer 23 1 ff.); in putting into one class the Northern and the Southern Kingdom and condemning both, although the prediction is also made that they shall eventually be united and pardoned (Ezk 23 16; Jer 3 6 ff.; Ezk 37 15 ff.; Jer 3 14-18; 23 5 ff.; 30 f); in the individualizing of religion (cf the fact that both reject the common saying: "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge," Ezk 18 2; Jer 31 29); in their inwardness (Ezk 36 25 ff.; Jer 24 7; 31 27-34; 32 39; 33 8); in their comparisons of the coming judgment with a boiling pot (Ezk 24 1 ff.; Jer 1 13 ff.); and finally, in their representation of the Messiah as the priest-king (see 1 above; viz. in Ezk 21 25 ff.; 45 22; cf Jer 30 21; 33 17 ff.; see II, 3, and my work Messianische Erwartung, 320 ff., 354 ff.). Neither is to be considered independently of the other, since the prophetic writings, apparently, received canonical authority soon after and perhaps immediately after they were written (cf the expression "the former prophets" in Zec 1 4; 7 12, also the constantly increasing number of citations from earlier prophets in the later prophets, and the understanding of the "exact succession of the prophets" down to Artaxerxes in Jos, CAp, I, 8), it is possible that Ezekiel, with his waw consecutivum, with which the book begins, is to be understood as desiring to connect with the somewhat older Jeremiah (cf a similar relation of Jonah to Obadiah; see my art. "Canon of the OT" and "Jonah" in Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary).

(4) Fate of the book and its place in the Canon.—With Jeremiah and Ezekiel, many Heb MSS, esp. those of the Ger. and Fr. Jews, begin the series of "later prophets," and thus these books are found before Isa; while the Massorah and the MSS of the Spanish Jews, according to the age and the size of the books, have the order, Isa, Jer, Ezk. The text of the book is, in part, quite corrupt, and in this way the interpretation of the book, not easy in itself, is made considerably more difficult. Jerome, Ad Paul., writes that the beginning and the end of the book contained many dark passages; that these parts, like the beginning of Gen, were not permitted to be read by the Jews before these had reached their 30th year. During the time when the schools of Hillel and Shammai flourished, Ezk belonged to those books which some wanted "to hide," the others being Prov, Eccl, Est and Cant. In these discussions the question at issue was not the reception of the book into the Canon, which was rather presupposed, nor again any effort to exclude them from the Canon again, which thought could not be reconciled with the high estimate in which it is known that Est was held, but it was the exclusion of these books from public reading in the Divine service, which project failed. The reasons for this proposal are not to be sought in any doubt as to their authenticity, but in reference to their contents (cf my art. "Canon of the OT," in Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary). Possibly, too, one reason was to be found in the desire to avoid the profanation of the most sacred vision in the beginning of the book, as Zunz suggests. There is no doubt, however, that the difference of this book from the Torah was a reason that made it unadvisable to read it in public. It was hoped that these contradictions would be solved by Elijah when he should return. But finally, rabbinical research, after having used up three hundred cans of oil, succeeded in finding the solution. These contradictions, as a matter of fact, have not yet been removed, and have in modern times contributed to the production of a very radical theory in criticism, as will be shown immediately under II, 2.

II. Significance of Ezekiel in Israel's Religious History.—Under the first head we will consider the formal characteristics and significance of the book; and the examination of its contents will form the subject under the next four divisions.

It is not correct to regard Ezekiel merely as a writer, as it is becoming more and more customary to do. Passages like 3 10 ff.; 14 4 ff.; 20 1 ff. 27; 24 18 ff.; 43 10 ff show that just as the other prophets did, he too proclaimed by word of mouth the revelations of God he had received. However, he had access only to a portion of the people. It was indeed for him even more important than it had been for the earlier prophets to provide for the wider circulation and permanent influence of his message by putting it into written form. We will, at this point, examine his book first of all from its formal and its aesthetic side. To do this it is very difficult, in a short sketch, to give even a general impression of the practically inexhaustible riches of the means at his command for the expression of his thoughts.

(1) Visions.—Thus, a number of visions at once attract our attention. In the beginning of his work there appears to him the Divine throne-chariot, which comes from the north as a storm, as a great cloud and a fire rolled together. This chariot is borne by the four living creatures in the form of men, with the countenances of a man, of a lion, of an ox and of an eagle, representing the whole living creation. It will be remembered that these figures have passed over into the Rev of St. John (4 7), and later were regarded as the symbols of the four evangelists. In chs 10 f this throne-chariot in the vision leaves the portal of the temple going toward the east, returning again in the prediction of deliverance in ch 43. Moreover, the entire last nine chapters are to be interpreted as a vision (cf 40 2). We must not forget, finally, the revivification of the Israelitish nation in ch 37, represented in the picture of a field full of dead bones, which are again united, covered with skin, and receive new life through the rûḥ (word of two meanings, "wind" and "spirit").

As a rule the visions of Ezekiel, like those of Zechariah (cf my art. "Zechariah" in Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary), are not regarded as actual experiences, but only as literary forms. When it is given as a reason for this that the number of visions are too great and too complicated, and therefore too difficult of presentation, to be real experiences, we must declare this to be an altogether too unsafe, subjective and irrelevant rule to apply in the matter. However correct the facts mentioned are in themselves they do not compel us to draw this conclusion. Not only is it uncertain how many visions may be experiences (cf e.g. the five visions in Am 7 ff, which are generally regarded as actual experiences), but it is also absolutely impossible to prove such an a priori claim with reference to the impossibility and the unreality of processes which are not accessible to us by our own experience. As these visions, one and all, are, from the religious and ethical sides, up to the standards of OT prophecy, and as, further, they are entirely unique in character, and as, finally, there is nothing to show that they are only literary forms, we must hold to the conviction that the visions are actual experiences.

(2) Symbolical acts.—Then we find in Ezk, also, a large number of symbolical acts. According to Divine command Ezekiel sketches the city of Jerus and its siege on a tile (4 1 ff); or he lies bound on his left side, as an atonement, 390 days, and 40 days on his right side, according to the number of years of the guilt of Israel and Judah (4 4 ff). During the 390 days the condition of the people in exile is symbolized by a small quantity of food daily of the weight of only 20 shekels, and unclean, being baked on human or cattle dung, and a small quantity of water, which serves as food and drink of the prophet (4 9 ff).

By means of his beard and the hair of his head, which he shaves off and in part burns, in part strikes with the sword, and in part scatters to the wind, and only the very smallest portion of which he ties together in the hem of his garment, he pictures how the people shall be decimated so that only a small remnant shall remain (5 1 ff). In ch 12, he prepares articles necessary for marching and departs in the darkness. Just so Israel will go into captivity and its king will not see the country into which he goes (cf the blinding of Zedekiah, 2 K 25

7). In 37 15 ff, he unites two different sticks into one, with inscriptions referring to the two kingdoms, and these picture the future union of Israel and Judah. It is perhaps an open question whether or not some of these symbolical actions, which would be difficult to carry out in actuality, are not perhaps to be interpreted as visions; thus, e.g. the distributing the wine of wrath to all the nations, in Jer 25 15, can in all probability not be understood in any other way. But, at any rate, it appears to us that here, too, the acceptance of a mere literary form is both unnecessary and unsatisfactory, and considering the religio-ethical character of Ezk, not permissible.

(4) Lamentations.—Of the lamentations, we mention the following: according to ch 19, a lioness rears young lions, one after the other, but one after the other is caught in a trap and led away by nose-rings. The ones meant are Jehoahaz and certainly Jehoichin. The lion mother, who before was like a grapevine, is banished (Zedekiah). Another lamentation is spoken over Tyre, which is compared to a proud ship (cf 27 1 ff); also over the king of Tyre, who is hurled down from the mountain of the gods (28 11–19); and over Pharaoh of Egypt, who is pictured as a crocodile in the sea (32 1 ff).

That his contemporaries knew how to appreciate the prophet at least from the aesthetic side, we saw above (1, 1). What impression does Ezekiel make upon us today, from this point of view? He is declared to be "too intellectual for a poet"; "fantastic"; "vividness in him finds a substitute in strengthening and repetition"; "he has no poetical talent"; "he is the most monotonous prose writer among the prophets." These and similar opinions are heard. In matters of taste there is no disputing; but there is food for reflection in the story handed down that Frederick von Schiller was accustomed to read Ezk, chiefly on account of his magnificent descriptions, and that he himself wanted to learn Heb in order to be able to enjoy the book in the original. And Herder, with his undeniable and undenied fine appreciation of the poetry of many nations, calls Ezekiel "the Aeschylus and the Shakespeare of the Hebrews" (cf Lange's Comm. on Ezk, 519).

(1) Ezk 44 4 ff: The claim that the distinction between priests and Levites was introduced by Ezekiel.—(a) The Bib. facts on the subject:

2. Ezekiel and the Levitical System In the vision of the reconstruction of the external relations of the people in the future (chs 40–48), in the second pericope, which treats of the cultus (43 13–46 24; cf I, 2, 2), it is claimed that Ezekiel, at the command of Jeh, reproaches the Israelites that they engage in their room strangers, uncircumcised in heart and uncircumcised in flesh, to take charge of the service of Jeh in the sanctuary, instead of doing this service themselves, and thus desecrate the temple (44 4–8). From now on the Levites, who hitherto have been participating in the service of the idols on the high places and had become for Israel an occasion for guilt, are to attend to this work. They are degraded from the priesthood as a punishment of their guilt, and are to render the above-mentioned service in the temple (vs 9 ff), while only those Levitical priests, the sons of Zadok, who had been rendering their services in the sanctuary in the proper way, while Israel was going astray, are to be permitted to perform priestly functions (vs 15 ff).

(b) The modern interpretation of this passage (Ezk 44 4 ff) is regarded as one of the most important proofs for the Wellhausen hypothesis. Down to the 7th cent. BC it is claimed that there are no signs that a distinction was made between the persons who had charge of the cultus in Israel, and this is held to be proved by the history of the preceding period and by the Book of Dt, placed by the critics in this time. It is said that Ezekiel is the first to change this, and in this passage introduces the distinction between priests and the lower order of Levites, which difference is then presupposed by the PC. According to this view, the high priest of the PC, too, would not yet be known to Ezekiel, and would not yet exist in his time. More fully expressed, the development would have to be thought as follows: the Book of Dt, which abolished the service on the high places, and had introduced the concentration of the cultus, had in a humane way provided for the deposed priests who had been serving on the high places, and, in 18 6 ff, had expressly permitted them to perform their work in Jerus, as did all of their brethren of their tribe, and to enjoy the same income as these. While all the other Deuteronomic commands had in principle been recognized, this ordinance alone had met with opposition: for in 2 K 23 9 we are expressly told that the priests of the high places were not permitted to go up to Jerus. Ezekiel now, according to Wellhausen's statement, "hangs over the logic of the facts a moral mantle," by representing the deposition of the priests of the high places as a punishment for the fact that they were priests of the high places, although they had held this position in the past by virtue of legal right.

It is indeed true, it is said, that these priests did not submit to such a representation of the case and such treatment. The violent contentions which are said to have arisen in consequence are thought to have their outcome expressed in Nu 16 f (the rebellion of Korah, the budding staff of Aaron). The PC, however, continued to adhere to the distinction once it had been introduced, and had become a fact already at the return in 538 BC (cf Ezr 2 36 ff), even if it was found impossible to limit the priesthood to the Zadokites, and if it was decided to make an honorable office out of the degraded position of the Levites as given by Ezekiel. The fact that, according to Ezr 2 36-39, in the year 538 BC, already 4,289 priests, but according to ver 40, only 74 Levites, returned, is also regarded as proving how dissatisfied the degraded priests of the high places had been with the new position, created by Ezekiel, to which they had been assigned. With the introduction of the PCodex in 444 BC, which made a distinction between high priest, priests and Levites within the tribe of Levi, this development reached an end for the time being. While Dt speaks of the "Levitical priests," which expression is regarded as confirming the original identity of the priests and the Levites, it is claimed that since the days of Ezekiel, priests and Levites constitute two sharply distinguished classes.

(c) Examination of this view: Both the exegesis of Ezk 44 4 ff and the whole superstructure are in every direction indefensible and cannot be maintained (cf also my work, Are the Critics Right? 30 ff, 124 ff, 196 ff).

(a) Proof that the hypothesis cannot be maintained for the preëxilic period. The claim that down to the 7th cent. BC there did not exist in Israel any distinction among the persons engaged in the public cultus is in itself an absurdity, but has in addition against it the express testimony of history. In preëxilic times the high priest is expressly mentioned in 2 K 12 9 ff; 22 4.8; 23 4. Accordingly he cannot have been a product of the post-exilic period. The rank of an Eli (1 S 1 ff), Ahimelech (1 S 21 ff), Abiathar (1 K 2 26 ff), Zadok (1 K 2 35), is vastly above that of an ordinary priest. The fact that the expression "high priest" does not happen to occur here is all the less to be pressed, as the term is found even in the PC only in Lev 21 10; Nu 35 25-28. From Dt 10 6; Josh 24 33; Jgs 20 28, we learn that the office of high priest was transmitted from Aaron to his son, Eleazar, and then to his son, Phinehas (cf also Nu 25 11). Before the time of Eli, according to 1 Ch 24 3, it had passed over to the line of the other surviving son of Aaron, that of Ithamar, but, according to 1 K 2 26 f.35, at the deposition of Abiathar and the appointment of Zadok, it returned again to the line of Eleazar (cf 1 S 2 27.28.35 f with 1 Ch 24 3). Distinctions within the tribe are also expressly presupposed by Jer 20 1; 29 25 f.29; 52 24; 2 K 25 18. In the same way Levites are expressly mentioned in history (cf Jgs 17 f; 19-21; 1 S 6 15; 2 S 15 24; 1 K 8 3 ff). This very division of the priestly tribe into three parts possibly suggested the three parts of the temple of Solomon (the holy of holies, the holy place, the forecourt). According to all this, it is not possible that this distinction is not found in Dt, esp. if this book was not written until the 7th cent. BC and throughout took into consideration the actual condition of affairs at that time, as is generally claimed. But this difference is found in Dt, the false dating of which we can here ignore, and is probably suggested by it; for, if this were not the case, then the addition of the words "the whole tribe of Levi" to the words "Levitical priests" in 18 1 would be tautology. But as it is, both expressions already refer to what follows: viz. vs 3-5 to the priests and vs 6 ff to the rest of the Levites. In the same way, the Levites are in 12 12.18 f; 14 27.29; 16 11.14 the objects of charity, while 18 3 ff prescribes a fixed and not insignificant income for the priests. Then, finally, such general statements as are found in 10 8; 18 2 ff; 33 8 ff, not only demand such specific directions as are found only in P, but in 10 9; 18 2 there is a direct reference to Nu 18 20.24 (from P). On the other hand, Dt, in harmony with its general tendency of impressing upon Israel in the spirit of pastoral exhortation the chief demands of the law, does not find it necessary, in every instance, to mention the distinctions that existed in the tribe of Levi.

In Nu 18 7 we have in P even an analogon to Dt 10 8; 33 8 ff; since here, too, no distinction is made between priests and high priests separately, but the whole priestly service is mentioned in a summary manner (cf further Lev 6 22 in comparison with ver 25; Nu 35 in comparison with Josh 21). That Dt cannot say "Aaron and his sons," as P does, is certainly self-evident, because Aaron was no longer living at the time when the addresses of Dt were delivered. And how the expression "Levitical priests," which Dt uses for the expression found in P, and which was entirely suitable, because under all circumstances the priests were of the tribe of Levi, is to be understood as excluding the subordinate members of the cultus-officers belonging to the same tribe, is altogether incomprehensible (cf the emphasis put on the Levitical priesthood in P itself, as found in Nu 17; Josh 21 4.10 ff). So are other passages which originated at a time after the introduction by Ezekiel, or, according to the critics, are claimed to have been introduced then (cf Mal 2 1 f.4.8; 3 3; Jer 33 18; Isa 66 21; 2 Ch 5 5; 23 18; 29 4 ff; 30 27), and even in Ezk (44 15). The claims that Dt is more humane in its treatment of the priests who had engaged in the worship in high places (cf e.g. 2 K 22 f) cannot at all be reconciled with Dt 13, which directs that death is to be the punishment for such idolatry. If, notwithstanding this, it is still claimed that Dt 18 6 ff allows the priests of the high places to serve in Jerus, then it is incomprehensible how in 2 K 23 9 these men did not appeal directly to Dt in vindication of their rights over against all hindrances, since Dt was regarded as the absolute norm in carrying out the cultus tradition.

(β) Examination of the hypothesis on the basis of Ezk: No less unfavorable to the view of the critics must the judgment be when we examine it in the light of the contents of Ezk itself. The prophet presupposes a double service in the sanctuary, a lower service which, in the future, the degraded priests of the high places are to perform and which, in the past, had been performed in an unlawful manner by strangers (44 6-9), and a higher service, which had been performed by the Zadokites, the priests at the central sanctuary, in the proper way at the time when the other priests had gone astray, which service was for this reason to be entrusted to them alone in the future (cf, also, 40 45, 46; 43 19). Since in vs 6 ff the sharpest rebukes are cast up to Israel (according to the reading of the LXX, which here uses the second person, even the charge of having broken the covenant), because they had permitted the lower service to be performed by uncircumcised aliens, it is absolutely impossible that Ezekiel should have been the first to introduce the distinction between higher and lower service, but he presupposes this distinction as something well known, and, also, that the lower service has been regulated by Divine ordinances. As we have such ordinances clearly given only in Nu 18 2 ff (from P) it is in itself natural and almost necessary that Ezekiel has reference to these very ordinances, but these very ordinances direct that the Levites are to have charge of this lower service. This is confirmed by Ezk 48 12 f, where the designation "Levites" in contradistinction from the priests is a fixed and recognized term for the lower cultus officials. For Ezekiel has not at all said that he would from now on call these temple-servants simply by the name "Levites," but, rather, he simply presupposes the terminology of P as known and makes use of it. He would, too, scarcely have selected this expression to designate a condition of punishment, since the term "Levites" is recognized on all hands to be an honorable title in the sacred Scriptures. And when he, in addition, designates the Zadokites as "Levitical priests" (44 15), this only shows anew that Ezekiel in his designation of the lower temple-servants only made use of the terminology introduced by P.

But, on the representation of the critics, the whole attitude ascribed to Ezekiel cannot be upheld. It is maintained that a prophet filled with the highest religious and ethical thoughts has been guilty of an action that, from an ethical point of view, is to be most sharply condemned. The prophet is made to write reproaches against the people of Israel for something they could not help (vs 6 ff), and he is made to degrade and punish the priests of the high places, who also had acted in good faith and were doing what they had a right to do (vs 9 ff; cf "the moral mantle" which, according to Wellhausen, "he threw over the logic of facts"). Ezekiel is accordingly regarded here as a bad man; but at the same time he would also be a stupid man. How could he expect to succeed in such an uncouth and transparent trick? If success had attended the effort to exclude from the service in Jerus the priests of the high places according to 2 K 23 9, and notwithstanding Dt 18 6 ff, which according to what has been said under (α) is most improbable, then this would through the action of Ezekiel again have been made a matter of uncertainty. Or, was it expected that they would suffer themselves to be upbraided and punished without protesting if they had done no wrong? Finally, too, the prophet would have belonged to that class whose good fortune is greater than their common sense. This leads us to the following:

(γ) Examination of the development after the time of Ezekiel: Ezekiel's success is altogether incomprehensible, if now the distinction between priests and Levites has, at once, been introduced and at the return from captivity, in the year 538 (Ezr 2 36 ff), certainly was a fact. It is true that we at once meet with a host of difficulties. Why do only 74 Levites return according to Ezr 2 40 if their degradation from the ranks of the priesthood through Ezekiel had not preceded? asks the Wellhausen school. Why did any Levites, at all, return, if they had been so disgraced? is our question. But, how is it at all possible that so many priests could return (4,289 among 42,360 exiles, or more than one-tenth of the whole number; cf Ezr 2 36-38 with ver 64; but many more than one-tenth if women are included in the 42,360), if, since the times of Ezekiel, there were none other than Zadokite priests? In examining the writers claimed as the authors of P, all those difficulties recur again which are found in the case of Ezekiel himself. That Nu 16 f indicates and reflects the opposition of the degraded is nothing but an unproved assertion; but if they had revolted, which was probable enough, then there would have been no worse and more foolish means than to change the degraded position of the Levites according to Ezk into the honorable position assigned them in P. This would only have made the matter worse. The Levites would again have been able to claim their old rights and they would have acquired the strongest weapons for their opposition. The fact that Ezekiel's restoration of the priesthood to the Zadokites would have been ignored by P, as also the descent of Aaron through Eleazar and Ithamar, according to the account of P, that is, that in reality also others were admitted to the priesthood, would only have the effect of making those who still were excluded all the more rebellious, who could appeal to each case of such an admission as a precedent and accordingly as a violation of the principle. What possible purpose the authors of P could have had in the creation of those products of imagination, Nadab and Abihu, and the portrayal of the terrible fate of these sons of Aaron (Lev 10) remains incomprehensible (cf the purposeless and constructive imagination in the description of the details of the Ark of the Covenant, which stands in no connection with the tendency of P; see Exodus, III, 5). Nor can it be understood why the creators of the PC would have had assigned other duties to the Levites than Ezekiel had done; the slaying of the burnt offerings and the sacrifices (44 11) and the cooking of the latter (46 24) is lacking in P, in which document the transportation of the imaginary tabernacle would have exhausted the duties of the priests (Nu 4), while in other respects, their services would be described only in such general notices as in Nu 8 23 ff; 18 2 ff (cf for this reason the very credible account in Ch, which through Ezk 44 11; 46 24 only becomes all the more trustworthy, where we are told of the enlargement of the duties of the Levites already by David in 1 Ch 23 25 ff). In short, the critical views offer one monstrosity after another, and each greater than its predecessor. We will only mention further that, if the critics are right in this matter, then of the directions found in Ezk 40-48 nothing else has ever been carried out in reality, even when these chapters are correctly understood (see 2 [d] below), and at first nothing was intended to be carried out, so that it would be all the more surprising if this one feature of the program of Ezekiel had alone been picked out and had been carried out with an inexplicable haste, and that too at a time when the whole cultus was not at all observed (573, according to 40 1).

(d) The solution of the problem: The text as it reads in Ezk 44 9 ff actually does speak of a degradation. If the matter involved only a mere putting back into the status quo ante, of the Levites, who on the high places, contrary to the law, had usurped the prerogatives of the higher priestly offices, as this could easily be understood, then the expression in vs 10. 12, "They shall bear their iniquity," would lose much of its significance. On the other hand, the whole matter finds its explanation if, in the first place, the lower order of Levites did not put a high estimate on their office, so that they transferred their service to aliens (vs 6 ff), and if, in the second place, by those Levites who departed from Jeh, when Israel was going astray, not all the Levites are to be understood, but only a certain group of priests, who by these words were for themselves and their contemporaries clearly enough designated: namely, the descendants of Aaron through Ithamar and Eleazar in so far as they were not Zadokites, that is, had not officiated at the central sanctuary. The non-Zadokite priests had permitted themselves to be misled to officiate in the idolatry in the services of the high places, and for this reason were for the future to be degraded to the already existing lower order of the Levites.

The fact that in the ranks of lower participants in the cultus, already in the days of David, according to Ch, a still further division had taken place (1 Ch 23-26), so that by the side of the Levites in the most narrow sense of the word, also the singers and the gate watchmen were Levites of a lower rank (Neh 12 44-47; 13 10), is again in itself entirely credible, and, in addition, is made very probable by Ezr 2 40 ff. This too at once increases the small number of Levites who returned from the exile from 74 to 341. In comparison to the number of priests (4,289) the number yet remains a small one, but from Ezk 44 6 ff we learn further that the Levites also before the days of Ezekiel had not appreciated their office, for then they would not have given it over to aliens. In this way not only does everything become clear and intelligible, but the weapon which was to serve for the defence of the Wellhausen school has in every respect been turned against these critics. The historical order can only be: first, the PC, and after that Ezk; never vice versa.

(2) Ezk 40-48: Priority claimed for Ezekiel over against the Priest Codex (of Are the Critics Right? 114 ff).—(a) Sketch of the modern view: The entire vision of what the external condition of affairs would be in the future in chs 40-48, and not only what is particularly stated in 44 4 ff, is made a part of Israel's religious development in accordance with the scheme of the Wellhausen school. For this hypothesis, this section is one of the chief arguments, besides the opposition which it claims exists on the part of the prophets against the sacrifices, in addition to the proof taken from the history of the people and from the comparison of the different collections of laws with each other. In Ezk 40-48 many things are different from what they are in the PC, and in Ezk much is lacking that is found in P. How now would a prophet dare to change the legislation in P? Hence P is regarded as later than Ezk. This is, briefly, the logic of the Wellhausen school.

(b) The one-sidedness of this view and its dangerous consequences: If we first state the facts in the case and complete the observations of the modern school, the picture will at once assume quite a different form and the conclusions drawn will in their consequences prove very embarrassing. It is a fact that in Ezk the high priest so prominent in P is lacking. No mention is made of the equipment of the holy of holies, and in the holy place the table of the shewbread and the candlesticks, old utensils that are mentioned in the tabernacle of P, and in part play an important rôle there. But the differences in Ezk are not found only in comparison with P, but just as much, too, in features which belong to the legislation of Dt, as also of the Book of the Covenant, accepted at all hands as pre-exilic (Ex 21-23; 34). Thus there is lacking in Ezk 40-48 not only the tithes of P (Lev 27 30-33), also the laws with reference to the firstborn from P (vs 26 f; Nu 18 15 f), the ordinances with reference to the portions of the redemption sacrifice to be given to the priests from P (Lev 7 31 ff), but equally the ordinance with reference to the tithes, firstborn and sacrificial gifts from Dt (cf 14 22 ff; 26 12 ff; 14 23-26; 15 19-23; 18 3). The feast of weeks is wanting, which is demanded not only by P in Lev 23 15 ff; Nu 28 26 ff, but also by the older legislation (Ex 23 16; 34 22; Dt 16 9 ff); and in the place of the three || feasts demanded everywhere, only the Passover and the Feast of the Tabernacles are prescribed (Ezk 45 21). Thus too the direction with regard, e.g. to the Day of Atonement in Ezk 45 18 ff is different in regard to number, time and ritual from P in Lev 16, etc (cf DAY OF ATONEMENT, I, 1), but also the command found in Ex 20 26 (from E) that it was not permitted to ascend on steps to the altar of Jeh is overthrown by Ezk 43 17. And, according to what has been described under (1), criticism itself accepts (although without reason) that Ezekiel had changed the commandment of Dt 18 6 ff, according to which all the Levites in Jerus could perform priestly service, so that he not only forbade this, as did 2 K 23 9, but that he also degraded these priests of the high places as a punishment and reduced them to a lower service.

As is the case in reference to the law, Ezekiel also disagrees with the facts of history. He changes the dimensions of the Solomonic temple entirely (40 5-42 20); he gives an entirely different distribution of the Holy Land (47 13-48 29) from that which was carried out in actual history. What sheer arbitrariness and short-sightedness it would be, to pick out of this condition of affairs only those features in which he differs from P, in order, for this reason, to force the composition of the PC into the post-exilic period, and at the same time to close one's eyes to the necessary conclusion that if this principle of interpretation is correct, then the Book of the Covenant and Dt, the temple and the migration into Canaan must also be post-exilic. "The prophet is not allowed to change P," we are told; but as a matter of fact he has changed P no more than he changed the older laws and history. Hence the claim is false. And then, too, P is not to be regarded as unchangeable. Even the writer of Ch, who writes from the standpoint of P, has changed P; for he narrates in 1 Ch 23 24.27 that the age of the Levites since the time of David had been reduced from 30 or 25 years (Nu 4 3.23.30.35; 8 23 ff) to 20 years (cf also the participation of the Levites in the burnt sacrifices and the Passover under Hezekiah [2 Ch 29 34; 30 17.19]), and in P itself, according to Nu 9 6-12, the observation of the Passover after the regular time was permitted, and in general if such changes and adaptations of the law on the part of Ezk could not be demonstrated elsewhere, the difficulties for the advocates of the Wellhausen hypothesis would be exactly as great as they are for the adherents of the Bib. views, only that the problem would be inverted to explain how the author of P could have ventured to deviate so far from the will of God as this had been revealed to Ezekiel.

(c) Impossibility that Ezk preceded P: While the description of the temple in 40 5 ff and of the future dwelling-places of the people (47 13 ff) is comparatively complete, it is the very legislation of the ritual in 43 13–46 24, in which it is maintained that the authors of P followed the precedent of the prophet, that is in itself so full of omissions in Ezk, that it could not possibly have been a first sketch, but must presuppose P, if it is not to be regarded as suspended in the air. Ezk presupposes not only burnt offerings, peace offerings and food offerings, but also sin offerings (40 39; 42 13; 43 19.21.22.25; 44 27.29; 46 20). Ezekiel is indeed the first and the only prophet who mentioned sin offerings, just as the guilt offerings are found outside of Ezk only in Isa 53 10. But this reference is of such a kind that he presupposes on the part of his readers an acquaintance also with these two kinds of sacrifices; hence it is, in itself, a natural conclusion, that the sacrificial legislation of P, that is, chiefly Lev 1 to 7, is older, and as the guilt offerings and the sin offerings are prescribed only by P, and in Lev 4 f appear to be emphasized anew, this conclusion becomes a necessity.

If this is not the case then Ezk is without any foundation. In the same way the injunctions with reference to what is clean and unclean are presupposed as known in 44 23.25 f (cf 22 26). How long the uncleanness described in ver 26 continued can be seen only from Nu 19 11 ff. Since in Ezk 22 26 there is presupposed a definitely fixed Torah or Law, which it is possible to violate, then it is only natural to conclude that such commands existed before the days of Ezekiel, esp. such as are found in Lev 11–15. In the same way the general character of the ordinances (44 30a), concerning the tithes due to the cultus officials, demand such further developments as are found especially in Nu 18 in P. The high priests, too, although Ezekiel makes no mention of them, belong to the period earlier than Ezekiel, as was proved under (1). If there had been no high priest before the days of Ezekiel, it would have been a perfect mystery, in addition, how he would be found after 520 BC (Hag 1 1; Zec 3 8; 6 10 ff), without a word having been mentioned of the establishment of such an important institution. In addition, if the office had been created just at this time, this would make it very uncomfortable for the contentions of the Wellhausen school, since the other ordinances of P were introduced only in 444 BC, and should here be regarded as innovating.

That Ezekiel presupposed the ordinances of P in reference to the cultus officials has been demonstrated under (1). Accordingly, there yet remains to be discussed the universally recognized relationship that exists between Ezk and the so-called Law of Holiness (H) in Lev 17–26 (cf LEVITICUS), which is so great, that for a time Ezekiel was regarded as the author or the editor of this law, a view which, however, has been dropped, because a number of the peculiarities of Ezk do not admit of its acceptance. The more advanced critics then went farther, and claimed that H is later than Ezk, which is the only possible and defensible position. For practical reasons we here examine, in addition to Ezk 40–48, also the older parts of the book. Especially do we take into consideration, in addition to ch 44, also chs 18, 20 and 22; but in the end the contents of H are suggested by the entire Book of Ezk. Esp. Lev 26 has been very fully used by Ezk; cf for the details, Driver's Intro to the OT; or, Hoffmann, Die wichtigsten Instanzen gegen die Graf-Wellhausensche Hypothese. That Ezk could not be the earlier of the two can be concluded as far as P in general is concerned, and for H in particular, esp. from this, that Ezk is just as closely connected with Dt and Jer, as with P; while, on the other hand, in the passage in question, P is connected only with Ezk, while the expressions which Ezk has in common with Dt and those Ezk has in common with Jer are not found in P (cf the exceedingly interesting and instructive proof in Hoffmann, op. cit.). Equally striking is the proof of Köhler, Biblische Geschichte, III, 154 ff, who shows that the contents of the Torah (Law) presupposed and recognized by Jer and Ezk as dating from the Mosaic period, take into consideration not only the Books of the Covenant (Ex 21 ff; 34) and Dt, but esp. P in general and H in particular. Further, if we place P in a later period, it would be incomprehensible that this body of laws, in which the systematic feature is so important, can differ from the still more systematic ordinances of Ezk, and thus become more unsystematic. Thus the sacrifices on the Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles are in number of the same kind in Ezk 45 21 ff; but not so in P in Nu 28 16 ff; 29 12 ff. In the same way in the food offerings on the feasts as far as oxen, rams, lambs, and the amount of oil to be given are concerned, there is everywhere the proper proportion in 45 18–46 15, while in Nu 28 this is regulated according to a different principle. Then in Ezk are found in the description of the sanctuary (42 15–20; 45 2), of the inner and outer courts (40 23.27.47; cf also 40 19; 43 16 f), square figures in places where they are not found in the tabernacle according to P. To this must be added that no other ordinances of Ezk would be carried out in actual practice. Even the ordinances in 44 4 ff, according to the views of the critics, would be changed in P, in so far as the establishment and work of the lower cultus officials and the enlargement of the powers of the higher cultus officials are concerned (cf [1]). The Day of Atonement, whose roots are said to be found in 45 18 ff, would be materially changed in number, length and ritual (cf DAY OF ATONEMENT, I, 1 and III, 1). When the Israelites returned from captivity, they did not think at all of building the temple or the tabernacle in accordance with Ezekiel's scheme, or dividing the land according to the directions of his book (both of these subjects have great prominence in Ezk 40–48; cf 40 5–43 12; 47 13–48 29), or of harmonizing Ezk with P, or of carrying out the latter practically. The Wellhausen hypothesis is then in conflict with all ritual legislation, whether real or constructed by Wellhausen himself.

(d) The correct interpretation of Ezk 40–48: These chapters dare not be made a part of the development of the law in the OT. Ezekiel's was not a program that was under all circumstances to be carried out or even could be carried out, for it presupposes conditions that were beyond the control of Israel. For in 40 2 ff, a new geographical or geological situation is presupposed, which the country up to this time did not possess (cf the "very high mountain," 40 2), and the same is true in 47 1 ff in reference to the miraculous temple fountain with its equally miraculous powers, and in 47 13 ff in the division of the land. Only after these changes had been effected in the character of the localities by Jeh, and Jeh should again have entered the holy city according to 43 1 ff, would it be possible to carry out also the other injunctions. It is impossible, either, to interpret these chapters as an allegory. This interpretation is out of the question on account of a large number of directions and measurements. It is, however, true that the whole is an ideal scheme, which portrays to the eye the continuation of the kingdom of God, and represents symbolically the presence of Jeh, which sanctifies all around about it and creates for itself a suitable outward form. This is particularly apparent in the new name which is assigned to Jerus, namely, "Jeh at that place," or the conclusion of this section and at the same time of the entire book. This, finally, leads us to a brief account of the views presented.

(3) Ezekiel's Leviticism.—In (1) and (2) above, it has been shown that Ezk was not the starting-point of Leviticism in Israel: it rather represents the extreme development of this tendency. It was in harmony with the elementary stage of the OT to give the thoughts and demands of God, not in a purely abstract form, but to clothe them in objective and external materials, in order to prepare and educate Israel to understand Christianity. (The negative side of Leviticism, which is not to be overlooked by the side of the positive, is discussed in the art. LEVITICUS.) It is a matter of utmost importance for the correct understanding of the OT, that we recognize that the prophets too throughout think Levitically; in their discourses, too, sacred trees, sacrifices, times, persons, tithes, play a most important rôle, notwithstanding all the spiritualization of religion on their part; and where it is thought possible to show an absolute opposition on the part of the prophets to the Levitical system, namely, in the matter of sacrifices, a close consideration, but esp., too, the analogy of the other external institutions, shows that we have in these cases only a relative antithesis (cf Are the Critics Right? 99 ff; Messianische Erwartung der vorexilischen Propheten, 333 ff). Thus e.g. Jeremiah who, in 6 20; 7 21 ff, engages as sharply as possible in polemics against the sacrificial system, and in 31 31 ff, in the passage treating of the new covenant, spiritualizes religion as much as possible, has assigned to sacrifices a place in his predictions of the future (cf 17 19 ff. 26; 31 14; 33 18), just as the abiding-place and the revelation of God for this prophet too, are always found connected with the Holy Land, Jerus or Zion (cf 3 17; 12 15; 30 18; 31 6.11.12; 32 36 ff; 33 9). That in this the ultimate development of the kingdom of God has not yet been reached, but that the entire OT contains only a preliminary stage, cannot be too sharply emphasized. In so far Ezekiel, in whose book Leviticism appears in its most developed state, more than others, shares in the limitations of the OT. But just as little can it be denied that the Levitical system was really one stage, and that, too, an important and indispensable stage in the development of the kingdom of God; and that in this system, the question at issue is not only that of a change of a religion into a stereotyped formalism or externalism, which is the case if this system loses its contents, but the fact that it contained a valuable kernel which ripened in this shell, but would not have ripened if this shell had been prematurely discarded. The external conditions, their harmonious arrangement, the ceremonial ordinances, keeping clean from external pollution, are indeed only forms; but in them valuable contents succeed in finding their expression; through these Israel learned to understand these contents. The kernel could not be given without the shell nor the contents without the form, until in Christianity the time came when the form was to be broken and the shell discarded. This significance of the Levitical system becomes more evident in Ezk than in the case, e.g. in P, where indeed a few passages like Ex 25 8; 29 45 ff; 40 34 ff; Lev 16; 19 18; 26 31.41 clearly show in what sense the entire legislation is to be understood; but the mere fact that there are so few of these passages makes it easy to overlook them; while in Ezk, in addition to the purely Levitical utterances, and in part more closely connected with these, the entire work is saturated with the emphasis put on the highest religious and ethical thoughts, so that both must be in the closest harmony with each other (cf on this subject also Ezekiel's conception of God under 5 below). That Ezk and the Law of Holiness stand in such close relations to each other is not to be explained from this, that Ezekiel is in any way to be connected with the composition of the law in Lev 17–26, but on the ground of the tendency common to both. The fact that Ezekiel shows a special liking for these chapters in P does not, accordingly, justify the conclusion that Lev 17 ff ever existed as a separate legal codex. We must in this connection not forget the close connection of the prophets with the rest of P mentioned under (2) above (cf LEVITICUS). We close this part of the discussion with the statement that Ezekiel constructed his system on the basis of the Levitical ordinance, but as priest-prophet (cf under I, 1) utilized this material independently and freely.

Chs 40–48 treat of the future, and furnish us the transition to another matter, in which Ezk by modern theology has been forced into a wrong light, namely, in regard to the Messianic idea. After the critics had, as a matter of fact, eliminated from the entire preëxilic prophetic writings nearly all of the passages speaking of the Messiah on the ground that they were not genuine (e.g. Am 9 8 ff; Hos 1 10.11; 3 5; Mic 2 12 ff; 4 f; Isa 4 2–6; 7 14; 9 1–7; 11 1–10, etc), Marti and Volz have now completed this task. While the former declared as not genuine all the Messianic predictions down to Deutero-Isaiah, the latter has, in his work, Die vorexilische Jahwe-Prophetie und der Messias, halted at Ezk, but for this works up the entire material into a uniform fundamental conception with pronounced characteristics. He declares that prophecy and the Messianic idea are two mutually exclusive phenomena, by regarding the Messiah as a purely political and national fact, but the prophetic expectation of the future as something purely religious. Ezekiel he regards as the first prophet with whose views on other matters the Messianic idea indeed did not harmonize, but who, nevertheless, yielded to the tendencies of his times and to the general national feelings, and submitted to the influence of the false prophets, who had created the carnal national expectation of a Messiah and constantly fed this, and accordingly received into his book the Messianic passages in 17 22–24; 21 25 f; 34 23 f; 37 22. 24.25. But this too is, all in all, simply a monstrous assumption. It is exegetically incorrect to regard the Messiah merely as a political, national and particularistic person, whenever the religious and ethical and universalistic characteristics of the Messiah are portrayed by prophecy; and it is also incorrect to regard prophecy as abstractly religious, when the national and external side of the kingdom of God is ignored. It is impossible to eliminate the different Messianic passages preceding the time of Ezekiel, as these are proved to be genuine by their contents and form, their close connection with the context, the structure of the prophetic writings, and by the mutual relation of these passages to each other. But we must here refer to our book, Die messianische Erwartung der vorexilischen Propheten. We draw attention to this only because since the publication of Gressmann's book, Der Ursprung der israelitisch-jüdischen Eschatologie, the critics have begun to be a little less skeptical in reference to the genuine character of the Messianic passages in the older prophetic writings. We here point to the fact, that the positive contentions of Volz, which ascribe to Ezk the introduction of the Messianic idea out of the popular faith, are exceedingly inconsiderate. The different passages mentioned above, which in Ezk speak of the Messiah, can scarcely be said to add any new features to the picture of the Messiah as it is found in earlier lit. (of one exception to this we will speak later). If the Messiah was not yet portrayed in the earlier prophetic lit., then Ezekiel had the less occasion to introduce this new feature, if this feature did not harmonize with his other views, as Volz claims. And, if this is only a mistake, it is yet a fact that in Ezk the Messianic idea is not relatively a prominent feature; he, as it were, only recalls the pictures known from the predictions of the earlier prophets; he accepts these pictures as revealed truth, because they, in his conviction, evidently originated in the development of prophecy. Cf for the idea that the Messiah is to come forth from small origins and from a lowly station Ezk 17 22-24; Isa 10 33.34; 11 1; Mic 5 1 ff. Ezk 21 32 only hints at the general expectation of a Messiah; Ezk 34 23 f; 37 22. 24.25 connect esp. with the promises given to David in 2 S 7. Then the reunion of the two kingdoms into one scepter is found also in Am 9 11; Hos 2 2; 3 5; Isa 8 23-9 1 ff; 11 13 f; Mic 5 2; Jer 3 18; 23 5 f; 1 K 11 39; the blessing of Nature, Isa 11 6-8; Am 9 13 ff; Hos 2 20 ff; 14 6 ff. At all events the Messianic expectations of Ezekiel exhibit too few peculiar features and are too little prominent in the body of his prophecies to justify the belief that he was the first prophet to have introduced this so important Messianic figure. On the other hand, let us remember too that Ezekiel opposes the national feelings as sharply as possible by representing the entire past history of Israel as an unbroken chain of heathenish abominations (chs 1-24, 33, esp. 16 and 23), and remember it was just he who like Jeremiah saw his most bitter opponents in the false prophets (13 1 ff; 14 9; 22 28), and that in the most pronounced antithesis to these he proclaimed before the fall of Jerus that this fall would and must come. And now it is claimed that he borrowed his Messianic idea from these very people, although this Messianic conception is everywhere represented as being a Divine revelation and not a natural product of the popular consciousness. A greater blunder in theological thought could scarcely be imagined.

In one point, however, we do find in Ezk a further development of the Messianic idea, namely, that in His work, in addition to His characteristics as a king, the Messiah has also those of a high priest, as this is shown at the same period by Jeremiah (see under I, 1, and 2, 3; cf later Zec 3 f, and possibly 6 9 ff). The micnepheth, which the Messiah bears according to Ezk 21 26, is in other connections always the mitre of the high priest (cf Ex 28 4.39; 29 6; 39 28.31; see above II, 2, 1a and 2c). At the Passover feast, at least, the prince conducts a purification through a bullock for a sin offering, which, through the fact that this is done for himself and for the entire people of the land, reminds us of the ceremony of the high priest on the day of atonement (Ezk 45 22; Lev 16 17.24.33; cf DAY OF ATONEMENT, I, 1, and Messianische Erwartung der vorzeitlichen Propheten, 356 ff). Over against the current view, we finally emphasize the fact that Ezekiel's expectations of a Messianic feature are not confined to Israel, but like those of Isaiah (2 2 ff; 11 10; Mic 5 3.6) and of other prophets are universal in their scope (cf Ezk 17 23; 16 53.61; 34 26).

Ezekiel is also, finally, regarded as the creator of apocalyptic lit., which in prophetic garment sought to satisfy the curiosity of the people and picture the details of the last times. In this connection the critics have in mind esp. Ezk 38, 39, that magnificent picture of the final onslaught of the nations under Gog and Magog, which will end with the certain victory of the Divine cause and the terrible overthrow of the enemies of Jeh. On the mountains of Israel the hosts will fall (39 4); seven years it will be possible to kindle fires with the weapons of the enemies (39 9); it takes seven months to bury the dead (39 12); a great feast is prepared for the birds (39 17 ff).

In reply to this there are two things to be said. First of all Ezekiel is not the creator of these thoughts. There is a whole list of passages in the Prophets that already before his time picture how matters will be after and beyond the Messianic age (cf Mic 2 12b f; 4 11 f; 5 4 f.7.20; Joel 3 2.12 f; Isa 11 4; 23 6; Hos 2 2). These are, however, all regarded by the critics as not genuine, or as the product of a later period, but they forget in this to observe that Ezekiel in these passages refers to older prophets (38 17; 39 8), and thus they saw off the branch upon which he sits. In regard, however, to painting the fullest details of the picture, Ezekiel is equaled by none of his predecessors. In this matter, too, he represents the highest point of development, in which he is followed by Zec 12; 13 7 ff; 14 1 ff, and Dnl, and with direct dependence on Ezk 38 f by the Apocalypse of St. John (ch 19 17 ff). On the other hand, Ezk is entirely different from the later Jewish apocalyptic lit. The latter borrowed the prophetic form but possesses neither the Divine contents nor the Divine inspiration of the prophet. For this reason the apocalyptic lit. appears anonymously or under a pseudonym. Ezekiel, however, openly places his name over his prophecies. In Ezk the eschatology is a part of his prophetic mission, and as he in his thoughts throughout remains within the bounds of the religious and ethical ideals of prophecy, this feature, too, of his work is to be regarded as a Divine revelation in a form in harmony with the OT stage of the development of the kingdom of God. We are here indeed considering a matter in connection with which it is esp. difficult to determine how much in reality belongs to the eternally valid contents, and how much to the temporary forms. Here too, as is the case in the exegesis of chs 40-48, Christian theology will vacillate between the extremes of spiritualism and realism, one extreme constantly correcting the other, and in this way constantly approaching the correct middle course, until at some time in the future we will reach the full truth in the matter.

A prophet who, from the aesthetic side, enjoyed the highest appreciation of a Schiller and a Herder (see 1 above), who has brought the 5. Ezekiel's Leviticism of the OT to the highest Conception stage of development (cf 2 above), who of God in his portrait of the Messiah has introduced the high-priestly characteristics (cf 3 above), who in eschatology developed new features and laid the foundation for the development that followed in later times (cf 4 above), can scarcely with any right or reason be termed a "secondary character among the prophets." This fact becomes all the more sure when we now finally examine the conception of God as taught in Ezk. In grandeur and variety of thought, in this respect only, Isaiah and Moses can be compared with Ezekiel. Already in the visions, we are struck by the sublimity of God as there pictured, esp. in the opening vision, where He appears as the absolute ruler of all creation, over which He sits enthroned (cf II, 1, above). He is constantly called "the Lord Jehovah," over against whom the prophet is at all times only "the son of man." More than fifty times it is said that the purpose of the prophecy was that the heathen nations, as well as the Israelites, shall by His judgments and His promises recognize that He is Jehovah.

4. Ezekiel and Apocalyptic Literature

On this side Ezekiel stands in an esp. close relation to the description of the exodus from Egypt (cf Ex 7 5.17; 8 10.22; 9 14.29.30; 10 2; 11 7; 14 4.18, and see Exodus, II, 2, on 7 8—13 16). Above everything Jeh's honor must be defended (36 23.32). Here again there is a place where the evolutionist hypothesis of the development of the idea of God is thoroughly put to shame. For in the preprophetic times it is claimed that God is, in the OT, merely placed by the side of other gods and was regarded only as the God of Israel, with which He was indissolubly connected, because His existence had depended on the existence of the nation. As a proof, reference is made to the defence of His honor; and now we find the same thought in Ezekiel, in whose case it is impossible that any doubt as to his absolute monotheism can any longer arise (cf my Entwicklung der Gottesidee in vorexilischer Zeit, 138 ff, 152 ff). The sublimity of this conception of God also appears in its universality. He is declared to be punishing the nations (cf chs 25 ff, 35 f); He uses them for His purposes (cf chs 38 f, 17, 19, 24, 33); He intends to give them salvation (chs 17, 23; 16 53.61; 34 26; cf 3 above).

Most of all, Ezekiel's conception of God, according to the preceding sketch, reminds us of that of Calvin. By the exalted character of God we find also a second feature. On the one side we find the holy God; on the other, sinful man. The entire development of the people is from the beginning a wrong one. Ezekiel's thoughts are to be regarded as those for days of penance when he, on the one hand, emphasizes the great guilt of the people as such (cf chs 16 and 23), and by the side of this maintains the principle that each one must be punished on account of his own sins (18 2), so that the individual cannot excuse himself, and the individual cannot be freed through the guilt of the people as a totality.

But now comes the highest conception. The exalted and holy God comes to be a God of love. What is it but love, that He does not reject His people forever, but promises them a future (cf chs 34-48, in which also the divided kingdoms are to be reunited, 37 15 ff)? As Ex finds its culmination point in the indwelling of God among His people, which He promised in Ex 25 ff (25 8; 29 45 f), but seems to have become a matter of doubt again in chs 32 ff through the apostasy of the people, and nevertheless is finally realized in chs 35 ff (40 34 ff), thus too in Ezk 10 f, Jeh leaves the city, but in 43 1 ff He again returns, and now the name of the city is "Jehovah is there" (48 35). But as every single member participates in the sin and the punishment of the people, so too he takes part in the deliverance.

Ezekiel is indeed, as little as is Jeremiah, the creator of individualism, which he has often been declared to be. Against this claim, e.g. the character of the patriarchs can be appealed to. But a deeper conception of individualism has actually been brought about by Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The national organization as such was for the present dissolved. Accordingly, these prophets have now to deal more with the individual (cf 1, 2, 3, above). Ezekiel is actually the pastor of those in exile. He has been appointed the watchman of the house of Israel (3 16 ff and 33 1 ff). He can bear the responsibility for the individual souls (cf also ch 18). The wicked man who dies without having been warned is demanded from his hand by God. Jeh does not wish the death of the sinner, but that he should repent and live.

Here such a clear mirror is given, that before it conscientious Christian preachers must all feel ashamed. Jeh is the gracious God, who does not treat men simply according to the principle of retaliation, else what would become of man? God rather desires to bestow all things out of free grace; he that repents shall live. This is the highest ideal of the prophet, and with it we close.

The Feast of Weeks, the Pentecost of the Israelites, Ezekiel does not mention (cf II, 2, 2b, above). This festival has come to be one of higher importance since on Pentecost the Holy Spirit was poured out, and this Spirit Ezekiel knows. Besides, such passages as Jer 32 15; 44 1-6; Ps 51 12 ff; Joel 2 28 ff; Jer 31 31 ff, it is Ezk which contains the clearest predictions of Pentecost. It is the Spirit who in ch 37 awakens to new life the dead bones of Israel.

And in 36 25-28 we read: "And I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep mine ordinances, and do them. And ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers; and ye shall be my people, and I will be your God."

EZEL, ē'zel (עֶזֶל, hā-'ēzel; LXX παρὰ τὸ ἐγγύς keino, pará tó ergáð ekeino): As it stands, the narrative in 1 S 20 19 records the tryst of Jonathan with David at the stone Ezel. The name occurs only here. There is general agreement that the text is corrupt, but there is no agreement as to how it should be restored. The LXX reads "this mound" (RVm), or "yonder cairn"; and in ver 41 instead of "out of a place toward the South" it reads "from beside the mound" or "cairn." Dr. Cheyne suggests "yonder juniper tree" (EB s.v.).

EZEM, ē'zem (עֶצֶם, 'eḥem, "bone"; Boosál, Boosál, Boosóm, Boasóm): A city in the extreme S. of Judah, assigned to Simeon. Some identify it with Azmon (Josh 15 29; 19 3; 1 Ch 4 29).

EZER, ē'zēr (עֶזֶר, 'ezer, "help"):

- (1) A Horite chief (Gen 36 21; 1 Ch 1 38).
- (2) A Judahite (1 Ch 4 4).
- (3) An Ephraimite, slain by men of Gath (1 Ch 7 21).
- (4) A Gadite who followed David while in exile on account of the wrath of Saul (1 Ch 12 9).
- (5) One of those who under direction of Nehemiah repaired the wall of Jerus (Neh 3 19).
- (6) A musician in one of the great companies appointed by Nehemiah to give thanks at the dedication of the wall of Jerus (Neh 12 42).

EZERIAS, ez-ē-r'as (Ἐζερίας, Ezerias): 1 Esd 8 1 AV, RV "Zechrias," the Azariah of Ezr 7 1.

EZIAS, ʔ-zī'as: RV OZIAS (q.v.).

EZION-GEBER, ʔ-zī-on-gē'bēr (עֲצִיּוֹן גִּבְעָר, 'eṣyōn gebher; Γασιὼν Γάβερ, Gasiōn Gāber): Always mentioned along with Elath ("Eziongeber," Nu 33 35 f AV). When the children of Israel left "the way of the Arabah," having come from the N.W., they seem to have turned to the N.E. from the neighborhood of 'Akaba, passing up by Wādī el-Ithm toward the eastern desert (Dt 2 8). Elath and Ezion-geber were evidently not far apart. They are named together again in connection with the maritime enterprises of Solomon and Jehoshaphat (1 K 9 26, etc). They therefore both lay on the shore of the sea. No trace of Ezion-geber is to be found on the present coast line. It is probable, however, that in ancient times the sea covered a considerable stretch of the mud flats at the S. end of Wādī el-'Arabah, and the site of Ezion-geber may be sought near the spring 'Ain el-Ghudyān, about 15 miles N. of the present head of the Gulf of 'Akaba. EZNITE, ez'nit (עֲצִיט or עֲצִיטָה, 'eṣnī or 'eṣnōḏ). See ADINO.

EZORA, ʔ-zō'ra (Ἐζώρα, Ezōrā, AV Ozora): He and his six sons "gave their hands to put away their strange wives" (1 Esd 9 20,34 = "Machnadebai" of Ezr 10 40).

EZRA, ez'ra (Aram. or Chaldee, עֶזְרָא, 'ezrā, "help"; a hypocoristic form, or shortened form of Azariah, "Jeh has helped." The Heb spells the name עֲזַרְיָה, 'ezrāh, as in 1 Ch 4 17, or uses the Aram. spelling of the name, as in Ezr 7 1. The Gr form is Esdras):

(1) A priest who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh 12 1). In Neh 10 2, Azariah, the full form of the name, is found.

(2) A descendant of Judah and father of Jethro and other sons (1 Ch 4 17).

(3) The distinguished priest who is the hero of the Book of Ezr and coworker with Nehemiah.

The genealogy of Ezra is given in Ezr 7 1-6, where it appears that he was the son of Seraiah, the son of Azariah, the son of Hilkiah,

1. Family the son of Shallum, the son of Ahitub, the son of Amariah, the son of Azariah, the son of Meraioth, the son of Zerabiah, the son of Uzzi, the son of Bukki, the son of Abishua, the son of Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, the high priest. Since Seraiah, according to the Book of K, was killed by Nebuchadrezzar at Riblah (2 K 25 18-21), and since he was the father of Jehozadak, the high priest who was carried into captivity by Nebuchadrezzar (1 Ch 6 14,15 [Heb 5 40], etc) in 588 BC, and since the return under Ezra took place in 458 BC, the word "son" must be used in Ezr 7 2 in the sense of descendant. Since, moreover, Joshua, or Jeshua, the high priest, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, was the son of Jehozadak and the grandson of Seraiah, Ezra was probably the great-grandson or great-great-grandson of Seraiah. Inasmuch as Jehozadak is never mentioned as one of his forefathers, Ezra was probably not descended from Jehozadak, but from a younger brother. He would thus not be a high priest, though he was of high-priestly descent as far as Seraiah. For the sake of shortening the list of names, six names are omitted in Ezr 7 2-7 between Azariah and Meraioth, and one between Shallum and Ahitub from the corresponding list found in 1 Ch 6 4-14 (Heb 5 30-40).

Being a priest by birth, it is to be supposed that Ezra would have performed the ordinary functions of a member of his order, if he had been born and had lived in Pal. Jos, indeed, says that he was high priest of his brethren in Babylon, a statement that in view of the revelation of the Elephantine papyri may not be without a foundation

2. Occupation in fact. According to the Scriptures and Jewish tradition, however, Ezra was preëminently a scribe, and esp. a scribe of the law of Moses. He is called "a ready scribe in the law of Moses," a "scribe of the words of the commandments of Jeh, and of his statutes to Israel," "the scribe of the law of the God of heaven." As early as the time of Jeremiah (cf Jer 8 8), "scribe" had already attained the meaning of one learned in the Scriptures, one who had made the written law a subject of investigation. Ezra is the first who is called by the title of "the scribe," the title by which Artaxerxes designates him in his letter of instructions in Ezr 7 6,11.

In the 7th year of Artaxerxes I (459-458 BC) Ezra requested permission of the king to go up to Jerus; for "Ezra had set his heart to

3. His Commission to seek the law of Jeh, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and ordinances." Artaxerxes granted his request, and gave him a letter permitting as many of the people of Israel and of the priests and Levites as so desired to accompany him to Jerus, and commissioning him to inquire concerning Judah and Jerus, and to carry a gift of money from the king and his counselors, and all the money to be found in the province of Babylon, and the freewill offerings of the people and priests, with which to buy offerings to offer upon the altar of the house of God which was in Jerus. He was commissioned also to carry vessels for the service of the house of God, and to do at the expense of the royal treasury whatever was needful for the house of God. The king decreed, moreover, that the treasurers of the king should assist Ezra with a tribute of wheat, wine, oil and salt, and that they should impose no tribute, custom or toll upon any of those employed in the service of the house of God. Moreover, Ezra was authorized to appoint judges to judge the people according to the law of God and the law of the king, and to inflict punishments upon all who would not obey these laws.

Ascribing this marvelous letter of the king to the lovingkindness of his God, and strengthened by this evidence of God's power, Ezra proceeded to gather together out of Israel the chief men and teachers and ministers of the house to go up with him to Jerus. He gathered these men in camp at Casiphia, on the river Ahava. Here he proclaimed a time of fasting and prayer, that God might prosper their journey (Ezr 8 15-23). Then, having delivered the treasures into the hands of the priests, the assembled company departed for Jerus, where by the help of God they arrived in safety, delivered over the money and gifts by number and weight, offered burnt offerings and sin offerings, delivered the king's commissions and furthered the people and the house of God.

Shortly after Ezra's arrival at Jerus, the princes accused the people, the priests, and the Levites of having intermarried with the peoples of the land, even asserting that the princes and rulers had been leaders in the trespass. Upon hearing this, Ezra was confounded, rent his garments, plucked off his hair, fell upon his knees and prayed a prayer of confession, weeping and casting himself down before the house of God. While he prayed the people assembled and wept, acknowledged their sin and promised to do according to the law. The whole people were then assembled in counsel, and in spite of some opposition the strange wives were put away.

In Neh 8, Ezra appears again upon the scene at the Feast of Tabernacles as the chief scribe of the law of Moses, the leader of the priests and Levites who read and explained the law to the people. On his advice the people ceased from their mourning and celebrated the festival according to the law of Moses with joy and thanksgiving and giving of gifts, dwelling also in booths in commemoration of the manner of their fathers' sojourning while in the wilderness.

The traditions with regard to Ezra found in Jos and in the Talm are so discrepant that it is impossible to place reliance upon any of their statements which are not found also in the canonical Scriptures.

The books of Ezr and Neh, by whomsoever written, are properly so named according to analogy from the principal persons mentioned

1. Name in them. In the Heb Bibles, the former is headed simply, Ezra, and the latter, Nehemiah. The two books are counted in the Talm, in Jos, and in the Canon of Melito, 171 AD, as one, and are so treated also in the subscription of the MT, which reads: "The totality of the verses of Ezr and Neh is 688, and its sign is 'Remember, Jeh, the reproach of thy servants,' and its two parts [are at the sentence] 'unto the ascent of the corner' [Neh 3 31] and its chapters (ḥdharāyw) are ten, and its sign is 'Upon a high mountain get thee up, O thou that announcest good tidings to Zion.'"ⁿ In the LXX, Ezr-Neh is called Esdras B, while an apocryphal Book of Ezr is called Esdras A (see below). In the catalogues of the OT writings handed down to us by the Fathers (Origen, Cyril, Melito, Jerome and the Council of Laodicea) our Ezr is called 1 Ezr; Neh, 2 Ezr; the apocryphal Gr Ezr, 3 Ezr; and an apocalyptic book, falsely called a book of Ezr, is denominated 4 Ezr.

The object of the books is to show that God fulfilled His promise, or prophecy, to restore His exiled people to their inheritance, through the

2. Object instrumentality on the one hand of the great heathen monarchs, Cyrus, Darius and Artaxerxes, and on the other hand by stirring up the spirit of such great men among the chosen people as Joshua and Zerubbabel, Haggai and Zechariah, and Ezra and Nehemiah, through whom the altar, the temple, the houses and walls of Jerus, and finally the worship and ceremony of the Jewish people were reestablished, the people being separated from foreign admixtures, customs and idolatry, and their religious observances purified and fixed for all time.

The object of the work justifies the selection and arrangement of the material and the plan pursued

3. Plan by the composer, or composers; all matter being stringently excluded which does not bear directly upon the purpose in view. However much we may wish that other historical records had been included, it is not proper to criticize the work because of these omissions, nor is it fair to argue that the writer was ignorant of what he has not seen fit to record.

The unity of the combined work is shown by the fact that they have the same common object, the same

4. Unity plan, and a similarity of language and style; that they treat, for the most part, of the same period of time; and that

Ezra is one of the most prominent persons in both. It is not fair to deny the essential unity on the ground that the list of priests and others found in Ezr 2 is repeated in Neh 7; for there is no doubt that Ezra was the compiler of parts at least of the book called after him, and that Nehemiah also was the original writer of parts of the book that bears his name. Whoever was the final editor of the whole work, he has simply retained the two almost identical lists in their appropriate places in the documents which lay before him.

The Books of Ezr and Neh are a compilation of genealogical lists, letters and edicts, memoirs and chronicles. We cannot be certain as

5. Sources to who was the composer of either or both books. Many think that Ezra compiled both the books out of preëxisting materials, adding parts of his own composition. Others, suppose that Ezra wrote the book named after him, while Nehemiah composed the Book of Neh. Others, again, are of the opinion that neither Ezra nor Nehemiah, but some other unknown editor, most probably the compiler of the Books of Ch, put together the Books of Ezr and Neh, using largely the memoirs of the two great men who are the principal persons in the records. While there is still much difference of opinion as to who was the final redactor, there is a general agreement as to the composite character of the whole, and that the person who wrote the parts that bind together the original sources was the same as he who wrote the canonical books of Chronicles.

The diversified character of the style, languages and other literary peculiarities of the books is accounted for by the large number and

6. Literary Character the variety of sources. From the style and contents of the first chapter it has been argued with great plausibility that it was written by Daniel; for similar reasons it has been argued that the portion of Ezr from 3 2 to 4 22 inclusive was written by Haggai the prophet. All admit that the parts of Ezr and Neh in which the 1st per. is employed were written by Ezra and Nehemiah respectively. As to who it was who added the other connecting portions there is and must always be great doubt arising from the fact that the author is not mentioned. The style points to the same hand as that which composed the Book of Chronicles. Those who believe that Ezra compiled the Book of Ch will believe that he most probably composed also the Books of Ezr and Neh. The principal objection to his authorship arises from the inexplicable change from the 1st to the 3d per. occurring in both Ezr and Neh. Inasmuch as the 3d per. is the proper form to use in the best style of Bib. historical composition; inasmuch as Herodotus, Thucydides and Xenophon often employ it in their histories; inasmuch as some of the Bab monuments mingle the 1st and 3d pers. in the same document; and finally, inasmuch as the prophets and psalmists of Israel likewise interchange the persons in what is for us often an unaccountable manner: this characteristic of the style of Ezr-Neh seems an insufficient reason upon which to base the denial of the claim that Ezra may have been the author.

The facts that there is unevenness in the treatment of the history, and that there are long periods on which the narrator is silent, do not militate against the authorship of Ezra nor do they imply a date long after his age; for the author is perfectly consistent in his purpose to stick to the object and plan which he had in view for himself, that is, to give an account of the reëstablishment of the Israelitish people and of their Divinely given institutions. That he has omitted other matters does not imply that he was ignorant of them.

The language of the books is Heb, except Ezr 4 7-6 18 and 7 12-26, which is written in Aram.

7. Languages The Heb closely resembles that of Dnl, Hag and Ch, much more so than it does that of Ecclus, which was written probably about 180 BC. The Aram. (formerly called Chaldee) is very much like that of the Egypt papyri which are dated in the 5th cent. BC. It closely resembles also the Aram. in Dnl.

Neither language nor style can be assigned as a ground for asserting a date later than the 5th cent.

BC as the time of the composition of the book. A much stronger reason against placing the final redaction of the books at so early a time is the mention of a Jaddua among the high priests in Neh 12 11.22, it being assumed that this is the same Jaddua whom Jos mentions (Ant, XI, viii, 4) as having filled the high-priestly office in the time of Alexander the Great. In view of the fact that Jos is the only source of information as to the period between 400 and 300 BC, it seems unfair to accept what he says as to the existence of this Jaddua, while rejecting substantially all the rest of the same chapter in Jos which tells about Sanballat, Manasseh and Alexander's meeting with Jaddua. Inasmuch as the Sachau papyri, written in the 17th year of Darius Nothus, that is, in 410-408 BC, mention the sons of Sanballat the governor of Samaria, the Sanballat who was their father must have lived about 450 BC. The same papyrus mentions Jehohanan (Johanan of Neh 12 22) as the high priest of the temple at Jerus, and Bagoas (Bagoas) was the Pers governor of Jerus in 410-408 BC. Since, according to Neh 13 6, Nehemiah was governor in 434-433 BC, the 32d year of Artaxerxes, Bagoas would be perhaps his immediate successor. If we are to put any confidence in the story of Jos, then there must have been at least two Sanballats, and probably two Jadduas, and at two different times a son of a high priest must have married a daughter of a Sanballat. While this is not impossible, it seems better to suppose that Jos has confused matters beyond any possibility of disentanglement, and we might be justified in throwing over entirely his account of a Sanballat, a Manasseh, and a Jaddua as living in the year 330 BC, when Alexander conquered Syria. As far, of course, as the Jaddua of Neh 12 11.22 is concerned, he may well have been high priest as early as 408 BC, and have continued to serve till 330 BC. On the other hand, another of the same name, probably a grandson, may, for all we know to the contrary, have been high priest in 330 BC. In view of the numerous Oniases, Simons, and Johns who served in that position between 600 and 150 BC, and in view, further, of our almost absolute lack of information as to the history of this period, it will be a bold man who will dare to deny, on the ground of the Jaddua of Jos, that Ezr-Neh might have been written as early as 400 BC.

The objection against the books having been composed in the Pers period, based upon the use of the titles of the kings of Persia, is fully answered by the fact that the same titles as those used in these books are found to have been used by the Pers kings themselves. (See the arts. of the present writer in the Presbyterian Reformed Review for 1905-6.) The "Darius the Persian" of Neh 12 22 is shown by the Sachau papyri to have been Darius Nothus, as Keil long ago suggested. The author may have called him "the Persian" to distinguish him from Darius the Mede. At any rate, it is best for us to remember that our inability to explain why the author called him by this title does not prove that he did not do so. Of all the Dariuses known to history, any one might have been called "the Persian," except Darius the Mede, because all but he were Persians. The assertion that a king of Persia could only have been called a Persian "after the Pers period was past" involves, on the one hand, the assumption of such thorough knowledge of the possibilities of the usus loquendi of that time, and, on the other hand, such real ignorance of the usage of all times in such matters, as well as of the usage of the Pers and Bab monuments of the Pers era, as almost to cause one to believe that it can scarcely have been seriously made. (See the writer's arts. cited above.) Jos, it is true, apparently confuses in his account Darius II and Darius III.

The phrase "the days of Nehemiah" (ver 26) certainly implied that the final redactor "looked back upon them as past." But there is no intimation as to how long they were past. According to Neh 5 14, Nehemiah returned to Babylon in the 32d year of Artaxerxes, that is, in 434 BC. As Bagoas was already governor of Jerus, and Johanan high priest in 408 BC, a writer living about 400 BC can very well have referred to what happened "in the days of Joiakim . . . and in the days of Nehemiah the governor, and of Ezra the priest and the scribe" as having occurred "in the days of Zerubbabel, and in the days of Nehemiah" (12 47). From all we know it appears that these were the only Jews who were ever governors of Jerus under the Pers domination. Certainly Bagoas is not a Heb name any more than Sanballat, and it looks as if on the death of Nehemiah his place as governor of Jerus had been filled by a native Persian, just as the governorship of Samaria was held by Sanballat, a Cuthenan. If we can trust Jos, Bagoas treated the Jews with harshness and even desecrated the temple itself (Ant, XI, vii, 1). Already, then, in 405 BC, any patriotic and pious Israelite may have justly looked back upon the days of their native governors with longing and pride, and have written with appropriate eulogy of the days of Zerubbabel, Nehemiah and Ezra—the time of his people's semi-independence and of the glorious and unforgettable restoration of the temple and city, just as we today refer to the time of Bismarck, Victoria, or Lincoln (cf 1 Ch 13 3). Waiving the discussion of the probability of Ezra's having called himself "a ready scribe in the law of Moses," and one who had prepared his heart to seek the law of the Lord, etc, it certainly cannot be denied that someone writing in 405 BC may have employed the language here used. There is not the slightest proof that any of Ezr-Neh is unhistorical, nor the least indication that all of it may not have been written as early as 405 BC.

The section Ezr 4 1-6 presents difficulties of date and composition. The section may have been misplaced. It may be epistolical. It may be explained, as suggested by Klostermann, as having been inserted here as a sort of résumé which is later expanded. But however explained, it is a literary rather than a historical or linguistic problem which it presents, and may safely be left for solution to those who think that everything in literature whose purpose or meaning they cannot perceive is therefore inexplicable.

In conclusion, we would say in the words of Professor Cornill, that since Ed. Meyer's demonstration of the authenticity of the documents in Ezr 4-7, the hypercritical reconstruction of the books "has lost all claim to serious consideration, and we may rest assured that in Ezr-Neh we have every reason to recognize an essentially trustworthy recital of the events narrated therein."

The most thorough investigation of the text of Ezr-Neh has been made by Professor A. Klostermann, his results being published in the

9. Text 3d German ed of RE. After an examination of the Arab., Syr, Gr and Lat VSS and a comparison of them with the Heb MT, he comes to the conclusion that our Heb text as a whole is of more value than that represented by the VSS. The writer of this art. has noted a wonderful accuracy in the transmission of the Aram. part of Esr, the spelling or writing of the words resembling in many of the smallest particulars that of the Aram. papyri of Elephantine, which date from the 5th cent. BC.

EZRAHITE, ez'ra-hīt (עֲזָרְיָהּ, 'ezrāhī; 'Aseβōv, Aseβōn): Found in 1 K 4 31; Pss 88, 89, titles; from which it appears that the word is a patronymic for Ethan and Heman. It may be derived from Zerah, instead of Ezra, seeing that there were an Ethan and a Heman who were descendants of Zerah, head of a Judahite family (1 Ch 2 6). There were also an Ethan and a Heman who were Levites (1 Ch 15 17).

EZRI, ez'ri (עֲזָרִי, 'ezri, "my help"; 'Eṣṣā, Ezrai, or 'Eṣṣā, Ezrai): "Ezri, the son of Chelub," appointed by David to be superintendent of agriculture (1 Ch 27 26).

EZRIL, ez'ril (עֲזָרִיל, Ezril, AV Esril): One who had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9 34); called Azarel in Ezr 10 41.

FABLE, fā'b'l (μῦθος, mūthos):

(1) Primitive man conceives of the objects around him as possessing his own characteristics. Consequently in his stories, beasts, trees, rocks, etc, think, talk and act exactly as if they were human beings. Of course, but little advance in knowledge was needed to put an end to this mode of thought, but the form of story-telling developed by it persisted and is found in the folk-tales of all nations. More particularly, the archaic form of story was used for the purpose of moral instruction, and when so used is termed the fable. Modern definitions distinguish it from the parable (a) by its use of characters of lower intelligence than man (although reasoning and speaking like men), and (b) by its lesson for this life only. But, while these distinctions serve some practical purpose in distinguishing (say) the fables of Aesop from the parables of Christ, they are of little value to the student of folk-lore. For fable, parable, allegory, etc, are all evolutions from a common stock, and they tend to blend with each other. See ALLEGORY; PARABLE.

(2) The Sem mind is peculiarly prone to allegorical expression, and a modern Arabian story-teller will invent a fable or a parable as readily as he will talk. And we may be entirely certain that the very scanty appearance of fables in the OT is due only to the character of its material and not at all to an absence of fables from the mouths of the Jews of old. Only two examples have reached us. In Jgs 9 7-15 Jotham mocks the choice of Abimelech as king with the fable of the trees that could find no tree that would accept the trouble of the kingship except the worthless bramble. And in 2 K 14 9 Jehoash ridicules the pretensions of Amaziah with the story of the thistle that wished to make a royal alliance with the cedar. Yet that the distinction between fable and allegory, etc, is artificial is seen in Isa 5 1,2, where the vineyard is assumed to possess a deliberate will to be perverse.

(3) In the NT, "fable" is found in 1 Tim 1 4; 4 7; 2 Tim 4 4; Tit 1 14; 2 Pet 1 16, as the tr of muthos ("myth"). The sense here differs entirely from that discussed above, and "fable" means a (religious) story that has no connection with reality—contrasted with the knowledge of an eyewitness in 2 Pet 1 16. The exact nature of these "fables" is of course something out of our knowledge, but the mention in connection with them of "endless genealogies" in 1 Tim 1 4 points with high probability to some form of gnostic speculation that interposed a chain of aeons between God and the world. In some of the gnostic systems that we know, these chains are described with a prolixity so interminable (the Pistis Sophia is the best example) as to justify well the phrase "old wives'

fables" in 1 Tim 4 7. But that these passages have gnostic reference need not tell against the Pauline authorship of the Pastorals, as a fairly well developed "Gnosticism" is recognizable in a passage as early as Col 2, and as the description of the fables as Jewish in Tit 1 14 (cf 3 9) is against 2d-cent. references. But for details the commentaries on the Pastoral Epistles must be consulted. It is worth noting that in 2 Tim 4 4 the adoption of these fables is said to be the result of dabbling in the dubious. This manner of losing one's hold on reality is, unfortunately, something not confined to the apostolic age. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

FACE, fās: In Heb the tr of three expressions: (1) פָּנִים, pānim, (2) עֵינַי, 'ayin, lit. "eye," and (3) אֶפֶס, 'aph, lit. "nose," "nostril," already noted s.v. COUNTERNANCE, which see. The first and second of these words are used synonymously, even in metaphorical expressions, as, e.g. in the phrase "the face of the earth," where pānim is used (Dt 6 15 et passim) and 'ayin (Nu 22 5 et passim). The third expression preserves more clearly its original meaning. It is generally used in the phrases "to bow one's self to the earth," "to fall on one's face," where the nose actually touched the ground. Often "my face," "thy face" is mere oriental circumlocution for the personal pronoun "I," "me," "thou," "thee." "In thy face" means "in thy presence," and is often so tr'd. A very large number of idiomatic Heb expressions have been introduced into our language through the medium of the Bible tr. We notice the most important of these phrases.

"To seek the face" is to seek an audience with a prince or with God, to seek favor (Ps 24 6; 27 8 bis; 105 4; Prov 7 15; Hos 5 15; cf Prov 29 26, where RV translates "Many seek the ruler's favor," lit. many seek the face [Heb p'nē] of a ruler).

If God "hides his face" He withdraws His presence, His favor (Dt 32 20; Job 34 29; Ps 13 1; 30 7; 143 7; Isa 54 8; Jer 33 5; Ezk 39 23,24; Mic 3 4). Such withdrawal of the presence of God is to be understood as a consequence of man's personal disobedience, not as a wrathful denial of God's favor (Isa 59 2). God is asked to "hide his face," i.e. to disregard or overlook (Ps 51 9; cf 10 11). This is also the idea of the prayer: "Cast me not away from thy presence" (lit. "face," Ps 51 11), and of the promise: "The upright shall dwell in thy presence" (lit. "face," Ps 140 13). If used of men, "to hide the face" expresses humility and reverence before an exalted presence (Ex 3 6; Isa 6 2); similarly Elijah "wrapped his face in his mantle" when God passed by (1 K 19 13). The "covering of the face" is a sign of mourning (2 S 19 4=Ezk 12 6,12); a "face covered with fatness" is synonymous with prosperity and arrogance (Job 15 27); to have one's face covered by another person is a sign of hopeless doom, as if one were already dead. This was done to Haman, when judgment had been pronounced over him (Est 7 8).

"To turn away one's face" is a sign of insulting indifference or contempt (2 Ch 29 6; Ezk 14 6; Sir 4 4; cf Jer 2 27; 18 17; 32 33); on the part of God an averted face is synonymous with rejection (Ps 13 1; 27 9; 88 14).

"To harden the face" means to harden one's self against any sort of appeal (Prov 21 29; Isa 50 7; Jer 5 3; cf Ezk 3 9). See also SPRT.

In this connection we also mention the phrase "to respect persons," lit. to "recognize the face" (Lev 19 15, or, slightly different in expression, Dt 1 17; 16 19; Prov 24 23; 28 21), in the sense of unjustly favoring a person, or requiting him with undue evil. Compare also the Heb hādhār (Ex 23 3 AV), "to countenance" (see s.v.).

The "showbread" meant lit. "bread of the face," "of the presence," Heb leḥem pānīm; Gr ártioi enōpíoi, ártioi tēs prothēsēs.

H. L. E. LUERING

FACT: Lit. "a deed." The word occurs only in the heading of the chapter, 2 K 10 AV, "Jehu excuseth the fact by the prophecy of Elijah," and in 2 Macc 4 36, with reference to the murder of Onias, "certain of the Greeks that abhorred the fact [the deed] also" (summisoponērointōn, lit. "hating wickedness together with [others]," RV "the Greeks also joining with them in hatred of the wickedness."

FADE, fād (נָבֵל, nābhēl; μαραινω, marainō): "To fade" is in the OT the tr of nābhēl, "to droop or wither," fig. "to fade," or "pass away" (Ps 18 45; Isa 1 30; 24 4; 28 1.4; 40 7.8); once it is the tr of ḥālal, "to well up," "to overflow"; perhaps from nābhāl (Isa 64 6, "We all do fade as a leaf"); in the NT of marainō, "to come to wither or to fade away" (Jas 1 11, "So also shall the rich man fade away in his ways," RV "in his goings"); cf Wisd 2 8, "Let us crown ourselves with rosebuds, before they be withered" (marainō); amarantinos (amaranth), "unfading," occurs in 1 Pet 5 4, "the crown of glory that fadeth not away," and amárantos (1 Pet 1 4), "an inheritance . . . that fadeth not away"; cf Wisd 6 12, "Wisdom is glorious [RV "radiant"], and fadeth not away."

For "fade" (Ezk 47 12), RV has "wither"; for "fall," "falleth," "falling" (Isa 34 4), "fade," "fadeth," "fading."

FAIL, fāl (כָּלַה, kālāh, קָרַח, kārath; ἐκλείπω, ekleipō): "Fail" is both intrans, "to fall short," "be wanting," and trans, "to be wanting to."

Of the many words tr^d "fail" in the OT, kālāh is the most frequent, meaning "to be consumed," "ended" (Job 11 20; 17 5; Ps 69 3; 71 9, etc; Prov 22 8; Isa 15 6, etc; Jer 14 6; Lam 2 11; 3 22; 4 17); it is the tr of kārath, "to be cut off" (2 S 3 29, of failure in succession; so 1 K 2 4, etc); ādhār, "to marshal," "to be missed" or "lacking" (Isa 34 16 AV; 40 26 AV; 59 15 AV; Zeph 3 5); of rāphāh, "to become faint" or "to make feeble" (Dt 31 6.8; "I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee," Josh 1 5; 1 Ch 28 20); of ābhād, "to perish," "be lost" (Ps 142 4, "Refuge hath failed me"; Ezk 12 22, "Every vision faileth"). Many other Heb words are tr^d "fail," "falleth," for the most part in single instances.

In the NT, ekleipō, "to leave out" or "off," is thrice rendered "fail" (Lk 16 9, "when it shall fail"; 22 32, "that thy faith fail not"; He 1 12, "Thy years shall not fail"); ekpēlō, "to fall off or away" (1 Cor 13 8, "Charity [RV "love"] never faileth"); katargēō, "to make useless" (13 8 AV, "Whether prophecies, they shall fail"); husterēō, "to be behind," "to lack" (He 12 15 AV); apopsichō, "to swoon away," "failing" (Lk 21 26 AV).

RV has "fail," in a new tr of Jer 18 14, for "fall" (Lam 1 14, m "stumble"); "his hand fail" for "fallen in decay" (Lev 25 35); "I will in no wise fail thee" for "I will never leave thee" (He 13 5; cf Dt 31 6; Josh 1 5); "failed to enter" for "entered not" (He 4 6); "falleth" (ARV) for "ceaseth" (Ps 49 8), ERV "must be let alone for ever"; "failing" for "was darkened" (Lk 23 45); for "fail" (Ezk 4 22), "be slack," "be missing" (Isa 34 16); "falleth short of" (He 12 15, m "falleth back from"); for "failed," "was all spent" (Gen 47 15); "wholly" (Josh 3 16); "fail [in looking]" (Lam 4 17); for "falleth," "is lacking" (Isa 40 26; 59 15); for "men's hearts failing them" (Lk 21 26), "men fainting," m "expiring."

W. L. WALKER

FAIN, fān (advb.): Occurs twice in EV, in the sense of "gladly": (1) in Job 27 22 as the rendering of פָּרַח, bārāh, "to flee with haste" (from anything), "He would fain flee out of his hand," lit. as in m of AV, "in fleeing he would flee"; (2) in Lk 15 16, as the tr of ἐπιθυμῶ, epithumēō, "to fix the mind or desire on," "He would fain have filled his belly with the husks which the swine did eat." RV adds two instances: (1) Lk 13 31, "Herod would fain kill thee"; (2) Acts 26 28, "Thou wouldest fain make me a Christian." See ALMOST.

FAINT, fānt (פָּיַח, āyēph, עָרַב, āph, רָצַח, yā'aph, עָלַה, ālaph, עָטַח, ātaph, דָּוַר, daṣwāy, זָנַן, yāghān, מָאָס, māas, רָכַח, rākhakh, קָבַח, pāghar, קָהַח, kāhāh; ἐκλείω, ekleūō, ἐκκατέω, ekkakēō, κάμνω, kámnō): The Heb vocabulary for the depressing physical conditions and mental emotions which are rendered in AV by the Eng. words "faint," "faintness," and other compounds of that stem, is, as will be seen above, wide and varied in derivation. The 11 Heb and 3 Gr words and their derivatives are used in 62 passages in AV to express these conditions.

Āyēph is used to express the exhaustion from fatigue and hunger in the case of Esau (Gen 25 29.30). This and its variants come from a root which primarily means "to cover or conceal," therefore "to be dark or obscure," and so, fig. "to be faint or depressed." Israel's helpless state when harassed by Amalek (Dt 25 18) and the plight of Gideon's weary force when they sought in vain for help at Succoth (Jgs 8 4) are described by the same word. Isaiah also uses it to picture the disappointed and unsatisfied appetite of the thirsty man awakening from his dream of refreshment (Isa 29 8). In 2 S 16 14, āyēphim is probably a proper name of a place (RVm).

Ūph in 1 S 14 28-31 describes the exhaustion of Saul's host in pursuit of the Philis after the battle of Michmash. The same word expresses the failure of David's strength when in conflict with the same foes, which led to his imminent peril and to the consequent refusal of the commander of his army to allow him to take part personally in the combat (2 S 21 15).

Yā'aph is used by Ziba when he brought refreshments to David's men on the flight from Absalom (2 S 16 2); see also its use in Isa 40 28. Cognate verbal forms occur in Isa 40 30.31; Jer 2 24; 51 58.64; Hab 2 13, as also in Jgs 8 15, meaning in all cases the faintness or exhaustion of fatigue or weariness.

Ālaph expresses the faintness from thirst in Am 8 13, or from the heat of the sun (Jon 4 8), and fig. the despondency which was the result of the captivity (Isa 51 20). Ezekiel uses it allegorically as describing the withering of the trees for grief at the death of the Assyrian kings (Ezk 31 15).

ʾĀph is the weariness of the wanderers in the desert (Ps 107 5), the faintness from hunger (Lam 2 19), or the despondency of Jonah dispelled by his remembrance of God's mercies (Jon 2 7).

Dawwāy, from a root which signifies the sickness produced by exhaustion from loss of blood, is used in Isa 1 5 for the faintness of heart, the result of remorse for sin, and in Jer 8 18 for the prophet's sorrow for the sins of Israel. A cognate form expresses his sorrow on account of the judgments of God which were incurred as punishments for the national backsliding (Lam 1 13.22; 5 17).

Māṣaṣ, lit. "dissolving or melting," is applied to the contagious fear which the example of a cowardly soldier produces among his comrades (Dt 20 8, RV "melt"). In the remarkable passage in Isa 10 18, in which God pronounces the doom of Assyria when his purposes of chastisement on Israel have been fulfilled, the collapse of Assyria is said to be "as when a standard-bearer fainteth." For this RVm substitutes "as when a sick man pineth away," which is probably the correct rendering. The word māṣaṣ may mean either a sick man, or else something glittering and seen from afar, such as a standard, but the former sense is more intelligible and suggestive in the context. The rarely used verbal form cognate to māṣaṣ is used on account of its assonance.

Yāghaʿ (yāgha), which is usually tr^d "grieved" or "tormented" or "fatigued," is rendered as "fainted" in Jer 45 3. This passage, "I fainted in my sighing" AV, is in Heb the same as that which reads, "I am weary with my groaning" in Ps 6 6, and is similarly rendered in RV.

Rākhaḥ, like māṣaṣ, primarily signifies "to melt" or "to become soft," and is used in prophetic exhortations in which the people are encouraged not to be panic-stricken in the presence of enemies (Dt 20 3, and also Jer 51 46; Isa 7 4). Another related word, mōreḥh, in the sense of despair and utter loss of courage, is used in expressing the consequences of God's wrath against Israel (Lev 26 36). In its literal sense it signifies "blandness," as of the words of a hypocritical enemy (Ps 55 21).

Pāghar is the prostration of utter fatigue whereby one is unable to raise himself or to proceed on a journey, as were some of David's little band (1 S 30 10-21). A cognate word describes the prostration of amazement and incredulity with which Jacob heard of Joseph's condition in Egypt (Gen 45 26).

Kāhāh, the pining of earnest, longing desire, is tr^d "fainteth" in Ps 84 2; 119 81; elsewhere it is rendered by words expressing wasting or languishing. The panic in Canaan due to famine is expressed (Gen 47 13) by the word lāhāh, which implies a state of frenzy.

The only records of actual fainting are (1) Daniel, in Dnl 8 27, where the word used is the Niphal of the vb. hāyāh, lit. "became," meaning that he became weak; (2) swooning is mentioned in Ad Est 15 7-15.

In the NT "faint" is used in the sense of physical exhaustion (Mt 9 36 AV; 15 32; Mk 8 3), where it is part of the vb. ekkūō, "to relax." Otherwise it is used fig. of discouragement of spirit. The same vb. is used in Gal 6 9; He 12 3.5; but in Lk 18 1; 2 Cor 4 1-16; Eph 3 13 it is part of the vb. ekkakeō (according to some authorities egkakeō, pronounced enkakeō, meaning "to be faint-hearted" or "to be culpably negligent"). In Rev 2 3 it is kōnidō, kopidō, lit. "to be tired."

FAIR, fār: The word tr^d in AV from 9 Heb and 4 Gr expressions has nowhere in the Bible the modern sense of "blond," "fair-skinned." The tr of Isa 54 11, "fair colors," refers to the cosmetic use of פִּיִּךְ, pūkḥ, stibium, antimony powder, with which black margins were painted around the eyelids, so as to make the eyes appear large and dark. The stones of rebuilt Jerus, beautifully laid in their black mortar, are compared with such eyes. We can distinguish the following varieties of meaning: (1) Beautiful, attractive, יָפִי, yāphāh, יָפִי, yāpḥeh; Aram. ܫܦܝܪ, shappīr; LXX καλός, kalós; in the NT ἀστέλιος, astelos. This latter word is in both places where it is found used of Moses (Acts 7 20; He 11 23, RV "goodly"), and means lit. town bred (as opposed to boorish), polite, polished in manners, urbane, then nice, pretty. (2) Pure, free of defilement, RV "clean," קָדוֹר, qāḥōr (Zec 3 5). (3) "Fair speech," plausible, persuasive (לִבְיָהּ, lebāh, Prov 7 21; εὐλόλος, eulalos, Sir 6 5; cf εὐλογία, eulogia, Rom 16 18). (4) Making a fine display (εὐπροσώρειν, euprosōpein, Gal 6 12, "to make a fair show"). (5) Good (of weather) (זָהָבִי, zāhābh, "golden," "clear," Job 37 22, RV "golden splendor"); εὐδία, eudia (Mt 16 2). H. L. E. LÜERING FAIR HAVENS, fār hā'v'nz (Καλοὶ Λιμένες, Kaloi Liménes): A roadstead on the S. coast of Crete, about 5 miles E. of Cape Matala, the most southerly point of the island. The harbor is formed by a bay, open to the E., and sheltered on the S.W. by two small islands. Here Paul waited for a considerable time (Acts 27 9); but while it afforded good anchorage and a shelter from N. and N.W. winds, "the haven was not commodious to winter in" (vs 8.12). See CRETE.

FAIRS, fārz: Found only 5 t in AV (Ezk 27 12. 14.16.19.27), apparently incorrect tr of פָּזְזִים, 'izzābhōn, according to modern Hebraists (though Gesenius gives "fair" as one of its meanings). The LXX tr^d the Heb of the above five passages by two different words, ἀγορά, agorá, "market-place" (vs 12.14.16.19), and μισθός, misḥós, "hire," "pay" (vs 27.33). AV follows the Wyclif version in ver 12 and the Geneva version throughout, although it properly tr^d "wares" in ver 33. RV gives "wares" (q.v.) throughout.

1. Etymology
2. Meaning: a Divergency
3. Faith in the Sense of Creed
4. A Leading Passage Explained
5. Remarks
6. Conclusion

In the OT (AV) the word occurs only twice: Dt 32 20 (יְמִינִי, 'emūn); Hab 2 4 (יְמִינִי, 'emūnāh). In the latter RV places in m the alternative rendering, "faithfulness." In the NT it is of very frequent occurrence, always representing πίστις, pístis, with one exception in AV (not RV), He 10 23, where it represents ἐλπίς, elpis, "hope."

The history of the Eng. word is rather interesting than important; use and contexts, alike for it and its Heb and Gr parallels, are the surest

1. Etymology guides to meaning. But we may note that it occurs in the form "feyth," in Havelok the Dane (13th cent.); that it is akin to fides and this again to the Sanskrit root bhidh, "to unite," "to bind." It is worth while to recall this primeval suggestion of the spiritual work of faith, as that which, on man's side, unites him to God for salvation.

Studying the word "faith" in the light of use and contexts, we find a bifurcation of significance in the Bible. We may distinguish the two senses as the passive and the active; on the one side, "fidelity," "trustworthiness"; and "faith," "trust," on the other.

In Gal 5 22, e.g. context makes it clear that "fidelity" is in view, as a quality congruous with the associated graces. (RV accordingly

2. Meaning: renders pistis there by "faithfulness." a Diver- Again, Rom 3 3 AV, "the faith of God," gency by the nature of the case, means His fidelity to promise. But in the overwhelming majority of cases, "faith," as rendering pistis, means "reliance," "trust." To illustrate would be to quote many scores of passages. It may be enough here to call attention to the recorded use of the word by Our Lord. Of about twenty passages in the Gospels where pistis occurs as coming from His lips, only one (Mt 23 23) presents it in the apparent sense of "fidelity." All the others conspicuously demand the sense of "reliance," "trust." The same is true of the apostolic writings. In them, with rarest exceptions, the words "reliance," "trust," precisely fit the context as alternatives to "faith."

Another line of meaning is traceable in a very few passages, where pistis, "faith," appears in the sense of "creed," the truth, or body of truth, 3. Faith in which is trusted, or which justifies Sense trust. The most important of such of Creed places is the paragraph Jas 2 14-26, where an apparent contradiction to some great Pauline dicta perplexes many readers. The riddle is solved by observing that the writer uses "faith" in the sense of creed, orthodox "belief." This is clear from ver 19, where the "faith" in question is illustrated: "Thou believest that God is one." This is the credal confession of the orthodox Jew (the sh'ma; see Dt 6 4), taken as a passport to salvation. Briefly, James presses the futility of creed without life, Paul the necessity of reliance in order to receive "life and peace."

It is important to notice that He 11 1 is no exception to the rule that "faith" normally means "reliance," "trust." There "Faith 4. A Lead- is the substance [or possibly, in the ing Passage light of recent inquiries into the type Explained of Gr used by NT writers, "the guaranty"] of things hoped for, the evidence [or "convincing proof"] of things not seen." This is sometimes interpreted as if faith, in the writer's view, were, so to speak, a faculty of second sight, a mysterious intuition into the spiritual world. But the chapter amply shows that the faith illustrated, e.g. by Abraham, Moses, Rahab, was simply reliance upon a God known to be trustworthy. Such reliance enabled the believer to treat the future as present and the invisible as seen. In short, the phrase here, "faith is the evidence," etc., is parallel in form to our familiar saying, "Knowledge is power."

A few detached remarks may be added: (a) The history of the use of the Gr pistis is instructive. In the LXX it normally, if not always, 5. Remarks bears the "passive" sense, "fidelity," "good faith," while in classical Gr it not rarely bears the active sense, "trust." In the koinē, the type of Gr universally common at the Christian era, it seems to have adopted the active meaning as the ruling one only just in time, so to speak, to provide it for the utterance of Him whose supreme message was "reliance," and who passed that message on to His apostles. Through their lips and pens "faith," in that sense, became the supreme watchword of Christianity. See JUSTIFICATION; UNION WITH CHRIST.

In conclusion, without trespassing on the ground of other arts, we call the reader's attention, for his Scriptural studies, to the central 6. Conclu- place of faith in Christianity, and its sion significance. As being, in its true idea, a reliance as simple as possible upon the word, power, love, of Another, it is precisely that which, on man's side, adjusts him to the living and merciful presence and action of a trusted God. In its nature, not by any mere arbitrary arrangement, it is his one possible receptive attitude, that in which he brings nothing, so that he may receive all. Thus "faith" is our side of union with Christ. And thus it is our means of possessing all His benefits, pardon, justification, purification, life, peace, glory.

As a comment on our exposition of the ruling meaning of "faith" in Scripture, we may note that this precisely corresponds to its meaning in common life, where, for once that the word means anything else, it means "reliance" a hundred times. Such correspondence between religious terms (in Scripture) and the meaning of the same words in common life, will be found to be invariable.

FAITHFUL, fāth'fōol, FAITHFULNESS, fāth'-fōol-nēs:

1. Faithfulness of God in the OT
2. Faithfulness of God in the NT

LITERATURE

Faithfulness is a quality or attribute applied in the Scripture to both God and man. This art. is limited to the consideration of the Scripture teaching concerning the meaning of faithfulness in its application to God.

Faithfulness is one of the characteristics of God's ethical nature. It denotes the firmness or constancy of God in His relations with men, especially with His people. It is, accordingly, one aspect of God's truth and of His unchangeableness. God is true not only because He is really God in contrast to all that is not God, and because He realizes the idea of Godhead, but also because He is constant or faithful in keeping His promises, and therefore is worthy of trust (see TRUTH). God, likewise, is unchangeable in His ethical nature. This unchangeableness the Scripture often connects with God's goodness and mercy, and also with His constancy in reference to His covenant promises, and this is what the OT means by the Faithfulness of God (see UNCHANGEABLENESS).

In the OT this attribute is ascribed to God in passages where the Heb words denoting faithfulness do not occur. It is implied in the covenant name Jehovah as unfolded in Ex 3 13-15, which not only expresses God's self-existence and unchangeableness, but, as the context indicates, puts God's immutability in special relation to His gracious promises, thus denoting God's unchangeable faithfulness which is emphasized in the OT to awaken trust in God (Dt 7 9; Ps 36 5 [Heb 6]; Isa 11 5; Hos 12 6,9). (For fuller remarks on the name Jehovah in Ex 3 13-15, see art. UNCHANGEABLENESS.) It is, moreover, God's faithfulness as well as His immutability which is implied in those passages where God is called a rock, as being the secure object of religious trust (Dt 32 4,15; Ps 18 2 [Heb 3]; 42 9 [Heb 10]; Isa 17 10, etc.). This same attribute is also implied where God reveals Himself to Moses and to Israel as the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and their fathers' God (Ex 3 6,15,16). The truth concerning God here taught is not simply that He stood in a gracious relation to the Patriarchs, but that He is faithful to His gracious promise to their fathers, and that what He was to them He will continue to be to Moses and to Israel. This is the fundamental idea in the OT concerning the faithfulness of God.

This can be seen also from the Heb words which are used to express this quality of God's nature and activity. These words are ne'ēman, the Niphal participle of the vb. 'āman used as an adj.—"faithful"—and the nouns 'ēmelh and 'ēmūnāh—"faithfulness." The verbal stem 'āman means "to be secure or firm." In the Kal it denotes the firmness of that which supports something, being used in the participle of a nurse who carries a child (Nu 11 12; 2 S 4 4; Isa 49 23). In the Niphal it denotes the firmness of that which is supported, for example, a child which is carried (Isa 60 4); a well-founded house (1 S 2 35; 25 28); a wall which firmly holds a nail (Isa 22 23.25); a kingdom firmly established (2 S 7 16); persons secure in political station (Isa 7 9); a heart which is faithful (Neh 9 8). Hence in the Niphal the vb. comes to have the meaning of being true in the sense of the agreement of words and assertions with reality; for example, of words and revelations (Gen 42 20; Hos 5 9); and of persons (Isa 8 2; Jer 42 5). It has also the meaning of being faithful, being applied to men in Nu 12 7; Ps 101 6; Neh 13 13, etc. In this sense the term is applied to the covenant-keeping Jeh to express the truth that He is firm or constant, that is, faithful in regard to His covenant promises, and will surely fulfil them (Dt 7 9; Isa 49 7; and possibly Hos 11 12 [Heb 12 1]).

A similar use is made of the nouns 'emeth and 'emūnāh. Apart from the instances where 'emeth denotes the idea of truth or the correspondence of words and ideas with reality, and the instances where it denotes the agreement of acts and words with the inner disposition, that is, sincerity, it is also used to denote the idea of faithfulness as above defined. As regards the noun 'emūnāh, apart from a few passages where it is doubtful whether it means truth or faithfulness, it usually denotes the latter idea. Both these nouns, then, are used to signify the idea of faithfulness, that is, constancy or firmness, esp. in the fulfilment of all obligations. In this sense these words are not only applied to men, but also to God to express the idea that He is always faithful to His covenant promises. It is this attribute of God which the Psalmist declares (Ps 40 10 [Heb 11]), and the greatness of which he affirms by saying that God's faithfulness reacheth to the clouds (36 5 [Heb 6]). It is this which he makes the object of praise (89 1.2 [Heb 2.3]; 92 2 [Heb 3]); and which he says should be praised and revered by all men (89 5.8 [Heb 6.9]). And even this faithfulness is itself characterized by constancy, if we may so speak, for the Psalmist says that it endures to all generations (100 5). Being thus a characteristic of God, it also characterizes His salvation, and becomes the basis of confidence that God will hear prayer (143 1). It thus becomes the security of the religious man (91 4); and the source of God's help to His people (31 5 [Heb 6]). Accordingly in the teaching of prophecy, the salvation of the covenant people rests upon no claim or merit of their own, but solely upon Jeh's mercy, grace and faithfulness. When Israel incurred God's judgments, it might have appeared as if His promise was to fail, but, so far from this being true, as Jehovah He is faithful to His word of promise which stands forever (Isa 40 8). Even from eternity His counsels are characterized by faithfulness and truth (25 1); and this is not because of Israel's faithfulness, but it is for His own sake that Jeh bloteth out their transgressions (43 22-25; Mic 7 18-20). It is, moreover, this same characteristic of Jeh which is asserted in many cases where the Heb words 'emeth and 'emūnāh are trd by the word "truth" in AV. In Ex 34 6 it is God's faithfulness ('emeth) which is referred to, since it evidently signifies His constancy from generation to generation; and in Dt 32 4 it is also God's faithfulness ('emūnāh) which is mentioned, since it is contrasted with the faithlessness of Israel. The same is true of 'emeth in Mic 7 20; Ps 31 5 [Heb 6]; 91 4; 146 6. This is also true of the numerous instances where God's mercy and truth ('emeth) are combined, His mercy being the source of His gracious promises, and His truth the faithfulness with which He certainly fulfils them (Ps 25 10; 57 3 [Heb 4]; 61 7 [Heb 8]; 85 10 [Heb 11]; 86 15). And since the covenant-keeping Jehovah is faithful, faithfulness comes also to be a characteristic of the New Covenant which is everlasting (Ps 89 28 [Heb 29]); of also for a similar thought, Isa 54 8 ff; Jer 31 35 ff; Hos 2 19 f; Ezk 16 60 ff.

It is in this connection, moreover, that God's faithfulness is closely related to His righteousness in the OT. In the second half of the prophecy of Isaiah and in many of the psalms, righteousness is ascribed to God because He comes to help and save His people. Thus righteousness as a quality parallel with grace, mercy and faithfulness is ascribed to God (Isa 41 10; 42 6; 45 13.19.21; 63 1). It appears in these places to widen out from its exclusively judicial or forensic association and to become a quality of God as Saviour of His people. Accordingly this attribute of God is appealed to in the Pes as the basis of hope for salvation and deliverance (Ps 31 1 [Heb 2]; 35 24; 71 2; 143 11). Hence this attribute is associated with God's mercy and grace (Ps 36 5 [Heb 6].9 [Heb 10]; 89 14 [Heb 15]); also with His faithfulness (Zec 8 8; Ps 36 6 [Heb 7]); 40 10 [Heb 11]; 88 11.12 [Heb 12.13]; 89 14 [Heb 15]; 96 13; 119 137.142; 143 1). Accordingly the OT conception of the righteousness of God has been practically identified with His covenant faithfulness, by such writers as Kautzsch, Riehm and Smend, Ritschl's definition of it being very much the same. Moreover, Ritschl, following Diestel, denied that the idea of distributive and retributive justice is ascribed to God in the OT. In regard to this latter point, it should be remarked in passing that this denial that the judicial or forensic idea of righteousness is ascribed to God in the OT breaks down, not only in view of the fact that the OT does ascribe this attribute to God in many ways, but also in view of the fact that in a number of passages the idea of retribution is specifically referred to the righteousness of God (see RIGHTEOUSNESS; of against Diestel and Ritschl, Dalman, Die richterliche Gerechtigkeit im Alten Testament).

That which concerns us, however, in regard to this close relation between righteousness and faithfulness is to observe that this should not be pressed to the extent of the identification of righteousness with covenant faithfulness in these passages in the Pes and the second half of Isa. The idea seems to be that Israel has sinned and has no claim upon Jeh, finding her only hope of deliverance in His mercy and faithfulness. But this very fact that Jeh is merciful and faithful becomes, as it were, Israel's claim, or rather the ground of Israel's hope of deliverance from her enemies. Hence in the recognition of this claim of His people, God is said to be righteous in manifesting His mercy and faithfulness, so that His righteousness, no less than His mercy and faithfulness, becomes the ground of His people's hope. Righteousness is thus closely related in these cases to faithfulness, but it is not identified with it, nor has it in all cases lost entirely its forensic tone. This seems to be, in general, the meaning of righteousness in the Pes and the second half of Isa, with which may also be compared Mic 6 9; Zec 8 8.

The emphasis which this attribute of God has in the OT is determined by the fact that throughout the whole of the OT the covenant relation of Jeh to His people is founded solely in God's grace, and not on any merit of theirs. If this covenant relation had been based on any claim of Israel, faithfulness on God's part might have been taken for granted. But since Jeh's covenant relation with Israel and His promises of salvation spring solely from, and depend wholly upon, the grace of God, that which gave firm assurance that the past experience of God's grace would continue in the future was this immutable faithfulness of Jeh. By it the experience of the fathers was given a religious value for Israel from generation to generation. And even as the faithfulness of God bridged over the past and the present, so also it constituted the connecting link between the present and the future, becoming thus the firm basis of Israel's hope; cf Ps 89 which sets forth the faithfulness of God in its greatness, its firmness as the basis of the covenant and the ground it affords of hope for future help from Jeh, and for hope that His covenant shall endure forever. When God's people departed from Him all the more emphasis was put upon His faithfulness, so that the only hope of His wayward people lay not only in His grace and mercy but also in His faithfulness, which stands in marked contrast with the faithlessness and inconstancy of His people. This is probably the meaning of the difficult ver Hos 11 12 (Heb 12 1).

In the NT teaching concerning the faithfulness of God the same idea of faithfulness to His gracious promises is emphasized and held up

2. Faithful- as the object of a confident trust in God. This idea is usually expressed in the NT by the adj. pistos, and once by the noun pistis, which more frequently has the active sense of faith or trust.

An attempt has been made by Wendt (SK, 1883, 511 f; Teaching of Jesus, ET, I, 259 f) to interpret the words alētheia and alēthēs in many instances, especially in the Johannine writings, as denoting faithfulness and rectitude, after the analogy of the LXX rendering ēleos kat' alētheia for the Heb phrase "mercy and truth," in which truth is equivalent to faithfulness. But the most that could be inferred from the fact that the LXX uses the word alētheia to translate the Heb word 'emeth, and in about one-half the cases where 'emūnāh occurs, would be that those Gr words might have been prepared for such a use in the NT. But while it is true that there is one usage of these words in John's writings in an ethical sense apparently based on the OT use of 'emeth and 'emūnāh, the Gr words do not have this meaning when employed to denote a characteristic of God. Neither is the adj. alēthinós so used. See TRUTH.

In the Epp. of Paul the word alētheia occurs quite frequently to denote the truth revealed by God to man through reason and conscience, and to denote the doctrinal content of the gospel. In two passages, however, the words alēthēs and alētheia seem to signify the faithfulness of God (Rom 3 4,7; 15 8). In the former passage Paul is contrasting the faithfulness of God with the faithlessness of men, the word alēthēs, ver 4, and alētheia, ver 7, apparently denoting the same Divine characteristic as the word pistis, ver 3. In the latter passage (Rom 15 8), the vindication of God's covenant faithfulness, through the realization of His promises to the fathers, is declared to have been the purpose of the ministry of Jesus Christ to the Jews.

This faithfulness of God to His covenant promises is frequently emphasized by Paul, the words he employs being the noun pistis (once) and the adj. pistos. The noun pistis is used once by Paul in this sense (Rom 3 3 ff). In this place Paul is arguing that the unbelief of the Jews cannot make void God's faithfulness. Both Jew and Gentile, the apostle had said, are on the same footing as regards justification. Nevertheless the Jews had one great advantage in that they were the people to whom the revelation of God's gracious promises had been committed. These promises will certainly be fulfilled, notwithstanding the fact that some of the Jews were unfaithful, because the fulfilment of these promises depends not on human conduct but on the faithfulness of God, which cannot be made void by human faithlessness and unbelief. And to the supposition that man's faithlessness could make of none effect God's faithfulness, Paul replies 'let God be faithful [alēthēs] and every man a liar' (ver 4), by which Paul means to say that in the fulfilment of God's promises, in spite of the fact that men are faithless, the faithfulness of God will be abundantly vindicated, even though thereby every man should be proven untrue and faithless. And not only so, but human faithlessness will give an opportunity for a manifestation of the faithfulness (alētheia) of God, abounding to His glory (ver 7). God's faithfulness here is His unchangeable constancy and fidelity to His covenant promises; and it is this fidelity to His promises, or the fact that God's gracious gifts and election are without any change of mind on His part, which gave to Paul the assurance that all Israel should finally be saved (Rom 11 25-29). Moreover this covenant faithfulness of God is grounded in His very nature, so that Paul's hope of eternal life rests on the fact that God who cannot lie promised it before the world began (Tit 1 2); and the certainty that God will abide faithful notwithstanding human faithlessness rests on the fact that God cannot deny Himself (2 Tim 2 13). It is because God is faithful that His promises in Christ are yea and amen (2 Cor 1 18,20). This attribute of God, moreover, is the basis of Paul's confident assurance that God will preserve the Christian in temptation (1 Cor 10 13); and establish him and preserve him from evil (2 Thess 3 3). And since God is faithful and His gracious promises trustworthy, this characteristic attaches to the "faithful sayings" in the Pastoral Epistles which sum up the gospel, making them worthy of trust and acceptance (1 Tim 1 15; 4 9; Tit 3 8).

This faithfulness of God in the sense of fidelity to His promises is set forth as the object of sure trust and hope by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews. It was the basis of Sarah's faith that she would bear a child when she was past age (He 11 11); and it is because God is faithful to His promise in Christ that we can draw nigh to Him with full assurance of faith, holding fast without wavering the profession of hope (He 10 23).

John also ascribes this attribute to God. Since one of the most precious of God's promises through Christ is the pardon of sin through the "blood of Jesus Christ," John says that God's faithfulness, as well as His righteousness, is manifested in the forgiveness of sin (1 Jn 1 9).

The faithfulness of God is viewed from a slightly different point by Peter when he tells his readers that those who suffer as Christians and in accordance with God's will should "commit their souls in well-doing unto a faithful Creator" (1 Pet 4 19). The quality of faithfulness, which in the Scripture is more frequently ascribed to God in His relation to man as gracious Saviour, and as the ground of hope in His gracious promises, is here applied by Peter to God in His relation to man as his Creator, and is made the ground of comfort under persecution and suffering. The omission of the art. before the words "faithful Creator" makes emphatic that this is a characteristic of God as Creator, and the position of the words in the sentence throws great emphasis on this attribute of God as the basis of comfort under suffering. It is as if Peter would say to suffering Christians, "You suffer not by chance but in accordance with God's will; He, the almighty Creator, made you, and since your suffering is in accordance with His will, you ought to trust yourselves to Him who as your Creator is faithful." It is, of course, Christians who are to derive this comfort, but the faithfulness of God is extended here to cover all His relations to His people, and to pledge all His attributes in their behalf.

This attribute is also ascribed to Christ in the NT. Where Jesus is called a faithful high priest, the idea expressed is His fidelity to His obligations to God and to His saving work (He 2 17; 3 2.6). But when in the Book of Revelation Jesus Christ is called the "faithful witness" or absolutely the "Faithful and True," it is clear that the quality of faithfulness, in the most absolute sense in which it is characteristic of God in contrast with human changeableness, is ascribed to Christ (Rev 1 5; 3 14; 19 11). This is esp. clear in the last-named passage. The heavens themselves open to disclose the glorified Christ, and He appears not only as a victorious warrior whose name is faithful and true, but also as the one in whom these attributes have their highest realization, and of whom they are so characteristic as to become the name of the exalted Lord. This clearly implies the Deity of Jesus.

In summing up the Scripture teaching concerning God's faithfulness, three things are noteworthy. In the first place, this characteristic of God is usually connected with His gracious promises of salvation, and is one of those attributes which make God the firm and secure object of religious trust. As is the case with all the Scripture teaching concerning God, it is the religious value of His faithfulness which is made prominent. In the second place, the so-called moral attributes, of which this is one, are essential in order to constitute God the object of religion, along with the so-called incommunicable attributes such as Omnipotence, Omnipresence and Unchangeableness. Take away either class of attributes from God, and He ceases to be God, the object of religious veneration and trust. And in the third place, while these moral attributes, to which faithfulness belongs, have been called "communicable," to distinguish them from the "incommunicable" attributes which distinguish God from all that is finite, it should never be forgotten that, according to the Scripture, God is faithful in such an absolute sense as to contrast Him with men who are faithful only in a relative sense, and who appear as changeable and faithless in comparison with the faithfulness of God. See RIGHTHOUSNESS; TRUTH; UNCHANGEABLENESS.

FAITHFUL SAYINGS, sa'ins (πιστὸς ὁ λόγος, piśtós ho lógos): "This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation" (AV). These words form a striking formula which is found—with slight variations—only in the Pastoral Epistles, in 1 Tim 1 15; 3 1; 4 9; 2 Tim 2 11; Tit 3 8. A similar expression occurs in Rev (21 5 and 22 6 AV), "These sayings are faithful and true."

The Five "Sayings."—Paul's faithful sayings are thus five in number, and "were no doubt rehearsed constantly in the assemblies, till they became well-known watchwords in the various churches scattered over the Mediterranean-washed provinces of the Rom empire" (Ellicott, NT Comm. on 1 Tim 1 15).

The first of the faithful sayings speaks of the pre-existence of Christ, of His coming into the world, and the purpose why He came is distinctly stated—to save the lost, irrespective of race or nationality, sinners who, apart from Christ, are without God and without hope.

The second of the faithful sayings refers to the work of being a minister of the gospel, a work then so full of danger and always full of difficulty. The office in question is honorable and Christlike, and, in those early days, it edness of that union. The Christian is "dead with Christ," he "suffers with Christ." But the union with Christ is eternal. "We shall also live with him; we shall also reign with him" in life that is fadeless, endless and full of glory. Surely then, no one will draw back, for "if we deny him," "if we believe not," "he also will deny us," for "he abideth faithful, he cannot deny himself."

The fifth and last of the faithful sayings speaks of our former unconverted state, "for we also once were foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving diverse lusts and pleasures. But . . . the kindness and love of God . . . toward man appeared, not by works which we did ourselves, but according to his mercy he saved us." Blessedness is now the Christian's lot, and this is the result not of our works; we owe it all to the tender love of God, to His Divine pity, to His redeeming grace. Yes, this is a faithful saying.

FAITHLESS, fā'les: The tr of ἀπίστος, apistos, "without faith," having the sense of "unbelieving," "disbelieving." Jesus upbraids the people, "O faithless and perverse generation!" (Mt 17 17; Mk 9 19; Lk 9 41); He says to Thomas, "Be not faithless, but believing" (Jn 20 27); RV adds, "If we are faithless," instead of "believe not" (2 Tim 3 13); cf 1 Cor 7 12-15; 10 27; 14 22, 24, etc; Tit 1 15. In Lk 12 46 apistos has the sense of "unfaithful," so RV; perhaps also Rev 21 8, "unbelieving."

FALCON, fā'k'n, fā'k'n, fā'kun: The Hebrews did not know the word. Their bird corresponding to our falcon, in all probability, was one of the smaller kestrels covered by the word nēq, which seemed to cover all lesser birds of prey that we include in the hawk family. That some of our many divisions of species were known to them is indicated by the phrase "after its kind." The word occurs in RV in Job 28 7, to tr 'ayyah, Gr γύψ, gyps (cf Lev 11 14; Dt 14 13):

"That path no bird of prey knoweth.
Neither hath the falcon's eye seen it."

"That path no bird of prey knoweth.
Neither hath the falcon's eye seen it."

This substitutes "falcon" for "vulture" in AV. The change weakens the force of the lines. All ornithologists know that eagles, vultures and the large hawks have such range of vision that they at once descend from heights at which we cannot see them to take prey on earth or food placed to tempt them. The falcons and sparrow hawks are small members of the family, some of which feed on little birds, some on insects. They are not celebrated for greater range of vision than other birds of the same location and feeding habits. The strength of these lines lay in the fact that if the path to the mine were so well concealed that the piercing eye of the vulture failed to find it, then it was perfectly hidden indeed. FALL, fôl (vb.): The idea of falling is most frequently expressed in Heb by נָפַל, nāphal, but also by many other words; in Gr by πτῖν, ptō, and its compounds. The uses of the word in Scripture are very varied. There is the literal falling by descent; the falling of the countenance in sorrow, shame, anger, etc (Gen 4 5.6); the falling in battle (14 10; Nu 14 3, etc); the falling into trouble, etc (Prov 24 16.17); prostration in supplication and reverence (Gen 17 3; Nu 14 5, etc); falling of the Spirit of Jeh (Ezk 11 5; cf 3 24; 8 1); of apostasy (2 Thess 2 3; He 6 6; Jude ver 24), etc. RV frequently changes "fall" of AV into other words or phrases, as "stumble" (Lev 26 37; Ps 64 8; 2 Pet 1 10, etc), "fade" (Isa 33 4), etc; in Acts 27, RV reads "be cast ashore on rocky ground" for "have fallen upon rocks" (ver 29), "perish" for "fall" (ver 34), "lighting upon" for "falling into" (ver 41). FALL, fôl, THE:

1. Meaning of Gen 3
2. Gen 3 in the Old and New Testaments
3. The Fall and the Theory of Evolution
4. The Character of the Fall

The question concerning the origin, the age and the written record of the history of the Fall in Gen 3 need not be discussed here. For in the first place, science can never reach to the oldest origins and the ultimate destinies of humanity, and historical and critical inquiry will never be able to prove either the veracity or the untruth of this history. And in the second place, exactly as it now lies before us, this history has already formed for centuries a portion of holy Scripture, an indispensable element in the organism of the revelation of salvation, and as such has been accepted in faith by the Heb congregation (Jewish people), by Christ, by the apostles, and by the whole Christian church.

That Gen 3 gives us an account of the fall of man, of the loss of his primitive innocence and of the misery, particularly death, to which

1. Meaning he has since been subjected, cannot of Gen, Ch 3 reasonably be denied. The opinion of the Ophites, Kant, Schiller, Hegel, etc, that Gen 3 relates the awakening of man to self-consciousness and personality (see ADAM IN OT AND APOC), and therefore does not tell us of a fall, but a marked progression, is controverted by the name which the forbidden tree bears, as indicating to man not merely a tree of knowledge in the ordinary way, but quite specially a tree of knowledge of good and evil.

Gen 3 is not in the least meant to relate to us how man obtained the idea of his nakedness and sexual passions, and from a state of childlike innocence changed in this respect to manlike maturity (Eerdman's De Beteekenis van het Paradijsverhaal, TT, 1905, 485-511). For according to Gen, man was created full-grown, received a wife immediately as helpmeet, and at the same time saw himself allotted the task of multiplying and replenishing the earth. Moreover, the idea that sexual desire is something sinful and deserves punishment was entirely foreign to ancient Israel.

Finally, the interpretation of Wellhausen (Geschichte Israels, 1878, 344) cannot be accepted, that man in Gen 3 should obtain "die intellektuelle Welterkenntnis, die metaphysische Erkenntnis der Dinge in ihrem Zusammenhange, ihrem Werth oder Unwerth, ihrem Nutzen oder Schaden" ("the intellectual knowledge of the world, the metaphysical knowledge of things in their connection, their worth or unworth, their utility or hurtfulness"). For in the first place, according to Gen, this was man's peculiar province from the beginning; he received indeed the vocation to subdue the earth, to keep and till the ground, to give the animals their names. And in the second place, the acquiring of this knowledge among the Israelites, who esteemed practical wisdom so highly, is difficult to represent as a fall, or as a punishment deserved for disobedience.

There is no other explanation possible of Gen 3 than that it is the narration of a fall, which consists in the transgression of an explicit command of God, thus bearing a moral significance, and therefore followed by repentance, shame, fear and punishment. The context of the chapter places this interpretation beyond all doubt, for before his fall man is represented as a creature made after God's image and receiving paradise as a dwelling-place, and after the fall he is sent into a rough world, is condemned to a life of labor and sorrow, and increases more and more in sin until the judgment of the Flood.

It is indeed remarkable how very seldom the OT refers to this history of the Fall. This is not a sufficient reason for pronouncing it 2. Gen, Ch 3 of later origin, for the same peculiarity in the OT presents itself at the time when, according to all criticism, it was recorded in literature. Prophets, Psalms, Proverbs never quote it; at the most, allusions may be found to it in Hos 6 7 and Eccl 7 29; and even Jesus and His apostles in the NT very seldom appeal to Gen 3 (Jn 8 44; Rom 5 12; 1 Cor 15 22; 2 Cor 11 3; 1 Tim 2 14). But it may be considered that the Prophets, Psalms and Proverbs only mention special facts of the past by way of exception, that the apostles even hardly ever quote the words and deeds of Jesus, and that all lived at a time when revelation itself was still proceeding and did not lie before them as a complete whole. With us it is quite a different matter; we are in a certain sense outside revelation, make it a subject of our study and meditation, try to discover the unity which holds all its parts together, and devote our special interest to Adam as a figure and counterpart of Christ. The creation and fall of man occupy therefore a much broader place in the province of our thoughts than they did among the writers of the books of the Old and New Testaments.

Nevertheless, the Fall is the silent hypothesis of the whole Bib. doctrine of sin and redemption; it does not rest only on a few vague passages, but forms an indispensable element in the revelation of salvation. The whole contemplation of man and humanity, of Nature and history, of ethical and physical evil, of redemption and the way in which to obtain it, is connected in Scripture with a Fall, such as Gen 3 relates to us. Sin, for example, is common to all men (1 K 8 46; Ps 14 3; 130 3; 143 2), and to every man from his conception (Gen 6 5; 8 21; Job 14 4; Ps 51 7). It arouses God's anger and deserves all kinds of punishment, not only of an ethical but of a physical nature (Gen 3 14-19; 4 14; 6 7.13; 11 8; Lev 26 14f; Dt 28 15; Ps 90 7, etc); the whole of Scripture proceeds from the thought that sin and death are connected in the closest degree, as are also obedience and life.

In the new heaven and new earth all suffering ceases with sin (Rev 21 4). Therefore redemption is possible only in the way of forgiveness (Ps 32 1; Isa 43 25, etc), and circumcision of the heart (Dt 10 16; Jer 4 4), and this includes, further, life, joy, peace, salvation. When Paul in Rom 5 12; 1 Cor 15 22 indicates Adam as the origin of sin and death, and Christ as the source of righteousness and life, he develops no ideas which are contrary to the organism of revelation or which might be neglected without loss; he merely combines and formulates the data which are explicitly or silently contained in it.

Tradition does little toward the confirmation and elucidation of the Bib. narrative of the Fall. The study of mythology is still too little

3. The Fall advanced to determine the ideal or and the historical value which may be con-
Theory of tained in the legend of a Golden Age, Evolution in many people's obsequious honoring of the serpent, in the equally widespread belief in a tree of life. The Bab representation also (a seal on which a man and woman, seated, are figured as plucking fruit from a tree, while a serpent curls up behind the woman as if whispering in her ear), which G. Smith, Lenormant and Friedrich Delitzsch compare with the Paradise narrative, shows no similarity on nearer view (A. Jeremias, *Das AT im Lichte des alten Orients*², Leipzig, 1906, 203). Indirectly, however, a very powerful witness for the fall of man is furnished by the whole empirical condition of the world and humanity. For a world, such as we know it, full of unrighteousness and sorrow, cannot be explained without the acceptance of such a fact. He who holds fast to the witness of Scripture and conscience to sin as sin (as drogula, anomia) cannot deduce it from creation, but must accept the conclusion that it began with a transgression of God's command and thus with a deed of the will. Pythagoras, Plato, Kant, Schelling, Baader have all understood and acknowledged this with more or less clearness. He who denies the Fall must explain sin as a necessity which has its origin in the Creation, in the nature of things, and therefore in God Himself; he justifies man but accuses God, misrepresents the character of sin and makes it everlasting and indefeasible. For if there has not been a fall into sin, there is no redemption of sin possible; sin then loses its merely ethical significance, becomes a trait of the nature of man, and is inexterminable.

This comes out, in later years, in the many endeavors to unite the Fall with the doctrine of evolution (cf Tennant, *The Origin and Propagation of Sin*², 1905; A. S. Peake, Christianity: Its Nature and Its Truth, 1908; W. E. Orchard, Modern Theories of Sin, 1909; Francis J. Hall, Evolution and the Fall, 1910). All these endeavors lead to setting on one side the objective standard of sin, which is the law of God, and determining the nature and importance of sin subjectively by the feeling of guilt, which in its turn again depends on the knowledge of and the love for the moral ideal, and itself forms an important factor in moral progress. It is true that the strength of all these endeavors is drawn from the theory of the descent of man from the animal. But as to this theory, it is worthy of notice: (1) that it is up to the present day a hypothesis, and is proved by no single observation, whether direct or indirect; (2) that the fossils of prehistoric men, found in Germany, Belgium, France and elsewhere have demonstrated the low degree of culture in which these men have lived, but in no sense their dissimilarity with mankind of today (W. Branca, Der Stand unserer Kenntnisse vom fossilen Menschen, Leipzig, 1910); (3) that the uncivilized and prehistoric man may be as little identified with the first man as the unjustly so-called nature-people and children under age; (4) that the oldest history of the human race, which has become known through the discoveries at Babylon in the last century, was not that of a state of barbarism, but of high and rich culture (D. Gath Whitley, "What was the Primitive Condition of Man?" Princeton Theol. Review, October, 1906; J. Orr, God's Image in Man, 1906); (5) that the acceptance of the theory of descent as a universal and unlimited rule leads to the denial of the unity of the human race, in a physical and also in an intellectual, moral and religious sense. For it may be possible, even in the school of Darwin, to maintain the unity of the human race so long a time as tradition exercises its influence on the habit of mind; but theory itself undermines its foundation and marks it as an arbitrary opinion. From the standpoint of evolution, there is not only no reason to hold to the "of one blood" of Acts 17 26 AV, but there has never even been a first man; the transition from animal to man was so slow and successive, that the essential distinction fails to be seen. And with the effacing of this boundary, the unity of the moral ideal, of religion, of the laws of thought and of truth, fails also; the theory of evolution expels the absolute everywhere and leads necessarily to psychologism, relativism, pragmatism and even to pluralism, which is literally polytheism in a religious sense. The unity of the human race, on the other hand, as it is taught in holy Scripture, is not an indifferent physical question, but an important intellectual, moral and religious one; it is a "postulate" of the whole history of civilization, and expressly or silently accepted by nearly all historians. And conscience bears witness to it, in so far as all men show the work of the moral law written in their hearts, and their thoughts accuse or excuse one another (Rom 2 15); it shows back to the Fall as an "Urthatsache der Geschichte."

What the condition and history of the human race could hardly lead us to imagine, holy Scripture relates to us as a tragic fact in its first

4. The pages. The first man was created by Character God after His own image, not thereof the Fall fore in brutish unconsciousness or childlike naïveté, but in a state of bodily and spiritual maturity, with understanding and reason, with knowledge and speech, with knowledge esp. of God and His law. Then was given to him moreover a command not to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. This command was not contained in the moral law as such; it was not a natural but a positive commandment; it rested entirely and only on God's will and must be obeyed exclusively for this reason. It placed before man the choice, whether he would be faithful and obedient to God's word and would leave to Him alone the decision as to what is good or evil, or whether he would reserve to himself the right arbitrarily to decide what is good or evil. Thus the question was: Shall theonomy or autonomy be the way to happiness? On this account also the tree was called the tree of knowledge of good and evil. It did not bear this name in the sense that man might obtain from it the empirical knowledge of good and evil, for by his transgression he in truth lost the empirical knowledge of good. But the tree was so named, because man, by eating of it and so transgressing God's commandment, arrogated to himself "die Fähigkeit zur selbständigen Wahl der Mittel, durch die man sein Glück schaffen will": "the capacity of independent choice of the means by which he would attain his happiness" (Köberle, Sünde und Gnade im relig. Leben des Volkes Israel bis auf Christentum, 1905, 64). Theonomy, as obedience to God from free love, includes as such the idea and the possibility of autonomy, therefore that of antinomy also.

But it is the free act and therefore the guilt of man that has changed the possibility into reality. For the mind, there remains here an insoluble problem, as much in the question, why God allowed this Fall to take place, as in the other, how man, created in the likeness of God, could and did fall. There is a great deal of truth in the often-expressed thought, that we can give no account of the origin of sin, because it is not logical, and does not result as a conclusion drawn from two premises. But facts are brutal. What seems logically impossible often exists in reality. The laws of moral life are different from those of thought and from those also of mechanical nature. The narrative in Gen 3, in any case, is psychologically faithful in the highest degree. For the same way as it appears there in the first man, it repeatedly takes place among ourselves (Jas 1 14.15). Furthermore we ought to allow God to justify Himself. The course of revelation discovers to faith how, through all the ages, He holds sin in its entire development in His own almighty hands, and works through grace for a consummation in which, in the dispensation of the fullness of times, He will gather together in one all things in Christ (Eph 1 10). FALLOW, fal'ō (פֶּלֶא, dāmam): Dāmam is tr^d only once in the sense of "fallow" (Ex 23 11). The law required that the Israelites allow their ground to lie fallow one year in seven. AV is (Dt 14 5) נָר, nir, and is tr^d "fallow" in its more obsolete sense of "tilled ground" in AV (Jer 4 3; Hos 10 12).

FAME, fām (שִׁמָּה, shēm, שְׁמָה, shēma'; ἀκοή, akoē, φήμη, phēmē): "Fame" has the twofold meaning, (1) of report or rumor, (2) of renown or reputation (in the OT it is not always easy to distinguish the two senses). "Fame," shēma, "fame," "rumor," "report" (Nu 14 15; Job 28 22, RV "rumor") probably means "report"; but in 1 K 10 1; 2 Ch 9 1; Isa 66 19, it is most probably "renown," or "reputation"; shēma'ah (1 K 10 7; 2 Ch 9 6) may have either meaning; shēma (Josh 6 27; 9 9; Est 9 4) seems to mean "fame" in the sense of reputation; but in Jer 6 24 (as ARV) "report"; shēm, "name," has the sense of reputation (1 K 4 31; 1 Ch 14 17; 22 5; Zeph 3 19, RV "name"); ḥōl, "voice," is report (Gen 45 16, ARV "report"). In the NT akoē, "hearing," is "report," so RV (Mt 4 24; 14 1; Mk 1 28); phēmē, "word," "rumor," is report, fame in this sense (Mt 9 26; Lk 4 14); ēchos, "a sound" "noise" (Lk 4 37, RV "rumor"), and lógos, "word" (Lk 5 15, RV "report") have the same meaning; diaphēmizō, "to say throughout," "to report publicly" (Mt 9 31, "they . . . spread abroad his fame"), seems to imply fame in the sense of reputation.

In 1 Macc 3 26, we have "fame" in the sense of reputation. "His fame (ónoma, RV "name") came near even to the king"; so 3 41, "heard the fame of them."

ERV has "fame" for "report" (shēma'), Jer 50 43.

FAMILIAR, fa-mil'yar: Is found as an adj. qualifying "friend" and "spirit."

(1) Used, in a number of OT passages, of spirits which were supposed to come at the call of one who had power over them. מְבִיחַ, 'ōbh, lit. something "hollow"; cf מְבִיחַ, 'ōbh, "bottle" (Job 32 19 AV); because the voice of the spirit might have been supposed to come from the one possessed, as from a bottle, or because of the hollow sound which characterized the utterance, as out of the ground (Isa 29 4); or, as some have conjectured, akin to מְבִיחַ, 'ūbh, "return" (nekpharitis, nektrōmantis). Probably called "familiar" because it was regarded as a servant (famulus), belonging to the family (familiaris), who might be summoned to do the commands of the one possessing it. The practice of consulting familiar spirits was forbidden by the Mosaic law (Lev 19 31; 20 6.27; Dt 18 11). King Saul put this away early in his reign, but consulted the witch of Endor, who "had a familiar spirit" (1 S 28 3.7.8.9; 1 Ch 10 13). King Manasseh fell into the same sin (2 K 21 6; 2 Ch 33 6); but Josiah put those who dealt with familiar spirits out of the land (2 K 23 24).

It seems probable, however, that the practice prevailed more or less among the people till the exile (Isa 8 19; 19 3). See "Divination by the 'Ōb" in Expos T, IX, 157; ASTROLOGY, 1; COMMUNION WITH DEMONS.

(2) "Familiars," "familiar friend," fr שָׂרִי, yādhā', "to know," hence "acquaintance," one intimately attached (Job 19 14); but more frequently of 'ēndēh shālōm, "man of [my or thy] peace," that is, one to whom the salutation of peace is given (Ps 41 9; Jer 20 10; 38 22; also in Ob ver 7, rendered "the men that were at peace with thee").

LITERATURE

The Bible is the world's great teacher of monogamy—the union for life of one man and one woman in marriage as the basis of the family.

1. The Foundation Whatever may be said about the time or of parts of them, the testimony of the whole is incontrovertibly to the point that marriage springs from the choice of one man and one woman of each other for a permanent family relation. Over and through the whole of the Bible this ideal is dominant. There may be instances shown here and there of violation of this rule. But such cases are to be regarded as contrary to the underlying principle of marriage—known even at the time of their occurrence to be antagonistic to the principle.

There may be times when moral principle is violated in high places and perhaps over wide reaches in society. The Bible shows that there were such times in the history of man. But it is undeniable that its tone toward such lapses of men and of society is not one of condonation but one of regret and disapproval. The disasters consequent are faithfully set forth. The feeling that finds expression in its whole history is that in such cases there had been violation of the ideal of right in the sex relation. The ideal of monogamic relation is put in the forefront of the history of man.

The race is introduced synthetically as a species in the incoming of life. "And God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them" (Gen 1 27). But with the first particularization of the relation of the sexes to each other the great charter of monogamy was laid down so clearly that Jesus was content to quote it, when with His limitless ethical scrutiny He explained the marriage relation. "And the man said [when the woman was brought to him], This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man. Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh" (Gen 2 23,24). It is well to pause and look at the grammatical number of the nouns: "a man," "his wife." The words of the charter hold the sexes to monogamy. The subsequent words make marriage life-lasting. "They twain shall be one flesh." A dualism becomes an individualism. So said Christ: "Wherefore they are no more twain but one flesh" (Mt 19 6 AV). Nothing but death separates a man from his own flesh. Nothing but life-monogamy can find place in the language of this charter.

There is much in the setting of this charter in the account given in Gen that is suggestive of the fine sentiment which we know has always gone along with love and marriage. That this account should have held the place in history that it has had adds testimony to the fine perception of sentiment and the strong grasp on principle out of which it came.

Eve, "the mother of all living," comes out as distinctly as Adam on the canvas in the portraiture of the first pair. She is the feminine

3. Equality representative—'ishshah—of the race, as Adam is the masculine—'ish (Gen Sexes 2 23). The personality of Eve is as complete as that of Adam. She is a rational and accountable creature, as Adam is. In primitive intellectual and moral transactions she has share on equality with Adam, and is equally involved in their results. Different physical consequences fall on her for "transgression," because she is "woman," "the mother of all living" (Gen 3 16). But Adam does not escape retribution for sin, and it may be questioned whether its burden did not fall hardest on him (Gen 3 18,19), for motherhood has its joy as well as its pain, in the companionship of new-born child-life; but the wrestler for subsistence from a reluctant earth must bear his hardship alone. It cannot but be that much of the primitive conjugal love survived the fall.

According to the record, monogamy seems long to have survived the departure from Eden. It is not till many generations after that dition of society must be that upon which we come in Gen 6 5: "And Jeh saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." Out of such condition will come war and slavery, and polygamy—and come they did. It is a straight road from Gen 6 5 to "The Koran, tribute or the sword," and the polygamy of Mohammedans.

4. Polygamy event that we find a case of polygamy—that of Lamech (Gen 4 19-24). Lamech is said to have had "two wives." The special mention of "two" seems to show that man had not yet wandered far away from monogamy. The indications seem to be that as the race multiplied and went out over the face of the earth they forgot the original kinship and exhibited all manner of barbarities in social relations. Lamech was a polygamist, but he was also a quarrelsome homicide: "I have slain a man for wounding me, and a young man for bruising me" (Gen 4 23). If such acts and dispositions as are disclosed in the case of Lamech become common, it will certainly not be a long while before the only apt description of the condi-

The commandments (Ex 20 12; Dt 5 16) are a succinct summary of the supreme moral relations and duties of man. The first four pertain to our relationship to God. The

5. The Commandments and the Family (5th Commandment) six following concern human relations. Of these six, three have considerations of the family involved in them. Commandments do not come to people ignorant of the subjects to which they relate. A commandment to cover an unknown moral relation is an absurdity. The text of the Fifth Commandment is, "Honor thy father and thy mother." This refers to the relation of children to parents. This commandment could scarcely have arisen when polygamy was a common practice, certainly never from promiscuity. The equality of father and mother is stamped on its face. That idea never could have had strength and solemnity enough, except in a prevailing condition of monogamy, to entitle the command in which it appeared to rank with the important subjects covered by the other commands. Before the gaze of the children to whom this commandment came, the family stood in monogamic honor—the mother a head of the family as well as the father. There is no question about the position of the mother in this commandment. She stands out as clear as Sinai itself. There is no cloud on her majesty. Such honor as goes to the father goes to the mother. She is no chattel, no property, no inferior being, but the mother; no subordinate to the father, but his equal in rank and entitled to equal reverence with him. The commandment would not and could not have so pictured the mother had she been one of the inmates of a harem.

The Seventh Commandment (Ex 20 14; Dt 5 18) gives the family. It secures the home. It says that whatever children are born to the race shall be born in a home and of the home—shall be family-born. The terms adultery and fornication have now become synonymous. Under the influence of polygamous practices a distinction was made in respect to unlawful sex union as to whether one or both of the parties thereto were married or not, or whether one or both were single. Such distinction will not hold in morals. All or any sex union out of marriage is barred by the family idea. Outside of that all sex union is sin.

6. The Commandments and the Family (7th Commandment) While it is true that in the laws of Israel sex sin outside the family relation was treated as a subject by itself, yet when we remember how early in life marriage came in those ancient days, and that betrothal in childhood was deemed as sacred as marriage itself, we see that even then the sweep of the commandment was well-nigh universal and over what a broad range it protected the family. The family is the primal eldest institution of man—the greatest and the holiest. Over this institution this commandment stands sentry. It prevents men from breaking up in complete individual isolation, from reverting to solitary savagery. Think to what a child is born outside of the family relation! Then think of all children being so born, and you have the picture of a low plane of animalism from which all trace of the moral responsibility of fatherhood has disappeared, and where even motherhood will be reduced to simple care during the short period of helpless infancy, to such care as belongs to animal instinct. Put up now the idea that marriage shall be universal and that the children born in marriage shall belong genuinely to it, and you have a new heaven and a new earth in the sex relations of the race of man.

The Tenth Commandment seems almost out of place on the list of the commandments. All the others enjoin specific acts. This tenth

7. The Commandments and the Family (10th Commandment) seems to be a foregleam of the Saviour's method—going to the thoughts and intents of the heart. It is an attempt at regulation in man. It goes beyond outward acts and deals with the spirit. Its purpose seems not regulation of man in society but in himself. So far as it has outward relation it seems to apply primarily to the rights of property. We have at common law the expression, "rights of persons; and rights of things," i.e. to property. But the list of things enumerated in the commandment comprises the things most common to family life: house, servants, animals. One is forbidden not only to take but even to desire such things. They are necessary to family life. In this list of things belonging to a neighbor that a man is forbidden to desire occurs the term "wife." To first thought it may seem strange that she should be listed with property in house and chattels. But it may not be very singular. One of woman's greatest blessings to man is helpfulness. Eve, the mother of all living, came as a helpmeet for Adam. Sarah is mistress of domestic operations. A wife quick of thought, accurate in judgment and deft of hand is usually the key to a man's material prosperity. As such help a man's desire might stray to his neighbor's wife as well as to his cattle. Even on this lower plane she is still a constituent element of the family. Here the thought of sex is scarcely discernible. Covetousness unlimited in the accumulation of property is what comes under ban. To treat of that matter would lead too far astray. See COVETOUSNESS.

It is well to remember in taking leave of the commandments that half of those pertaining to human relations hold the family plainly in view. This is as it should be. The race is divided equally between male and female, and their relations to each other, we might expect, would call for half of the directions devoted to the whole.

The laws against adultery and incest (Lev 20 and the like) may seem barbarously severe. Be it so; that fact would show they were

8. Primitive Monogamic Ideal carried along by a people tremendously in earnest about the integrity of the family. Beneath pioneer severity is usually a solemn principle. That the children of Israel had a tough grasp on the primitive monogamic ideal is not only apparent in all their history, but it comes out clear in what they held as history before their own began. Mr. Gladstone said the tenth chapter of Genesis is the best document of ancient ethnography known to man. But it is made up on family lines. It is a record of the settlement of heads of families as they went forth on the face of the earth. The common statement for the sons of Noah as they filed out over the lands of which they took possession is, 'these are the sons of . . . after their families, after their tongues, in their lands, in their nations.' Mr. Gladstone called attention to the fact that modern philology verifies this classification of the nations which rests on outgrowth from families.

Turning now to a very distant point in history—the return of the Jews from captivity in Babylon—we find in Est and Neh the most

9. Reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah critical regard for genealogy. The effort to establish "pure blood" was fairly a fanaticism and might even be charged with injustice. Yet this effort was ratified by the people—sufferers in degraded name though many of them must have been. This could never have been done had not the monogamic family idea rested in their hearts as just and right.

Nehemiah (13 26) unsparingly condemned the mighty Solomon for his polygamy, and Israel approved the censure.

When we come to the times of the NT, contemporaneous polygamy in Jewish society was dead.

10. The NT contemporaneous polygamy has ceased to be. Wherever NT influences have gone,

There has been in the United States by Mormonism a belated attempt to revive that crime against the family. But it has had its bad day, and, if it lives at all, it is under the ban of social sentiment and is a crime by law. Consecutive polygamy still exists in nations that are called Christian by the permission of divorce laws. But the tide of Christian sentiment is setting strongly against it, and it takes no special clearness of vision to see that it must go to extinction along with polygamy contemporaneous.

Jesus reaffirmed the original charter of the monogamic family (Mt 19 1-12; Mk 10 2-12). It is to be noticed that He affirmed the indissolubility of the family not only against the parties thereto but against the power of society. See DIVORCE.

At first sight it seems a little strange that Jesus said so little about the family. But as we reflect on the nature of His mission we shall 11. The Teaching of Jesus catch the explanation of His silence. He said, "Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets: I came not to destroy, but to fulfil" (Mt 5 17), that is, to fill out, to expound and expand. He also said, "For the Son of man is come to save that which was lost" (18 11 AV), and, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners" (9 13), that is, to rectify what was wrong. To what was right He gave the right of way—let it go on in its own course. When the law was right, He said, not one jot or tittle of it should fail (5 18). With regard to the family, He held the old charter written in the heart of man, before it was burned in brick or committed to manuscript, was right. It was comprehensive, would and ought to stand. So He stood by that, and that sufficed His purpose. Christ did not try to regulate the family so much as to regulate the persons who entered into family life. This may explain why we have no utterance from Him in regard to the conduct and duties of children toward parents. Still stood the ancient statute, "Honor thy father and thy mother." He came not to destroy but to fulfil that. That still indicated the right relation of children to parents. If a child had asked about his relation to his parents, Christ would doubtless have referred him to that commandment, as He did other inquirers about duties to the commandments that cover so large a part of the ethical realm.

Paul, who particularizes so much in explanation of duties in all relations, scarcely gets beyond the old commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother," when he says, "Children, obey your parents in the Lord; for this is well-pleasing in the Lord."

12. The Teaching of Paul It has always been well-pleasing in the Lord. To be sure there was new inspiration to obedience from the new revelation of duty which came to them in Christ, but the duty was enforced by the Fifth Commandment, and that was copied from the deeper revelation in the heart of man.

In modern society the two great foes of the family are Divorce and Migration. Families no longer live a continuous life together. We have less family life than the old pastoral nomads. They had to keep together for several generations in order to protect their lives and their flocks and herds. So arose the clan, the tribe and the nation. Family influence can be detected through them. Modern industries are very much localized. We should easily think that families would be under their controlling influence. But they are not; the industries are localized, the workers are becoming rovers. When trouble comes in an industry, a workman's first resort is to try

13. Modern Dangers They had to keep together for several generations in order to protect their lives and their flocks and herds. So arose the clan, the tribe and the nation. Family influence can be detected through them. Modern industries are very much localized. We should easily think that families would be under their controlling influence. But they are not; the industries are localized, the workers are becoming rovers. When trouble comes in an industry, a workman's first resort is to try somewhere else. Cheapness of transportation gives him the opportunity he desires. So with a satchel he goes hunting, much as a barbarian roams the forest for game, alone. He may take his family or leave it behind. He may be separated from his family for months or years—possibly abandon it forever. A very common cause of divorce is abandonment of family by its male head.

In fact, those engaged in a great deal of legitimate industry are looking out for a better place quite as much as to develop the capacities of business in their own locations. The signs over places of business are few that carry the same name in town or city for a generation. Moving is perhaps more the order of the day than movement. The families are few that can be found in the same place for a quarter of a century. The wealthy cannot stay in the same house six months at a time. They have a house in the city for the winter and one in the country for the summer, and then forsake both and fly over the sea, perhaps to remain for years—traveling. How can family ties survive under such migratory life? Society supersedes the family.

Even education is subject to this malign influence. At their most impressive age, when they need family influence most around them, children are sent away to prepare for or to enter upon higher courses of education. This fits them for something else than life in the family from which they sprang and they rarely return to it. We may not be able to check this drift, but we ought to see its tendency to degrade the estimate of the value of the family.

FAMINE, fam'in (צָרָה, rā'ābh; λυμός, limós):

- | | |
|----------------------|---------------------|
| 1. Natural Causes | 3. Divine Relations |
| 2. Famines Mentioned | 4. Figurative Uses |

The common OT word for "famine" is rā'ābh; rā'ābhōn also occurs (Gen 42 19,33; Ps 37 19), and kāphān (Job 5 22; 30 3), all meaning "hunger" and "famine"; in the NT the word is limos, meaning primarily "failure," "want of food."

In early times, esp. in lands dependent on their own productions, famines were not infrequent.

They were generally caused by local

1. Natural Causes irregularities of the rainfall, by destructive hail storms (Ex 9 23,31,32), by ravages of insects (Ex 10 15; Joel 1 4) and by enemies (Dt 28 51); in a city a famine might be caused by a siege (2 K 6 25); pestilence often followed in its wake, and the suffering was great.

Famines are recorded in the time of Abraham (Gen 12 10, etc), of Isaac (26 1), of Jacob, when

2. Famines Mentioned Joseph was in Egypt—seven years of famine even in Egypt after seven years of plenty (41 54), which also affected Canaan (42 1), and, indeed, "was over all the face of the earth" (41 56); in the time of the Judges (Ruth 1 1), of David, for three years (2 S 21 1), of Ahab and Elijah (1 K 17 1; 18 2; Ecclus 48 2,3), of Elisha (2 K 4 38), during the siege of Samaria (6 25), the seven years foretold by Elisha (8 1), in the reign of Zedekiah in Jerus when besieged by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25 3; Jer 52 6; cf 14 1), its great severity is referred to (Lam 5 10; Bar 2 25); a "dearth" is also mentioned after the return from Captivity (Neh 5 3); when the city was besieged by Antiochus Eupator (1 Macc 6 54), after the death of Judas (9 24), when Jerus was besieged by Simon (13 49), in the time of Claudius (Acts 11 28, in his reign there were frequent famines, one of which in 45 AD severely affected Pal; Jos, Ant, XX, v); Christ predicted "famines . . . in divers places" as characterizing the end of the age (Mt 24 7; Mk 13 8; Lk 21 11); in the siege of Jerus by Titus a terrible famine raged, the consequences of which to the people have never been surpassed.

Famines are frequently said to be sent as punishments sometimes threatened as such (Lev 26 19 f; Dt 28 49-51; 2 K 8 1; Ps 105 16; 3. Divine Relations Isa 14 30; 51 19; Jer 14 12,15; 21, etc; Ezk 5 16, etc; Am 8 11; 2 Esd 15 5,49; 16 19; Tob 4 13; Ecclus 39 29; 40 9).

The righteous or godly should be preserved by God in time of famine (Job 5 20, "In famine he will redeem thee from death"; Ps 33 19, "to keep them alive in famine"; 37 19, "In the days of famine they shall be satisfied"); this was a special mark of the Divine favor and power.

A famine is used by Amos to indicate the absence of Divine communications as a punishment that should come on the people, a "famine of hearing the words of Jeh" (8 11; cf 1 S 3 1; 28 6; 2 Ch 15 3; Ezk 7 26; Mic 3 6); by Zephaniah of the destruction of heathen deities (2 11).

RV has "dearth" for "famine" (Job 5 22); "famine" for "dearth" (Gen 41 54b; 2 Ch 6 28; Acts 7 11; 11 28); for "hunger" (Jer 38 9; Ezk 34 29; Rev 6 8); "famines" for "famines and pestilences" (Mt 24 7), "famines and troubles" (Mk 13 8), revised texts. W. L. WALKER

FAMISH, fam'ish (צָרָה, rā'ābh, רָצָה, rāzāh): "To famish" as a trans vb. is the tr of rā'ābh, "to hunger" (Gen 41 55): "All the land of Egypt was famished"; of rā'ābh, "hunger" (Isa 5 13), "Their honorable men are famished," m "Heb their glory are men of famine"; of rāzāh, "to make lean," "famish" (Zeph 2 11), "For he will famish all the gods of the earth"; it is intrans as the tr of rā'ābh (Prov 10 3), "Jeh will not suffer the soul of the righteous to famish."

FAN, FANNER, fan'ēr: The word "fan" occurs 3 t only in ARV (Jer 15 7; Mt 3 12; Lk 3 17). In Isa 30 24 mizreh is trd "fork," which is a much better tr if the instrument referred to was shaped like the winnowing fork used by the Syrian farmer today and still so called. In Isa 41 16; Jer 4 11; 15 7, the vb. zārāh is rendered "winnow" in ARV. In Jer 51 2, RV substitutes "strangers" for "fanners."

FANCY, fan'si (φαντασία, phantázō, "to cause to appear," "show"): In Ecclus 34 5, "And the heart fancieth, as a woman's in travail" (cf Wisd 6 16; He 12 21).

FAR, fār, FARTHER, fār'thēr: "Far" (adj.), distant, remote; (advb.) widely removed, is most frequently in the OT the tr of רָחֹק, rāhōk, and in the NT of μακράν, makrán, but also of other Heb and Gr words. The word hālālāh, an exclamation of abhorrence or aversion (LXX mē genoilo; see FORBID), is rendered "far from me," "far from thee," etc (Gen 18 25; 1 S 2 30; 20 9; 22 15; 2 S 20 20; 23 17; Job 34 10). Besides its literal sense, distance in a spiritual sense is expressed by "far," as "Salvation is far from the wicked" (Ps 119 155; cf Prov 15 29), "far from righteousness" (Isa 46 12), "not far from the kingdom of God" (Mk 12 34), etc. For "far" RV has "aloof" in Job 30 10; in several places the word in AV is omitted (Jgs 9 17; Ps 27 9; Isa 19 6; 26 15; Mk 13 34); "a far country" is changed to "another" (Mt 21 33; 25 14; Mk 13 34), etc. For "God forbid" RV has "far be it," "far be it from me" (Gal 6 14; in ARV, Gen 44 7,17; 1 S 12 23; Job 27 5, etc).

The comparative "farther" occurs only once in the OT (Eccl 8 17), and thrice in the NT (Mt 26 39; Mk 1 19; 10 1), and in each case is replaced in RV by another word or phrase. RV, on the other hand, has "its farthest height" for "the height of his border" (Isa 37 24), and "his farthest lodging-place" for "the lodgings of his borders" (2 K 19 23).

FAR HOUSE: The marginal explanation in RV of Beth-merhak (בֵּית מֶרְחָק, beth ha-merhak, "house of distance"), which is given in the text of 2 S 15 17 instead of "a place that was far off." See BETH-MERHAK.

FARE, fār: Occurs twice in the OT as the tr of two Heb words, שָׁלוֹם, shalom, "peace," "prosperity," "completeness" (1 S 17 18), found in the section on David's family history omitted by the LXX translators, and שָׂכָר, sākhār, "hire," "reward," LXX πώλιον, polion, "passage-money," "fare" (Jon 1 3). In Heb both words are substantives; in Eng. the former is a vb. meaning "to go," or "get on as to circumstances" (Century Dict.), the latter, a subst. meaning the price which Jonah paid for a sea-voyage to Tarshish.

In Apoc the Eng. vb. "fare" helps in the tr of three Gr words, κακός, kakós, "fare evil" (RV "fare ill"), Sir 3 26; θάραξ, tharax, "fare worse" (RV "suffer loss"), 32 24; ῥώννυμι, rhōnnymi, "be strong," "prosper," in 2 pers. (sing.) imperat. (ῥώσω, ēr[h]ōso) or pl. (ῥώσθε, ēr[h]ōsathē) as a farewell salutation, or at the close of a letter, or to describe the welfare (usually physical or social) of a friend (2 Mac 9 20; 11 23, etc.). Cf Acts 15 29; 23 30 m.

In the NT the Eng. vb. "fare," in addition to its occurrence in the word "farewell" (which see), occurs only once (Lk 16 19), where it is said that the rich man "fared sumptuously every day" (RVm "living in mirth and splendor every day").

The Gr is εὐφραίνωμαι, euphrainomai, "be merry," and occurs 14 t in the NT, 10 in a good sense (Lk 15 23, 24, 29, 32, all referring to the merry-making over the return of the lost son; Acts 2 26, tr of Heb פָּדַח, sāmah, "be glad"; Rom 15 10, tr of Heb פָּדַח, sāmah, "to sing"; 2 Cor 2 2; Gal 4 27, tr of Heb פָּדַח, sāmah, "to sing"; of "fare." The λαμπρός, lampρός, "sumptuously," shows that the rich man's manner of living was "brilliant," "magnificent." RV has "fare" for "do" (Acts 15 36), "fared" for "did" (2 S 11 7), "hath fared" for "was" (Gen 30 29).

CHARLES B. WILLIAMS

FAREWELL, fār-wel' (χαίρω, chaírō), Fare ye, or thou, well: Originally a wish at parting for those faring forth (traveling):

(1) As a parting wish at the close of a letter it represents the Gr ἔρρωσο, ēr[h]ōso, "Be strong," imperat. of ῥώννυμι, rhōnnymi, "to make strong" (Acts 15 29; 23 30 AV; see RVm; 2 Mac 11 21); once χαίρετε, chaírete (imp. of χαίρω), "Rejoice!" (2 Cor 13 11, RVm "Rejoice: be perfected").

(2) As equivalent to our saying "good-bye," it represents the Gr ἀνταρσάομαι, antarsáomai, "to separate one's self," "to take leave," "to bid farewell" (Lk 9 61, "to bid farewell to them that are at my house"; Acts 15 21, "bade them farewell," RV "taking his leave of them"). See FARE; GREETING.

FARM, fārm: Mt 23 5 is the only passage where ἀγρός, agros, has been rendered "farm." In the many other passages where the same word occurs it is rendered "field" or "piece of ground." Farms such as the Occidental is accustomed to see, namely, isolated dwellings with their groups of outbuildings, surrounded by walls or hedges and overlooking the planted fields, were probably unknown in Pal. For protection against wild beasts and Arab marauders everyone lived in a village and went out to his fields, located perhaps miles away, only as occasion required. JAMES A. PATCH

FARTHING, fār'thing: The rendering of two words in the Gr of the NT, ἀσάριον, asarion, and κοδράντις, kodrantis, Lat quadrans. The assarion was the tenth part of the denarius, and hence in value about one penny or two cents. The quadrans was the fourth part of the Roman as, and worth only about three mills, or less than the Eng. farthing, and is the only term rendered farthing by ARV. It occurs in Mt 5 26 and Mk 12 42, while assarion, which occurs in Mt 10 29 and Lk 12 6, is rendered "penny" by ARV.

FASHION, fash'un (μοῆσις, mōsis; σχῆμα, schēma, the make, pattern, shape, manner or appearance of a thing [from Lat faction-em, "a making," through Old Fr. façon, fachon): In the OT the noun "fashion" represents 3 Heb words:

(1) Mishpāt—lit. "judgment," hence judicial sentence, right, custom, manner; usually tr'd "judgment" (very frequent), but also a few times "sentence," "cause," "charge," and more frequently "manner" (nearly 40 t in AV). In 3 passages it is tr'd "fashion," in the sense of style, shape, make, in each case of a building or part of a building (Ex 26 30; 1 K 6 38; Ezk 42 11).

(2) Tkhanāh—lit. "arrangement," "adjustment" (cf takhan, "to set right," "adjust," from kān, kēkhin, "to set up," "establish"); Ezk 43 11, "the form of the house, and the fashion thereof." A cognate word in the preceding verse is tr'd "pattern" (RVm "sum").

(3) Dmūth—"resemblance" (from dāmāh, "to be similar"), generally tr'd "likeness" in EV, but "fashion" in 2 K 16 10, where it means pattern or model. The vb. "to fashion" stands for (a) yācar, "to form," "fashion" (Ps 33 15; 139 16 AV; Isa 23 11 AV; 44 12; 48 9); (b) ʿādāh, "to work," "make," "form" (Job 10 8); (c) kān, "to set up," "establish," "prepare" (Job 31 15; Ps 119 73; Ezk 16 7); (d) cūr, "to bind up together," "compress" (Ex 32 4, of Aaron fashioning the golden calf out of the golden rings).

In the NT, the noun represents 5 Gr words:

(1) Of these, the most interesting is schēma, "figure," "shape," "fashion" (from schēn, schēn, aor. of schēn, schēn, "to have," of Lat habitus, from habeo, "I have"). Schēma denotes a transient, external semblance or fashion, and so it may be distinguished from its synonym morphē, morphē, which denotes the essential intrinsic form of a thing, expressing its real nature. (See Lightfoot, Detached Note on Phil 3; Trench, NT Syn., 252 ff; Gifford, Incarnation, 22 ff. The distinction is rejected by Meyer, on Rom 12 2, and by others.) In the NT, the noun schēma occurs but twice: 1 Cor 7 31, "The fashion of this world passeth away," where there seems to be an allusion to theatrical scenes, which are in their very nature transitory (cf 2 Mac 4 13); and Phil 2 8, "being found in fashion as a man," i.e. having the outward figure and bearing of a man, such marks of human nature as strike the senses (contrast morphē Theou, "form of God," ver 6, and morphē doūlou, "form of servant," ver 7, which describe Christ's real inner nature). The word schēma is found in compound vbs. in the following passages: Rom 12 2, "Be not fashioned [schēmatizesthe] according to this world: but be ye transformed [metamorphōisathe] by the renewing of your mind" (so RV), paraphrased by Sanday and Headlam, "Do not adopt the external and fleeting fashion of this world, but be ye transformed in your inmost nature" (Comm. in loc.); 2 Cor 11 13 f, metaschematizomai, AV "transformed," better RV "fashioned," the reference being to "the fictitious, illusory transformation whereby evil assumes the mask of good" (Lightfoot, Comm. on Phil, 131); 1 Pet 1 14, "not fashioning yourselves according to your former lusts," paraphrased by Lightfoot, "not falling in with the capricious guidance of the passions" (ib). In Phil 3 21, the adj. summorphos is trd "fashioned" in AV, but better "conformed" as in RV.

(2) Eidos, eidōs, lit. "thing seen," "external appearance," "shape," is trd "fashion" in Lk 9 29, of the glorified appearance of the transfigured Christ.

(3) Πρόσωπον, prosōpon, lit. "face," hence look, appearance, Jas 1 11, "The grace of the fashion of it perisheth."

(4) Týpos, týpos, type, model, trd "fashion" in Acts 7 44 AV (RV "figure"), the Gr word being taken from the LXX of the quoted passage, Ex 25 40. The same phrase, κατὰ τὸν τύπον, in the passage, He 8 5, is trd "according to the pattern."

(5) In one instance the phrase "on this fashion," "in this manner," represents the Gr advb. οὕτως, houtōs, "thus" (Mk 2 12). D. MIALLE EDWARDS

FAST, fast, FASTING, fast'ing (צָם, ṣām; נִפְּשׁוּתָא, nippeshut, "afflict soul or self," i.e. practise self-denial; νηστεία, nēsteia, νηστεύειν, nēsteuein): It is necessary to get rid of some modern notions associated with fasting before we can form a correct idea of its origin and significance in the ancient world. For instance, in the case of many ailments the dieting of the patient is an essential part of the remedy. But we may readily assume that originally fasting was not based on the salutary influence which it exercised on the health of the subject. Considerations of therapeutics played no part in the institution. The theory that fasting, like many other ancient customs, had a religious origin, is in favor with scholars, but we must not assume a religious origin for all practices which in process of time came to be associated with religion.

Many customs, purely secular in their origin, have gradually obtained a religious significance, just as purely religious customs have been dissociated from religion. It is also possible and, in the light of some usages, probable, that different motives operated in the association of fasting, as of some other customs, with religion. Scholars have been too ready to assume that the original significance of fasting was the same in all countries and among all nations. Robertson Smith in his Religion of the Semites advanced and defended the theory that fasting was merely a mode of preparation for the tribal meal in which sacrifice originated, and came to be considered at a later stage as part of the sacrificial act. This hypothesis apparently accounts for the otherwise strange fact that both fasting and feasting are religious acts, but it does not give a satisfactory explanation of the constant association of fasting with the "wearing of sackcloth," the "putting of ashes on the head," and other similar customs. It is obvious that very different motives operated in the institution of fasting and of feasting as religious observances.

It is a matter of common observation and experience that great distress causes loss of appetite and therefore occasions abstinence from food. Hannah, who was greatly distressed on account of her childlessness, "wept, and did not eat" (1 S 1 7). Violent anger produces the same effect (20 34). According to 1 K 21 4, Ahab, "heavy and displeased" on account of Naboth's refusal to part with his estate, sulked and "would eat no bread." Fasting, originally the natural expression of grief, became the customary mode of proving to others the inner emotion of sorrow. David demonstrated his grief at Abner's death (2 S 3 35) by fasting, just as the Psalmist indicated his sympathy with his adversaries' sorry plight in the same way (Ps 35 13). In such passages as Ezr 10 6; Est 4 3, it is not clear whether fasting is used in its religious significance or simply as a natural expression of sorrow (cf also Lk 5 33 and see below). This view explains the association of fasting with the mourning customs of antiquity (cf 1 S 31 13; 2 S 1 12). As fasting was a perfectly natural and human expression and evidence of the subject's grief, it readily claimed a place among those religious customs whose main object was the pacification of the anger of God, or the excitation of His compassion. Any and every act that would manifest the distressful state of the suppliant would appeal to the Deity and move Him to pity. The interesting incident recorded in 2 S 12 16-23 suggests the twofold significance of fasting as a religious act or a mode of appealing to the Deity and as a funeral custom. David defends his fasting before and not after the child's death on the ground that while the child was alive David's prayer might be answered. His fasting was intended to make his petition effectual (cf also 1 K 21 27; Ezr 8 21; Est 4 16). Occasionally fasting was proclaimed on a national scale, e.g. in case of war (Jgs 20 26; 2 Ch 20 3) or of pestilence (Joel 1 13 f). Fasting having thus become a recognized mode of seeking Divine favor and protection, it was natural that it should be associated with confession of sin, as indisputable evidence of penitence or sorrow for sin.

Fasting might be partial, i.e. abstinence from certain kinds of food, or total, i.e. abstinence from all food as well as from washing, anointing, sleeping. It might be of shorter or longer duration, e.g. for one day, from sunrise to sunset (Jgs 20 26; 1 S 14 24; 2 S 1 12; 3 35). In 1 S 31 13 allusion is made to a seven days' fast, while Daniel abstained from "pleasant bread," flesh, wine and anointing for three weeks (Dnl 10 3). Moses (Ex 34 28) and Elijah (1 K 19 8) fasted for 40 days. It is probable that these last three references presuppose a totally different conception of the significance of fasting. It is obvious that dreams made a deep impression on primitive man. They were communications from the departed members of the family. At a later stage they were looked upon as revelations from God. During sleep there is total abstinence from food. It was easy to draw the inference that fasting might fit the person to receive these communications from the world of spirits (Dnl 10 2). The close connection between fasting and insight—intellectual and spiritual—between simple living and high thinking is universally recognized. See further under ABSTINENCE; FEASTS AND FASTS.

FAT (חֵלֶב, hēleb, חֵלֶב, hēleb): The layer of subcutaneous fat and the compact suet surrounding the viscera and imbedded in the entrails, which, like the blood, was forbidden as food in the Mosaic code (Lev 3 17). It was to be sacrificed to God by being burnt upon the altar (3 16; 7 30). This had to be done on the very day on which a beast had been slaughtered, to remove temptation from the Israelite to use it otherwise (Ex 23 18). The law was probably a sanitary restriction, for, at an early date, leprosy, scrofula and disfiguring cutaneous diseases were thought to be caused by the use of fat as food. It was, moreover, an important pedagogical provision teaching the idea of self-denial, and the maxim that the richest and best meat of the edible animal belonged to Jeh. See also FAT-LING; FOWL, FATTED.

The expression "fat" is often used in figurative senses, e.g. abundant, exuberant, lusty, fertile, robust, outwardly successful (Dt 32 15; Ps 92 14 AV; 119 70; Prov 11 25; 13 4, etc.).

FATHER, fā'thēr (AS Fæder; Ger. Vater; Heb אָב, 'ābh, etymology uncertain, found in many cognate languages; Gr πατήρ, patēr, from root pā, "nourisher," "protector," "upholder"):

Immediate male ancestor. The father in the Heb family, as in the Rom, had supreme rights over his children, could dispose of his daughter in marriage (Gen 29), arrange his son's marriage (Gen 24), sell his children (Ex 21 7), but not his daughter to a stranger (Neh 5 5), had power of life and death, as in the case of Isaac (Gen 22), Jephthah's daughter (Jgs 11 34 ff), the sacrificing of his children to Molech (Lev 18 21; 20 3-5), etc. Respect, reverence and affection for fathers (and equally for mothers) is most tenderly, explicitly and sternly prescribed from the earliest times (Ex 20 12; Lev 19 3; Dt 5 16; Mic 7 6; Ezk 22 7, etc.). A symmetrical and beautiful picture of the duties and character of the ideal human father may be built up from the OT, with added and enlarged touches from the NT. He loves (Gen 37 4); commands (Gen 50 16; Prov 6 20); instructs (1 8, etc.); guides, encourages, warns (Jer 3 4; 1 Thess 2 11); trains (Hos 11 3); rebukes (Gen 34 30); restrains (Eli, by contrast, 1 S 3 13); punishes (Dt 21 18); chastens (Prov 3 12; Dt 8 5); nourishes (Isa 1 2); delights in his son (Prov 3 12), and in his son's wisdom (10 1); is deeply pained by his folly (17 25); he is considerate of his children's needs and requests (Mt 7 10); considerate of their burdens, or sins (Mal 3 17, "As a man spareth his own son"); tenderly familiar (Lk 11 7, "with me in bed"); considerably self-restrained (Eph 6 4, "Provoke not your children to wrath"); having in view the highest ends (ib, "Nurture them in the chastening and admonition of the Lord"); pitiful (Ps 103 13, "as a father pitieth his children"); the last human friend (but one) to desert the child (Ps 27 10: "When [a thing to the psalmist incredible] my father and my mother forsake me, then Jeh will take me up").

(a) Ancestor, immediate or remote: Gen 28 13, "Abraham thy father" (grandfather); 1 K 22 50, "Jehoshaphat . . . David his father"; Jer 35 6, "Jonadab, the son of Rechab, thy father"; Dnl 5 11, "Nebuchadnezzar thy father" (personal or official ancestor); Gen 15 15, "Go to thy fathers in peace" (and so [in the pl.] in over 500 passages). The expressions "slept with his fathers," "go down to his fathers," "buried with his fathers," "gathered to his fathers," are self-explanatory euphemisms. (b) The founders of the (Heb) race, specifically the patriarchs: Rom 9 5, "whose are the fathers," considered here also as in a sense the religious ancestors of all believers. (c) Progenitors of clans, i.e. (RV) "fathers' houses": Ex 6 14; 1 Ch 27 1, etc. (d) Gods as progenitors of men: Jer 2 27, "Who say to a stock, thou art my father."

Figurative and derived uses: (a) A spiritual ancestor, one who has infused his own spirit into others, whether good, as Abraham, the father of the faithful, Rom 4 11; or bad, as Jn 8 44, "Ye are of your father the devil." (b) Indicating closest resemblance, kinship, affinity: Job 17 14, "If I have said to corruption, Thou art my father." (c) A source: Eph 1 17,

"Father of glory"; Job 38 28, "Hath the rain a father?" (d) Creator: Jas 1 17, "the Father of lights." (e) The inventor or originator of an art or mode of life: Gen 4 20, "father of such as dwell in tents" (a hint here of hereditary occupations? Probably not). (f) One who exhibits the fatherly characteristics: Ps 68 5, "a father of the fatherless." (g) One who occupies a position of counsel, care, or control (frequently applied by sultans to their prime ministers): Gen 45 8, "a father to Pharaoh"; Jgs 17 10, "Be unto me a father and a priest." (h) A revered or honored superior: 2 K 5 13, "My father, if the prophet had bid thee"; but esp. applied to prophets: 2 K 2 12, "My father, my father!" also to elderly and venerable men: 1 Jn 2 13, "I write unto you, fathers"; hence also, with perhaps an outlook on (2) (a), deceased early Christians: 2 Pet 3 4, "from the day that the fathers fell asleep." (i) An ecclesiastical title, condemned (in principle) by Our Lord: Mt 23 9, "Call no man your father on the earth"; but applied, under the power of the Spirit, to members of the Sanhedrin (probably) by Stephen: Acts 7 2; and by Paul: 22 1, but the latter, perhaps also the former, may simply refer to the elderly among his hearers. Christ's condemnation is clearly of the praise-seeking or obsequious spirit, rather than of a particular custom.

"Father," used by Mary of Joseph, in relation to Jesus, equals "putative father," a necessary reserve at a time when the virgin birth could not yet be proclaimed (Lk 2 49). But note Jesus' answer: "my Father's house."

FATHER, GOD THE: In the Christian religion God is conceived of as "Father," "Our Father . . . in heaven" (Mt 6 9.14.26, etc.), "the God and Father of the Lord Jesus" (2 Cor 11 31, etc.). The tenderness of relation and wealth of love and grace embraced in this profound designation are peculiar to Christ's gospel. Pagan religions also could speak of God as "Father" (Zeus Patēr), and in the general sense of Creator God has a universal fatherly relation to the world (Acts 17 24-28). In the OT God was revealed as Father to the chosen nation (Ex 4 22), and to the special representative of the nation, the king (2 S 7 14), while fatherly love is declared to be the image of His pity for those who fear Him (Ps 103 13). In the gospel of Jesus alone is this Fatherhood revealed to be of the very essence of the Godhead, and to have respect to the individual. Here, however, there is need for great discrimination. To reach the heart of the truth of the Divine Fatherhood it is necessary to begin, not with man, but with the Godhead itself, in whose eternal depths is found the spring of that Fatherly love that reveals itself in time. It is first of all in relation to the eternal Son—before all time—that the meaning of Fatherhood in God is made clear (Jn 1 18). In "God the Father" we have a name pointing to that relation which the first Person in the adorable Trinity sustains to "Son" and "Holy Spirit"—also Divine (Mt 28 19). From this eternal fountain-head flow the relations of God as Father (1) to the world by creation; (2) to believers by grace. Man as created was designed by affinity of nature for sonship to God. The realization of this—his true creature-destiny—was frustrated by sin, and can now only be restored by redemption. Hence the place of sonship in the gospel, as an unspeakable privilege (1 Jn 3 1), obtained by grace, through regeneration (Jn 1 12.13), and adoption (Rom 8 14.19). In this relation of nearness and privilege to the Father in the kingdom of His Son (Col 1 13), believers are "sons of God" in a sense true of no others. It is a relation, not of nature, but of grace. Fatherhood is now the determinative fact in God's relation to them (Eph 3 14 ff). It is an error, nevertheless, to speak of fatherhood as if the whole character of God was therein sufficiently expressed. God is Father, but equally fundamental is His relation to His world as its Moral Ruler and Judge. From eternity to eternity the holy God must pronounce Himself against sin (Rom 1 18); and His fatherly grace cannot avert judgment where the heart remains hard and impenitent (3 1-9). For the fuller discussion of these points see GOD; CHILDREN OF GOD; TRINITY. JAMES ORR

FATHER-IN-LAW, fā'thēr-in-lō. See RELATIONSHIPS, FAMILY.

FATHERLESS, fā'thēr-less (אֲבִיָּהוֹן, yāthōm; ὀρφανός, orphanos): The fatherless are frequently mentioned in the OT, generally in association with the widow and the stranger, as typical instances of the unprotected and necessitous, who are specially subject to oppression, and also to God's special protection. Great philanthropic regard is bestowed on this class throughout. In early legislation there is a special clause to guard them against affliction (Ex 22 22-24). They have a still more prominent place in the Deuteronomist legislation, which gives instructions that a charitable fund be formed out of the tithe, once every three years, for the relief of the destitute (Dt 14 28, 29; 26 12-14), and that gleanings be left in the cornfield, the olive garden, and the vineyard for the benefit of this class (24 19-22; cf Lev 19 9 f; 23 22, where, however, the "fatherless" are not specially mentioned). The Deuteronomist declares that God is on their side (10 18), and strongly condemns those who would oppress them (24 17; 27 19). The prophets and psalmists are equally emphatic in pleading for mercy and justice to the fatherless, and in declaring that God is their special guardian (Isa 1 17; Jer 7 6 f; 22 3; Hos 14 3; Zec 7 10; Ps 10 14; 68 5; 82 3; 146 9; cf Prov 23 10). Oppressing the fatherless is frequently mentioned as a typical act of cruelty and injustice (cf Job 6 27; 22 9; 24 3. 9; 29 12 f; 31 16, 17, 21; Ps 94 6; Isa 1 23; 10 2; Jer 6 28; Eze 22 7; Mal 3 5). Here we have instances of the prophetic passion for righteousness and compassion for the helpless, inspired by a profound sense of the value of human life. Passages in the Apoc reflect the same spirit (2 Ead 3 20; Eccles 4 10).

In the NT the word "fatherless" occurs but once, where James declares, in the spirit of the OT prophets, that true religious ritual consists in visitation of the fatherless and widows and in moral purity (Jas 1 27). Here the word for "fatherless" is orphanos ("bereft," "orphaned"), which is the LXX tr of the OT yāthōm. In the NT the Gr word is found besides only in Jn 14 18, where it means destitute of a teacher or guide (cf Lam 3 3).

FATHER'S HOUSE, FATHERS' HOUSE (בֵּית אָבִי, bēit 'abī, אֲבֵהוֹן, abēhōn): Father's house in the OT is (1) a dwelling, the family home (Gen 12 1; 31 14, 30; 35 11; 1 S 18 2); (2) a family or household (Gen 41 51; 46 31; Ex 12 3, RV "fathers' houses"); (3) the group of households, of several of which the "family" or "clan" was constituted, aggregations of which formed the "tribe," generally "fathers' houses" (Nu 1 18, 20 ff; 17 2; Eze 2 69; Neh 10 34, etc); (4) the "family" (clan), mišpāḥāh, "fathers' houses" (Ex 6 14 f; Nu 3 20 ff); (5) the tribe, "fathers' house," "houses" (Nu 7 2; 17 1-3, etc).

In the NT "father's house" (oikos tou patros), oikos tou patros) occurs in the sense of dwelling, house (Lk 16 27; cf 16 4). Our Lord also uses the phrase (1) of the earthly temple-dwelling of God at Jerus (Jn 2 16, "Make not my Father's house a house of merchandise"; cf Ps 11 4; Isa 63 15); (2) of heaven as the abode of God and His children (Jn 14 2, "In my Father's house are many mansions," RV "abiding places," oikia, "house," "dwelling," also household, family; cf Ps 33 13; Isa 63 15; Mt 6 9). The phrase occurs also (Acts 7 20) of Moses, "nourished . . . in his father's house" (oikos).

FATHOM, fath'um (ἄρπυξ, arpux): The lit. meaning is the length of the outstretched arms, and it was regarded as equal to 4 cubits, or about 6 ft. (Acts 27 28). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

FATLING, FATTED. See CALF.

FATNESS, fat'nes (שֶׁמֶן, sheṣen; ὑπόχρησις, hypochresis): The tr of sheṣen (Jgs 9 9, "But the olive-tree said unto them, Should I leave my fatness?"; 1. Literal Job 36 16 [of food]), "full of fatness"; of hēlebbh, "fat," "the best part," "the marrow" (Job 16 27; Ps 73 7; Isa 34 6, 7); of mišmān, "fatness," "fertility" (Gen 27 28, "the fatness of the earth"; Isa 17 4, "the fatness of his flesh"); of shemen, "fatness," "oil" (Ps 109 24); of piotēs, "fat," "fatness" (Rom 11 17, "partaker . . . of the root of the fatness of the olive tree").

"Fatness" is used fig. for the richness of God's goodness; as such it is the tr of sheṣen ("They shall be abundantly satisfied [in "Heb 2. Figura- watered"] with the fatness of thy tive house" (Ps 36 8); "Thy paths drop fatness" (65 11; cf Isa 55 2; Jer 31 14).

"With fatness" is supplied, Dt 32 15 AV, "covered with fatness"; RV has "become sleek"; for "The yoke shall be destroyed because of the anointing" (Isa 10 27) ARV has "by reason of fatness," in "Heb oil"; ERV as AV, with in as ARV; the text is believed to be corrupt; LXX has "from your shoulders."

FAVOR, fā'vēr (פָּזַר, hēn, פָּזַר, rāḥōn, with other Heb words; χάρις, charis): Means generally good will, acceptance, and the benefits flowing from these; in older usage it meant also the countenance, hence appearance. Alternating in EV with "grace," it is used chiefly of man, but sometimes also of God (Gen 18 3; 30 27; 39 21; Ex 3 21; 2 S 15 25, "in the eyes of Jeh," etc.). It is used perhaps in the sense of "countenance" in Prov 31 30, "Favor is deceitful, and beauty is vain" (AV), where for "favor" RV has "grace"; the reference is to external appearance. "Favored" is used in the sense of "appearance" in the phrase "well-favored" (Gen 29 17; 39 6; 41 2.4); conversely, "ill-favored" (Gen 41 3.4). For "favor" RV has "have pity on" (Ps 109 12), "good will" (Prov 14 9), "peace" (Cant 8 10); ERV "grace" (Ruth 2 13), ARV "kindness" (Est 2 17; Dnl 1 9), etc. In ARV "the acceptable year of the Lord" (Isa 61 2) is changed into "the year of Jeh's favor"; "Do I now persuade men" (Gal 1 10) into, "Am I now seeking the favor of men," and there are other RV changes.

FAWN, fōn. See DEER.

FEAR, fēr (יִרְאָה, yir'āh, יָרֵא, yārē'; φόβος, phobos, φοβέω, phobēō): "Fear" is the tr of many words in the OT; the chief are: yir'āh, "fear," "terror," "reverence," "awe," most often "the fear of God," "of Jeh" (Gen 20 11; 2 Ch 19 9, etc.); also of "fear" generally (Job 22 4; Isa 7 25; Ezk 30 13, etc.); yārē', "to be afraid," "to fear," "to reverence" (Gen 15 1; Lev 19 3.14; Dt 6 2, etc.); pahādāh, "fear," "terror," "dread" (Gen 31 42.53; Dt 11 25; 1 S 11 7 AV; Job 4 14; Isa 2 10 AV, etc.).

"Fearful" (timid) is the tr of yārē' (Dt 20 8; Jgs 7 3); "to be feared," yārē' (Ex 15 11; Dt 28 58; cf Ps 130 4); in Isa 35 4 it is the tr of māhar, "hasty," "them that are of a fearful heart," m "Heb hasty"; perhaps, ready to flee (for fear).

"Fearfully" (Ps 139 14), yārē', "I am fearfully [and] wonderfully made," so RV; "and" is not in the text, so that "fearfully" may be equivalent to "extremely," to an awesome degree; cf Ps 66 5, "by terrible things . . . in righteousness"; 66 3, "How terrible are thy works (yārē' "fearful"); the LXX, Pesh, Vulg have "Thou art fearfully wonderful."

"Fearfulness" occurs in Ps 55 5 (yir'āh): Isa 31 4 (palāḥūth, RV "horror"; Isa 33 14 (r'ādāh, "trembling"), "Fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites," RV "Trembling hath seized the godless ones."

In the NT the chief words are phobos, "fear," "terror," "affright" (Mt 14 26; 28 4.8; Lk 21 26; 1 Jn 4 18, etc), and phobēō, "to put in fear" (both used of ordinary fear) (Mt 1 20; 10 26; 28 5; 2 Cor 12 20, etc); of the fear of God, the noun (Rom 3 18; 2 Cor 7 1), the vb. (Lk 18 4; 23 40, etc); deilōs, "timidity," "fear," occurs in 2 Tim 1 7, "God hath not given us the spirit of fear," RV "a spirit of fearfulness"; ēkphobos, "frightened out [of one's senses]," "greatly terrified" (He 12 21; cf Dt 9 19; Wisd 17 9 AV); apō tēs eulabētas is tr^d (He 5 7) "[of Christ] who was heard in that he feared," RV "having been heard for his godly fear"; so all the Gr commentators; eulabeia, properly, "caution," "circumspection," is used in the NT for godly fear (He 12 28, RV "reverence and awe," m as AV); cf eulabēs (Lk 2 25; Acts 2 5; 8 2); eulabēmai, "to act with caution" (Acts 23 10). Deilōs, "fearful," "timid," occurs in Mt 8 26; Mk 4 40; Rev 21 8, "Their part shall be . . . the second death"; phoberōs, "fearful," "terrible" (He 10 27. 31); phóbētron, "something fearful," "a terrible sign or portent" (Lk 21 11, RV "terrors").

Fear is a natural and, in its purpose, beneficent feeling, arising in the presence or anticipation of danger, and moving to its avoidance; it is also awakened in the presence of superiors and of striking manifestations of power, etc, taking the form of awe or reverence. Fear has been said to be the source of religion, but religion can never have originated from fear alone, since men are impelled to draw nigh with expectation to the object of worship.

"Fear" is certainly a prominent element in OT religion; the "fear of God" or of Jeh, "the fear of the Lord," is indeed synonymous with religion itself (Ps 34 11; Prov 1 7; Isa 11 2.3; Jer 2 19; Eccl 12 13, "the whole duty of man," RVm "the duty of all men"). But although the element of dread, or of "fear" in its lower sense, is not always absent and is sometimes prominent in the earlier stages especially, though not exclusively (Ex 23 27, 'ēmāh; 1 S 11 7; 2 Ch 20 29; Ps 119 120; Isa 2 10.19.21), it is more the feeling of reverent regard for their God, tempered with awe and fear of the punishment of disobedience. As such it is a sentiment commanded and to be cherished toward Jeh (Ex 20 20; Dt 6 13; Josh 4 24; 1 S 12 24; Job 6 14; Ps 33 8; 34 9; Prov 23 17; Eccl 5 7, etc). It is an essential element in the worship and service of Jeh (2 K 17 often; Ps 2 11, etc); it is a Divine qualification of the Messiah (Isa 11 2.3). This "fear of Jeh" is manifested in keeping God's commandments, walking in His ways, doing His will, avoiding sin, etc (Ex 20 20; Dt 6 13.24; 2 S 23 3; Ps 34 4.9 || Prov 8 13; 16 6). It is the true wisdom (Job 28 28; Ps 25 14; Prov 1 7; 15 33); it gives life (Prov 10 27, etc), blessedness (Ps 128 1.4), sufficiency (34 9), Divine friendship (25 14), protection (34 7), deliverance (85 9), forgiveness (130 4). In Ps 90 11 AV has "According to thy fear so is thy wrath," RV "and thy wrath according to the fear that is due unto thee"; the meaning probably is "thy wrath is in proportion to thy fear."

The "fear of the Lord" is a frequent phrase in Apoc, and is highly exalted, e.g. Ecclesi 1 11-30; the idea of it became gradually more and more elevated; in 2 15.16 it is joined with the love of God.

"Fear" is the natural consequence of sin (Gen 3 10; 4 13.14; Prov 23 1); it comes as a punishment (Dt 28 25.28). The fear of man and of evils are dangers to be avoided, from which the fear of God delivers (Nu 14 9; 21 34; Ps 23 4; 31 14, etc).

"Fear" sometimes stands for the object of fear (Prov 10 24; Isa 66 4); for the object of worship (Gen 31 42.53, "the God of Abraham, and the Fear of Isaac," pahādāh).

In the NT dread, or fear of God in the lower sense, is removed; He is revealed as the loving and forgiving Father, who gives to men the spirit of sonship (Rom 8 15; 2 Tim 1 7; 1 Jn 4 18); we are invited even to come "with boldness unto the throne of grace," with confidence, assurance (parhēsia), which, however, may have its literal meaning of free "utterance" (He 4 16; 10 19); but there remains a filial fear and sense of awe and of the greatness of the issues involved (Rom 11 20; Eph 5 21, RV "of Christ"; 1 Tim 5 20; He 4 1); all other fears should be dismissed (Mt 8 26; 10 26-28.31; Lk 12 32); in Mt 10 28; Lk 12 5, "fear" is used in the sense of "stand in awe of," so perhaps Lk 23 40; to "fear God" is sometimes used in the NT as equivalent to religion (Lk 18 4; Acts 10 2.35; 13 16.26, used of proselytes); in He 10 27, it is said that if Christ be wilfully rejected, nothing remains but "a fearful looking for [RV "expectation"] of judgment," and ver 31, "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God," in which places "fearful" means "terrible," something well to be feared. RV gives frequently a more literal rendering of the words תִּירָא "fear."

The Hebrews had an abundance of holidays, some based, according to their tradition, on agriculture and the natural changes of times and seasons, some on historical events connected with the national or religious life of Israel, and still others simply on immemorial custom. In most instances two or more of these bases co-exist, and the emphasis on the natural, the agricultural, the national, or the religious phase will vary with different writers, different context, or different times. Any classification of these feasts and fasts on the basis of original significance must therefore be imperfect.

We should rather classify them as pre-exilic and post-exilic, because the period of the Bab captivity marks a complete change, not only in the kinds of festivals instituted from time to time, but also in the manner of celebrating the old.

I. Pre-exilic List.—The pre-exilic list includes the three pilgrimage festivals, the Passover week, Pentecost, and the Feast of Tabernacles, together with the Eighth Day of Assembly at the conclusion of the last of these feasts, and New Year and Atonement Days, the weekly Sabbath and the New Moon.

The pre-exilic festivals were "holy convocations" (Lev 23; Nu 28). Special sacrifices were offered on them in addition to the daily offerings.

1. Observances. These sacrifices, however, varied according to the character of the festival (Nu 28, 29). On all of them trumpets (hāçōç-rōth) were blown while the burnt offerings and the peace-offerings were being sacrificed (Nu 10 10). They were all likened to the weekly Sabbath as days of rest, on which there must be complete suspension of all ordinary work (Lev 16 29; 23 7.8.21.24.25.28.35.36).

The three pilgrimage festivals were known by that name because on them the Israelites gathered at Jerus to give thanks for their doubly joyful character. They were of agricultural significance as well as commemorative of national events. Thus the Passover is connected with the barley harvest; at the same time it is the zman hērūh, recalling the Exodus from Egypt (Ex 12 6; Lev 23 5.8; Nu 28 16-25; Dt 16 1-8).

Pentecost has an agricultural phase as hagh habikkūrim, the celebration of the wheat harvest; it has a religious phase as zman matlan Thōrāh in the Jewish liturgy, based on the rabbinical calculation which makes it the day of the giving of the Law, and this religious side has so completely overshadowed the agricultural that among modern Jews the Pentecost has become "confirmation day" (Ex 34 26; Lev 23 10-14; Nu 28 26-31).

The Feast of Tabernacles is at once the general harvest festival, hagh he-'āçīph, and the anniversary of the beginnings of the wanderings in the wilderness (Ex 23 16; Lev 23 33 ff; Dt 16 13-15). The Eighth Day of Assembly immediately following the last day of Tabernacles (Lev 23 36; Nu 29 35 ff; Jn 7 37) and closing the long cycle of Tīshri festivals seems to have been merely a final day of rejoicing before the pilgrims returned to their homes.

New Year (Lev 23 23-25; Nu 29 1-6) and the Day of Atonement (Lev 16 1 ff; 23 26-32; Nu 29 7-11) marked the turning of the year; primarily, perhaps, in the natural phenomena of Pal, but also in the inner life of the nation and the individual. Hence the religious significance of these days as days of judgment, penitence and forgiveness soon overshadowed any other significance they may have had. The temple ritual for these days, which is minutely described in the OT and in the Talm, was the most elaborate and impressive of the year. At the same time Atonement Day was socially an important day of rejoicing.

In addition to these annual festivals the pre-exilic Hebrews celebrated the Sabbath (Nu 28 9.10; Lev 23 1-3) and the New Moon (Nu 10 10; 28 11-15). By analogy to the weekly Sabbath, every seventh year was a Sabbath Year (Ex 23 11; Lev 25 1-7; Dt 15 1), and every cycle of seven Sabbath years was closed with a Jubilee Year (Lev 25 8-18) somewhat after the analogy of the seven weeks counted before Pentecost.

For further details of all of these pre-exilic festivals see the separate articles.

II. The Post-exilic List.—In post-exilic times important historical events were made the basis for the institution of new fasts and feasts. When the first temple was destroyed and the people were carried into captivity, "the sacrifice of the body and one's own fat and blood" were substituted for that of animals (see Talm, B'rākhoth 17a). With such a view of their importance, fasts of all sorts were as a matter of course rapidly multiplied. (Note that the Day of Atonement was the only pre-exilic fast.) Of these post-exilic fasts and feasts, the Feast of Dedication (1 Macc 4 52-59; Jn 10 22; Mish, Ta'ănūth 2 10; Mō'edh Kāṭōn 3 9; Jos, Ant, XII, vii; CAP, II, xxxix) and the Feast of Purim (Est 3 7; 9 24 ff; 2 Macc 15 36); and the fasts of the fourth (Zec 8 19; Jer 39, 52; Mish, Ta'ănūth 4 6), the fifth (Zec 7 3.4; 8 19; Ta'ănūth 4 6), the seventh (Zec 7 5; 8 19; Jer 41 1 ff; 2 K 25 25; Sēdher 'Olām Rabbā 26; M'ghillath Ta'ănūth c. 12), the tenth months (Zec 8 19; 2 K 25), and the Fast of Esther (Est 4 16 f; 9 31) have been preserved by Jewish tradition to this day. (The Feast of Dedication, the Feast of Purim and the Fast of Esther are described in separate articles.)

The fasts of the fourth, fifth, seventh and tenth months are based on historical incidents connected with one or more national calamities.

Significance In several instances the rabbis have by close figuring been able to connect with the dates of the fasts as well as the feasts other important national events than those for which the days were primarily instituted. Not less than four incidents are connected with the fasts of the fourth month (17th of Tammūz): (a) on this day the Israelites made the golden calf; (b) Moses broke the tables of law; (c) the daily sacrifices ceased for want of cattle when the city was closely besieged prior to the destruction of Jerus; and (d) on this day Jerus was stormed by Nebuchadnezzar. The fast of the fifth month (9th day of 'Ābh) receives its significance from the fact that the First Temple was destroyed upon this day by Nebuchadnezzar, and the Second Temple on the same day of the year by Titus. In addition it is said that on this day Jeh decreed that those who left Egypt should not enter the land of promise; the day is also the anniversary of the capture of the city of Bether by the Emperor Hadrian. The fast of the seventh month (the 3d day of Tishri) commemorates the murder of Gedaliah at Mizpah. That of the tenth month (10th day of TebBeth) commemorates the beginning of the siege of Jerus by Nebuchadnezzar.

Other fasts and feasts no doubt were instituted on similar occasions and received a local or temporary observance, for example, the Feast of Acra (1 Macc 13 50-52; cf 1 33), to celebrate the recapture of Acra ("the citadel") on the 23d of 'Īyār 141 BC, and the Feast of Nicanor, in celebration of the victory over Nicanor on the 13th day of 'Ādhār 160 BC (1 Macc 7 49).

Several other festivals are mentioned in the Talm and other post-Biblical writings which may have been of even greater antiquity. The Feast of Woodcarrying (Midsummer Day: Neh 10 34; Jos, BJ, II, vii, 6; M'ghillath Ta'ānūh c.v, p. 32, Mish, Ta'ānūh 4 8a), for example, is referred to as the greatest day of rejoicing of the Hebrews, ranking with Atonement Day. It was principally a picnic day to which a religious touch was given by making it the woodgatherers' festival for the Temple. A New Year for trees is mentioned in the Talm (Rō'sh ha-Shānāh 1 1). The pious, according both to the Jewish tradition and the NT, observed many private or semi-public fasts, such as the Mondays, Thursdays and following Monday after Nisān and Tishri (the festival months: Lk 18 12; Mt 9 14; Mk 2 18; Lk 5 33; Acts 10 30; M'ghillath 31a; Ta'ānūh 12a; Bābhā' Kamā' 8 2). The day before Passover was a fast day for the firstborn (Šōphrīm 21 3).

In post-Biblical times the Jews outside of Pal doubled each of the following days: the opening and closing day of Passover and Tabernacles and Pentecost, because of the šāphēk, or doubt as to the proper day to be observed, growing out of the delays in the transmission of the official decree of the sanhedrin in each season. Differences in hours of sunrise and sunset between Pal and other countries may have had something to do at least with the perpetuation of the custom. New Year's Day seems to have been doubled from time immemorial, the forty-eight hours counting as one "long day."

Many new modes of observance appear in post-exilic times in connection with the old established festivals, esp. in the high festival season of Tishri. Thus the šimḥah bēth ha-shō'ēbhāh, "water drawing festival," was celebrated during the week of Tabernacles with popular games and dances in which even the elders took part, and the streets were so brilliantly illuminated with torches that scarcely an eye was closed in Jerus during that week (Talm, Hullin).

The last day of Tabernacles was known in Talmudic times as yōm ḥibbūf 'ārābhōth, from the custom of beating willow branches, a custom clearly antedating the various symbolical explanations offered for it. Its festivities were connected with the dismantling of the booth. In later times the day was known as hōsha' nā' rabbā', from the liturgical passages beginning with the word hōsha' nā', recited throughout the feast and "gathered" on that day. The day after Tabernacles has been made šimḥah Tōrah, the Feast of the Law, from the custom of ending on that day the cycle of fifty-two weekly portions read in the synagogues.

In general it may be said that although the actual observance has changed from time to time to meet new conditions, the synagogal calendar of today is made up of the same festivals as those observed in NT times.

FEASTS, SEASONS FOR, regulated by the sun and moon. See ASTRONOMY, 1, 5.

FEATHERS, feth'ērz (רִפְּי, nōṣāh; Lat penna): "Gavest thou the goodly wings unto the peacocks? or wings [RV "pinions"] and feathers [ARV "plumage"] unto the ostrich?" (Job 39 13 AV); "He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust; his truth shall be thy shield and buckler" (Ps 91 4 AV). In RV this is again changed to pinions. In Dnl 4 33 the word "feathers" is left. The wonderful plumage of birds was noted and prized in those days, just as now. Old ostriches were too tough and rank of flesh for food. They were pursued for their feathers, which were used for the headdressing and shield ornaments of desert princes. No one doubts that the ships of Solomon introduced peacocks because of their wonderful feathers. Those of the eagle were held in superstitious reverence as late as the days of Pliny, who was ten years old at the time of the crucifixion of Christ. Pliny wrote that the eagle was so powerful that if its feathers be laid in a box with those of other birds, the eagle feathers would "devour and consume all the rest."

FEEBLE KNEES, fē'b'l nēz: The expression is found in three places (one being a free quotation of another): Job 4 4, "Thou hast made firm the feeble [כָּרַע, kāra', "bending," "bowing"] knees," and He 12 12, "Wherefore lift up the hands that hang down, and the palsied [AV "feeble"] knees." The Gr word used here (παράλυμα, paralūmena, "paralyzed," "motionless") implies the loss of junction, interrupted articulation, the cutting off of vital strength; cf Gr χολός, chōlós, "lame," and see Delitzsch in his Comm. on He, loc. cit.

Such an affection of the knees may be due to different causes. It is, e.g., a very frequent symptom of the disease known in the Orient as beriberi, when the muscles of the lower leg shrink to such a degree as to render voluntary locomotion impossible. It always disables its victim, and is therefore often expressive of general debility, e.g. in Ps 109 24, where such weakness is described as the outcome of protracted fasting. In Ezk 7 17 and 21 7, "All knees shall be weak as water," the expression indicates a complete relaxation of the muscles. Fear effected the same condition in Belshazzar's case, when he saw the writing on the wall (Dnl 5 6), "The joints of his loins were loosed, and his knees smote one against another" (cf Nah 2 10).

The "sore boil . . . in the knees, and in the legs," a disease announced in Dt 28 35 as a punishment upon Israel for disobedience, cannot now be fully determined. Driver (in his commentary on the passage) thinks of elephantiasis, which is possible but not probable on account of the additional statement, "whereof thou canst not be healed, from the sole of thy foot unto the crown of thy head" which would be unexplained, as elephantiasis rarely presents a form in which the whole body is sympathetically affected. I rather think of some form of bubonic plague, which causes very high fever all over the body. In ver 27 in the enumeration of plagues mention is made of the "boll of Egypt," and some commentators have explained this as "bubonic plague." There is, however, no doubt that the "boll or botch of Egypt" is identical with the disease known to modern medicine as bouton du Nil, Biakra button, Bagdad or Aleppo sore.

FEEDLE-MINDED, fē'b'l-mīn'ded (ὀλιγόψυχος, oligópsuchos): Only in 1 Thess 5 14 AV, in the sense of "fainthearted," as in RV. In LXX it is used as the equivalent of kōshēl, the tottering or feeble-kneed in Isa 35 3; 54 6; oligopsuchia occurs in LXX twice (Ex 6 9; Ps 54 7), for "anguish of spirit" and "trouble." The term refers to weakness of will and vacillation of purpose rather than to idiocy or morbid imbecility.

FEELING, fēl'ing: The following varieties of meaning are to be noted:

(1) "To touch," "handle," "grope after" (מִשָּׁח, māshash (Gen 27 12,22; Ex 10 21; מִשָּׁח, mūsh, Gen 27 21; Jgs 16 26; ψηλαφάω, psēlapháo, Acts 17 27).

(2) "To know," "understand," "experience" (יָדָע, bīn, Ps 58 9; יָדָעָה, yādha', Prov 23 35; γινώσκω, ginōskō, Mk 5 29).

(3) "To have a fellow feeling," "to place one's self into the position of another," esp. while suffering, "to have compassion" (συνπαθεῖν, sumpathein, He 4 15; cf 10 34; which is to be carefully distinguished from the similar vb. συμπάσχειν, sumpáschein, which means "to share in the same suffering with another," Rom 8 17; 1 Cor 12 26). See Delitzsch, Comm. on He 4 15.

(4) "To feel harm," "pain," "grief," "to be sensitive" (πάσχειν, páschein, with the roots path- and penih-, Acts 28 5); or with the negation: "to have ceased to feel," "to be apathetic," "past feeling," "callous" (ἀπαλγής, apēlgēhós, perf. part. of ἀπαλγέω, apalgéō (Eph 4 19) which describes the condition of the sinner, who by hardening his heart against moral influences is left without a sense of his high vocation, without an idea of the awfulness of sin, without reverence to God, without an appreciation of the salvation offered by Him, and without fear of His judgment.

FEIGN, fān (בָּדָא, bādā', נָקַר, nākhār; πλαστός, plastós): Occurs (1) in the sense of "to devise," "invent" as the tr of bādā', "to form," "to fashion" (Neh 6 8, "Thou feignest them out of thine own heart"; cf 1 K 12 33, EV "devised of his own heart"); of plastos, "formed," "molded" (2 Pet 2 3, "with feigned words make merchandise of you"); (2) in the sense of "pretense," nākhār, "to be foreign," "strange" (1 K 14 5, "feign herself to be another woman," ver 6; cf Gen 42 7; Prov 26 24); 'ābhal, "to mourn," "to act as a mourner" (2 S 14 2); hālal, "to make a show," Hithpael, "to be mad," "to feign madness" (of David, 1 S 21 13; cf Jer 25 16; 50 38); hupokrinomai, "to give judgment, or act, under a mask" (Lk 20 20, "who feigned themselves to be righteous"); (3) in the sense of "deceit," "fraud," "insincerity," mīrmāh, "prayer, that goeth not out of feigned lips" (Ps 17 1); sheker, "falsehood," "a lie," "Judah hath not returned unto me with her whole heart, but feignedly" (Jer 3 10; cf 2 Esd 8 28); kāhash,

"to lie," "to feign, or flatter" (2 S 22 45; Ps 18 44; 66 3; 81 15), where the text of AV and RV, "shall submit themselves," is rendered m, AV and RV, "yield feigned obedience, Heb lie." RV has "feign" for "make" (2 S 13 5), and "feigned" for "made" (ver 6). W. L. WALKER

FELIX, fē'liks, ANTONIUS, an-tō'ni-us (Φη-λῆξ, Phēlix, from Lat felix, "happy"): A Rom procurator of Judaea, appointed in succession to Cumanus by the emperor Claudius. The event which led to the introduction of Felix into the narrative of Acts was the riot at Jerus (Acts 21 27). There Paul, being attacked at the instigation of the Asiatic Jews for alleged false teaching and profanation of the temple, was rescued with difficulty by Lysias the chief captain. But Lysias, finding that Paul was a Rom citizen, and that therefore the secret plots against the life of his captive might entail serious consequences upon himself, and finding also that Paul was charged on religious rather than on political grounds, sent him on to Felix at Caesarea for trial (Acts 21 31—23 34). On his arrival, Paul was presented to Felix and was then detained for five days in the judgment hall of Herod, till his accusers should also reach Caesarea (Acts 23 33—35). The trial was begun, but after hearing the evidence of Tertullus (see TERTULLUS) and the speech of Paul in his own defence, Felix deferred judgment (Acts 24 1—22). The excuse he gave for delay was the non-appearance of Lysias, but his real reason was in order to obtain bribes for the release of Paul. He therefore treated his prisoner at first with leniency, and pretended along with Drusilla to take interest in his teaching. But these attempts to induce Paul to purchase his freedom failed ignominiously; Paul sought favor of neither Felix nor Drusilla, and made the frequent interviews which he had with them an opportunity for preaching to them concerning righteousness and temperance and the final judgment. The case dragged on for two years till Felix, upon his retirement, "desiring to gain favor with the Jews . . . left Paul in bonds" (Acts 24 27). According to the Bezan text, the continued imprisonment of Paul was due to the desire of Felix to please Drusilla.

Felix was the brother of Pallas, who was the infamous favorite of Claudius, and who, according to Tacitus (Annals xiii.14), fell into disgrace in 55 AD. Tacitus implies that Felix was joint procurator of Judaea, along with Cumanus, before being appointed to the sole command, but Jos is silent as to this. Both Tacitus and Jos refer to his succeeding Cumanus, Jos stating that it was at the instigation of Jonathan the high priest. There is some doubt as to the chronology of Felix' tenure of office. Harnack and Blass, following Eusebius and Jerome, place his accession in 51 AD, and the imprisonment of Paul in 54—56 AD; but most modern commentators incline to the dates 52 AD and 56—58 AD. These latter interpret the statement of Paul, "Thou hast been of many years a judge unto this nation" (Acts 24 10), as referring to some judicial office, not necessarily that of co-procurator (see Tac.), previously held by Felix in the time of Cumanus, and argue that this earlier connection of Felix with Judaea supplied a reason for the advocacy by Jonathan of Felix' claims to the procuratorship on the deposition of Cumanus. The testimony of Acts as to the evil character of Felix is fully corroborated by the writings of Jos (BJ, II, xiii). Although he suppressed the robbers and murderers who infested Judaea, and among them the "Egyptian" to whom Lysias refers (Acts 21 38), yet "he himself was more hurtful than them all." When occasion offered, he did not hesitate to employ the sicarii (see ASSASSINS) for his own ends. Trading upon the influence of his brother at court, his cruelty and rapacity knew no bounds, and during his rule revolts became continuous, and marked a distinct stage in that seditious movement which culminated in the outbreak of 70 AD (so Schürer). His leaving Paul in bonds was but a final instance of one who sacrificed duty and justice for the sake of his own unscrupulous selfishness. For more detailed information as to dates, etc., cf. Knowling (Expos Gr Test., II, 477 ff). C. M. KERR

FELLOWS, fel'ōs (1 K 7 33). See WHEEL.

FELLOW, fel'ō (רֵעַ, hābār, רֵעַ, rā'; hēlāros, hēlāros): Meant originally a "partner," from fe, "property," and lag, "to lay," then "a companion," "an equal," "a person or individual," "a worthless person."

(1) As "companion" it is the tr of hābār, "associate," "companion," "friend" (also hābār, Job 41 6 [Heb 40 30], where we have the original sense of partnership, tr "bands" RV, AV "companions"); Ps 45 7, "God hath anointed thee . . . above thy fellows"; of hābārāh (Eccl 4 10; Dnl 7 20); of rā', "companion," "friend," "another" (Ex 2 13; Jgs 7 13, 14, 22); rā'āh (or ra'yāh), "a female friend" (Jgs 11 37, "I and my fellows," RV "companions"; here AV applies "fellow" to a female; cf Bar 6 43, "She reproacheth her fellow," hēlāros); in Jgs 11 38, "companions" is the tr of amūh, "fellowship"; amūh (Zec 13 7, "the man that is my fellow," lit. "the man of my fellowship"); hēlāros, "companion" (Mt 11 16); mētochos, "partner," (cf Lk 8 7; He 1 9, quoted from Ps 45 7, LXX for hābār).

(2) As an individual or person "fellow" is the tr of ish, "a man," "an individual": "make this fellow return" (1 S 29 4 AV, RV "the man"); in the same ver "fellow" is supplied instead of "he"; "fellow" in 1611 meant simply "a man," and it is difficult to say in what passages the ideas of "worthless," etc., are meant to be implied; probably, however, in Jgs 15 25, where the Heb is simply anāsh, "man," and the text is almost the only deviation from the rendering "man," "men," "lest angry [m, RV "bitter of soul"] fellows fall upon you"; also Acts 17 5, anēr, "a man," "certain lewd fellows of the baser sort," RV "vile fellows"; cf 2 S 6 20, "vain [rāk] fellows" (supplied); 1 Macc 10 61, "contain pestilent fellows" (anēr); Eccles 8 15, "a bold fellow" (tolmārōs), RV "a rash man"; in several places of the OT "fellow" represents zāh, "this," and in these instances there seems to be something of worthlessness or contempt implied (1 S 21 15 bis; 25 21; 1 K 22 27; 2 K 9 11, and, as before, 1 S 29 4 RV); in the NT also "fellow" often represents hōtōs, "this," and in most of these cases AV seems to intend something depreciatory to be understood; RV gives simply "man" (Mt 12 24; 26 61, 71; Lk 22 59; 23 2; Jn 9 29; Acts 13 13); so Eccles 13 23, "If the poor man speaks, they say, What fellow is this?" RV "who is this?" 1 Macc 6 5, "These fellows flee from us," RV "these men." RV has "fellows" for "persons" (Jgs 9 4), for "men" (11 3); "base fellows" for "men the children of Belial" (Dt 13 13), m, "sons of worthlessness"; ARV "worthless fellow" for "son of Belial" (1 S 25 17, 25), "base fellows" for "sons of Belial" (Jgs 19 22; 20 13, etc); RV has also "companions" for "fellows" (Jgs 11 37, as above; Est 3 19; Dnl 2 13), "each man his fellow" for "one another" (2 K 3 23); "fellow by" for "neighbor in" (1 K 20 35).

Fellow-citizen, Fellow-disciple, Fellow-heir, Yokefellow, etc. In composition, "fellow" always means partner or companion.

FEMALE, fē'māl: Two Heb words are thus tr'd:

(1) נִקְבָּץ, nēqēbāh, which is merely a physiological description of the sexual characteristic (from נִקְבָּץ, nēqēbāh, "to perforate"), and which corresponds to נָקִי, nāqīhār, "male" (see s.v.).

(2) נִשְׂאָה, nēshāh, with the irregular pl. נִשְׂאוֹת, nēshōt (only Gen 7 2, in all other places "wife," "woman"), the fem. form of נָשִׁים, nēshim, "man."

The Gr word is θάλυς, thēlus, lit. "the nursing one," "the one giving suck" (from θάλισσιν, thēlissin, "to suckle").

Israelitic law seems frequently guilty of unjust partiality in favor of the male sex, but we have to consider that most of these legal and religious disabilities of women can be explained from the social conditions prevailing at the time of legislation. They are therefore found also in contemporaneous gentile religions. Though traces of this prejudice against the weaker sex are found in the NT, the religious discrimination between the sexes has practically ceased, as is evident from Gal 3 28: "There can be no male and female; for ye all are one man in Christ Jesus"; cf also 1 Pet 3 7.

FENCE, fens (בָּצָר, bāṣar, מִבְּחָר, mibhār): Commonly used in AV in the description of fortified places, as the tr of bāṣar, "to cut off," "to separate," "to fortify" (and forms) (Dt 3 5; 9 1; 28 52, etc); mibhār, "fenced city," is a fortified place (Nu 32 17, 36; Josh 10 20; 19 35, etc); māṣār, "fenced cities," means "bulwark," "citadel" (2 Ch 8 5); māṣārāh, "fortification" (2 Ch 11 23; 13 4; 14 6; 21 3); for "fenced" ARV substitutes "fortified" in all these instances; in Dnl 11 15, mibhār is "a well-fortified city," m "the fortified cities," ERV "well-fenced"; "fence" is also the tr of gādhār, "a wall" or "fence" (Job 19 8 ARV, "walled up," gādhār; Ps 62 3); anāṣ, "to loosen" (the ground) as with a mattock (Isa 5 2, where AV has "fenced" it [the vineyard], ARV "dugged it," ERV "made a trench about it," m "dugged it"); sūkh, "to interweave" or "interlace" (Job 10 11, RV "clothed"); māṣār, "to be or become full" (2 S 23 7, RV "armed," m "Heb filled").

FERRET, fer'et (חִרְשֵׁי, chirshē, RV GECKO):

Occurs only in Lev 11 30 AV, in the list of animals which are unclean "among the creeping things that creep upon the earth." RV has "gecko" with the marginal note, "Words of uncertain meaning, but probably denoting four kinds of lizards." The list of animals in Lev 11 29, 30 includes (1) hōlēdāh, EV "weasel"; (2) akbār, EV "mouse"; (3) ṣābh, AV "tortoise," RV "great lizard"; (4) anāṣāh, AV "ferret," RV "gecko"; (5) kōḥ, AV "chameleon," RV "land crocodile"; (6) ṣēṣāh, EV "lizard"; (7) ḥōmēl, AV "snail," RV "sand lizard"; (8) ṭināhemēl, AV "mole," RV "chameleon." It will be noted that while RV makes the first two mammals and the remaining six reptiles, AV makes not only (1) and (2) but also (4) and (8) mammals, and (7) a mollusk. So far as this general classification is concerned AV follows the LXX, except in the case of (7). It must be borne in mind that all these words except (2) and (8) occur only in this passage, while (2) and (8) occur each in only a few passages where the context throws but uncertain light upon the meaning. Under these circumstances we ought to be content with the rendering of the LXX, unless from philology or tradition we can show good reason for differing. For ἄνδρα, LXX has μυγᾶλη, mygale, which occurs in Herodotus and Aristotle and may be a shrew mouse or a field mouse. Just as the next word, κῶα, is found in other passages (see CHAMELEON) with the meaning of "strength," so ἄνδρα occurs in several places signifying "moaning" or "sighing" (Ps 12 5; 79 11; 102 20; Mal 2 13). It seems to be from the root, ἄνακ, "to choke," "to be in anguish" (cf ἄνδρα, "a collar"; ἡνάκ, "to choke"; Arab. ʿunḳ, "neck"; Arab. khanak, "to strangle"; Gr ἀνάγκη; Lat angustus; Ger. enge, Nacken; Eng. "anxious," "neck"). Some creature seems to be meant which utters a low cry or squeak, and neither "ferret" (AV) nor "gecko" (RV) seems to have a better claim than the older LXX rendering of μυγᾶλη = "shrew mouse" or "field mouse."

FERVENT, fūr'vent (פֶּרֶבֶן, dālak; ἐκτενής, ektenēs, [ἔλ, zēd): "Fervent" (from Lat fervere, "to boil") does not occur in AV of the OT, but RV gives it as the tr of dālak, "to burn" (Prov 26 23), instead of "burning," "fervent lips and a wicked heart." In the NT it is the tr of ektenēs, "stretched out," hence intent, earnest (1 Pet 4 8, "being fervent in your love among yourselves"); of zēd, "to boil," "to be hot" (Rom 12 11, "fervent in spirit," Acts 18 25); of zēlos, "zeal," "fervor" (2 Cor 7 7, RV "zeal"), in Jas 5 16 AV has: "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much," where the Gr is: πολύ ισχυαί δέεις δικαίου ενεργουμένη, which RV renders, "The supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working."

"Fervently" is the tr of agonizomai, "to strive or struggle" (agonize). Col 4 12 AV, RV "Epaphras . . . striving for you in his prayers"; of ektenēs, lit. in an outstretched manner (1 Pet 1 22, RV "Love one another from the heart fervently"; cf 1 Pet 4 8, "fervent in your love among yourselves"). Christian love too often lacks this ferency, but Christ's love for us was "stretched out" to the uttermost.

RV has "fervently" for "earnestly" (Jas 5 17, m "with prayer").

FESTIVAL, fes'ti-val. See FEASTS AND FASTS.

FESTUS, fes'tus, PORCIUS, pōr'shi-us (Πόρκιος Φέρτος, Pōrkios Phēstos): The Rom governor or procurator who succeeded Felix in the province of Judaea (Acts 24 27), and was thus brought into prominence in the dispute between Paul and the Sanhedrin which continued after the retirement of Felix (chs 25, 26). Upon the arrival of Festus in Jerus, the official capital of his province, the Jews besought of him to send Paul from Caesarea to Jerus to appear before them, intending to kill him on the way (25 3). Festus at first refused their request, and upon his return to Caesarea proceeded himself to examine Paul (ver 6). But on finding that the evidence was conflicting, and reflecting that, as the accused was apparently charged on religious rather than on political grounds, the Sanhedrin was a more suitable court for his case than a Rom tribunal, he asked Paul if he were agreeable to make the journey to Jerus (vs 7-9). But Paul, who knew well the nefarious use that the Jews would make of the pleasure which Festus was willing to grant them, made his appeal unto Caesar (vs 10.11). To this request of a Rom citizen accused on a capital charge (cf ver 16), Festus had perforce to give his consent (ver 12). But the manner of his consent indicated his pique at the apparent distrust shown by Paul. By the words "unto Caesar shalt thou go," Festus implied that the case must now be proceeded with to the end: otherwise, had it been left in his own hands, it might have been quashed at an earlier stage (cf also 26 32). Meantime King Agrippa and Bernice had arrived in Caesarea, and to these Festus gave a brief explanation of the circumstances (25 13-21). The previous audiences of Festus with Paul and his accusers had, however, served only to confuse him as to the exact nature of the charge. Paul was therefore summoned before the regal court, in order both that Agrippa might hear him, and that the governor might obtain more definite information for insertion in the report he was required to send along with the prisoner to Rome (vs 22-27). The audience which followed was brought to an abrupt conclusion by the interruption of Paul's speech (26 1-23) by Festus: "Paul, thou art mad; thy much learning is turning thee mad" (ver 24). Yet the meeting was sufficient to convince both Agrippa and Festus that "this man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds" (ver 31). While Festus displayed a certain contempt for what he regarded as the empty delusions of a harmless maniac, his conduct throughout the whole proceeding was marked by a strict impartiality; and his straightforward dealing with Paul formed a marked contrast to the dilatoriness of Felix. The praise bestowed upon the latter by Tertullus (24 2) might with better reason have been bestowed on Festus, in that he freed the country from many robbers (Sicarii: Jos, Ant, XX, viii-x; BJ, II, xiv, 1); but his procuratorship was too short to undo the harm wrought by his predecessor. The exact date of his accession to office is uncertain, and has been variously placed at 55-61 AD (cf Knowling in Expos Gr Test., II, 488-89; see also FELIX).

FETCH, fech (לָקַח, lāqah): Has generally the meaning of "to bring"; it is commonly the tr of Heb lāqah, "to take" or "lay hold of," Hoph. "to be brought, seized or snatched away" (Gen 18 4, etc; 27 9, etc; 42 16; 1 S 4 3; 1 K 17 10, etc); twice of nāṣā, "to lift up" (2 Ch 12 11, ARV "bare"; Job 36 3); of bā, "to come in" (2 Ch 1 17; Neh 8 15); of ālāh, "to cause to come up" (1 S 6 21; 7 1); of yāṣā, "to cause to come out" (Nu 20 10, ARV "bring forth"; Jer 26 23), and of a number of other words.

In the NT it is the tr of εἰσάγω, "to lead out" (Acts 16 37, "Let them come themselves and fetch us out," RV "bring"); "to fetch a compass" is the tr of ᾠδᾶβη (Nu 34 5; Josh 15 3, RV "turn," "turned about"; 2 S 5 23, RV "make a circuit"; 2 K 3 9, RV "made a circuit"); of περιέρχεται (aor. 2, periēllhōn), "to go about," "to wander up and down" (of a ship driven about; Acts 28 13, RV "made a circuit," m "some ancient authorities read cast loose").

RV has "fetch" for "bring" (1 K 3 24), for "call for" (Acts 10 5; 11 13); "fetched" for "called for" (Est 5 10), for "took out" (Jer 37 17); "fetched" for "took" (2 Ch 8 18).

FETTER, fet'er: Found only in the pl. in both OT and NT; fetters of iron (Ps 105 18; 149 8; so probably Mk 6 4; Lk 8 29) or brass (Jgs 16 21; 2 K 25 7) were frequently used for securing prisoners. See CHAIN.

Figurative: of trouble (Job 36 8).

FEVER, fē'ver (קָדַח, kaddahath, קָדַח, dallo-keth; πυρετός, puretós, derived from a root signi-lying "to burn"): A generic term, applied to all diseases characterized by high temperature of body. Several forms of febrile disease are among the commonest of all maladies in Pal today, as they were also in the period covered by the Bible history. Of these the most prevalent is ague or intermittent malarial fever, which is common in all parts but esp. in low-lying districts or places where there are pools or marshes in which mosquitoes breed, these insects being the commonest carriers of the malaria bacillus. These fevers are generally more severe in late summer and autumn, when the mosquitoes are most numerous, and when there is a liability to chill, owing to the sudden drop of temperature at sunset. During the day one uses as light clothing as possible, but immediately after sunset the air becomes chilly and damp, and the physiological resistance to the influence of the parasite is remarkably diminished. On this account travelers in Pal at this season should be particular to avoid exposure to these evening damps, and to use mosquito curtains invariably at night. In most tropical countries now houses are rendered mosquito-proof by close wire netting, and thereby the risk of infection is much diminished. In Pal the marshes of the north about Banias and the Water of Merom, the Shephelah, and the Jordan valley are the most fever-stricken regions of the country. The word kaddahah is tr^d burning ague in Lev 26 16 AV (RV "fever"), and is coupled with dalleketh, tr^d inflammation in Dt 28 22. LXX renders the former word purelos, and the latter rhigos in this passage, a collocation which is interesting as Galen uses these words together rhigopurelos in his description of a fever identical with that common in Pal. In Lev the word in LXX is ikteros which lit. means jaundice, a disease otherwise not mentioned in the Bible. In Pal as in other malarious countries the condition of jaundice or yellowing of the skin frequently accompanies repeated and protracted attacks of fever which cause organic disease of the liver. On this account Hippocrates describes all fevers as due to a perverted secretion of bile. These fevers begin with severe shivering fits, hence the name rhigos which is used by Hippocrates. This is followed by a period of burning dry heat, ending in a period of profuse perspiration. Such attacks may take place daily, a few hours of interval with normal temperature separating the end of one fit from the onset of the next. The commonest type however is that called tertian, in which a whole day separates one fit from the next. In some of the severe fevers which are rife in the Jordan valley the temperature never falls to the normal, and while there is a short remission between the attacks with a body heat a little above the normal, there is no intermission. Rarer febrile conditions which have been met with in Pal, such as the Malta fever, present the same characteristics and may continue for months. Cases also of genuine blackwater fever have been recorded by several authorities. It is probable that in former days these fevers were even worse than they are now, as ancient medicine knew of no certain remedy for them. At present they generally yield at once to treatment by quinine, and in my own experience I believe that the administration of this remedy in large and repeated doses is the most effectual treatment.

Other febrile diseases are rife in certain districts in Pal, and probably existed in Bible times. Typhoid is common in some crowded towns and villages, and considering how little protected the wells are from contamination, the wonder is that it is not much more prevalent. It is probable also that typhus then, as now, was present as an occasional epidemic in the more crowded cities, but even the physicians of Greece and Rome did not differentiate these diseases. All these fevers seem also to have existed in Egypt to much the same extent as in Pal. The Papyrus Ebers speaks of "a fever of the gods" (46) and another called "a burning of the heart" (102). Its causation is attributed to the influence of the "god of fever," and the evil sequelae of the disease as it affects the heart, stomach, eyes and other organs are described in terms which remind us of the minatory passages in Lev 26 and Dt 28. The conditions there mentioned, such as consuming the eyes and causing sorrow of heart or pining away of the soul, graphically describe the state frequently seen affecting those in the Shephelah villages who have suffered from frequent returns of fever, and who in consequence have developed serious local affections of the liver, spleen and other organs. Before the introduction of quinine, cases of this kind must have been much more commonly met with than they are now. It is probable that this state is that called shahepheth, or consumption, in these passages.

Another form of fever, harhur, the "extreme burning" of AV or "fiery heat" of RV, is coupled with the other forms of fever in Dt 28 22. This is called in LXX erethismós or irritation, and may have been a feverish condition with a reddened skin, possibly erysipelas or else one of the eruptive fevers. At present outbreaks of scarlatina, measles and erysipelas are of fairly frequent occurrence and are often very severe.

In the NT fever is mentioned eight times. The disease which affected Simon's wife's mother is called a "great fever" (Lk 4 38), and that which nearly proved fatal to the nobleman's son in the same district was also a fever (Jn 4 52). Cases of the kind are common all round the Sea of Galilee at the present day. ALEX. MACALISTER

FIG, FIG-TREE, fig'trē (תְּאֵנָה, t'ēnāh, pl. תְּאֵנִים, t'ēnim, specially "figs"; פַּגְגִּים, paggim, "green figs" only in Cant 2 13; טֶמְרִים, tēmrim, "fig-tree," σῦκον, sūkon, "fig"):

1. Fig-Trees sukh, "fig-tree," σῦκον, sūkon, "fig"): in the OT The earliest OT reference to the fig is to the leaves, which Adam and Eve converted into aprons (Gen 3 7). The promised land was described (Dt 8 8) as "a land of wheat and barley, and vines and fig-trees and pomegranates," etc. The spies who visited it brought, besides the cluster of grapes, pomegranates and figs (Nu 13 23). The Israelites complained that the wilderness was "no place of seed, or of figs, or of vines, or of pomegranates" (Nu 20 5). When Egypt was plagued, the fig-trees were smitten (Ps 105 33); a similar punishment was threatened to unfaithful Israel (Jer 6 17; Hos 2 12; Am 4 9). It is only necessary to ride a few miles among the mountain villages of Pal, with their extensive fig gardens, to realize what a long-lasting injury would be the destruction of these slow-growing trees. Years of patient labor—such as that briefly hinted at in Lk 13 7—must pass before a newly planted group of fig-trees can bear profitably. Plenitude of fruitful vines and fig-trees, specially individual ownership, thus came to be emblematical of long-continued peace and prosperity. In the days of Solomon "Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree" (1 K 4 25). Cf also 2 K 18 31; Isa 36 16; Mic 4 4; Zec 3 10; 1 Macc 14 12. Only a triumphal faith in Jeh could rejoice in Him "though the fig-tree shall not flourish" (Hab 3 17).

The Ficus carica, which produces the common fig, is a tree belonging to the N.O. Urticaceae, the nettle family, which includes also the shrubs than trees—occur also everywhere; they are usually barren and are described by the fellahin as "male" trees; it is generally supposed that their presence is beneficial to the cultivated variety. The immature flowers harbor small insects which convey pollen to the female flowers and by their irritating presence stimulate the growth of the fruit. Artificial fertilization has been understood since ancient times, and there may be a reference to it in Am 7 14.

2. Natural History of the Fig-Tree banyan, the India rubber fig-tree, the sycamore fig and other useful plants. Fig-trees are cultivated all over the Holy Land, esp. in the mountain regions. Wild fig-trees—usually rather

Fig-trees are usually of medium height, 10 or 15 ft. for full-grown trees, yet individual specimens sometimes attain as much as 25 ft. The summer foliage is thick and surpasses other trees of its size in its cool and dense shade. In the summer owners of such trees may be seen everywhere sitting in their shadow (Jn 1 48). Such references as Mic 4 4; Zec 3 10, etc., probably are to this custom rather than to the not uncommon one of having a fig-tree overhanging a dwelling.

The fruit of the fig-tree is peculiar. The floral axis, instead of expanding outward, as with most flowers, closes, as the flower develops, upon the small internal flowers, leaving finally but a small opening at the apex; the axis itself becomes succulent and fruit-like. The male flowers lie around the opening, the female flowers deeper in; fertilization is brought about by the presence of small hymenopterous insects.

There are many varieties of figs in Pal differing in sweetness, in color and consistence; some are good and some are bad (cf Jer 24 1,8; 29 17). In Pal and other warm climates the fig yields two crops annually—an earlier one, ripe about June, growing from the "old wood," i.e. from the midsummer sprouts of the previous year, and a second, more important one, ripe about August, which grows upon the "new wood," i.e. upon the spring shoots.

By December, fig-trees in the mountainous regions of Pal have shed all their leaves, and they remain bare until about the end of March, when they commence putting forth their tender leaf buds (Mt 24 32; Mk 13 28,32; Lk 21 29-33), and at the same time, in the leaf axils, appear the tiny figs. They belong to the early signs of spring:

"The voice of the turtle-dove is heard in our land;
The fig-tree ripeneth her green figs" (psqgm)
—Cant 2 12,13.

These tiny figs develop along with the leaves up to a certain point—to about the size of a small cherry—and then the great majority of them fall to the ground, carried down with every gust of wind. These are the

4. Early Figs "unripe figs" (blunthos) trd, more appropriately in AV, as "untimely figs"—of Rev 6 13. Cf also Isa 34 4 AV—in RV "leaf" has been supplied instead of "fig." These immature figs are known to the fellahin as taksh, by whom they are eaten as they fall; they may even sometimes be seen exposed for sale in the markets in Jerus. In the case of many trees the whole of this first crop may thus abort, so that by May no figs at all are to be found on the tree, but with the best varieties of fig-trees a certain proportion of the early crop of figs remains on the tree, and this fruit reaches ripe perfection about June. Such fruit is known in Arab. as dafur, or "early figs," and in Heb as buk-kurah, "the first-ripe" (Isa 28 4; Jer 24 2; Hos 9 10). They are now, as of old, esteemed for their delicate flavor (Mic 7 1, etc.).

The miracle of Our Lord (Mt 21 18-20; Mk 11 12,13,20,21) which occurred in the Passover season, about April, will be understood (as far as the natural phenomena are concerned) by the account given above of the fruiting of the fig-tree, as repeatedly observed by the present writer in the neighborhood of Jerus. When the young leaves are newly appearing, in April, every fig-tree which is going to bear fruit at all will have some taksh ("immature figs") upon it, even though "the time of figs" (Mk 11 13 AV), i.e. of ordinary edible figs—either early or late crop—"was not yet." This taksh is not only eaten today, but it is sure evidence, even when it falls, that the tree bearing it is not barren. This acted parable must be compared with Lk 13 6,9; now the time of judgment was surely coming, the fate of the fruitless Jewish nation was forcibly foretold.

While fresh figs have always been an important article of diet in their season (Neh 13 15), the dried form is even more used. They are

6. Dried Figs today dried in the sun and threaded on strings (like long necklaces) for convenience of carriage. A "cake of figs" (d'bhādhā, lit. "pressed together") is mentioned (1 S 30 12); Abigail gave 200 such cakes of figs to David (25 18); the people of N. Israel sent, with other things, "cakes of figs" as a present to the newly crowned David (1 Ch 12 40). Such masses of figs are much used today—they can be cut into slices with a knife like cheese. Such a mass was used externally for Hezekiah's "boil" (Isa 38 21; 2 K 20 7); it was a remedy familiar to early medical writers.

FIGURE. fig'ūr, fig'yur (פִּגְיוּר, ḥemēl, ḥemēl; ḥemēl, ṭipos): The tr of ḥemēl, or ḥemēl, "a likeness or image"; perhaps a transposition of ḥemēl, the usual word for likeness; it is elsewhere trd "idol" and "image" (Dt 4 16, "the similitude of any figure," RV "in the form of any figure"); of ṭabnūth, "form or likeness" (Isa 44 13, "shapeth it [the idol] . . . after the figure of a man"; cf Dt 4 16); of miṭṭā'ath, "carving," "carved work" (1 K 6 29: "And he carved all the walls of the house round about with carved figures of cherubim and palm-trees and open flowers, within and without," only here and in ver 32, 7 31 where the word is tr^d "carving" and "graving"; in the NT "figure" is the tr of tupos, primarily "a mark," "print," "impression," "something made by blows," hence, "figure," "statue," tropically "form," "manner"; a person bearing the form or figure of another, having a certain resemblance, preceding another to come, model, exemplar (Acts 7 43), "the figures [images] which ye made to worship them"; Rom 5 14, "who is the figure [RV, "a figure"] of him that was to come," that is, the first Adam was a type of the second Adam, Christ; of antitupon, that which corresponds to a type or model (He 9 24 AV, "Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself"); the meaning is simply the correspondence, or likeness (of the tabernacle to heaven), therefore RV renders "like in pattern to the true" (1 Pet 3 21, "the like figure whereunto [even] baptism doth also now save us," i.e. baptism is the antitype of the ark "wherein . . . eight souls were saved [or brought safely] through water," RV "which also after a true likeness [m "in the antitype"] doth now save you, even baptism"); of parabolē, "a placing alongside," a "comparison," "similitude," hence, image, figure, type (He 9 9, "which was a figure for the time then present," ARV "which is a figure for the time present," ERV "parable" and "[now] present," viz. the entrance of the high priest into the Holy of Holies was a type of Christ's entrance into heaven; 11 19, "from whence [from the dead] also he received him in a figure," i.e. Abraham received Isaac back from the dead as it were, in the likeness of a resurrection, he not being actually dead, ARV "from whence he did also in a figure receive him back," ERV "in a parable"); metaschēmattō, "to change the form or appearance," "to transfer figuratively" (1 Cor 4 6, "These things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and Apollos"; the Geneva version reads "I have figuratively described in my own person"). Paul is "substituting himself and Apollos for the teachers most in repute at Corinth that he might thus avoid personality."

"Figure" is supplied in Eccles 49 9, with en ombrō, "He made mention of the enemies under the figure of the rain" RV "He remembered the enemies in storm," m "Gr rain."

RV has "a figure" m "an interpretation," for "the interpretation" (Prov 1 6; the word is m'liqāh, only here and Hab 2 6, meaning properly what is involved and needs interpretation; in Hab 2 6 it is tr^d "taunting proverb," RVm "riddle"); "figured stone" for "image of stone" (Lev 26 1); "figured stones" for "pictures" (Nu 33 52).

FILE, fil: Found only in 1 S 13 21, but the text here is obscure. The Heb (p'cīrah phīm) signifies "bluntness of edge," and is so rendered in RVm. See TOOLS.

FILLET, fil'et (חִטָּה, hūṭ, פֶּשֶׁל, hāshuk):

(1) Hūṭ, from a root not used, meaning probably "to sew," therefore a string or a measuring rod or cord, and so a line, tape, thread, fillet. Jer 52 21 tr^d "line" (AV "fillet"), measuring 12 cubits long, encircling brass pillars standing 18 cubits high, part of the temple treasure plundered by the Chaldeans; and many other things "that were in the house of Jeh, did the Chaldeans break in pieces." Tr^d "thread," used by Rahab, in Josh 2 18, and "cord," "three fold . . . is not quickly broken," in Eccl 4 12.

(2) Hāshuk, from a root meaning "to join" and therefore something joined or attached, and so a rail or rod between pillars, i.e. a fillet. The hangings of the court of the tabernacle were supported by brass pillars set in brass sockets, "The hooks of the pillars and their fillets shall be of silver" (Ex 27 10.11). The embroidered screen for the door of the Tent was supported by five pillars socketed in brass: "And he overlaid their capitals and their fillets with gold" (Ex 36 38). The pillars for the court and the gate of the court had fillets of silver (Ex 36 10 ff). The vb. is used in Ex 27 17; 36 17, "All the pillars of the court were filleted with silver."

FILTH, filth, FILTHINESS, fil'thi-ness, FILTHY, fil'thi (רִצְצָה, ṣō'ah, רִצְצָה, ṣum'ah; ṣurōs, rhupōd): The word once tr^d "filth" in the OT is ṣō'ah, "excrement" or "dung," elsewhere tr^d "dung" (Isa 4 4, used figuratively of evil doings, sin, "the filth of the daughters of Zion"; cf Prov 30 12); in the NT we have perikátharisma, "cleansings," "sweepings," "offscourings" (1 Cor 4 13, "We are made as the filth of the world," RVm "or refuse"); rhūpos, "filth," "dirt," LXX for ṣō'ah in Isa 4 4 (1 Pet 3 21, "the filth of the flesh").

"Filthiness" is the tr of tum'ah, "uncleanness" (ritual, Lev 5 3; 7 20, etc), used figuratively of moral impurity, tr^d "filthiness" (Ezr 6 21; Lam 1 9; Ezk 22 15; 24 11.13 bis; 36 25); niddāh, "impurity" (2 Ch 29 5); figuratively (Ezr 9 11); RV has "uncleanness," but "filthiness" for uncleanness at close of verse (niddāh); n'hōsheth, "brass," figuratively (for "impurity" or "impudence") (Ezr 16 36); aischrōtēs, primarily "ugliness," tropical for unbecomingness, indecency (only Eph 5 4, "nor filthiness, nor foolish talking"; Alford has "obscenity," Weymouth, "shameful"); akathártēs, "uncleanness" (Rev 17 4 AV), corrected text, akátharta, "the unclean things," so RV.

"Filthy" is the tr of ālāh, "to be turbid," to become foul or corrupt in a moral sense (Job 15 16 AV; Ps 14 3; 53 3); iddim, pl. of iddāh, from ādāh, "to number or compute [monthly courses]"; Isa 64 6, "All our righteousnesses are as filthy rags," RV "as a polluted garment"; cf Ezk 36 17; aischros, "ugly," tropical for unbecoming, shameful (Tit 1 11, "for filthy lucre's sake"; cf ver 7); shameful discourse aischrologia (Col 3 8 AV); rhupōd, "filthy," in a moral sense polluted (Rev 22 11, "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still," RV "let him be made filthy still" [corrected text], m "yet more"; Alford, "Let the filthy [morally polluted] pollute himself still" [in the constant middle sense of passive vbs. when the act depends on the man's self]).

In Apoc we have (Eccles 23 1): "A slothful man is compared to a filthy [ardalōō] stone," RV "a stone that is defiled," ver 2 "A slothful man is compared to the filth [ōbilitōn] of a dunghill"; 27 4 "So the filth [skubalon] of a man in his talk [RV, "of man in his reasoning"] remaineth." FIN. See FISH.

FINE, fin (adj., from Lat finire, "to finish"): Indicates superior quality. Only in a few instances does "fine" represent a separate word: (1) ṭōbh, "good," qualifies gold (2 Ch 3 6.8, "fine gold"; cf Gen 2 12, "good"); fine gold (Lam 4 1, AV "most fine gold," RV "most pure gold," lit. "good fine gold"), copper (Ezr 3 27, RV "fine bright brass"); ṭābh, Aram. (Dnl 2 32, "fine gold"). (2) pāz, "refined" (Cant 5 11, "the most fine gold"). (3) hēlēbh, "fatness," "the best of any kind"; cf Gen 45 18; Dt 32 14, etc (Ps 81 16, "the finest of the wheat," RVm Heb "fat of wheat"). (4) sārīṭ, "fine combed" (Isa 19 9, "fine flax," RV "combed flax").

In other places it expresses a quality of the substantive: kethem, "fine gold" (Job 31 24; Dnl 10 5, RV "pure gold"); pds, used as a noun for refined gold (Job 28 17; Ps 19 10; Prov 8 19; Isa 13 12; Lam 4 2); hārūc, "fine gold" (Prov 3 14; cf Ps 68 13, "yellow gold"); gōleth, "flour" rendered "fine flour," rolled or crushed small (Lev 2 1, 4.5.7, etc); semitidalis, "the finest wheaten flour" (Rev 18 13); hemah gōleth, "fine meal" (Gen 18 6); gādhin, "linen garment" (LXX sindōn, Prov 31 24 AV; Isa 3 23); shēsh, "white," "fine linen" (Gen 41 42; Ex 25 4, etc); in Prov 31 22 AV has "silk"; shēsh (Ezk 16 13, "fine flour"); shēn, "what is twisted or spun," "yarn" (Prov 7 16 AV, "fine linen of Egypt," RV "yarn of Egypt"); būc, "fine white cloth," "cotton or linen," "fine linen" (1 Ch 4 21; Ezk 27 16, etc); 2 Ch 5 12, AV "white," RV "fine"; būssos, "byassus," "linen" from būc (LXX for which, 2 Ch 2 14; 3 14), deemed very fine and precious, worn only by the rich (Lk 16 19; Rev 18 12); būssinos, "byssine," made of fine linen, LXX for būc (1 Ch 15 27) (Rev 18 16, "clothed in fine linen," RV "arrayed," 19 8.14); sindōn, "fine linen" (Mk 15 46, "He bought fine linen," RV "a linen cloth"; cf Mk 14 51.52; Mt 27 59; Lk 23 53); it was used for wrapping the body at night, also for wrapping round dead bodies; sindōn is LXX for gādhin (Jgs 14 12.13; Prov 31 24); chalkothanōn (Rev 1 15; 2 18, AV "fine brass").

expressed by the second half of the Gr word. See Thayer's Lexicon (s.v.).

In Apoc we have "fine linen," būssinos (1 Ead 3 6), "fine bread"; the adj. katharós, separate (Jth 10 5, RVm "pure bread"); "fine flour" (Ecclus 35 2; 38 11); semitidalis (Bel ver 3; 2 Macc 1 8, RV "meal offering"). W. L. WALKER FINER, fin'ér, FINING, fin'ing (Prov 25 4 AV). See REFINER.

FINES, fins. See PUNISHMENTS.

FINGER, fin'gér (Heb and Aram. ʔāṣār, 'eṣbā'; δάκτυλος, daktulos): The fingers are to the Oriental essential in conversation; their language is frequently very eloquent and expressive. They often show what the mouth does not dare to utter, esp. grave insult and scorn. The scandalous person is thus described in Prov 6 13 as "teaching" or "making signs with his fingers." Such insulting gestures (compare e.g. the gesture of Shimei in throwing dust or stones at David, 2 S 16 6) are even now not infrequent in Pal. The same habit is alluded to in Isa 58 9 by the expression, "putting forth of fingers."

The fingers were decorated with rings of precious metal, which, with other jewelry worn ostentatiously on the body, often formed the only possession of the wearer, and were therefore carefully guarded. In the same way the law of Jeh was to be kept: "Bind them [my commandments] upon thy fingers; write them upon the tablet of thy heart" (Prov 7 3).

Figurative: In 1 K 12 10 and 2 Ch 10 10 Rehoboam gives the remarkable answer to his dissatisfied people, which is, at the same time, an excellent example of the use of figurative language in the Orient: "My little finger is thicker than my father's loins," a figure explained in the next verse: "Whereas my father did lade you with a heavy yoke,

I will add to your yoke: my father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions." The Heb word used here for little finger is ʔāṣār, lit. "pettiness," "unimportant thing."

The "finger of God," like the "hand of God," is synonymous with power, omnipotence, sometimes with the additional meaning of the infallible evidence of Divine authorship visible in all His works (Ps 8 3; Lk 11 20), esp. in His law (Ex 8 19; 31 18; Dt 9 10; cf Ex 32 15.16).

The finger or digit as a linear measure is mentioned in Jer 52 21 (Gr daktulos; Jos, Ant, VIII, iii, 4). It is equal to one finger-breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a hand-breadth (palm) = 18.6 millimeters or .73 in.

H. L. E. LUBRING
FINGER, fin'gér (ʔāṣār, 'eṣbā): The smallest of the Heb linear measures. It was equal to the breadth of the finger, or about $\frac{1}{4}$ in., four of which made a palm (Jer 52 21). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

FINISH, fin'ish (ʔāṣār, kālāh; τελέω, teleō, with other Heb and Gr words): The proper sense of "finish" is to end or complete; so for "finish," "finished," in AV, there is sometimes met with in RV the change to "complete" (Lk 14 28; 2 Cor 8 6), "accomplish" (Jn 4 34; 5 36; 17 4), "made an end of doing" (2 Ch 4 11; cf 24 14), etc. In Jas 1 15, for "sin, when it is finished," RV reads "sin, when it is full-grown," corresponding to "conceived" of the previous clause. On the other hand, RV has frequently "finished" for other words, as "ended" (Gen 2 2; Dt 31 30), "accomplished" (Jn 19 28), "filled up," "fulfilled" (Rev 16 1.8), etc. The grandest Scriptural example of the word is the cry upon the cross, "It is finished" (Tetelestai, Jn 19 30). W. L. WALKER

FINISHER, fin'ish-ér (τελειωτής, teleiōtēs): This word is applied to Jesus (He 12 2), and comes from teleiōō, "to complete," "to make perfect"; hence it means finisher in the sense of completing; AV "the author and finisher of our faith," RV "the author [in "captain"] and perfecter of our faith"; but "our" is supplied, and in the connection in which the passage stands—after the examples which have been adduced of the power of faith—most probably the best rendering is "the Leader [or Captain] and Perfecter of the Faith," that is of the faith which has been illustrated by those mentioned in ch 11, who are as "a great cloud of witnesses" to the power of faith; but above all "looking to Jesus, our Leader" in whom it was perfected, as is shown in what follows: "who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross," etc. "In His human nature He exhibited Faith in its highest form, from first to last, and placing Himself as it were at the head of the great army of heroes of Faith, He carried Faith, the source of their strength, to its most complete perfection and to its loftiest triumph" (Westcott). FIR, fūr, FIR-TREE (RVm "cypress"; ברוש, brōsh, 2 S 6 5; 1 K 5 8.10, etc; בריתא, brithim [pl. only], an Aram. form, Cant 1 17): This tree was one of the chief trees of Leb-
1. OT anon (Isa 60 13); one of usefulness References (41 19; 55 13); associated with the cedar (2 K 19 23; Ps 104 17; Isa 14 8; Zec 11 2); its boughs were wide and great (Ezk 31 8); it was evergreen (Hos 14 8); it could supply boards and timber for doors (1 K 6 15.24); beams for roofing the temple (2 Ch 3 5); planks for shipbuilding (Ezk 27 5). In 2 S 6 5 we read: "David and all the house of Israel played before Jeh with all manner of instruments made of fir-wood," etc. It is practically certain that the reading in the || passage in 1 Ch 13 8 is more correct: "David and all Israel played before God with all their might, even with songs," etc. This view is supported by the LXX tr (ἐν ᾧ ᾠδὴν ὑμᾶμεν, ἐν ψαλμῷ δυνάμεν). There is therefore no necessity to suppose that b'rōsh was a wood used for musical instruments.

The identity of b'rōsh is uncertain. It was a name applied either to several of the Coniferae in common or to one or more outstanding species. If the latter is the case we can only seek for the most suited to OT requirements. The Aleppo pine, Pinus Halepensis, is a fine tree which flourishes in the Lebanon, but its wood is not of special excellence and durability. A better tree (or couple of trees) is the sherbīn of the Syrians; this name includes two distinct varieties in the suborder Cypressineae, the fine tall juniper, Juniperus excelsa and the cypress, Cypressus sempervirens. They both still occur in considerable numbers in the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon; they are magnificent trees and produce excellent wood—resinous, fragrant, durable. If these trees were not classed locally, as now, under one name, then the cypress is of the two more probably the b'rōsh. The coffins of Egypt mummies were made of cypress; a compact variety of this cypress is cultivated all over the Turkish empire by the Moslems as an ornament in cemeteries. From early times the cypress has been connected with mourning.

In the Apoc there are two definite references to the cypress (κυπάρισσος, kypdrissos). In Sir 24 13, Wisdom says:

"I was exalted like a cedar in Libanus,
And as a cypress tree on the mountains of Hermon."

And in Sir 50 10 the high priest Simon is said to be

"As an olive tree budding forth fruits,
And as a cypress growing high among the clouds."

These passages, esp. the former, certainly favor the idea that b'rōsh was the cypress; the name may, however, have included allied trees.

FIRE, fir (עֵשֶׂה, 'esh; עֵשֶׂה, pur): These are the common words for fire, occurring very frequently. 'Ur, "light" (Isa 24 15 AV; cf RV; 31 9, and see FIRES), nūr (Aram.) (Dnl 3 22 ff) are found a few times, also 'eshshāh (Jer 6 29), and b'ērāh (Ex 22 6), once each. Acts 28 23 has purā, "pyre," and Mk 14 54; Lk 22 56, phōs, "light," RV "in the light [of the fire]." "To set on fire," yāqath (2 S 14 31), lāhaq (Dt 32 22, etc), phlogizō (Jas 3 6).

Fire was regarded by primitive peoples as supernatural in origin and specially Divine. Molech, the fire-god, and other deities were worshipped by certain Canaanitish and other tribes with human sacrifices (Dt 12 31; 2 K 17 31; Ps 106 37), and, although this was specially forbidden to the Israelites (Lev 18 21; Dt 12 31; 18 10), they too often lapsed into the practice (2 K 16 3; 21 6; Jer 7 31; Ezk 20 26.31). See MOLECH; IDOLATRY.

Fire in the OT is specially associated with the Divine presence, e.g. in the making of the Covenant with Abraham (Gen 15 17), in the

1. Literal burning bush (Ex 3 2-4), in the pillar of fire (13 21), on Sinai (19 18), in the flame on the altar (Jgs 13 20).

Jeh was "the God that answereth by fire" (1 K 18 24.38). In the Law, therefore, sacrifices and offerings (including incense) were to be made by fire (Ex 12 8.9.10; Lev 1). Fire from Jeh signified the acceptance of certain special and separate sacrifices (Jgs 6 21; 1 K 18 38; 1 Ch 21 26). In Lev 9 24 the sacrificial fire "came forth from before Jeh." The altar-fire was to be kept continually burning (6 12.13); offering by "strange fire" (other than the sacred altar-fire) was punished by "fire from before Jeh" (10 1.2). Fire came from heaven also at the consecration of Solomon's Temple (2 Ch 7 1).

According to 2 Macc 1 19-22, at the time of the Captivity priests hid the sacred fire in a well, and Nehemiah found it again, in a miraculous way, for the second Temple. Later, Maccabaeus is said to have restored the fire by "striking stones and taking fire out of them" (10 3).

Fire was a frequent instrument of the Divine primitive wrath (Gen 19 24; Ex 9 23 [lightning]; Nu 11 1; 16 35, etc; Ps 104 4, ARV "Who maketh . . . flames of fire his ministers"). Fire shall yet dissolve the world (2 Pet 3 12). It was frequently used by the Israelites as a means of destruction of idolatrous objects and the cities of their enemies (Dt 7 5.25; 12 3; 13 16; Josh 6 24; Jgs, frequently); sometimes also of punishment (Lev 20 14; 21 9; Josh 7 25; 2 Macc 7 5).

The domestic use of fire was, as among other peoples, for heating, cooking, lighting, etc, but according to the Law no fire could be kindled on the Sabbath day (Ex 35 3). It was employed also for melting (32 24), and refining (Nu 31 23; Mal 3 2.3, etc). For the sacrificial fire wood was used as fuel (Gen 22 3.6; Lev 6 12); for ordinary purposes, also charcoal (Prov 25 22; Isa 6 6, RVm "or hot stone"; Hab 3 5, RV "fiery bolts," m "or burning coals"; Jn 21 9, "a fire of coals" RVm "Gr, a fire of charcoal"; Rom 12 20); branches (Nu 15 32; 1 K 17 12); thorns (Ps 58 9; 118 12; Eccl 7 6; Isa 33 12); grass and other herbage (Mt 6 30; Lk 12 28).

Fire was an emblem (1) of Jeh in His glory (Dnl 7 9); (2) in His holiness (Isa 6 4); (3) in His jealousy for His sole worship (Dt 4 24; He 12 29; Ps 79 5; perhaps also Isa

2. Figurative Use 33 14); (4) of His protection of His people (2 K 6 17; Zec 2 5); (5) of His righteous judgment and purification (Zec 13 9; Mal 3 2.3; 1 Cor 3 13.15); (6) of His wrath against sin and punishment of the wicked (Dt 9 3; Ps 18 8; 89 46; Isa 5 24; 30 33, "a Topheth is prepared of old"; Mt 3 10-12; 5 22, RV "the hell of fire," m "Gr, Gehenna of fire"; see Isa 30 33; Jer 7 31; Mt 13 40.42; 25 41, "eternal fire"; Mk 9 45-49; see Isa 66 24; 2 Thess 1 7; He 10 27; Jude ver 7); (7) of the word of God in its power (Jer 5 14; 23 29); (8) of Divine truth (Ps 39 3; Jer 20 9; Lk 12 49); (9) of that which guides men (Isa 50 10.11); (10) of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2 3); (11) of the glorified Christ (Rev 1 14); (12) of kindness in its melting power (Rom 12 20); (13) of trial and suffering (Ps 66 12; Isa 43 2; 1 Pet 1 7; 4 12); (14) of evil (Prov 6 27; 16 27; Isa 9 18; 65 5); lust or desire (Hos 7 6; Sir 23 16; 1 Cor 7 9); greed (Prov 30 16); (15) of the tongue in its evil aspects (Jas 3 5.6); (16) of heaven in its purity and glory (Rev 15 2; see also 21 22.23).

FIREBRAND, fir-brand (עֵשֶׂה, 'adh, used for a burning stick taken out of the fire): In Jgs 15 4.5 describing the "brands" (m "torches") which Samson tied to the foxes' tails, the word is lappidh ("lamp"; see Jgs 7 16.20 RV, "torches"). Other words are zikkim, "sparks," "flames" (fiery darts; Prov 26 18), and zikkōth (Isa 50 11); 'adh is used figuratively of angry men (Isa 7 4), and of those mercifully rescued from destruction (Am 4 11; Zec 3 2; RV "brand"). RV gives "firebrand" as tr of mōkād (AV "hearth") in Ps 103 3, "My bones are burned as a firebrand" (m "as a hearth"). See BRAND.

FIREPAN, fīr'pan (מִזְבֵּחַ, maḥṭāh, "firepan," "censer," "snuffdish," from מִזְבֵּחַ, hāḥāh, "to snatch up"): A vessel for carrying coals. Brazen firepans were part of the furnishings of the altar of burnt offerings (Ex 27 3; 38 3, and in Nu 4 14, where AV wrongly reads "censers," the context indicating a vessel belonging to the brazen altar).

The same word is tr^d "snuffdishes" in Ex 25 38; 37 23; Nu 4 9, where it refers to golden firepans which belonged to the golden candlestick or lamp stand, and were used to receive the burnt ends of the wicks. In 1 K 7 50 and 2 Ch 4 22, although AV reads "censers," the context points to the firepans belonging to the candlestick; as also in 2 K 25 15 and Jer 52 19, tr^d "firepans" in AV and RV. A similar firepan designated by the same Heb word but tr^d "censer" was used to carry the burning coals upon which the incense was thrown and burned (Lev 10 1; 16 12; Nu 16 6.17 ff). See CENSER.

The firepan or censer of the Hebrews was doubtless similar to the censer of the Egyptians, pictures of which have been found. It consisted of a pan or pot for the coals, which was held by a straight or slightly curved long handle. The style of censer used in recent centuries, swung by three chains, came into use about the 12th cent. AD.

GEORGE RICE HOVEY

FIRES, fīr: In Isa 24 15 AV translates מִנְיָן, 'urim ("lights," esp. Urin in the phrase "Urim and Thummim") "fires." RV, understanding the word to mean the region of light, translates "east," which satisfies the context far better, and is adopted by many modern scholars. In Ezk 39 9.10 RV has "fires"; in ver 9 "make fires" is a tr of a vb. of different root; in ver 10 "fires" translates the common sing. noun for fire.

FIRKIN, fūr'kin (μετρητής, metrētēs): The liquid measure used in Jn 2 6 to indicate the capacity of the water-pots mentioned in the narrative of the miracle of turning the water into wine. It is regarded as equivalent to the Heb bath, and thus contained about nine gallons. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

FIRMAMENT, fūr'ma-ment. See ASTRONOMY, III, 3.

FIRST, fūrst (רִאשֹׁן, 'eḥād, רִאשֹׁן, ri'shōn; πρῶτον, prōton, τὸ πρῶτον, tō prōton, πρῶτος, prōtos): Of these words, which are those most frequently used for "first," ri'shōn is from rōsh, "the head," and is used for the highest, chief, etc; also of time, the beginning, e.g. Gen 8 13, "in the first month"; in Isa 44 6; 48 12, it is used of Jeh as Eternal and solely Supreme—the First and the Last (cf 41 4). Special usages are in connection with "firstborn," "first-fruit," etc; prōton is used of that which is first in order; but also of that which is first or chief in importance, etc (Mt 6 33; Jas 3 17). In 1 Tim 1 15, Paul says Jesus came "to save sinners; of whom I am chief," lit. "first"; the same word is used by Jesus of the "first" of the commandments (Mk 12 29); where we read in 1 Cor 15 3, "I delivered unto you first of all," it is en prōtois ("in the foremost place"); "The first and the last" is applied to Christ as Eternal and Supreme (Rev 1 17; 2 8; 22 13); prōtos is "the first day" (Mt 26 17; Mk 16 9); in Mt 28 1; Mk 16 2; Lk 24 1; Jn 20 1.19; Acts 20 7, it is mta ("one").

FIRST-BEGOTTEN, fūrst-bē-got (πρωτότοκος, prōtōtokos): This Gr word is tr^d in two passages in AV by "first-begotten" (He 1 6; Rev 1 5), but in all other places in AV, and always in RV, by "firstborn." It is used in its natural literal sense of Jesus Christ as Mary's firstborn (Lk 2 7; Mt 1 25 AV); it also bears the literal sense of the first-born of men and animals (He 11 28). It is not used in the NT or LXX of an only child, which is expressed by monogenēs (see below).

Metaphorically, it is used of Jesus Christ to express at once His relation to man and the universe and His difference from them, as both He and they are related to God. The laws and customs of all nations show that to be "firstborn" means, not only priority in time, but a certain superiority in privilege and authority. Israel is Jeh's firstborn among the nations (Ex 4 22; cf Jer 31 9). The Messianic King is God's firstborn (LXX prōtōtokos), "the highest of the kings of the earth" (Ps 89 27). Philo applies the word to the Logos as the archetypal and governing idea of creation. Similarly Christ, as "the firstborn of all creation" (Col 1 15), is not only prior to it in time, but above it in power and authority. "All things have been created through him, and unto him" (ver 16). He is "sovereign Lord over all creation by virtue of primo-geniture" (Lightfoot). It denotes His status and character and not His origin; the context does not admit the idea that He is a part of the created universe. So in His incarnation He is brought into the world as "firstborn," and God summons all His angels to worship Him (He 1 6). In His resurrection He is "firstborn from the dead" (Col 1 18) or "of the dead" (Rev 1 5), the origin and prince of life. And finally He is "firstborn among many brethren" in the consummation of God's purpose of grace, when all the elect are gathered home. Not only is He their Lord, but also their pattern, God's ideal Son, and men are "foreordained to be conformed to [his] image" (Rom 8 29). Therefore the saints themselves, as growing in His likeness, and as possessing all the privileges of eldest sons, including the kingdom and the priesthood, may be called the "church of the firstborn who are enrolled in heaven" (He 12 23). See also BEGOTTEN, and Lightfoot on Col 1 15.

FIRSTBORN, fūrst'bōrn, FIRSTLING, fūrst'ling (בְּכֹרֶת, b'khor; πρωτότοκος, prōtōtokos): The Heb word denotes the firstborn of human beings as well as of animals (Ex 11 5), while a word from the same root denotes first-fruits (Ex 23 16). All the data point to the conclusion that among the ancestors of the Hebrews the sacrifice of the firstborn was practised, just as the firstlings of the flocks and the first-fruits of the produce of the earth were devoted to the deity. The narrative of the Moabite war records the sacrifice of the heir to the throne by Measha, to Chemosh, the national god (2 K 3 27). The barbarous custom must have become extinct at an early period in the religion of Israel (Gen 22 12). It was probably due to the influence of surrounding nations that the cruel practice was revived toward the close of the monarchical period (2 K 16 3; 17 17; 21 6; Jer 7 31; Ezk 16 20; 23 37; Mic 6 7). Jeremiah denies that the offering of human beings could have been an instruction from Yahweh (7 31; 19 5). The prophetic conception of God had rendered such a doctrine inconceivable. Clear evidence of the spiritualization and humanization of religion among the Israelites is furnished in the replacement, at an early stage, of the actual sacrifice of the firstborn by their dedication to the service of Yahweh. At a later stage the Levites were substituted for the firstborn. Just as the firstlings of unclean animals were redeemed with money (Ex 13 13; 34 20), for the dedication of the firstborn was substituted the consecration of the Levites to the service of the sanctuary (Nu 3 11–13.45). On the 30th day after birth the firstborn was brought to the priest by the father, who paid five shekels for the child's redemption from service in the temple (cf Lk 2 27; Mish B'khorōth viii.8). For that service the Levites were accepted in place of the redeemed firstborn (Nu 3 45). See note. According to Ex 22 29-31 the firstborn were to be given to Yahweh. (The firstborn of clean animals, if free from spot or blemish, were to be sacrificed after eight days, Nu 18 16 ff.) This allusion to the sacrifice of the firstborn as part of the religion of Yahweh has been variously explained. Some scholars suspect the text, but in all probability the verse means no more than similar references to the fact that the firstborn belonged to Yahweh (Ex 13 2; 34 19). The modifying clause, with regard to the redemption of the firstborn, has been omitted. The firstborn possessed definite privileges which were denied to other members of the family. The Law forbade the disinheriting of the firstborn (Dt 21 15-17). Such legislation, in polygamous times, was necessary to prevent a favorite wife from exercising undue influence over her husband in distributing his property, as in the case of Jacob (Gen 25 23). The oldest son's share was twice as large as that of any other son. When Elisha prayed for a double portion of Elijah's spirit, he simply wished to be considered the firstborn, i.e. the successor, of the dying prophet. Israel was Yahweh's firstborn (Ex 4 22; cf Jer 31 9 [Ephraim]). Israel, as compared with other nations, was entitled to special privileges. She occupied a unique position in virtue of the special relationship between Yahweh and the nation. In three passages (Rom 8 29; Col 1 15; He 1 6), Jesus Christ is the firstborn—among many brethren (Rom 8 29); of every creature (Col 1 16). This application of the term to Jesus Christ may be traced back to Ps 89 27 where the Davidic ruler, or perhaps the nation, is alluded to as the firstborn of Yahweh. See CHILD; CIRCUMCISION; FIRST-BEGOTTEN; PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

NOTE.—The custom of redeeming the firstborn son is preserved among the Jews to this day. After thirty days the father invites the "Kohen," i.e. a supposed descendant of Aaron, to the house. The child is brought and shown to the "Kohen," and the father declares the mother of the child to be an Israelite. If she is a "Kohen," redemption is not necessary. The "Kohen" asks the father which he prefers, his child or the five shekels; the father answers that he prefers his son, and pays to the "Kohen" a sum equivalent to five shekels. After receiving the redemption-money, the "Kohen" puts his hands on the child's head and pronounces the Aaronite blessing (Nu 6 22-27).

FIRST-FRUIT, fürst'-fröots (רֵאשִׁית, rē'shūth, רֵאשִׁית, bikkūrim; ἀπαρχή, aparchē. LXX translates rē'shūth by aparchē, but for bikkūrim it uses the word protogennēmatā; cf Philo 22 33): In acknowledgment of the fact that the land and all its products were the gift of Jeh to Israel, and in thankfulness for His bounty, all the first-fruits were offered to Him. These were offered in their natural state (e.g. cereals, tree fruits, grapes), or after preparation (e.g. musk, oil, flour, dough), after which the Israelite was at liberty to use the rest (Ex 23 19; Nu 15 20; 18 12; Dt 26 2; Neh 10 35.37). No absolute distinction can be made between rē'shūth and bikkūrim, but rē'shūth seems generally to mean what is prepared by human labor, and bikkūrim the direct product of Nature. The phrase "the first of the first-fruits" (Ex 23 19; 34 26; Ezk 44 30), Heb rē'shūth bik-kūrē, Gr aparchat tōn protogennēmatōn, is not quite clear. It may mean the first-ripe or the choicest of the first-fruits. The rē'shūth offerings were individual, except that a rē'shūth of dough was to be offered as a heave offering (Nu 15 17-21). The priest waved a rē'shūth of corn before the Lord on the morrow after the Sabbath in the week of unleavened bread (Lev 23 9-11). These offerings all fell to the priest (Nu 18 12). Bikkūrim refers specially to things sown (Ex 23 16; Lev 2 14). At the Feast of Weeks, seven weeks after the offering of the sheaf, bikkūrim of corn in the ear, parched with fire and bruised, were brought to the House of the Lord as a meal offering (Ex 34 22-26; Lev 2 14-16). The bikkūrim also fell to the priest, except a portion which was burned as a memorial (Lev 2 8-10.16). The beautiful ceremony of the offering of the rē'shūth in the House of God is described in Dt 26 1-11, and is enlarged upon in the Talm (Bikkūrim 3 2). According to the Talm (T'rāmōth 4 3) a sixtieth part of the first-fruits in a prepared form was the minimum that could be offered; the more generous brought a fortieth part, and even a thirtieth. The fruits of newly planted trees were not to be gathered during the first three years; the fruits of the fourth year were consecrated to Jeh, and from the fifth year the fruits belonged to the owner of the trees (Lev 19 23-25). According to Mish, Orlāh i.10, even the shells of nuts and pomegranates could not be used during the first three years as coloring matter or for the lighting of fires. It is held by some scholars that the institution of the tithe (see TITHE) is a later development from the first-fruits.

Figurative: In the OT, in Jer 2 3, Israel is called "the rē'shūth of his increase." In the NT aparchē is applied fig. to the first convert or converts in a particular place (Rom 16 5; 1 Cor 16 15); to the Christians of that age (Jas 1 18; 2 Thes 2 13, WHm), and to the 144,000 in heaven (Rev 14 4); to Christ, as the first who rose from the dead (1 Cor 15 20.23); also to the blessings which we receive now through the Spirit, the earnest of greater blessings to come (Rom 8 23). FISH (דָּג, dāgh, דָּגִים, dāghāh, דָּגָה, dā'gh; ἰχθύς, ichthūs, ἰχθυόων, ichthūōon, ἰχθυόων, op-sirion): Fishes abound in the inland

1. Natural waters of Pal as well as the Mediterranean. They are often mentioned or indirectly referred to both in the OT and in the NT, but it is remarkable that no particular kind is distinguished by name. In Lev 11 9-12 and Dt 14 9 f, "whatsoever hath fins and scales in the waters" is declared clean, while all that "have not fins and scales" are forbidden. This excluded not only reptiles and amphibians, but also, among fishes, siluroids and eels, sharks, rays and lampreys. For our knowledge of the inland fishes of Pal we are mainly indebted to Tristram, NHB and Fauna and Flora of Pal; Lortet, Poissons et reptiles du Lac de Tibériade; and Russeger, Reisen in Europa, Asien, Afrika, 1835-1841. The most remarkable feature of the fish fauna of the Jordan valley is its relationship to that of the Nile and of E. Central Africa. Two Nile fishes, Chromis nilotica Hasselquist, and Clarias macracanthus Gunth., are found in the Jordan valley, and a number of other species found only in the Jordan valley belong to genera (Chromis and Hemichromis) which are otherwise exclusively African. This seems to indicate that at some time, probably in the early Tertiary, there was some connection between the Palestinian and African river systems. No fish can live in the Dead Sea, and many perish through being carried down by the swift currents of the Jordan and other streams. There are, however, several kinds of small fish which live in salt springs on the borders of the Dead Sea, springs which are as salt as the Dead Sea but which, according to Lortet, lack the magnesium chloride which is a constituent of the Dead Sea water and is fatal to the fish. Capoëta damascina Cuv. and Val., one of the commonest fishes of Syria and Pal, has been taken by the writer in large numbers in the Arnon and other streams flowing into the Dead Sea. This is surprising in view of the fact that the Dead Sea seems to form an effective barrier between the fishes of the different streams flowing into it. The indiscriminate mention of use of the casting net requires much skill. It forms a circle of from 10 to 20 feet in diameter with numerous small leaden weights at the circumference. It is lifted by the center and carefully gathered over the right arm. When well thrown it goes to some distance, at the same time spreading out into a wide circle. A cord may be attached to the center, but this is not always the case. When lifted again by the center, the leads come together, dragging over the bottom, and sometimes a large number of fish may be inclosed. The novice has only to try, to realize the dexterity of the practised fishermen.

Figurative: The fact that so many of Our Lord's disciples were fishermen lends a profound interest to their profession. Christ tells Simon and Andrew (Mt 4 19; Mk 1 17) that He will make them fishers of men. The Kingdom of Heaven (Mt 13 47) is likened unto a net that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind; which, when it was filled, they drew up on the beach; and they sat down and gathered the good into vessels, but the bad they cast away. Tristram (NHB) says that he has seen the fishermen go through their net and throw out into the sea those that were too small for the market or were considered unclean. In Jer 16 16, we read: "Behold, I will send for many fishers, saith Jeh, and they shall fish them up; and afterward I will send for many hunters, and they shall hunt them from every mountain, and from every hill, and out of the clefts of the rocks." In the vision of Ezekiel (Ezk 47 9 f), the multitude of fish and the nets spread from En-gedi to En-eglaim are marks of the marvelous change wrought in the Dead Sea by the stream issuing from the temple. The same sign, i.e. of the spreading of nets (Ezk 26 5, 14), marks the desolation of Tyre. It is a piece of broiled fish that the risen Lord eats with the Eleven in Jerus (Lk 24 42), and by the Sea of Galilee (Jn 21 13) He gives the disciples bread and fish.

ALFRED ELY DAY

FISHER, fish'er, FISHERMAN, fish'er-man (פִּשְׁרִי, dayyāgh, פִּשְׁרִי, dayyāgh; ἁλιεύς, halieus; WH halieus): Although but few references to fishermen are made in the Bible, these men and their calling are brought into prominence by Jesus' call to certain Galilee fishermen to become His disciples (Mt 4 18, 19; Mk 1 16, 17). Fishermen, then as now, formed a distinct class. The strenuousness of the work (Lk 5 2) ruled out the weak and indolent. They were crude in manner, rough in speech and in their treatment of others (Lk 9 49, 54; Jn 18 10). James and John before they became tempered by Jesus' influence were nicknamed the "sons of thunder" (Mk 3 17). The fishermen's exposure to all kinds of weather made them hardy and fearless. They were accustomed to bear with patience many trying circumstances. They often toiled for hours without success, and yet were always ready to try once more (Lk 5 5; Jn 21 3). Such men, when impelled by the same spirit as filled their Master, became indeed "fishers of men" (Mt 4 19; Mk 1 17).

One of the striking instances of the fulfilment of prophecy is the use by the Syrian fishermen today of the site of ancient Tyre as a place for the spreading of their nets (Ezk 26 5, 14).

Figurative: Fish were largely used as food (Hab 1 16), hence the lamentation of the fishermen, who provided for all, typified general desolation (Isa 19 8). On the other hand, abundance of fish and many fishermen indicated general abundance (Ezk 47 10). Our modern expression, "treated like a dog," had its counterpart in the language of the OT writers, when they portrayed the punished people of Judah as being treated like fish. Jeh would send many fishers to fish them up and put sticks or hooks through their cheeks as a fisherman strings his fish (Jer 16 16; Job 41 2). Such treatment of the people of Judah is depicted on some of the Assyrian monuments.

fishes without reference to the different kinds is well illustrated by the numerous passages in which "the fishes of the sea, the birds of the heavens, and the beasts of the field," or some equivalent expression, is used to denote all living creatures, e.g. Gen 1 26; 9 2; Nu 11 22; Dt 4 18; 1 K 4 33; Job 12 8; Ps 8 8; Ezk 33 20; Hos 4 3; Zeph 1 3; 1 Cor 15 39.

An unusually large shark might fulfil the conditions of Jonah's fish (dāgh, dāghāh; but Mt 12 40, κῆτος, kētos, "whale" or "sea monster"). The whale that is found in the Fish Mediterranean (Balaena australis) has a narrow throat and could not swallow a man. No natural explanation is possible of Jonah's remaining alive and conscious for three days in the creature's belly. Those who consider the book historical must regard the whole event as miraculous. For those who consider it to be a story with a purpose, no explanation is required.

Carp Found in the Sea of Galilee (PEF Drawing).

The present inhabitants of Moab and Edom make no use of the fish that swarm in the Arnon, the Hula and other streams, but fishing is an important industry in Galilee and Western Pal. Now, as formerly, spear hooks and nets are employed. The fish-spear (Job 41 7) is little used. Most of the OT references to nets have to do with the taking of birds and beasts and not of fishes, and, while in Hab 1 15 šērem is rendered "net" and miḥmereth "drag," it is not clear that these and the other words rendered "net" refer to particular kinds of nets. In the NT, however, καὶν, agōn (Mt 13 47), is clearly the dragnet, and ἀμφιβάλλον, amphiballon (Mt 4 18), is clearly the casting net. The word oftenest used is ἀρσεν, diktikon. Though this word is from diktōn, "to throw," or "to cast," the context in several places (e.g. Lk 5 4; Jn 21 11) suggests that a dragnet is meant. The dragnet may be several hundred feet long. The upper edge is buoyed and the lower edge is weighted. It is let down from a boat in a line parallel to the shore and is then pulled in by ropes attached to the two ends, several men and boys usually pulling at each end. The present day along the seashores of Pal. Two of these, dynamiting and poisoning with the juice of cyclamen bulbs or other poisonous plants, can be passed over as having no bearing on ancient methods.

FISHER'S COAT, kôt: This expression is found in Jn 21 7 where RV and ARV have "coat." John here, after representing Peter as "naked" (γυμνός, gumnós), pictures him as girding on his "coat" (ἐνδύμενος, ependúlēs), lit. "upper garment," and not at all specifically a "fisher's coat." See DRESS; UPPER GARMENT, etc.

(1) With hooks: Some fishing is done with hooks and lines, either on poles when fishing from shore, or on trawls in deep-sea fishing. The fishhooks now used are of European origin, but bronze fish-

FISHERS MENDING THEIR NETS BY THE SEA OF GALILEE.

FISHHOOK, fish'hōök (פִּשְׁתִּיק, šir dūghāh, פִּשְׁתִּיק, hakkāh): The word "fishhooks" occurs but twice in ARV (Job 41 1; Am 4 2). In other passages the word "hook" or "angle" is applied to this instrument for fishing (Isa 19 8; Job 41 2). The ancient Egyp noblemen used to amuse themselves by fishing from their private fishpools with hook and line. The Egyp monuments show that the hook was quite commonly used for catching fish. The hook is still used in Bible lands, although not as commonly as nets. It is called a šinnārah, probably from the same root as šinnāh, the pl. of which is tr^d hooks in Am 4 2. In Mt 17 27, ἀγκίστρον, āgkistron (lit. "fishhook"), is rendered "hook."

JAMES A. PATCH

FISHING, fish'ing (ἀλιεύω, halieúō): Several methods of securing fish are resorted to at the hooks of a very early date have been discovered. That fishing with hooks was known in Jesus' time is indicated by the Master's command to Peter (Mt 17 27). See FISHHOOK.

(2) With spears: Job 41 7 probably refers to an instrument much like the barbed spear still used along the Syrian coast. It is used at night by torchlight.

(3) With nets: In the most familiar Bible stories of fisherman life a net was used. Today most of the fishing is done in the same way. These nets are homemade. Frequently one sees the fishermen or members of their families making nets or repairing old ones during the stormy days when fishing is impossible.

Nets are used in three ways: (a) A circular net, with small meshes and leaded around the edge, is cast from the shore into the shallow water in such a manner that the leaded edge forms the base of a cone, the apex being formed by the fisherman holding the center of the net in his hand. The cone thus formed incloses such fish as cannot escape the quick throw of the fisher. (b) A long net or seine of one or two fathoms depth, leaded on one edge and provided with floats on the other, is payed out from boats in such a way as to surround a school of fish. Long ropes fastened to the two ends are carried ashore many yards apart, and from five to ten men on each rope gradually draw in the net. The fish are then landed from the shallow water with small nets or by hand. This method is commonly practised on the shore of the Sea of Galilee. (c) In deeper waters a net similar to that described above, but four or five fathoms deep, is cast from boats and the ends slowly brought together so as to form a circle. Men then dive down and bring one portion of the weighted edge over under the rest, so as to form a bottom. The compass of the net is then narrowed, and the fish are emptied from the net into the boat. Sometimes the net with the fish inclosed is towed into shallow water before drawing. The above method is probably the one the disciples used (Mt 4 18; Mk 1 16; Lk 5 2-10; Jn 21 3-11). Portions of nets with leads and floats, of early Egypt origin, may be seen in the British Museum. See Net.

The fishermen today usually work with their garments girdled up about their waists. Frequently they wear only a loose outer garment which is wet much of the time. This garment can be quickly removed by pulling it over the head, when occasion requires the fisherman to jump into the sea. If methods have not changed, Peter had probably just climbed back into the boat after adjusting the net for drawing when he learned that it was Jesus who stood on the shore. He was literally naked and pulled on his coat before he went ashore (Jn 21 7).

JAMES A. PATCH

FISHPOOLS, fish'pools: This is a mistranslation. The Heb פְּרָכֹת, brēkhōth (Cant 7 4) simply means "pools" (RV); "fish" is quite unwarrantably introduced in AV. In Isa 19 10, again, instead of "all that make sluices and ponds for fish" (AV), we should certainly read, with RV, "All they that work for hire shall be grieved in soul."

FIT, FITLY, fit'li: The word "fit" (adj. and vb.) occurs a few times, representing nearly as many Heb and Gr words. RV frequently alters, as in Lev 16 21 ('ūti, "timely," "opportune," "ready"), where for "fit" it reads, "in readiness," m "appointed." In 1 Ch 7 11 RV has "that were able"; in Isa 44 13, "shapeth"; in Prov 24 27, "ready," etc. "Fitly" in Prov 25 11 is in RVm "in due season"; in Cant 5 12, "fitly set" is in RVm "sitting by full streams." In the NT "fit" is the tr of eúthetos, "well placed" (Lk 9 62; 14 35), of kathēkon, "suitable" (Acts 22 22), and of katarizō, "to make quite ready" (Rom 9 22, "vessels of wrath fitted unto destruction"). W. L. WALKER

FITCHES, fich'iz (the Eng. word "fitch" is the same as "vetch"):

(1) קֶצֶחַ, keṣaḥ (Isa 28 25, 27; RVm has "black cummin" [Nigella sativa]). This is the "nutmeg flower," an annual herb (N.O. Ranunculaceae), the black seeds of which are sprinkled over some kinds of bread in Pal. They were used as a condiment by the ancient Greeks and Romans. These seeds have a warm aromatic flavor and are carminative in their properties, assisting digestion. They, like all such plants which readily yield their seed, are still beaten out with rods. The contrast between the stouter staff for the "fitches" and the lighter rod for the cummin is all the more noticeable when the great similarity of the two seeds is noticed.

(2) קֶצֶחַיִם, keṣṣāyim (pl.) (Ezk 4 9) RV "spelt" (which see). E. W. G. MASTERMAN FIVE, fiv (חָמֵשׁ, hāmēsh; πέντε, pente). See NUMBER.

FLAG: Two Heb words:

(1) זָרָע, zūph (Ex 2 3, 5, "flags"; Isa 19 6, "flags"; Jon 2 5, "weeds"). This is apparently a general name which includes both the fresh-water weeds growing along a river bank and "seaweeds." The Red Sea was known as Yam zūph.

(2) אֵשׁ, 'āhū (Gen 41 2, 18, AV "meadow," RV "reed-grass"; Job 8 11, "Can the rush grow up without mire? Can the flag [m "reed-grass"] grow without water?"). Some such general term as "sedges" or "fens" would better meet the requirements.

FLAGON, flag'un: The tr of פֶּתִיחַ, 'dshishāh, in AV in 2 S 6 19; 1 Ch 16 3; Cant 2 5; Hos 3 1. In all these passages RV reads "cake of raisins" or "raisins." It was probably a pressed raisin cake. AV and RV read "flagons," in Isa 22 24 as a rendering of נִבְלִים, nbhālīm, which is elsewhere (1 S 1 24; 10 3; 2 S 16 1, etc) rendered "bottles," RVm "skins." These were the bags or bottles made of the whole skin of a kid, goat or other animal. RV has "flagons" in Ex 25 29 and 37 16 as tr of קֶשֶׁת, keṣhāwōth, a golden jug or jar used in the tabernacle from which the drink offerings were poured out. The same word is tr "cups" in Nu 4 7. GEORGE RICH HOVER

FLAKE, flāk (פֶּקֶל, mappāl, a word of uncertain meaning): It is used in the sense of "refuse [husks] of the wheat" in Am 6 8. With regard to the body we find it used in Job 41 23 in the description of leviathan (the crocodile): "The flakes of his flesh are joined together: they are firm upon him; they cannot be moved." Baethgen in Kautzsch's tr of the OT translates "Wampen," i.e. the collaps or lateral folds of flesh and armored skin. A better tr would perhaps be: "the horny epidermic scales" of the body, differentiated from the bony dermal scutes of the back (Heb "channels of shields," "courses of scales"), which are mentioned in ver 15 m. H. L. E. LUERING

FLAME, flām (לָהָב, lahabh, and other forms from same root; פֶּלֶא, phlōz): In Jgs 13 20 bis; Job 41 21; Isa 29 6; Joel 2 5, the word is lahabh. Various other words are tr "flame"; mas'ēh, "a lifting or rising up" (Jgs 20 38, 40 AV), RV "cloud" (of smoke); kālil, "completeness" (Jgs 20 40b AVm, "a holocaust, or offering wholly consumed by fire"; cf Lev 6 15); shalhebheth (Job 15 30; Cant 8 6; ARV "a very flame of Jeh," m "or, a most vehement flame"; Ezk 20 47, RV "the flaming flame"); shābhēbh (Job 18 5; RVm); sh'bhēbh, Aram. (Dnl 3 22; 7 9). In Ps 104 4 ARV has "maketh . . . flames of fire his ministers"; RV "flame" for "snare" (Prov 29 8).

Figuratively: "Flame" is used to denote excitement (Prov 29 8 RV), shame, astonishment, "faces of flame" (Isa 13 8); in Rev 1 14, the glorified Christ is described as having eyes "as a flame of fire," signifying their searching purity (cf 2 18; 19 12). Flame is also a symbol of God's wrath (Ps 83 14; Isa 5 24; 10 17). See also FIRE.

FLAT NOSE (חָרָם, hārum; LXX κολοβόριν, kolobórin): Used only in Lev 21 18 as the name of a deformity which disqualified a member of a priestly family for serving the altar. The root of the word signifies "to cut off" or "to cut flat," and in RVm "slit nose" is substituted. The condition indicated is most probably the depressed, flattened nose which so often accompanies harelip, esp. in its double form. A mere snub-nose can scarcely be regarded as a blemish of sufficient importance to unfit a priest for the service of "offering the bread of God"; but harelip, like blindness or the other congenital malformations or deformities enumerated in this passage, might well render a son of Aaron unfit or unsuitable for public religious duty. ALEX. MACALISTER

FLAX, flaks (פֶּשֶׁת, pesheth, also פִּשְׁתִּית, pishtit; אֲרֶב, linon [Mt 12 20]): The above Heb words are applied (1) to the plant: "The flax was in bloom" (AV "balled"; Ex 9 31); (2) the "stalks of flax," lit. "flax of the tree," put on the roof to dry (Josh 2 6); (3) to the fine fibers used for lighting: AV "tow," "flax," RV. "A dimly burning wick will be not quenched" (Isa 42 3); "They are quenched as a wick" (Isa 43 17). The thought is perhaps of a scarcely lighted wick just kindled with difficulty from a spark. (4) In Isa 19 9 mention is made of "combed flax," i.e. flax hackled ready for spinning (cf Hos 2 5.9; Prov 31 13). The reference in Jgs 15 14 is to flax twisted into cords. (5) In Jgs 16 9; Isa 1 31, mention is made of פִּשְׁתִּית, ne'reth, "tow," lit. something "shaken off"—as the root implies—from flax. (6) The pl. form pishtim is used in many passages for linen, or linen garments, e.g. Lev 13 47.48.52 59; Dt 22 11; Jer 13 1 ("linen girdle"); Eek 44 17f. Linen was in the earliest historic times a favorite material for clothes. The Jewish priestly garments were of pure linen. Egypt mummies were swathed in linen. Several other Heb words were used for linen garments. See LINEN.

Flax is the product of Linum usitatissimum, a herbaceous plant which has been cultivated from the dawn of history. It is perennial and grows to a height of 2 to 3 ft.; it has blue flowers and very fibrous stalks. The tough fibers of the latter, after the decay and removal of the softer woody and gummy material, make up the crude "flax." Linseed, linseed oil and oilcake are useful products of the same plant. FLEA, flē (פָּרָשָׁה, par'sah; cf Arab. barghāt, "flea," and barghash, "mosquito" [1 S 24 14; 26 20]; פָּרָשָׁה, par'sah [Ex 8 16], "lice," RVm "sand-flies" or "fleas"; LXX σκνίπες, sknīpēs, probably best rendered "gnat"; see GNAT; LICE): In 1 S 24 Saul seeks David in the wilderness of En-gedi, and David, after cutting off the skirt of Saul's robe in the cave, calls out to him, "After whom is the king of Israel come out? after whom dost thou pursue? after a dead dog, after a flea" (ver 14). Again in 1 S 26 20 Saul seeks David in the wilderness of Ziph, and David after taking the spear and cruse from beside Saul while he slept, cries out to him, "... the king of Israel is come out to seek a flea, as when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains." The flea is here used as a symbol of David's insignificance, coupled perhaps, in the second passage, with a thought of the difficulty that Saul had in laying hands on him. In EB Cheyne finds fault with a similar interpretation given in DB on the ground that it is absurd that David should refer to hunting "a single flea," and proposes to change par'sah 'ehādāh, "a flea," to perē midbār, "wild ass of the desert." The writer will only say that no observant resident of Pal would consider the textual alteration to be called for.

Linnaeus recognized two species of flea, Pulex irritans, the common parasite of man, and Pulex (Sarcophylla) penetrans, the tropical and sub-tropical jigger flea. More than a hundred species are now listed, and the recent discovery that certain fleas are instrumental in the transmission of the plague has given a new impetus to the study of these tiny pests. A flea that is often commoner in houses than Pulex irritans is the "dog and cat flea," variously known as Pulex serraticaps, Pulex canis, Pulex felis or Ctenocephalus canis.

FLEE, flē. See FLY.

FLEECE, flēs. See GIDEON; SHEEP; WOOL.

FLESH (בָּשָׂר, bāsar, מִנְצָה, sh'ar): Used in all senses of the word, the latter, however, most frequently in the sense of kin, family, 1. Ety- relationship (cf מִנְצָה, sha'arāh, "kin-mology woman," Lev 18 17; Lev 18 6; 25 49; Prov 11 17; Jer 51 35, and probably Ps 73 26. In all other places sh'ar means "flesh"=body (Prov 5 11) or=food (Ps 73 20.27; Mic 3 2.3). מִנְצָה, sh'ar, is "[slaughtered] flesh for food," "butcher's meat" (1 S 25 11). The word בָּשָׂר, 'eshār, found only in two passages (2 S 6 19=1 Ch 16 3), is of very uncertain meaning. The Eng. VSS translate it with "a good piece [portion] of flesh," the Vulg with "a piece of roast meat," others with "a portion of flesh" and "a measure of wine." It probably means simply "a measured portion." לֶחֶם, lahēm, lit. "eaten," then food (cf לֶחֶם, lehem, "bread"), has been rarely specialized as flesh or meat (cf Arab. lahm, "meat," "flesh," so in Zeph 1 17, where it stands in parallelism with "blood"). The Gr terms are σὰρξ, sārx, and σπῆς, spēs, the latter always meaning "butcher's meat" (Rom 14 21; 1 Cor 8 13).

We can distinguish the following varieties of meaning in Bib. language:

In a physical sense, the chief substance of the animal body, whether used for food and sacrifice, or not; also the flesh of man (Gen 2 2. Ordinary 21; Ex 21 10m; Isa 51 3; Eek 23 Sense 20; 1 Cor 15 39; Rev 19 18.21).

The whole body. This meaning is the extension of the preceding (pars pro toto). This is indicated by the LXX, where bāsar is often tr^d by the pl. αἶμα, hai sārkes (Gen 40 19; Nu 12 12; Job 33 25), and occasionally by σῶμα, sōma, i.e. "body" (Lev 15 2; 1 K 21 27). This meaning is also very clear in passages 3. The Body like the following: Ex 4 7; Lev 17 14; Nu 8 7; 2 K 4 34; Prov 5 11, where bāsār and sh'ēr are combined; and Prov 14 30; Eccl 12 12.

Flesh, as the common term for living things, animals and men, esp. the latter (Gen 6 13, 17, 19; Nu 16 22; Jer 12 12; Mk 13 20); often in the phrase "all flesh" (Ps 66 2; Isa 40 5, 6; Jer 25 31; Ezk 20 48; Joel 2 28; Lk 3 6).

Flesh as opposed to the spirit, both of which were comprised in the preceding meaning (Gen 6 3; Ps 16 9; Lk 24 39, where "flesh and bones" are combined; Jn 6 63).

4. The Term "All Flesh" 5. As Opposed to the Spirit Thus we find in Jn 1 14, "The Word became flesh"; 1 Tim 3 16, "He who was manifested in the flesh"; 1 Jn 4 2, and all passages where the incarnation of Christ is spoken of. The word in this sense approaches the meaning of "earthly life," as in Phil 1 22, 24, "to live in the flesh," "to abide in the flesh"; of Philm ver 16 and perhaps 2 Cor 5 16. Under this meaning we may enumerate expressions such as "arm of flesh" (2 Ch 32 8; Jer 17 5), "eyes of flesh" (Job 10 4), etc. Frequently the distinction is made to emphasize the weakness or inferiority of the flesh, as opposed to the superiority of the spirit (Isa 31 3; Mt 26 41; Mk 14 38; Rom 6 19). In this connection we mention also the expression "flesh and blood," a phrase borrowed from rabbinical writings and phraseology (see also Sir 14 13, "the generation of flesh and blood," and 17 31, "man whose desire is flesh and blood" AV). The expression does not convey, as some have supposed, the idea of inherent sinfulness of the flesh (a doctrine borrowed by gnostic teachers from oriental sources), but merely the idea of ignorance and frailty in comparison with the possibilities of spiritual nature. The capabilities of our earthly constitution do not suffice to reveal unto us heavenly truths; these must always come to us from above. So St. Peter's first recognition of the Divine sonship of Jesus did not proceed from a logical conviction based upon outward facts acting upon his mind, but was based upon a revelation from God vouchsafed to his inner consciousness. Christ says therefore to him: "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jonah: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven" (Mt 16 17). Similarly the kingdom of God, being a realm of perfect spiritual submission to God, cannot be inherited by flesh and blood (1 Cor 15 50), nor was the richly endowed mind a competent tribunal to which St. Paul could refer his heaven-wrought conviction of his great salvation and the high calling to be a witness and apostle of Christ, so he did well that he "conferred not with flesh and blood" (Gal 1 16). That "flesh and blood" does not imply a sense of inherent sinfulness is moreover shown in all passages where Christ is declared a partaker of such nature (Eph 6 12; He 2 14, where, however, we find in the original text the inverted phrase "blood and flesh").

Flesh in the sense of carnal nature (σάρκιος, sārkikos, "carnal"; AV uses sarkinos in Rom 7 14).

6. Applied to the Carnal Nature Human nature, being inferior to the spiritual, is to be in subjection to it. If man refuses to be under this higher law, and as a free agent permits the lower nature to gain an ascendancy over the spirit, the "flesh" becomes a revolting force (Gen 6 3, 12; Jn 1 13; Rom 7 14; 1 Cor 3 1, 3; Col 2 18; 1 Jn 2 16). Thus the fleshly or carnal mind, i.e. a mind in subjection to carnal nature, is opposed to the Divine spirit, who alone is a sufficient corrective, Christ having secured for us the power of overcoming (Rom 8 3), if we manifest a deep desire and an earnest endeavor to overcome (Gal 5 17, 18).

Flesh in the sense of relationship, tribal connection, kith and kin. For examples, see what has been said above on Heb sh'ēr. The

7. In the following passages are a few of those Sense of in which bāsār is used: Gen 2 24; Relationship 37 27; Job 2 5; cf the NT passages: Mt 19 5, 6; Rom 1 3; 9 3, 5, 8. The expressions "bone" and "flesh" are found in combination (Gen 2 23; 29 14; Jgs 9 2; 2 S 5 1; 19 12, 13; Eph 5 31, the latter in some MSS only).

Some other subdivisions of meanings might be added, for example where "flesh" takes almost the place of "person," as in Col 2 1: "as many as have not seen my face in the flesh," i.e. have not known me personally, or ver 5, "absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit," etc.

FLESH AND BLOOD. See FLESH, 5.

FLESH-HOOK, flesh'hōök (מַזְלָגָה, mazlēgh, and pl. מַזְלָגוֹת, mizlaghōth): One of the implements used around the sacrificial altar. According to Divine direction given to Moses (Ex 27 3; 38 3), it was to be made of brass, but later David felt impelled by "the Spirit" or "in his spirit" to determine that for use in the magnificent Temple of Solomon it should be made of gold (1 Ch 28 17). But Huram made it, with other altar articles, of "bright brass" (2 Ch 4 16). In Samuel's time, it was made with three hook-shaped tines, and was used in taking out the priests' share of the meat offering (1 S 2 13, 14). With the other altar utensils, it was in the special charge of the Kohathites (Nu 4 14). The hooks mentioned in Ezk 40 43 were altogether different and for another purpose. See HOOK.

FLESH-POT, flesh'pot (פֶּתִיחַ בָּשָׂר, ṣēr ha-bāsār, "pot of the flesh"): One of the six kinds of cooking utensils spoken of as pots or pans or caldrons or basins. Probably usually made of bronze or earthenware. The only mention of flesh-pots, specifically so named, is in Ex 16 3. See FOOD.

FLIES, fliz. See FLY.

FLINT, flint (חֲלָמִישׁ, hallāmish [Dt 8 15; 32 13; Job 28 9; Ps 114 8], צֶר, ṣēr [Ex 4 25; Ezk 3 9], צֶרֶךְ, ṣēr [Isa 5 28], צֶרֶךְ, ṣūr [Job 22 24; Ps 89 43], צֶרֶךְ, ṣurim [Josh 5 2 f]; קָחֶלֶאֱ [קָחֶלֶאֱ, "pebble"], kōchlaṣ [1 Macc 10 73]): The word hallāmish signifies a hard stone, though not certainly flint, and is used as a figure for hardness in Isa 50 7, "Therefore have I set my face like a flint." A similar use of ṣūr is found in Ezk 3 9, "As an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead," and Isa 5 28, "Their horses' hoofs shall be accounted as flint"; and of ṣela in Jer 5 3, "They have made their faces harder than a rock." The same three words are used of the rock from which Moses drew water in the wilderness: hallāmish (Dt 8 15; Ps 114 8); ṣūr (Ex 17 6; Dt 8 15; Ps 78 20; Isa 48 21); ṣela (Nu 20 8; Neh 9 15; Ps 78 16). Ṣūr and ṣela are used oftener than hallāmish for great rocks and cliffs, but ṣūr is used also for flint knives in Ex 4 25, "Then Zipporah took a flint [AV "sharp stone"], and cut off the foreskin of her son," and in Josh 5 2 f, "Jeh said unto Joshua, Make thee knives of flint [AV "sharp knives"], and circumcise again the children of Israel the second time." Surgical implements of flint were used by the ancient Egyptians, and numerous flint chippings with occasional flint implements are found associated with the remains of early man in Syria and Pal. Flint and the allied mineral, chert, are found in great abundance in the limestone rocks of Syria, Pal and Egypt. See ROCK.

FLOCK. See CATTLE.

FLOOD, flūd: In AV not less than 13 words are rendered "flood," though in RV we find in some passages "river," "stream," "tempest," etc. The word is used for: the deluge of Noah, מַבְּבִיל, mabbīl (Gen 6 17 f); κατακλυσμός, kataklysmós (Mt 24 38.39; Lk 17 27); the waters of the Red Sea, נָזַל, nāzal (Ex 15 8); the Euphrates, נָהָר, nāhār, "Your fathers dwelt of old time on the other side of the flood" (RV "beyond the River" Josh 24 2); the Nile, יַאֲרֹךְ, y'ārōk, "the flood [RV "River"] of Egypt" (Am 8 8); the Jordan, נָהָר, nāhār, "They went through the flood [RV "river"] on foot" (Ps 66 6); torrent, זֶרֶם, zerem, "as a flood [RV "tempest"] of mighty waters" (Isa 28 2); ποταμός, potamós, "The rain descended and the floods came" (Mt 7 25); πλημμύρα, plēmmúra, "When a flood arose, the stream brake against that house" (Lk 6 48).

Figurative: נָהָל, nahal, "The floods of ungodly men [RV "ungodliness," RVm "Heb Belial"] made me afraid" (2 S 22 5; Ps 18 4); also אָרַר, 'ār (Am 8 8 [AV]); שִׁבְבֹלֶת, shibboleth (Ps 69 2); שֶׁלֶפֶח, sheleph (Dnl 11 22 [AV]); שֶׁלֶפֶח, shēleph (Ps 32 6 [AV]); ποταμοφόρητος, potamophórētos (Rev 12 15 [AV]). FLOUR, flour. See BREAD; FOOD.

FLOURISH, flur'ish (פָּרַח, pārah, צָחַץ, cūc; ἀναθάλλω, anathállō): The tr of pārah, "to break forth" (Ps 72 7; 92 12.13; Prov 14 11; Isa 66 14; Cant 6 11; 7 12; RV "budded"); of cūc, "to bloom" (Ps 72 16; 90 6; 92 7; 103 15; 132 18); ראֲדָנָן, "green," "fresh," is tr'd "flourishing" in Ps 92 14, RV "green," and ראֲדָנָן, Aram. in Dnl 4 4; נֹבֵחַ, "to sprout" (Zec 9 17, AV "cheerful").

In an interesting passage (Eccl 13 5 AV), the Hiphil fut. of nā'ac, meaning properly "to pierce or strike," hence, to slight or reject, is tr'd "flourish"; it is said of the old man "The almond tree shall flourish," RV "blossom" (so Ewald, Delitzsch, etc); nā'ac has nowhere else this meaning; it is frequently rendered "contemn," "despise," etc. Other renderings are, "shall cause loathing" (Gesenius, Knobel, etc), "shall be despised," i.e. the hoary head; "The almond tree shall shake off its flowers," the silvery hairs falling like the fading white flowers of the almond tree; by others it is taken to indicate "sleeplessness," the name of the almond tree (shākēdh) meaning the watcher or early riser (cf Jer 1 11, "a rod of an almond-tree," lit. "a wakeful [or early] tree"), the almond being the first of the trees to wake from the sleep of winter. See ALMOND.

"Flourish" appears once only in the NT, in AV, as tr of anathállō, "to put forth anew," or "to make put forth anew" (Phil 4 10): "Your care for me hath flourished again," RV "Ye have revived your thought for me."

FLOWERS, flou'érz (BLOOM, BLOSSOM, etc):

(1) גִּבְעֹל, gibh'ol, lit. "a small cup," hence calyx or corolla of a flower (Ex 9 31, "The flax was in bloom").

(2) פֶּחַח, nēc (Gen 40 10, נִצְחָה, niççāh, "a flower" or "blossom"; Job 15 33; Isa 18 5). These words are used of the early berries of the vine or olive.

(3) נִצָּן, niççān, "a flower"; pl. only, נִצְנִים, niççānim (Cant 2 12, "The flowers appear on the earth").

(4) פָּרַח, perah, root to "burst forth" expresses an early stage of flowering; "blossom" (Isa 5 24; 18 5); "flower" (Nah 1 4, "The flower of Lebanon languisheth"). Used of artificial flowers in candlesticks (Ex 25 31 ff).

(5) צִיץ, ciç, "flower" (Isa 40 6); pl. צִיצִים, ciççim, flowers as architectural ornaments (1 K 6 18); נִצְחָה, niççāh, "the fading flower of his glorious beauty" (Isa 28 1.4; also Nu 17 8; Job 14 2, etc).

(6) ἀνθος, anthos, in LXX equivalent of all the Heb words (Jas 1 10.11; 1 Pet 1 24).

The beauty of the profusion of flowers which cover Pal every spring receives but scant reference in the OT; Cant 2 12 is perhaps the only clear reference. It is noticeable that the native of Syria thinks little of flowers unless it be for their perfume. Our Lord's reference to the flowers ("lilies") is well known (Mt 6 28; Lk 12 27). For details of the flowers of modern Pal, see BOTANY. The aptness of the expression "flower of the field" for a type of the evanescence of human life (Job 14 2; Ps 103 15; Isa 40 6; Jas 1 10) is the more impressive in a land like Pal where the annual display of wild flowers, so glorious for a few short weeks, is followed by such desolation. The fresh and brilliant colors fade into masses of withered leaves (not uncommonly cleared by burning), and then even these are blown away, so that but bare, cracked and baked earth remains for long months where once all was beauty, color and life. FLY, fl, FLIES, fliz (פָּרַח, 'arōbh [Ex 8 21 ff; Ps 78 45; 105 31; LXX κυνόμυια, kunómuia; "dog-fly"], זְבִיב, zēbhūbh [Eccl 10 1; Isa 7 18; LXX μυία, mutai, "flies"]; cf זְבִיבָה, ba'al-zēbhūbh, "Baal-zebub" [2 K 1 2 ff], and βελζεβούλ, beelzeboul, "Beelzebub," or βελζεβούβ, beelzeboub, "Beelzebub" [Mt 10 25; 12 24.27; Lk 11

15 18.19]; cf Arab. ذُبَاب, dhubbāb, "fly" or "bee"; N.B. dh for Arab. dhāl, pronounced like d or z or like th in "the"): The references in Ps as well as in Ex are to the plague of flies, and the word 'arōbh is rendered "swarm of flies" throughout, except in Ps 78 45; 105 31 AV, where we find "divers sorts of flies" (cf Vulg omne genus muscarum). In Ex 8 21 we read, "I will send swarms of flies upon thee, and upon thy servants, and upon thy people, and into thy houses: and the houses of the Egyptians shall be full of swarms of flies, and also the ground whereon they are"; in Ex 8 24, . . . "the land was corrupted by reason of the swarms of flies"; in Ps 78 45, "He sent among them swarms of flies, which devoured them." There has been much speculation as to what the insects were, but all the texts cited, including even Ps 78 45, may apply perfectly well to the common house fly (Musca domestica). Some species of blue-bottle fly (Calliphora) might also suit.

The other word, ḥbhāh, occurs in Eccl 10 1, "Dead flies cause the oil of the perfumer to send forth an evil odor; so doth a little folly outweigh wisdom and honor"; and Isa 7 18, "And it shall come to pass in that day, that Jeh will hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria." The house fly would fit perfectly the reference in each, but that in Isa would seem to suggest rather one of the horse flies (Tabanidae) or gad flies (Oestridae). Whatever fly may be meant, it is used as a symbol for the military power of Egypt, as the bee for that of Assyria.

Owing to deficiencies in public and private hygiene, and also for other reasons, house flies and others are unusually abundant in Pal and Egypt and are agents in the transmission of cholera, typhoid fever, ophthalmia and anthrax. Glossina morsitans, the tsetse fly, which is fatal to many domestic animals, and Glossina palpalis, which transmits the sleeping sickness, are abundant in tropical Africa, but do not reach Egypt proper. See PLAGUES.

FLY (vb.; ṭāph, ṭāph; ṭāphomai, ṭāphomai, or, contracted, ṭāphomai): Used in preference to "flee" when great speed is to be indicated. "To fly" is used: (1) Literally, of birds, ṭāph (Gen 1 20; Ps 55 6); ḏā'āh (Dt 28 49), of sparks (Job 5 7); of the arrow (Ps 91 5); of the seraphim (Isa 6 2,6); of an angel (Dnl 9 21, ya'aph, "to be caused to fly"); of swift action or movement (Ps 18 10; Jer 48 40); of people (Isa 11 14); of a fleet (Isa 60 8; 1 S 15 19, ṭā; 14 32, ṭāh, "to do," etc.). (2) Figuratively, of a dream (Job 20 8); of man's transitory life (Ps 90 10); of riches (Prov 23 5); of national glory (Hos 9 11).

For "fly" RV has "soar" (Job 39 26), "fly down" (Isa 11 14); for "flying" (Isa 31 5) ARV has "hovering."

"As for Samaria, her king is cut off, as foam [ḥāph "twigs"] upon the water" (Hos 10 7). The other references are from the NT. FOLLOW, fol'ō (ḥāph, ḥāph, ḥāph, ḥāph; ḥāph, ḥāph, ḥāph, ḥāph): Frequently the tr of ḥāph, "after," e.g. Nu 14 24, "hath followed me fully," lit. "fulfilled after me" (Nu 32 11, 12; Dt 1 36; Am 7 15); ḥāph is "to pursue," and is often so tr'd; it is tr'd "follow" (Ps 23 6; Isa 5 11, etc.); "follow after" (Gen 44 4; Ex 14 4); ḥāph, "foot," is several times tr'd "follow" (lit. "at the foot of"; Ex 11 8; Jgs 8 5, etc.); ḥāph, "to go after" (Dt 4 3; 1 K 14 8, etc.); ḥāph, "to go on after" (Gen 24 5; Jgs 2 19, etc.); ḥāph, "to cause to cleave to" is "follow hard after" (1 S 14 22; Ps 63 8, etc.).

In the NT, in addition to ḥāph (Mt 4 20, 22,25, etc) various words and phrases are rendered "follow," e.g. Deute opisō mou, "Come after me" (Mt 4 19, "Follow me," RV "Come ye after me"); diōkō, "to pursue" (Lk 17 23; 1 Thess 5 15, RV "follow after," etc); mimēomai, "to imitate" (He 13 7, "whose faith follow," RV "imitate their faith"; 2 Thess 3 7,9; 3 Jn ver 11); compounds of ḥāph with ex, para, sun, etc (2 Pet 1 16; Mk 16 20; Acts 16 17; Mk 5 37, etc.).

ERV "Follow after faithfulness" makes an important change in Ps 37 3, where AV has "and verily thou shalt be fed"; but ARV has "feed on his faithfulness," m "feed securely or verily thou shalt be fed." For "attained" (1 Tim 4 6) RV gives "followed until now."

FOLLOWER, fol'ō-ēr (ḥāph, ḥāph, ḥāph, ḥāph): "Followers" is in AV the tr of mimēōs, "to imitate" (in the NT in the good sense of becoming imitators, or following an example), rendered by RV "imitators" (1 Cor 4 16; 11 1; Eph 5 1; 1 Thess 1 6; 2 14; He 6 12); summimēōs, "joint imitators" (Phil 3 17); in 1 Pet 3 13, AV "followers of that which is good," the word, according to a better text, is zelōts, RV "if ye be zealous of that which is good."

LITERATURE

In a previous art. (see BREAD) it has been shown that in the Bible "bread" usually stands for food in general and how this came to be so. In a complementary article on MEALS the methods of preparing and serving food will be dealt with. This article is devoted specifically to the foodstuffs of the Orient, more esp. to articles of food in use among the Hebrews in Bible times. These are divisible into two main classes.

I. Vegetable Foods.—Orientals in general are vegetarians, rather than flesh eaters. There is some reason to believe that primitive

1. Primitive man was a vegetarian (see Gen 2 16; Habits 3 2,6). It would seem, indeed, from a comparison of Gen 1 29 f with 9 3 f that Divine permission to eat the flesh of animals was first given to Noah after the Deluge, and then only on condition of drawing off the blood in a prescribed way (cf the kosher [kāshār] meat of the Jews of today).

The chief place among the foodstuffs of Orientals must be accorded to the cereals, included in ARV under the generic term "grain," in AV 2. Cereals and ERV "corn." The two most important of these in the nearer East are wheat (ḥiṭṭāh) and barley (š'ōrīm). The most primitive way of using the wheat as food was to pluck the fresh ears (Lev 23 14; 2 K 4 42), remove the husks by rubbing in the hands (Dt 23 25; Mt 12 1), and eat the grains raw. A common practice in all lands and periods, observed by the fellahen of Syria today, has been to parch or roast the ears and eat the grain unground. This is the parched corn (ARV "grain") so often mentioned in the OT, which with bread and vinegar (sour wine) constituted the meal of the reapers to which Boaz invited Ruth (Ruth 2 14).

Later it became customary to grind the wheat into flour (kemāh), and, by bolting it with a fine sieve, to obtain the "fine flour" (gōleth) of our EV, which, of course, was then made into "bread" (which see), either without leaven (maṣṣāh) or with (leḥem ḥāmēh, Lev 7 13).

Meal, both of wheat and of barley, was prepared in very early times by means of the primitive rubbing-stones, which excavations at Lachish, Gezer and elsewhere show survived the introduction of the hand-mill (see MILL; cf PEFS, 1902, 326). Barley (š'ōrīm) has always furnished the principal food of the poorer classes, and, like wheat, has been made into bread (Jgs 7 13; Jn 6 9.13). Less frequently millet (Ezk 4 9) and spelt (kūṣgemeth; see FITCHES) were so used. (For details of baking, bread-making, etc, see BREAD, III, 1,2,3.)

Vegetable foods of the pulse family (leguminosae) are represented in the OT chiefly by lentils and beans.

The pulse of Dnl 1 12 (z'rō'īm) denotes edible "herbs" in general (RVm, 3. Leguminous Plants cf Isa 61 11, "things that are sown").

The lentils ('ādāshīm) were and are considered very toothsome and nutritious. It was of "red lentils" that Jacob brewed his fateful potage (Gen 25 29.34), a stew, probably, in which the lentils were flavored with onions and other ingredients, as we find it done in Syria today. Lentils, beans, cereals, etc, were sometimes ground and mixed and made into bread (Ezk 4 9). I found them at Gaza roasted also, and eaten with oil and salt, like parched corn.

The children of Israel, when in the wilderness, are said to have looked back wistfully on the "cucumbers . . . melons . . . leeks . . . onions, and the garlic" of Egypt (Nu 11 5). All these things we find later were grown in Pal. In addition, at least four varieties of the bean, the chickpea, various species of chickory and endive, the bitter herbs of the Passover ritual (Ex 12 8), mustard (Mt 13 31) and many other things available for food, are mentioned in the Mish, our richest source of information on this subject. Cucumbers (kishshu'īm) were then, as now, much used. The oriental variety is much less fibrous and more succulent and digestible than ours, and supplies the thirsty traveler often with a fine substitute for water where water is scarce or bad. The poor in such cities as Cairo, Beirut and Damascus live largely on bread and cucumbers or melons. The cucumbers are eaten raw, with or without salt, between meals, but also often stuffed and cooked and eaten at meal time. Onions (b'cālīm), garlic (shummit) and leeks (ḥāṣīr) are still much used in Pal as in Egypt. They are usually eaten raw with bread, though also used for flavoring in cooking, and, like cucumbers, pickled and eaten as a relish with meat (ZDPV, IX, 14).

Men in utter extremity sometimes "plucked salt-wort" (mallū'h) and ate the leaves, either raw or boiled, and made "the roots of the broom" their food (Job 30 4).

In Lev 19 23 f it is implied that, when Israel came into the land to possess it, they should "plant all manner of trees for food." They

4. Food of Trees doubtless found such trees in the goodly land in abundance, but in the natural course of things needed to plant more.

Many olive trees remain fruitful to extreme old age, as for example those shown the tourist in the garden of Gethsemane, but many more require replanting. Then the olive after planting requires ten or fifteen years to fruit, and trees of a quicker growth, like the fig, are planted beside them and depended on for fruit in the meantime. It is significant that Jotham in his parable makes the olive the first choice of the trees to be their king (Jgs 9 9), and the olive tree to respond, "Should I leave my fatness, which God and man honor in me, and go to wave to and fro over the trees?" (ARVm). The berries of the olive (zayith) were doubtless eaten, then as now, though nowhere in Scripture is it expressly so stated. The chief use of the berries, now as ever, is in furnishing "oil" (q.v.), but they are eaten in the fresh state, as also after being soaked in brine, by rich and poor alike, and are shipped in great quantities. Olive trees are still more or less abundant in Pal, esp. around Bethlehem and Hebron, on the borders of the rich plains of Esdraelon, Phoenicia, Sharon and Philistia, in the vale of Shechem, the plain of Moreh, and in the trans-Jordanic regions of Gilead and Bashan. They are esteemed as among the best possessions of the towns, and the culture of them is being revived around Jerus, in the Jordan valley and elsewhere throughout the land. They are beautiful to behold in all stages of their growth, but esp. in spring. Then they bear an amazing wealth of blossoms, which in the breeze fall in showers like snowflakes, a fact that gives point to Job's words, "He shall cast off his flower as the olive-tree" (16 33). The mode of gathering the fruit is still about what it was in ancient times (cf Ex 27 20).

Next in rank to the olive, according to Jotham's order, though first as an article of food, is the fig (in the OT t'ēnāh, in the NT sukē), whose "sweetness" is praised in the parable (Jgs 9 11). It is the principal shade and fruit tree of Pal, growing in all parts, in many spontaneously, and is the emblem of peace and prosperity (Dt 8 8; Jgs 9 10; 1 K 4 25; Mic 4 4; Zec 3 10; 1 Macc 14 12). The best fig and olive orchards are carefully plowed, first in the spring when the buds are swelling, sometimes again when the second crop is sprouting, and again after the first rains in the autumn. The "first-ripe fig" (bikkūrāh, Isa 28 4; Jer 24 2), i.e. the early fig which grows on last year's wood, was and is esteemed as a great delicacy, and is often eaten while it is young and green. The late fig (t'ēnīm) is the kind dried in the sun and put up in quantities for use out of season. Among the Greeks and the Romans, as well as among the Hebrews, dried figs were most extensively used. When pressed in a mold they formed the "cakes of figs" (d'bhēlāh) mentioned in the OT (1 S 25 18; 1 Ch 12 40), doubtless about such as are found today in Syria and Smyrna, put up for home use and for shipment. It was such a fig-cake that was presented as a poultice (AV "plaster") for Hezekiah's boil (Isa 38 21; cf 2 K 20 7). As the fruit-buds of the fig appear before the leaves, a tree full of leaves and without fruit would be counted "barren" (Mk 11 12f; cf Isa 28 4; Jer 24 2; Hos 9 10; Nah 3 12; Mt 21 19; Lk 13 7).

Grapes ('ānāḥīm), often called "the fruit of the vine" (Mt 26 29), have always been a much-prized article of food in the Orient. They are closely associated in the Bible with the fig (cf "every man under his vine and under his fig-tree," 1 K 4 25). Like the olive, the fig, and the date-palm, grapes are indigenous to Syria, the soil and climate being most favorable to their growth and perfection. Southern Pal esp. yields a rich abundance of choice grapes, somewhat as in patriarchal times (Gen 49 11, 12). J. T. Haddad, a native Syrian, for many years in the employment of the Turkish government, tells of a variety in the famous valley of Eshecol near Hebron, a bunch from which has been known to weigh twenty-eight pounds (cf Nu 13 23). Of the grapevine there is nothing wasted; the young leaves are used as a green vegetable, and the old are fed to sheep and goats. The branches cut off in pruning, as well as the dead trunk, are used to make charcoal, or for firewood. The failure of such a fruit was naturally regarded as a judgment from Jeh (Ps 105 33; Jer 6 17; Hos 2 12; Joel 1 7). Grapes, like figs, were both enjoyed in their natural state, and by exposure to the sun dried into raisins (šimmūhīm), the "dried grapes" of Nu 6 3. In this form they were esp. well suited to the use of travelers and soldiers (1 S 25 18; 1 Ch 12 40). The meaning of the word rendered "raisin-cake," ARV "a cake of raisins" (2 S 6 19 and elsewhere), is uncertain. In Bible times the bulk of the grape product of the land went to the making of wine (q.v.). Some doubt if the Hebrews knew grape-syrup, but the fact that the Aram. dibē, corresponding to Heb. d'bhāsh, is used to denote both the natural and artificial honey (grape-syrup), seems to indicate that they knew the latter (cf Gen 43 11; Ezk 27 17; and see HONEY).

Less prominent was the fruit of the mulberry fig-tree (or sycamore) (šikkāh), of the date-palm (ūmār), the dates of which, according to the Mish, were both eaten as they came from the tree, and dried in clusters and pressed into cakes for transport; the pomegranate (appūh), the "apple" of AV (see APPLE), or quinch, according to others; the husks (Lk 15 16), i.e. the pods of the carob tree (kaprūr), are treated elsewhere. Certain nuts were favorite articles of food—pistachio nuts (boṭnīm), almonds (sh'kēdhīm) and walnuts ('ēghōz); and certain spices and vegetables were much used for seasoning: cummin (kammōn), anise, dill (AV) (keṣh), mint (hōbōrūr) and mustard (śīṭarī), which see. Salt (melah), of course, played an important part, then as now, in the cooking and in the life of the Orientals. To "eat the salt" of a person was synonymous with eating his bread (Ezr 4 14), and a "covenant of salt" was held inviolable (Nu 18 19; 2 Ch 13 5).

II. Animal Food.—Anciently, even more than now in the East, flesh food was much less used than among western peoples. In the first place, in Israel and among other Sem peoples, it was confined by law to the use of such animals and birds as were regarded as "clean" (see CLEAN; UNCLEANNES), or speaking according to the categories of Lev 11 2, 3; Dt 14 4-20, domestic animals and game (see DRIVER on Dt 14 4-20). Then the poverty of the peasantry from time immemorial has tended to limit the use of meat to special occasions, such as family festivals (haggīm), the entertainment of an honored guest (Gen 18 7; 2 S 12 4), and the sacrificial meal at the local sanctuary.

The goat ('ēz, etc), esp. the "kid of the goats" (Lev 4 23, 28 AV), was more prized for food by the ancient Hebrews than by modern Orientals, by whom goats are kept chiefly for their milk—most of which they supply (cf Prov 27 27). For this reason they are still among the most valued possessions of rich and poor (cf Gen 30 33; 32 14 with 1 S 25 2). A kid, as less valuable than a lamb, was naturally the readier victim when meat was required (cf Lk 15 29).

The sheep of Pal, as of Egypt, are mainly of the fat-tailed species (Ovis aries), the tail of which was forbidden as ordinary food and had to be offered with certain other portions of the fat (Ex 29 22; Lev 3 9). To kill a lamb in honor of a guest is one of the highest acts of Bedouin hospitality. As a rule only the lambs are killed for meat, and they only in honor of some guest or festive occasion (cf 1 S 25 18; 1 K 1 19). Likewise the "calves of the herd" supplied the daintiest food of the kind, though the flesh of the neat cattle, male and female, was eaten. The "fatted calf" of Lk 15 23 will be recalled, as also the "fatlings" and the "stalled" (stall-fed) ox of the OT (Prov 15 17). A sharp contrast suggestive of the growth of luxury in Israel is seen by a comparison of 2 S 17 28 f with 1 K 4 22 f. The food furnished David and his hardy followers at Mahanaim was "wheat, and barley, and meal, and parched grain, and beans, and lentils, and parched pulse, and honey, and butter, and sheep, and cheese of the herd," while the daily provision for Solomon's table was "thirty measures of fine flour, and threescore measures of meal, ten fat oxen, and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and a hundred sheep, besides harts, and gazelles, and roebucks, and fatted fowl." Nehemiah's daily portion is given as "one ox and six choice sheep" (Neh 5 18).

Milk of large and small animals was a staple article of food (Dt 32 14; Prov 27 27). It was usually kept in skins, as among the Syrian peasants it is today (Jgs 4 19). We find a generic term often used (hem'āh) which covers also cream, clabber and cheese (Prov 30 33). The proper designation of cheese is q'bhīnāh (Job 10 10), but hālābh also is used both for ordinary milk and for a cheese made directly from sweet milk (cf 1 S 17 18, hāriṣ hālābh, and our "cottage cheese"). See MILK.

Honey (d'bhāsh, nōpheth ha-šūphīm), so often mentioned with milk, is ordinary bees' honey (see HONEY). The expression "honey" in the combination d'bhāsh w'hālābh, for which Pal was praised, most likely means d'bhāsh t'mārīm, i.e. "date-juice." It was much prized and relished (Ps 19 10; Prov 16 24), and seems to have been a favorite food for children (Isa 7 15).

Of game seven species are mentioned (Dt 14 5). The gazelle and the hart were the typical animals of the chase, much prized for their flesh (Dt 12 15), and doubtless supplied the venison of Esau's "savory meat" (Gen 25 28; 27 4).

Of fish as food little is said in the OT (see Nu 11 5; Jer 16 16; Ezk 47 10; Eccl 9 12). No particular species is named, although thirty-six species are said to be found in the waters of the Jordan valley alone. But we may be sure that the fish which the Hebrews enjoyed in Egypt "for nought" (Nu 11 5) had their successors in Canaan (Kennedy). Trade in cured fish was carried on by Tyrian merchants with Jerus in Nehemiah's day (Neh 13 16), and there must have been a fish market at or near the fish gate (3 3). The Sea of Galilee in later times was the center of a great fish industry, as is made clear by the Gospels and by Jos. In the market of Tiberias today fresh fish are sold in great quantities, and a thriving trade in salt fish is carried on. The "small fishes" of Our Lord's two great miracles of feeding were doubtless of this kind, as at all times they have been a favorite form of provision for a journey in hot countries.

As to the exact price of food in ancient times little is known. From 2 K 7 1, 16 we learn that one š'āh of fine flour, and two of barley, sold for a shekel (cf Mt 10 29). For birds allowed as food see Dt 14 11 and arts. on CLEAN; UNCLEANNES.

Pigeons and turtle doves find a place in the ritual of various sacrifices, and so are to be reckoned as "clean" for ordinary uses as well. The species of domestic fowl found there today seem to have been introduced during the Pers period (cf 2 Esd 1 30; Mt 23 37; 26 34, etc). It is thought that the fatted fowl of Solomon's table (1 K 4 23) were geese (see Mish). Fatted goose is a favorite food with Jews today, as it was with the ancient Egyptians.

Of game birds used for food (see Neh 5 18) the partridge and the quail are prominent, and the humble sparrow comes in for his share of mention (Mt 10 29; Lk 12 6). Then, as now, the eggs of domestic fowls and of all "clean" birds were favorite articles of food (Dt 22 6; Isa 10 14; Lk 11 12).

Edible insects (Lev 11 22f) are usually classed with animal foods. In general they are of the locust family (see LOCUST). They formed part of the food of John the Baptist (Mt 3 4, etc), were regarded by the Assyrians as delicacies, and are a favorite food of the Arabs today. They are prepared and served in various ways, the one most common being to remove the head, legs and wings, to drop it in meal, and then fry it in oil or butter. It then tastes a little like fried frogs' legs. In the diet of the Baptist, locusts were associated with wild honey (see HONEY).

As to condiments (see separate arts. on SALT; CORIANDER, etc) it needs only to be said here that the caperberry (Eccl 12 5 m) was eaten before meals as an appetizer and, strictly speaking, was not a condiment. Mustard was valued for the leaves, not for the seed (Mt 13 31). Pepper, though not mentioned in Scripture, is mentioned in the Mish as among the condiments. Before it came into use, spicy seeds like cummin, the coriander, etc, played a more important rôle than since.

The abhorrence of the Hebrews for all food prepared or handled by the heathen (see ABOMINATION) is to be attributed primarily to the intimate association in early times between flesh food and sacrifices to the gods. This finds conspicuous illustration in the case of Daniel (Dnl 1 8), Judas Maccabaeus (2 Macc 5 27), Jos (Vita, III), and their compatriots (see also Acts 15 20, 29; 1 Cor 8 1-10; 10 19, 28). As to sources of food supply and traffic in food stuffs, for primitive usages see Gen 18 7; 27 9; 1 K 21 2. As to articles and customs of commerce adopted when men became dwellers in cities, see Jer 37 21, where bakers were numerous enough in Jerus to give their name to a street or bazaar, where doubtless, as today, they baked and sold bread to the public (cf Mish, passim). Extensive trade in "victuals" in Nehemiah's day is attested by Neh 13 15 f, and by specific mention of the "fish gate" (3 3) and the "sheep gate" (3 1), so named evidently because of their nearby markets. In John's Gospel (4 8; 13 29) we have incidental evidence that the disciples were accustomed to buy food as they journeyed through the land. In Jerus, cheese was clearly to be bought in the cheesemakers' valley (Tyropæon), oil of the oil merchants (Mt 25 9), and so on; and Corinth, we may be sure, was not the only city of Paul's day that had a provision market ("shambles," 1 Cor 10 25 RV).

FOOL, fool, FOLLY (נָבָחַל, נָבָחַל, 'šwīl, נָבָחַל, נָבָחַל, šākhāl, and forms; ἀφρον, ἀφροσύνη, aphrosynē, μωρός, mōros):

1. In the Old Testament.—Taking the words generally, apart from the Wisdom literature, we find nābhāl frequently tr^d "fool" and n'bhālāh, "folly"; nābhāl, however, denotes a wicked person, an evil character, "shamelessly immoral," equivalent to "a son of Belial" (Cheyne), rather

1. General than a merely "foolish" person, and n'bhālāh, "wickedness," "shameless impropriety," rather than simple folly. We have almost a definition of nābhāl in Isa 32 6: "For the fool will speak folly, and his heart will work iniquity, to practise profaneness, and to utter error against Jeh, to make empty the soul of the hungry, and to cause the drink of the thirsty to fail." Abigail described her husband, Nābhāl, as "a son of Belial" (RV "worthless fellow"), "for as his name is, so is he" (1 S 25 25), and what we read of him bears out this character. Other occurrences of the words support the above meaning; they are generally associated with some form of wickedness, frequently with base and unnatural lewdness (Gen 34 7; Dt 22 21; Josh 7 15; Jgs 19 23, 24; 20 6, 10; 2 S 13 12). When in Ps 14 1; 53 1 it is said, "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God," it is followed by the statement, "They are corrupt, they have done abominable works," showing that more than "folly" is implied. In Isa 32 5, 6 AV, nābhāl is tr^d "vile person" and n'bhālāh "villany," RV "fool" and "folly," Jer 29 23; hālāl, implying loud boasting is in AV tr^d "foolish," but it means, rather, "arrogant," which RV adopts (Ps 5 5; 73 3; 75 4, m "fools"); šākhāl, "a fool," also occurs (Gen 31 28; 1 S 13 13, etc) for which word see (4) below; also yā'al "to be empty," "to be or become foolish" (Nu 12 11; Isa 19 13; Jer 5 4; 50 36).

In the Hokhmāh or Wisdom literature, which, within the Bible, is contained in Job, Prov (esp.), Eccl, Cant, some Pss and certain

2. The portions of the prophetic writings, Wisdom "fool" and "folly" are frequent and Literature distinctive words. Their significance is best seen in contrast with "Wisdom." This was the outcome of careful observation and long pondering on actual life in the light of religion and the Divine revelation. Wisdom had its seat in God and was imparted to those who "feared" Him ("The fear of Jeh is the beginning [chief part] of knowledge" Prov 1 7). Such wisdom was the essence of life, and to be without it was to walk in the way of death and destruction. The fool was he who was thoughtless, careless, conceited, self-sufficient, indifferent to God and His Will, or who might even oppose and scoff at religion and wise instruction. See WISDOM. Various words are used to designate "the fool" and his "folly."

(1) nābhāl (Job 2 10; 30 8; Ps 53 1; Prov 17 21); n'bhālāh (Job 42 8; Isa 9 17) (see above).

(2) 'šwīl, one of the commonest, the idea conveyed by which is that of one who is hasty, impatient, self-sufficient (Prov 12 15; 15 5; 16 22); despising advice and instruction (1 7; 14 9; 24 7); ready to speak and act without thinking (10 14; 12 16; 20 3); quick to get angry, quarrel and cause strife (11 29; 14 17 'šwīleth; 29 9); unrestrained in his anger (Job 5 2; Prov 17 12); silly, stupid even with brute stupidity (Prov 7 22; 26 11; 27 22; cf Isa 19 11; Jer 4 22); he is associated with "transgression" (Ps 107 17; Prov 13 15; 17 18, 19), with "sin" (24 9), with the "scoffer" (ib); 'šwīleth, "foolishness" occurs (Ps 38 5; 69 5; Prov 13 16; "folly," 14 8, 24, 29, etc).

(3) k'šāl is the word most frequent in Prov. It is probably from a root meaning "thickness," "sluggishness," suggesting a slow, self-confident person, but it is used with a wide reference. Self-confidence appears (Prov 14 16; 28 26); ignorance (Eccl 2 14); hate of instruction (Prov 1 22; 18 2); thoughtlessness (10 23; 17 24); self-exposure (14 33; 15 2; 18 7; 29 11; Eccl 5 1; 10 12); anger and contention (Prov 18 6; 19 1; Eccl

7 9); rage (Prov 14 16; 17 12); indolence and improvidence (Eccl 4 5; Prov 21 20); silly merriment (Eccl 7 4.5.6); brutishness (Prov 26 11; cf Ps 49 10; 92 6); it is associated with slander (Prov 10 18), with evil (13 19).

(4) śākhāl, śekhel, śikhluṭh, also occur. These are probably from a root meaning "to be stopped up" (Cheyne), and are generally taken as denoting thickheadedness; but they are used in a stronger sense than mere foolishness (cf 1 S 26 21; 2 S 24 10, etc). These words do not occur in Prov, but in Eccl 2 12; 7 25; śikhluṭh is associated with "madness" ("Wickedness is folly, and . . . foolishness is madness").

(5) p'ṭhī, "simple," is only once tr^d "foolish" (Prov 9 6 AV).

(7) tāphēl, "insipid," "untempered," is tr^d "foolish" (Lam 2 14); tīphlāh, "insipidity" (Job 1 22, "foolishly," ERV, "with foolishness"; 24 12, "folly"; Jer 23 13, "folly," AVm "unsavoury, or, an absurd thing").

(8) whōlāh (Job 4 18: "Behold, he putteth no trust in his servants; and his angels he chargeth with folly" [Delitzsch, "imperfection," others, "error"], AVm "nor in his angels in whom he put light").

II. In the Apocrypha.—In the continuation of the Wisdom literature in Wisd and Ecclus, "fool" frequently occurs with a signification similar to that in Prov; in Wisd we have aphrōn (12 24; 15 5, etc), in Ecclus mōros (18 18; 19 11, etc; 20 13; 21 16, etc).

III. In the New Testament.—In the NT we have various words tr^d "fool," "foolish," "folly," etc, in the ordinary acceptation of these terms; aphrōn, "mindless," "witless" (Lk 11 40; 12 20; 1 Cor 15 36); aphrosunē, "want of mind or wisdom" (2 Cor 11 1; Mk 7 22); anoia, "want of understanding" (2 Tim 3 9); mōrainō, "to make dull," "foolish" (Rom 1 22; 1 Cor 1 20); mōros, "dull," "stupid" (Mt 7 26; 23 17; 25 2; 1 Cor 1 25.27); mōria, "foolishness" (1 Cor 1 18, etc); mōrologia, "foolish talk" (Eph 5 4).

In Mt 5 22 Our Lord says: "Whosoever shall say [to his brother], Thou fool [mōrē], shall be in danger of the hell of fire [the Gehenna of fire]." Two explanations of this word are possible: (1) that it is not the vocative of the Gr mōros—a word which was applied by Jesus Himself to the Pharisees (Mt 23 17.19), but represents the Heb mōrāh, "rebel," applied in Nu 20 10 by Moses to the people, "ye rebels" (for which he was believed to be excluded from the promised land; cf ver 12; hence we have in RVm "or mōreh, a Heb expression of condemnation"); or (2) that, as Our Lord spake in the Aram. it is the Gr tr of a word representing the Heb nābhāl, "vile, or worthless fellow," atheist, etc (Ps 14 1; 53 1).

FOOLERY, fōol'ēr-i: The pl. "fooleries" occurs Ecclus 22 13 AV: "Talk not much with a fool . . . and thou shalt never be defiled with his fooleries." The Gr word is ἐντιναγμός, entīnagmós, "a striking or throwing in," "an attack," from entindō, "to strike into," "cast at," etc (1 Macc 2 36; 2 Macc 4 41; 11 11). RV renders "Thou shalt not be defiled in his onslaught," m "defiled: in his onslaught turn." The meaning is most probably "with what he throws out," i.e. his foolish or vile speeches, as if it were slaver.

FOOT, fōot (רֶגֶל, reghel, פֶּדָס, ḥarṣōl [only twice in || passages: 2 S 22 37=Ps 18 36, where it probably means ankle]; פֶּדָס, pois): The dusty roads of Pal and other eastern lands make a much greater care of the feet necessary than we are accustomed to bestow upon them. The absence of socks or stockings, the use of sandals and low shoes rather than boots and, to an even greater degree, the frequent habit of walking barefoot make it necessary to wash the feet repeatedly every day. This is always done when entering the house, esp. the better upper rooms which are usually carpeted. It is a common dictate of good manners to perform this duty to a visitor, either personally or through a servant; at least water for washing has to be presented (Gen 18 4; Lk 7 44). This has therefore become almost synonymous with the bestowal of hospitality (1 Tim 5 10). At an early date this service was considered one of the lowest tasks of servants (1 S 25 41), probably because the youngest and least trained servants were charged with the task, or because of the idea of defilement connected with the foot. It was, for the same reason, if rendered voluntarily, a service which betokened complete devotion. Jesus taught the greatest lesson of humility by performing this humble service to His disciples (Jn 13 4-15). The undoing of the lachets or leather thongs of the sandals (Mk 1 7; Lk 3 16; Jn 1 27) seems to refer to the same menial duty.

Often the feet and shoes were dusted on the highway, as is being done in the Orient to this day, but if it were done in an ostentatious manner in the presence of a person or a community who had refused hospitality to a stranger, it was understood in the same sense in which the cutting in two of the tablecloth was considered in the days of knighthood: it meant rejection and separation (Mt 10 14; Acts 13 51).

The roads of the desert were not only dusty but rough, and the wanderer was almost sure to ruin his ill-made shoes and wound his weary feet. A special providence of God protected the children of Israel from this experience during the long journey through the wilderness. "Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years" (Dt 8 4; 29 5).

In the house shoes and sandals were never worn; even the most delicate would put on shoes only when going out (Dt 28 56). The shoes were left outside of the house or in a vestibule. This was esp. done in the house of God and at the time of prayer, for whenever or wherever that might be, the law was: "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground" (Ex 3 5; Josh 5 15; Acts 7 33). This custom still prevails among the Moslems of our day. Probably it was the idea of defilement through contact with the common ground which gave rise to its moral application by the Preacher, "Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God" (Eccl 5 1 [Heb 4 17]).

Nakedness of the feet in public, esp. among the wealthier classes, who used to wear shoes or sandals, was a token of mourning (Ezk 24 17 and probably also Jer 2 25 and Isa 20 2-4). A peculiar ceremony is referred to in Dt 25 9.10, whereby a brother-in-law, who refused to perform his duty under the Levirate law, was publicly put to shame. "And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed." See also Ruth 4 7.8.

Numerous are the phrases in which the word "foot" or "feet" is used in Bib. language. "To cover the feet" (1 S 24 3) is synonymous with obeying a call of Nature. "To speak with the feet" is expressive of the eloquence of abusive and obscene gesticulation among oriental people, where hands, eyes and feet are able to express much without the use of words (Prov 6 13). "To sit at the feet," means to occupy the place of a learner (Dt 33 3; Lk 10 39; Acts 23 3). Vanquished enemies had to submit to being trodden upon by the conqueror (a ceremony often represented on Egypt monuments; Josh 10 24; Ps 8 6; 110 1; cf Isa 49 23). St. James warns against an undue humiliation of those who join us in the service of God, even though they be poor or mean-looking, by bidding them to take a lowly place at the feet of the richer members of the congregation (Jas 2 3). We read of dying Jacob that "he gathered up his feet into the bed," for he had evidently used his bed as a couch, on which he had been seated while delivering his charge to his several sons (Gen 49 33). "Foot" or "feet" is sometimes used euphemistically for the genitals (Dt 28 57; Esk 16 25). In Dt 11 10 an interesting reference is made to some Egypt mode of irrigating the fields, "the watering with the foot," which mode would be unnecessary in the promised land of Canaan which "drinketh water of the rain of heaven." It is, however, uncertain whether this refers to the water-wheels worked by a treadmill arrangement or whether reference is made to the many tributary channels, which, according to representations on the Egypt monuments, intersected the gardens and fields and which could be stopped or opened by placing or removing a piece of sod at the mouth of the channel. This was usually done with the foot. Frequently we find references to the foot in expressions connected with journeyings and pilgrimages, which formed so large a part in the experiences of Israel, e.g. Ps 91 12, "lest thou dash thy foot against a stone"; 94 18, "My foot slippeth"; 121 3, "He will not suffer thy foot to be moved," and many more. Often the reference is to the "walk," i.e. the moral conduct of life (78 2; Job 23 11; 31 5).

Figurative: In the metaphorical language of Isa 62 7 "the feet" are synonymous with "the coming."

FOOTMAN, fōōt'man. See WAR.

FOOTSTOOL, fōōt'stōol (פֶּדֶס, kebbes; trōdōn, hupopōdion, "trodden on"): The 15 Scripture references to this term may be classified as literal or figurative. Of the former are the two passages: 2 Ch 9 18 and Jas 2 3. In these the footstool was a sort of step or support for the feet placed before the throne or any pretentious seat.

Of figurative uses, there are the following groups: (1) Of the earth: Isa 66 1; Mt 5 35; Acts 7 49. (2) Of the ark: 1 Ch 28 2. (3) Of the Temple: Ps 99 5; 132 7; Lam 2 1; cf Isa 60 13. (4) Of heathen enemies subdued by the Messianic King: Ps 110 1; Mt 22 44 AV; Mk 12 36; Lk 20 43; Acts 2 35; He 1 13; 10 13. Thus the uses of

FOR, fōr (פֶּר, kt [conj.], פֶּר, l', from פֶּר, 'el [prep.], and various other words. In the NT also the words are various, chiefly γὰρ, gar, καὶ γὰρ, kai gar, ὅτι, hōti [conj.]; ἀντὶ, anti, ἀπὸ, apō, ἐκ, ek, διὰ, diā [acc.], ἐν, en, ἐπὶ [dat. and acc.], περὶ, peri [gen.], ὑπὲρ, huper [gen. and acc.], ὑπὲρ, huper [gen.] [preps.]): ERV and ARV give in many cases more literal or more accurate renderings than those in AV.

In the NT the most important preps. from a doctrinal point of view are anti, "face to face," "over against," "instead," "on behalf of," peri, "around," "about," "concerning," huper, "over," "on behalf of." The first has been claimed as stating the substitutionary nature of Christ's sacrifice as contrasted with huper and peri, more frequently used of it. But, although anti in the NT often means "instead of," "answering to," it does not necessarily imply substitution. On the other hand, in classical Gr huper is sometimes used in that sense (see Trench, Synonyms). "Here as always the root idea of the prep., the root idea of the case, and the context must all be considered" (Robertson, Grammar, 124). Anti is found in this connection only in Mt 20 28, and Mk 10 45. In Mt 26 28; Mk 14 24, we have peri, also in He 10 6.8.18.26; 1 Pet 3 18; 1 Jn 2 2; 4 10. Lk 22 19.20 has huper, which is the word commonly used by Paul, as in Rom 5 6.8; 8 32; 14 15; 1 Cor 15 3, etc., also by John in his Gospel, 6 51; 10 11, etc., and 1 Jn 3 16; also He 2 9; 10 12; 1 Pet 2 21; 3 18; 4 1; in Rom 8 3 it is peri.

FORBEAR, fōr-bār' (נָחַם, hādhāl; ἀνεχόμεναι, anēchomai): In the OT hādhāl, "to leave off," is the word most frequently tr^d "forbear" (Ex 23 5, etc); dāmam, "to be silent," hāshakh, "to keep back," māshakh, "to draw or stretch out," occur once each; RV renders Esk 24 17 (dāmam), "Sigh, but not aloud," m "Heb be silent"; Prov 24 11 (hāshakh), "See that thou hold back," m "or forbear thou not to deliver," AV "if thou forbear to deliver"; Neh 9 30 (māshakh), "bear" instead of "forbear"; apā lit. "breathing," the "nose" hence from violent breathing, "anger" (erekh, "long," understood), and hāl "to hold," are tr^d "forbearing" (Prov 25 15; Jer 20 9, respectively).

In the NT we have anēchomai, "to hold self back or up," "with long-suffering, forbearing one another" (Eph 4 2; Col 3 13); antēmi, "to send back," AV and RV "forbear threatening" (Eph 6 9); phēidomai, "to spare," "but I forbear" (2 Cor 12 6); mē ergazesthai, "not to work," "to forbear working" (1 Cor 9 6); stēgō, "to cover," "conceal": "when I could no longer forbear" (1 Thess 3 1.5).

FORBEARANCE, fōr-bār'ans (ἀνεχέμεναι, anēchē): "Forbearance" (anēchē, "a holding back") is ascribed to God (Rom 2 4, "the riches of his goodness and forbearance and long-suffering"; 3 25 RV, "the passing over of the sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God," AV "remission" [m "passing over"] of sins, that are past, through the forbearance of God); in Phil 4 5, to epieikēs is tr^d by RV "forbearance," m "gentleness"; it is a Christian grace in likeness to God. "Forbearing" (AVm) is substituted by RV for "patient" (anēstikakos, "holding up under evil") in 2 Tim 2 24. W. L. WALKER

FORBID, for-bid' (נָשָׁא, kālā'; καλέω, kālēō): Occurs very seldom in the OT except as the rendering of hālilah (see below); it is once the tr of kālā', "to restrain" (Nu 11 28, "Joshua . . . said, My lord Moses, forbid them"); twice of gāwāh, "to command" (Dt 2 37, "and whosoever Jeh our God forbade us"; 4 23, "Jeh thy God hath forbidden thee," lit. "commanded"); once of lā', "not," RV "commanded not to be done" (Lev 5 17). In the phrases, "Jeh forbid" (1 S 24 6; 26 11; 1 K 21 3), "God forbid" (Gen 44 7; Josh 22 29; 24 16; 1 S 12 23; Job 27 5, etc.), "My God forbid it me" (1 Ch 11 19), the word is hālilah, denoting profanation, or abhorrence (rendered, Gen 18 25 AV, "that be far from thee"); ERV leaves the expressions unchanged; ARV substitutes "far be it from me," "thee," etc., except in 1 S 14 45; 20 2, where it is, "Far from it."

In the NT kōluō, "to cut short," "restrain," is the word commonly tr'd "forbid" (Mt 19 14, "forbid them not," etc.); in Lk 6 29, RV has "withhold not"; diakolūō, with a similar meaning, occurs in Mt 3 14, "John forbade him," RV "would have hindered him"; akōlūōs, "uncut off" (Acts 28 31), is tr'd "none forbidding him." The phrase "God forbid" (mā genoilo, "let it not be," Lk 20 16; Rom 3 4, etc.) is retained by RV, with m "Be it not so," except in Gal 6 14, where the text has "Far be it from me"; mā genoilo is one of the renderings of hālilah in LXX. "God forbid" also appears in Apoc (1 Macc 2 21, RV "Heaven forbid," m "Gr may he be propitious," 9 10, RV "Let it not be").

FORCES, fôr'sis (חַיִּיל, hayil):

(1) The word is used as a military term, equivalent to army, in 2 K 25 23.26 (where AV reads "armies"); 2 Ch 17 2; Jer 40 7, etc. See ARMY.

(2) In Isa 60 5.11, it is rendered in RV by "wealth," and in Ob ver 11, by "substance."

Two other Heb words are also tr'd "forces" in AV, ma'dmaççim (Job 36 19), and ma'ōz (Dnl 11 38), the latter being rendered in RV "fortresses."

FORD, fôrd (מַעְבָּר, ma'abbār [Gen 32 22; "pass" (of Michmash), 1 S 13 23; "stroke" (RVm "passing"), Isa 30 32]; מַעְבָּרָה, ma'bārāh [Josh 2 7; Jgs 3 28; 12 5.6; Isa 16 2; "pass" (of Michmash), 1 S 14 4; "passages" (RVm "fords"), Jer 51 32]; עֲבָרָה, abbārāh [2 S 15 28; 17 16; "ferry-boat" (RVm "convoy"), 2 S 19 18]; from

the journeyings of the children of Israel, in addition to the miraculous passages of the Red Sea and the Jordan, they had other streams to pass over, esp. the Zered (Hisa') and the Arnon (Maujib) (Nu 21 12.13; Dt 2 24). The Jabbok (Zarka) is frequently referred to, particularly in connection with Jacob (Gen 32 22). The most frequent references are to the Jordan which, in time of flood, was impassable (Josh 3 15). The lower Jordan is about 100 ft. wide, and from 5 to 12 ft. deep, so that in the absence of bridges, the places where it was possible to ford were of great importance. The passage of the Jordan is referred to in connection with Jacob (Gen 32 10), Gideon (Jgs 8 4), the children of Ammon (Jgs 10 9), Abner and his men (2 S 2 29), David (2 S 10 17; 17 22), Absalom (2 S 17 24), and others. Jesus undoubtedly crossed the Jordan, and John is thought to have baptized at the ford of the Jordan near Jericho. The fords of the Jordan are specifically mentioned in Josh 2 7 in connection with the pursuit of the spies who were hidden in Rahab's house, and in

2 S 15 28; 17 16 in connection with the flight of David. In the last two passages we have abbārāh, the same word which, in the account of David's return (2 S 19 18), is rendered "ferry-boat" (RVm "convoy"). See JORDAN. ALFRED ELY DAY

FORECAST, fôr-kast' (vb.) (חָשַׁב, hāshabh): To forecast is both to plan or scheme beforehand and to consider or see beforehand. It is in the first sense that it is used in Dnl 11 24.25 (AV) as the tr of hāshabh, "to think," "meditate," "devise," "plot," "He shall forecast his devices [AVm "Heb think his thoughts"] against the strongholds"; "They shall forecast devices against him," RV "devise his devices"; cf Nah 1 9, "What do ye devise against Jeh?" In the second sense, the word occurs in Wisd 17 11 RV, "Wickedness . . . always forecasteth the worst lot" (proetlēphen), m "Most authorities read hath added" (proetlēphen).

FOREFATHER, fôr-fā-thēr:

(1) אָבִי רִאשׁוֹן, 'abb ri'shōn, "first father," "chief father," hence "early ancestor": "turned back to the iniquities of their forefathers" (Jer 11 10).

(2) πρόγονος, prōgonos, "born before," "ancestor": "whom I serve from my forefathers" (2 Tim 1 3). It is tr'd "parents" (including grandparents) in 1 Tim 5 4: "and to requite their parents."

FOREFRONT, fôr-frunt (פָּנִים, pānim): For "forefront," "front" is now generally used, since "back-front" has gone out of use. "Forefront" is the tr of pānim, "face" (2 K 16 14; Ezk 40 19 bis; 47 1); of mūl pānim, "over against the face" (Ex 26 9; Lev 8 9, "And he put the mitre upon his head; also upon the mitre even upon his forefront, did he put the golden plate"; for "upon his forefront" RV has "in front"; 2 S 11 15, "in the forefront of the hottest battle"; of rō'sh, "head" (2 Ch 20 27); of shēn, "tooth" (1 S 14 5, "The forefront [AVm "Heb tooth"] of the one was situated northward over against Michmash," RV "The one crag rose up on the north in front of Michmash"); in 1 Macc 4 57 m it is the tr of prōsōpon, "face": "They decked the forefront of the temple with crowns of gold."

RV has "forefront" for "face" (Ezk 40 15), "in the forefront of" for "over against" (Josh 22 11).

FOREGO, fôr-go'. See FÖRGO.

FOREHEAD, fôr'ed (מִצְחָה, mēçah; μέτωπον, mētōpon):

(1) In a literal sense the word is used frequently in the Scriptures. Aaron and after him every high priest was to wear on the forehead the golden frontlet having the engraved motto, "Holy to Jeh" (Ex 28 36.38). The condition of the forehead was an important criterion in the diagnosis of leprosy by the priest (Lev 13 42.43; 2 Ch 26 20). It was in the forehead that brave young David smote Goliath with the stone from his sling (1 S 17 49). The faulty tr of AV in Ezk 16 12 has been corrected in RV, reference being had in the passage to a nose-ring, not to an ornament of the forehead. While the cutting or tattooing of the body was strictly forbidden to the Israelite on account of the heathen associations of the custom (Lev 19 28), we find frequent mention made of markings on the forehead, which were esp. used to designate slaves (see Philo, De Monarchia, I) or devotees of a godhead (Lucian, De Syria Dea, 59). In 3 Macc 2 29 we read that Ptolemy IV Philopator branded some Jews with the sign of an ivy leaf, marking them as devotees of Bacchus-Dionysos. Possibly we may compare herewith the tr of Isa 44 5 (RVm): "And another shall write on his hand, Unto Jeh" (or Jeh's slave). Very clear is the passage Ezk 9 4.6 (and perhaps Job 31 35), where the word used for "mark" is tdw, the name of the last letter of the Heb alphabet which in its earliest form has the shape of an upright + (Baal Lebanon Inscr, 11th cent. BC) or of a lying (St Andrew's) cross X (Moabite Inscr, 9th cent. BC), the simplest sign in the old Israelite alphabet, and at the same time the character which in the Gr alphabet represents the X, the initial of Christ. In the NT we find a clear echo of the above-mentioned OT passage, the marking of the foreheads of the righteous (Rev 7 3; 9 4; 14 1; 22 4). The godless followers of the beast are marked on the (right) hand and on the forehead (13 16; 14 9; 20 4), and the apocalyptic woman dressed in scarlet and purple has her name written on her forehead (17 5).

(2) In a metaphorical sense the expression, "a harlot's forehead," is used (Jer 3 3) to describe the shameless apostasy and faithlessness of Israel. Ezk speaks of the stiff-necked obstinacy and the persistent unwillingness of Israel to hear the message of Jeh: "All the house of Israel are of a hard forehead and of a stiff heart" (3 7), and God makes his prophet's "forehead hard . . . as an adamant harder than flint," whereby an unflinching loyalty to God and a complete disregard of opposition is meant (vs 8.9). Compare the phrase: "to harden the face," s.v. FACE. H. L. E. LUERING

FOREIGN DIVINITIES, for'in di-vin'i-tiz (Acts 17 18 m). See GOD(S), STRANGE.

FOREIGNER, for'in-är: The tr of נָכְרִי, nokhri, "unknown," "foreign," frequently rendered "stranger" (Dt 15 3; Ob ver 11); of יוֹשֵׁב חֵץ, tōshābh, "a settler," "an alien resident" (Ex 12 45; RV "sojourner"; cf Lev 25 47; Ps 39 12); of פְּרוֹכִיט, "dwelling near," "sojourner" (Eph 2 19, RV sojourners).

RV has "foreigner" for "stranger" (Dt 17 15; 23 20; 29 22; Ruth 2 10; 2 S 15 19), for "alien" (Dt 14 21); "the hand of a foreigner" for "a stranger's hand" (Lev 22 25). See ALIEN; STRANGER AND SOJOURNER.

FOREKNOW, för-nō', FOREKNOWLEDGE, för-nol'ej:

1. Meaning of the Term
2. Foreknowledge as Prescience
3. Foreknowledge Based on Foreordination
4. Foreknowledge as Equivalent to Foreordination

The word "foreknowledge" has two meanings. It is a term used in theology to denote the prescience or foresight of God, that is, His knowledge of the entire course of events of the Term which are future from the human point of view; and it is also used in AV and RV to translate the Gr words proginōskein and prōgnōsis in the NT, in which instances the word "foreknowledge" approaches closely the idea of foreordination.

In the sense of prescience foreknowledge is an aspect of God's omniscience (see OMNISCIENCE).

God's knowledge, according to the Scripture, is perfect, that is, it is omniscience. It is true that the Scripture makes use of anthropomorphic forms of expression as regards the way in which God obtains knowledge (Gen 3 8), and sometimes even represents Him as if He did not know certain things (Gen 11 5; 18 21); nevertheless the constant representation of the Scripture is that God knows everything. This perfect knowledge of God, moreover, is not merely a knowledge which is practically unlimited for all religious purposes, but is omniscience in the strictest sense of the term. In the historical books of the OT the omniscience of God is a constant underlying presupposition when it is said that God watches men's actions, knows their acts and words, and discloses to them the future; while in the Psalms, Prophets and Wisdom literature, this Divine attribute becomes an object of reflection, and finds doctrinal expression. It cannot, however, be said that this attribute of God appears only late in the history of special revelation; it is a characteristic of the Bib. idea of God from the very first, and it is only its didactic expression which comes out with especial clearness in the later books. God's knowledge, then, is represented as perfect. Since He is free from all limits of space, His omniscience is frequently connected with His omnipresence. This is the thought which underlies the anthropomorphic expressions where God is represented as seeing, beholding and having eyes. God's eyes go to and fro throughout the whole earth (2 Ch 16 9), and are in every place beholding the evil and the good (Prov 15 3). Even Sheol is naked and open to God's sight (Prov 15 11; Job 26 6). The night and darkness are light to Him, and darkness and light for God are both alike (Ps 139 12). All animals and fowls are His, and so are known by Him (50 11), and as their Creator God knows all the hosts of the heavenly bodies (Ps 147 4; Isa 40 26). He knows also the heart of man and its thoughts (1 S 16 7; 1 K 8 39; Ps 7 9 [Heb 10]; 94 11; 139 2; Jer 11 20; 17 9.10; 20 12; Ezk 11 5). Furthermore, God knows man entirely in all his ways (Ps 139 1-5; Prov 5 21). He looks from heaven and sees all men (Ps 11 4; 14 2; 33 13. 14.15). Evil and sin are also known to God (Gen 3 11; 6 5.9.13; 2 S 7 20; Ps 69 5 [Heb 6]; Jer 16 17; 18 23). In a word, God knows with absolute accuracy all about man (Job 11 11; 34 21; Ps 33 15; Prov 5 21; Hos 5 3; Jer 11 20; 12 3; 17 9f; 18 23). This perfect knowledge finds its classic expression in Ps 139.

God is also, according to the OT, free from all limitations of time, so that His consciousness is not in the midst of the stream of the succeeding moments of time, as is the case with the human consciousness. God is not only without beginning or end of days, but with Him a thousand years are as one day. Hence God knows in one eternal intuition that which for the human consciousness is past, present and future. In a strict sense, therefore, there can be no foreknowledge or prescience with God, and the distinction in God's knowledge made by theologians, as knowledge of reminiscence, vision and prescience, is after all an anthropomorphism. Nevertheless this is the only way in which we can conceive of the Divine omniscience in its relation to time, and consequently the Scripture represents the matter as if God's knowledge of future events were a foreknowledge or prescience, and God is represented as knowing the past, present and future.

It is God's knowledge of events which from the human point of view are future that constitutes His foreknowledge in the sense of prescience. God is represented as having a knowledge of the entire course of events before they take place. Such a knowledge belongs to the Scriptural idea of God from the very outset of special revelation. He knows beforehand what Abraham will do, and what will happen to him; He knows beforehand that Pharaoh's heart will be hardened, and that Moses will deliver Israel (Gen 15 13 ff; Ex 3 19; 7 4; 11 1 ff). The entire history of the patriarchal period of revelation exhibits plainly the foreknowledge of God in this sense. In prophecy this aspect of the Divine knowledge is made the subject of explicit assertion, and its religious significance is brought out. Nothing future is hidden from Jeh (Isa 41 22 ff; 42 9; 43 9-13; 44 6-8; 46 10; Dnl 2 22; Am 3 7), and this foreknowledge embraces the entire course of man's life (Ps 31 15 [Heb 16]; 39 5 [Heb 6]; 139 4-6.16; Job 14 5). These passages from Isa show that it is from the occurrence of events in accordance with Jeh's prediction that the Prophet will prove his foreknowledge; and that in contrast with the worshippers of idols which are taken by surprise, Israel is warned of the future by the omniscient Jeh.

In the NT likewise, God's omniscience is explicitly affirmed. Jesus taught that God knows the hidden secrets of man's heart (Lk 16 15); and this is also the teaching of the apostles (Acts 1 24; 15 8; 1 Cor 2 10; 3 20; 1 Thess 2 4; Rev 2 23). In a word, according to the author of the Epistle to the He, everything is open to God, so that He is literally omniscient (He 4 13). And as in the OT, so also in the NT, foreknowledge in the sense of prescience is ascribed to God. Jesus asserts a foreknowledge by God of that which is hidden from the Son (Mk 13 32), and James asserts that all God's works are foreknown by Him (Acts 15 18). Moreover the many references in the NT to the fulfilment of prophecy all imply that the NT writers ascribed foreknowledge, in this sense of foresight, to God.

Denials of the Divine foreknowledge, in this sense of prescience, have been occasioned, not by exegetical considerations, but by the supposed conflict of this truth with human freedom. It was supposed that in order to be free, an event must be uncertain and contingent as regards the fact of its futurity, and that too in the most absolute sense, that is, from the Divine as well as the human point of view. Hence the Socinians and some Arminians denied the foreknowledge of God. It was supposed either that God voluntarily determines not to foresee the free volitions of man, or else that since God's omniscience is simply the knowledge of all that is knowable, it does not embrace the free acts of man which are by their nature uncertain and so unknowable. And upon this view of freedom, this denial of God's foreknowledge was logically necessary. If the certainty of events with respect to the fact of their futurity is inconsistent with freedom, then human freedom does conflict with God's foreknowledge, since God cannot know future events as certainly future unless they actually are so. Since, therefore, the Divine foreknowledge is quite as inconsistent with this view of freedom as is the Divine foreordination, the view of those who regard God as a mere onlooker on the course of future events which are supposed to be entirely independent of His purpose and control, does not help matters in the least. If God foreknows future events as certain, then they must be certain, and if so, then the certainty of their actually occurring must depend either upon God's decree and providential control, or else upon a fate independent of God. It was to escape these supposed difficulties that the doctrine known as scientia media was propounded. It was supposed that God has a knowledge of events as conditionally future, that is, events neither merely possible nor certainly future, but suspended upon conditions undetermined by God. But this hypothesis is of no help and is not true. Besides being contrary to the Scripture in its idea that many events lie outside the decree of God, and that God must wait upon man in His government of the world, there is really no such class of events as this theory asserts. If God foreknows that the conditions on which they are suspended will be fulfilled, then these events belong to the class of events which are certainly future; whereas if God does not know whether or not the conditions will be fulfilled by man, then His foreknowledge is denied, and these events in question belong to the class of those merely possible. Nor do the Scripture passages to which appeal is made, such as Gen 11 6; Ex 3 19; Dt 7 3.4; 1 S 23 10-13; 2 S 12 8, etc., afford a basis for this doctrine. The Scripture of course recognizes that God has put all things in relations of mutual dependence, and speaks of what can or cannot happen under such and such conditions; but none of these passages assert or imply that the events are suspended upon conditions which are either unknown or undetermined by God.

God's foreknowledge, according to the Scripture teaching, is based upon His plan or eternal purpose, which embraces everything that comes to pass. God is never represented as a mere onlooker seeing the future course of events, but having no part in it. That God has such a plan is the teaching of the entire Scripture. It is implied in the OT conception of God as an Omnipotent Person governing all things in accordance with His will. This idea is involved in the names of God in the patriarchal revelation, 'El, 'Elohim, 'El Shaddai, and in the prophetic name Jeh of Hosts. This latter name teaches not only God's infinite power and glory, but also makes Him known as interposing in accordance with His sovereign will and purpose in the affairs of this world, and as having also the spiritual powers of the heavenly world at His disposal for the execution of His eternal purpose. Hence this idea of God comes to signify the omnipotent Ruler of the universe (Ps 24 10; Isa 6 3; 51 5; 54 5; Jer 10 16; Am 9 5; cf Oehler, Theol. of the OT, ET, II, 280).

Not only in this conception of God as omnipotent and sovereign Ruler is the thought of His eternal plan evolved; it is explicitly asserted throughout the whole OT. The purpose of God as determining human history in the Book of Gen lies clearly upon the surface of the narrative, as, for example, in the history of Abraham and of Joseph. And where there is no abstract statement of this truth, it is evident that the writer regards every event as but the unfolding of the purpose of God. In the Psalms, Prophets, and Wisdom literature, this truth finds explicit and reiterated assertion. Jeh has an eternal purpose (Ps 33 11), and this purpose will certainly come to pass (Isa 14 27; 43 13). This purpose includes all events and renders certain their occurrence (Isa 14 24; 40 10; 46 9.10; Zec 1 6). In the Wisdom literature the ethical character of this plan is dwelt upon, as well as its all-embracing character, and the certainty of its fulfilment (Prov 16 4.33; 19 21; 20 24; Job 28 23). The providential control wherewith Jeh executes this plan includes the heart of man (Prov 21 1).

The NT likewise regards all history as but the unfolding of God's eternal purpose (Acts 4 28), which includes man's salvation (Eph 1 4.5; 2 Tim 1 9), the provision of Christ as Saviour (1 Pet 1 20), and the good works of the Christian (Eph 2 10). See PREDESTINATION.

Now while the writers of the OT and the NT do not write in an abstract or philosophical manner nor enter into metaphysical explanations of the relation between God's foreknowledge and foreordination, it is perfectly evident that they had a clear conception upon this subject. Although anthropomorphisms are used in regard to the manner in which God knows, He is never conceived as if He obtained His knowledge of the future as a mere onlooker gazing down the course of events in time. The idea that the omnipotent Creator and sovereign Ruler of the universe should govern the world and form His plan as contingent and dependent upon a mere foresight of events outside His purpose and control is not only contrary to the entire Scriptural idea of God's sovereignty and omnipotence, but is also contrary to the Scriptural idea of God's foreknowledge which is always conceived as dependent upon His sovereign purpose. According to the Scriptural conception, God foreknows because He has foreordained all things, and because in His providence He will certainly bring all to pass. His foreknowledge is not a dependent one which must wait upon events, but is simply the knowledge which God has of His own eternal purpose. Dillmann has called this "a productive foreknowledge" (Handbuch d. attest. Theol., 251). This is not exactly correct. The OT does not conceive God's foreknowledge as "producing" or causing events. But when Dillmann says that in the OT there is no hint of an "idle foreknowledge" on God's part, he is giving expression to the truth that in the OT God's foreknowledge is based upon His foreordination and providential control of all things. The Divine foreknowledge, therefore, depends upon the Divine purpose which has determined the world plan (Am 3 7), and all its details (Job 28 26-27). Before man is born God knows him and chooses him for his work (Jer 1 5; Job 28 13,14), and God's thorough knowledge of man in Ps 139 is made to rest upon the fact that God has determined man's lot beforehand (Ps 139 14-16).

The same thing is true of the NT teaching on this subject. The Divine foreknowledge is simply God's knowledge of His own eternal purpose. This is esp. clear in those cases where God's eternal purpose of redemption through Christ is represented as a mystery which is known by God and which can be known by man only when it pleases God to reveal it (Eph 1 9; 3 4,9).

While, therefore, the foreknowledge of God in the sense of prescience is asserted in the NT, this is not the meaning of the term when used to translate the Gr words proginōskēin and prognōsis. These words as Equivalents which are tr^d in AV and RV by the word "foreknowledge," and once by the word "foreordain" (1 Pet 1 20 AV), mean much more than mere intellectual foresight or prescience.

Both the vb. and the noun approach the idea of foreordination and are closely connected with that idea in the passages where these words occur. Thus in Peter's speeches in Acts the predestination which finds expression in 4 28 is practically identified with the term prognōsis in 2 23. Everything which happened to Jesus took place in accordance with "the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God," so that nothing happened except that which God had foreordained. In this verse the term foreknowledge is an expansion of the idea of God's "counsel" or plan, regarding it as an intelligent prearrangement, the idea of foreknowledge being assimilated to that of foreordination. The same idea is found in 1 Pet 1 20. Here the apostle speaks of Christ as a lamb "foreordained" by God before the foundation of the world. The Gr vb. proegnōsménou, meaning lit. "foreknown" (as in RV) is tr^d "foreordained" in AV. It is evidently God's foreordination of Jesus as Saviour which Peter has in mind. Also in 1 Pet 1 2 those to whom the apostle is writing are characterized as "elect according to the foreknowledge [prognōsis] of God," where the election is based on the "foreknowledge." By the prognōsis or foreknowledge, however, far more is meant than prescience. It has the idea of a purpose which determines the course of the Divine procedure. If it meant simply prevision of faith or love or any quality in the objects of the election, Peter would not only flatly contradict Paul (Rom 9 11; Eph 1 3,4; 2 Tim 1 9); but also such a rendering would conflict with the context of this passage, because the objects of election are chosen "unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of . . . Christ," so that their new obedience and relation to Christ are determined by their election by God, which election springs from a "foreknowledge" which therefore cannot mean a mere prescience.

In view of the fact that there was a classical use of the simple vb. ginōskēin in the sense of "resolve," and more esp. of the fact that this word is used in the NT to denote an affectionate or loving regard or approbation in accordance with a common use of the Heb yādhā' (Mt 7 23; 1 Cor 8 3; Gal 4 9; 2 Tim 2 19), there is nothing arbitrary in giving it this sense when compounded with the preposition pro when the context clearly demands it, as it does in the above passage (cf Johnstone, Comm. on Pet in loc.; per contra Meyer on passages in Acts and Rom). The word prognōsis is, however, discriminated from "predestination." It is that loving regard in God from which the Divine election springs, which election Peter evidently regarded as sovereign, since sanctification is only a confirmation of it (2 Pet 1 10), and stumbling and disobedience are referred to 'appointment to unbelief' (1 Pet 2 8). Here, then, we have a pregnant use of foreknowledge in which it is assimilated to the idea of purpose, and denotes a sovereign and loving regard.

The word prognōsis is also found in this sense in the writings of Paul, in cases where it is manifestly impossible to regard it as a mere intellectual foresight, not only because of Paul's doctrine that election is absolutely sovereign (Eph 1 3,4; Rom 9 11; 2 Tim 1 9), but also because of the contexts in which the term occurs.

In Rom 8 29,30 the word "foreknow" occurs in immediate connection with God's predestination of the objects of salvation. Those whom God foreknew, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His son. Now the foreknowledge in this case cannot mean a mere prescience or foresight of faith (Meyer, Godet) or love (Weiss) in the subjects of salvation, which faith or love is supposed to determine the Divine predestination. This would not only contradict Paul's view of the absolutely sovereign and gracious character of election, but is diametrically opposed to the context of this passage. These verses form a part of the encouragement which Paul offers his readers for their troubles, including their own inward weakness. The apostle tells them that they may be sure that all things work together for good to them that love God; and these are defined as being those whom God has called in accordance with His purpose. Their love to God is evidently their love as Christians, and is the result of a calling which itself follows from an eternal purpose, so that their Christian love is simply the means by which they may know that they have been the subjects of this call. They have not come within the sphere of God's love by their own choice, but have been "called" into this relationship by God, and that in accordance with an eternal purpose on His part.

What follows, therefore, must have as its motive simply to unfold and ground this assurance of salvation by tracing it all back to the "foreknowledge" of God. To regard this foreknowledge as contingent upon anything in man would thus be in flat contradiction with the entire context of the passage as well as its motive. The word "foreknowledge" here evidently has the pregnant sense which we found it to have in Peter. Hence those whom God predestinates, calls, justifies and glorifies are just those whom He has looked upon with His sovereign love. To assign any other meaning to "foreknowledge" here would be out of accord with the usage of the term elsewhere in the NT when it is put in connection with predestination, and would contradict the purpose for which Paul introduces the passage, that is, to assure his readers that their ultimate salvation depends, not on their weakness, but on God's sovereign love and grace and power.

It is equally impossible to give the word prognōsis any other sense in the other passage where Paul uses it. In Rom 11 2, speaking of the Jews, Paul says that "God did not cast off his people which he foreknew." It is quite impossible to regard this as meaning that God had a foresight or mere prevision of some quality in Israel which determined His choice of them, not only because it is the teaching of the entire Scripture that God's choice of Israel was sovereign and gracious, and not only because of the actual history of Israel, but also because of the context. Paul says that it would be absurd to suppose that God had cast off His people because He foreknew them, His foreknowledge of them being adduced as a ground for His not casting them off. Hence the argument would have no force if anything in Israel, foreseen by God, were supposed to ground an assurance that He had not cast them off, because the context is full of the hardness of heart and unbelief of Israel. The foreknowledge here has evidently the same sense as in the former passage.

Foreknowledge, therefore, in the NT is more than mere prescience. It is practically identical with the Divine decree in two instances, and in the other places where the term occurs it denotes the sovereign loving regard out of which springs God's predestination or election of men to salvation. FOREORDAIN, fôr-ôr-dân', FOREORDINATION, fôr-ôr-di-nâ'shun: The word "foreordain" is uniformly used in RV to render the Gr προορίζω, proôrizô, in the passages where this vb. occurs (Acts 4 28; Rom 8 29,30; 1 Cor 2 7; Eph 1 5,11). In the passages in Rom and Eph it takes the place of the AV word "predestinate," a return to the usage of the older Eng. VSS. The word has simply the sense of determining beforehand. It is thus kindred in meaning with a number of other NT words expressing the idea of Divine purpose, as "foreknow" (in pregnant sense, Acts 2 23; Rom 8 29, etc); "determine" (Acts 17 26); "appoint" (1 Pet 2 8). Foreordination, in the widest sense, is coextensive with the sphere of God's universal providence, being but another name for that Divine plan, purpose or counsel which embraces all things, great and small (Mt 10 29,30), that happen in Nature, or fall out in human life. Man's free actions are not regarded in Scripture as excluded from it (Acts 2 28). Foreordination, at the same time, is not to be conceived of as in any way overriding, or doing violence to, human freedom. Man acts freely, as Nature acts necessarily, but it is God who appoints the time, place and circumstances of the free act, permits its happening, and overrules it and its issues for the furthering of His own wise and holy ends. See PROVIDENCE. Foreordination in the sphere of grace has respect to the choice, calling and blessing of those who, through faith, are made partakers of eternal life (Rom 8 29,30; Eph 1 5,11). In this, its soteriological aspect, the subject is considered in special articles. See CHOOSE; ELECTION; PREDESTINATION. JAMES ORR

FOREPART, fôr-pärt: The tr of פָּנִים, pānim, "face" (Ex 28 27; 39 20; 1 K 6 20, RV "within"; Ezk 42 7, RV "before"), and of πῶρα, prôra, the forward part of a ship, the prow (Acts 27 41, "the forepart stuck fast," RV "the foreship struck").

ARV has "its forepart into" for "with his face towards" (Joel 2 20 m "with its forepart"); "in the forepart thereof" for "before it" (Ex 28 25; 39 18).

FORERUNNER, fôr-run'ēr (πρόδρομος, prô-dromos): This word occurs but once in the Bible: "Whither as a forerunner Jesus entered for us"

(He 6 20). The word signifies one who comes in advance to a place where the rest are to follow, or one who is sent on before as a scout to take observations. In this sense Christ is our forerunner for He has gone into heaven to prepare a place for His people into which He will eventually lead them. The idea of a forerunner is peculiar to the Christian dispensation. The OT Levitical economy knew nothing of such. The high priest was a representative, not a forerunner: where he led, viz. into the Holy of Holies, the people could not follow. He was not the pioneer of the people; Christ is. Christ goes nowhere but where His people may follow. He is the file-leader (cf He 12 2, "the author . . . of faith"). He goeth before His people to prepare the way for them, to open the gates of heaven by His atoning blood and priestly intercession. The believer is led into full fellowship with God through Jesus Christ. See also JOHN THE BAPTIST; RUNNER. WILLIAM EVANS

FORESKIN, fôr'skin (פְּרִיָה, 'orlâh; ἀκροβυστία, akrobustia, often euphemistically tr^d "uncircumcision"):—

(1) In the literal sense the word is frequently mentioned owing to the rite of circumcision in vogue in Israel since the days of Abraham (Gen 17 9-14) and among several other peoples of antiquity and modern times. The act of circumcision is represented in the temple of Khonsu, a medical deity, at Karnak. Among the Jews of antiquity circumcision had to be performed by means of a flint or stone knife (Ex 4 25; Josh 5 2,3) on the eighth day after birth (Gen 17 12; 21 4; Lev 12 3; Lk 2 21; Phil 3 5), even if this day was the Sabbath (Jn 7 22).

Very early we find the practice one of which the descendants of Abraham became proud (Gen 34 14), so that we see the uncircumcised despised and scorned (1 S 17 26), and in the time of oppression under King Antiochus Epiphanes many Israelites suffered martyrdom rather than give up the distinctive sign of their people (1 Macc 1 48,60,61; 2 Macc 6 10). Among the Arabs and all Mohammedans the custom of circumcision prevails from pre-Islamic times, for it is nowhere ordered in the Koran, and the appellation "uncircumcised" (غلف, ghalaf) is considered the greatest possible insult.

A peculiar martial custom is mentioned in 1 S 18 25, 27 (cf 2 S 3 14), where Saul is represented as asking "a hundred foreskins of the Philis" as a dowry from David for the hand of Michal. This does not seem to have been an exceptional booty in war, esp. if it meant that no very careful operation was expected to be performed, but the act became practically equivalent to extermination. We find in Egypt history at the time of Ramses III, that an invasion into Egypt had been made by several Libyan tribes (see Dümichen, Histor. Inschr., I, plates I-VI, and II, plates 47 ff). The Egypt army sent against the invaders defeated them and returned with a large number of karnatha which is a transcription into hieroglyphics of the Sem word קַרְנִית, kar-nôth, the word being used euphemistically as is proven by the accompanying determinative sign of a phallus. See Chabas, Études sur l'antiquité historique d'après les sources égyptiennes, etc, 234; Bondi, Hebr.-Phoen. Lehnworte im Egyptischen, Leipzig, 1886, 72-74.

(2) Metaphorically the word is used in a variety of ways: (a) In the sense of "unlawful," "forbidden as food," "taboo." The fruit of newly planted trees was not to be eaten (Lev 19 23-25). (b) In the sense of "obstinacy," "opposition to God's law." The rite of circumcision meant submission under the law. While an outward form could not be identical with an inward attitude toward God, the use of the word "circumcision" was soon extended to that of purity and obedience of the heart (Dt 10 16; 30 6; and Col 2 11, where this circumcision is called a "circumcision not made with hands, . . . the circumcision of Christ"). The uselessness of outward circumcision, which does not include obedience and purity, is shown by St. Paul (Rom 2 25; 1 Cor 7 18; cf Acts 7 51). (c) In the sense of "Gentiles," "non-Israelites" (Gal 2 7; Eph 2 11; Col 3 11). See CIRCUMCISION; CON-

CISION. H. L. E. LUEHRING

FOREST, for'est:

(1) יָרֵד, hāresh (cf proper name Harosheth), 2 Ch 27 4. In 1 S 23 15 fr tr^d "wood"; in Isa 17 9, "wood"; in Ezk 31 3, "forest-like shade." Applied to any thick growth of vegetation but not necessarily so extensive as (3).

(2) פָּרְדֵּי, pardē: Neh 2 8, m "park"; Eccl 2 5, AV "orchards," RV "parks"; Cant 4 13, EV "orchard," RVm "paradise." A word of Pers origin signifying probably an inclosure. See PARADISE.

(3) יָרַע, ya'ar, from root meaning "rugged"; cf Arab. wa'ar, "a rugged, stony region." It is sometimes rendered "forest" and sometimes (but less often in RV) "wood." It is used of certain definite wooded tracts: "the forest in Arabia" (Isa 21 13, m "thickets"); "the forest of Carmel" (2 K 19 23 AV, RV "of his fruitful field"); "the forest of Hereth" (1 S 22 5); "the forest of Lebanon" (1 K 7 2 f; 10 17-21; 2 Ch 9 16-20); "the forest of Ephraim," E. of the Jordan (2 S 18 6.8.17). The word ya'ar appears also in well-known Kiriath-jearim, "the city of forests," and Mt. Jearim (Josh 15 10). Among numerous other references the following may be cited: Dt 19 5; Josh 17 15.18; 1 Ch 16 33; 2 K 2 24; Ps 80 13; 83 14; 96 12; 132 6; Eccl 2 6; Cant 2 3; 1 S 7 2; 14 25.26; Jer 4 29; 46 23; Ezk 34 29; Mic 3 12; 7 14.

(4) עֲבֵיט, ʿēbhakkh, from root meaning "to interweave." A "thicket" (Gen 22 13; Jer 4 7); "thicket of trees" (Ps 74 5); "thickets of the forest" (Isa 9 18; 10 34).

(5) עֲבֵיט, ʿēbhim, "thicket" (Jer 4 29).

From many references it is evident that Pal had in OT times much more extensive forests and woodlands than today. For a discussion of the subject see BOTANY. E. W. G. MASTERMAN FOREST OF EPHRAIM. See EPHRAIM.

FORETELL, fōr-tel', FORETOLD, fōr-tōld': The AV occurrences of these words in the NT represent as many Gr terms, and are in each case rendered differently in RV: (1) Mk 13 23 (προειπω, proei-pon), RV "told beforehand"; (2) Acts 3 24 (προκαταγγέλλω, prokataggellō), RV simply "told"; (3) 2 Cor 13 2 (προλέγω, prolēgō), RV "said beforehand," m "plainly"; cf 1 Thess 3 4. The foretelling of future events is claimed in the OT as a prerogative of Jeh (Isa 41 22.23; 42 9, etc; cf Dt 18 22). See PROPHECY.

FORFEIT, fōr'fit (פָּרַע, hāram): "Forfeit" (from forisfacere, "to act beyond") implies loss through transgression or non-observance of some law or rule. The word occurs only once as the tr of hāram, "to shut in," frequently to devote or consecrate a person or thing to God beyond redemption (cf Lev 27 28.29; Mic 4 13; Ezr 10 8, "That whosoever came not within three days, . . . all his substance should be forfeited, and himself separated from the assembly of the captivity," AVm, ARVm and RV "devoted"; cf 1 Esd 9 4, "Their cattle should be seized to the use of the temple"

RV has "forfeited" (kādhēsh, "consecrated," "devoted") for "defiled" (Dt 22 9), m "Heb consecrated"; "forfeit his life" for "lose his own soul" (psuchē) (Mt 16 26; Mk 8 36); "lose or forfeit his own self" for "lose himself or be cast away" (Lk 9 25, heautōn de apolēsas ē zēmiōthēs; zēmiōō is the LXX for anash, "to be mulcted," or "fined," Ex 21 22; Dt 22 19; Prov 17 26 m; 19 19; 21 11; 22 3); Weymouth renders Lk 9 25, "to have lost or forfeited his own self" (or "had to pay his own self—his own existence—as a fine"); in the other instances of zēmiōō (1 Cor 3 15; Phil 3 8), AV and RV render "suffer loss," "suffered . . . loss"; 2 Cor 7 9 AV, "receive damage."

FORGE, fōrj, FORGER, fōr'jēr (פָּחַד, fāphal): "Forgers of lies" occurs in Job's reply to his comforters (13 4; cf 14 17); the word is the tr of fāphal, "to patch," "lay on," "besmear," hence to impute, overcharge, etc; in Ps 119 69, "forged" occurs with a similar meaning: "The proud have forged a lie against me" (cf Sir 51 2). "Forger," in the sense of "one who forges, makes, anything," is the RV rendering of lāqash, "to smite," or "hammer," in Gen 4 22 AV: "Tubal-cain, an instructor of every artificer in brass and iron," RV "the forger of every cutting instrument of brass and iron," m "an instructor of every artificer of copper and iron."

FORGET, for-get', FORGETFUL, for-get'ful (פָּחַח, shākhah; ἐπιλανθάνομαι, epilanthanomai): "Forget" is to fail to hold in mind, and the forgetfulness may be either innocent or blameworthy. In the OT the word is most frequently used as tr of shākhah in a blameworthy sense: to forget the covenant, the law, Jeh their God (Dt 4 9.23.31; 6 12; Jgs 3 7; 1 S 12 9; Ps 44 20, etc). In an innocent or neutral, sometimes good, sense it is used in Gen 27 45; Dt 24 19; Job 9 27; 11 16; 24 20; Ps 102 4, etc. It is also used of God forgetting or not seeming to care (Ps 9 12; 10 11.12; 13 1; 42 9; 77 9; Isa 49 15, etc). To "forget" sometimes means to forsake (Ps 45 10; 74 19, etc).

In the NT epilanthanomai is used of simple forgetting (Mt 16 5; Mk 8 14, etc; in Lk 12 6 the sense of care is implied); Phil 3 13, "forgetting the things which are behind," has the force of leaving behind. "Forgetful" in Jas 1 25 is epilethmonē, RV "a hearer that forgetteth." "Forgetfulness" Ps 88 12, "the land of forgetfulness," is a synonym for Sheol, where all forget and are forgotten. RV has "forget not" for "be ignorant of" (2 Pet 3 8; similarly ver 5).

FORGIVENESS, for-giv'nes (כַּפָּר, kāphar, ἁφίεσις, nāsā', ἱλῆψ, śālāh; ἀπολύειν, apoluēin, χαρίζεσθαι, charizesthai, ἁφίσις, āphesis, πᾶσις, pāsisis):

11. The Need of an Atonement
12. The NT Doctrine of Atonement

Of the seven words, three Heb and four Gr, which are used to express the idea of forgiveness, the last two occur in this sense only once each.

1. Ety- Apoluēin (Lk 6 37) is used because mology of the analogy of sin to debt, and denotes the release from it. It has the meaning "forgiveness" in 2 Mac 12 45 also, in which passage the word for sin is expressed. In Rom 3 25 Paul uses pareia instead of the usual aphesia. The former means "putting aside," "disregarding," "pretermisssion"; the latter, "putting away" completely and unreservedly (Trench, Synonyms of the NT, § xxxiii). It does not mean forgiveness in the complete sense, and in AV is incorrectly tr^d "remission." Nor does it mean that God had temporarily suspended punishment which at some later date He might inflict (Sanday on Rom 3 25). It was apparent that God had treated sins as though He had forgiven them, though in fact such an attitude on the part of God was without such a foundation as was later supplied by an adequate atonement, and so the apostle avoids saying that God forgave them. This passing over of sins had the tendency of destroying man's conception of God's righteousness, and in order to avert this Christ was set forth as a propitiation and God's disregard of sin (pareia) became a real forgiveness (aphesia); cf Acts 14 16; 17 30. Charizesthai is not found outside of the writings of Luke and Paul, and in the sense "to forgive sins" is peculiarly Pauline (2 Cor 2 7; 12 13; Eph 4 32; Col 2 13; 3 13). It expresses, as no other of these words does, his conception of the graciousness of God's pardon. Kāphar (Dt 21 8; Ps 78 38; Jer 18 23) and šālah (Nu 30 5.8.12; 1 K 8 30.34.36.39.50, etc) are used only of Divine forgiveness, while nāṣa is used in this sense (Ex 32 32; Nu 14 19; Josh 24 19; Ps 25 18; 32 1.5; 99 8; Isa 2 9), and also of human forgiveness (Gen 50 17; Ex 10 17; 1 S 25 28). Remission (Mt 26 28; Mk 1 14; Lk 1 77; 24 47; Acts 2 38; 10 43; He 9 22; 10 18) and blotting out (Ps 51 1.9; Isa 43 25; Jer 18 23; Acts 3 19) are synonyms of forgiveness, and to understand it fully such words as save, justify, reconcile and atonement should also be considered.

Forgiveness was not a pagan virtue. The large-souled man might disregard offences in cases where he considered them beneath his notice.

2. Pagan and Jewish Ideas but to forgive was weak-spirited (F. W. Robertson on 1 Cor 4 12). Even in the OT, man's forgiveness of his fellow-man is infrequently mentioned. In every case the one asking forgiveness is in a position of subservency, and is petitioning for that to which he has no just right (Gen 50 17; Ex 10 17; 1 S 15 25; 25 28). The Imprecatory Psalms attest the fact that forgiveness of enemies was not esteemed as a virtue by Israel. They could appeal to the law which enjoined upon them to seek neither the peace nor the prosperity of their avowed enemies (Dt 23 6; cf Esr 9 12). Jesus gave the popular summing-up of the law and not its exact words when he said, "Ye have heard that it was said . . . hate thine enemy" (Mt 5 43), and this certainly does represent their attitude and their understanding of the teaching of the Scriptures.

Christ taught that forgiveness is a duty. No limit can be set to the extent of forgiveness (Lk 17 4) and it must be granted without reserve. Jesus will not admit that there is any wrong so gross nor so often repeated that it is beyond forgiveness.

3. The Teaching of Christ To Him an unforgiving spirit is one of the most heinous of sins (Bruce, Parabolic Teaching, 376 ff). This is the offence which God will not forgive (Mt 18 34.35). It is the very essence of the unpardonable sin (Mk 3 22-30). It was the one blemish of the elder son which marred an otherwise irreproachable life (Lk 15 28-30). This natural, pagan spirit of implacability Jesus sought to displace by a generous, forgiving spirit. It is so far the essence of His teaching that in popular language

"a Christian spirit" is not inappropriately understood to be synonymous with a forgiving disposition. His answer to Peter that one should forgive not merely seven times in a day, but seventy times seven (Mt 18 21.22), not only shows that He thought of no limit to one's forgiveness, but that the principle could not be reduced to a definite formula.

Jesus recognized that there are conditions to be fulfilled before forgiveness can be granted. Forgiveness is part of a mutual relation-

4. Conditions of Forgiveness ship; the other part is the repentance of the offender. God does not forgive Forgiveness without repentance, nor is it required of man. The effect of forgiveness is to restore to its former state the relationship which was broken by sin. Such a restoration requires the coöperation of both parties. There must be both a granting and an acceptance of the forgiveness. Sincere, deep-felt sorrow for the wrong which works repentance (2 Cor 7 10) is the condition of mind which insures the acceptance of the forgiveness. Hence Jesus commands forgiveness when the offender turns again, saying, "I repent" (Lk 17 3.4). It was this state of mind which led the father joyfully to welcome the Prodigal before he even gave utterance to his newly formed purpose (15 21).

It is not to be supposed, however, that failure to repent upon the part of the offender releases the

5. The Offended Party offended from all obligation to extend forgiveness. Without the repentance of the one who has wronged him he can have a forgiving state of mind. This

Jesus requires, as is implied by, "if ye forgive not every one his brother from your hearts" (Mt 18 35). It is also implied by the past tense in the Lord's Prayer: "as we also have forgiven our debtors" (6 12). It is this forgiving spirit which conditions God's forgiveness of our sins (Mk 11 25; Mt 6 14.15). In such a case the unforgiving spirit is essentially unrepentance (Mt 18 23-35). "Of all acts, is not, for a man, repentance the most Divine?"

The offended is to go even farther and is to seek to bring the wrongdoer to repentance. This is the purpose of the rebuking commanded in Lk 17 3. More explicitly Jesus says, "If thy brother sin against thee, go, show him his fault between thee and him alone" (Mt 18 15-17). He is to carry his pursuit to the point of making every reasonable effort to win the wrongdoer, and only when he has exhausted every effort may he abandon it. The object is the gaining of his brother. Only when this is evidently unattainable is all effort to cease.

The power of binding and loosing, which means forbidding and allowing, was granted to Peter (16 19) and to the Christian community (18 18; Jn 20 23). It clearly implies the possession of the power to forgive sins. In the case of Peter's power it was exercised when he used the keys of the kingdom of heaven (Mt 16 19). This consisted in the proclamation of the gospel and esp. of the conditions upon which men might enter into relationship with God (Acts 2 38; 10 34 ff). It was not limited to Peter only, but was shared by the other apostles (Mt 16 19; 18 18). Christ left no fixed rules the observance or non-observance of which would determine whether one is or is not in the kingdom of God. He gave to His disciples principles, and in the application of these principles to the problems of life there had to be the exercise of discriminating judgment. The exercise of this judgment was left to the Christian community (2 Cor 2 10). It is limited by the principles which are the basis of the kingdom, but within these principles the voice of the community is supreme. The forgiveness here implied is not the pronouncing of absolution for the sins of individuals, but the determination of courses of conduct and worship which will be acceptable. In doing this its decisions will be ratified in heaven (Westcott on Jn 20 23).

That there is a close analogy between human and Divine forgiveness is clearly implied (Mt 5 23.24; 6 12; Mk 11 25; Lk 6 37; Col 1 14; 3 13). God's forgiveness is conditional upon man's forgiveness of the wrongs done him, not because God forgives grudgingly but because forgiveness alone indicates that disposition of mind which will humbly accept the Divine pardon. Repentance

6. Divine is a necessary ingredient of the fully and Human developed forgiveness. There is no Forgiveness essential difference between the human and the Divine pardon, though the latter is necessarily more complete. It results in the complete removal of all estrangement and alienation between God and man. It restores completely the relationship which existed prior to the sin. The total removal of the sin as a result of the Divine forgiveness is variously expressed in the Scriptures: "Thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back" (Isa 38 17); "Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea" (Mic 7 19); "I will forgive their iniquity, and their sin will I remember no more" (Jer 31 34); "I, even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions" (Isa 43 25); "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us" (Ps 103 12). Ideally this same result is attained in human forgiveness, but actually the memory of the sin remains with both parties as a barrier between them, and even when there is a complete restoration of amity the former state of alienation cannot entirely be removed from memory. When God forgives, however, He restores man to the condition of former favor. Release from punishment is involved, though Divine forgiveness is more than this. In most cases the consequences, which in some instances are spoken of as punishment, are not removed, but they lose all penal character and become disciplinary. Nor does the forgiveness remove from human mind the consciousness of sin and the guilt which that involved, but it does remove the mistrust which was the ground of the alienation. Mistrust is changed into trust, and this produces peace of mind (Ps 32 5-7; Rom 5 1); consciousness of the Divine love and mercy (Ps 103 2 ff); removes fear of punishment (2 S 12 13); and awakens love to God.

Paul rarely uses the term "forgiveness," but in its place prefers justification. They are to his understanding practically synonymous 7. Forgive- (Stevens, Theology of the NT, 418). ness and He preferred the latter, however, Justification cause it was better fitted to express the idea of secure, present and permanent acceptance in the sight of God. It connoted both a complete and a permanent state of grace. In popular thought forgiveness is not so comprehensive, but in the Bib. sense it means no less than this. It removes all of the guilt and cause of alienation from the past; it assures a state of grace for the present; and promises Divine mercy and aid for the future. Its fulness cannot adequately be conveyed by any one term or formula.

Divine, like human, forgiveness is always contingent upon the fulfillment of conditions. It must be preceded by repentance and a firmly fixed intention not to repeat the offence. In addition to this, one was required to conform to certain legal or formal acts before the assurance of pardon was his. These acts were expressive of the sinner's state of mind. They consisted of certain acts of sacrifice in the pre-Christian times and of baptism during the ministry of John the Baptist (Mk 1 4; Lk 3 3) and under Christ (Acts 2 38; 22 16). These acts are never regarded as in any sense a quid pro quo in return for which the benefit of forgiveness is granted. It is an act of pure grace on God's part, and these acts are required as expressions of the man's attitude toward God. The state of mind required in order to obtain the gift of forgiveness is that to which the Prodigal Son came (Lk 15 17-19), and that of the sinner who went to his house justified rather than the Pharisee (18 9-14), because he realized that forgiveness was to him an act of pure favor.

There was real and actual forgiveness of sins in the OT times as well as since Christ. Certain passages have been construed to teach that the Law provided only for a passing over or rolling back of sins, and that there was not then an actual forgiveness. The sacrifices prescribed by the Law were not adequate atonements, so that there was constant necessity of yearly remembrance of sin (He 10 3; cf Lev 16 21). The atonement of Christ is, however, of permanent adequacy, and became retroactive in the sense that it unified in Christ the Divine arrangement for saving mankind in all ages (He 11 40). "The passing over of the sins done aforetime" (Rom 3 25) does not imply a partial or apparent forgiveness, but means that they were forgiven, though seemingly without adequate recognition on the part of God of their heinous character. In view of God's righteous character men might naturally have expected punishment, but instead the offenders were spared (cf Acts 14 16; 17 30). No expression in the OT suggests any inadequacy of the forgiveness extended to Israel, but on the other hand many passages may be quoted to show how rich and full it was deemed to be (Pss 32, 103; Mic 7 19; Isa 38 17, Jer 31 34).

Two passages seem to limit God's forgiveness. They are Christ's discussion of the unpardonable sin (Mt 12 31,32; Mk 3 28-30; Lk 9. Limita- 12 10), and the one which mentions of tions the sin unto death (1 Jn 5 16; Forgiveness of He 6 4-6). In the former passage there is mentioned a sin which has no forgiveness, and in the latter, one on behalf of which the apostle cannot enjoin prayer that it be forgiven, though he does not prohibit it. In both cases the sin is excluded from the customary forgiveness which is extended to sins of all other classes.

The act of the Pharisees which led Jesus to speak of the unpardonable sin was the attributing of a good deed wrought by Him through the Spirit of God (Mt 12 28) to Beelzebub. No one could do such a thing unless his moral nature was completely warped. To such a person the fundamental distinctions between good and evil were obliterated. No ordinary appeal could reach him, for to him good seemed evil and evil seemed good. The possibility of winning him back is practically gone; hence he is beyond the hope of forgiveness, not because God has set an arbitrary line of sinfulness, beyond which His grace of forgiveness will not reach, but because the man has put himself beyond the possibility of attaining to that state of mind which is the essential condition of Divine forgiveness. It is practically certain that John did not have any particular sinful act in mind when he spoke of the sin which is unto death. See BLASPHEMY.

There is no possible way of determining what specific sin, if any, he refers to. Probably the same principle applies in this case as in that of the unpardonable sin. God's forgiveness is limited solely by the condition that man must accept it in the proper spirit.

There are some passages which seem to imply that forgiveness was the principal Messianic task. This is suggested by the name given to the Messiah during His earthly career (Mt 1 21), and by the fact that He was the Saviour. The remission of sins was the preparation for the advent of the Messiah (Lk 1 77), and repentance and remission of sins were the prerequisites to a state of preparation for the kingdom.

It is not surprising, therefore, that we find Jesus laying claim to the power to forgive sins. This provoked a bitter controversy with the Jews, for it was axiomatic with them that no one could forgive sins but God only (Mk 2 7; Lk 5 21; 7 49). 10. Christ's Power to Forgive Sins

This Jesus did not question, but He would have them infer from His power to forgive sins that He was the possessor of Divine power. Jesus asserted His possession of this power on two occasions only, though it has been insufficiently inferred from Jn 5 14; 8 11 that He was accustomed to pronounce absolution upon all of those He healed. On one of these occasions He not merely asserted that He possessed the power, but demonstrated it by showing Himself to be the possessor of the Divine gift of healing. The impostor might claim some such intangible power as the authority to forgive sins, but he would never assert the possession of such easily disproved power as the ability to heal the sick. But Jesus claimed both, and based His claim to be the possessor of the former on the demonstration that He possessed the latter. God would not support an impostor, hence his aid in healing the paralytic proved that Jesus could forgive sins. The multitude accepted this logic and "glorified God, who had given such authority unto men" (Mt 9 2-9; cf Mk 2 3-12; Lk 5 18-26).

On the other occasion when His possession of this power was under discussion (Lk 7 36-50), He offered no other proof than the forgiven woman's deep gratitude and love. One expression that He uses, however, has raised some discussion as to the relative order in time of her love and forgiveness (ver 47). Did she love because she was forgiven, or vice versa? Manifestly the forgiveness precedes the love, in spite of the fact that ver 47 seems to assert the opposite, for this is the bearing of the parable of the Two Debtors (vs 41-43), and the latter part of ver 47 has the same implication. It is clear that she had previously repented and had been accepted, and the anointing of Jesus was an outpouring of her gratitude. The phrase of ver 47, "for she loved much," is proof of the greatness of her sin rather than a reason why she was forgiven. In both cases where Jesus forgave sins, He did so because the state of mind of the person forgiven showed worthiness of the blessing. To this as a condition of forgiveness there is no exception. Christ's prayer on the cross (Lk 23 34) would not avail to secure the pardon of His murderers without their repentance.

Though forgiveness is on God's part an act of pure grace prompted by His love and mercy, and though He forgives freely all those 11. The who comply with the condition of repentance and abandonment of sin, Need of an Atonement yet this does not dispense with the necessity of an atonement. The parable of the Prodigal Son was spoken to teach the freedom of God's forgiveness and acceptance of returning sinners, and the duty of men to assume the same attitude toward them. This much it teaches, but it fails to set forth entirely God's attitude toward sin. With reference to the sinner God is love and mercy, but with reference to sin He is righteous, and this element of God's nature is no less essential to Him than His love, and must be considered in any effort to set forth completely the doctrine of God's forgiveness of sinners. The atonement of Christ and the many atonements of the Law were manifestations of this phase of God's nature.

The idea of an atonement is fundamental in the teachings of the NT (Rom 5 10; 2 Cor 5 18-21; Col 1 21). It is very clearly implied

12. The NT in such terms as reconciliation and Doctrine of propitiation, and is no less present in Atonement pardon, remission and forgiveness.

The doctrine of the atonement is not developed by Jesus, but it is strongly hinted at and is unmistakably implied in the language of Mt 20 28; 26 28; Mk 10 45; Lk 24 46, 47. John the Baptist's salute, "Behold, the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world" (Jn 1 29), also implies it. In the writings of the apostles it is repeatedly and clearly affirmed that our forgiveness and reconciliation to God is based upon the death of Christ. "In none other is there salvation" (Acts 4 12); through Him is the redemption (Rom 3 24); God set Him forth to be a propitiation (ver 25); through Him "we have now received the reconciliation" (5 11); "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself" (2 Cor 5 19); "Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf" (ver 21); and "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us" (Gal 3 13). Such citations might be greatly multiplied. That which was so perfectly accomplished by the offering of Christ was in an analogous though imperfect way accomplished by the sacrifices required by the Law. It had "a shadow of the good things to come" (He 10 1).

The unvarying effect of sin is to produce an estrangement between the injurer and the wronged. The nature of God is such and the relationship between Him and man is of such a character that sin brings about an alienation between them. It is this presupposition of an estrangement between them which renders the atonement necessary before forgiveness can be extended to man. This estrangement must be removed, and the alienation be transformed into a reconciliation. In what then does the alienation consist?

The sin of man produces a changed attitude toward each other on the part of both God and man. God holds no personal pique against man because of his sin. The NT language is very carefully chosen to avoid any statement which would seem to convey such a conception. Yet God's holy righteousness is such that He cannot be indifferent to sin. His wrath must rest upon the disobedient (Jn 3 36; Rom 1 18). It is not merely impersonal. It is not enough to say He hates the sin. Man's unrighteousness has not merely alienated him from God, but God also from him. The word "enemies" (echthroi) of Rom 5 10 is passive, and means the object of God's enmity (Sanday, ad loc.). It was because of this fact that God set forth Christ to be a propitiation to show His righteousness because of the passing over of sins done aforesaid (3 25, 26). God's passing over, without inflicting punishment, the sins of pre-Christian times had placed in jeopardy His righteousness; had exposed Him to the implication that He could tolerate sin. God could not be true to Himself while He tolerated such an imputation, and so instead of visiting punishment upon all who sinned—which would have been one way of showing His righteousness—He set forth Christ to death ("in his blood"), and in this way placed Himself beyond the imputation of unrighteousness while it enabled Him to show mercy to sinners. The effect of sin upon man was to estrange him from God, to lead him farther and farther away from his Maker. Each successive sin produced a greater barrier between the two. Now the atonement was designed to remove the cause of this estrangement and restore the former relationship between God and man. This too, it has been observed, is the purpose of forgiveness, so that the atonement finds its completion in forgiveness. It should be noted that the reconciliation originates with God and not with man (Rom 3 25; 2 Cor 5 19). God woos man before the latter seeks God. The effect of the atonement on man is to reconcile him, attract him, to God. It shows him God's love for man, and the forgiveness, in that it removes sin completely, takes away the estranging factor between them and so wins man back to God. "We love, because he first loved us." At the same time the atonement is such a complete expression of both the love and the righteousness of God that, while on the one hand it exhibits his yearning for man, on the other it shows that He is not tolerant toward sin. In the atonement of Christ, therefore, is the meeting-place and the reconciliation of God's holy horror of sin and the free bestowal of forgiveness upon penitent believers.

FORGO, for-gō' (from for, negative, and go): Occurs in Eccles 7 19, as tr of ἀστοχέω, astochēō, which means "to miss the mark," "turn or swerve from." "Forgo not a wise and good wife [AV "woman"]; for her grace is above gold," meaning "Turn not away from her"; in 8 9, the word is rendered "miss not"; cf 1 Tim 1 6; 6 21; 2 Tim 2 18.

FORK, fôrk (פֶּשֶׁל קִישׁוֹן, sh'losh kîll'shôn): This compound word, meaning strictly "three points" or "three prongs," is found only once (1 S 13 21), and doubtless there refers to the agricultural tool now known as the pitchfork. It might, however, also be a weapon.

FORM, fôrm (צָרַ, yācar, צָרָה, tō'ar; μορφή, morphē):

(1) To form is "to fashion," "create," "produce." In the OT it is for the most part the tr of yācar, "to form," "to fashion" (Gen 2 7, etc., "Jeh God formed man of the dust of the ground," etc); also of hûl and hîl, "to be twisted," "turned round," "to bring forth [in pain]" (cf Isa 13 8; Mic 4 10; Dt 32 18 AV, "God that formed thee"; Job 26 13 AV; Ps 90 2, "or ever thou hadst formed the earth," etc; Prov 26 10 AV). In the NT we have morphōō, "to form" (Gal 4 19, "until Christ be formed in you"); plāssō, "to form," "to mold" (Rom 9 20, "him that formed it"; 1 Tim 2 13, "Adam was first formed"; 2 Mac 7 23, "the Creator . . . who formed the generation of man," RV "fashioned"; ver 22, "that formed the members [diarrhukhmizō]," RV "brought into order").

(2) Form (noun) is used for (a) appearance, mar'eh, "sight," "appearance" (Job 4 16, "I could not discern the form thereof," RV "appearance," with "form" for "image" [t'mūnāh] in next sentence); celem, Aram. "image" (Dnl 3 19, "The form of his visage was changed"); rēv, "form," "likeness" (2 31; 3 25, RV "aspect"); w'ar, "visage," "form" (1 S 28 14, "What form is he of?"); (b) the fixed or characteristic form of anything, tabhniṭh, "model," "form" (Ezk 8 3; 10 8, "the form of a hand"; 8 10, "every form of creeping things"); morphē, characteristic form as distinguished from schēma, changing fashion (Phil 2 6, "in the form of God"; ver 7, "the form of a servant"; less distinctly, Mk 16 12, "in another form"); (c) shape, model, pattern, mold, qūrah, "shape," from qūr, "to cut or carve" (Ezk 43 11, ter, "the form of the house," etc); mishpāt, "rule" (2 Ch 4 7 AV); tūpos, "type," "impress" (Rom 6 17, RVm "pattern"); hupo-tūpōsis, "outline," pattern (2 Tim 1 13, RV "pattern"); mōrphōsis, "form," "appearance" (Rom 2 20, "the form of knowledge"); (d) orderly arrangement, giving shape or form (Gen 1 2; Jer 4 23, the earth was "without form," wāhū, RV "waste"; Wisd 11 17, amorphos); "form of speech" (2 S 14 20, aspect, pānim, "face," RV "to change the face of the matter"); as giving comeliness or beauty, w'ar (Isa 52 14; 53 2, "He hath no form nor comeliness"; cf Gen 29 17; 39 6, etc; Wisd 15 5, "desiring the form [eidōs] of a dead image," RV "the breathless form"); (e) Show, without substance, mōrphōsis, "form" (2 Tim 3 5, "holding a form of godliness").

ARV has "didst form" for "hast possessed" (Ps 139 13, so ERM; both have "formed" for "made" (Ps 104 26), ARV for "framed" bis (Isa 29 16); both for "formed thee," "gave birth" (Dt 32 18); "pierced" (Job 26 13); "woundeth" (Prov 26 10); "fashioned" (Isa 44 10); for "are formed from" (Job 26 5), "tremble"; for "their form" (2 Ch 4 7), "the ordinance concerning them"; "form" for "similitude" (Nu 19 8; Dt 4 12.15); for "size" (1 K 6 25; 7 37); for "shape" (Lk 3 22; Jn 5 37); "in the form" for "similitude" (Dt 4 16); for "or the like" (4 23.25); ARV "beholding" thy form" for "thy likeness" (Ps 17 15, ERM); "every form" for "all appearance" (1 Thess 5 22; so ERM "appearance").

FORMER, fôr'mēr: The word in the sense of "maker," "framer," occurs only in Jer 51 19, "He is the former [from yācar, "to form"] of all things." The adj., in the sense of preceding in the order of time, is commonly in Heb the tr of rî'shôn, "first," "foremost" (Gen 40 13; Nu 21 26; Dt 24 4, etc); in Gr of prōteros (Eph 4 22; He 10 32; 1 Pet 1 14); and in two cases (Acts 1 1; Rev 21 4) of prōtos, where RV has (in Acts in m) "the first." As denoting place or position the word occurs in the OT in Zec 14 8, "the former sea" as tr of qadhmōnī, "in front," where RV has "eastern," i.e. the Dead Sea, in contrast with the Mediterranean, or western sea (cf Ezk 47 18; Joel 2 20). For "former iniquities" (Ps 79 8) RV has simply "the iniquities"; other changes may be seen in Nu 6 12; Isa 65 7; Ezk 36 11; Mic 4 8; Hag 2 3.

FORSWEAR, for-swā'r. See CRIMES.

FORTH, fôrth: "Forth," advb. (from "for"), signifies movement (1) forward, (2) out of, (3) beyond a certain boundary. In a few instances in the OT it is the tr of the prep. al, properly "above," "upon" (2 K 11 15; 2 Ch 23 14; Am 7 17 AV), and of hūc, "without" (Gen 39 13; Jgs 19 25). "Forth" is often used as an expletive of various vbs., as "break [forth]," "bring [forth]," "call [forth]," etc. In the Gospel of Jn it is the tr of éxō, "without," as "Lazarus, come forth" (11 43; so 15 6; 19 4 AV, etc; also Acts 5 34; 9 40). "Stand forth" in Mk 3 3 is the tr of égreire eis tō méson, m "Arise into the midst." RV has a great many changes, frequently substituting "out," "away," "abroad," etc; "forth from" for "out of" (Job 41 21; Isa 45 23); "spread forth" for "stretched out" (Ps 44 20; 88 9; 136 6), etc. In Col 1 6, for "bringeth forth fruit" RV reads "bearing fruit."

LITERATURE

Has a number of words representing its various elements and aspects:

(1) מִבְּצָר, miḥṣār, is the term generally rendered "fenced" or "defenced city." In both AV and RV of Isa and Jer we find for the most part the more formal "defenced city." It is found by itself (Isa 17 3); with 'ir, "city" (1 S 6 18; 2 K 3 19; pl. ārš miḥṣār, "fenced [ARV "fortified"] cities," Nu 32 17); with צָר, cār, "Tyre" (Josh 19 29; 2 S 24 7, where it is rendered "stronghold"). (2) מִשְׁבָּצָה, mišbāḥ, "high fort" (Isa 25 12; Jer 48 1 RVm; Ps 9 9, and many other places in the Ps). (3) מְצֻרָה, mā'ōz, "fortress," "stronghold" (Jgs 6 26; Ps 31 2; Dnl 11 39). (4) מִצְדָּה, m'cūdhāh, "fort" AV, "stronghold" RV (2 S 5 9.17). (5) מִצְרֵי, m'cūrah, "fort" (Isa 29 3 AV; pl. RV "siege works"). (6) מִצְבָּה, mūṣṣāḥ (Isa 29 3, "fort" RV, "mount" AV, "posted troops" ARV). (7) דָּיֶק, dāyēk, "fort" (for the siege of a city, the wall of circumvallation cast up by the besiegers, 2 K 25 1; Jer 52 4; Ezk 4 2; 17 17; 21 22; 26 8). (8) מִצְרֵי, mā'ōz, "fortress" (Jer 10 17 m, wall of circumvallation; Hab 2 1, "tower"

AV, "fortress" RVm; Zec 9 3). (9) בִּירָה, bīrah, "palace" AV, "castle" RV (Neh 3 8; 7 2). Bīrah Grecized is βῆρα, bēria, which has the double meaning of "palace" and "fortress." Nehemiah's "castle" figures largely in the books of Maccabees and in Jos, and is the Castle of Antonia of the Acts of the Apostles. (10) pyrgos, ochlōros (2 Cor 10 4, its only occurrence in the NT though it is the chief equivalent of μῦθος in LXX). In this connection it is to be noted that בִּמְדִּי, bēmāh, is Heb for "wall," Gr τειχος, teichos; חֵיל or חֵיל, hēl, is Heb for the "ditch," or "rampart," or "bastion" of a fortress; מִגְדָּל, migddal, "tower"; מִגְדָּל, migddal, pinndā, pinndā, "corner tower."

From the very beginning of their history as a nation the Israelites were acquainted with fortified cities. The report of cities "great Fortified and fortified up to heaven," inhabited by the sons of Anak, by Amalekites, Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites and Canaanites, struck terror into the hearts of the Israelites in the wilderness, and called forth murmurings from them on their way to Canaan (Nu 13 28 ff; Dt 1 28). Not that these cities were at all of the extent or population of modern cities, or of Nineveh, Babylon and Memphis of old. But to a people who were as yet little better than a horde of fugitives accustomed to the simple camp life of the wilderness and unacquainted with appliances for siege and assault, the prospect of scaling the walls and conquering the inhabitants was appalling. The cities of the Canaanites were already old when Joshua led the Israelites to the conquest of the land. Not a little of their history has become known to us, and the character of their defensive works has been disclosed by Palestinian excavation in recent years.

1. In Recent Excavations.—

Ugarsa.

These cities of the primitive inhabitants of Canaan occupied sites easily capable of defence. They were built either upon a projecting spur of a mountain ridge, like Gezer, Megiddo, Tell es-Saī (believed to be the ancient Gath) and primitive Jerus, or upon an isolated eminence in the plain like Tell el-Hesi (Lachish) or Taanach. Compared with modern cities the area was small in the case of Gezer about a quarter of a mile square, Lachish 15 acres, Megiddo and Taanach 12 to 13 acres. A sufficient water supply within easy reach was an essential feature. Speaking of Gezer, Professor Macalister says: "Water, the first necessity of life, was in abundance. The three primitive modes of livelihood—hunting, pasturing, and agriculture—could be practised here better than in many places. Further, for defence—another prime necessity in early days—the hill is admirably fitted. It is steep and not easy to climb; and being fairly high it commands a wide prospect, so that the

While the site of the Can. city was chosen for its natural strength, the first settlers soon felt the need of some fortification. At

4. Walls Sinjerli the excavators have been able to trace the general growth of the site from a group of shepherds' huts into a walled town. The earliest fortification attempted was a rampart of earth following the natural contour of the hill (PEFS, 1903, 113). Within some such inclosing wall, houses were built and the inhabitants lived and pursued their avocations safely. The primitive earthbank in the case of Gezer was in course of time replaced first by an inner and then by an outer wall in succession. The outer wall when it was added to strengthen the inner was the hēl, rendered in the Eng. version "bulwark" (Isa 26 1) or "rampart" (Nah 3 8, where the waters of the Nile served the same purpose). Professor Macalister estimates that the inner wall of Gezer had fallen into disuse and ruin by about 1450 BC and that it was the outer that saw the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites. "Even in its present ruined form," says Professor Macalister, "the outer city wall is an imposing structure. In places it still stands to a height of from 10 to 14 ft., and these can hardly be regarded as being much more than the underground foundations. The outer face of the city wall, towering above the hill on which the city was built, may well have seemed impregnable to the messengers of Moses" (Bible Side-Lights, 142). The walls of a later time, as we learn from Assyrian representations, were provided with battlements, very often crenelated, and "thy pinnacles of rubies" (Isa 54 12, RV, RVm "windows") may refer to them. For the purpose of strengthening the walls, esp. at the least defensible points, revetments or facings of stone or kiln-burnt bricks were sometimes added. Even these again would be rendered less assailable by a trench (hēl) serving to cut off a fortress from adjacent level or sloping ground, as may still be seen outside the N. wall of Jerus, and many parts of the walls of Constantinople.

Towers were sometimes built at the corners or at points on the wall where attack was to be apprehended (Zeph 1 16; 2 Ch 14 7).

5. Towers Such towers have been disclosed on the crest of the hill at Tell Zakariyah. At Gezer 30 towers were found round the outer wall. On the walls of Sinjerli there rose no fewer than 800 towers (Garstang, Land of the Hittites, 273). On the evidence of the excavations at this ancient Hittite site we gather that the cities about the time of the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan "were already surrounded by masoned walls, supported by numerous external towers, and entered through gateways barred by a pair of double doors and guarded by wing towers on either hand" (Land of the Hittites, 367). For illustrations, see CITY.

Boghas-keui: the Hittite Fortress Called Yenig Kaleh.

Every one of these ancient cities had an inner fortress which would be an internal means of protection, and the last refuge of the defenders in extremity. At Tell Zakariyah the acropolis wall has been traced, and its shape has been found to be conditioned by the contours of the hill on which it stood. In an old Hittite settlement a fortress has been found rectangular in shape and supported by an outer and lower wall at a distance of 12 to 30 yds (Land of the Hittites, 162). There is evidence that the mound or bluff originally occupied remained the fortress or acropolis of the city when it spread out over a larger area, and this seems to have been the case for some time at least with the Jebusite fort taken by David and made the capital of the kingdom. At Sijerli, while there was a wall surrounding the whole township, there was an outer as well as an inner defensive wall to the citadel. Upon this citadel were found palaces from which the Assyrian king, Tiglath-pileser I, copied the plan of a Hittite palace, called in Assyrian Bilani.

The excavations enable us to see the progress of the art of fortification from very primitive beginnings. Crude brick and rough stone-masonry were the materials of the earliest walls. They are usually found of uncoursed masonry in which the large stones are undressed field boulders. The facings of stone and the joints in walls were often packed with pebbles or with limestone chippings, the stones themselves being more or less roughly trimmed and dressed to shape by a hammer. Corner-stones are found in the towers showing marks of the chisel, but it is not till well on in the Heb period that stones are found with bosses and marginal drafting. At Zakariyah the walls of the acropolis were of rubble laid in mud, mixed with straw without lime, and they contained some well-worked stones, irregularly intermingled with field stones of various sizes. At a later time mortar was used to cover the walls and give greater strength and support. But the clay used for the purpose was apt to crack unless it was given consistency by treading with the feet and mixing with water. Thus we read of a wall daubed with untempered mortar (Ezek 13 10-16; 22 28; cf Nah 3 14). In the masonry of the Can. period there is no appearance of the use of mortar. In the Hittite fortress (see [6] above) the masonry of the inner wall is rough, dry stonewalling, while the outer is built of stones roughly pentagonal in shape, irregular in size, fitted to one another and laid without mortar, somewhat like the Cyclopean walls of the earliest periods of Gr history. See GAZEN.

The gates of the fenced cities of Canaan may not have had the social importance which the city gate came to possess in later times, but they were an important element in the defensive works of a city. They were as few as possible, so as to give only the necessary ingress and egress. The gate of Jericho was shut and secured at nightfall (Josh 3 5). The gate of Gaza had two leaves which were not hinged to the two gate-posts, but turned on pins moving in sockets in the sill and lintel, the bar stretching between the two posts and let into them to secure the gate (Jgs 16 3, with Moore's notes). The hundred gates of Babylon, according to Herodotus, were all of brass (i.179); and Jeh promises to Cyrus to break in pieces the doors of brass and to cut in sunder the bars of iron (Isa 45 2). That the bars were sometimes of wood is clear from what is said of the bars of Nineveh (Nah 3 13). To protect the gate it was supplied with towers. Ussiah built towers in Jerus at the corner gate and at the valley gate, and fortified them (2 Ch 26 9). In the inner wall of Gezer, to which reference has been made, a gate of very remarkable structure has been found. The wall is of stone, but the gateway consists of a passage between two solid towers of brick. The passage is 9 ft. wide and 42 ft. long, roughly paved with stones. Stone slabs on each side of the passageway bear traces of fire, and the absence of any wooden barrier may be due to a conflagration at the capture of the city. The towers remain standing and rise to a total height of about 16 ft. In later times watchmen were set on the tower over the gate to descry the approach of friend or foe or messenger (2 S 18 24 f), and the tower had chambers in it which might be occupied by visitors or by a guard. For the more general purposes see GATE.

One of the essential requisites of the primitive Can. fortress was a supply of water. At Gezer a copious spring within easy reach was available. Tell el-Hesi commands the only springs in that region (A Mound of Many Cities, 16). It is a strong point in favor of the modern theory of the ridge of Ophel being the site of Zion or David's town that the Virgin's Fountain, the only perennial spring in the whole circuit of Jerus, was close to it, and would have been an inducement to the Jebusites to build their fortress there. In the sites that have been excavated, cisterns, sometimes vaulted over and with steps down into them, have been constantly found. Traces have also been observed of concealed passages or tunnels by which access has been obtained to the nearest spring. Some such explanation has been given of the "gutter" (2 S 5 8 AV, "watercourse" RV), by which Joab obtained access to the fortress of Jebus and enabled David to capture it (1 Ch 11 6; cf Vincent, Canaan d'après l'exploration récente, 26). During an investment of a fortified city by an enemy, it was a point in strategy for the inhabitants to secure the fountain and to divert or conceal the stream flowing from it so that the besiegers might be left without a water supply (2 K 3 19-25; 2 Ch 32 3; compare also 2 S 12 26-27, Century Bible, Kennedy's note).

II. In Biblical History.—On the passage of the Jordan the Israelites found in Jericho a walled city of great strength barring their progress. The excavations recently made have disclosed the common features of Can fortresses—an outer wall, surrounding the entire area, 8½ ft. thick, a citadel and protecting walls of hardly less substantial workmanship. Nearby also is the essential spring to furnish the water supply. Within the citadel were found the walls and rooms of Can. houses, and in many cases remains of infants buried in jars under the clay floors (Driver, Modern Research as Illustrating the Bible, 91 ff). These examples of "foundation sacrifices" with which the excavations at Gezer have made us familiar give point to the account of the resettlement of the city in the days of Ahab, when Hiel the Bethelite rebuilt Jericho, laying the foundation thereof with the loss of Abiram, his firstborn, and setting up the gates thereof with the loss of his youngest son Segub (1 K 16 34). See CORNER STONE; CANAAN.

In the Book of Jgs we read of the strong tower, or citadel, of Thebes, into which the inhabitants had crowded and to which Abimelech was setting fire when a woman upon the wall hurled a millstone upon him and broke his skull (Jgs 9 51 f). It does not appear that at this period the Israelites were in possession of the strongholds of the land, for when the Philis overran the country, they had no fortresses to flee to, but "did hide themselves in caves, and in thickets, and in rocks, and in coverts, and in pits" (1 S 13 6).

When David captured the Jebusite fortress (2 S 5 6 ff) and transferred his capital from Hebron to Jerus, a new era of independence and even of conquest began. The natural strength of David's town, with such fortification as had been added, made it impregnable to any Philis or Syrian foe, and one of the strongest fortresses in Western Asia.

boam, Nadab, Baasha and Elah, kings of Israel, was largely a war of sieges, one of them, that of Gibbethon, having apparently lasted 27 years (1 K 15 27, compared with 1 K 16 15 ff).

With Omri there arose in Israel a powerful ruler whose name is mentioned with respect in the Assyrian monuments, which designate the kingdom of Israel Mât Bît Khumri, "the land of the house of Omri." He was the builder of Samaria which remained the capital of the Northern Kingdom till its fall in 722 BC. In excavations but recently carried on by the archaeological expedition of Harvard University, the walls of Omri's palace and fortress were laid bare, giving an impression of the great strength of the place.

While Solomon built the wall of Jerus, we read that Uzziab built towers at the corner gate, and at the valley gate, and at the turning of the wall, and fortified them (2 Ch 26 9). Jotham his son, continued his father's labors in the further fortification of the city (27 3.4). Hezekiah had good reason to add still further to the strength of the city, seeing that he had to bear the brunt of Sennacherib's expedition to the west. Sennacherib boasts that of Hezekiah's fortified towns, he captured 46, with innumerable fortresses besides (Schrader, COT, I,

SIEGE OF A CITY (ASSYRIAN SCULPTURE IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM).

Although Solomon was a man of peace, he included among the great buildings which he executed fortresses and works of defence. He built the wall of Jerus round about. He built Millo (called Akra ("citadel") in the LXX), and closed the breaches of the city of David, so that there might be no vulnerable point found in the defences of the city (1 K 9 15). This fortification is represented in LXX, which has here an addition to the MT, as securing the complete subjection of the original inhabitants who remained. Solomon also built Hazor to watch Damascus, Megiddo to guard the plain of Jezreel, and Gezer overlooking the maritime plain, his work being one of refortification rather than of building from the foundation. He fortified also Beth-horon, Upper and Nether, to block the way against Philis invasion. The store cities, and cities to accommodate his chariots and horses, were also part of his military system (1 K 9 18 ff).

The disruption of the kingdoms, and the jealousy and hostility that followed between Judah and Israel, necessitated fresh undertakings of fortification, on the part of both kingdoms. Rehoboam dwelt in Jerus, and built cities for defence in Judah. He fortified the strongholds and provisioned them and stored arms within them in case of siege (2 Ch 11 5 ff). One of Jeroboam's first acts on ascending the throne was to build the two fortresses, Shechem to guard Mt. Ephraim, and Penuel to protect Gilead (1 K 12 25 f). Baasha later pushed his frontier within a few miles of Jerus, fortifying Ramah to overawe Asa in his very capital. The long war which lasted through the reigns of Jero-286), but he cannot tell that Jerus was among them, for it came through the ordeal unscathed. In the reign of Manasseh Jerus was captured and the king himself carried away to Nineveh, but on his repentance he was restored to the throne and set himself to strengthen the fortifications of the city (2 Ch 33 14). The city was unable, however, to hold out against Nebuchadrezzar and his captains; for it was taken in 597 BC, and King Jehoiachin and the flower of the population were deported to Babylon. After a siege of two years it was again taken in 586 BC, and temple and city were destroyed, and the walls razed to the ground.

The patriotic labor of Nehemiah in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerus belongs properly to the history of the city (see JERUSALEM). In the Maccabean struggle, the Akra (1 Macc 1 33; 3 45, etc), the citadel, was long held by a Syrian garrison, and was in the end delivered up to the high priest by Demetrius (10 32). Notable also still later was the castle of Antonia (Acts 22 24) on the site of the earlier castle of Nehemiah's day (Neh 2 8; 7 2).

III. In the Psalms and the Prophets.—Under the image of a fortress, or mountain fastness, inaccessible to any common foot, where there

1. The Psalms is perfect safety from enemies and persecutors, the Psalmist delights to express his confidence in God. Jeh, in virtue of His righteous judgments, is a high tower to the downtrodden, a place of refuge and security (misgābh) to those who are in trouble (Ps 9 9). When he exults in the strength of God who has given him deliverance, he multiplies words to utter his confidence: "I love Thee, O Jeh, my strength. Jeh is my rock, and my fortress [m'cūdhāh], . . . my God . . . my high tower [miṣgābh]" (Ps 18 1,2). Thirteen times in the Ps we find this word: 9 9; 18 2; 45 7.11; 59 9.16.17 (where AV translates "defence" and RV "high tower"), etc. Elsewhere m'cūdhāh is employed (Ps 31 2; lit. "house of fortresses"; 91 2; 144 2). If we were at liberty to accept such psalms as Ps 18 and 59 as Davidic, the appropriateness of them to the circumstances of the Shepherd King when persecuted by Saul, taking refuge in the cave of Adullam and enduring the perils and anxieties of an outlaw's life, would at once be apparent.

Although Jeremiah has been called the weeping prophet, yet for the fearless fulfilment of his commission to a gainsaying people, God made him "a fortified city ['ir mibhḥār], and an iron pillar, and brazen walls" (Jer 1 18; cf 6 27; 15 20). Hosea in the Northern Kingdom predicted the destruction of its "fortresses" (mibhḥār) by the invading Assyrians (10 14; cf 8 14). The prophets in proclaiming God's message to their day addressed themselves not only to Israel and Judah, but also to those great world-powers with which the Heb people had relations. In the oracles of the prophets to the nations—to Egypt, Babylon, Assyria, Syria, Edom, and others—we obtain glimpses of great and fortified cities like No-amon (Thebes), Babylon, Nineveh, Damascus, whose natural defences and added fortifications did not save them from capture and destruction. And the teaching of the prophets for the comfort of Israel and Judah is that Jeh was a better defence to them than the great rivers of Assyria and Egypt were to those nations. When Nineveh was at the height of her pride, fierceness and worldly glory, Nahum asks her: "Art thou better than No-amon [Thebes of Egypt], that was situate among the rivers, that had the waters round about her; whose rampart [hāl] was the sea [the Nile], and her wall [hōmāh] was of the sea?" (Nah 3 8). Of Nineveh itself we know that it was protected, not only by walls and fortresses of great strength, but also by canals and streams drawn round the city. Yet Nahum declares in his sublime apostrophe: "All thy fortresses shall be like fig-trees with the first-ripe figs: if they be shaken, they fall into the mouth of the eater" (ver 12). Babylon had walls whose strength and height, as described by Herodotus and other historians, were fabulous. Its great monarch Nebuchadnezzar was in his day the greatest ruler of the East, and Sir Henry Layard has told that scarcely a brick unearthed in the mounds of the great Bab plain was without his name. Yet when the day of reckoning came, the wall, said to be mountain-high, and 80 ft. thick, with its moat so broad that an arrow could not be shot over it, and all its elaborate works of defence, were as if they had not been; it surrendered to Cyrus without a blow being struck. It is in the visions of the prophets, in the universal peace which is to accompany the restoration of Israel, that we hear of "them that are at rest, that dwell securely, all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates" (Ezk 38 11). "In that day shall this song be sung in the land of Judah: We have a strong city; salvation will be appoint for walls and bulwarks" (hāl) (Isa 26 1). "Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, desolation nor destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise" (60 18). Building of fenced cities, with riding upon horses and military preparation, was a note of the false prophet, who urged alliances with foreign powers such as Assyria and Egypt, and relied too much upon the material resources of the nation. The true prophet realized that the strength of the nation lay in God and urged the people to put their trust in Him (Hos 8 14). "Jerusalem," says Zechariah in the days of the Return, "shall be inhabited as villages without walls, by reason of the multitude of men and cattle therein. For I, saith Jeh, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and I will be the glory in the midst of her" (2 4.5; cf 8 4.5).

IV. In the New Testament.—In a well-known passage (2 Cor 10 3-5), St. Paul, as he often does, draws upon his knowledge of Rom methods of warfare, and introduces for the enforcement of great spiritual lessons the pulling down of "strongholds" as the ultimate object of every campaign. The word employed (ochurōmata) is the Gr equivalent of the Heb word commonly rendered "fortress" (mibhḥār). "The 'strongholds' are the rock forts, such as those which once bristled along the coast of his native Cilicia and of which he must often have heard when his father told him how they were 'pulled down' by the Romans in their wars against the pirates. Those 'high things that exalt themselves'—those high eminences of the pride of Nature—occupied in force by hostile troops—had been a familiar experience in many wars throughout Asia Minor, while one of the grandest of all was the Acropolis that towered over Corinth" (Dean Howson, The Metaphors of St. Paul, 34 f).

From the stairs of the Castle of Antonia, St. Paul, by leave of Claudius Lysias, the commandant of the garrison at Jerus, in whose charge he was, addressed the excited crowd and told the story of his conversion. Antonia was the quarters, then, as it was in the time of Our Lord, of the Rom garrison, which occupied the Jewish capital (Acts 21 37; Jn 18 28); and the same site is to this day covered with a Turkish barracks.

Tower of Antonia.

Although it is not mentioned by name, the gloomy fortress of Machaerus on the E. of the Dead Sea is believed to have been the scene of the imprisonment and murder of John the Baptist. The description of it given by Joe (B.J. VII. vi. 1) shows it to have been a place of immense strength. "It was quite necessary that that fortress should be demolished lest it might draw away many into rebellion because of its FOUR, för (פָּאָר, 'arba'; τέσσερες, téssares): "Four" (cardinal number) was a sacred and complete number with the Hebrews, as well as with several other peoples. It occurs very frequently in the OT and the NT.

(1) It indicates completeness. We have the four rivers of Paradise (Gen 2 10); the four winds of heaven (Ezk 37 9; Dnl 7 2; 8 8; 11 4; Zec 6 5, RVm "spirits"; 2 Esd 13 5); "the four winds" (Mt 24 31; Mk 13 27); "the four corners of the earth" (Isa 11 12; Rev 7 1; 20 8, AV "quarters"); "the four corners of the house" (Job 1 19); Jephthah's daughter was bewailed four days a year (Jgs 11 40); "four cities" are several times mentioned in Josh in the allotment of inheritances (19 7; 21 18, etc); Nehemiah's enemies sent to him "four times" (Neh 6 4); "four kinds" (RVm "families" of destroyers were threatened, Jer 15 3); Jeh's "four sore judgments" (Ezk 14 21); "four generations" were seen by Job (42 16).

(2) "Four" is frequent in prophetic visions: Daniel saw "four . . . beasts" arise, representing four kings (7 3.17); "four notable horns" (8 8.22; cf 2 Esd 11 39); "four gates" (2 Esd 3 19; four wings, 12 2 AV); "four horns" were seen by Zechariah, as the powers that had scattered Israel, and "four smiths" (RV) as powers that would cast the four horns down (1 18-21); "four chariots and . . . horses" represented the "four spirits," AV and RVm (better than "winds"), that went "forth from standing before the Lord of all the earth" (6 1-5); in the visions of Ezk, "four living creatures," each with four faces, four wings, etc, were the bearers of the throne of God (1 5 f.23); so, in the visions of John there were "four living creatures" before and around the throne (Rev 4 6; 5 6.8.14; 6 1; 15 7; 19 4); John saw "four angels" of destruction loosed for their work (Rev 9 14 f.).

(3) "Four" occurs frequently in the measurements of the sacred buildings, etc (a) of the tabernacle (Ex 25; 26; 27; 28 17; 36, etc); (b) of Solomon's temple (1 K 7 2, etc; 1 Ch 9 24); (c) of Ezekiel's temple (Ezk 40 41; 41 5; 42 20; 43 14, etc).

(4) "Four" is used as an alternative with "three" (Prov 30 15.18.21.24.29); we have "three or four" (2 Esd 16 29.31); "the third and . . . the fourth generation" (Ex 20 5; 34 7; Nu 14 18; Dt 5 9).

(5) Ten times four, or forty is also a special and sacred number, e.g. forty years did Israel eat manna (Ex 16 35); forty years in the wilderness (Nu 14 33; 32 13); "the land had rest forty years" (Jgs 3 11; 5 31); Israel was delivered unto the hands of the Philis for forty years (13 1); Eli judged Israel forty years (1 S 4 18); Moses was forty years old when he visited his brethren (Acts 7 23); the flood continued for "forty days and forty nights" (Gen 7 4); Moses was in the Mount "forty days and forty nights" (Ex 24 18; 34 28; Dt 9 9);

Jesus fasted in the desert forty days and nights (Mt 4 2, etc); He remained with His disciples forty days after His resurrection (Acts 1 3).

(6) Fourscore is also frequent (sh'mōnīm) (Ex 7 7; Jgs 3 30; Jer 41 5, etc; ogdoēkonta, Lk 2 37; 16 7).

(7) Four hundred represents a large number, e.g. the years of the oppression in Egypt (Gen 15 13); Esau's company (33 1); the men with David (1 S 22 2; 25 13; 30 10.17); the prophets of Baal "four hundred and fifty," of Asherah, "four hundred" (1 K 18 19.22); the prophets of Israel (22 6). Four thousand represents a larger number, e.g. the musicians and porters of Solomon's temple (1 Ch 23 5); the stalls for horses in Solomon's stables (2 Ch 9 25); the Assassins who made insurrection under an Egyptian (Acts 21 38); Christ fed "four thousand men, besides women and children" (Mt 15 38). Four hundred thousand represents a very large number, e.g. the congregation of Israel that gathered at Mizpah, "four hundred thousand footmen that drew sword" (Jgs 20 2.17); Abijah's army (2 Ch 13 3; Jeroboam's, twice that number).

(8) The fourth part also frequently occurs (Ex 29 40; Lev 23 13; Nu 23 10; Rev 6 8, etc).

FOURFOLD, för'föld: Occurs but twice in EV: 2 S 12 6, "He shall restore the lamb fourfold"; and Lk 19 8 AV, "If I have wrongfully exacted ought . . . I restore fourfold." From this statement of Zacchaeus we are to understand that fourfold the amount of that which was stolen was the restoration the law required of a thief. This was the extreme penalty the law imposed. In some cases double the amount was to be restored (Ex 22 4.7); in others, a fifth of its value was added to the thing restored (Lev 6 5); still again, an amount equal to that taken was to be restored (1 S 12 3).

FOURSCORE, för'skör. See FOUR; NUMBER.

FOURSQUARE, för'skwär (רָבָה, rābha; τετραγώνος, tetrágōnos): "Foursquare," meaning equal in length and breadth, not round, is the tr of rābha (from obs. r-bha, "four"); it occurs in the description of the altar of burnt offering (Ex 27 1; 38 1); of the altar of incense (30 2; 37 25); of the breastplate of the high priest (28 16; 39 9); of the panels of the gravings upon the mouth of the brazen or molten sea in Solomon's temple (1 K 7 31); of the inner court of Ezekiel's temple (Ezk 40 47); of "the holy oblation" of the city of Ezekiel's vision (48 20, r-bhi'i, "fourth"); of the new Jerus of John's vision (Rev 21 16, tetrágōnos), and conveys the idea of perfect symmetry. In AVm of 1 K 6 31, we have "five-square," square being formerly used for equal-sided, as it still is in "three-square file."

FOURTH PART. See FOUR.

FOWL, fowl (טוֹף, ṭoph; πετεινόν, peteinón): The word is now generally restricted to the larger, esp. the edible birds, but formerly it denoted all flying creatures; in Lev 11 20 AV we have even, "all fowls that creep, going upon all four," ver 21, "every flying creeping thing that goeth upon all four."

The word most frequently tr^d "fowl" is ṭoph from ṭaph, "to cover," hence wing; it is used collectively for birds and fowl in general (Gen 1 20, etc; 2 19.20, etc); ayū (from ū, "to rush") means a ravenous beast, or bird of prey, used collectively of ravenous birds (Gen 15 11 AV; Isa 18 6 AV "fowls"; Job 28 7, "a path which no fowl knoweth," RV "no bird of prey");

1. OT fowl knoweth," RV "no bird of prey"; Terms and in Isa 46 11 it is used as a symbol References of a conqueror (cf Jer 12 9, "bird," "birds of prey"; Ezk 39 4, "ravenous birds"); ṣippōr, Aram. ṣippār (from ṣāphar, "to twitter or chirp"), "a chirper," denotes a small bird or sparrow (Dt 4 17 AV; Neh 5 18; Dnl 4 14); to give the carcasses of men to the fowls (birds) of the air was an image of destruction (Dt 28 26 AV; 1 S 17 44.46; Ps 79 2; Jer 7 33, etc); barburim, rendered (1 K 4 23) "fatted fowl" (among the provisions for Solomon's table for one day), is probably a mimetic word, like Gr bárbaros, Lat murmuro, Eng. babble, perhaps denoting geese from their cackle (Gesenius, from bārār, "to cleanse," referring to their white plumage; but other derivations and renderings are given). They might have been ducks or swans. The young of the ostrich was delicious food, and no doubt when Solomon's ships brought peafowl they also brought word that they were a delicacy for a king's table. The domestic fowl was not common so early in Pal, but it may have been brought by Solomon with other imports from the East; in NT times chickens were common; ba'al kânāph, "owner of a wing," is used for a bird of any kind in Prov 1 17. "In vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird," AVm "Heb, in the eyes of everything that hath a wing."

In the Levitical law fowls (birds) were distinguished as clean and unclean (Lev 11 13 f; Dt 14 11-20; cf Gen 8 20); the first were

2. In the allowed to be eaten because they fed Levitical on grains, seeds, and vegetables; the Law second were forbidden because they fed on flesh and carrion.

In the NT the common word for "fowl" is peteron, "winged fowl." "The fowls of the air" (RV "the birds of the heaven") are pointed

3. NT Ref- to by Our Lord as examples of the erences and providential care of God (Mt 6 26; Illustrative Lk 12 24); in another connection the Uses "sparrows" (strouthion) sold cheap, probably for food, are so employed (Mt

10 29, "Are not two sparrows sold for a penny?" Lk 12 6, "five . . . for two pence"); their quickly picking up seeds from the ground is made to illustrate the influences which render "the word" powerless (Mt 13 4); their being sheltered in the branches, the growth of the kingdom (13 32, peteron); the hen's (ornis) sheltering care for her chickens, His desire to protect and save Jerus (Mt 23 37; cf 2 Eed 1 30; Ruth 2 12); the fowls were shown in vision to Peter as among the things made clean by God (Acts 10 12; 11 6); in Rev 18 2; 19 17.21, orneon, "bird," "fowl," a carnivorous bird (RV "bird"), is the representative of desolation and of destruction.

For "fowls" ARV has "birds" (Gen 6 7.20; 7 8; Lev 20 25b; Acts 10 12; 11 6; with ERV Mt 6 26; 13 4; Mk 4 32; Lk 8 5; 12 24; 13 19), for "every feathered fowl" (Ezk 39 17), RV has "the birds of every sort"; for "all fowls that creep" (Lev 11 20) and for "every flying creeping thing" (ver 21), "all winged creeping things."

FOWL, FATTED. See preceding article.

FOWLER, foul'ér (פֹּדֵר, yōkēsh): A professional birdcatcher. In the days previous to firearms, birds were captured with nets spread on the ground, in traps and snares. There was a method of taking young birds from a nest, raising them by hand, and when they had become very tame, they were confined in hidden cages so that their voices would call others of their kind to the spot and they could be killed by arrows of concealed bowmen or the use of the throw-stick (Ecclus 11 30). This was a stick 1½ ft. in length and ¼ in. in diameter, hurled with a rotary motion at the legs of the birds and was very effective when thrown into flocks of ground birds, such as partridge or quail, esp. if the birds were running up hill. There was also a practice of sewing a captured bird's eyelids together and confining it so that its cries would call large numbers of birds through curiosity and they could then be taken in the several ways mentioned. The fowlers supplied the demand for doves and other birds used for caged pets, and furnished the market with wild pigeons and doves for sacrifice and such small birds as were used for food. Ps 91 3:

"For he will deliver thee from the snare of the fowler,
And from the deadly pestilence."

This is David's promise that the Almighty will deliver us from the evil plans laid to ruin us, as a bird sometimes in its struggles slips the hair and escapes from the "snare" (q.v.) set for it. Ps 124 7:

"Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers:
The snare is broken, and we are escaped."

Here is the fulfilment of the former promise in a cry of rejoicing. Sometimes the snare held fast, sometimes it broke; then the joy in the heart of a freed man was like the wild exultation in the heart of the escaping bird. Prov 6 5:

"Deliver thyself as a roe from the hands of the hunter,
And as a bird from the hand of the fowler."

With methods so primitive as these for taking birds, it must have occurred frequently that a stunned, wounded or entrapped bird slipped even from the hand that held it and made good its escape.

Jer 5 26: "For among my people are found wicked men: they watch, as fowlers lie in wait; they set a trap, they catch men." Here is the plain comparison strongly drawn between wicked men entrapping their fellows and fowlers taking unsuspecting birds.

The last reference is in Hos 9 8: "Ephraim was a watchman with my God: as for the prophet, a fowler's snare is in all his ways, and enmity in the house of his God." Wherever he goes, the prophet is in danger of being trapped. GENE STRATTON-PORTER

FOX (פֶּסֶל, shu'al; cf Arab. ثَعْلَب, tha'lab [Jgs 15 4; Neh 4 3; Ps 63 10; Cant 2 15; Lam 5 18; Ezk 13 4]; alōpēz [Mt 8 20; Lk 9 58; 13 32]): The foxes of different parts of Europe and Western Asia differ more or less from each other, and some authors have given the local types distinct specific names. Tristram, for instance, distinguishes the Eyp fox, Vulpes nilotica, of Southern Pal, and the tawny fox, Vulpes flavescens, of the N. and E. It is possible that the range of the desert fox, Vulpes leucopus, of Southwestern Asia may also reach Syria. We have, however, the authority of the Royal Natural History for considering all these as merely local races of one species, the pieces into which it is said in all the synoptic narratives and references Jesus "broke" the "loaves," which, being thin cakes, were usually broken before distribution; hence the phrase, "breaking of bread." See HDB, s.v. "Fragment"; Weymouth translates "broken portions," viz. "those into which the Lord had broken the loaves; not mere scraps or crumbs."

FRAME, frām:

(1) פָּרָה, yāṣar (from root yāṣar, "to knead," mold with the fingers): "For he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust" (Ps 103 14).

(2) אָרַךְ, 'ārah (from root 'ārakh, "to put in order," "to set in a row," "to arrange"): "goodly frame" (Job 41 12, AV "goodly proportion").

(3) עֲצָמַי, 'āṣem, "bony frame," "body": "My frame was not hidden from thee, when I was made in secret" (Ps 139 15), AV "my substance," AVm "my strength, or, my body." See also BONE.

(4) מִבְּנֵה, mibneh, "building, frame" (Ezk 40 2, "frame of a city").

(5) נָתַן, nāthan, "to give," "to direct": "They will not frame their doings" (Hos 5 4, AV and RVm).

(6) συναρμολογέω, sunarmologéō, "to fit or join closely together" (Eph 2 21).

(7) καταρτίζω, kataritzō, "to fit out," "make fit," "adjust" (He 11 3).

common fox, Vulpes alopec or Canis vulpes. The natives of Syria and Pal do not always distinguish the fox and jackal although the two animals are markedly different. The jackal and wolf also are frequently confounded. See DRAGON; JACKAL.

In Ps 63 9 f we have, "Those that seek my soul, to destroy it, . . . shall be given over to the power of the sword: they shall be a portion for foxes" (shū'ālim). It has been thought that the jackal is meant here (RVm), and that may well be, though it is also true that the fox does not refuse carrion. In RVm, "jackal" is suggested in two other passages, though why is not clear, since the rendering "fox" seems quite appropriate in both. They are Neh 4 3, ". . . if a fox go up, he shall break down their stone wall" and Lam 5 17 f, ". . . our eyes are dim; for the mountain of Zion which is desolate: the foxes walk upon it." RVm also has "jackals" in Jgs 15 4 f, where Samson "caught three hundred foxes . . . and put a firebrand in the midst between every two tails . . . and let them go into the standing grain of the Philis, and burnt up both the shocks and the standing grain, and also the oliveyards." Jackals are probably more numerous than foxes, but the substitution does not appreciably diminish the difficulties in the way of any natural explanation of the story. In Cant 2 15 we have a reference to the fondness of the fox for grapes. In Mt 3 20 and Lk 9 58 Jesus says in warning to a would-be follower, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the heaven have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." Foxes differ from most of the Canidae in burrowing holes for their lairs, unless indeed they take possession of the burrow of another animal, such as the badger. In Lk 13 32 Jesus compares Herod to a fox.

FRAGMENT, frag'ment (κλάσμα, klasma): "Fragment," a piece broken off, occurs only in the pl., in the accounts of the miracles of the Loaves in the Gospels and references thereto. It is the tr of klasma (from kldō, "to break"), "a piece broken off" (Mt 14 20 AV); "broken meat" (15 37).

RV has in each instance "broken pieces." The change is important because it shows that the pieces left over were not mere fragments or crumbs left by the people after eating, but some of the original

FRANKINCENSE, frank'in-sens (לְבָנֹן, lībānān, from root meaning "whiteness," referring to the milky color of the fresh juice: Ex 30 34; Lev 2 1 f. 15 f; 5 11; 6 15; 24 7; Nu 5 15; 1 Ch 9 29; Neh 13 5.9; Cant 3 6; 4 6.14; Isa 43 23; 60 6; 66 3; Jer 6 20; 17 26; 41 5; tr^d in the last six references "incense" in AV, but correctly in RV; libanos, libanos: Mt 2 11; Rev 18 13. The Eng. word is derived from old Fr. franc encens, i.e. "pure incense"): The common frankincense of the pharmacopoeas is a gum derived from the common fir, Frankincense (Boswellia serrata).

but the frankincense of the Jews, as well as of the Greeks and Romans, is a substance now called Olibanum (from the Arab. el libān), a product of certain trees of the genus Boswellia (N.O. Amyridaceae), growing on the limestone rocks of south Arabia and Somali-land (Isa 60 6; Jer 6 20). The most important species are B. Carteri and B. Frereana. Some of the trees grow to a considerable height and send down their roots to extraordinary depths. The gum is obtained by incising the bark, and is collected in yellowish, semitransparent tears, readily pulverized; it has a nauseous taste. It is used for making incense for burning in churches and in Indian temples, as it was among the Jews (Ex 30 34). See INCENSE. It is often associated with myrrh (Cant 3 6; 4 6) and with it was made an offering to the infant Saviour (Mt 2 11). A specially "pure" kind, l'bhōnāh zakkāh, was presented with the shewbread (Lev 24 7).

FRANKLY, frank'li (χαρίζομαι, charizomai): "Frankly" in the sense of "freely," "readily," "graciously," occurs only in the tr of charizomai, properly "to gratify," "to do that which is grateful or pleasing," "to forgive" (Lk 7 42, "He frankly forgave them both," RV has simply "forgave"; the same word is tr^d in ver 43, AV and RV, "forgave," in ver 21 AV it is "gave," RV "bestowed," granted to see). It occurs in the NT only in Lk and Paul.

FRAY, frā (פָּרַח, hārādh, "to make afraid," "cause to tremble": AV of Dt 28 26; Jer 7 33; Zec 1 21; RV "frighten," "terrify"). See WAR.

FRECKLED, frek'ld, SPOT (פֶּלֶא, bōhāk; LXX ἀλφός, alphós, called in RV "a tetter," and described as a brightshining spot [b'hārōth l'bhēnōth): These white eruptions did not render the person so marked ceremonially unclean (Lev 13 39). This form of skin disease is described by Hippocrates as usually of no great importance and indicative of a sluggishness of body; it is probably some form of local psoriasis. There is a cognate modern Arab. word applied to a facial eczematous eruption. For other references to skin diseases, see LEPROSY.

FREE, FREEDOM. See CHOICE; WILL.

FREEDMAN, frēd'man, FREEMAN, frē'man: The term occurs in 1 Cor 7 22; Col 3 11, and Rev 6 15, and represents two slightly different words. In 1 Cor 7 22 the word is ἀπελευθερώς, apeleutheros, "a freeman," one who was born a slave and has received freedom. In this case it refers to spiritual freedom. He that was in bondage to sin has been presented with spiritual freedom by the Lord. In Rev 6 15 the word is simply eleutheros, eleutheros, "a free man" as opposed to a slave.

FREELY, frē'li (חִנָּם, hinnām, נְדָבָה, n'dhābhāh; δωρεάν, dōreán, παρρησιαστικῶς, parrhēsiastikōs): "Freely" occurs in three senses:

(1) Gratis, for nothing (Nu 11 5, hinnām, "for nought," "the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely," RV "for nought"); Mt 10 8, dōreán, "Freely ye have received, freely give," RV omits "have"; Rom 3 24, "being justified freely by his grace"; 2 Cor 11 7, "I have preached to you the gospel freely," RV "for nought"; Rev 21 6; 22 17, "Take the water of life freely"; charizomai (Rom 8 32) is tr^d "freely give," id charisthénta (1 Cor 2 12), "the things that are freely given," ARV has "were" for "are."

(2) Willingly, spontaneously: n'dhābhāh, "willing offering" (Ps 54 6, "I will freely sacrifice unto thee," RV "with a freewill-offering"; Hos 14 4, "I will love them freely"); nādhābh, "to give willingly" (Ezr 2 68, RV "willingly offered"; cf 1 6); n'dābh Aram. (7 15; cf vs 13.16).

(3) Without hindrance or restraint, 'akhal, "to eat" is rendered in Gen 2 16, "Thou mayest freely eat," AVm "Heb, eating thou shalt eat"; 1 S 14 30, "if . . . the people had eaten freely"; parrhēsiastomai, "to speak freely, openly, boldly" (Acts 26 26, "Unto whom also I speak freely"); metá parrhēsiā, "with full speech" (2 29, "I may say unto you freely").

RV has "have drunk freely" for "well drunk" (Jn 2 10). The word is methuskō, Pass. "to become drunk." Comparison with Lk 12 45; Eph 5 18; 1 Thess 5 7; Rev 17 2, where the same word is tr^d AV "made drunk," RV "made drunken" (Mt 24 49; Acts 2 15; 1 Cor 11 21; Rev 17 6, "drunken"), will show that the meaning is "drunk," which was the rendering of Tyndale and Cranmer; Vulg has cum inebriati fuerint; Plummer renders "have become drunk, are drunk."

FREEWILL OFFERING, frē'wil of'er-ing. See SACRIFICE.

FREEWOMAN, frē'wōm-an (λευθήρα, eleuthéra): Found but 4 t in AV (Gal 4 22.23.30.31). In the first three passages it refers to Sarah, the freewoman and true wife of Abraham as in contrast with Hagar, the Egypt slave girl who became his concubine (Gen 16 1 ff). In the last passage a metaphorical application of the term is made to the Christians who are the children of promise, of freedom, of the spirit, the children of the freewoman, in contrast with the Jews who are the children of the letter, of bondage, of the bondwoman.

FREQUENT, frē'kwent (περισσότης, perissotēs): "Frequent," adj. (from Lat frequens, frequentis, "crowded") occurs only once in the text of AV, as the tr of perissotērōs, advb. in comparative degree of perissōs, "abundantly," hence "more abundantly" (cf 2 Cor 1 12); in 2 Cor 11 23, "in prisons more frequent," RV "more abundantly"; and once in m of AV (Prov 27 6) as tr of 'āhar, "to be abundant," RV in text, "profuse."

ARV has "frequent" for "open" (1 S 3 1, "The word of Jehovah was precious [m, rare] in those days; there was no frequent vision," m "Heb widely spread" (the word is pārāḥ, "to break forth," "to scatter," etc). ERV retains "open" with "frequent," Heb widely spread" in m. "Frequent" (the vb.) does not occur.

FRESH, adj.: The tr of פָּרֵךְ, hādhash, "new," "fresh" (Job 29 20, "My glory is fresh in me"); of טָשָׁ, l'shadh, "sap," "moisture" (Nu 11 8, of the manna, "as the taste of fresh oil," RVm "cakes baked with oil"); of רָעָנָן, ra'ānān, "to be fresh and green" (Ps 92 10, "fresh oil"); of גִּלְכִּיָּס, glukīyis, "sweet" (Jas 3 12, "salt water and fresh," RV "sweet"). Fresher is the tr of פָּרֵךְ, ruḏ-phash, "to become fresh" (Job 33 25; "His flesh shall be fresher than a child's").

RV has "fresh" for "green" (Gen 30 37; Lev 23 14), for "moist" (Nu 6 3), for "full" (Lev 2 14; 2 K 4 42), for "new" (Jgs 15 15; Mt 9 17; Mk 2 22; Lk 5 38).

FRET, FRETTING (פָּרַח, hārāh, מָאָר, mā'ar): To "fret" is from for (prefix) and elan, "to eat," "to consume." The word is both trans and intrans in AV: (1) trans as tr of hārāh, "to burn," Hithpael, "to fret one's self," "to be angry" (Ps 37 1, "Fret not thyself because of evil-doers"; vs 7.8; Prov 24 19); of kāṣaph, "to be angry," etc (Isa 8 21, "They shall fret themselves, and curse," etc); of rāḡhaz, "to be moved" (with anger, etc) (Ezr 16 43, "Thou hast fretted me in all these things," ARV "ragged against me"). For Lev 13 55, see under Fretting below. (2) Intrans, it is the tr of rā'am, "to rage," Hiphil, "to provoke to anger" (1 S 1 6, "Her rival provoked her sore, to make her fret"); of zā'aph, "to be sad," "to fret" (Prov 19 3, "His heart fretteth against Jeh").

Fretting in the sense of eating away, consuming, is used of the leprosy, mā'ar, "to be sharp, bitter, painful" (Lev 13 51.52; 14 44, "a fretting leprosy"; in ver 55 we have "it [is] fret inward" ("fret" past part.), as the tr of p'hetheth from pāhath, "to dig" (a pit), the word meaning "a depression," "a hollow or sunken spot in a garment affected by a kind of leprosy," RV "it is a fret."

RV has "fretful" for "angry" (Prov 21 19), in "vexation."

FRIED, frid. See BREAD, III, 3, (2); FOOD, II; LOCUSTS.

FRIEND, frend, FRIENDSHIP, frend'ship: In the OT two words, variously tr^d "friend" or "companion": רֵעַ, rē'eh, indicating a mere associate, passing friend, neighbor, or companion; רֵעָה, 'ahab, indicating affection natural or unnatural. In the NT also two words: traipos, hetairos, "a comrade," or "fellow," and philos, philos, suggesting a more affectionate relation.

Literature abounds in concrete examples of friendship of either kind noted above, and of profoundly philosophic as well as sentimental and poetic expositions of the idea of friendship. Notable among these are the OT examples. Abraham, because of the intimacy of his relations, was called "the friend of God" (2 Ch 20 7; Isa 41 8; Jas 2 23). "Jeh spake unto Moses face to face, as a man . . . unto his friend" (Ex 33 11). The romantic aspect of the friendship of Ruth and Naomi is interesting (Ruth 1 16-18). The devotion of Hushai, who is repeatedly referred to as David's friend (2 S 15 37; 16 16), is a notable illustration of the affection of a subordinate for his superior. The mutual friendship of David and Jonathan (1 S 18 1), from which the author is made to say, "The soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul," is another example. Again in his pathetic lament for Jonathan (2 S 1 26), David says in highly emotional tones that his love "was wonderful, passing the love of women." Elijah and Elisha form a unique illustration of semi-professional affection (2 K 2).

In the NT, Jesus and His disciples illustrate the growth of friendship from that of teacher and disciple, lord and servant, to that of friend and friend (Jn 15 13-15). Paul and Timothy are likewise conspicuous (2 Tim 1 2).

In general lit. we have the classic incident, recorded by Plutarch, of Damon and Pythias during the rule of Dionysius. Pythias, condemned to death, was about to be executed but desired to see his family. Damon offered himself as a ransom in case he should not return in time for the hour of execution. Returning in time, both were released by the great Dionysius, who asked to be taken into the secret of such friendship. The writings on friendship are many. Plato and Cicero have immortalized themselves by their comments. Cicero held dearly the friendship of Scipio, declaring that of all that Nature or Fortune ever gave him there was nothing which could compare with the friendship of Scipio. Bacon, Emerson, Black, Gladden, King, Hillis, and many others in later days have written extensively concerning friendship. The best illustration of the double use of the word (see above) is that in Prov 18 24, "He that maketh many friends doeth it to his own destruction; but there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother." Again, "Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend" (27 17). The honesty and frankness of genuine friends are set forth in the maxim, "Faithful are the wounds of a friend" (27 6).

FRIENDS, CHIEF FRIENDS (cf φάτοι πρότοι, hoi philoi protoi): Expressions used in 1 and 2 Macc to designate the favored courtiers of the Antiochi. Mattathias is promised enrolment among the king's Friends, to tempt him to apostatize (1 Macc 2 18); Alexander Balas writes Jonathan among his Chief Friends (10 65). Cf also 1 Macc 3 38; 6 10.14; 10 60; 11 26.27; 2 Macc 8 9.

FRINGES, frin'jis (רִצְצִים, řic'ith, "tassel, lock" [Nu 15 38.39], רִצְצִים, řic'ith, "twisted threads," "festoons" [Dt 22 12]): Tassels worn by the Israelites on the four corners of their garments as reminders of "all the commandments of Jehovah," in accordance with the law set out in Nu 15 37-41 and Dt 22 12. These tassels originally contained a thread of 'kheleth, "violet." Jewish tradition, however, has failed to retain the 'kheleth, because of doubt as to the exact meaning of the term, and instead dark blue lines were dyed on the borders of the talith or garment in which the fringes were placed. According to tradition any garment having four corners required the mnemonic fringes, the importance of which was weighed against "all the commandments of the Lord." In NT times such garments were still worn (cf Mt 9 20; 14 36; 23 5). The later Jews, after adopting the garments of the Diaspora, in order to observe the řic'ith commandment began to use two extra four-cornered fringed garments: the large talith while at prayer, and the small talith, or 'arba' kan'photh, as an undergarment during the day. Their tradition prescribes the exact manner in which each tassel shall be made, and gives a symbolic meaning to the numbers of windings and knots, somewhat after the manner of the string-writing of several early civilizations (cf the Peruvian quipus). Thus in the řic'ith a long cord is wrapped around seven shorter cords first seven times, then eight, then eleven, and finally thirteen, each series being separated from the others by two knots. The numbers seven and eight constituting fifteen together suggest YH, YH, and the number eleven, WH. Together they make up the holy name YahWeH. The number thirteen stands for יָהוָה, 'ehādāh, the letters of which taken as numerals equal thirteen. The sentence Yahweh 'ehādāh means "Yahweh is one." Many other suggestions, more or less fanciful, have been worked out, all tending to associate the fringes with the Law in the mind of the wearer. See DRESS.

FROCK, frok (פְּרוֹכֶת, simlāh; ἀμάλινον, hōmōlinon): The hempen frock, mentioned in Ecclus 40 4 as a mark of the lowly, was a simple garment consisting of a square piece of cloth wrapped around the body. It is the same as the garment (simlāh) which we find the poor man using as his only bed covering by night (Ex 22 26 f); the traveler, as the receptacle for his belongings (cf Ex 12 34); and the common people of both sexes as their general outer garments, though there was some difference in appearance between the simlāh of the man and that of the woman (Dt 22 5). See DRESS.

FROG (צְפַדִּיָּה, ṣṣphardē; cf Arab. ضَفْدَع, ḍafda' [Ex 8 2 ff; Ps 78 45; 105 30]; βάτραχος, bātrachos [Rev 16 13]): The references in Ps, as well as in Ex, are to the plague of frogs. In Rev 16 13 we have, "And I saw coming out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet, three unclean spirits, as it were frogs." The word ṣṣphardē probably referred both to frogs and to toads, as does the Arab. ḍafda'. In Pal and Syria Rana esculenta, Bufo viridis and Hyla arborea are common. According to Mr. Michael J. Nicoll, assistant director of the Zoological Gardens at Gizah, near Cairo, the commonest Egypt species are Rana mascariensis and Bufo regularis. Rana esculenta, Bufo viridis and Bufo vittatus are also found, but are much less common.

ALFRED ELY DAY

FRONTIER, fron'tēr, frun'tēr (רֶחֶק, kāṣeh): The word occurs once in pl. in Ezk 25 9. RVm has "in every quarter."

FRONTLETS, frunt'lets (טִישְׁפֹּרוֹת, ṭiṣṣphōth, fr ṭiṣph, "to bind"): Ornaments worn on the forehead, particularly phylacteries (which see), which were worn in this manner and also on the arms (Ex 13 16; Dt 6 8; 11 18; cf also Ex 13 9).

FROST, frost (קֶפֶז, kphōr, "hoar-frost," Ex 16 14; Job 38 29; חֲנָמַל, hānāmāl, perh. "the aphs," Ps 78 47; קֶרֶחַ, kerāḥ, "cold," Gen 31 40; Job 37 10 AV; Jer 36 30): A temperature of freezing or lower is called frost. Dew forms when the temperature is decreased; and if below freezing, the dew takes the form of a white film or covering over rocks and leaves. This white covering is called hoar-frost. Like dew it is the result of condensation of the moisture of the air on objects which radiate their heat quickly. In order that condensation may take place the atmosphere must be saturated. Frost may be expected on clear, still nights when the radiation is sufficient to reduce the temperature below the freezing-point.

In Syria and Pal frost is a very rare occurrence at sea-level; but on the hills and elevated plains it is usual in winter, beginning with November, and on the highest elevations throughout the year. Late spring frosts in March or early April do great damage to fruit. In clear weather there is often a great variation in the temperature of the day and the night, esp. on the inland plains, so that lit., as Jacob said to Laban, "In the day the drought consumed me, and the frost by night" (Gen 31 40); "In the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost" (Jer 36 30; cf 22 19), a passage which suggests that Jehoiaikim's corpse was left unburied.

The meaning of hānāmāl, tr'd "frost" in Ps 78 47 (see above), "He destroyed . . . their sycamore-trees with frost" (m "great hail-stones"), is uncertain. "Frost is unknown in Egypt, and Gesenius suggests 'ants,' comparing it with Arab. namal" (Temple, BD, s.v.).

The manna in the wilderness is compared to hoar-frost. "A small round thing, small as the hoar-frost" (Ex 16 14). Manna is occa-

4. Figuratively found in Syria now as a flaky, gelatinous substance formed on bushes and rocks. The elements of Nature are indications of God's power, and are referred to as signs of His might: "By the breath of God frost is given" (Job 37 10 AV). "The hoary frost of heaven, who hath gendered it?" (Job 38 29); "He destroyed their vines with hail, and their sycamore-trees with frost" (Ps 78 47); "He scattereth the hoar-frost like ashes" (Ps 147 16).

FRWARDNESS, frō'wērd-nes: The tr of תַּפְּחֻחְוּת, tahpukhōth, the pl. of tahpukhāh, "perversity," "foolishness" (from hāphakh, "to turn about") in Prov 2 14, "delight in the frowardness of the wicked," ARV "the perverseness of evil," m "the evil man" (cf ver 12; some render "deceit"); 6 14 ARV, "perverseness"; 10 32, "the mouth of the wicked speaketh frowardness," ARV "speaketh perverseness," m "is."

FRUIT, frōōt. See FOOD; BOTANY, and special arts. on APPLE; FIG; VINE, etc.

FRUSTRATE, frus'trāt (פָּרַר, pārar; ἀθετέω, athetēō): "Frustrate" (from frustra, "vain") is the tr of pārar "to break," "to make void," "to bring to nothing" (Ezr 4 5), "to frustrate their purpose" (Isa 44 25, "that frustrateth the signs of the liars"); of athetēō, "to displace," "to reject or make void or null": Gal 2 21, "I do not frustrate the grace of God" (by setting up the righteousness which is "through the law"); RV "make void"; of 1 Macc 11 36, "Nothing hereof shall be revoked," RV "annulled" (athetēō).

RV has "frustrateth" for "disappointeth" (Job 5 12, pārar).

The adj. appears (2 Esd 10 34), "frustrate of my hope" (Jth 11 11, "frustrate of his purpose" [dpraktos]).

FUEL, fu'el (אֹכְלִיָּה, okhlāh, or מִאֲכָלִיָּה, ma'ākhlēth, "food"): Is mentioned specifically only in the OT, in Isa 9 5.19; Ezk 15 4.6; 21 32. Its general, lit. meaning in these connections is "food for fire," and might include any sort of combustible material. The common forms of fuel were wood of various sorts (even including thorns, Ps 58 9; 118 12; Ecl 7 6), and dried stalks of flowers or grass (Mt 6 30), charred wood as charcoal (Lev 16 12; Isa 44 19, and frequently), and dried dung (Ezk 4 12.15). There is no certain indication that our coal was known to the Hebrews as fuel, and their houses, being without chimneys, were not constructed for the extensive use of fuel for warmth.

FUGITIVE, fū'ji-tiv (פָּלֵיט, pālīt, from פָּלַט, pālāt, "to escape"; פָּלָה, pālā, from פָּלָה, pālā, "to waver"; נָפַל, nāphāl, from נָפַל, nāphāl, "to fall"; נָפַח, nāphāh, from נָפַח, nāphāh, and מִבְרַח, mibrah, from מִבְרַח, mibrah, "to flee"): One who flees from danger (Isa 15 5; Ezk 17 21); escapes from bondage (2 Macc 8 35 [as adj.]); deserts from duty (Jgs 12 4; 2 K 25 11 AV; cf Jth 16 12 AV), or wanders aimlessly (Gen 4 12.14).

FULFIL, fūl'il (מָלַא, mālā; πληρώω, plērōō, plērōō, telēō, with other words): "Fulfil" is used (1) in a sense more or less obsolete, "to fill up," complete (Gen 29 21 28; Ex 23 26; Job 36 17, RV "full" in "filled up"; Mt 3 15, "to fulfil all righteousness"; Phil 2 2, "Fulfil ye my joy," ARV "make full"; cf 2 Cor 10 6); (2) in the sense of "to accomplish," "to carry into effect," as to fulfil the word of Jeh (1 K 2 27; 8 15.24; 2 Ch 36 21, etc.); in the NT very frequently used of the fulfilment of prophetic Scripture (Mt 1 22; 2 15, etc.). Love is declared to be "the fulfilment [plērōma, "fulness"] of the law" (Rom 13 10). For "fulfil" RV has "do" (Rev 17 17); for "fulfilled" has "performed" (2 S 14 22), "accomplished" (Ezr 1 1; Mt 5 18; 24 34; Lk 21 32; Jn 19 28), with numerous other changes. W. L. WALKER

FULLER, fūl'ār (סָבַף, sābāf; lit. "to trample," γνάφειν, gnaphēin): The fuller was usually the dyer, since, before the woven cloth could be properly dyed, it must be freed from the oily and gummy substances naturally found on the raw fiber. Many different substances were anciently used for cleansing. Among them were white clay, putrid urine, and the ashes of certain desert plants (Arab. ḥālī, Bib. "soap"; Mal 3 2). The fuller's shop was usually outside the city (2 K 18 17; Isa 7 3; 36 2), first, that he might have sufficient room to spread

Here stood Rabshakeh in his interview with Eliakim and others on the wall (2 K 18 17; Isa 36 2); clearly the highway was within easy earshot of the walls. Here Isaiah met Ahas and Shear-jashub his son by command of Jeh (Isa 7 3). An old view placed these events somewhere near the present Jaffa Gate, as here runs an aqueduct from the Birket Mamilla outside the walls of the Birket Hamam el Batrah, inside the walls; the former was considered the "Upper Pool" and is traditionally called the "Upper Pool" of Gihon. But these pools and this aqueduct are certainly of later date (see JERUSALEM). Another view puts this highway to the N. side of the city, where there are extensive remains of a "conduit" running in from the N. In favor of this is the fact that the N. was the usual side for attack and the probable position for Rabshakeh to gather his army; it also suits the conditions of Isa 7 3. Further, Jos (BJ, V, iv, 2) in his description of the walls places a "Monument of the Fuller" at the N.E. corner, and the name "fuller" survived in connection with the N. wall to the 7th cent., as the pilgrim Arculf mentions a gate W. of the Damascus gate called Porta Villae Fullonis. The most probable view, however, is that this conduit was one connected with Gihon, the present "Virgin's Fountain" (see GIHON). This was well known as "the upper spring" (2 Ch 32 30), and the pool, which, we know, was at the source, would probably be called the "Upper Pool." In this neighborhood—or lower down the valley near En-rogel, which is supposed by some to mean "the spring of the fuller"—is the natural place to expect "fulling." Somewhere along the Kidron valley between the Virgin's Fountain and the junction with the Tyropoeon was the probable scene of the interview with Rabshakeh; the conversation may quite probably have occurred across the valley, the Assyrian general standing on some part of the cliffs now covered by the village of Siloam. FULLER'S FOUNTAIN. See EN-ROGEL.

FULNESS, fūl'nes: The tr of πληρώμα, plērōma, which is generally, but not invariably, rendered "fulness" in the NT. Etymologically, plērōma—which itself is derived from the vb. plērōō, "I fill"—signifies "that which is or has been filled"; it also means "that which fills or with which a thing is filled"; then it signifies "fulness," "a fulfilling."

In the Gospels it occurs as follows: Mt 9 16 and Mk 2 21: in both of these passages it means "the fulness," that by which a gap or rent is filled up, when an old garment is repaired by a patch; Mk 6 43, "They took up fragments, the fulness of twelve baskets"; 8 20, "The fulness of how many baskets of fragments did ye take up?" Jn 1 16, "out of his fulness we all received."

Elsewhere in the NT "fulness" is used by Paul alone, who employs it 12 t, in addition to the frequent use he makes of the vb. "to fill."

2. Its Use Of these 12, no fewer than 6 are in Eph in the and Col. The references are these: Pauline Rom 11 12, "If . . . their loss [is] the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness?" The "fulness" of Israel here refers to their being, as a nation, received by God to a participation in all the benefits of Christ's salvation. Ver 25, "A hardening . . . hath befallen Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." 13 10, "Love . . . is the fulfilment [the fulfilling] of the law"; that is, love is not a partial fulfilment, by obedience to this or that commandment, but a complete filling up of what the law enjoins. 15 29, "I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of Christ." 1 Cor 10 26, "The earth is the Lord's, out his cloth for drying and sunning, and second, because of the offensive odors sometimes produced by his processes. The Syrian indigo dyer still uses a cleaning process closely allied to that pictured on the Egypt monuments. The unbleached cotton is soaked in water and then sprinkled with the powdered ashes of the ishnan, locally called ḥālī, and then beaten in heaps on a flat stone either with another stone or with a large wooden paddle. The cloth is washed free from the alkali by small boys treading on it in a running stream or in many changes of clean water (cf En-rogel, lit. "foot fountain," but tr'd also "fuller's fountain" because of the fullers' method of washing their cloth). Mark describes Jesus' garments at the time of His transfiguration as being whiter than any fuller on earth could whiten them (Mk 9 3). JAMES A. PATCH and the fulness thereof." Gal 4 4, "when the fulness of the time came." The fulness of the time is that portion of time by which the longer antecedent period is completed. Eph 1 10, "unto a dispensation of the fulness of the times." Ver 23, "the church, which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all." The church is the fulness of Christ; the body of believers is filled with the presence, power, agency and riches of Christ. 3 19, "that ye may be filled unto all the fulness of God"—that ye may be wholly filled with God and with His presence and power and grace. 4 13, "unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." Col 1 19, "In him should all the fulness dwell." 2 9, "In him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" (cf Lk 2 40.52; 4 1).

FULLER'S FIELD, fūl'ārs fēld, THE (מִבְרַח הַסָּבָף, mibrah ḥāsābāf): In all references occurs "the conduit of the upper pool, in the highway of the fuller's field"; this must have been a well-known landmark at Jerus in the time of the monarchy.

"Fullness" in Eph and Col is used to present some of the most prominent thoughts in these epistles, sometimes referring to Christ, sometimes to the church and the individual Christian. Christ is Himself to "fulfill" all things in heaven and on earth (Eph 4 10 AVm). We cannot separate "the fulness of Christ" in this passage (ver 13) from the statement in 1 23, that the Christ is being fulfilled, and finds His fulness in the church. When all the saints have come to the unity which is their destined goal, or in other words, to the full-grown man, the Christ will have been fulfilled. Thus they will have together reached "the full measure of the maturity of the fulness of the Christ" (J. Armitage Robinson, Comm. on Eph, 183). The church and individual believers have, by faith, the full possession of all that Christ has to impart—the grace and comfort and strength of Christ received by them now. Cf Jn 1 16; "In him ye are complete, are made full" (Col 2 10); that is, the fulness of moral, intellectual and spiritual perfection is communicated by Christ to all who are united to Him. "When as the result of the Holy Spirit's inward strengthening, Christ dwells in the heart, and His knowledge-surpassing love is known, the only limit to spiritual excellence is 'to be filled unto all the fulness of God!'" (HDB, 735).

In the passages from Col, "the fulness" in Christ is contrasted with the mediating aeons or angel-powers or spiritual manifestations supposed to be intermediate between the False God and the world. The false teachers at Colossae seem to have used "fulness" as a technical or semi-technical term, for the purpose of their philosophical or theosophical teaching, employing it to signify the entire series of angels or aeons, which filled the space or interval between a holy God and a world of matter, which was conceived of as essentially and necessarily evil. Teaching of this sort was entirely derogatory to the person and work of Christ. In opposition, therefore, to the Colossian false teaching in regard to "the fulness," Paul shows what the facts really are, that in Christ dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. The fulness of the Godhead is the totality of the Divine powers and attributes, all the wealth of the being and of the nature of God—eternal, infinite, unchangeable in existence, in knowledge, in wisdom, in power, in holiness, in goodness, in truth, in love. This is the fulness of the nature of God—life, light, love; and this has its permanent, its settled abode in Christ. All that is His own by right is His by His Father's good pleasure also. It was the Father's good pleasure that in Christ should all the fulness dwell.

Any limitation, therefore, of the meaning of "fulness," which would make the indwelling of the fulness of the Godhead in Christ a matter either of the future, or of the past only, is inconsistent with what is said of "the fulness" in Him, in Col 1 19; 2 9. The reference in both passages is to the timeless and eternal communication of the fulness of the Godhead from the Father to the Son.

It was in a sense developed along the lines of the Colossian teaching regarding "the fulness," that the Gnostics afterward used the term. See Gnosticism. JOHN RUTHERFURD

FURLONG, fūr'long (στάδιον, stádion, "stadium"; Lk 24 13; Jn 6 19; 11 18; Rev 14 20; 21 16): A Gr measure of length, being 600 Gr ft., or 100 orguiat equal to 606½ Eng. ft., and thus somewhat less than a furlong, which is 660 ft. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

FURNACE, fūr'nās: The word is used in the OT EV to translate several Heb words:

Kibhshān, in Gen 19 23, where the smoke of the destruction of the cities of the plain is said to have ascended "as the smoke of a f."; in Ex 9 8, where Jeh commands to take "handfuls of ashes of the f. and . . . sprinkle it toward heaven," etc.

Kūr, in Dt 4 20, where Jeh is represented, when speaking of taking the children of Israel out of Egypt, as taking them "out of the iron furnace."

Ālū, in Ps 12 6, where "the words of Jeh" are said to be "pure," "as silver tried in a f."; cf Prov 17 3, "f. for gold."

Āttūn, in Dnl 3 6, where mention is made of "a burning fiery f." into which Daniel and his companions were cast. There is good reason to believe that these words all stand for either a brick-kiln or a smelting furnace.

In the NT a notable figurative use is made of the word in the phrase "the f. of fire," ἡ κάμινος τοῦ πυρός, hē káminos toú pyros. It is found in the parable of the Tares (Mt 13 42) as part of the remarkable imagery of that parable; while in the companion parable of the Drag-Net (ver 50) it stands as a symbol of the final destiny of the impenitent, a synonym of "hell"; cf Jer 29 22; Dnl 3 6.22; Rev 20 14-15, etc., and "eternal fire" (Mt 25 41), "unchangeable fire" (3 12), "the Gehenna of fire" (5 22 m; 18 9 || Mk 9 43 m, etc.). A fact which modern travelers speak of, that furnaces for punishment have been found in Persia as elsewhere in the East, sheds some light upon this use of the expression "the f. of fire." GEO. B. FURNACES, TOWER OF THE (Neh 3 11). See JERUSALEM.

FURNISH, fūr'nish (סָבַח, mālē; πλῆθομαι, plēthomai): To "furnish" is to supply with what is useful or necessary, to fit out, provide, equip. It is the tr of several Heb or Gr words: of mālē, "to fill in or up," "to complete" (Isa 65 11 AV); nāsā, "to lift up," "to aid" (1 K 9 11); ānak, Hiphil, prob. "to lay on the neck," "to encircle" (with a bracelet) (Dt 15 14), of a slave set at liberty; ārakh, "to arrange in order," "to lay out a table" (Ps 78 19 AV; Prov 9 2); āsāh k'li, "to make a vessel for containing things" (Jer 46 19, "Furnish thyself to go into captivity," Rvm "Heb, make thee vessels of captivity"); plēthomai, "to be filled" (Mt 22 10 AV); strōnumi, "to strew," "to spread" (Mk 14 15; Lk 22 12); exartizō, "to complete fully," "to equip" (2 Tim 3 17).

In Eccles 29 26 we have "furnish a table" (kos-méō); 44 6, "furnished with ability" (chorégēō); 1 Macc 14 34 AV, "He furnished them with all things" (tiēhēmi). W. L. WALKER

FURNITURE, fūr'ni-tūr (כֶּלִים, kār, כְּלִים, kēlīm; σκευή, skeuē): In Gen 31 34 kār is tr^d "furniture" in AV, but "saddle" in ARV. The latter is decidedly preferable. It was the "camel-basket," or the basket-saddle of the camel, which was a sort of palanquin bound upon the saddle. Upon this saddle-basket Rachel sat with the teraphim hidden beneath, and her wily father did not suspect the presence of his gods in such a place. In other places the word kēlīm is used, and is generally rendered "vessels," though sometimes "furniture." It may have many other renderings also (see BDB). Ex 31 7; 39 33 mention the furniture of the Tent, which is specified in other places. Moses is instructed (25 9) to make a sanctuary or tabernacle and the furniture thereof according to the pattern showed him in the Mount. The furniture of the Court consisted of the brazen altar and laver (40 29,30); that of the Holy Place, of the table of showbread, the golden lampstand and altar of incense (39 36; 40 22-26; He 9 2); that of the Holy of Holies, of the ark and mercy-seat overshadowed by the cherubim. The tribe of Levi was set apart by Jeh to "keep all the furniture of the tent of meeting" (Nu 3 8). When David organized the tabernacle-worship in Jerus and assigned the Levites their separate duties, certain men "were appointed over the furniture, and over all the vessels of the sanctuary" (1 Ch 9 29). In Nah 2 9 the sing. form of the word kēlī is used, and is rendered "furniture." The prophet refers to the abundant, costly, luxurious furniture and raiment, largely the results of their conquests and plunder in many countries.

In Acts 27 19 the word skeuē is tr^d in AV and RV "tackling," with "furniture" in RVm.

By way of information regarding the general furniture of the house little is said directly in the Scriptures. The chamber built for Elisha upon the wall contained a bed, a table, a seat, and lampstand. This was doubtless the furnishing of most bedrooms when it could be afforded. The prophet Amos had a supreme contempt for the luxurious furniture of the grandees of Samaria (3 12; 6 4). For full particulars see HOUSE; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE.

FURROW, fur'ō (לֵבַיִת, telem): The word is tr^d "furrows" in Job 39 10; 31 38; Ps 65 10; Hos 10 4; 12 11 (Ps 65 10 AV, "ridges"). In these passages the fields are pictured as they were in the springtime or late autumn. When the showers had softened the earth, the seed was sown and the soil turned over with the plow and left in furrows, not harrowed and pulverized as in our modern farming. The Syrian farmer today follows the custom of his ancient predecessors.

Another word, מַדְרָגָה, ma'drah, occurs in two passages, first in the figurative sense in Ps 129 3, and second in an obscure passage in 1 S 14 14. Three other words, מַדְרָגָה, g'dhūdhah, מַדְרָגָה, 'drūghah, מַדְרָגָה, 'ayin, tr^d "furrows" in AV, are probably more properly rendered in ARV "ridges" (Ps 65 10), "beds" (Ezk 17 7,10), and "transgressions" (Hos 10 10). See AGRICULTURE; PLOW.

FURTHER, fūr'thēr, FURTHERANCE, fūr'thēr-ans (מִבְּרָא, yāṣaph; ἔτι, ēti, προκοπή, prokopē): Further, advb. and adj., is comparative of "forth," meaning "to a greater distance," "something more," "moreover," etc; the vb. "to further," means "to help forward," "advance," "assist." The vb. occurs (Ezr 8 36) as the tr of nāsā, "to lift up": "They furthered the people and the house of God" (cf 1 K 9 11; Ezr 1 4); of pūk "to send forth," "carry out" (Ps 140 8, "Further not his evil device").

Furtherance is the tr of prokopē, "a going forward," "advance" (Phil 1 12, "the furtherance of the gospel," RV "progress," ver 25, "for your furtherance and joy," RV "progress").

Furthermore is the tr of ēta, "then," "so then" (He 12 9); of ō loipōn, "for the rest," or "as to the rest" (1 Thes 4 1, RV "finally then").

RV omits "further" (Acts 12 3); has "further" for "more than right" (Job 34 23), for "farther thence" (Mk 1 19, different text); "What further need have we of witnesses?" for "What need we any further witnesses?" (14 63); "your fellowship in furtherance of the gospel" (Phil 1 5; 2 22); "to the furthest bound" for "all perfection" (Job 28 3).

FURY, fū'ri (ἀλίστωρ, alístōr, "not to forget," "significant of revenge"): Occurs only in 2 Macc 7 9 AV, "Thou like a fury (RV "Thou, miscreant") takest us out of this present life." See also WRATH; FIERCENESS; ANGER.

FUTURE, fū'tūr, fū'chur. See ESCHATOLOGY.

G

GAAL, gā'al (גָּאֵל, ga'al, "rejection," or "loathing"; according to Wellhausen, "beetle," HPN, 110): A man of whose antecedents nothing is known, except that his father's name was Ebed. He undertook to foment and lead a rebellion on the part of the inhabitants of Shechem against Abimelech, son of Gideon, and his rebellion failed (Jgs 9 26-45). See also ABIMELECH.

GAASH, gā'ash (גִּישָׁא, ga'ash): First mentioned in connection with the burial place of Joshua "in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-serah, which is in the hill-country of Ephraim, on the north [side] of the mountain of Gaash" (Josh 24 30; cf Jgs 2 9); see TIMNATH-HERES. The "brooks," or rather the wadies or "watercourses" of Gaash are mentioned as the native place of Hiddai (2 S 23 30), or Hurai (1 Ch 11 32), one of David's heroes. No likely identification has been suggested. See EPHRAIM, MOUNT.

GABA, gā'ba (גַּבְאָה, gābha' [in pause]). See GEB.

GABAE, gab'ā-el (Γαβαήλ, Gabaēl; Vulg "Gabelus"):

(1) An ancestor of Tobit (Tob 1 1).

(2) A poor Jew of Rages, a city of Media, to whom Tobit lent ten talents of silver (1 14). The money was restored to Tobit in the time of his distress through his son Tobias, whom the angel Raphael led to Gabael at Rages (1 14; 4 1,20; 5 6; 6 9; 10 2).

GABATHA, gab'a-tha (Γαβαθά, Gabathá): A eunuch of Mardocheus (Ad Est 12 1).

GABBAL, gab'ā-i (גַּבְבַּל, gabbay, "collector"): One of the chiefs of the Benjamites in Jerus after the return from the Babylonish captivity (Neh 11 8).

GABBATHA, gab'a-tha: Given (Jn 19 13) as the name of a special pavement (τὸ λιθόστρωτον, lithóstrōton), and is probably a transcription in Gr of the Aram. גַּבְבְּתָא, gabbi'thā, meaning "height" or "ridge." Tradition which now locates the Praetorium at the Antonia and associates the triple Rom arch near there with the "Ecce Homo" scene, naturally identifies an extensive area of massive Rom pavement, with blocks 4 ft. × 3½ ft. and 2 ft. thick, near the "Ecce Homo Arch," as the Gabbatha. This paved area is in places roughened for a roadway, and in other places is marked with incised designs for Rom games of chance. The site is a lofty one, the ground falling away rapidly to the E. and W., and it must have been close to, or perhaps included in, the Antonia. But apart from the fact that it is quite improbable that the Praetorium was here (see PRAETORIUM), it is almost certain that the lihostrōlon was a mosaic pavement (cf Est 1 6), such as was very common in those days, and the site is irretrievably lost. GABBE, gab'ē (Γαββή, Gabbē; AV Gabdes [1 Est 5 20]): Called Geba in Est 2 26.

GABRIAS, gā'bri-as (Γαβρίας, Gabrias): Brother of GABAEI (q.v.). In Tob 4 20 he is described as his father. The readings are uncertain.

GABRIEL, gā'bri-el (גַּבְרִיֵּאל, gabhrī'el, "Man of God"; Γαβριήλ, Gabriel): The name of the angel commissioned to explain to Daniel the vision of the ram and the he-goat, and to give the prediction of the 70 weeks (Dnl 8 16; 9 21). In the NT he is the angel of the annunciation to Zacharias of the birth of John the Baptist, and to Mary of the birth of Jesus (Lk 1 19, 26). Though commonly spoken of as an archangel, he is not so called in Scripture. He appears in the Book of En (chs 9, 20, 40) as one of 4 (or 6) chief angels. He is "set over all powers," presents, with the others, the cry of departed souls for vengeance, is "set over the serpents, and over Paradise, and over the cherubim." He is prominent in the Jewish Tgs, etc. See ANGEL.

GAD (גָּד, gād, "fortune"; Γάδ, Gád): The seventh son of Jacob, whose mother was Zilpah (Gen 30 11), and whose birth was welcomed by Leah with the cry, "Fortunate!" Some have sought to connect the name with that of the heathen deity Gad, of which traces are found in Baal-gad, Migdal-gad, etc. In the blessing of Jacob (49 19) there is a play upon the name, as if it meant "troop," or "marauding band." "Gad, a troop shall press upon him; but he shall press upon their heel" (Heb gād, g'adhūh, y'ghūdhennū, whū yāghūdh 'āqēbh). Here there is doubtless a reference to the high spirit and valor that characterized the descendants of Gad. The enemy who attacked them exposed himself to grave peril. In the blessing of Moses again (Dt 33 20 ff) it is said that Gad "dwelleth as a lioness, and teareth the arm, yea, the crown of the head." Leonine qualities are ascribed to the Gadites, mighty men of valor, who joined David (1 Ch 12 8, 14). Their "faces were like the faces of lions, and they were as swift as the roes upon the mountain." Among their captains "he that was least was equal to a hundred, and the greatest to a thousand."

Of the patriarch Gad almost nothing is recorded. Seven sons went down with him into Egypt, when Jacob accepted Joseph's invitation (Gen 46 16). At the beginning of the desert march Gad numbered 45,650 "from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war" (Nu 1 24). In the plains of Moab the number had fallen to 40,500 (26 18). The place of Gad was with the standard of the camp of Reuben on the S. side of the tabernacle (2 14). The prince of the tribe was Eliasaph, son of Deuel (1 14), or Reuel (2 14). Among the spies Gad was represented by Geuel son of Machi (13 15). See NUMBERS.

From time immemorial the dwellers E. of the Jordan have followed the pastoral life. When Moses had completed the conquest of these lands, the spacious uplands, with their wide pastures, attracted the great flock-masters of Reuben and Gad. In response to their appeal Moses assigned them their tribal portions here: only on condition, however, that their men of war should go over with their brethren, and take their share alike in the hardship and in the glory of the conquest of Western Pal (ch 32). When the victorious campaigns of Joshua were completed, the warriors of Reuben and Gad returned to their possessions in the E. They halted, however, in the Jordan valley to build the mighty altar of Ed. They feared lest the gorge of the Jordan should in time become all too effective a barrier between them and their brethren on the W. This altar should be for all time a "witness" to their unity in race and faith (Josh 22). The building of the altar was at first misunderstood by the western tribes, but the explanation given entirely satisfied them.

It is impossible to indicate with any certainty the boundaries of the territory of Gad. Reuben lay on the S., and the half-tribe of Manasseh on the N. These three occupied the whole of Eastern Pal. The S. border of Gad is given as the Arnon in Nu 32 34; but six cities to the N. of the Arnon are assigned in vs 16 ff to Reuben. Again, Josh 13 26 makes Wady Hesban the southern boundary of Gad. Mesha, however (MS), says that the men of Gad dwelt in Ataroth from old time. This is far S. of Wady Hesban. The writer of Nu 32 may have regarded the Jabbok as the northern frontier of Gad; but Josh 13 27 extends it to the Sea of Chinnereth, making the Jordan the western boundary. It included Rabbath-ammon in the E. We have not now the information necessary to explain this apparent confusion. There can be no doubt that, as a consequence of strifes with neighboring peoples, the boundaries were often changed (1 Ch 5 18 ff). For the Bib. writers the center of interest was in Western Pal, and the details given regarding the eastern tribes are very meager. We may take it, however, that, roughly, the land of Gilead fell to the tribe of Gad. In Jgs 5 17 Gilead appears where we should naturally expect Gad, for which it seems to stand. The city of refuge, Ramoth in Gilead, was in the territory of Gad (Josh 20 8). For description of the country see GILEAD.

Reuben and Gad were absent from the muster against Sisera (Jgs 5 15 ff); but they united with their brethren in taking vengeance on Benjamin, Jabesh-gilead, from which no contingent was sent, being destroyed (20 ff). Jephthah is probably to be reckoned to this tribe, his house, Mizpah (Jgs 11 34), being apparently within its territory (Josh 13 26). Gad furnished a refuge for some of the Hebrews during the Philistine oppression (1 S 13 7). To David, while he avoided Saul at Ziklag, certain Gadites attached themselves (1 Ch 12 8 ff). A company of them also joined in making him king at Hebron (ver 38). In Gad the adherents of the house of Saul gathered round Ish-bosheth (2 S 2 8 ff). Hither David came in his flight from Absalom (17 24). Gad fell to Jeroboam at the disruption of the kingdom, and Penuel, apparently within its borders, Jeroboam fortified at first (1 K 12 25). It appears from the Moabite Stone that part of the territory afterward passed into the hands of Moab. Under Omri this was recovered; but Moab again asserted its supremacy. Elijah probably belonged to this district; and the brook Cherith must be sought in one of its wild secluded glens.

Gad formed the main theater of the long struggle between Israel and the Syrians. At Ramoth-gilead Ahab received his death wound (ch 22). Under Jeroboam II, this country was once more an integral part of the land of Israel. In 734 BC, however, Tiglath-pileser appeared, and conquered all Eastern Pal, carrying its inhabitants captive (2 K 15 29; 1 Ch 5 26). This seems to have furnished occasion for the children of Ammon to occupy the country (Jer 49 1). In Ezekiel's ideal picture (43 27,34), a place is found for the tribe of Gad. Obadiah seems to have forgotten the tribe, and their territory is assigned to Benjamin (ver 19). Gad, however, has his place among the tribes of Israel in Rev 7.

GAD (גָּד, gādh, "fortunate"): David's seer (hōzeh, 1 Ch 21 9; 29 29; 2 Ch 29 25), or prophet (nābhī; cf 1 S 22 5; 2 S 24 11). He appears (1) to advise David while an outlaw fleeing before Saul to return to the land of Judah (1 S 22 5); (2) to rebuke David and give him his choice of punishments when, in spite of the advice of Joab and the traditional objections (cf Ex 30 11 ff), he had counted the children of Israel (2 S 24 11; 1 Ch 21 9 ff); (3) to instruct David to erect an altar on the threshing-floor of Araunah when the plague that had descended on Israel ceased (2 S 24 18; 1 Ch 21 18); and (4) to assist in the arrangement of Levitical music with cymbals, psalteries and harps (cf 2 Ch 29 25). Of his writings none are known, though he is said to have written a history of a part of David's reign (1 Ch 29 29).

ELLA DAVIS ISAACS

GAD (גָּד, gadh, "fortune"): A god of Good Luck, possibly the Hyades. The writer in Isa 65 11 pronounces a curse against such as are lured away to idolatry. The warning here, according to Cheyne, is specifically against the Samaritans, whom with their religion the Jews held in especial abhorrence. The charge would, however, apply just as well to superstitious and semi-pagan Jews. "But ye that forsake Jeh, that forget my holy mountain, that prepare a table for Fortune, and that fill up mingled wine unto Destiny; I will destine you to the sword, and ye shall all bow down to the slaughter." There is a play upon words here: "Fill up mingled wine unto Destiny" (גִּזְלִי, m'nī) and "I will destine [מַנִּיחִי, mānihi, i.e. portion out] you for the sword" (vs 11,12). Gad and Meni mentioned here are two Syrian deities (Cheyne, Book of the Prophet Isaiah, 198). Schürer (Gesch. d. jüd. Volkes, II, 34 n., and bibliography) disputes the reference of the Gr Τύχη (Túchē) cult to the Sem Gad, tracing it rather to the Syrian "Astarte" worship. The custom was quite common among heathen peoples of spreading before the gods tables laden with food (cf Herod. i. 181, 183; Smith, Rel. of Semites, Lect X).

Nothing is known of a Bab deity named Gad, but there are Aramaean and Arab. equivalents. The origin may have been a personification of fortune and destiny, i.e. equivalent to the Fates. The Nabataean inscriptions give, in pl. form, the name of Meni. Achimenean coins (Pers) are thought by some to bear the name of Meni. How widely spread these Syrian cults became, may be seen in a number of ways, e.g. an altar from Vaison in Southern France bearing an inscription:

"Belus Fortunae rector, Menisque Magister."

Belus, signifying the Syrian Bel of Apamea (Driver). Canaanitish place-names also attest the prevalence of the cult, as Baal-gad, at the foot of Hermon (Josh 11 17; 12 7; 13 5); Migdal-gad, possibly Mejdol near Askalon (Josh 15 37); Gaddi and Gaddiel (Nu 13 10 f). In Talmudic lit. the name of Gad is frequently invoked (cf McCurdy in Jew Enc. V, 544). Indeed the words of Leah in Gen 30 11 may refer not to good fortune or luck but to the deity who was esp. regarded as the patron god of Good Fortune (cf Kent, Student's OT, I, 111). Similar beliefs were held among the Greeks and Romans, e.g. Hor. Sat. ii.8, 61:

"... Fortuna, quis est crudellior in nos te deus?"

Cic. N.D. iii.24, 61:

"Quo in genere vel maxime est Fortuna numeranda."

The question has also an astronomical interest. Arab. tradition styled the planet Jupiter the greater fortune, and Venus the lesser fortune. Jewish tradition identified Gad with the planet Jupiter, and it has been conjectured that Meni is to be identified with the planet Venus. See, however, ASTROLOGY, 10.

W. N. STEARNS

GAD (גָּד, 'adal, "to go about"): Used once in Jer 2 36, "Why gaddest thou about so much to change thy way?" of going after Egypt and Assyria.

GAD, VALLEY OF (גִּדְיָה, nahal ha-gādh; AV River of Gad): In 2 S 24 5 we read that Joab and the captains of the host passed over Jordan and pitched in Aroer, on the right side of the city that is in the midst of the valley of Gad. If we refer to Josh 13 25 f, this might seem to indicate a valley near Rabbath-ammon. According to a generally accepted emendation suggested by Wellhausen, however, we should read, "They began from Aroer, and from the city that is in the middle of the torrent valley, toward Gad." See AR. The valley is evidently the Arnon.

GADARA, gad'a-ra (Γάδαρα, Gádara): This city is not named in Scripture, but the territory belonging to it is spoken of as χώρα τῶν Γάδα-
1. Country χωρῶν, chōra tōn Gadarēnōn, "country of the Gadarenes" (Mt 8 28). In the || Gadarenes passages (Mk 5 1; Lk 8 26,37) we read: χώρα τῶν Γερασσηνῶν, chōra tōn Gerasēnōn, "country of the Gerasenes." There is no good reason, however, to question the accuracy of the text in either case. The city of Gadara is represented today by the ruins of Umm Keis on the heights south of el-Hummeih—the hot springs in the Yarmūk valley—about 6 miles S.E. of the Sea of Galilee. It may be taken as certain that the jurisdiction of Gadara, as the chief city in these regions, extended over the country E. of the sea, including the lands of the subordinate town, GERASA (q.v.). The figure of a ship frequently appears on its coins: conclusive proof that its territory reached the sea. The place might therefore be called with propriety, either "land of the Gerasenes," with reference to the local center, or "land of the Gadarenes," with reference to the superior city.

NOTE.—The TR reading, τῶν Γεργεσηνῶν, tōn Gergesēnōn, "of the Gergesenes," must be rejected (WH, II, App. 11).

The name Gadara appears to be Sem. It is still heard in Jedūr, which attaches to the ancient rock tombs, with sarcophagi, to the E. of the present ruins. They are closed by carved stone doors, and are used as storehouses for grain, and also as dwellings by the inhabitants. The place is not mentioned till later times. It was taken by Antiochus the Great when in 218 BC he first invaded Pal (Polyb. v.71). Alexander Jannaeus invested the place, and reduced it after a ten months' siege (Ant. XIII, iii, 3; BJ, I, iv, 2). Pompey is said to have restored it, 63 BC (Ant. XIV, iv, 4; BJ, I, vii, 7); from which it would appear to have declined in Jewish hands. He gave it a free constitution. From this date the era of the city was reckoned. It was the seat of one of the councils instituted by Gabinius for the government of the Jews (Ant, XIV, v, 4; BJ, I, viii, 5). It was given by Augustus to Herod the Great in 30 BC (Ant, XV, vii, 3; BJ, I, xx, 3). The emperor would not listen to the accusations of the inhabitants against Herod for oppressive conduct (Ant, XV, x, 2 f). After Herod's death it was joined to the province of Syria, 4 BC (Ant, XVII, xi, 4; BJ, II, vi, 3). At the beginning of the Jewish revolt the country around Gadara was laid waste (BJ, II, xviii, 1). The Gadarenes captured some of the boldest of the Jews, of whom several were put to death, and others imprisoned (ib, 5). A party in the city surrendered it to Vespasian, who placed a garrison there (BJ, IV, vii, 3). It continued to be a great and important city, and was long the seat of a bishop (Reland, Pal, 776). With the conquest of the Moslems it passed under eclipse, and is now an utter ruin.

Umm Keis answers the description given of Gadara by ancient writers. It was a strong fortress (Ant, XIII, iii, 3), near the Hieromax (Ant, XIII, i, 3)—i.e. Yarmūk (Pliny NH, xvi)—E. of cation and Tiberias and Scythopolis, on the top of a hill, 3 Rom miles from hot springs and baths called Amatha, on the bank of the Hieromax (Onom, s.v.). The narrow ridge on which the ruins lie runs out toward the Jordan from the uplands of Gilead, with the deep gorge of Wady Yarmūk—Hieromax—on the N., and Wady el Arab on the S. The hot springs, as noted above, are in the bottom of the valley to the N. The ridge sinks gradually to the E., and falls steeply on the other three sides, so that the position was one of great strength. The ancient walls may be traced in almost their entire circuit of 2 miles. One of the great Rom roads ran eastward to Der'ah; and an aqueduct has been traced to the pool of el Khab, about 20 miles to the N. of Der'ah. The ruins include those of two theaters, a basilica, a temple, and many important buildings, telling of a once great and splendid city. A paved street, with double colonnade, ran from E. to W. The ruts worn in the pavement by the chariot wheels are still to be seen.

That there was a second Gadara seems certain, and it may be intended in some of the passages referred to above. It is probably represented by the modern Jedūr, not far from es-Salḥ (Buhl, GAP, 255; Guthe). Jos gives Pella as the northern boundary of Peraea (BJ, III, iii, 3). This would exclude Gadara on the Hieromax. The southern city, therefore, should be understood as "the capital of Peraea" in BJ, IV, vii, 3.

Gadara was a member of the DECAPOLIS (q.v.).

GAIUS, gā'yus (Γάιος, Gáios; WH, Gaios):

(1) The Gaius to whom 3 Jn is addressed. He is spoken of as "the beloved" (3 Jn vs 1.2.5.11), "walking in the truth" (vs 3.4), and doing "a faithful work" "toward them that are brethren and strangers withal" (vs 5.6). He has been identified by some with the Gaius mentioned in the Apos Const (VII, 46), as having been appointed bishop of Pergamum by John.

(2) Gaius of Macedonia, a "companion in travel" of St. Paul (Acts 19 29). He was one of those who were seized by Demetrius and the other silversmiths in the riot at Ephesus, during St. Paul's third missionary journey.

(3) Gaius of Derbe, who was among those who accompanied St. Paul from Greece "as far as Asia," during his third missionary journey (Acts 20 4). In the corresponding list given in the "Contentings of St. Paul" (cf Budge, Contentings of the Twelve Apostles, II, 592), the name of this Gaius is given as "Gallius."

(4) Gaius, the host of St. Paul when he wrote the Ep. to the Rom, and who joined in sending his salutations (Rom 16 23). As St. Paul wrote this epistle from Corinth, it is probable that this Gaius is identical with (5).

(5) Gaius, whom St. Paul baptized at Corinth (1 Cor 1 14). C. M. KERR

IV. ST. PAUL'S USE OF "GALATIANS"

I. Introductory.—"Galatia" was a name used in two different senses during the 1st cent. after Christ: (1) geographically, to designate a country in the north part of the central plateau of Asia Minor, touching Paphlagonia and Bithynia N., Phrygia W. and S., Cappadocia and Pontus S.E. and E., about the headwaters of the Sangarios and the middle course of the Halys; (2) politically, to designate a large province of the Rom empire, including not merely the country Galatia, but also Paphlagonia and parts of Pontus, Phrygia, Pisidia, Lycania and Isauria. The name occurs in 1 Cor 16 1; Gal 1 2; 1 Pet 1 1, and perhaps 2 Tim 4 10. Some writers assume that Galatia is also mentioned in Acts 16 6; 18 23; but the Gr there has the phrase "Galatic region" or "territory," though the EV has "Galatia"; and it must not be assumed without proof that "Galatic region" is synonymous with "Galatia." If e.g. a modern narrative mentioned that a traveler crossed British territory, we know that this means something quite different from crossing Britain. "Galatic region" has a different connotation from "Galatia"; and, even if we should find that geographically it was equivalent, the writer had some reason for using that special form.

The questions that have to be answered are: (a) In which of the two senses is "Galatia" used by Paul and Peter? (b) What did Luke mean by Galatic region or territory? These questions have not merely geographical import; they bear

2. Questions to Be Answered most closely, and exercise determining influence, on many points in the biography, chronology, missionary work and methods of Paul.

II. Origin of the Name "Galatia."—The name was introduced into Asia after 278-277 BC, when a large body of migrating Gauls (Galdtai in Gr) crossed over from Europe at the invitation of Nikomedes, king of Bithynia; after ravaging a great part of Western Asia Minor they were gradually confined to a district, and boundaries were fixed for them after 232 BC. Thus originated the independent state of Galatia, inhabited by three Gaulish tribes, Tolistobogioi, Tektosages and Trokmoi, with three city-centers, Pessinus, Ankyra and Tavia (Tavion in Strabo), who had brought their wives and families with them, and therefore continued to be a distinct Gaulish race and stock (which would have been impossible if they had come as simple warriors who took wives from the conquered inhabitants). The Gaulish language was apparently imposed on all the old inhabitants, who remained in the country as an inferior caste. The Galatai soon adopted the country religion, alongside of their own; the latter they retained at least as late as the 2d cent. after Christ, but it was politically important for them to maintain and exercise the powers of the old priesthood, as at Pessinus, where the Galatai shared the office with the old priestly families.

The Galatian state of the Three Tribes lasted till 25 BC, governed first by a council and by tetrarchs, or chiefs of the twelve divisions

2. Transference to Rome (four to each tribe) of the people, then, after 63 BC, by three kings. Of these, Deiotaros succeeded in establishing himself as sole king, by murdering the two other tribal kings; and after his death in 40 BC his power passed to Castor and then to Amyntas, 36-25 BC. Amyntas bequeathed his kingdom to Rome; and it was made a Rom province (Dion Cass. 48, 33, 5; Strabo, 567, omits Castor). Amyntas had ruled also parts of Phrygia, Pisidia, Lycania and Isauria. The new province included these parts, and to it were added Paphlagonia 6 BC, part of Pontus 2 BC (called Pontus Galaticus in distinction from Eastern Pontus, which was governed by King Polemon and styled Polemoniacus), and in 64 also Pontus Polemoniacus. Part of Lycania was non-Rom and was governed by King Antiochus; from 41 to 72 AD Laranda belonged to this district, which was distinguished as Antiochiana regio from the Rom regio Lycania called Galatica.

This large province was divided into regiones for administrative purposes; and the regiones coincided roughly with the old national divisions Pisidia, Phrygia (including

3. The Roman Province Antioch, Iconium, Apollonia), Lycania (including Derbe, Lystra and a district organized on the village-system), etc.

See Calder in Journal of Rom Studies, 1912. This province was called by the Romans Galatia, as being the kingdom of Amyntas (just like the province Asia, which also consisted of a number of different countries as diverse and alien as those of province Galatia, and was so called because the Romans popularly and loosely spoke of the kings of that congeries of countries as kings of Asia). The extent of both names, Asia and Galatia, in Rom language, varied with the varying bounds of each province. The name "Galatia" is used to indicate the province, as it was at the moment, by Ptolemy, Pliny v.146, Tacitus Hist. ii.9; Ann. xiii.

35; later chroniclers, Syncellus, Eutropius, and Hist. Aug. Max. et Balb. 7 (who derived it from earlier authorities, and used it in the old sense, not the sense customary in their own time); and in inscriptions CIL, III, 254, 272 (Eph. Ep. v.51); VI, 1408, 1409, 332; VIII, 11028 (Mommson rightly, not Schmidt), 18270, etc. It will be observed that these are almost all Rom sources, and (as we shall see) express a purely Rom view. If Paul used the name "Galatia" to indicate the province, this would show that he consistently and naturally took a Rom view, used names in a Rom connotation, and grouped his churches according to Rom provincial divisions; but that is characteristic of the apostle, who looked forward from Asia to Rome (Acts 19 21), aimed at imperial conquest and marched across the Empire from province to province (Macedonia, Achaia, Asia are always provinces to Paul). On the other hand, in the East and the Graeco-Asiatic world, the tendency was to speak of the province either as the Galatic Eparchia (as at Iconium in 54 AD, CIG, 3991), or by enumeration of its regiones (or a selection of the regiones). The latter method is followed in a number of inscriptions found in the province (CIL, III, passim). Now let us apply these contemporary facts to the interpretation of the narrative of Luke.

III. The Narrative of Luke.—The evangelization of the province began in Acts 13 14. The stages are: (1) the audience in the stages of synagogue, vs 42 f; (2) almost the whole city, ver 44; (3) the whole region, i.e. a large district which was affected from the capital (as the whole of Asia was affected from Ephesus 19 10); (4) Iconium another city of this region: in 13 51 no boundary is mentioned; (5) a new region Lycaonia with two cities and surrounding district (14 6); (6) return journey to organize the churches in (a) Lystra, (b) Iconium and Antioch (the secondary reading of WH, καὶ εἰς Ἰκόνιον καὶ Ἀντιόχειαν [καὶ εἰς Ἰκόνιον καὶ Ἀντιόχειαν]), is right, distinguishing the two regions [a] Lycaonia, [b] that of Iconium and Antioch); (7) progress across the region Pisidia, where no churches were founded (Pisidian Antioch is not in this region, which lies between Antioch and Pamphylia).

Again (in 16 1-6) Paul revisited the two regiones: (1) Derbe and Lystra, i.e. regio Lycaonia Galatica, (2) the Phrygian and Galatic region, i.e. the region which was racially Phrygian and politically Galatic. Paul traversed both regions, making no new churches but only strengthening the existing disciples and churches. In 18 23 he again revisited the two regiones, and they are briefly enumerated: (1) the Galatic region (so called briefly by a traveler, who had just traversed Antiochiana and distinguished Galatica from it); (2) Phrygia. On this occasion he specially appealed, not to churches as in 16 6, but to disciples; it was a final visit and intended to reach personally every individual, before Paul went away to Rome and the West. On this occasion the contribution to the poor of Jerus was instituted, and the proceeds later were carried by Timothy and Gaius of Derbe (Acts 20 4; 24 17; 1 Cor 16 1); this was a device to bind the new churches to the original center of the faith.

These four churches are mentioned by Luke always as belonging to two regiones, Phrygia and Lycaonia; and each regio is in one case described as Galatic, i.e. part of the province Galatia. Luke did not follow the Rom custom, as Paul did; he kept the custom of the Greeks and Asiatic peoples, and styled the province by enumerating its regiones, using the expression Galatic (as in Pontus Galaticus and at Iconium, CIG, 3991) to indicate the supreme unity of the province. By using this adjective about both regiones he marked his point of view that all four churches are included in the provincial unity.

From Paul's references we gather that he regarded the churches of Galatia as one group, converted together (4 13), exposed to the same influences and changing together (1 6, 8; 3 1; 4 9), naturally visited at one time by a traveler (1 8; 4 14). He never thinks of churches of Phrygia or of Lycaonia; only of province Galatia (as of provinces Asia, Macedonia, Achaia). Paul did not include in one class all the churches of one journey: he went direct from Macedonia to Athens and Corinth, but classes the churches of Macedonia separate from those of Achaia. Troas and Laodicea and Colossae he classed with Asia (as Luke did Troas, Acts 20 4), Philippi with Macedonia, Corinth with Achaia. These classifications are true only of the Rom usage, not of early Gr usage. The custom of classifying according to provinces, universal in the fully formed church of the Christian age, was derived from the usage of the apostles (as Theodore Mopsuestia expressly asserts in his Comm. on First Timothy [Swete, II, 121]; Harnack accepts this part of the statement [Verbreitung, 2d ed, I, 387; Expansion, II, 96]). His churches then belonged to the four provinces, Asia, Galatia, Achaia, Macedonia. There were no other Pauline churches; all united in the gift of money which was carried to Jerus (Acts 20 4; 24 17).

IV. St. Paul's Use of "Galatians."—The people of the province of Galatia, consisting of many diverse races, when summed up together, were called Galatai, by Tacitus Ann. xv.6; Syncellus, when he says Ἀγροῦτος Γαλάταις φόρους ἔθετο (Augustos Galatais phorous etheto), follows an older historian describing the imposing of taxes on the province; and an inscription of Apollonia Phrygiae calls the people of the city Galatae (Lebas-Waddington, 1192). If Paul spoke to Philippi or Corinth or Antioch singly, he addressed them as Philippians, Corinthians, Antiochians (Phil 4 15; 2 Cor 6 11), not as Macedonians or Achaians; but when he had to address a group of several churches (as Antioch, Iconium, Derbe and Lystra) he could use only the provincial unity, Galatae.

All attempts to find in Paul's letter to the Galatians any allusions that specially suit the character of the Gauls or Galatae have failed. The Gauls were an aristocracy in a land which they had conquered. They clung stubbornly to their own Celtic religion long after the time of Paul, even though they also acknowledged the power of the old goddess of the country. They spoke their own Celtic tongue. They were proud, even boastful, and independent. They kept their native law under the Empire. The "Galatians" to whom Paul wrote had changed very quickly to a new form of religion, not from fickleness, but from a certain proneness to a more oriental form of religion which exacted of them more sacrifice of a ritual type. They needed to be called to freedom; they were submissive rather than arrogant. They spoke Greek. They were accustomed to the Graeco-Asiatic law: the law of adoption and inheritance which Paul mentions in his letter is not Rom, but Graeco-Asiatic, which in these departments was similar, with some differences; on this see the writer's Historical Commentary on Gal.

LITERATURE

When and to whom, precisely, this letter was written, it is difficult to say; its authorship and purpose are unmistakable. One might conceive it addressed by the apostle Paul, in its main tenor, to almost any church of his gentile mission attracted to Judaism, at any point within the years cir 45-60 AD. Some plausibly argue that it was the earliest, others place it among the later, of the Pauline Epistles. This consideration dictates the order of our inquiry, which proceeds from the plainer to the more involved and disputable parts of the subject.

I. The Authorship.—The Tübingen criticism of the last century recognized the four major epistles of Paul as fully authentic, and made them the corner-stone of its construction of NT history. Only Bruno Bauer (Dutch Kritik. d. paulin. Briefe, 1850-52) attacked them in this sense, while several other critics accused them of serious interpolations; but these attempts made little impression. Subsequently a group of Dutch scholars, beginning with Loman in his Quaestiones Paulinae (1882) and represented by Van Manen in the EB (art. "Paul"), have denied all the canonical epistles to the genuine Paul. They postulate a gradual development in NT ideas covering the first century and a half after Christ, and treat the existing letters as "catholic adaptations" of fragmentary pieces from the apostle's hand, produced by a school of "Paulinists" who carried their master's principles far beyond his own intentions. On this theory, Gal, with its advanced polemic against the law, approaching the position of Marcion (140 AD), was a work of the early 2d cent. Edwin Johnson in England (Antiqua Mater, 1887), and Steck in Germany (Galaterbrief, 1888), are the only considerable scholars outside of Holland who have adopted this hypothesis; it is rejected by critics so radical as Scholten and Schmiedel (see the art. of the latter on "Galatians" in EB). Knowling has searchingly examined the position of the Dutch school in his Witness of the Epistles (1892)—it is altogether too arbitrary and uncontrolled by historical fact to be entertained; see Jülicher's or Zahn's Introduction to NT (ET), to the same effect. Attempts to dismember this writing, and to appropriate it for other hands and later times than those of the apostle Paul, are idle in view of its vital coherence and the passionate force with which the author's personality has stamped itself upon his work; the Paulinum pectus speaks in every line. The two contentions on which the letter turns—concerning Paul's apostleship, and the circumcision of gentile Christians—belonged to the apostle's lifetime: in the fifth and sixth decades these were burning questions; by the 2d cent. the church had left them far behind.

Early Christianity gives clear and ample testimony to this document. Marcion placed it at the head of his Apostolikon (140 AD); Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, Melito, quoted it about the same time. It is echoed by Ignatius (Philad., i) and Polycarp (Philip., iii and v) a generation earlier, and seems to have been used by contemporary gnostic teachers. It stands in line with the other epistles of Paul in the oldest Lat, Syr and Egypt trs, and in the Muratorian (Rom) Canon of the 2d cent. It comes full into view as an integral part of the new Scripture in Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian at the close of this period. No breath of suspicion as to the authorship, integrity or apostolic authority of the Ep. to the Gal has reached us from ancient times.

II. Matter of the Epistle.—

A double note of war sounds in the address and greeting (1 1-4). Astonishment replaces the customary thanksgiving (vs 6-10): The Galatians are listening to preachers of "another gospel" (vs 6, 7) and traducers of the apostle (vs 8, 10), whom he declares "anathema." Paul has therefore two objects in writing —to vindicate himself, and to clear and reinforce his doctrine. The first he pursues from 1 11 to 2 21; the second from 3 1 to 5 12. Appropriate moral exhortations follow in 5 13-10. The closing paragraph (6 11-17) resumes incisively the purport of the letter. Personal, argumentative, and hortatory matter interchange with the freedom natural in a letter to old friends.

Paul's independent apostleship.—Paul asserts himself for his gospel's sake, by showing that his commission was God-given and complete (vs 11, 12). On

2. Personal History four decisive moments in his course he dwells for this purpose—as regards the second manifestly (ver 20), as to others probably, in correction of misstatements: (1 11-2 21; 4 12-20; 6 17)

(1) A thorough-paced Judaist and persecutor (vs 13, 14), Paul was supernaturally converted to Christ (ver 15), and received at conversion his charge for the Gentiles, about which he consulted no one (vs 16, 17).

(2) Three years later he "made acquaintance with Cephas" in Jerus and saw James besides, but no "other of the apostles" (vs 18, 19). For long he was known only by report to "the churches of Judaea" (vs 21-24).

(3) At the end of "fourteen years" he "went up to Jerus," with Barnabas, to confer about the "liberty" of gentile believers, which was endangered by "false brethren" (3 1-5). Instead of supporting the demand for the circumcision of the "Greek" Titus (ver 3), the "pillars" there recognized the sufficiency and completeness of Paul's "gospel of the uncircumcision" and the validity of his apostleship (vs 6-8). They gave "right hands of fellowship" to himself and Barnabas on this understanding (vs 9, 10). The freedom of gentile Christianity was secured, and Paul had not "run in vain."

(4) At Antioch, however, Paul and Cephas differed (ver 11). Cephas was induced to withdraw from the common church-table, and carried "the rest of the Jews," including Barnabas, with him (vs 12, 13). "The truth of the gospel," with Cephas' own sincerity, was compromised by this "separation," which in effect "compelled the Gentiles to Judaize" (vs 13, 14). Paul therefore reproved Cephas publicly in the speech reproduced by vs 14-21, the report of which clearly states the evangelical position and the ruinous consequences (vs 18, 21) of reestablishing "the law."

(1) Thesis.—The doctrinal polemic was rehearsed in the autobiography (3 3-5, 11-12). In 2 16 is laid down the thesis of the epistle: "A man is not

3. Doctrinal Polemic justified by the works of law but through faith in Jesus Christ." This proposition is (a) demonstrated from experience and history in 3 1-4 7; then (b) enforced by (3 1-5 12) 4 8-5 12.

(2) Main argument.—(a1) From his own experience (3 19-21) Paul passes to that of the readers, who are "bewitched" to forget "Christ cruciflod" (§ 3). Had their life in "the Spirit" come through "works of the law" or the "hearing of faith"? Will the flesh consummate what the Spirit began (vs 2-5)? (a3) Abraham, they are told, is the father of God's people; but "the men of faith" are Abraham's true heirs (vs 6-9). "The law" curses every transgressor. Scripture promised righteousness through faith for the very reason that justification by legal "doing" is impossible (vs 10-12). "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law" in dying the death it declared "accursed" (ver 13). Thus He conveyed to the nations "the promise of the Spirit," pledged to them through believing Abraham (vs 14). (a4) The "testament" God gave to Abraham and his seed "a single seed," observe) is unalterable. The Mosaic law, enacted 430 years later, could not nullify this instrument (vs 15-17 AV). Nullified it would have been, had its fulfillment turned on legal performance instead of Divine "grace" (ver 18). (a4) "Why then the law?" Sin required it, pending the accomplishment of "the promise." Its promulgation through intermediaries marks its inferiority (vs 19-20). With no power "to give life," it served the part of a jailer guarding us till "faith came," of "the paedagogue," training us for Christ (vs 21-25). (a5) But now "in Christ," Jew and Greek alike, "ye are all sons of God through faith"; being such, "you are Abraham's seed" and "heirs in terms of the promise" (vs 26-29). The "infant" heirs, in tutelage, were "subject to the elements of the world," until "God sent forth his Son," placed in the like condition, to "redeem" them (4 1-6). Today the "cry" of "the Spirit of his Son" in your "hearts" proves this redemption accomplished (vs 6, 7).

The demonstration is complete: § 1-4 7 forms the core of the epistle. The growth of the Christian consciousness has been traced from its germ in Abraham to its flower in the church of all nations. The Mosaic law formed a disciplinary interlude in the process, which has been all along a life of faith. Paul concludes where he began (§ 2), by claiming the Spirit as witness to the full salvation of the Gentiles; cf Rom 8 1-27; 2 Cor 8 4-15, Eph 1 13-14. From 4 8 onward to § 12, the argument is pressed home by appeal, illustration and warning.

(3) Appeal and warning.—(b1) After "knowing God," would the Galatians return to the bondage in which ignorantly they served as gods "the elements" of Nature? (vs 8, 9). Their adoption of Jewish "seasons" points to this backsliding (vs 10, 11). (b2) Paul's anxiety prompts the entreaty of vs 12-20, in which he recalls his fervent reception by his readers, deprecates their present alienation, and confesses his perplexity. (b3) Observe that Abraham had (see sons—after the flesh) and "through promise" (vs 21-23); those who want to be under law are choosing the part of Ishmael: "Hagar" stands for "the present Jerusalem" in her bondage; "the Jerusalem above is free—she is our mother!" (vs 24-28, 31). The fate of Hagar and Ishmael pictures the issue of legal subjection (vs 29, 30): "Stand fast therefore" (§ 1). (b4) The crucial moment comes at § 2, the Galatians are half-persuaded (vs 7, 8); they will fatally commit themselves, if they consent to "be circumcised." This will sever them from Christ, and bind them to complete observance of Moses' law, law or grace—by one or the other they must stand (vs 3-5). Circumcision, uncircumcision—these "count for nothing in Christ Jesus" (ver 6). Paul will not believe in the defection of those who "ran" so "well"; "judgment" will fall on their "disturber" (vs 7-10, 12). Persecution marks himself as no circumciser (ver 11).

The ethical application is contained in the phrase of Rom 8 2, "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus."

(1) Love guards Christian liberty from Rome; it fulfils the whole law in a single

The autograph conclusion (ver 11) exposes the sinister motive of the circumcisers, who are ashamed of the cross, the Christian's only boast (vs 12-15). Such men are none of "the Israel of God!" (ver 16). "The brand of Jesus" is now on Paul's body; at their peril "henceforth" will men trouble him! (ver 17). The benediction follows (ver 18).

The postscript reveals the inwardness of the legalists' agitation. They advocated circumcision from policy more than from conviction, hoping to conciliate Judaism and atone for accepting the Nazarene—to hide the shame of the cross—by capturing for the Law the gentile churches. They attack Paul because he stands in the

B) Salient Points way of this attempt. Their policy is treason; it surrenders to the world that cross of Christ, to which the world for its salvation must unconditionally submit. The grace of God the one source of salvation (1 3; 2 21; 5 4), the cross of Christ its sole ground (1 4; 3 19-21; 3 13; 6 14), faith in the Good News its all-at Stake sufficient means (3 16, 20; 3 2, 5-9, 23-26; 5 5), the Spirit its effectuating power

(3 2-5; 4 6, 7; 5 18-25; 6 8)—hence emancipation from the Jewish law, and the full status of sons of God open to the Gentiles (2 4, 5, 15-19; 3 10-14; 3 28-4 9, 26-31; 5 18; 6 15); these connected principles are at stake in the contention; they make up the doctrine of the epistle.

Circumcision is now proposed by the Judaists as a supplement to faith in Christ, as the qualification for sonship to Abraham and communion with the apostolic church (3 7, 29).

Stage of the After the Council at Jerus, they no longer say outright, "Except ye be circumcised after the custom of Moses, ye cannot be saved" (Acts 15 1). Paul's Galatian converts, they admit, "have begun in the Spirit"; they bid them "be perfected" and attain the full Christian status by conforming to Moses—"Christ will profit" them much more, if they add to their faith circumcision (3 3; 5 2; cf Rom 3 1). This insidious proposal might seem to be in keeping with the findings of the Council; Peter's action at Antioch lent color to it. Such a grading of the Circumcision and Uncircumcision within the church offered a tempting solution of the legalist controversy; for it appeared to reconcile the universal destination of the gospel with the inalienable prerogatives of the sons of Abraham. Paul's reply is, that believing Gentiles are already Abraham's "seed"—nay, sons and heirs of God, instead of adding anything, circumcision would rob them of everything they have won in Christ; instead of going on to perfection by its aid, they would draw back unto perdition.

Paul carries the war into the enemies' camp, when he argues, (a) that the law of Moses brought condemnation, not blessing, on its subjects (3 10-24); and (b) that instead of completing the work of faith, its part in the Divine economy was subordinate (3 19-25). It was a temporary provision, due to man's sinful unrepentness for the original covenant (3 19, 24; 4 4). The Spirit of sonship, now manifested in the Gentiles, is the infallible sign that the promise made to mankind in Abraham has been fulfilled. The whole position of the legalists is undermined by the use the apostle makes of the Abrahamic covenant.

The religious and the personal questions of the epistle are bound up together; this § 2 clearly indicates. The latter naturally emerges

4. The Personal Question first (1 1, 11 ff.). Paul's authority must be overthrown, if his disciples are to be Judaized. Hence the campaign of destruction against him (cf 2 Cor 10-13).

The line of defence indicates the nature of the attack. Paul was said to be a second-hand, second-rate apostle, whose knowledge of Christ and title to preach Him came from Cephas and the mother church. In proof of this, an account was given of his career, which he corrects in 1 13-21. "Cephas" was held up (cf 1 Cor 1 12) as the chief of the apostles, whose primacy Paul had repentedly acknowledged; and "the pillars" at Jerus were quoted as maintainers of Mosaic rule and authorities for the additions to be made to Paul's imperfect gospel. Paul himself, it was insinuated, "preaches circumcision" where it suits him; he is a plausible time-server (1 10; 5 11; cf Acts 16 3; 1 Cor 9 19-21). The apostle's object in his self-defence is not to sketch his own life, nor in particular to recount his visits to Jerus, but to prove his independent apostleship and his consistent maintenance of gentile rights. He states, therefore, what really happened on the critical occasions of his contact with Peter and the Jerus church. To begin with, he received his gospel and apostolic office from Jesus Christ directly, and apart from Peter (1 13-20); he was subsequently recognized by "the pillars" as apostle, on equality with Peter (2 6-9); he had finally vindicated his doctrine when it was assailed, in spite of Peter (2 11-12). The adjustment of Paul's recollections with Luke's narrative is a matter of dispute, in regard both to the conference of 2 1-10 and the encounter of 2 11-21; to these points we shall return, iv.3 (4), (5).

This is a letter of expostulation. Passion and argument are blended in it. Hot indignation and righteous scorn (1 7-9; 4 17; 5 10.

C) Characteristics 12; 6 12,13), tender, wounded affection (4 11-20), deep sincerity and manly integrity united with the loftiest consciousness of spiritual authority (1 10-12,20; 2 4-6,14; 5 2; 6 17), above all a consuming devotion to the person and cross of the Redeemer, fill these few pages with an incomparable wealth and glow of Christian emotion. The power of mind the epistle exhibits matches its largeness

1. Idiosyncrasy of heart. Rom indeed carries out the crasy of the argument with greater breadth and Epistle theoretic completeness; but Gal excels in pungency, incisiveness, and debating force. The style is that of Paul at the summit of his powers. Its spiritual elevation, its vigor and resource, its subtlety and irony, poignancy and pathos, the vis vivida that animates the whole, have made this letter a classic of religious controversy. The blemishes of Paul's composition, which contribute to his mastery of effect, are conspicuous here—his abrupt turns and apostrophes, and sometimes difficult ellipses (2 4-10,20; 4 16-20; 5 13), awkward parentheses and entangled periods (2 1-10,18; 3 16,20; 4 25), and outburst of excessive vehemence (1 8,9; 5 12). The anti-legalist polemic gives a special OT coloring to the epistle; the apostle meets his adversaries on their own ground.

2. Jewish Coloring In 3 16,19-20; 4 21-31, we have examples of the rabbinical exegesis Paul had learned from his Jewish masters. These texts should be read in part as argumenta ad hominem; however peculiar in form such Pauline passages may be, they always contain sound reasoning.

III. Relations to Other Epistles.—(1) The connection of Gal with Rom is patent; it is not sufficiently understood how pervasive that connection is and into what manifold detail it extends. The similarity of doctrine and doctrinal vocabulary manifest in Gal 2 13-6 16 and Rom 1 16-3 39 is accounted for by the Judaistic controversy on which Paul was engaged for so long, and by the fact that this discussion touched the heart of his gospel and raised questions in regard to which his mind was made up from the beginning (1 15,16), on which he would therefore always express himself in much the same way. Broadly speaking, the difference is that Rom is didactic and abstract, where Gal is personal and polemical; that the former presents a measured and rounded development of conceptions projected rapidly in the latter under the stress of controversy. The emphasis lies in Rom on justification by faith; in Gal on the freedom of the Christian man. The contrast of tone is symptomatic of a calmer mood in the writer—the lull which follows the storm; it suits the different address of the two epistles.

Besides the correspondence of purport, there is a verbal resemblance to Rom pervading the tissue of Gal, and traceable in its mannerisms and incidental expressions. Outside of the identical quotations, we find more than 40 Gr locutions, some of them rare in the language, common to these two and occurring in these only of Paul's epistles—including the words rendered "bear" (Rom 11 18 and Gal 5 10, etc.); "blessing" or "gratulation" (makarismós), "divisions" (Rom 16 17; Gal 5 20); "fall" or "fall from" (ekpíptō); "labour on" or "upon" (of persons), "passions" (pathēmata, in this sense); "set free" or "deliver" (eleutherōō); "shut up" or "conclude" and "shut out" or "exclude"; "travail [together]," and such phrases as "die to" (with dative), "hearing of faith," "if possible," "put on [the Lord Jesus] Christ," "those who do such things," "what saith the Scripture?" "where then?" (rhetorical), "why any longer?" The list would be greatly extended by adding expressions distinctive of this pair of letters that occur sporadically elsewhere in Paul. The kinship of Gal-Rom in vocabulary and vein of expression resembles that existing between Col-Eph or 1-2 Thess; it is twice as strong proportionately as that of 1-2 Cor. Not only the same current of thought, but with it, much the same stream of language was running through Paul's mind in writing these two epistles.

The association of Gal with the two Corinthian letters, though less intimate than that of Gal-Rom, is unmistakable.

We count 23 distinct locutions shared by 2 Cor alone (in its 13 chs) with Gal, and 20 such shared with 1 Cor (16 chs)—a larger proportion for the former.

2. Links with 1 and 2 Corinthians Among the Gal-1 Cor peculiarities are the sayings, "A little leaven," etc., "circumcision is nothing," etc., and the phrases, "be not deceived," "it is manifest" (dēlon as predicate to a sentence), "known by God," "profit nothing" and "to be something," "scandal of the cross," "the spiritual" (of persons), "they that are Christ's [of Christ Jesus]," "Peculiar to Gal-2 Cor are "another gospel" and "false brethren," "brings into bondage," "devour" and "zealously seek" or "am jealous over" (of persons); "a new creation," "confirm" or "ratify" (kurōō); "I am perplexed," the antithesis of "sowing" and "reaping" (fig.); the phrase "on the contrary" or "contrariwise" (ὑποαντίθετον), etc. The conception of the "two covenants" (or "testaments") is conspicuous in both epistles (Gal 3 17-21; 4 21-31; 2 Cor 3 8-18), and does not recur in Paul; in each case the ideas of "law" (or "letter"), "bondage," "death," are associated with the one, diathēkē, of "spirit," "freedom," "life," with the other. Gal 3 13 ("Christ . . . made a curse for us") is matched by 2 Cor 5 21 ("made sin for us"); in Gal 2 19 and 6 14 we find Paul "crucified to the world" in the cross of his Master and "Christ" alone "living in" him; in 2 Cor 5 14,15 this experience becomes a universal law for Christians; and where in Gal 6 17 the apostle appears as 'from henceforth . . . bearing in' his 'body the brand of Jesus,' in 2 Cor 4 10 he is "always bearing about in" his "body the dying of Jesus."

These identical or closely congruous trains of thought and turns of phrase, varied and dominant as they are, speak for some near connection between the two writings. By its list of vices in 5 19,20 Gal curiously, and somewhat intricately, links itself at once with 2 Cor and Rom (see 2 Cor 12 20; Rom 13 13; 16 17). Gal is allied by argument and doctrine with Rom, and by temper and sentiment with 2 Cor. The storm of feeling agitating our epistle blows from the same quarter, reaches the same height, and engages the same emotions with those which animate 2 Cor 10-13.

If we add to the 43 locutions confined in the Pauline Epp. to Gal-Rom the 23 such of Gal-2 Cor, the 20 of Gal-1 Cor, the 14 that range over Gal-Rom-2 Cor, the 15 of Gal-Rom-1 Cor, the 7 of Gal-1-2 Cor, and the 11 running through all four, we get a total of 133 words or phrases (apart from OT quotations) specific to Gal in common with one or more of the Cor-Rom group—an average, that is, of close upon 3 for each chapter of those other epistles.

With the other groups of Pauline letters Gal is associated by ties less numerous and strong, yet marked enough to suggest, in conjunction with the general style, a common authorship.

4. With Other Groups of Epistles The proportion of locutions peculiar to Gal and the 3d group (Col-Phil-eph-Phil) is 1 to each of their 15 chapters. The more noticeable of these are in Gal-Col: "elements of the world," and the maxim, "There is no Jew nor Greek," etc., associated with the "putting on of Christ" ("the new man"); "fulness of the time" (or "seasons") and "householders of faith [of God]," also "Christ loved me [the church] and gave up himself for me [her]," in Gal-Eph; "he that supplieth [your supplying of, epichōrēgta] the Spirit," and "vain-glory" (kenodoxia), in Gal-Phil; "redeem" (exagorazō) and "inheritance," are peculiar to Gal with Col-Eph together; the association of the believer's "inheritance" with "the Spirit" in Gal-Eph is a significant point of doctrinal identity.

The Thess and Tim-Tit (1st and 4th) groups are outliers in relation to Gal, judged by vocabulary. There is little to associate our epistle with either of these combinations, apart from pervasive Cor-Rom phrases and the Pauline complexion. There are 5 such expressions registered for the 8 chapters of 1 and 2 Thess, 7 for the 13 of 1 and 2 Tim and Tit—just over one to two chapters for each group. While the verbal coincidences in these two cases are, proportionately, but one-half so many as those connecting Gal with the 3d group of epistles and one-fifth or one-sixth of those linking it to the 2d group, they are also less characteristic; the most striking is the contrast of "well-doing" (kalopoiēō) with "fainting" or "wearying" (epkathēō) in Gal 6 9 and 2 Thess 3 13.

No other writing of Paul reflects the whole man so fully as this—his spiritual, emotional, intellectual, practical, and even physical, idiosyncrasy.

5. General Comparison We see less of the apostle's tenderness, but more of his strength than in Phil; less of his inner, mystic experiences, more of the critical turns of his career; less of his "fears," more of his "fightings," than in 2 Cor. While the 2d letter to Timothy lifts the curtain from the closing stage of the apostle's ministry, Gal throws a powerful light upon its beginning. The Pauline theology opens to us its heart in this document. The apostle's message of deliverance from sin through faith in the crucified Redeemer, and of the new life in the Spirit growing from this root, lives and speaks; we see it in Gal as a working and fighting theology, while in Rom it peacefully expands into an ordered system. The immediately saving truth of Christianity, the gospel of the Gospel, finds its most trenchant utterance in this epistle; here we learn "the word of the cross" as Paul received it from the living Saviour, and defended it at the crisis of his work.

IV. The Destination and Date.—The question of the people to whom, is bound up with that of the time at which, the Epistle to the Galatians was written. Each goes to determine the other. The expression "the first time" (tō prōteron) of 4 13 presumes Paul to have been twice with the readers previously—for the first occasion, see 4 13-15; for the second, 1 9; 5 3. The explanation of Round (Date of Ep. to Gal, 1906), that the apostle intended to distinguish his first arrival at the several (S.) Galatian cities from his return in the course of the same journey (Acts 14 21-23), cannot be accepted: Derbe, the limit of the expedition, received Paul and Barnabas but once on that round, and in retracing their steps the missionaries were completing an interrupted work, whereas Gal 4 13 implies a second, distinct visitation of the churches concerned as a whole; in Acts 15 36 Paul looks back to the journey of Acts 13 14-14 26 as one event.

Now the apostle revisited the S. Galatian churches in starting on the 2d missionary tour (Acts 16 1-5). Consequently, if his "Galatians" were Christians of Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe (the S. Galatian hypothesis), the letter was written in the further course of the 2d tour—from Macedonia or Corinth about the time of 1 and 2 Thess

(so Zahn, Intro to the NT, I, ET), or from Antioch in the interval between the 2d and 3d journeys (so Ramsay); for on this latter journey (Acts 18 23) Paul (ex hyp.) traversed 'the [S.] Galatian country' a third time. On the other hand, if they were people of Galatia proper, i.e. of N. (Old) Galatia, the epistle cannot be earlier than the occasion of Acts 18 23, when Paul touched a second time "the Galatian country," which, on this supposition, he had evangelized in traveling from S. Galatia to Troas during the previous tour (Acts 16 6-8). On the N. Galatian hypothesis, the letter was dispatched from Ephesus during Paul's long residence there (Acts 19; so most interpreters, ancient and modern), in which case it heads the 2d group of the epistles; or later, from Macedonia or Corinth, and shortly before the writing of the Epistle to the Rom (thus Lightfoot, Salmon, A. L. Williams and others).

Per contra, the earlier date, if proved independently, carries with it the S. Galatian, the later date the N. Galatian theory. The subscription of the TR "written from Rome," rests on inferior MS authority and late Patristic tradition. Clemens, with no suggestion as to place of origin, assigns to the writing a date subsequent to the termination of the 3d missionary tour (55 or 57 AD), inasmuch as the epistle reflects the controversy about the Law, which in Rom is comparatively mild, at an acute, and, therefore (he supposes), an advanced stage.

Lightfoot (ch iii of Intro to Comm.) placed Gal in the 2d group of the epistles between 2 Cor and Rom, upon considerations drawn from

2. Internal Evidence "the style and character" of the epistle. His argument might be strengthened by a detailed linguistic analysis (see III, 1-3, above). The more minutely one compares Gal with Rom and 1 and 2 Cor, the more these four are seen to form a continuous web, the product of the same experience in the writer's mind and the same situation in the church. This presumption, based on internal evidence, must be tested by examination of the topographical and chronological data.

(1) Galatia and the Galatians.—The double sense of these terms obtaining in current use has been shown in the art. on GALATIA; Stein-

3. External Data mann sets out the evidence at large in his essay on Der Leserkreis des Galaterbriefes, 61-76 (1908); see also A. L. Williams' Intro to Gal in Cambr. Gr Test. (1910). Rom authors of the period in using these expressions commonly thought of provincial Galatia,¹ which then embraced in addition to Galatia proper a large tract of Southern Phrygia and Lycaonia, reaching from Pisidian Antioch in the west to Derbe in the east; but writers of Asia Minor leaned to the older local and national usage, according to which "Galatia" signified the north-central highlands of the peninsula, on both sides of the river Halys, in which the invading Galatae had settled long before this time. (On their history see the previous art.) It is asserted that Paul strictly followed the official, as against the popular, usus loquendi in these matters—a questionable dictum (see A. L. Williams, op. cit., xix, xx, or Steinmann's Leserkreis, 78-104), in view of Gal 1 21,22 (note the Gr double article), to go no farther. There was nothing in Paul's Rom citizenship to make him a precisian in a point like this. Ramsay has proved that all four cities of Acts 13 14-14 23 were by this time included in provincial Galatia. Their inhabitants might therefore, officially, be styled "Galatians" (Galatae); it does not follow that this was a fit or likely compellation for Paul to use. Jülicher says this would have been a piece of "bad taste" on his part. The attachment of the southern districts (Phrygian, Pisidian, Lycaonian) to Galatia was recent—Derbe had been annexed so late as the year 41—and artificial. Supposing that their Rom "colonial" rank made the designation "Galatians" agreeable to citizens of Antioch or Lyrstra, there was little in it to appeal to Iconians or Derbeans (cf Schmiedel, in EB, col. 1604).

(2) Prima facie sense of Acts 16 6.—The "Galatian country" (Galatias chora) is mentioned by Luke, with careful repetition, in Acts 16 6 and 18 23. Luke at any rate was not tied to Imperial usage; he distinguishes "Phrygia" from "Asia" in Acts 9 10, although Phrygia was administratively parcelled out between Asia and Galatia. When therefore "Asia" is opposed in 16 6 to "the Phrygian and Galatian country" (or "Phrygia and Galatian country," Zahn), we presume that the three terms of locality bear alike a non-official sense, so that the "Galatian country" means Old Galatia (or some part of it) lying to the N.E., as "Asia" means the narrower Asia west of "Phrygia." On this presumption we understand that Paul and Silas, after completing their visitation of "the cities" of the former tour (Acts 16 4-5; cf 18 36, in conjunction with 18 14-15 23), since they were forbidden to proceed westward and speak the word in Asia, turned their faces to the region—first Phrygian, then Galatian—that stretched northward into new territory, through which they traveled toward "Myra" and "Bithynia" (ver 7). Thus ver 6 fills in the space between the S. Galatia covered by vs 4 and 5, and the Mysian-Bithynian border where we find the travelers in ver 7. Upon this, the ordinary construction of Luke's somewhat involved sentence, N. Galatia was entered by Paul on his 2d tour; he retraversed, more completely, "the Galatian region," at the commencement of the 3d tour, when he found "disciples" there (Acts 18 23) whom he had gathered on the previous visit.

(3) The grammar of Acts 16 6.—In the interpretation of the Lukan passages proposed by Ramsay, ver 16a, detached from 16b, is read as the completion of vs 1-5 ('And they went through the Phrygian . . . region. They were forbidden by the Holy Ghost . . . in Asia, and came over against Myra,' etc.); and "the Phrygian and Galatian region" means the southwestern division of Provincia Galatia, a district at once Phrygian (ethnically) and Galatian (politically). The combination of two local adjs. under a common art., to denote the same country in different respects, is exceptional in Greek (18 41 and 27 5 illustrate the usual force of this collocation), is clearly possible—the one strictly geographical expression, "the Ituraean and Trachonite country" in Lk 9 1, unfortunately, is also ambiguous. But the other difficulty of grammar involved in the new rendering of Acts 16 6 is insuperable: the severance of the participle, "having been forbidden" (ἀποκωλύμενοι), from the introductory vb., "they went through" (διήλθον), wrenches the sentence to dislocation; the sordid participle in such connection "must contain, if not something antecedent to 'they went,' at least something country" first, traveling this time directly N from Syrian Antioch, and turned westward toward Phrygia when he had reached Old Galatia; whereas his previous route had brought him westward along the highroad traversing S. Galatia, until he turned northward at a point not far distant from Pisidian Antioch, to reach N Galatia through Phrygia from the southwest. See the Map of Asia Minor.

(4) Notes of time in the epistle.—The "3 years" of 1 18 and the "14 years" of 2 1 are both seemingly counted from Paul's conversion. (a) The synchronism of the conversion with the murder of Stephen and the free action of the high priest against the Nazarenes (Acts 9 2, etc), and of Saul's visit to Jerus in the 3d year thereafter with Aretas' rule in Damascus (2 Cor 11 32 33), forbid our placing these two events further back than 36 and 38—at furthest, 35 and 37 AD (see Turner on "Chronology of the NT" in HDB, as against the earlier dating).

(b) This calculation brings us to 48-49 as the year of the conference of Gal 2 1-10—a date precluding the association of that meeting with the errand to Jerus related in Acts 11 30 and 12 25, while it suits the identification of the former with the council of Acts 15. Other indications converge on this as the critical epoch of Paul's apostleship. The expedition to Cyprus and S. Galatia (Acts 13 14) had revealed in Paul "signs of the apostle" which the chiefs of the Judaean church now recognised (Gal 2 7-9; cf Acts 15 12), and gave him the ascendancy which he exercised at this crisis; up to the time of Acts 15 1 "Saul" was known but as an old persecutor turned preacher (Gal 1 23), one of the band of "prophets and teachers" gathered round Barnabas at Antioch. The previous visit of Barnabas and Saul to Jerusalem (Acts 11 13) had no ostensible object beyond that of famine-relief. From Acts 13 we learn that the mother church just then was suffering deadly persecution; Peter certainly was out of the way. There was no opportunity for the negotiation described in Gal 2 1-10, and it would have been premature for Paul to raise the question of his apostleship at this stage. In all likelihood, he saw few Judaean Christians then beyond "the elders," who received the Antiochene charity (Acts 11 30). Nothing transpired in connection with this remittance, important as it was from Luke's standpoint, to affect the question of Gal 1, 2; it would have been idle for Paul to refer to it. On the other hand, no real contradiction exists between Acts 15 and Gal 2: "The two accounts admirably complete each other" (Pfleiderer; cf Cambr. Gr. Test., 145, 146; Steinmann, Die Abfassungszeit d. Gal.-Briefes, §7); in matters of complicated dispute involving personal considerations, attempts at a private understanding naturally precede the public settlement. It would be strange indeed if the same question of the circumcision of gentile believers had twice within a few years been raised at Antioch, to be twice carried to Jerus and twice over decided there by the same parties—Barnabas and Paul, Peter and James—and with no reference made in the second discussion (that of Acts, ex hypo.) to the previous compact (Gal 2). Granting the epistle written after the council, as both Ramsay and Zahn suppose, we infer that Paul has given his more intimate account of the crisis, about which the readers were already informed in the sense of Acts 15, with a view to bring out its essential bearing on the situation.

(c) The encounter of Paul and Cephas at Antioch (2 11-21) is undated. The time of its occurrence bears on the date of the epistle. As hitherto, the order of narration presumably follows the order of events, the "but" of ver 11 appears to contrast Cephas' present attitude with his action in Jerus just described. Two possible opportunities present themselves for a meeting of Paul and Cephas in Antioch subsequently to the council—the time of Paul's and Barnabas' sojourn there on their return from Jerus (Acts 15 35,36), or the occasion of Paul's later visit, occupying "some time," between the 2d and 3d tours (18 22,23), when for aught we know Barnabas and Peter may both have been in the Syrian capital.

The former dating assumes that Peter yielded to the Judaizers on the morrow of the council, that "Barnabas too was carried away" while still in collegueship with Paul and when the cause of gentle freedom, which he had championed, was in the flush of victory. It assumes that the legalists had no sooner been defeated than they opened a new attack on the same ground, and presented themselves as "from James" when James only the other day had repudiated their agitation (Acts 15 19,24). All this is very unlikely. We must allow the legalists time to recover from their discomfiture and to lay new plans (see II 2, (2), (3), (4)). Moreover, Luke's detailed narrative in Acts 15 30-36, which makes much of the visit of Judas and Silas, gives no hint of any coming of Peter to Antioch at that time, and leaves little room for this; he gives an impression of settled peace and satisfaction following on the Jerus concordat, with which the strife of Gal 2 11 ff would ill accord. Through the course of the 2d missionary tour, so far as the Thessalonian epistles indicate, Paul's mind remained undisturbed by legalistic troubles. "The apostle had quitted Jerus [after his understanding with the pillars] and proceeded to his 2d missionary journey full of satisfaction at the victory he had gained and free from anxiety for the future. . . . The decisive moment of the crisis necessarily falls between the Thessalonian and Galatian epistles. . . . A new situation suddenly presents itself to him on his return" to Antioch (A. Sabatier, The Apostle Paul, ET, 10, 11, also 124-36).

(5) Paul's renewed struggle with legalism.—The new situation arose through the vacillation of Peter; and the "certain from James" who made mischief at Antioch, were the forerunners of "troublers" who agitated the churches far and wide, appearing simultaneously in Corinth and N. Galatia. The attempt to set up a separate church-table for the circumcised at Antioch was the first movement in a crafty and persistent campaign against gentile liberties engineered from Jerus. The Ep. to the Rom signalized Paul's conclusive victory in this struggle, which covered the period of the 3d missionary tour. On his revisitation of the Galatians (1 9; 5 3 || Acts 18 23), fresh from the contention with Cephas and aware of the wide conspiracy on foot, Paul gave warning of the coming of "another gospel"; it had arrived, fulfilling his worst fears. Upon this view of the course of affairs (see Neander, Planting and Training of the Christian Church, III, vii; Godet's Intro to the NT, Epp. of Paul, 200-201; Sabatier, as above), the mistake of Peter at Antioch was the proximate antecedent of the trouble in Galatia; hence Gal 2 11-24 leads up to 3 1 and the main argument. Now, if the Antiochene collision befell so late as this, then the epistle is subsequent to the date of Acts 18 22,23; from which it follows, once more, that Gal belongs to the 3d missionary tour and the Cor-Rom group of letters.

(6) Ephesus or Corinth?—Chiefly because of the words, "you are removing so quickly," in 1 6, the epistle is by many referred to the earlier part of the above period, the time of Paul's protracted sojourn in Ephesus (Acts 19 8,10: 54-56 AD); "so quickly," however, signifies not "so soon after my leaving you," but "so suddenly" and "with such slight persuasion" (5 7,8). From Ephesus, had the apostle been there when the trouble arose, he might as easily have visited Galatia as he did Corinth under like circumstances (so much is implied in 2 Cor 13 1); he is longing to go to Galatia, but cannot (Gal 4 19,20). A more distant situation, such as Macedonia or Corinth (Acts 20 1-3), where Paul found himself in the last months of this tour (56-57 AD), and where, in churches of some standing, he was surrounded by a body of sympathetic "brethren" (1 1) whose support gave weight to his remonstrance with the Galatians, suits the epistle better on every account.

(7) Paul's first coming to Galatia.—In 4 13-15 the apostle recalls, in words surcharged with emotion, his introduction to the readers. His "preaching the good news" to them was due to "weakness of the flesh"—to some sickness, it seems, which arrested his steps and led him to minister in a locality that otherwise he would have "passed over," as he did Mysia a little later (Acts 16 8). So we understand the obscure language of ver 13. The S. Galatian theorists, in default of any reference to illness as affecting the apostle's movements in Acts 13 13,14, favor Ramsay's conjecture that Paul fell a victim to malaria on the Pamphylian coast, and that he and Barnabas made for Pisidian Antioch by way of seeking the cooler uplands. The former explanation lies nearer to the apostle's language: he says "I preached to you," not "I came to you, because of illness." The journey of a hundred miles from Perga to Antioch was one of the least likely to be undertaken by a fever-stricken patient (see the description in Conybeare and Howson's Life of St. Paul, or in Ramsay's Paul the Traveller). Besides, if this motive had brought Paul to Antioch, quite different reasons are stated by Luke for his proceeding to the other S. Galatian towns (see 13 50,51; 14 6,19,20). Reading Gal 4 13-15, one imagines the missionary hastening forward to some further goal (perhaps the important cities of Bithynia, Acts 16 7), when he is prostrated by a malady the physical effects of which were such as to excite extreme aversion. As strength returns, he begins to offer his gospel in the neighborhood where the unwilling halt has been made. There was much to prejudice the hearers against a preacher addressing them under these conditions; but the Galatians welcomed him as a heaven-sent messenger. Their faith was prompt and eager, their gratitude boundless.

The deification of Barnabas and Paul by the Lycanians (14 11-18) is the one incident of Luke's narrative of which the apostle's description reminds us. To this the latter is thought to be alluding when he writes, "You received me as an angel of God, as Christ Jesus!" But could he speak thus of his reception—hateful at the time—in the character of a heathen god, and of a reception that ended in his stoning? The "welcome" of the messenger implies faith in his message (cf Gal 4 14; 2 Cor 6 1; 1 Thess 1 6; Mt 10 40,41, where the same Gr vb. is used).

Paul's mishandling at Lystra (Acts 14 19,20) has suggested a correspondence in the opposite sense between the epistle and the story of the S. Galatian mission. The Lystran stones left their print on Paul's body; in these disfiguring scars one might see "the marks of Jesus" to which he points in Gal 6 17, were it not for the note of time, "from henceforth," which distinguishes these stigmata as a fresh infliction, identifying the servant now more than ever with his Master. The true || to Gal 6 17 is 2 Cor 4 10 (see the context in 4 7-5 4, also 1 8), which we quoted above (III, 2). When he wrote 2 Cor., the apostle was emerging from an experience of crucial anguish, which gave him an aspect imaging the dying Saviour whom he preached; to this new consecration the appeal of our epistle seems to refer.

(8) Barnabas and the Galatians.—The references to Barnabas in 2 1,9,13, at first sight suggest the S. Galatian destination of the letter. For Barnabas and Paul were companions on the first only of the three tours, and Barnabas is named thrice here and but twice in the rest of the epistles. Yet these very references awaken misgiving. Barnabas was Paul's full partner in the S. Galatian mission; he was senior in service, and had introduced Saul to the apostles at Jerus; he was the leader at the outset of this journey (Acts 9 27; 11 22-26; 13 1-3; 15 25)—Barnabas was taken for "Zeus" by the heathen of Lystra, while the eloquent Paul was identified with "Hermes" (Acts 14 12). The churches of S. Galatia had two founders, and owed allegiance to Barnabas along with Paul. Yet Paul deals with the readers as though he alone were their father in Christ. Referring to Barnabas conspicuously ously in the letter and as differing from himself on a point affecting the question at issue (2 13), Paul was the more bound to give his old comrade his due and to justify his assumption of sole authority, if he were in truth addressing communities which owed their Christianity to the two men in conjunction. On the S. Galatian hypothesis, the apostle appears ungenerously to have elbowed his colleague out of the partnership. The apostle Paul, it is to be noted, was particularly sensitive on matters of this kind (see 1 Cor 4 15; 2 Cor 10 13-16). The name of Barnabas was known through the whole church (see 1 Cor 9 6; Col 4 10); there is no more difficulty in supposing the N. Galatians to be familiar with it than with the names of James and John (2 9). Possibly Paul, as his responsibilities extended, had left the care of S. Galatia to Barnabas, who could readily superintend this district from Antioch in Syria; Paul refers to him in 1 Cor 9 6, long after the separation of Acts 15 39, as a fellow-worker. This would account for his making direct for N. Galatia on the 3d tour; see IV, 3 (3).

(9) The two Antiochs.—In 2 11 Paul refers to "Antioch," the famous city on the Orontes. To S. Galatians "Antioch" meant, as in 2 Tim 3 11, the Pisidian city of that name. Had Paul been addressing S. Galatians, and Antiochenes imprimis, he could not without singular inadvertence have failed to make the distinction. The gaucherie would have been as marked as if, in writing to a circle of West-of-England towns including Bradford-on-Avon, one should mention "Bradford" without qualification, meaning the Yorkshire Bradford.

The arguments drawn from local difference in legal usage—in the matters of adoption, testament, etc.—in favor of the S. Galatian destination (see Schmiedel's examination of Ramsay's views in EB, coll. 1608-9), and from the temperament of Paul's "Galatians" in favor of N. Galatia (Lightfoot), are too precarious to build upon.

(10) Wider bearings of the problem.—On a broad view of the scope of Paul's missionary work and of the relation of his letters to Acts, there is much to commend the S. Galatian theory. It simplifies the situation by connecting this cardinal writing of Paul with churches of cardinal importance in Luke's narrative. The S. Galatian cities lay along the main route of the apostle's travels, and in the mid-stream of the church's life. The epistle, when associated with the Christian communities of this region, gains a definite setting and a firm point of attachment in NT history; whereas the founding of N. Galatian Christianity is indicated by Luke, if at all, in the most cursory fashion, and it held an obscure place in the early church. How, it is asked, could Paul's intimate friend have been (on the N. Galatian theory) so uninterested in churches by which Paul himself set such store? And how can Paul have ignored, apart from the allusion of 2 Tim 3 11, the S. Galatians who formed the first-fruits of his wider labors and supplied a vital link in his chain of churches? In reply, we must point out: (1) that for anything we know Paul wrote many letters to S. Galatia; we possess but a selection from his correspondence; the choice of the canonical epistles was not governed by the importance of the parties addressed in them—witness Col and Philem; nor were Paul's concern for his churches, and the empressment with which he wrote, determined by their magnitude and position, but by their needs and their hold on his affections (see Gal 1 6, etc; 4 12-20). (2) The N. Galatian mission lay off the central line of Paul's journeys and of the advance of gentile Christianity; this is probably the reason why Luke, who was compelled to a strict economy of space, just ignores this field, though he shows himself aware of its existence. The apostle's confession that he preached to the readers, in the first instance, not from choice but necessity (4 13), accords with the neglect of N. Galatia in Acts; the evangelizing of the N. Galatians was an aside in Paul's work—an incident beyond the scope of his plans, from which at this period he was compelled again and again to deviate (Acts 16 6-10).

After all, though less important during the 1st cent. than S. Galatia, N. Galatia was not an unimportant or inaccessible region. It was traversed by the ancient "Royal Road" from the E. to the Hellespont, which the apostle probably followed as far as Phrygia in the journey of Acts 18 22.23. Planted by Paul in Old Galatia, the gospel would spread to Bithynia and Pontus farther north, as it certainly had done by the time Peter wrote to the churches of Asia Minor (1 Pet 1 1). It is observable that "Galatia" stands between "Pontus and Cappadocia" in Peter's enumeration of the provinces—an order indicating that Christians of North Galatia were particularly in the writer's mind. Had Paul never set foot in N. Galatia, had he not worked along the Royal Road and put his message in the way of reaching the northern provinces of Asia Minor, the claim of Rom 15 19 is difficult to sustain, that "from Jerusalem, and in a circle as far as Illyricum, he had fulfilled the gospel of Christ." On the whole, we find the external evidence in accord with the testimony given by the internal character and affinities of the epistle: we judge that this epistle was written cir the autumn or winter of 56-57 AD, from Macedonia or Corinth, toward the end of Paul's third missionary tour; that it was addressed to a circle of churches situated in Galatia proper or N. Galatia, probably in the western part of this country contiguous to (or overlapping) Phrygia (Acts 16 6); and that its place lies between the two Corinthian and the Rom letters among the epistles of the second group.

LITERATURE.—The S. Galatian destination was proposed by the Danish Myrster (Einlitz. in d. Brief an d. Gal. 1825; M. however included N. Galatia), and adopted by the French Perrot (De Galatia Provincia Romana, 1867) and Renan (S. Paul); by the German Clemen (Chronologie d. paulin. Briefe, 1893; Die Adressaten d. Gal.-Briefe; Paulus: sein Leben u. Wirken, 1904), Hausrath (NT Zeitgeschichte, 1873, ET), Pfleiderer (Paulinismus, 1873, ET; Paulinismus, much altered; Urchristentum, 1902), Steck (as above), Weizsäcker (Das apost. Zeitalter, 1902, ET); after Ramsay (see under GALATIA), by Belser (Beiträge z. Erklärung d. AG, etc), O. Holtzmann (Zeitschrift f. KG, 1894), von Soden (Hist. of Early Christian Lit., ET; he includes S. with N. Galatia), Weber (Die Adressaten d. Gal.-Briefe), J. Weiss (KE, art. "Kleinasiens"), in Germany; by Askwith (Ep. to Gal: An Essay on Its Destination and Date), Bacon (Expos. V, vii, 123-36; x, 351-67), Bartlett (Expos. V, x, 263-80), Gifford (Expos. IV, x, 1-20), Maclean (1-vol HDB), Rendall (Expos. IV, ix, 254-64; EGT, Intro to "Galatians"), Round (as above), Sanday (with hesitation, Expos. IV, vii, 491-95), Woodhouse (EB, art. "Galatia"). The N. Galatian destination, held by earlier scholars up to Lightfoot and Salmon (DB, an illuminating discussion), is reasserted, in view of Ramsay's findings, by Chase (Expos. IV, viii, 401-19; ix, 331-42), Cheetham (Class. Review, 1894), Dods (HDB, art. "Galatians"), Williams (Cambr. Gr. Test., 1910), in this country; by Sabatier (L'Apostre Paul, ET, 1891); by Gheorghiu (Adressatii ep. c. Galatensi, Cernauti, 1904, praised by Steinmann), and by the German critics Blass (Acta Apost.), von Dobschütz (Die urchr. Gemeinden, 1902, and Probleme d. apost. Zeitalters), Harnack (Apostelgeschichte, 1908, 37-90), H. Holtzmann (Handcomm. s. NT, "AG"), Jülicher (NT Intro, ET), Lipsius (Handcomm. s. NT, "Galater"), Lietzmann (doubtfully, Handbuch s. NT, III, 1, "Galaterbrief"), Mommsen (ZNTW, 1901, 81-98), Schmiedel (EB), Schröter (Jahrbuch f. prot. Theologie, XVIII, 460-74), Sieffert (Meyer's Kommentar), Steinmann (as above), Zöckler (a full and masterly discussion; Studien u. Kritiken, 1895, 51-102). Mommsen's verdict is thus expressed: "To apprehend the Galatians of Paul other than in the strict and narrower sense of the term, is allowable. The Provinces associated with Galatia under the rule of a single legate, as e.g. Lycania certainly was as early as the time of Claudius, were in no way incorporated in that region; the official inscriptions simply set Galatia at the head of the combined regions. Still less could the inhabitants of Iconium and Lystra be named 'Galatians' in common speech."

Apart from the aforesaid controversy, besides the standard Comm. on Paul's Epp., Luther's Ad Galatas is of unique historical interest; the interpretations of Usteri (1833), Hilgenfeld (1852), Winer (1859), Holsten (Das Evangel. d. Paulus, 1880), Philippi (1884), in German; Baljon (1889), in Dutch; and of B. Jowett, Ellcott, Beet, are specially serviceable, from different points of view; see also CGT and EB.

GEORGE G. FINDLAY

GALBANUM, gal'ba-num (גַּלְבָּנוֹן, galbānāh; χαλβάνη, chalbanē): A gum-resin which occurs in small, round, semitranslucent tears or in brownish yellow masses; has a pleasant aromatic odor and a bitter taste; and is today, at any rate, imported from Persia. It is derived from certain umbelliferous plants, Ferula galbaniflua and F. rubricaulis. It is mentioned in Ex 30 34 as an ingredient of the holy incense, and also in Sir 24 15: "a pleasant odour . . . as galbanum."

GALEED, gal'ē-ed (גִּלְעָד, gal'ēdh): Derived from the Heb gal, "a heap of stones," and 'ēdh, "witness." The meaning therefore is "cairn" or "heap of witness," corresponding to y'ghar-sādhādhūthā in Aram. (Gen 31 47). It is applied to the cairn raised by Jacob and Laban, beside which they sealed their covenant in a common meal, the memory of which they appealed to the silent cairn to preserve. The ancient custom of associating events with inanimate objects as witnesses is often illustrated in Heb history (Josh 4 4 ff, etc). There may be in this narrative a suggestion of how the name "Gilead" came to be applied to that country. W. EWING

GALGALA, gal'gal-a (גִּלְגָּל, Gālgala): Gr equivalent for Gilgal. The word occurs in 1 Macc 9 2 in connection with Arbela, in Galilee—"The way to Galgala"—but it is doubtful which Gilgal is meant. Cf Jos, Ant, XII, xi, 1; and see GILGAL.

GALILEAN, gal-i-lē'an. See GALILEE.

GALILEE, gal'i-lē (גִּלְיָל, ha-gālīl, ha-gālīlāh, lit. "the circuit" or "district"; ἡ Γαλιλαία, hē Galilata): Kedesh, the city of refuge,

1. Galilee of is described as lying in Galilee, in Mt. the Nations Naphtali (Josh 20 7; cf 21 32).

The name seems originally to have referred to the territory of Naphtali. Joshua's victorious campaign in the north (ch 11), and, subsequently, the triumph of the northern tribes under Deborah and Barak (Jgs 4 f) gave Israel supremacy; yet the tribe of Naphtali was not able to drive out all the former inhabitants of the land (1 33). In the time of Solomon the name applied to a much wider region, including the territory of Asher. In this land lay the cities given by Solomon to Hiram (1 K 9 11). Cabul here named must be identical with that of Josh 19 27. The Asherites also failed to possess certain cities in their allotted portion, so that the heathen continued to dwell among them. To this state of things, probably, is due the name given in Isa 9 1 to this region, "Galilee of the nations," i.e. a district occupied by a mixed population of Jews and heathen. It may also be referred to in Josh 12 23, where possibly we should read "king of the nations of Galilee" (h'gālīl), instead of "Gilgal" (b'gīlgāl). Yet it was within this territory that, according to 2 S 20 18 (LXX) lay the two cities noted for their preservation of ancient Israelitic religious customs in their purity—Abel-beth-maacah and Dan.

There is nothing to guide us as to the northern boundary of Galilee in the earliest times. On the

2. Ancient Boundaries E. it was bounded by the upper Jordan and the Sea of Galilee, and on the S. by the plain of el-Baḥauf. That all within these limits belonged to Galilee we may be sure. Possibly, however, it included Zebu-lun, which seems to be reckoned to it in Isa 9 1. In this territory also there were unconquered Canaanite cities (Jgs 1 30).

At the instigation of Asa, king of Judah, Benhadad, son of Tabrimmon of Damascus, moved against Israel, and the cities which he smote

3. Before the Exile all lay within the circle of Galilee (1 K 15 20). Galilee must have been the arena of conflict between Jehoahaz and Hazael, king of Syria. The cities which the latter captured were recovered from his son Benhadad by Joash, who defeated him three times (2 K 10 32; 13 22 ff). The affliction of Israel nevertheless continued "very bitter," and God saved them by the hand of Jeroboam son of Joash, the great warrior monarch of the Northern Kingdom, under whom Galilee passed completely into the hands of Israel (2 K 14 25 ff). But the days of Israel's supremacy in Northern Pal were nearly over. The beginning of the end came with the invasion of Tiglath-pileser III, who took the chief cities in Galilee, and sent their inhabitants captive to Assyria (ver 29). Probably, as in the case of the Southern Kingdom, the poorest of the land were left as husbandmen. At any rate there still remained Israelites in the district (2 Ch 30 10 f); but the measures taken by the conqueror must have made for the rapid increase of the heathen element.

In post-exilic times Galilee is the name given to the most northerly of the three divisions of Western

4. After the Exile Pal. The boundaries are indicated by Jos (BJ, III, iii, 1). It was divided into Lower and Upper Galilee, and was encompassed by Phoenicia and Syria. It marched with Ptolemais and Mt. Carmel on the W. The mountain, formerly Galilean, now belonged to the Syrians. On the S. it adjoined Samaria and Scythopolis (Beisān) as far as the river Jordan. It was bounded on the E. by Hippene, Gadara, Gaulonitis and the borders of the kingdom of Agrippa, while the northern frontier was marked by Tyre and the country of the Tyrians. The northern limit of Samaria was Ginea, the modern Jenīn, on the south border of Esdraelon. Lower Galilee, therefore, included the great plain, and stretched northward to the plain of er-Rāmeḥ—Ramah of Josh 19 36. Jos mentions Bersabe, the modern Abu-Shebā, and the Talm, K'phar Hānanyāh, the modern Kefr 'Anan, as the northern border; the former being about a mile N. of the latter. The plain reaches to the foot of the mountain chain, which, running E. and W., forms a natural line of division. Upper Galilee may have included the land as far as the gorge of the Lūḏāny, which, again, would have formed a natural boundary to the N. Jos, however, speaks of Kedesh as belonging to the Syrians (BJ, II, xviii, 1), situated "between the land of the Tyrians and Galilee" (Ant, XIII, v, 6). This gives a point on the northern frontier in his time; but the rest is left indefinite. Guthe, Sanday and others, followed by Cheyne (EB, s.v.), on quite inadequate grounds conclude that certain localities on the E. of the Sea of Galilee were reckoned as Galilean.

In the mixed population after the exile the purely Jewish element must have been relatively small.

In 165 BC Simon Maccabaeus was able to rescue them from their threatening neighbors by carrying the whole Galileans community away to Judaea (1 Macc 5 14 ff). Jos tells of the conquest by Aristobulus I of Ituraea (Ant, XIII, xi, 3). He compelled many of them to adopt Jewish religious customs, and to obey the Jewish law. There can be little doubt that Galilee and its people were treated in the same way. While Jewish in their religion, and in their patriotism too, as subsequent history showed, the population of Galilee was composed of strangely mingled elements—Aramaean, Ituraean, Phoen and Gr. In the circumstances they could not be expected to prove such sticklers for high orthodoxy as the Judeans. Their mixed origin explains the differences in speech which distinguished them from their brethren in the S., who regarded Galilee and the Galileans with a certain proud contempt (Jn 1 46; 7 52). But a fine type of manhood was developed among the peasant farmers of the two Galilees which, according to Jos (BJ, III, iii, 2), were "always able to make a strong resistance on all occasions of war; for the Galileans are inured to war from their infancy . . . nor hath the country ever been destitute of men of courage." Jos, himself a Galilean, knew his countrymen well, and on them he mainly relied in the war with Rome. In Galilee also the Messianic hope was cherished with the deepest intensity. When the Messiah appeared, with His own Galilean upbringing, it was from the north-countrymen that He received the warmest welcome, and among them His appeal elicited the most gratifying response.

In 47 BC, Herod the Great, then a youth of 25, was made military commander of Galilee, and won great applause by the fashion in which he suppressed a band of robbers who had long vexed the country (Lut, XIV, ix, 2). When Herod came to the throne, 37 BC, a period of peace and prosperity for Galilee began, which lasted till the banishment of his son Antipas in 40 AD. The tetrarchy of Galilee was given to the latter at his father's death, 4 BC. His reign, therefore, covered the whole life of Jesus, with the exception of His infancy. After the banishment of Antipas, Galilee was added to the dominions of Agrippa I, who ruled it till his death in 44 AD. Then followed a period of Rom administration, after which it was given to Agrippa II, who sided with the Romans in the subsequent wars, and held his position till 100 AD. The patriotic people, however, by no means submitted to his guidance. In their heroic struggle for independence, the command of the two Galilees, with Gamala, was intrusted to Jos, who has left a vivid narrative, well illustrating the splendid courage of his freedom-loving countrymen. But against such an adversary as Rome even their wild bravery could not prevail; and the country soon lay at the feet of the victorious Vespasian, 67 AD. There is no certain knowledge of the part played by Galilee in the rebellion under Hadrian, 132-35 AD.

At the beginning of the Rom period Sepphoris (Safuriyeh), about 3 miles N. of Nazareth, took the leading place. Herod Antipas, however, built a new city on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, which, in honor of the reigning emperor, he called Tiberias. Here he reared his "golden house," and made the city the capital of his tetrarchy. See TIBERIAS. After the fall of Jerus, Galilee, which had formerly been held in contempt, became the home of Jewish learning, and its chief seat was found in Tiberias where the Mish was committed to writing, and the Jerus Talm was composed. Thus a city into which at first no pious Jew would enter, in a province which had long been despised by the leaders of the nation, became the main center of their national and religious life.

Among the more notable cities in Galilee were Kedesh Naphtali, the city of refuge, the ruins of which lie on the heights W. of el-Huleh;

7. Cities of Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum, Galilee N. of the Sea of Galilee; Nazareth, the city of the Saviour's youth and young manhood; Jotapata, the scene of Jos' heroic defence against the Romans, which stood at Tell Jefät, N. of the plain of Asochis (BJ, III, vii, viii); Cana of Galilee; and Nain, on the northern slope of the mountain now called Little Hermon.

In physical features Galilee is the most richly diversified and picturesque district in Western Pal; while in beauty and fertility it is

8. General strongly contrasted with the barren Description uplands of Judah. Cut off from Mt.

Lebanon in the N. by the tremendous gorge of the Litāny, it forms a broad and high plateau, sinking gradually southward until it approaches Safed, when again it rises, culminating in Jebel Jermuk, the highest summit on the W. of the Jordan. From Safed there is a rapid descent by stony slope and rocky precipice to the shore of the Sea of Galilee. The mountains of which Jebel Jermuk is the N.E. outrunner stretch westward across the country, and drop upon the plain of er-Rameh to the S. Irregular hills and valleys, with breadths of shady woodlands, lie between this plain and that of Asochis (el-Baḥāuf). The latter is split from the E. by the range of Jebel Tor'an. S. of Asochis rise lower hills, in a cup-like hollow among which lies the town of Nazareth. S. of the town they sink steeply into the plain of Esdraelon. The isolated form of Tabor stands out on the E., while Carmel bounds the view on the W. The high plateau in the N. terminates abruptly at the lip of the upper Jordan valley. As the Jordan runs close to the base of the eastern hills, practically all this valley, with its fine rolling downs, is included in Galilee. The plain of Gennesaret runs along the northwestern shore of the Sea of Galilee. From the uplands to the W., stretching from Kurūn Hallin (the traditional Mount of Beatitudes) to the neighborhood of Tabor, the land lets itself down in a series of broad and fertile terraces, falling at last almost precipitously on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. The descent toward the Mediterranean is much more gradual; and the soil gathered in the longer valleys is deep and rich.

The district may be described as comparatively well watered. The Jordan with its mighty springs is, of course, too low for purposes of irrigation. But there are many perennial streams fed by fountains among the hills. The springs at Jenin are the main sources of the river Kishon, but for the greater part of its course through the plain the bed of that river is far below the surface of the adjoining land. The dews that descend from Lebanon and Hermon are also a perpetual source of moisture and refreshment.

Galilee was famous in ancient times for its rich and fruitful soil, "full of the plantations of trees of all sorts, insomuch that it invites the

9. Products most slothful to pains in its cultivation by its fruitfulness; accordingly it is all cultivated by its inhabitants, and no part of it lies idle" (BJ, III, iii, 2). See also GENNESARET, LAND OF. The grapes grown in Naphtali were in high repute, as were the pomegranates of Shikmona—the Sykaminos of Jos—which stood on the shore near Mt. Carmel. The silver sheen of the olive meets the eye in almost every valley; and the olive oil produced in Galilee has always been esteemed of the highest excellence. Its wheat fields also yielded an abundant supply, the wheat of Chorazin being proverbial. The great plain of Esdraelon must also have furnished rich provision. It cannot be doubted that Galilee was largely drawn upon for the gifts in kind which Solomon bestowed upon the king of Tyre (2 Ch 2 10). At a much later day the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon depended upon the produce of Galilee (Acts 12 20).

Galilee was in easy touch with the outside world by means of the roads that traversed her valleys, crossed her ridges and ran out eastward, westward and southward. Thus she was connected with the harbors on the Phoen seaboard, with Egypt on the

S., with Damascus on the N.E., and with the markets of the E. by the great caravan routes (see "Roads" under PALESTINE). In the days of

10. Contact Christ the coming and going of the with the merchantmen, the passing of armies and the movements of the representatives of the Empire, must have made these highways a scene of perpetual activity, touching the dwellers in Galilee with the widening influences of the great world's life.

The peasant farmers of Galilee, we have seen, were a bold and enterprising race. Encouraged 11. Popu- by the fruitfulness of their country, they were industrious cultivators of the soil. Jos estimates the population at 3,000,000. This may be an exaggeration; but here we have all the conditions necessary for the support of a numerous and prosperous people. This helps us to understand the crowds that gathered round and followed Jesus in this district, where the greater part of His public life was spent. The cities, towns and villages in Galilee are frequently referred to in the Gospels. That the Jewish population in the centuries immediately after Christ was numerous and wealthy is sufficiently proved by the remains from those times, esp. the ruins of synagogues, e.g. those at Tell Hām, Kerdeh, Irtid, el-Jish, Kefr Bir'im, Meirōn, etc. Near the last named is shown the tomb of the great Jewish teacher Hillel.

Galilee was not without her own heroic memories. The great battlefields of Megiddo, Gilboa, and the waters of Merom lay within her borders; and among the famous men of the past she could claim Barak, Ibzan, Elon and Tola of the judges; of the prophets, Jonah and Elisha at least; possibly also Hosea who, according to a Jewish tradition, died in Babylon, but was brought to Galilee and buried in Safed (Neubauer, Geog. der Talmud, 227). When the chief priests and Pharisees said, "Search, and see that out of Galilee ariseth no prophet," it argued strange and inexcusable ignorance on their part (Jn 7 52). Perhaps, however, in this place we should read ὁ προφήτης, ho prophētēs, "the prophet," i.e. the Messiah. It is significant that 11 out of the 12 apostles were Galileans.

GALILEE, MOUNTAIN IN: After the resurrection the disciples "went into Galilee, unto the mountain where Jesus had appointed them" (Mt 28 16). Here Jesus came to them, declared that all authority in heaven and earth had been given to Him, commanded them to go and make disciples of all nations, concluding with the memorable promise: "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." Probably it was some well-known height not far from the scenes most frequented during the Galilean ministry. Looking from the western shore at the uplands N. of the lake, it is not easy to imagine a more appropriate spot for this never-to-be-forgotten interview than Jebel Kan'an, a bold headland not far to the E. of Safed, overlooking the land of Gennesaret and the sea, and commanding from its lofty summit a view of about 80 miles in every direction. Of course, there is no certainty.

GALILEE, SEA OF (ἡ θάλασσα τῆς Γαλιλαίας, hē thálassa tēs Galilaias): This is the name 5 t given in the NT (Mt 4 18; 15 29; Mk 1 16; 7 31; Jn 6 1) to the sheet of water

1. The which is elsewhere called "the sea of Tiberias" (Jn 21 1; cf 6 1); "the lake of Gennesaret" (Lk 5 1); "the sea" (Jn 6 16, etc), and "the lake" (Lk 5 1, etc). The OT names were "sea of Chinnereth" (יַם כִּנְרֶת, yām-kinnereth: Nu 34 11; Dt 3 17; Josh 13 27; 19 35), and "sea of Chinneroth" (יַם כִּנְרֹת, yām-kinnrōth: Josh 12 3; cf 11 2; 1 K 15 20). In 1 Macc 11 67 the sea is called "the water of Gennesar" (RV "Gennesareth"). It had begun to be named from the city so recently built on its western shore even in NT times (Jn 21 1; 6 1); and by this name, slightly modified, it is known to this day—Baḥr Ṭabariyeh.

Sea of Galilee.

The sea lies in the deep trough of the Jordan valley, almost due E. of the Bay of Acre. The surface is 680 ft. below the level of the

2. General Mediterranean. It varies in depth Description from 130 ft. to 148 ft., being deepest along the course of the Jordan (Barrois, PEFS, 1894, 211-20). From the point where the Jordan enters in the N. to its exit in the S. is about 13 miles. The greatest breadth is in the N., from el-Mejdel to the mouth of Wādī Semak being rather over 7 miles. It gradually narrows toward the S., taking the shape of a gigantic pear, with a decided bulge to the W. The water of the lake is clear and sweet. The natives use it for all purposes, esteeming it light and pleasant. They refuse to drink from the Jordan, alleging that "who drinks Jordan drinks fever." Seen from the mountains the broad sheet appears a beautiful blue; so that, in the season of greenery, it is no exaggeration to describe it as a sapphire in a setting of emerald. It lights up the landscape as the eye does the human face; and it is often spoken of as "the eye of Galilee." To one descending from Mt. Tabor and approaching the edge of the great hollow, on a bright spring day, when the land has already assumed its fairest garments, the view of the sea, as it breaks upon the vision in almost its whole extent, is one never to be forgotten. The mountains on the E. and on the W. rise to about 2,000 ft. The heights of Naphtali, piled up in the N., seem to culminate only in the snowy summit of Great Hermon. If the waters are still, the shining splendors of the mountain may be seen mirrored in the blue depths. Round the greater part of the lake there is a broad pebbly beach, with a sprinkling of small shells. On the sands along the shore from el-Mejdel to Ain el-Tineh these shells are so numerous as to cause a white glister in the sunlight.

The main formation of the surrounding district is limestone. It is overlaid with lava; and here and there around the lake there are outcrops of basalt through the limestone. At el-Tabgha in the N., at Ain el-Fuliyeh, S. of el-Mejdel, and on the shore, about 2 miles S. of modern Tiberias, there are strong hot springs. These things, together with the frequent, and sometimes terribly destructive, earthquakes, sufficiently attest the volcanic character of the region. The soil on the level parts around the sea is exceedingly fertile. See GENNESARET, LAND OF. Naturally the temperature in the valley is higher than that of the uplands; and here wheat and barley are harvested about a month earlier. Frost is not quite unknown; but no one now alive remembers it to have done more than lay the most delicate fringe of ice around some of the stones on the shore. The fig and the vine are still cultivated with success. Where vegetable gardens are planted they yield plentifully. A few palms are still to be seen. The indigo plant is grown in the plain of Gennesaret. In their season the wild flowers lavish a wealth of lovely colors upon the surrounding slopes; while bright-blossoming oleanders fringe the shore.

Coming westward from the point where the Jordan enters the lake, the mountains approach within a short distance of the sea. On the shore, fully 2 miles from the Jordan, are the ruins of Tell Hām. See CAPERNAUM. About 2 miles farther W. are the hot springs of et-Tabgha. Here a shallow vale breaks northward, bounded on the W. by Tell 'Arimeh. This tell is crowned by an ancient Canaanite settlement. It throws out a rocky promontory into the sea, and beyond this are the ruins of Khān Mīnyeh, with 'Ain el-Tīneh close under the cliff. Important Rom remains have recently been discovered here. From this point the plain of Gennesaret (el-Ghuweir) sweeps round to el-Mejdel, a distance of about 4 miles. W. of this village opens the tremendous gorge, Wādī el-Hamām, with the famous robbers' fastnesses in its precipitous sides, and the ruins of Arbela on its southern lip. From the northern parts of the lake the Horns of Haffin, the traditional Mount of Beatitudes, may be seen through the rocky jaws of the gorge. S. of el-Mejdel the mountains advance to the shore, and the path is cut in the face of the slope, bringing us to the hot spring, 'Ain el-Fūtiyeh, where is a little valley, with gardens and orange grove. The road then crosses a second promontory, and proceeds along the base of the mountain to Tiberias. Here the mountains recede from the shore leaving a crescent-shaped plain, largely covered with the ruins of the ancient city. The modern town stands at the northern corner of the plain; while at the southern end are the famous hot baths, the ancient Hammath. A narrow ribbon of plain between the mountain and the shore runs to the S. end of the lake. There the Jordan, issuing from the sea, almost surrounds the mound on which are the ruins of Kerak, the Tarichaea of Jos. Crossing the floor of the valley, past Semakh, which is now a station on the Haifa-Damascus railway, we find a similar strip of plain along the eastern shore. Nearly opposite Tiberias is the stronghold of Ka'at el-Horn, possibly the ancient Hippos, with the village of Fīṭ, the ancient Aphek, on the height to the E. To the N. of this the waters of the sea almost touch the foot of the steep slope. A herd of swine running headlong down the mountain would here inevitably perish in the lake (Mt 8 32, etc.). Next we reach the mouth of Wādī Semakh, in which lie the ruins of Kurakh, probably representing the ancient Gerasa. Northward the plain widens into the marshy breadths of el-Baṭṭāh, and once more we reach the Jordan, flowing smoothly through the flat lands to the sea.

The position of the lake makes it liable to sudden storms, the cool air from the uplands rushing down the gorges with great violence and

3. Storms tossing the waters in tumultuous billows. Such storms are fairly frequent, and as they are attended with danger to small craft, the boatmen are constantly on the alert.

Save in very settled conditions they will not venture far from the shore. Occasionally, however, tempests break over the lake, in which a boat could hardly live. Only twice in over 5 years the present writer witnessed such a hurricane. Once it burst from the S. In a few moments the air was thick with mist, through which one could hear the roar of the tortured waters. In about ten minutes the wind fell as suddenly as it had risen. The air cleared, and the wide welter of foam-crested waves attested the fury of the blast. On the second occasion the wind blew from the E., and the phenomena described above were practically repeated.

Fishing on the Sea of Galilee.

The sea contains many varieties of fish in great numbers. The fishing industry was evidently pursued to profit in the days of Christ.

4. Fish Zebedee was able to hire men to assist him (Mk 1 20). In recent years there has been a considerable revival of this industry. See FISHING. Four of the apostles, and these the chief, had been brought up as fishermen on the Sea of Galilee—Peter and Andrew, James and John.

The towns around the lake named in Scripture are treated in separate articles. Some of these it is impossible to identify. Many are the ruins of great and splendid cities on slope and height of which almost nothing is known today. But from their mute testimony we gather that the lake in the valley which is now so quiet was once the center of a busy and prosperous population. We may assume that the cities named in the Gospels were mainly Jewish. Jesus would naturally avoid those in which Gr influences were strong. In most cases they have gone, leaving not even their names with any certainty behind; but His memory abides forever. The lake and mountains are, in main outline, such as His eyes beheld. This it is that lends its highest charm to "the eye of Galilee."

The advent of the railway has stirred afresh the pulses of life in the valley. A steamer plies on the sea between the station at Semakh and Tiberias. Superior buildings are rising outside the ancient walls. Gardens and orchards are being planted. Modern methods of agriculture are being employed in the Jewish colonies, which are rapidly increasing in number. Slowly, perhaps, but surely, the old order is giving place to the new. If freedom and security be enjoyed in reasonable measure, the region will again display its long-hidden treasures of fertility and beauty.

GALL, gōl:

(1) גָּל, gāl, or גָּל, gāl (Dt 32 32 only, "grapes of gall"): Some very bitter plant, the bitterness as in (2) being associated with the idea of poison. Dt 29 18 m "rosh, a poisonous herb"; Lam 3 5, 19; Jer 8 14; 9 15; 23 15, "water of gall," m "poison"; Hos 10 4, tr "hemlock"; Am 6 12, "Ye have turned justice into gall"; Job 20 16, the "poison of asps": here rosh clearly refers to a different substance from the other references, the points in common being bitterness and poisonous properties. Hemlock (Conium maculatum), colocynth (Citrullus colocynthus) and the poppy (Papaver somniferum) have all been suggested as the original rōsh, the last having most support, but in most references the word may represent any bitter poisonous substance. Rōsh is associated with la'ānāh, "wormwood" (Dt 29 18; Lam 3 19; Am 6 12).

(2) מִרְרָה, m'rārāh (Job 16 13), and מִרְרָה, m'rārāh (20 14.25), both derived from a root meaning "to be bitter," are applied to the human gall or "bile," but like (1), m'rārāh is once applied to the venom of serpents (20 14). The poison of these animals was supposed to reside in their bile.

(3) חֹלֶה, cholē (Mt 27 34), "They gave him wine to drink mingled with gall"; this is clearly a reference to the LXX version of Ps 69 21: "They gave me also gall [cholē, Heb rōsh] for my food; and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink." In Mk 15 23, it says, "wine mingled with myrrh." It is well known that the Romans gave wine with frankincense to criminals before their execution to alleviate their sufferings; here the cholē or bitter substance used was myrrh (Pliny Ep. xx.18; Sen. Ep. 83). GALLANT, gal'ant: The tr of גָּלִיָּת, 'addir, "bright," "splendid," "mighty" (Isa 33 21, "Neither shall gallant ['addir] ship pass thereby"); the word is tr^d "mighty" in Ex 15 10; 1 S 4 8; Isa 10 34; Zec 11 2 AV. In Isa 33 21, above, it is applied to Jeh, "glorious ['addir] Lord" AV, RV "Jeh . . . in . . . majesty"; cf also Ps 16 3, "the excellent." As a noun it is used in m of Nah 2 5 as alternative for "worthies," RV "nobles"; in Zec 11 2, for "the mighty," RV "goodly ones," m "glorious"; it is tr^d "nobles" in Jgs 5 13; 2 Ch 23 20, etc. See also SHIPS AND BOATS.

GALLERY, gal'ēr-i:

(1) גָּלְיָה, allūk, K^{thibh}; גָּלְיָה, 'allūk, used only in Ezk 41 16; 42 3.5; etymology and meaning uncertain; among the more probable suggestions are "pillar," "column," "walk with pillars," "colonnades," "passageway," "porches," "galleries" and "terraces." Cornill suggests the substitution of ḥrōth, "walls," to suit the context; others, e.g. Rothstein, would omit it as a dittography or other corruption: A long narrow balcony formed either by pillars or by the receding upper stories of a building. Both kinds are described in Ezekiel's vision of the Temple restored. They surround the three stories of side chambers around the Temple proper, and also the "building before the separate place which was at the back thereof," and the three-story structure containing rows of chambers in the outer court opposite the side-chambers of the Temple. Those around the Temple proper were apparently supported by pillars, and hence they did not take away from the width of the 2d- and 3d-story rooms (cf 41 7). On the other hand, the galleries of the outer buildings which were not supported by pillars and therefore not on top of each other, but in terraces, did take away from the upper stories more than from the lowest and middlemost: the upper chambers were shortened or "straitened more than the lowest and the middlemost from the ground."

The lower porches of the outer court were cut off from the view of those of the inner court by a low wall, but in the 3d story, gallery looked out to gallery across the "twenty cubits which belonged to the inner court and the pavement which belonged to the outer court." These "galleries," or 'allūkīm, are one of the few features that distinguish the temple of Ezekiel's vision from Solomon's temple. The idea and perhaps the word seem to have been borrowed from the more elaborate architecture of the countries of the Exile, which must have impressed the Jews of Ezekiel's time very strongly. The building Ezekiel would place in the outer court with its terraces is a perfect Bab ziggurat or stage-tower temple (cf Enc Brit, 11th ed, II, 374, c-d).

(2) רָהַף, rahaḥ, probably "lock of hair," Cant 7 5; רָהִיט, rāhiṭ, K^{re}, רָהִיט, rāhiṭ, K^{thibh}, probably "rafters," Cant 11 7; both words and also the similar word רָחַלִּים, rāḥalīm, Gen 30 38; Ex 2 16], tr^d "troughs," are probably connected with the Aram. רָחַף, "to flow," "to run": Although AV uses "galleries" in Cant 7 5 and 1 17 m, the context in each place clearly points to another meaning. In the former of these passages, "the king is held captive in the tresses thereof," there follows a description of the head. In the latter passage the word in question is in parallelism with ḥrōth dāṭnā, "the beams of our house," and "rafters" AV, or possibly "boards," is suggested. NATHAN ISAACS

GALLEY, gal'i. See SHIPS AND BOATS, II, 2, (2).

GALLIM, gal'im (גָּלִים, gallim, "heaps"): Probably two distinct places:

(1) A town mentioned among the 11 additional cities of Judah which are in the LXX appended to Josh 15 59, and have altogether disappeared from the Heb text. It occurs between Karem ('Ain Kairem) and Baither (Bethr); it is probably the large and flourishing village of Beit Jala, near Bethlehem.

(2) Gallim is mentioned in Isa 10 30; not far from Laishah and Anathoth and certainly N. of Jerus. It was the home of Palti the son of Laish (1 S 25 44), and it is by many authorities identified with the Gilgal on the N. border of Judah (Josh 15 7), the G'ulōth of the || passage (18 17), and the Beth-gilgal of Neh 12 29.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

GALLIO, gal'i-ō (Γαλλίον, Gallion): The Rom deputy or proconsul of Achaia, before whom Paul was haled by his Jewish accusers on the apostle's first visit to Corinth, during his second missionary journey (Acts 18 12-17). The trial was not of long duration. Although Gallio extended his protection to the Jewish religion as one of the religions recognized by the state, he contemptuously rejected the claim of the Jews that their law was binding upon all. In the eyes of the proconsul, the only law universally applicable was that of the Rom code and social morality: under neither was the prisoner chargeable; therefore, without even waiting to hear Paul's speech in his own defence, he summarily ordered his lictors to clear the court. Even the subsequent treatment meted out to Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, was to him a matter of indifference. The beating of Sosthenes is ascribed by different readings to "Jews" and to "Greeks," but the incident is referred to by the writer of Acts to show that the sympathies of the populace lay with Paul, and that Gallio made no attempt to suppress them. Gallio has often been instanced as typical of one who is careless or indifferent to religion, yet in the account given of him in Acts, he merely displayed an attitude characteristic of the manner in which Rom governors regarded the religious disputes of the time (cf also LYSIAS; FELIX; FESTUS). Trained by his administrative duties to practical thinking and precision of language, he refused to adjudicate the squabbles of what he regarded as an obscure religious sect, whose law was to him a subtle quibbling with "words and names."

According to extra-canonical references, the original name of Gallio was Marcus Annaeus Novatus, but this was changed on his being adopted by the rhetorician, Lucius Junius Gallio. He was born at Cordova, but came to Rome in the reign of Tiberius. He was the brother of the philosopher Seneca, by whom, as also by Statius, reference is made to the affable nature of his character. As Achaia was reconstituted a proconsular province by Claudius in 44 AD, the accession of Gallio to office must have been subsequent to that date, and has been variously placed at 51-53 AD (cf also Knowling in Expos Gr Test., II, 389-92). C. M. KERR GALLOWES, gal'ōz. See HANGING; PUNISHMENTS.

GAMAEI, gam'a-el (Γαμαήλ, Gamaēl): Chief of the family of Ithamar who went up from Babylon with Ezra (1 Esd 8 29); called Daniel in Ezr 8 2.

GAMALIEL, ga-mā'li-el (גמלי'ל, gamli'el, "reward or recompense of God"; Γαμαλιήλ, Gamaeliēl): (1) The son of Pedahzur, and "prince of the children of Manasseh," chosen to aid in taking the census in the Wilderness (Nu 1 10; 2 20; 7 54-59; 10 23).

(2) A Pharisee who at the meeting of the "council" succeeded in persuading its members to adopt a more reasonable course when they were incensed at the doctrine of Peter and the rest of the apostles and sought to slay them (Acts 5 33-40). That he was well qualified for this task is attested by the fact that he was himself a member of the Sanhedrin, a teacher of the law, and held in high honor among all the people. In his speech he pointed out to his fellow-councillors the dire consequences that might ensue upon any precipitous action on their part. While quoting instances, familiar to his hearers, of past insurrections or seditions that had failed, he reminded them at the same time that if this last under Peter "is of God, ye will not be able to overthrow them; lest haply ye be found even to be fighting against God." As a result of his arguments, the apostles, after being beaten and admonished to speak no longer in the name of Jesus, were released. In the speech which he was permitted by Lysias to deliver from the stairs of the palace after the riot in Jerus, Paul referred to Gamaliel as the teacher of his youth, who instructed him rigidly in the Mosaic law (Acts 22 3).

The toleration and liberality displayed by Gamaliel upon the occasion of his speech before the Sanhedrin were all the more remarkable because of their rarity among the Pharisees of the period. Although the strict observance by the Christians of temple-worship, and their belief in immortality, a point in dispute between Pharisees and Sadducees, may have had influence over him (Knowling), no credence is to be attached to the view that he definitely favored the apostles or to the tradition that he afterward became a Christian. The high place accorded him in Jewish tradition, and the fact that the title of Rabban, higher even than Rabbi or Master, was first bestowed upon him, testify that he remained a Pharisee to the end. His speech is rather indicative of one who knew the deeper truth in the OT of the universal fatherhood of God, and who recognized that the presence of His power was the deciding factor in all human enterprise. His social enactments were permeated by the same broad-minded spirit. Thus his legislation on behalf of the poor was formulated so as to include Gentiles as well as Jews. The authenticity of his speech has been questioned by Wendt and others, chiefly on account of the alleged anachronism in regard to Theudas (see THEUDAS); but the internal evidence is against this view (cf Knowling in Expos Gr Test., II, 161). It has also been objected by Baur and the Tübingen school that the liberal, peace-loving Gamaliel could not have been the teacher of the fanatical Saul. To this, reply has been made, firstly, that the charges against Stephen of destroying the temple and subverting the laws of Moses were not brought against Peter and the other apostles, and, secondly, that the doctrines of any teacher, however moderate he himself may be, are liable to be carried to extremes by an over-zealous pupil.

LITERATURE

About the amusements of the ancient Israelites we know but little, partly on account of the nature of our literary sources, which are almost exclusively religious, partly because the antiquities thus far discovered yield very little information on this topic as compared with those of some other countries, and partly because of the relatively serious character of the people. Games evidently took a less prominent place in Heb life than in that of the Greeks, the Romans and the Egyptians. Still the need for recreation was felt and to a certain extent supplied in ways according with the national temperament. Mere athletics (apart from Gr and Rom influence) were but little cultivated. Simple and natural amusements and exercises, and trials of wit and wisdom, were more to the Heb taste. What is known or probably conjectured may be summed up under the following heads: Games of Children; Sports; Games of Chance and Skill; Story-telling; Dancing; Proverbs; Riddles. The amusements of Greece and Rome, which to some extent influenced later Jewish society and esp. those which are directly or indirectly referred to in the NT, will be the theme of the latter part of the article.

I. Israelitish Games.—There are two general references to the playing of children: Zec 8 5: "And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof"; and Gen 21 9 m, where we read of Ishmael "playing" (m'cahēk). The rendering of our Bibles, "mocking," is open to question. Of specific games and pets there is hardly a mention in the OT. Playing with ball is alluded to in Isa 22 18: "He will . . . toss thee like a ball into a large country," but children need not be thought of as the only players. If the balls used in Pal were like those used by the Egyptians, they were sometimes made of leather or skin stuffed with bran or husks of corn, or of string and rushes covered with leather (cf Wilkinson, Popular Account, I, 198-201; British Museum Guide to the Egypt Collections, 78). The question of Jeh to Job (41 5): "Wilt thou play with him [the crocodile] as with a bird? or wilt thou bind him for thy maidens?" suggests that tame birds were petted by Heb children, esp. by girls. The NT has one reference to children's play, viz. the half-parable about the children in the market-place who would neither dance to the flute as if at a marriage feast nor wail as if at a funeral (Mt 11 16 f || Lk 7 32).

Mimicry.—There are interesting accounts in Les enfants de Nazareth, by the Abbé Le Camus (60-66; 101-10), of the way in which the children of the modern Nazareth mimic scenes connected with weddings and funerals. That Israelitish children had toys (dolls, models of animals, etc.) cannot be doubted in view of the finds in Egypt and elsewhere, but no positive evidence seems to be as yet forthcoming.

Running was no doubt often practised, esp. in the time of the early monarchy. Saul and Jonathan (2 S 1 23), Asahel (2 18), Ahimaaz (18 23,27) and some of the Gadites in David's service (1 Ch 12 8) were renowned for their speed, which can only have been the result of training and exercise. The same may be said of the feats of those who ran before a king or a prince (1 S 8 11; 2 S 15 1; 1 K 1 5; 18 46). The Psalmist must have watched great runners before he pictured the sun as rejoicing like a strong man to run his course (Ps 19 5b; cf also Eccl 9 11; Jer 8 6; 23 10). For running in the Gr games, see the latter part of this article.

Archery practice is implied in the story of Jonathan's touching interview with David (1 S 20 20, 35-38) and in Job's complaint: "He hath also set me up for his mark. His archers compass me round about" (Job 16 12 f). Only by long practice could the 700 left-handed Benjamite slingers, every one of whom could sling stones at a hair-breadth and not miss (Jgs 20 16), and the young David (1 S 17 49), have attained to the precision of aim for which they are famous.

In Zec 12 3, "I will make Jerus a burdensome stone," lit. "a stone of burden," Jerome found an allusion to a custom which prevailed widely in Pal in his day, and has been noticed by a recent traveler, of stone-lifting, i.e. of testing the strength of young men by means of heavy round stones. Some, he says, could raise one of these stones to the knees, others to the waist, others to the shoulders and the head, and a few could lift it above the head. This interpretation is not quite certain (Wright, Comm., 364), but the form of sport described was probably in vogue in Pal in Bib. times.

High leaping or jumping was probably also practised (Ps 18 29). The "play" referred to in 2 S 2 14 ff of 12 Benjamites and 12 servants of David was not a sport but a combat like that of the Horatii and the Curiatii.

Dice were known to the ancient Egyptians, and Assyrian dice have been found, made of bronze with points of gold, but there is no trace of them in the OT. Recent research at of Chance Ta'annek has brought to light many bones which seem to have been used in somewhat the same way as in a game played by the modern Arabs, who call it ka'ab, the very word they apply to dice. These bones were "the oldest and most primitive form of dice" (König after Sellin, RE, XVIII, 634). The use of dice among the later Jews is attested by the condemnation of dice-players in the Mish (Sanh., iii. 3). The Syrian soldiers who cast lots for the raiment of Jesus at the cross (Mt 27 35 || Mk 15 24; Lk 23 34; Jn 19 24) may have used dice, but that can neither be proved nor disproved.

It has been suggested that the mockery of Jesus before the Sanhedrin described in Mt 26 67 f || Mk 14 65; Lk 22 63 f may have been connected with a Gr game in which one of the players held the eyes of another while a third gave him a box on the ear. The last was then asked with what hand he had been struck. A somewhat similar game is represented in an Egypt tomb picture (Wilkinson, Popular Account, I, 192). This reference, however, though not quite inadmissible, is scarcely probable. Games with boards and men bearing some resemblance to our draughts were in great favor in Egypt (ib. 190-95), but cannot be proved for the Jews even in NT times.

Listening to stories or recitations has long been a favorite amusement of Orientals (cf Lane, Modern Egyptians, 350-91: "The Thousand and One Nights"), but there seems to be no reference to it in the Bible. There can be no reasonable doubt, however, that the Hebrews, like their neighbors, had story-tellers or reciters, and heard them with delight.

4. Story-Telling—Egypt tales of great antiquity are well known from the two volumes edited by Professor Petrie in 1895; and there are several non-canonical Jewish tales which combine romance and moral teaching: the Books of Tob and Jth and perhaps the Story of Ahikar, the last of which, with the help of the Aram. papyri discovered at Elephantine, can be traced back (in some form) to about 400 BC (Schürer, GV, III, 255). There are also many short stories in the Haggadic portions of the Talm and the Midr.

Dancing, that is, the expression of joy by rhythmical movements of the limbs to musical accompaniment, is scarcely ever mentioned in the

5. Dancing Bible as a social amusement, except in a general way (Jgs 16 25,27[?]; Job 21 11; Ps 30 11; Eccl 3 4; Jer 31 4,13; Lam 5 15; Mt 11 17; Lk 15 25). There is one exception, the dancing of Salome, the daughter of Herodias, before Herod Antipas and his court (Mt 14 6 || Mk 6 22), which was a solo dance, probably of a pantomimic character affected by Rom influence. The other Bib. references to dancing can be grouped under two heads: the dance of public rejoicing, and the dance which was more or less an act of worship. Of the former we have two striking examples in the OT: the dance accompanied by the tambourine with which the maidens of Israel, led by Jephthah's daughter, met that leader after his victory (Jgs 11 34), and the dances of the Israelitish women in honor of Saul and David to celebrate the triumph over the Philis (1 S 18 6; 21 11; 29 5).

It was probably usual to welcome a king or general with music and dancing. There is a good illustration in a fine Assyrian sculpture in the British Museum which represents a band of 11 instrumentalists taking part in doing homage to a new ruler. Three men at the head of the procession are distinctly dancing (SBOT, "Psalms," Eng., 226).

The distinctly religious dance is more frequently mentioned. The clear instances of it in the Bible are the dance of the women of Israel at the Red Sea, headed by Miriam with her tambourine (Ex 15 20); the dance of the Israelites round the golden calf (32 19); the dance of the maidens of Shiloh at an annual feast (Jgs 21 19 ff); the leaping or limping of the prophets of Baal round their altar on Carmel (1 K 18 26), and the dancing of David in front of the ark (2 S 6 14,16 || 1 Ch 15 29). There are general references in Ps 149 3: "Let them praise his name in the dance"; 150 4: "Praise him with timbrel and dance"; and perhaps in 68 25. The allusions in Cant 6 13, "the dance of Mahanaim," and in the proper name Abel-meholah, "the meadow of the dance" (1 K 19 16, etc.), are too uncertain to be utilized. The ritual dance was probably widespread in the ancient East. David's performance has Egypt parallels. Seti I, the father of Rameses II, and three other Pharaohs are said to have danced before a deity (Budge, The Book of the Dead, I, xxxv), and Asiatic monuments attest the custom elsewhere. About the methods of dancing practised by the ancient Hebrews but little is known. Probably the dancers in some cases joined hands and formed a ring, or part of a ring, as in some heathen representations. The description of David's dance: he "danced before Jeh with all his might . . . leaping and dancing before Jeh" (2 S 6 14-16) suggests three features of that particular display and the mode of dancing which it represented: violent exertion, leaping (m'phazzēz), and whirling round (m'kharkēr). Perhaps the whirling dance of Islam is a modern parallel to the last. Women seem generally to have danced by themselves, one often leading the rest, both in dancing and antiphonal song; so Miriam and the women of Israel, Jephthah's daughter and her comrades, the women who greeted Saul and David, and, in the Apoc, Judith and her sisters after the death of Holofernes (Jth 15 12 f.). Once the separation of the sexes is perhaps distinctly referred to (Jer 31 13). In public religious dances they may have occasionally united, as was the case sometimes in the heathen world, but there is no clear evidence to that effect (cf, however, 2 S 6 20 and Ps 68 25). Of the social dancing of couples in the modern fashion there is no trace. There seems to be some proof that the religious dance lingered among the Jews until the time of Christ and later.

If the Mish can be trusted (Sukkah, v. 4), there was a torch-light dance in the temple in the illuminated court of the women at the Feast of Tabernacles in which men of advanced years and high standing took part. The Gemara to the Jerus Talm adds that a famous dancer on these occasions was Rabbi Simeon or Simon, the son of Gamaliel, who lived in the apostolic age (Jos. B.J. IV, iii, 9). According to another passage (Ta'anith 4 8) the daughters of Jerus used to dance dressed in white in the vineyards on Tishri the 10th and Ab the 15th. Religious dancing in the modern East is illustrated not only by the dances of the dervishes mentioned above, but also by occasional dances led by the sheikh in honor of a saint (Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion To-day, 169). Among the later Jews dancing was not unusual at wedding feasts. More than one eminent rabbi is said to have danced before the bride (K'hubbāh 17a). Singing and dancing, with lighted torches, are said to be wedding customs of the modern Arabs.

Proverbs (משפטים, māshāl; παροιμία, paroimía): Proverbs and proverbial expressions seem to have been, to some extent, a means of amusement as well as instruction for the ancient Oriental who delighted in the short, pointed statement of a moral or religious truth, or a prudential maxim, whether of literary or popular origin. Most of these sayings in the Bible belong to the former class, and are couched in poetic form (see PROVERBS; ECCLESIASTES; ECCLESIASTICUS). The others which are shorter and simpler, together with a number of picturesque proverbial phrases, must have recurred continually in daily speech and have added greatly to its vivacity.

The OT supplies the following 10 examples of the popular proverb: (1) "Like Nimrod a mighty hunter before Jeh" (Gen 10 9); (2) "As the man is, so is his strength" (Jgs 8 21), only two words in the Heb; (3) "Is Saul also among the prophets?" (1 S 10 11 f.; 19 24); (4) "Out of the wicked (wicked men) cometh forth wickedness" (1 S 24 13); (5) "There are the blind and the lame; he cannot come into the house" (2 S 5 8); (6) "Let not him that girdeth on his armor boast himself as he that putteth it off" (1 K 20 11); (7) "Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life" (Job 2 4); (8) "The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth" (Ezk 12 22), a scoffing jest rather than a proverb; (9) "As is the mother, so is her daughter" (Ezk 16 44), two words in the Heb; (10) "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge" (Jer 31 29; Ezk 18 2). In the NT we find 10 others: (1) "Physician, heal thyself" (Lk 4 23); in the Midrash Rabbah on Gen: "Physician heal thine own wound"; (2) "Can the blind guide the blind? shall they not both fall into a pit?" (6 39); (3) "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured unto you" (Mt 7 2 || Mk 4 24; Lk 6 38), almost identical with a Jewish proverb, "measure for measure" cited several times in the ancient Midrash, the Mekhilah;

(4) "One soweth, and another reapeth" (Jn 4 37); (5) "A prophet is not without honor save in his own country" (Mt 13 57; Lk 4 24; Jn 4 44; Logion of Oxyrhynchus); (6) "There are yet four months, and then cometh the harvest" (Jn 4 35), possibly a kind of proverb; (7) "Wherever the carcass is, there will the eagles [i.e. vultures] be gathered together" (Mt 24 28 || Lk 17 37); perhaps a proverb of which there is a trace also in the reference to the vulture: "Where the slain are, there is she" (Job 39 30); (8) "It is hard for thee to kick against the goad" (Acts 26 14), a Gr proverb; for proof of Wetstein's note; (9) "The dog turning to his own vomit again, and the sow that had washed to wallow in the mire" (2 Pet 2 22); Wetstein gives rabbinic parallels for the former half, and Gr for the latter; (10) "Ye strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel" (Mt 23 24).

There are also many proverbial phrases which added piquancy to conversation. Exceeding smallness was likened to the eye of a needle (Mt 19 24 || Mk 10 25; Lk 18 25), or to a grain of mustard (Mt 13 31 || Mk 4 31; Mt 17 20 || Lk 17 6), comparisons both found also in the Talm, the Koran, and modern Arab. sayings. Relative greatness was likened to a camel (Mt 19 24, etc.), in the Talm to a camel or an elephant. Great number was illustrated by reference to the sand which is upon the sea-shore" (Gen 22 17 and many other passages); "the dust of the earth" (13 16, etc.; also an Arabian figure); "the grass of the earth" (Job 5 25; Ps 72 16; cf 92 7), an early Bab figure; a swarm of locusts (Nab. 3 15 and 4 other passages), a similitude used also by Senacherib (RF, n.s. VI, 97), and the stars of heaven (Gen 15 5 and 10 other passages). When complete security was promised or described it was said that not a hair of the head was or should be injured or perished (1 S 14 45; 2 S 14 11; 1 K 1 52; Dnl 3 27; Lk 21 18; Acts 27 34). Overcoming of difficulties was referred to as the removal of mountains (Mt 17 20; 21 21 || Mk 11 23; 1 Cor 13 2), an expression which has rabbinic parallels. Other proverbial phrases may perhaps be found in the saying about the mote and the beam (Mt 7 3-5), lot or lot (Mt 5 18 || Lk 16 17), and the foolish words of Rehobam and his young advisers (1 K 12 10 f.). Many old proverbs have no doubt perished. Dukes in his Rabbinische Blumenlese gives 665 proverbs and proverbial expressions from the Talm and related lit., and modern collections show that proverbial lore is still in great favor in the Bib. Orient. See also PROVERBS.

Riddles (חידה, hīdhāh; αἰνίγμα, ainigma): Riddle-making and riddle-guessing were in favor in the ancient East, both in educated circles

7. Riddles and in comparatively common life. There is a tablet in the British Museum (K 4347: Guide to Assy and Bab Antiquities, 53) from the library of Ashur-bani-pal which attests the use of riddles not only by the Assyrians of the 7th cent. BC, but also in a far earlier age, for it contains a Sumer as well as a Sem text. So it is not surprising that we find a remarkable example in early Israelitish history in Samson's famous riddle: "Out of the eater came forth food, and out of the strong came forth sweetness" (Jgs 14 14). The riddle is couched in poetic form, as is also the solution: "What is sweeter than honey? and what is stronger than a lion?" (ver 18), and the comment: "If ye had not plowed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle" (ib). The stipulation of a prize or penalty according to the success or failure of the persons challenged to solve the riddle was a custom met with also among the ancient Greeks and in a later age among the Arabs. In 1 K 10 1 || 2 Ch 9 1 the word used of Samson's riddle (hīdhāh) is employed of the "hard questions" put to Solomon by the queen of Sheba. The LXX seems to have understood the word as "riddle" here also, for it renders "enigmas," and some of the later Jews not only adopted this interpretation, but actually gave riddles said to have been propounded. Of these riddles which, of course, have no direct historic value, but are interesting specimens of riddle lore, one of the best is the following: "Without movement while living, it moves when its head is cut off"; the answer to which is: "a tree" (Jew Enc, art. "Riddle"; see also for these riddles Wünsche, Die Räthselweisheit bei den Hebräern, 15-23). If Jos can be trusted, historians of Phoenicia recorded a riddle-contest between Solomon and the Phoenician Hiram in which the latter finally won with the help of a Tyrian named Abdeimon (Ant, VIII, v, 3; Cap, 1, 18). In this case, too, defeat involved penalty. The testing of ability by riddles has a striking parallel in the Pers epic, the Shah Nameh, in the trial of the hero Sal by the mobeds or wise men (Wünsche, op. cit., 43-47). Solomon's fame as an author of riddles and riddle-like sayings is referred to in Sir 47 15, 17 (Heb): "With song, and proverbs, dark sayings (hiddāh) and figures, thou didst greatly move the nations." Hiddāh occurs only once in Prov (1 6): "the words of the wise, and their dark sayings," but the collection contains several examples of what König calls "the numerical riddle": 8 16-19; 30 7 ff. 15 f. 18 f. 21 ff. 24-28, 29 ff. In each case the riddle is stated first and then the solution. The saying in Prov 30 10: "As an archer that woundeth all, so is he that hireth the fool and he that hireth them that pass by," has been cited as a riddle, and it is certainly obscure enough, but the obscurity may be due to textual corruption. There are several passages in the OT in which the word hiddāh seems to be used in the general sense of "mysterious utterance": Nu 12 8; Ps 49 4; 78 2; Dnl 5 12 (the Aram. equivalent of hiddāh); 8 23; Hab 3 6. In Esk 17 1 it describes the parable or allegory of the Two Eagles and the Cedar and the Vine. Sir has several numerical riddles: 23 16; 28 11, 7 f.; 36 5 f.; 50 25 f.; and there are similar sayings in Ab 5 1-11 16-21 (Taylor's ed). In the Book of Jer (25 26; 51 41; 51 1) are two examples of a cryptic or cipher mode of writing which comes very near the riddle. SHS SHaKH, in the first two passages, represented by the three letters shn, shn, kaph, answering to our sh, sh, k, is meant to be read with the substitution for each letter of the letter as near the beginning of the alphabet as it is near the end, the result being sh=b, sh=b, k=i, that is, B b i or Babel, Babylon. In the same way in the last passage the consonants composing the word Leotamai i, b, k, m, y, suggest k, s, d, y, m, that is, Kaddish or Chaldee. This cipher or riddle-writing was called by the Jews 'Al-bash (cf Buxtorf, Lexicon Chaldaicum, etc., I, 131, 137 f., edited by Fischer; and modern commentaries on Jer). The NT contains no riddle except the numerical puzzle, Rev 13 18 (cf NUMBERS; GEMATRIA), and has the Gr equivalent of hiddāh only in 1 Cor 13 12, "for now we see . . . darkly." RVm "in a riddle" (Gr en aigmata). There can be little doubt that riddles enlivened marriage festivals, such as that of Cana. Wünsche (op. cit.) gives some interesting specimens of later Jewish riddles, subsequent indeed to Our Lord's time, but such as might have been in circulation then.

LITERATURE.—The most important authority is the above-cited monograph of Wünsche. König has an interesting paragraph in his Stilistik, Rhetorik, Poetik, etc., 12 f. II. The Games of Greece and Rome.—This is not the place to give a detailed account of the Greek gymnasia and the elaborate contests for which candidates were prepared (cf Introduction in them, or to describe the special forms of sport introduced by the Romans, but these exercises and amusements were so well known in Pal and throughout the Rom Empire in the time of Christ and the apostles that they cannot be passed over in silence. Some acquaintance with them is absolutely necessary for the interpretation of many passages in the NT, esp.

in the Epistles. Hellenic athletics found their way into Jewish society through the influence of the Gr kingdom ruled over by the Seleucidae. Early in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (cir 176 BC) a gymnasium, "place of exercise," was built in Jerus Theater at Geram.

(1 Macc 1 14; 2 Macc 4 9, 12) and frequented by priests (vs 14 f.), who are spoken of as "making of no account the honours of their fathers, and thinking the glories of the Greeks best of all." After the success of the Maccabean rising Gr games fell into disrepute among the Jewish population of Pal, and were thenceforth regarded with suspicion by all strict religionists, even the worldly Jos sharing the general feeling (Ant, XV, viii, 1). Nevertheless gentile games must have been familiar to most in Jerus and elsewhere during the Herodian rule and the Rom occupation. Herod the Great built a theater and amphitheater in the neighborhood of the city (Jos, ib; for probable sites, see G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, II, 493), and instituted in the name of Caesar games which included Rom as well as Hellenic sports, celebrated every 5 years. There was also a hippodrome or race-course for horses and chariots, bearing considerable resemblance to the Rom circus (Jos, Ant, XVII, x, 2; BJ, II, iii, 1). Jericho, too, was provided with a theater, an amphitheater and a hippodrome. There was a hippodrome also at Tarichaea. In addition there were scattered over Syria many Hellenic and partially Hellenic cities—Schürer (GJV, II, 108-221) gives the history of 33—Caesarea Stratonice, Caesarea Philippi, the cities of the Decapolis, Tiberias, etc., which would all have had gymnasia and games. In Tarsus, which must have had a large Gr element in its population, Paul must have heard, and perhaps seen, in his childhood, much of the athletic exercises which were constantly in progress, and in later life he must often have been reminded of them, esp. at Corinth, near which were celebrated biennially the Isthmia or Isthmian Games which drew visitors from all parts of the Empire, at Caesarea which possessed a theater, an amphitheater and a stadium, and at Ephesus. The custom, indeed, seems to have been almost universal. No provincial city of any importance was without it (Schürer, op. cit., 48), esp. after the introduction of games in honor of the Caesars. The early Christians, therefore, whether of Jewish or gentile origin, were able to understand, and the latter at any rate to appreciate, references either to the games in general, or to details of their celebration.

The word which described the assembly gathered together at one of the great Grecian games (agōn) was also applied to the contests themselves, and then came to be used of any intense effort or conflict. The corresponding vb (agōnizomai) had a similar history. Both these words are used fig. in the Pauline Epistles: the noun in Phil 1 30; Col 2 1; 1 Thess 2 2; 1 Tim 6 12; 2 Tim 4 7, rendered in RV (except in the second passage), "conflict" or "fight"; the vb. in Col 1 29; 4 12; 1 Tim 4 10; 6 12; 2 Tim 4 7, tr⁴ "strive," "fight." In

1 Cor 9 25; 2 Tim 2 5 (where another word is used) there are literal references. The former passage ERV: "Every man that striveth in the games [agónizómēnos] is temperate in all things," also alludes to the rigid self-control enforced by long training which the athlete must practise. The training itself is glanced at in the exhortation: "Exercise thyself [gymnaze] unto godliness" (1 Tim 4 7), and in the remark which follows: "Bodily exercise [gymnasia] is profitable for a little." It is remarkable that the word gymnasium, or "place of training," which occurs in the Apoc (2 Macc 4 9. 12) is not met with in the NT. The necessity for the observance of rules and regulations is referred to in the words: "And if also a man contend in the games, he is not crowned, except he have contended lawfully" (2 Tim 2 5). In all these passages the games will have been more or less in the apostle's thought (for other possible NT references cf He 5 14; 10 32; 12 1; 2 Pet 2 14).

In addition to these general references there are many allusions to details, again found mainly in the Pauline Epistles. These may most

3. Specific conveniently be grouped in alphabetical order.

References to Greek Athletics (a) Beast-fight.—The combats of wild animals with one another and with men, which were so popular at Rome toward the close of the Republic and under the Empire, were not unknown in Pal. Condemned criminals were thrown to wild beasts by Herod the Great in his amphitheater at Jerus, "to afford delight to spectators," a proceeding which Jos (Ant, XV, viii, 1) characterizes as impious. After the fall of Jerus in 70 AD many Jewish captives were slain in fighting with wild beasts (BJ, VII, ii). This horrible form of sport must have been in the apostle's mind when he wrote: "I fought with beasts [ethēriomáchēsa] at Ephesus" (1 Cor 15 32). The reference is best understood as figurative, as in Ignatius on Rom 5 1, where the same word (thēriomachēō) is used, and the soldiers are compared to leopards.

Boxing with the Cestus.

[From Pausanias, Bilder des antiken Lebens.]

(b) Boxing.—This form of sport is directly referred to in 1 Cor 9 26: "So box I [RVm, Gr pukteuō], as not beating the air." The allusion is probably continued in ver 27a: "but I buffet [RVm "bruise," Gr hupōpiázō] my body."

(c) The course.—Foot-races and other contests took place in an inclosure 606 ft. 9 in. in length, called a stadium. This is once referred to in a passage in the context of that just mentioned, which almost seems based on observation: "They that run in a race-course [RVm, Gr stádion] run all" (ver 24).

(d) Discus throwing.—The throwing of the discus, a round plate of stone or metal 10 or 12 in. in diameter, which was a prominent feature of Gr athletics and is the subject of a famous statue, a copy of which is in the British Museum, is not mentioned in the NT, but is alluded to in 2 Macc 4 14 as one of the amusements indulged in by Hellenizing priests in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes.

(e) The foot-race.—The words for "run" and "race" (Gr tréchō and drómōs) sometimes clearly, and in other cases probably, allude to foot-races at the games. For obvious references cf 1 Cor 9 24; He 12 1; 2 Tim 4 7; for possible references see Acts 13 25; 20 24; Rom 9 16; Gal 2 2; 5 7; Phil 2 16; 2 Thess 3 1. The second of these passages (He 12 1) alludes to the necessity for the greatest possible reduction of weight, and for steady concentration of effort. All the passages would remind the first readers of the single-course and double-course foot-races of the games.

(f) The goal.—The goal of the foot-race, a square pillar at the end of the stadium opposite the entrance, which the athlete as far as possible kept in view and the sight of which encouraged him to redouble his exertions, is alluded to once: "I press on toward the goal" (Phil 3 14, Gr skopós).

(g) The herald.—The name and country of each competitor were announced by a herald and also the name, country and father of a victor. There may be an allusion to this custom in 1 Cor 9 27: "after that I have been a herald [RVm, Gr kērússō] to others"; cf also 1 Tim 2 7; 2 Tim 1 11, where the Gr for "preacher" is kēruz, "herald."

(h) The prize.—Successful athletes were rewarded at the great games by a wreath consisting in the apostolic age of wild olive (Olympian), parsley (Nemean), laurel (Pythian), or pine (Isthmian). This is referred to in a general way in Phil 3 14, and in 1 Cor 9 24: "One receiveth the prize" (Gr in both cases brabēton; cf also Col 3 15: "Let the representation of a play of Euripides, and the Jewish colony to which he belonged produced a dramatic poet named Ezekiel, who wrote inter alia a play on the Exodus, some fragments of which have been preserved (Schürer, GJV, II, 60; III, 500 ff). An inscription found not long ago at Miletus shows that part of the theater of that city was reserved for Jews (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 446 ff). The readers of the Pauline Epistles, Jews as well as Gentiles, would be generally more or less familiar with the theater and the drama. It has been suggested that there is a glimpse of a degraded form of the drama, the mime or mimic play, which was exceedingly popular in the 1st cent. and afterward, in the mockery of Jesus by the soldiers (Mt 27 27-30 || Mk 15 16-19). The "king" seems to have been a favorite character with the comic mime. The mockery of the Jewish king, Agrippa I, by the populace of Alexandria, a few years later, which furnishes a very striking parallel to the incident recorded in the Gospels (Schürer, GJV, I, 497), is directly connected by Philo with the mimes. The subject is very ably discussed by a German scholar, Hermann Reich, in a learned monograph, Der König mit der Dornenkrone (1905). Certainty is, of course, unattainable, but it seems at least fairly probable that the rude Syrian soldiers, who were no doubt in the habit of attending the theater, may have been echoing some mimic play in their mock homage to "the king of the Jews."

WILLIAM TAYLOR SMITH

GAMMADIM, gam'a-dim (גַּמְדִּים, gammadīm): The word occurs only in Ezk 27 11, in AV in form "Gammadims," in ERV "Gammadim." In ARV, as also in ERVm, it is rendered "valorous men." Some think a proper name is required, but identification is not possible, and the meaning remains doubtful.

GAMUL, gā'mul (גָּמַל, gamāl, "weaned"): The head of the 22d of the 24 courses of priests inaugurated by David (1 Ch 24 17).

GANGRENE, gan'grēn (γάγγραινα, gāggraina, pronounced gān'-graina; AV canker): The name was used by the old Gr physicians for an eating ulcer which corrodes the soft parts and, according to Galen, often ends in mortification. St. Paul compares the corrupting influence of profane babbling or levity, in connection with subjects which ought to be treated with reverence, to this disease (2 Tim 2 17). The old Eng. word "canker" is used by 16th- and 17th-cent. authors as the name of a caterpillar which eats into a bud. In this sense it occurs 18 t in Shakespeare (e.g. Midsummer Night's Dream, II, ii, 3). The canker-worm mentioned 6 t by Joel and Nahum is probably the young stage of Acridium peregrinum, a species of locust. Cankered in Jas 5 3 AV means "rusted" (Gr kattōtai), and is so rendered in RV. In Sus ver 52 Coverdale uses the phrase, "O thou old cankered carle," in Daniel's address to the elder, where EV has "waxen old in wickedness." The word is still used in the Scottish dialect and applied to persons who are cross-grained and disagreeable.

GAP: The tr of פֶּרֶץ, peretz, "a breach" (Ezk 13 5, "Ye have not gone up into the gaps," RVm "breaches"; 23 30, "I sought for a man among them, that should build up the wall, and stand in peace of Christ arbitrate [RVm] in your hearts," where the vb. is brabēō. The wreath (stēphanos) is directly alluded to in 1 Cor 9 25: "They [the athletes] do it to receive a corruptible crown"; 2 Tim 2 5: "A man . . . is not crowned, except he have contended lawfully"; and 1 Pet 5 4: "Ye shall receive the crown of glory that fadeth not away." There may be allusions also in Phil 4 1; 1 Thess 2 19; He 2 7, 9; Jas 1 12; Rev 2 10; 3 11. In the palm-bearing multitude of the Apocalypse (Rev 7 9) there is possibly a reference to the carrying of palm-branches by victors at the games. The judges who sat near the goal and who, at Olympia at any rate, had been carefully prepared for their task, may be glanced at in 2 Tim 4 8: "The crown . . . which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give to me at that day."

(i) Wrestling.—This form of sport, which was in great favor in Gr society from the age of Homer onward, is alluded to once in the NT: "Our wrestling [Gr pala] is not against flesh and blood," etc (Eph 6 12). The exercise made great demands on strength, perseverance and dexterity. There is an indirect allusion in the term palaestra, which first meant "place for wrestling," and then "place for athletic exercises in general" (2 Macc 4 14).

Isthmian Crowns.

Although there is no direct reference in the NT to the intellectual contests in which the Greeks delighted as much as in athletics, the former cannot be entirely ignored. 4. References to the Theater.—The word "theater" (Gr theatron) occurs 3 t: twice in the sense of "public hall" (Acts 19 29, 31); and once with a clear reference to its use as a place of amusement: "We are made a spectacle" (1 Cor 4 9). "The drama was strongly discountenanced by the strict Jews of Pal, but was probably encouraged to some extent by some of the Jews of the Diaspora, esp. in Asia Minor and Alexandria. Philo is known to have witnessed the rep-the gap before me for the land"). Said of prophets who failed to stand up for the right and to strengthen and preserve the people.

GAR, gār: AV for GAS (q.v.).

GARDEN, gār'd'n (גַּרְדֵּן, gan, גַּנָּה, gannah, גִּנְיָה, ginnah; κήπος, kēpos): The Arab. jannah (dim. jannainah), like the Heb gannah, lit. "a covered or hidden place," denotes in the mind of the dweller in the East something more than the ordinary garden. Gardens in Bib. times, such as are frequently referred to in Sem lit., were usually walled inclosures, as the name indicates (Lam 2 6 ARVm), in which there were paths winding in and out among shade and fruit trees, canals of running water,

4; 52 7). They are inclosed with walls of mud blocks, as in Damascus, or stone walls capped with thorns, or with hedges of thorny bushes (cf Lam 2 6 ARVm), or prickly pear. In nearly treeless countries, where there is no rain during 4 or 5 months, at least, of the year, the gardens are often the only spots where trees and other vegetation can flourish, and here the existence of vegetation depends upon the water supply, brought in canals from streams, or raised from wells by more or less crude lifting machines (cf Nu 24 7). Such references as Gen 2 10; Nu 24 6; Dt 11 10; Isa 1 30; 58 11; Cant 4 15 indicate that in ancient times they were as dependent upon irrigation in Bib. lands as at present. The planning of their gardens so as to utilize the water supplies has be-fountains, sweet-smelling herbs, aromatic blossoms and convenient arbors in which to sit and enjoy the effect. These gardens are mentioned in Gen 2 and 3; 13 10; Cant 4 12-16; Eccl 2 5, 8; Ezk 28 13; 31 8, 9; 36 35; Joel 2 3. Ancient Bab, Assyr and Egyp records show the fondness of the rulers of these countries for gardens laid out on a grand scale and planted with the rarest trees and plants. The drawings made by the ancients of their gardens leave no doubt about their general features and their correspondence with Bib. gardens. The Pers word pardeś (παράδεισος, parádeisos) appears in the later Heb writings to denote more extensive gardens or parks. It is tr^d "orchards" in Eccl 2 5 AV; Cant 4 13. See PARADISE.

Such gardens are still common throughout the Levant. They are usually situated on the outskirts of a city (cf Jn 18 1, 26; 19 41), except in the case of the more pretentious estates of rich pashas or of the government seats (cf 2 K 21 18; Est 1 5; 7 7, 8; Neh 8 15; 2 K 25 4; Jer 36 come instinctive with the inhabitants of Pal and Syria. The writer has seen a group of young Arab boys modeling a garden out of mud and conducting water to irrigate it by channels from a nearby canal, in a manner that a modern engineer would admire. Gardens are cultivated, not only for their fruits and herbs (cf Cant 6 11; Isa 1 8; 1 K 21 2) and shade (cf Cant 6 11; Lk 13 19), but they are planned to serve as dwelling-places during the summer time when the houses are hot and stuffy. That this was an ancient practice is indicated by Cant 5 2; 6 2; 8 13. A shaded garden, the air laden with the ethereal perfumes of fruits and flowers, accompanied by the music of running water, a couch on which to sit or recline, suggest a condition of bliss dear to the Oriental. Only one who has traveled for days in a dry, glaring desert country and has come upon a spot like the gardens of such a city as Damascus, can realize how near like paradise these gardens can appear. Mohammed pictured such a place as the future abode of his followers. No doubt the remembrances of his visit to Damascus were fresh in his mind when he wrote. El-Jannah is used by the Moslems to signify the "paradise of the faithful."

Gardens were used as places of sacrifice, esp. in heathen worship (Isa 1 29; 65 3; 66 17). They sometimes contained burial places (2 K 21 18.26; Jn 19 41).

Figurative: The destruction of gardens typified desolation (Am 4 9); on the other hand, fruitful gardens figured prosperity (Nu 24 6; Job 8 16; Isa 51 3; 58 11; 61 11; Jer 29 5.28; 31 12; Am 9 14).

JAMES A. PATCH

GARDEN, THE KING'S: Mention is made of "the king's garden" in 2 K 25 4; Jer 39 4; 52 7 (fundamentally the same passage), in connection with the flight of Zedekiah from Jerus; and again in Neh 3 15. The last passage shows that the "garden" was at the pool of Siloah (RV "Shelah"), at the mouth of Tyropæon, near the "fountain gate." This would seem to be "the gate between the two walls which was by the king's garden" of the passages in 2 K and Jer (cf 2 Ch 32 5). On the topography, see JERUSALEM; also Robinson, Pal, II, 142. Arnold (in Herzog) thinks the garden is probably identical with "the garden of Uzza" of 2 K 21 18.26.

JAMES ORR

GARDENER, gār'd'n-ēr (κῆρυπος, kēpouros): "Gardener" occurs once in the EV (Jn 20 15), the tr of kēpos and ouros, "warden" or "keeper." It is likely that the man referred to was the watchman or keeper (Arab. naḥār; Heb nōḥār), corresponding to those mentioned in 2 K 17 9; 18 8; Job 27 18, etc, and not one who did the manual labor. It is the common practice in Pal today to set a watchman over a garden during its productive season. See WATCHMAN.

GARDEN-HOUSE (גֵּרְיָהּ, bēh ha-gān): A place mentioned in describing the flight of Ahasiah, king of Judah, from Jehu (2 K 9 27). Probably we ought not to translate the Heb, but take it as a proper name, BETH-HAGGAN (q.v.). If he fled southward, the town might possibly be Jenīn, EN-GANNIM, which see.

GAREB, gā'reb (גָּרֵב, gārēbh): One of David's "mighty men of the armies" (2 S 23 38; 1 Ch 11 40), an "Ithrite," i.e. a member of one of the families of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 2 53). Some, however, read ha-yathiri for ha-yithri, thus making him a native of Jattir. See IRA.

GAREB, gā'reb, THE HILL OF (גָּרֵב, gārēbh): A hill in the neighborhood of Jerus, which was one of the landmarks to which the prophet Jeremiah (31 39) foresaw that the city should extend. The site is unknown. Cheyne (EB) would connect this with the "mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward" (Josh 15 8), but this is too far S.; it is inconceivable that the prophet could have imagined the city extending so far in this direction; most probably the hill was to the N.—the one natural direction for the city's extension—and is now incorporated in the modern suburbs.

GARIZIM, gar'i-zim. See GERIZIM.

GARLAND, gār'land (στεῦμα, stemma, "wreath"): Mentioned only in Acts 14 13, where it is said that the priest of Jupiter brought oxen and garlands unto the gates with which to offer sacrifices unto Barnabas and Paul. The rendering "oxen and garlands," instead of "oxen garlanded," seems to imply that the garlands were for the priests and altar and worshippers themselves, as well as for the victims sacrificed. Only occasionally did the Hebrews use such ornaments for themselves, and that almost altogether in their later history. See CROWN.

GARLIC, gār'lik (שֶׁמֶץ, shūm, used only in pl. שְׁמִיץ, shūmīz; cf Arab. ثوم, thūm): One of the delights of Egypt for which the Israelites in the Wilderness longed (Nu 11 5); we know from other sources that, though originally a product of Central Asia, garlic was known to the ancient Egyptians. It is the bulb of Allium sativum, N.O. Liliaceae, and is cultivated all over the Orient. It is eaten cooked in stews; its disagreeable penetrating odor is in evidence in the houses and on the breath of most Orientals. A bulb of garlic, hung over a bed or over the door of a house, is a powerful charm against the evil eye and other malign influences.

GARMENT, gār'ment. See DRESS.

GARMITE, gār'mit (גַּרְמִית, garmī): A gentile name applied to Keilah in 1 Ch 4 19. The reason for this is not known.

GARNER, gār'nēr (גָּרַן, māzū; ἀποθήκη, apothēkē): "Garners," derived from zāwāh, "to gather," occurs in Ps 144 13; 'ōḡār is similarly tr'd in Joel 1 17. In the NT apothēkē is twice tr'd "garner" (Mt 3 12; Lk 3 17). The same word is tr'd "barns" in Mt 6 26; 13 30; Lk 12 18.24.

GARNISH, gār'nish (צִפָּף, ṣippāh, צִפְפָּה, shippārah; κοσμέω, kosmēō): The word is used twice in the OT. In 2 Ch 3 6, ṣippāh means "to overlay," or "to plate." Thus he "garnished" the house or "overlaid" it, "studded" it, with precious stones, and thus adorned and beautified it. In Job 26 13, shippārah is a fem. noun meaning "fairness," "beauty," "brilliancy." "By his Spirit the heavens are garnished," i.e. the clouds are driven off by the wind or breath of Jeh, and the sky made bright and clear.

In the NT (Mt 12 44; 23 29) the word kosmēō means "set in order," "make ready," "adorn," etc. In Mt 25 7 it is tr'd "trimmed," and in Rev 21 19 "adorned."

GARRISON, gar'i-s'n. See WAR.

GAS, gas (גָּס, Gás): Named among the "sons of the servants of Solomon" (1 Esd 5 34); not mentioned in the lists of Ezr and Neh.

GASHMU, gash'mū, gash'mōō (גַּשְׁמוֹ, gashmū): A form of the name GESHEM (q.v.), found in Neh 6 6 (cf ver 1), "And Gashmu saith it." According to BDB the same termination -u is found in Nabataean proper names.

GATAM, gā'tam (גַּתָּם, ga'tām): An Edomite chief, grandson of Esau (Gen 36 11.16; 1 Ch 1 36).

GATE, gāt (Heb normally [over 300 t] שַׁעַר, sha'ar; occasionally דֶּלֶת, deleth, prop. "gateway" [but cf Dt 3 5]; elsewhere the gateway is דֶּרֶךְ, pethaḥ [cf esp. Gen 19 6]; Aram. שַׁעַר, šar'; Gr πύλην, pulōn, πύλην, pūlē; ERV and AV add θύρα, thūra, "threshold," in 1 Ch 9 19.22; and AV adds דֶּלֶת, deleth, "double-door," in Isa 45 1; θύρα, thūra, "door," Acts 3 2):

(1) The usual gateway was provided with double doors, swung on projections that fitted into sockets in the sill and lintel. Ordinarily the material was wood (Neh 2 3.17), but greater strength and protection against fire was given by plating with metal (Ps 107 16; Isa 45 2). Jos (BJ, V, v, 3) speaks of the solid metal doors of the Beautiful Gate (Acts 3 2) as a very exceptional thing. Some doors were solid slabs of stone, from which the imagery of single jewels (Isa 64 12; Rev 21 21) was derived. When closed, the doors were secured with a bar (usually of wood, Nah 3 13, but sometimes of metal, 1 K 4 13; Ps 107 16; Isa 45 2), which fitted into clamps on the doors and sockets in the post, uniting the whole firmly (Jgs 16 3). Sometimes, perhaps, a portcullis was used, but Ps 24 7 refers to the enlargement or enrichment of the gates. As the gate was esp. subject to attack (Ezk 21 15, 22), and as to "possess the gate" was to possess the city (Gen 22 17; 24 60), it was protected by a tower (2 S 18 24.33; 2 Ch 14 7; 26 9), often, doubtless, overhanging and with flanking projections. Sometimes an inner gate was added (2 S 18 24). Unfortunately, Pal gives us little monumental detail.

GATE, EAST: The expressions are found in Eek: "Even the gate that looketh toward the east" (43 1); "The gate whose prospect is toward the east" (ver 4); but the idea of a gate on the eastern side as the principal entrance to the court of the sanctuary goes back to the days of the tabernacle (Ex 27 13-16). In addition to its use as admitting to the sanctuary inclosure, it may be presumed, in analogy with the general mode of the administration of justice, to have been the place where in earlier times cases were tried which were referred to the jurisdiction of the sanctuary (cf Ex 18 19-22; Dt 17 8; 19 16.18; Nu 27 2.3, etc.).

In Ex 27 13-16 the "gate" by which the congregation entered the tabernacle is carefully described. An embroidered screen of the three sacred colors (blue, purple and Tabernacle scarlet), 20 cubits in width, hung from 4 pillars (really 5 pillars, 5 cubits apart; on the reckoning see TABERNACLE), in the center of the E. side of the tabernacle court. This is further alluded to in Nu 4 26, "the screen for the door of the gate of the court."

PERSIAN SATRAP DICTATING TERMS TO GRECIAN CHIEFS AT THE GATE OF A CITY. BAS-RELIEF FROM LYCIAN MONUMENT.—Brit. Mus.

(2) As even farm laborers slept in the cities, most of the men passed through the gate every day, and the gate was the place for meeting others (Ruth 4 1; 2 S 15 2) and for assemblages. For the latter purpose "broad" or open places (distinguished from the "streets" in Prov 7 12) were provided (1 K 22 10; Neh 8 1), and these were the centers of the public life. Here the markets were held (2 K 7 1), and the special commodities in these gave names to the gates (Neh 3 1.3.23). In particular, the "gate" was the place of the legal tribunals (Dt 16 18; 21 19; 25 7, etc), so that a seat "among the elders in the gates" (Prov 31 23) was a high honor, while "oppression in the gates" was a synonym for judicial corruption (Job 31 21; Prov 22 22; Isa 29 21; Am 6 10). The king, in especial, held public audiences in the gate (2 S 19 8; 1 K 22 10; Jer 38 7; cf Jer 39 3), and even yet "Sublime Porte" (the French tr of the Turkish for "high gate") is the title of the Court of Constantinople. To the gates, as the place of throngs, prophets and teachers went with their message (1 K 22 10; Jer 17 19; Prov 1 21; 8 3; 31 31), while on the other hand the gates were the resort of the town good-for-nothings (Ps 69 12).

(3) "Gates" can be used figuratively for the glory of a city (Isa 3 26; 14 31; Jer 14 2; Lam 1 4; contrast Ps 87 2), but whether the military force, the rulers or the people is in mind cannot be determined. In Mt 18 18 "gates of Hades" (not "hell") may refer to the hosts (or princes) of Satan, but a more likely tr is 'the gates of the grave [which keep the dead from returning] shall not be stronger than it.' The meaning in Jgs 5 8.11 is very uncertain, and the text may be corrupt. See CITY; JERUSALEM; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

GATE, CORNER, FOUNTAIN, HORSE, SUR, etc. See JERUSALEM.

Nothing is said of the position of gates in connection with Solomon's temple, but there was an "inner" (1 K 6 36), and also an "outer" or "great" court (2 Ch 4 9), the latter with doors overlaid with brass, and Temple analogy makes it certain that here also the chief gate (inner or outer court? see COURT) was on the E. side. Provision was made by Solomon in his adjoining palace for the administration of justice in a hall or "porch of judgment" (1 K 7 7), but graver cases were still, apparently, referred for decision to the sanctuary (Jer 26 10). The trial in Jeremiah's case, however, took place, not at the E. gate, but at "the entry of the new gate of Jeh's house" (Jer 26 10; cf 36 10), probably Jotham's "upper gate" (2 K 16 35).

In Ezekiel's ideal temple, "the gate whose prospect was toward the east" was that by which the glory of Jeh went up from the city. 3. Ezekiel's Temple (11 23), and by which the prophet in vision saw it return (43 4). Nothing is told of an E. gate in the temple of 4. Second Temple Zerubbabel, but it may be assumed that there was one as in the other cases. The great E. gate of the Herodian temple, which followed those above mentioned, was that "Beautiful Gate of the temple" where the miracle of the healing of the lame man was performed (Acts 3 1-10). See GATE, THE BEAUTIFUL; HARSITH; SHECANIAH. W. SHAW CALDECOTT

GATE, THE BEAUTIFUL, bu'ti-fōōl (ἡ ἐπὶ τῇ πόλει ἡ ὀψιμα, ἡ ὀψιμα πύλη τοῦ ἱεροῦ): This gate of Herod's temple is mentioned in the narrative of the healing of the lame man by Peter and John in Acts 3 2.10. Little dispute exists as to the identification of the Beautiful Gate with the splendid

"gate of Nicanor" of the Mish (Mid., i.4), and "Corinthian Gate" of Jos (BJ, V, v, 3), but authorities are divided as to whether this gate was situated at the entrance to the women's court on the E., or was the gate reached by 15 steps, dividing that court from the court of the men. The balance of recent opinion inclines strongly to the former view (cf Kennedy, "Problems of Herod's Temple," Expos T, XX, 170); others take the opposite view (Waterhouse, in Sacred Sites of the Gospels, 110), or leave the question open (thus G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, II, 212). See TEMPLE, HEROD'S. The gate itself was of unusual size and splendor. It received the name "Nicanor" from its being the work, or having been constructed at the expense, of an Alexandrian Jew of this name. Lately an ossuary was discovered on Mt. Olivet bearing the Gr inscription: "The bones of Nicanor the Alexandrian, who made the doors." Its other name, "Corinthian," refers to the costly material of which it was constructed—Corinthian bronze. Jos gives many interesting particulars about this gate, which, he tells us, greatly excelled in workmanship and value all the others (BJ, V, v, 3). These were plated with gold and silver, but this still more richly and thickly. It was larger than the other gates; was 50 cubits in height (the others 40); its weight was so great that it took 20 men to move it (BJ, VI, vi, 3). Its massiveness and magnificence, therefore, well earned for it the name "Beautiful."

GATE, VALLEY: In Neh 2 13 AV, "gate of the valley." See JERUSALEM.

GATH, gath (גַּת, gath; LXX Γάθ, Gáth, "winepress"): One of the five chief cities of the Philis (Josh 13 3; 1 S 6 17). It was a walled town (2 Ch 26 6) and was not taken by Joshua, and, although many conflicts took place between the Israelites and its people, it does not seem to have been captured until the time of David (1 Ch 18 1). It was rendered famous as the abode of the giant Goliath whom David slew (1 S 17 4), and other giants of the same race (2 S 21 18–22). It was to G. that the Ashdodites conveyed the ark when smitten with the plague, and G. was also smitten (1 S 6 8,9). It was G. where David took refuge twice when persecuted by Saul (21 10; 27 2–4). It seems to have been destroyed after being taken by David, for we find Rehoboam restoring it (2 Ch 11 8). It was after this reoccupied by the Philis, for we read that Uzziah took it and razed its walls (26 6), but it must have been restored again, for we find Hazael of Damascus capturing it (2 K 13 17). It seems to have been destroyed before the time of Amos (Am 6 2), and is not further mentioned in the OT or Macc, except in Mic 1 10, where it is referred to in the proverb, "Tell it not in Gath" (of 2 S 1 20). Since its destruction occurred, probably, in the middle of the 8th cent. BC, it is easy to understand why the site has been lost so that it can be fixed only conjecturally. Several sites have been suggested by different explorers and writers, such as: Tell es Sâfi, Beit Jibrtn, Khurbet Jeladyeh, Khurbet Abu Geih, Jennata and Yebna (see PEFS, 1871, 91; 1875, 42, 144, 194; 1880, 170–71, 211–23; 1886, 200–202). Tradition in the early centuries AD fixed it at 5 Rom miles N. of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrtn, toward Lydda, which would indicate Tell es Sâfi as the site, but the Crusaders thought it was at Jamnia (Yebna), where they erected the castle of Ibelin, but the consensus of opinion in modern times fixes upon Tell es Sâfi as the site, as is to be gathered from the references cited in PEFS above. The Bib. notices of G. would indicate a place in the Phili plain or the Shephelah, which was fortified, presumably in a strong position on the border of the Phili country toward the territory of Judah or Dan. Tell es Sâfi fits into these conditions fairly well, but without other proof this is not decisive. It is described in SWP, II, 240, as a position of strength on a narrow ridge, with precipitous cliffs on the N. and W., connected with the hills by a narrow neck, so that it is thrust out like a bastion, a position easily fortified. In 1144 Fulke of Anjou erected here a castle called Blanchegarde (Alba Specula). The writer on "Gath and Its Worthies" in PEFS, 1886, 200–204, connects the name Sâfi with that of the giant Saph (2 S 21 18), regarding him as a native of Gath, but the most direct evidence from early tradition connecting Tell es Sâfi with Gath is found in a MS said to be in the library of the Patriarchate of Jerus, which informs us that Catherocastrum was situated on a mountain called Telesaphion or Telesaphy, which is clearly Tell es Sâfi. Catherocastrum must be the Lat for "camp of Gath" (PEFS, 1906, 305). H. PORTER

GATHER, gath'er (גָּתַר, 'gaph, גָּתַר, gáthar; συλλέγω, sullégō, συνάγω, sunagō): "Gather," trans "to bring together," "collect," etc. and intrans "to come together," "assemble," etc. occurs frequently and represents many Heb and Gr words. It is the tr of 'gaph, "to bring together," in Josh 6 9, AVm "gathering host"; Ps 27 10, AVm "The Lord will gather me"; cf Nu 13 14,15; Isa 52 12 AVm. The phrases "gather thee unto thy fathers," "gathered unto his fathers," "gathered into the grave," etc. are frequently used for "to die" and "death" (Gen 25 8,17; 49 29,33; Dt 32 50; 2 K 22 20; 2 Ch 34 28; Job 27 19; cf Jer 3 2), etc.; gáthar, "to take or grasp with the hand," is frequently used of the Divine "gathering" or restoration of Israel (Dt 30 3,4; Neh 1 9; Ps 106 47; Isa 43 5, etc.; Ezk 20 34, etc.; Hos 8 10; Mic 2 12; Zeph 3 19,20; Zec 10 8,10); figuratively, Isa 40 11, "He shall gather the lambs with [RV "in"] his arm" (cf Ps 27 10 AVm); sometimes it denotes bringing together for punishment or destruction (Mic 4 12), "He hath gathered them as the sheaves to the threshing-floor."

In the NT we have sullégō, "to lay together," "to collect" (Mt 13 28,29,30,40,41,48); sunagō, "to lead or bring together," "to gather," "to collect" (26 26, "seek returns"; Jn 4 36, "fruit unto life eternal"); episundgō, "to lead or bring together" (Mt 23 37, "even as a hen gathereth her chickens"); anakephalaibomai, "to sum up under one head," "to recapitulate" (Eph 1 10, "that he might gather together in one all things in Christ," RV "to sum up all things in Christ"; cf 2 14; in Rom 13 9 the pass. is tr'd "be briefly comprehended," RV "summed up").

"To gather," in the sense of "to infer," occurs in Acts 16 10 as the tr of sumbibázō, "to bring together" (here, in mind), "assuredly gathering," RV "concluding" (cf 9 22, "proving").

Gatherer occurs in Am 7 14 as the tr of bōlēg, from bālag, to cultivate figs or sycamores, "a gatherer of sycamore fruit," RV "a dresser of sycamore-trees" ("a nipper of sycamore figs, i.e. helping to cultivate a sort of figs or mulberries produced by the real sycamore tree" [used only by the poorest], which requires nipping in the cultivation, perhaps an occupation of shepherds; Vulg velicans sycamnia).

Gathering is the tr of episunagōgē, "leading together unto" (2 Thess 2 1), "our gathering together unto him"; in 1 Cor 16 2 we have "gathering" (logia from legō) in the sense of a collection of many, RV "collection," as AV in ver 1.

"Gather," etc. occurs frequently in Apoc, e.g. "will gather us out of all the nations," sunagō (Tob 13 5); "gather them together" (1 Macc 9 7; 10 8); "Gather together our dispersion," episundgagē tēn diasporān hēmōn (2 Macc 1 27); "gathered to his fathers" prosethā prās tēn laōn autōi, RV "people" (Jth 16 22; Bel ver 1, tōds palāras; 1 Macc 2 69); "gathering up briefly," RV "gather," suntēmnō (2 Macc 10 10); a "gathering" in the sense of a collection of money (12 43), RV "collection."

Among the changes in RV we have "hold firm" for "gather" (Jer 51 11); "Gather thee together" for "Go one way or other" (Eak 21 16 m, "Make thyself one"); for "gather blackness" (Nah 3 10), "are waxed pale"; for "or gather together" (Job 11 10), "and call unto judgment," m "Heb call an assembly"; for "even as a hen doth gather her brood" (Lk 13 34) "gathereth her own brood"; for "as the partridge sitteth on eggs and hatcheth them not," ARV has "that sitteth on eggs which she hath not laid," m "gathereth young which she hath not brought forth," text of ERV and AVm (Jer 17 11).

GATH-HEPHER, gath-hē'fēr (גַּתְּ הַפֶּהֶר, gath ha-hēpher, "winepress of the pit"): A town on the boundary of Zebulun (Josh 19 13; AV in error, "Gittah-hapher"), the birthplace of the prophet Jonah (2 K 14 25). Jerome (Comm. on Jon) speaks of Geth as an inconsiderable village, about 2 miles from Sepphoris on the Tiberias road, where the tomb of Jonah was shown. Benjamin of Tudela says that Jonah the son of Amittai the prophet was buried "in the mountain" near Sepphoris (Bohn, Early Travels in Pal, 88). These indications agree with the local tradition which identifies Gath-hepher with el-Meshked, a village with ancient ruins on a height N. of the road as one goes to Tiberias, about 2 miles from Nazareth, and half a mile from Kefer Kennah.

GATH-RIMMON, gath-rim'un (גַּתְּ רִמּוֹן, gath rimmōn, "winepress of Rimmon"):

(1) A city in the territory of Dan named with Bene-berak and Me-jarkon, in the plain not far from Joppa (Josh 19 45), assigned to the Kohathite Levites (21 24), reckoned to Ephraim in 1 Ch 6 69. Onom locates it 12 miles from Eleutheropolis on the way to Diospolis. This, however, is too far to the S. More probably it is identical with the "Gath" which Onom places between Antipatris and Jamnia. It is not identified.

(2) A town in the territory of Manasseh, W. of Jordan, given to the Levites (Josh 21 25). There is nothing to indicate the position of the place, and there is much confusion in the writing of the name: LXX A, "Baithsa"; B, "Jebatha." In 1 Ch 6 70 it is replaced by "Bileam," i.e. IBLEAM (q.v.).

GAULONITIS, gōl-on-f'itis. See GOLAN.

GAULS, gōls (Γαλάται, Galatāi): Galatia in Asia Minor is literally the Gallia of the East; its inhabitants are called Galli by Rom writers, just as the inhabitants of ancient France are called Galatae by Gr writers. In some MSS in 2 Tim 4 10, eis Gallian is read for eis Galatian. The emigration of the Gauls from Europe and their settlement in the central region of the peninsula of Asia Minor are somewhat obscure subjects, but the ancient authorities leave no doubt of the main facts. In 1 Macc 8 2 it is difficult to say whether Judas Maccabaeus is referring to the Gauls of Europe or the Gauls of Asia Minor. Both became finally subject to the Romans, and about the same time. It was in 191 BC that Gallia Cisalpina was reduced to the form of a Rom province, and in 189 BC occurred the defeat of Antiochus, king of Asia. Mommsen argues that the reference is to the Gauls in the N. of Italy, from the circumstance that they are mentioned as being under tribute to the Romans, and also from their mention in connection with Spain. Not much, however, can be argued from this, as the notice of them is in a manner rhetorical, and the defeat of Antiochus is mentioned practically in the same connection. In 2 Macc 8 20 the reference is without doubt to the Asiatic Gauls or Galatians, as they are more commonly called. In the Maccabean period they were restless and fond of war, and often hired themselves out as auxiliaries to the Asiatic kings.

GAZA, gā'za (גָּזָא, 'azzāh, "strong"; LXX Γάζα, Gāza; Arab. غَزَّة, Ghazze): One of the five chief towns of Philistia and probably the oldest, situated near the coast in lat. 31° 30' and about 40 miles S. of Jaffa. It is on a hill rising 60 to 200 ft. above the plain, with sand dunes between it and the sea, which is about 2½ miles distant. The plain around is fertile and wells abound, and, being on the border of the desert between Syria and Egypt and lying in the track of caravans and armies passing from one to the other, it was anciently a place of importance. The earliest notices of it are found in the records of Egypt. Thothmes III refers to it in the account of his expedition to Syria in 1479 BC, and it occurs again in the records of the expedition of Seti I in 1313 BC (Breasted, History of Egypt, 285, 409). It occurs also in the early catalogue of cities and tribes inhabiting Canaan in the earliest times (Gen 10 19). Joshua reached it in his conquests but did not take it (Josh 10 41; 11 22). Judah captured it (Jgs 1 18) but did not hold it long, for we find it in the hands of the Philis in the days of Samson, whose exploits have rendered it noteworthy (16 1-3.21.30). The hill to which he carried off the gate of the city was probably the one now called el-Muntar ("watch-tower"), which lies S.E. of the city and may be referred to in 2 K 18 8, "from the tower of the watchmen to the fortified city." G., with the other chief towns, sent a trespass offering to Jeh when the ark was returned (1 S 6 17). Hezekiah defeated and pursued the Philis to G., but does not seem to have captured it. It was taken by Sargon in 720 BC, in his war with Egypt, since Khanun, the king of G., joined the Egyptians and was captured at the battle of Raphia (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchies, II, 142). It was probably destroyed (see Am 1 7). It was certainly dismantled by Alexander the Great in 332, when it dared to resist him. It was then exceedingly strong, verifying its name, and was most bravely defended, so that it took Alexander two months to reduce it. He put to death all the men and sold the women and children as slaves (Grote, History of Greece, XI, 467 ff). It was restored, however, and we learn that Jonathan forced it to submit to him (Jos, Ant, XIII, v, 5; 1 Macc 11 62), and Alexander Jannaeus took it and massacred the inhabitants who escaped the horrors of the siege (Jos, Ant, XIII, xiii, 3). Pompey restored the freedom of G. (ib, XIV, iv, 4), and Gabinius rebuilt it in 57 BC (ib, XIV, v, 3). G. is mentioned only once in the NT (Acts 8 26), in the account of Philip and the eunuch. In the 2d and 3d cents. AD, it became a center of Gr commerce and culture, and pagan influence was strong, while the church founded there was struggling for existence. Many martyrs there testified to the faith, until finally, under Theodosius, Christianity gained the supremacy (HGHL, 12th ed, 188). It fell into the hands of the Arabs in 634 AD, and became and has remained a Moslem city since the days of Saladin, who recovered it from the Crusaders in 1187, after the battle of Hattin. It is now a city of some 20,000 inhabitants, among whom are a few hundred Christians. See also AZZAH.

GAZARA, ga-zā'ra (Γαζάρ, Gazara, Γαζάρ, Gazár): A fortress of great strength in Judaea, which figures often in the Maccabean wars. To this place Judas pursued Gorgias (1 Macc 4 15). It was fortified by the Gr general Bacchides (9 52; Ant, XIII, i, 3). It was captured by Simon Maccabaeus, who turned out the inhabitants and purified the city. He built here a palace for himself, and appointed his son John commander of his army (1 Macc 13 43 ff). A different account of this occurrence is given in 2 Macc 10 32 ff, where the capture is attributed to Judas. The narrative here, however, is inspired by antagonism to Simon because he had assumed the high-priesthood.

The fortress is identical with Tell Jezer, the ancient GEZER (q.v.). It is interesting to note that recent excavations have uncovered the ruins of Simon's palace (PEFS, 1905, 28). W. EWING

GAZATHITES, gā'zath-its (גַּזְאִיתִים, 'azzāthim): The inhabitants of GAZA (q.v.) (Josh 13 3 AV), rendered "Gazites" (Jgs 16 2).

GAZELLE, ga-zel' (צִבְיָה, ṣibhi, and fem. צִבְיָה, ṣibhiyāh; cf Tabeitā, Tabeitā [Acts 9 36], and Arab. ظبي, zabi; also Arab. غزال, ghazāl; Δορκάς, Dorkas [9 36]; modern Gr ζαρκάδι, zarkádi): The word "gazelle" does not occur in AV, where ṣibhi and ṣibhiyāh, in the 16 passages where they occur, are uniformly tr'd "roe" or "roebuck." In RV the treatment is not uniform. We find "gazelle" without comment in Dt 12 15, 22; 14 5; 15 22; 1 K 4 23. We find "roe," with marginal note "or gazelle," in Prov 6 5; Cant 2 7, 9, 17; 4 5; 8 14; roe-deer is sometimes called ghazāl or even wa'il, which is the proper name of the Pers wild goat.

The gazelle is an antelope belonging to the bovine family of the even-toed ruminants. There are more than twenty species of gazelle, all belonging to Asia and Africa. The species found in Syria and Pal is the Dorcas gazelle (Gazella dorcas). It is 2 ft. high at the shoulders. Both sexes have unbranched, lyrate, ringed horns, which may be a foot long. The general coloration is tawny, but it is creamy white below and on the rump, and has a narrow white line from above the eye to the nostril. Several varieties have been distinguished, but they will not bear elevation to the rank of species, except perhaps G. meruli, a form of which a few specimens have been obtained from the Judean hills, having distinctly different horns from those of the common gazelle. The gazelle is found singly or in small groups on the interior plains and the uplands, but not in the high mountains. It is a marvel of lightness and grace, and a herd, when alarmed, makes off with great rapidity over the roughest country (2 S 2 18; 1 Ch 12 8; Prov 6 5; Cant 8 14). The beauty of the eyes is proverbial. The skin is used for floor coverings, pouches or shoes, and the flesh is eaten, though not highly esteemed. See DEER; GOAT; ZOOLOGY. ALFRED ELY DAY

GAZER, gā'zēr (גָּזֵר, gāzer [in pause]). See GEZER.

GAZERA, ga-zē'ra (Γαζέρα, Gazēra):

(1) A fortress of Judaea (1 Macc 4 15; 7 45); in RV always GAZARA (q.v.).

(2) Head of a family of temple-servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 6 31) = "Gazzam" in Ezr 2 48 and Neh 7 51.

GAZEZ, gā'zez (גָּזֵז, gāzez, "shearer"):

(1) A son of Ephah, Caleb's concubine (1 Ch 2 46).

(2) A second Gazez is mentioned in the same ver as a son of Haran, another son of Ephah.

GAZING-STOCK, gāz'ing-stok: This obs word occurs twice: (1) in Nah 3 6, as the tr of גָּזֵז, gāzez, "a sight" or "spectacle" (from rd'āh, "to look," "see," also "to look down upon," "despise"); "I will . . . make thee vile, and will set thee as a gazing-stock," as one set up to be gazed at, mocked and despised—a form of punishment in olden times; cf "mocking stock" (2 Macc 7 7), and "laughing-stock" still in use. The Heb word occurs only here and in Gen 16 13; 1 S 16 12; Job 7 8; 33 21, in which places it does not have the same bad meaning; for a similar threatening of Isa 14 16; Jer 51 37. (2) In He 10 33, it is the tr of theatrisō, "to bring upon the theater," "to be made a spectacle of," "made a gazing stock both by reproaches and afflictions"; cf 1 Cor 4 9, theatron ginomai, where St. Paul says the apostles were "made a spectacle unto the world," AVm "Gr theatre." The reference in both instances is to the custom of exhibiting criminals, and esp. gladiators, men doomed to death, in the theaters. "In the morning men are exposed to lions and bears; at mid-day to their spectators; those that kill are exposed to one another; the victor is detained for another slaughter; the conclusion of the fight is death" (Seneca, Ep. vii, quoted by Dr. A. Clarke on 1 Cor 4 9). We are apt to forget what the first preachers and professors of Christianity had to endure. W. L. WALKER

GAZITES, gāz'its: Inhabitants of Gaza, who were Philis when the Israelites came into contact with them (Josh 13 3; Jgs 16 2), but there was an older stratum of population which occupied the Gazelle (Gazella dorcas).

Isa 13 14. We find "roe" without comment in 2 S 2 18; 1 Ch 12 8; Cant 3 5; 7 3. In the last passage cited, Cant 7 3, while ARV has no note, ERV refers to Cant 4 5, where "gazelle" is given in the m. In the opinion of the writer, the rendering should be "gazelle" in all of these passages. It must be acknowledged, however, that the gazelle and the roe-deer are of about the same size, and are sometimes confused with each other. The Gr dorkas may refer to either, and in Syria the place before the invasion of the Philis, probably of Amorite stock.

GAZZAM, gaz'am (גַּזָּאם, gazzām, "devouring"): Head of a family of Nethinim who returned from exile (Ezr 2 48; Neh 7 51; 1 Esd 5 31, "Gazera").

GEBA, gē'ba (גִּבְעָא, gebha', "hill"):

(1) A town on the N.E. boundary of the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18 24), given to the Levites (Josh 21 17; 1 Ch 6 60). It stood on the northern frontier of the kingdom of Judah, Geba and Beersheba marking respectively the northern and southern limits (2 K 23 8). In 2 S 5 25 "Geba" should be altered to "Gibeon," which stands in the corresponding passage, 1 Ch 14 16. In Jgs 20 10.33; 1 S 13 3.16, the Heb reads "Geba," the tr "Gibeah" being due to confusion of the two names. From 1 S 14 5 we gather that Geba stood to the S. of the great gorge, Wady Suweintū, commanding the pass at Michmash. This was the scene of Jonathan's daring enterprise against the Philis, when, accompanied by his armor-bearer, he accomplished an apparently impossible feat, climbing the rocky steepes of the gorge to the N. and putting the enemy to flight. There can be no doubt that the modern village of Jeba' occupies the ancient site. It stands to the S. of Wady Suweintū, looking toward Michmash—modern Mukhmās—with Seneh, the crag on the southern lip of the gorge, in front of it. The distance from Jerus is about 6 miles. It was fortified by Asa with materials that his enemy Baasha had used to fortify Ramah against him (1 K 15 22). It is named by Isaiah in his description of the terrifying march of the Assyrians upon Jerus from the N. (10 28 ff). It appears among the cities which were reoccupied by Israel after the Exile (Ezr 2 26, etc; Neh 11 31).

(2) (Γαββαί, Gabai): Between a fortress so named and Scythopolis (Beisān), Holofernes pitched his camp (Jth 3 10). On the high road that runs through Jenīn, and down the Vale of Jesreel to Beisān, about 2 miles to the S. of Sanūr, stands the village of Jeba', with which this fortress may be identified. W. EWING

GEBAL, gē'bal (גִּבְלָא, gbhal, "border"; Βύβλος, Býblos, and Βίβλος, Biblos; Byblos, mod. Jebeil):

(1) An ancient Phoen city, situated on a bluff of the foothills of Lebanon, overlooking the Mediterranean. It was one of the principal seaports of Phoenicia, and had a small but good harbor for small ships. It lies in lat. 34° 8', nearly, and about 4 miles N. of the river Adonis (Nahr Ibrahm). It was regarded as a holy city by the ancients. Philo mentions the tradition that it was founded by Kronos, and was sacred to the worship of Beltis and, later, of Adonis, whose rites were celebrated yearly at the river of the same name and at its source in the mountain, at Apheca (see TAMMUZ). G. was the center of quite an extensive district, extending from the Eleutherus on the N. to the Tamyras on the S., a distance of 60 or 70 miles along the coast. It is mentioned by Josh (13 5) as the land of the Gebalites (q.v.) (AV "Giblites"), and the Gebalites are also mentioned in 1 K 5 18 (Heb 32) as aiding in the construction of Solomon's temple. The "elders" and the "wise men" of G. are among the workmen employed on Tyrian ships (Ezk 27 9 ARVm). The earliest mention of G. found in history is in the Am Tab, which were composed in the first half of the 14th cent. BC. It had become, in connection with all Phoenicia, a dependency of Egypt in the days of Thothmes III and was under Egypt governors, but, in the reign of Amenhotep IV (Ikhnaton), the Hittites and Amorites from the N. and Khabiri from the S. attacked the territory of G., and its governor wrote letters to Amenhotep, calling for help. There are over 60 of these, describing the desperate condition of the city and of its governor, Ribaddi, who was expelled and took refuge in Beirut, but afterward regained his capital only to be besieged and lose all his dependencies, and finally to fall into the hands of the enemy. G. afterward became independent, as is shown by the records of Ramses IX (1442-1423 BC) and of Ramses XII, for its king retained the emissaries of the former 17 years in captivity, and treated a trusted agent of the latter with scant civility. Its king at this time was Zakkar-Baal, and kings of G. are mentioned in the Assy records, one paying tribute to Ashurnazir-pal (c 887 BC) and another to Sennacherib (705-680). The latter king was Uru-melek, and kings of G. are mentioned in connection with other Phoen cities under Pers rule. The city submitted to Alexander the Great without opposition, and furnished a fleet to aid him in the siege of Tyre (332). Strabo refers to it as a town of note in the days of Pompey (xvi.2.17), and it is frequently mentioned in Phoen (CIS, 1) and Assy inscriptions in the forms Gubal and Gubli (COT, I, 174).

(2) (גִּבְלָא, gbhal; Γοβολίτις, Gobolitis): A district S.E. of the Dead Sea, which is referred to in Ps 83 7 (Heb 8) in connection with Moab, Ammon, Amalek and others, as making a covenant together against Israel (of 1 Macc 5). Robinson (BR, II, 154) found the name Jebāl still applied to this region, and Jos (Ant, II, i, 2) speaks of a Gebalitis as forming part of Idumaea. It is a hilly region, as the modern name signifies, and includes the towns of Shobek and Tolfteb. H. PORTER

GEBALITES, gē'bal-its (גִּבְלִיִּים, ha-gibhlīm): Inhabitants of GEBAL (q.v.). According to the present text of Josh 13 5, "the land of the Gebalites" was given to Israel as part of its future territory. But it was never occupied by the Israelites. LXX, however, has a very different reading, indicating an early corruption of the text. Perhaps with many modern scholars it is better to read "to the borders of the Gebalites."

In 1 K 5 18 AV translates this word "stone-squarers," AVm gives "Giblites," and RV "Gebalites," as workmen who, with the men of Solomon and of Hiram, fashioned the stones for the temple. Here also the text is doubtful, and some by a slight change would read: "and made a border for them" (i.e. for the stones). In Ezk 27 9 the men of Gebal are described as the "calkers" of the ships of Tyre and Sidon. GEORGE RICE HOVEY

GEBER, gē'bēr (גִּבְרָא, gebher, "man," "strong one"):

(1) According to 1 K 4 13 AV the father of one of the 12 officers who provided food for Solomon and his household (but here RV "Ben-geber"). His district lay to the N.E. of Jordan.

(2) Another, and the last in the list of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K 4 19). His district was also E. of the Jordan, but probably to the S. of that named in connection with the official of ver 13 (RV "Ben-geber"). According to the rendering of EV, he is said to have been "the only officer that was in the land." Unless the text, which presents some difficulties, is corrupt, as some suppose, it probably means that this large region was assigned to one official because less able than the others to furnish the required supplies. BENJAMIN RENO DOWNER

GEBIM, gē'bim (גִּבִּים, gebhīm, "trenches"): A place named only in Isa 10 31. Some would place it at Jebta, identifying it with the Geba of Eusebius, 5 Rom miles from Gophna (modern Jifneh), on the way to Shechem. Its place, however, in the order of names, after Anathoth, seems to point to some position S. of that village, to the N.E. of Jerus.

GECKO, gek'ō (RV for גֶּכּוֹ, 'ānākāh, only in Lev 11 30; LXX μυγάλη, mugālē, "shrew mouse" or "field mouse"; AV ferret): Probably a shrew or a field mouse. See FERRET; LIZARD; SPIDER.

GEDALIAH, ged-a-lī'a (גְּדַלְיָהּ, g'dhalyāh, except in 1 Ch 25 3.9 and Jer 38 1, where it is גְּדַלְיָהוּ, g'dhalyāhū, "Yah[ui] is great"):

(1) Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam (the friend and protector of Jeremiah) and grandson of Shaphan (the scribe in the reign of Josiah) (2 K 25 22-25; Jer 39 14; 40 5-16; 41 1-18).

After the destruction of Jerus and the carrying away captive of the Jews to Babylon (586 BC), Gedaliah was appointed by Nebuchadnezzar governor over the poor Jews who had been left in the land to be as Governor vine-dressers and husbandmen (2 K in Judah 25 12.22). To his charge were committed also some royal princesses (Jer 43 6) and courtiers (41 16) who had been allowed to remain as unlikely to cause any trouble. Gedaliah fixed his residence at Mizpah, a few miles N.W. of Jerus. Here he was joined by Jeremiah (40 6).

The Jewish soldiers who had escaped capture, having heard that the Chaldeans had departed, and that Gedaliah, one of their own nation,

2. His Con- had been appointed governor in ciliary Judah, came with Ishmael, Johanan Spirit and other officers at their head, to Wise Rule Gedaliah at Mizpah (2 K 25 23.24; Jer 40 7-10). The governor assured them that they need have no fear of vengeance from their conquerors, and promised them on oath protection and security, if they would remain and cultivate the land and become the peaceful subjects of the king of Babylon. This assurance led to a general gathering around Gedaliah of refugees from all the neighboring countries (Jer 40 11.12). For two months (some think longer) Gedaliah's beneficent and wise rule did much to consolidate affairs in Judah and to inspire the feeble remnant of his countrymen with heart and hope.

But evil spirits were at work against him. Baalis, king of Ammon, had determined upon his life (Jer 40 13-16). The peaceful and popular rule which was being established by the good governor stood in the way of the accomplishment of any plan of conquest he entertained. Baalis found a ready instrument for his murderous design in Ishmael who, as one of royal birth and in the counsels of the king (41 1), was doubtless jealous of the man who had been chosen governor in preference to himself. Gedaliah was informed by Johanan and the other captains of the plot to assassinate him, and Johanan at a private interview expressed to him a strong desire to go himself and slay Ishmael secretly, declaring that the safety of the Jews depended upon the life of the governor. But Gedaliah refused to allow Johanan to anticipate his enemy, believing, in the generosity of his heart, that Ishmael was not capable of such an act of treachery. He soon found, however, that his confidence had been sadly misplaced. Ishmael, with ten of his companions, came on a visit to him to Mizpah, and after they had been hospitably entertained they fell upon their good host and murdered him, along with all the Jewish and the Chaldean soldiers whom he had with him for order and protection (2 K 25 25; Jer 41 1-3). They then cast the bodies of their victims into the cistern which Asa had made (ver 9). Ishmael was pursued and overtaken by Johanan, but he succeeded in effecting his escape to the Ammonites (vs 11-15). Then Johanan and the other captains, afraid lest the Chaldeans should avenge upon them the murder of the governor (vs 16-18), and against the earnest entreaties of Jeremiah (ch 42), fled to Egypt, taking the prophet and the Jewish remnant with them (43 5-7). In memory of the date of Gedaliah's assassination the Jews kept a fast (which is still retained in the Jewish calendar) on the 3d day of the 7th month, Tishri (Zec 7 5; 8 19).

The narratives reveal Gedaliah in a very attractive light, as one who possessed the confidence alike of his own people and their conquerors;

4. His a man of rare wisdom and tact, and Noble of upright, transparent character, Character whose kindly nature and generous disposition would not allow him to think evil of a brother; a man altogether worthy of the esteem in which he was held by succeeding generations of his fellow-countrymen.

(2) (g'dhalyāhū): Son of Jeduthun, and instrumental leader of the 2d of the 24 choirs in the Levitical orchestra (1 Ch 25 3.9).

(3) A priest of the "sons of Jeshua," in the time of Ezra, who had married a foreign woman (Ezr 10 18).

(4) (g'dhalyāhū): Son of Paashur (who beat Jeremiah and put him in the stocks, Jer 20 1-6), and one of the chiefs of Jerus who, with the sanction of the king, Zedekiah, took Jeremiah and let him down with cords into a cistern where he sank in the mud (38 1.4-6).

(5) Grandfather of Zephaniah the prophet, and grandson of Hezekiah, probably the king (Zeph 1 1).

JAMES CRICHTON

GEDDUR, ged'ur (גֶּדּוּר, Geddour): Head of a family of temple-servants (1 Esd 5 30), corresponding to Gahar of Ezr 2 47 and Neh 7 49.

GEDEON, ged'e-on (He 11 32 AV). See GID-ON.

GEDER, gē'dēr (גְּדֵר, gedher): A royal city of the Canaanites taken by Joshua along with Lachish, Eglon, Gezer, Debir and Hormah (Josh 12 13 f). It may be the city called "Beth-gader" in 1 Ch 2 51, and the birthplace of Baal-hanan, who had charge of David's olives and sycamores (27 28); unidentified.

GEDERAH, ge-dē'ra, GEDERATHITE, ge-dē'ra-thit (גְּדֵרָתִי, ha-g'dhērāh, "the inclosed place"): A town in the Shephelah of Judah, named with Socoh, Azekah, Shaaraim and Adithaim (Josh 15 36). In 1 Ch 4 23 RV reads, "the inhabitants of Netaim and Gederah," for AV, "those that dwelt among plants and hedges." It is probably represented by Khirbet Jadīreh, about 3 miles S.W. of Gezer. "Gederathite," applied to Jozabad (12 4), probably meant an inhabitant of this place.

GEDERITE, gē'dēr-it, ge-dē'rit (גְּדֵרִית, g'dhērit): Inhabitant of GEDER, which see (1 Ch 27 28).

GEDEROTH, ged'e-roth, ge-dē'rōth (גְּדֵרֹת, g'dhērōth): A town in the Shephelah of Judah, named with Kithlish, Beth-dagon, Naamah and Makkedah (Josh 15 41). It is mentioned along with Bethshemesh and Aijalon as taken by the Philis in the reign of Ahas (2 Ch 28 18). It possibly corresponds with the "Kidron" of 1 Macc 15 39.41; 16 9. Onom places a very large village named Gedrom 10 Rom miles from Lydda on the road to Eleutheropolis. This points to Kafrah, S.E. of Yebnah.

GEDEROTHAIM, ged-ê-rô-thâ'im (גְּדֵרוֹתַיִם, gdêrôthayim, "place of inclosures"): Stands as the 15th in a list which professes to give only the names of 14 cities in the Judaean Shephelah (Josh 15 36). AVm suggests that we might read "or" for "and" after Gederah, but this is impossible. LXX reads, "and its cattle shelters." Probably, however, the name has arisen by dittography from the preceding GEDERAH (q.v.).

GEDOR, gē'dor (גְּדוֹר, gdhōr; B, Γεδόρ, Geddōr, A, Γεδόρ, Gedōr):

(1) A town in the mountains of Judah, named with Halhul and Beth-zur (Josh 15 58). It seems to be referred to by Eusebius as Gadeira (Onom, s.v.), which he identifies with Gaidora (Jerome calls it Gadora), a village in the borders of Jerus, near the terebinth. It is probably represented today by Khirbet Jedūr, about 7 miles N. of Hebron (PEF, III, 313, Sh XXI).

(2) Among the Benjamites who joined David at Ziklag were the sons of Jeroham of Gedor (1 Ch 12 7). No trace of this name is found in the territory of Benjamin. It may be identical with (1).

(3) The Simeonites are said to have gone to the entering in of Gedor in search of pasture for their flocks. They smote and expelled the Meunim, "and dwelt in their stead" (1 Ch 4 39 ff). Here LXX reads Gerar, and this is probably correct.

(4) A family in Judah (1 Ch 4 4).

(5) An ancestor of Saul (1 Ch 8 31).

GE-HARASHIM, gē-ha-rā'shim (גֵּהַרָּשִׁים, gdhārāshim): In 1 Ch 4 14, AV renders "valley of Charashim." In Neh 11 35, EV renders "valley of craftsmen"; here it is named with Lod and Ono. Something of the name perhaps survives in Khirbet Hirsā, E. of Lydda.

GEHAZI, gē-hā'zī (גֵּהָזִי, gdhāzī, except in 2 K 4 31; 5 25; 8 4.5, where it is גֵּהָזִי, gdhāzī, perhaps "valley of vision"): The confidential servant of Elisha. Various words are used to denote his relation to his master. He is generally called Elisha's "boy" (נָעַר, na'ar), servant or personal attendant; he calls himself (5 25) his master's servant or slave (עֶבֶד, 'ebhedh), and if the reference be to him in 4 43 RVm, he receives the designation "minister" (מְשָׁרֵת, m'shārēth), or chief servant of Elisha.

Mention is made of him on three different occasions. He is first brought under notice in the story of the wealthy Shunammite (2 K 4 8-37) who provided in her house special accommodation for Elisha, which suited his simple tastes, and of which he availed himself as often as he passed that way. By command of his master, Gehazi called the Shunammite, that she might be rewarded by the prophet for her liberal hospitality. Failing to elicit from the lady a desire for any particular favor, and being himself at a loss to know how to repay her kindness, Elisha consulted with his servant, whose quick perception enabled him to indicate to his master the gift that would satisfy the great woman's heart. When on the death of her child the Shunammite sought out the man of God at Carmel, and in the intensity of her grief laid hold of the prophet's feet, "Gehazi came near to thrust her away" (ver 27)—perhaps not so much from want of sympathy with the woman as from a desire to protect his master from what he considered a rude importunity. Then Elisha, who had discovered of himself (ver 27), from what the woman had said (ver 28), the cause of her sorrow, directed Gehazi, as a preliminary measure, to go at once to Shunem and lay his staff upon the face of the dead child. Gehazi did so, but the child was "not awaked."

In this narrative Gehazi appears in a favorable light, as a willing, efficient servant, jealous of his master's honor; a man of quick observation, whose advice was worth asking in practical affairs.

Gehazi, however, reveals himself in a different character in connection with the healing of Naaman

(2 K 5 20-27). As soon as the Syrian general had taken his departure, Gehazi, with his retinue from the house of Sin Elisha, the covetous spirit of Gehazi, which had been awakened by the sight of the costly presents the prophet had refused, was no longer able to restrain itself. Running after Naaman, Gehazi begged in the prophet's name a talent of silver (£400 = $2,000) and two changes of raiment, alleging, as a specious reason for Elisha's change of mind, the arrival at his master's house of two poor scholars of the prophet, who would require help and maintenance. Naaman, glad to have the opportunity he desired of showing his gratitude to Elisha, urged Gehazi to take two talents and sent two servants with him to carry the money and the garments. When they came to the hill in the neighborhood of the prophet's house, Gehazi dismissed the men and concealed the treasure. Thereafter, with a bold front, as if he had been attending to his ordinary duties, he appeared before his master who at once inquired, "Whence, Gehazi?" (Heb). On receiving the ready answer that he had not been anywhere, Elisha, who felt sure that the suspicion he entertained regarding his beloved servant, his very "heart" (ver 26), was well grounded, sternly rebuked him for the dishonor he had brought upon God's cause, and called down upon him and his family forever the loathsome disease of the man whose treasures he had obtained by his shameful lie. "And he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow."

By this narrative confidence in Gehazi is somewhat unexpectedly and rudely shaken. The active, zealous servant stands confessed a liar and a thief. Gehazi's sin branched out in different directions. By his falsehood he deceived Naaman and misrepresented Elisha; he not only told a lie, but told a lie about another man, and that man his master and friend. Further, he brought true religion into disrepute; for it was not a time (ver 26) for a servant of God to allow any commercial idea to be associated with the prophet's work in the mind of the Syrian general to whom God's power had been so strikingly manifested and when many for worldly gain pretended to be prophets. But while Gehazi's sin had its various ramifications, its one root was covetousness, "the love of money [which] is a root of all kinds of evil" (1 Tim 6 10).

Once more Gehazi is mentioned (2 K 8 1-6) as having been summoned, leper though he was, by King Jehoram to give him an account of all the great things Elisha had done. And when he came to the story of the restoration of the Shunammite's child to life, the woman herself appeared before the king along with her son, craving to be reinstated in her house and land of which she had been dispossessed during her seven years' absence from her native country in a time of famine. Gehazi testified to the identity of both mother and son, with the result that the king at once ordered the restoration not only of all her former possessions, but also of all the profits her land had yielded during her sojourn in Philistia.

The appearance and conduct of Gehazi on this occasion give some ground for the hope that he had repented of his sin and could now be trusted to speak the truth; and the pleasure he seemed to take in rehearsing the wonderful deeds of a master who, though kind and indulgent to a stranger, was hard upon him, may even warrant the belief that in his earlier days there was some good thing in him toward his master's God. If also, as has been indicated above, the word used in 4 43 (m'shārēh) applies to him—the same as is applied to Elisha (1 K 19 21)—we may be the more readily inclined to see in the history of Gehazi how one besetting sin may prevent a man from taking his natural place in the succession of God's prophets. Let us hope, however, that though Gehazi became a "lost leader," "just for a handful of silver," he was yet saved by a true repentance from becoming a lost soul.

GEHENNA, gē-hen'a (גֵּהֶנְנָא, gēhenna [see Grimm-Thayer, s.v.]): Gehenna is a transliteration from the Aram. form of the Heb gē-hinnōm, "valley of Hinnom." This latter form, however, is rare in the OT, the prevailing name being "the valley of the son of Hinnom." LXX usually translates; where it transliterates the form is different from Gehenna and varies. In the NT the correct form is Gēhenna with the accent on the penult, not Gēenna. There is no reason to assume that Hinnom is other than a plain patronymic, although it has been proposed to find in it the corruption of the name of an idol (EB, II, 2071). In the NT (ARV) Gehenna occurs in Mt 5 22.29.30; 10 28; 18 9; 23 15.33; Mk 9 43.45.47; Lk 12 5; Jas 3 6. In all of these it designates the place of eternal punishment of the wicked, generally in connection with the final judgment. It is associated with fire as the source of torment. Both body and soul are cast into it. This is not to be explained on the principle that the NT speaks metaphorically of the state after death in terms of the body; it presupposes the resurrection. In AV and RV Gehenna is rendered by "hell" (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT). That "the valley of Hinnom" became the technical designation for the place of final punishment was due to two causes. In the first place the valley had been the seat of the idolatrous worship of Molech, to whom children were immolated by fire (2 Ch 28 3; 33 6). Secondly, on account of these practices the place was defiled by King Josiah (2 K 23 10), and became in consequence associated in prophecy with the judgment to be visited upon the people (Jer 7 32). The fact, also, that the city's offal was collected there may have helped to render the name synonymous with extreme defilement. Topographically the identification of the valley of Hinnom is still uncertain. It has been in turn identified with the depression on the western and southern side of Jerus, with the middle valley, and with the valley to the E. Cf EB, II, 2071; DCG, I, 636; *RE*³, VI. GEERHARDUS VOS

GELILOTH, gē-lī'loth (גְּלִילֹת, gēlīloth): This word is used for "districts" or "circuits," perhaps indicating the different parts subject to the several lords of the Philis (Josh 13 2, AV "borders," RV "regions"); for the quarter of the Jordan valley where the eastern tribes built the altar of Ed (22 10 f; AV "border of," RV "region about," Jordan); and apparently, for the whole of Philistia (Joel 3 4, AV "coasts of Pal," RV "regions of Philistia"). But in Josh 18 17, it is clearly used as a place-name. Geliloth lay on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin which passed En-shemesh (probably 'Ain el-Hōd, about 2 miles E. of Jerus), "and went out to Geliloth, which is over against the ascent of Adummim." From this point it "went down" toward the plain. The place cannot therefore be identified with Gilgal in the Jordan valley. Some point on the road leading from Jericho to Tal'at ed-Dumm, about 6 miles from Jerus, was probably intended, but no identification is possible.

GEM, jem (Prov 26 8, ERV "a bag of gems"). See STONES, PRECIOUS.

GEMALLI, gē-mal'ī (גִּמְלִי, gīmālī, "camel owner"): Father of the spy Ammiel from the tribe of Dan (Nu 13 12), who was one of those sent by Moses to spy out the land of Canaan.

GEMARA, ge-mā'rā. See TALMUD.

GEMARIAH, gem-a-rī'a (גִּמְרִיָּהוּ, gīmārīyāhū, גִּמְרִיָּה, gīmārīyāh, "Jeh hath accomplished"): (1) Son of Shaphan the scribe, one of the princes, from whose chamber Baruch read Jeremiah's prophecies to the people. He, with others, sought to stay Jehoiakim from burning the roll (Jer 36 10. 11.12.25).

(2) Son of Hilkiah, one of Zedekiah's ambassadors to Babylon, by whom Jeremiah sent his letter to the captives (Jer 29 3).

GEMATRIA, gē-mā'tri-a. See NUMBERS; GAMES.

GENDER, jen'dēr (גֵּנֶדֶר, yāladh, גֶּנֶדֶר, 'ābhar; גֵּנֶדֶר, genēdō): "Gender" is an abbreviation of "engender." In Job 38 29 yāladh (common for "to bear," "to bring forth") is tr^d "gender" (after Wicliff), RV "The hoary frost of heaven, who hath gendered it?" m "given it birth." In 21 10 we have 'ābhar (either the Piel of 'ābhar, "to pass over," etc, or of a separate word meaning "to bear," "to be fruitful"), tr^d "gendereth," "Their bull gendereth, and faileth not"; in Lev 19 19, rābha, "to lie down with" is used of cattle gendering. In Gal 4 24 AV we have "Mount Sinai, which gendereth [gennaō, "to beget"] to bondage," RV "bearing children unto bondage" (like Hagar, Abraham's bondwoman), and in 2 Tim 2 23, which "gender strifes," i.e. beget them. LITERATURE

The OT tr^s (once, Neh 7 5) the noun גֵּנֶדֶר, yāhas; גֵּנֶדֶר הַיָּהוָה, šēpher ha-yāhas, "book of the genealogy"; also tr^s a denominate vb.

1. Definition in Hithpael, גֵּנֶדֶר, yāhas, "sprout," "grow" (cf family "tree"); גֵּנֶדֶר הַיָּהוָה, hithyāhēs, "genealogy"; the idea is conveyed in other phrases, as גֵּנֶדֶר הַיָּהוָה, šēpher tōl'dhōth, "book of the generations," or simply גֵּנֶדֶר הַיָּהוָה, tōl'dhōth, "generations." In the NT it transliterates γενεαλογία, genealogía, "account of descent," 1 Tim 1 4; Tit 3 9. In Mt 1 1, βίβλος γενεσῶν, biblos genēsēs, "book of the generation" of Jesus Christ, is rendered in ARV "the genealogy of Jesus Christ"; a family register, or register of families, as 1 Ch 4 33, etc; the tracing backward or forward of the line of ancestry of individual, family, tribe, or nation; pedigree. In Tim and Tit it refers probably to the gnostic (or similar) lists of successive emanations from Deity in the development of created existence.

According to the OT, the genealogical interest dates back to the beginnings of sacred history. It appears in the early genealogical tables

2. Biblical References of Gen 5, 10, 46, etc; in Ex 6 14-27, where the sons of Reuben, Simeon and esp. Levi, are given; in Nu 1 2; 26 2-51, where the poll of fighting men is made on genealogical principles; in Nu 2 2, where the positions on the march and in camp are determined by tribes and families; in David's division of priests and Levites into courses and companies (1 Ch 6-9); is referred to in the account of Jeroboam's reign (2 Ch 12 15 m, "the words of Iddo, after the manner of genealogies"); is made prominent in Hezekiah's reforms when he reckoned the whole nation by genealogies (1 Ch 4 41; 2 Ch 31 16-19); is seen in Jotham's reign when the Reubenites and Gadites are reckoned genealogically (1 Ch 5 17). Zerubabel took a census, and settled the returning exiles according to their genealogies (1 Ch 3 19-24; 1 Ch 9; Ezr 2; Neh 7, 11, 12). With the rigid exclusion of all foreign intermixtures by the leaders of the Restoration (Ezr 10; Neh 10 30; 13 23-31), the genealogical interest naturally deepened until it reached its climax, perhaps in the time of Christ and up to the destruction of Jerus. Jos, in the opening of his Life, states that his own pedigree was registered in the public records. Many families in Christ's time clearly possessed such lists (Lk 1 5, etc.). The affirmed, reiterated and unquestioned Davidic descent of Christ in the NT, with His explicit genealogies (Mt 1 1-17; Lk 3 23-38); Paul's statement of his own descent; Barnabas' Levitical descent, are cases in point. Davididae, descendants of David, are found as late as the Rom period. There is a tradition that Herod I destroyed the genealogical lists at Jerus to strengthen his own seat, but more probably they persisted until the destruction of Jerus.

Genealogical accuracy, always of interest both to primitive and more highly civilized peoples, was made esp. important by the facts that the land was promised to the descendants of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, that the priesthood was exclusively hereditary, that the royal succession of Judah lay in the Davidic house, that the division and occupation of the land was according to tribes, families and fathers' houses; and for the Davididae, at least, that the Messiah was to be of the house of David. The exile and return, which fixed indelibly in the Jewish mind the ideas of monotheism, and of the selection and sacred mission of Israel, also fixed and deepened the genealogical idea, prominently so in the various assignments by families, and in the rejection in various ways of those who could not prove their genealogies. But it seems extreme to date, as with many modern critics, its real cultivation from this time. In the importance attached to genealogies the Heb resembles many other ancient literatures, notably the Egypt, Gr. and Arab., but also including Romans, Kelts, Saxons, the earliest history naturally being drawn upon genealogical as well as on annalistic lines. A modern tendency to overestimate the likeness and underestimate the unlikeness of the Scripture to its undoubtedly cognate literatures finds in the voluminous artificial genealogical material, which grew up in Arabia after the time of the caliph Omar, an almost exact analogue to the genealogical interest at the time of the return. This, however, is on the assumption of the late date of most of the genealogical material in the older NT books, and rests in turn on the assumption that the progress of religious thought and life in Israel was essentially the same as in all other countries; an evolutionary development, practically, if not theoretically, purely naturalistic in its genesis and progress.

The direct historical value of the Scripture genealogies is variously estimated. The critically reconstructive school finds them chiefly in the late (priestly) strata of the early books, and dates Ch-Ezr-Neh (our fullest sources) about 300 BC, holding it to be a priestly reconstruction of the national history wrought with great freedom by the "Chronicler." Upon this hypothesis the chief value of the genealogies is as a mirror of the mind and ideas of their authors or recorders, a treasury of reflections on the geographical, ethnological and genealogical status as believed in at their time, and a study of the effect of naïve and exaggerative patriotism dealing with the supposed facts of national life, or else, in the extreme instance, a highly interesting example of bold and inventive juggling with facts by men with a theory, in this particular case a priestly one, as with the "Chronicler." To more conservative scholars who accept the OT at its face value, the genealogies are a rich mine of historical, personal and ethnographic, as well as religious, information, whose working, however, is much hindered by the inevitable corruption of the text, and by our lack of correlative explanatory information. Much interesting illustrative matter may be looked for from such archaeological explorations as those at Gezer and elsewhere under the Pal Exploration Society, the names on the pottery throwing light on the name-lists in Ch, and the similar discoveries on the supposed site of Ahab's palace in Samaria, which also illustrate the conflict between Baal and Jeh worship by the proportion of the proper names compounded by "Baal" or "Jah" (see Macalister, Bible Sidelights from Gezer, 150 ff; PEF, 1905, 243, 328; Harvard Theological Review, 1911). In spite of all such illustrative data, however, the genealogies must necessarily continue to present many insoluble problems. A great desideratum is a careful and systematic study of the whole question by some modern conservative scholar endowed with the patience and insight of the late Lord A. C. Hervey, and equipped with the fruits of the latest discoveries. While much curious and suggestive information may be derived from an intensive study of the names and relationships in the genealogies (although here the student needs to watch his theories), their greatest present value lies in the picture they present of the large-hearted cosmopolitanism, or international brotherliness, in the older ones, notably Gen 10, recognizing so clearly that God hath made of one all nations to dwell on the earth; and, as they progress, in the successive selection and narrowing as their lines converge upon the Messiah.

In the evaluation and interpretation of the genealogies, certain facts and principles must be held in mind. (1) Lists of names necessarily suffer more in transmission than other parts of literature, since there is almost no connectional suggestion as to their real form. Divergences in different versions, or in different stages, of the same genealogy are therefore to be looked for, with many tangles hard to unravel, and it is precisely at this point that analytic and constructive criticism needs to proceed most modestly and restrain any possible tendency unduly to theorize. (2) Frequently in the Scriptural lists names of nations, countries, cities, districts or clans are found mingled with the names of individuals. This is natural, either as the personification of the clan or nation under the name of its chief, or chief progenitor, or as the designation of the individual clan, family or nation, from its location, so common among many nations. Many of the cases where this occurs are so obvious that the rule may not be unsafe to consider all names as probably standing for individuals where the larger geographical or other reference is not unmistakably clear. This is undoubtedly the intent and understanding of those who transmitted and received them. (3) It is not necessary to assume that the ancestors of various tribes or families are eponymous, even though otherwise unknown. The Scriptural explanation of the formation of tribes by the expansion and division of families is not improbable, and is entitled to a certain presumption of correctness. Furthermore, it is extremely difficult to establish a stopping-point for the application of the eponymous theory; under its spell the sons of Jacob disappear, and Jacob, Isaac and even Abraham become questionable. (4) The present quite popular similar assumption that personal details in the genealogy stand for details of tribal history, as, for instance, the taking of a concubine means rather an alliance with, or absorption of, an inferior tribe or clan, is a fascinating and far-reaching generalization, but it lacks confirmation, and would make of the Scripture an allegorical enigma in which historical personages and events, personified peoples or countries, and imaginary ancestors are mingled in inextricable confusion. (5) Scriptural genealogies are often given a regular number of generations by omitting various intermediate steps. The genealogies of Jesus, for instance, cover 42 generations, in 3 subdivisions of 14 each. Other instances are found in the OT, where the regularity or symmetry is clearly intentional. Instance Jacob's 70 descendants, and the 70 nations of Gen 10. This has in modern eyes an artificial look, but by no means necessarily involves violence done to the facts under the genealogist's purview, and is readily and creditably accounted for by his conceptions and purposes. The theory that in some cases the requisite number has been built up by the insertion of imaginary names (vide Curtis, ICC, "Chronicles," 135) has another aspect, and does not seem necessary to account for the facts, or to have sufficient facts to sustain it. See 21 5, (6) below. It involves a view of the mental and moral equipment and point of view of the Chronicler in particular, which would not seem to leave him many shreds of either historical, or "religious" value, and which a sounder criticism will surely very materially modify. (6) Much perplexity and confusion is avoided by remembering that other modes of entrance into the family, clan, tribe or nation obtained than that by birth: capture, adoption, the substitution of one clan for another just become extinct, marriage. Hence "son of," "father of," "begat," have broader technical meanings, indicating adoptive or official connection or "descent," as well as actual consanguinity, nearer or remote, "son" also meaning "grandson," "great-grandson," etc. Instance Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, of the tribe of Judah, styled (1 Ch 2 18) a descendant of Hebron and son of Hur, but also, in token of his original descent, called the Kenizzite or "son of Kenaz" (Josh 15 17), etc. Similarly, where in an earlier genealogy a clan or individual is assigned to a certain tribe, and in a later to another, it has been "grafted in." But while these methods of accretion clearly obtained, the nations freely absorbing neighboring or surrounding peoples, families, or persons, families likewise absorbing individuals, as in American Indian, and many other tribes; yet, as in them, the descent and connection by birth constituted the main line, and in any given case has the presumption unless clear facts to the contrary exist. (7) The repetition of the same name in the same genealogy, as in that of the high priests (1 Ch 6 1-15), rouses "suspicion" in some minds, but unnecessarily. It is very natural, and not uncommon, to find grandfathers and grandsons, esp. among the Hebrews, receiving the same name (Lk 1 59). This would be esp. to be expected in a hereditary caste or office like the priesthood. (8) The existence of the same name in different genealogies is not uncommon, and neither implies nor should cause confusion. (9) The omission of one or many links in the succession, often clearly caused by the desire for symmetry, is frequent where the cause is unknown, the writers being careful only to indicate the connection more or less generally, without feeling bound to follow every step. Tribes were divided into families, and families into fathers' houses; tribe, family and fathers' house regularly constituting links in a formal genealogy, while between them and the person to be identified any or all links may be omitted. In similar fashion, there is an absence of any care to keep the successive generations absolutely distinct in a formal fashion, son and grandson being designated as alike "son" of the same ancestor. Gen 46 21, for instance, contains grandsons as well as sons of Benjamin, Bela, Becher, Ashbel, Gera, Naaman, Ehi, etc. This would be esp. true where the son as well as the father became founder of a house. Some confusion is occasionally caused by the lack of rigid attention to precise terminology, a characteristic of the Heb mind. Strictly the tribe, שֵׁבֶט, shēbhet (in P, מִשְׁפָּחָה, mishpāhāh), is the larger subdivision, then the clan, מִשְׁפָּחָה, mishpāhāh, "family," and then the "house" or "fathers' house," בֵּית, bayith, or אֵב, ēb, בֵּית אֵב, bēth 'abb, or בֵּית אֲבוֹת, bēth 'abhōth; but sometimes a "fathers' house" is a tribe (Nu 17 6), or a clan (1 Ch 24 6). In this connection it is to be remembered again that sequence of generations often has to do with families rather than with individuals, and represents the succession to the inheritance or headship, rather than the actual relationship of father and son. (10) Genealogies are of two forms, the descending, as Gen 10: "The sons of Japheth: Gomer," etc; "The sons of Gomer: Ashkenaz," etc; and the ascending, Ezr 7 1 ff: "Ezra, the son of Seraiah, the son of Azariah, the son of Hilkiah," etc. The descending are the usual. (11) Feminine names are occasionally found, where there is anything remarkable about them, as Sarai and Milcah (Gen 11 29), Rebekah (22 23), etc; or where any right or property is transmitted through them, as the daughters of Zelophehad, who claimed and were accorded "a possession among the brethren of [their] father" (Nu 26 33; 27 1-11), etc. In such cases as Azubah and Ephrath, successive wives of Caleb (1 Ch 2 18-20), many modern critics find tribal history enshrined in this case, "Caleb" or "dog" tribe having removed from Azubah, "deserted" to Ephrathah, Bethlehem, in Northern Judah. But the principle is not, and cannot be, carried out consistently. (12) The state of the text is such, esp. in Ch, that it is not easy, or rather not possible, to construct a complete genealogical table after the modern form. Names and words have dropped out, and other names have been changed, so that the connection is often difficult and sometimes impossible to trace. The different genealogies also represent different stages in the history and, at many places, cannot with any knowledge now at our command be completely adjusted to each other, just as geographical notices at different periods must necessarily be inconsistent. (13) In the present state of our knowledge, and of the text, and also considering the large and vague chronological methods of the Hebrews, the genealogies can give us comparatively little chronological assistance. The uncertainty as to the actual length of a generation, and the custom of frequently omitting links in the descent, increases the difficulty; so that unless they possess special marks of completeness, or have outstanding historical relationships which determine or corroborate them, or several parallel genealogies confirm each other, they must be used with great caution. Their interest is historical, biographical, successional or hereditary, rather than chronological.

The principal genealogical material of the OT is found in Gen 5, 10, 11, 22, 25, 29, 30, 35, 36, 46; Ex 6; Nu 1, 2, 7, 10, 13, 26, 34; scattered notices in Josh, Ruth, 1 S; 2 S 3, 5, 23; 1 K 4;

1 Ch 1-9, 11, 12, 15, 23-27; 2 Ch 23, 29; Ezr 2, 7, 10; Neh 3, 7, 10, 11, 12. The genealogies of Our Lord (Mt 1 1-17; Lk 3 23-38) are the only NT material. The OT and NT genealogies bring the record down from the creation to the birth of Christ.

After tracing the descent from Adam to Jacob, incidentally (Gen 10) giving the pedigree of the various nations within their purview, the Heb genealogists give the pedigree of the twelve tribes. As was to be expected, those tribes, which in the developing history assumed greater prominence, received the chief attention. Dan is carried down but 1 generation, and credited with but 1 descendant; Zebulun 1 generation, 3 sons; Naphtali 1 generation, 4 sons; Issachar 4 generations, 15 descendants; Manasseh 4 generations, 39 descendants; Asher 7 generations, 40 descendants; Reuben 8 (?) generations, 22 descendants; Gad 10 generations, 28 descendants; Ephraim 14 (?) generations, 25 descendants. Levi, perhaps first as the priestly tribe, Judah next as the royal, Benjamin as most closely associated with the others, and all three as the survivors of the exile (although representatives of other tribes shared in the return) are treated with the greatest fulness.

Ch furnishes us the largest amount of genealogical information, where coincident with the older genealogies, clearly deriving its data from them.

7. Sources them. Its extra-canonical sources are a matter of considerable difference among critics, many holding that the books cited by the Chronicler as his sources ("The Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah," "The Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel," "The History of Samuel the Seer," "The History of Nathan the Prophet," etc., to the number of perhaps 16) are our canonical books, with the addition of a "Midrashic History of Israel," from which he quotes the most freely. But the citations are made with such fulness, vividness, and particularity of reference, that it is hard to believe that he did not have before him extensive extra-canonical documents. This is the impression he clearly seeks to convey. Torrey (AJSL, XXV, 195) considers that he cites this array of authority purely "out of his head," for impressiveness' sake, a theory which leaves the Chronicler no historical value whatever. It is extremely likely that he had before him also oral and written sources that he has not cited, records, private or public lists, pedigrees, etc., freely using them for his later lists and descents. For the post-exilic names and lists, Ezr-Neh also furnish us much material. In this art. no attempt is made at an exhaustive treatment, the aim being rather by a number of characteristic examples to give an idea of the quality, methods and problems of the Bible genealogies.

In the early genealogies the particular strata to which each has been assigned by reconstructive critics is here indicated by J, P, etc. The signs "=" or ":" following individual names indicate sonship.

(1) Gen 4 16-24. The Cainites (assigned to P).

Seven generations to Jabal, Jubal and Tubal-cain, explaining the hereditary origin of certain occupations (supposed by many to be a shorter version of ch 5).

8. Principal Genealogies and Lists (2) Gen 4 25-26. The Sethites (assigned to J).

(3) Gen 5 1-32. The Book of the Generations of Adam (assigned to P, except ver 29 J).

Brings the genealogy down to Noah, and gives the chronology to the Flood. The numbers in the Heb MT, the Sam Heb, and the LXX differ, MT aggregating 1,656 years, Sam 1,307 years, and LXX 2,242 years. Some scholars hold this list to be framed upon that of the ten Bab kings given in Berosus, ending with Xisuthrus, the Bab Noah. An original primitive tradition, from which both lists are derived, the Heb being the nearer, is not impossible. Both the "Cainite" list in Gen 4 and this "Sethite" list end with three brothers.

(4) Gen 10 1-32. The Generations of the Sons of Noah, "The Table of Nations" (assigned to P, vs 1-7; J, vs 8-19; P, ver 20; J, ver 21; P, ver 22; J, vs 24-30; P, vs 31-32). Found in abridged form in 1 Ch 1 5-24.

I. Japheth = Gomer, Magog, Badai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, Tiras.

1. Gomer = Ashkenaz, Riphath (1 Ch 1 6, Dip-hath), Togarmah.

2. Javan = Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, Dodanim (Rodanim, 1 Ch 1 7, is probably correct, a T, d, having been substituted by a copyist for T, r).

II. Ham = Cush, Mizraim, Put, Canaan.

1. Cush = Seba, Havilah, Sibtah, Raamah, Sab-teca (Nimrod).

2. Mizraim = Ludim, Ananim, Lehabim, Naph-tuhim, Pathrusim, Casluhim (whence the Philis), Caphtorim.

3. Canaan = Zidon (Ch Sidon), Heth; the Jebu-site, Amorite, Girgashite, Hivite, Arkite, Sinite, Arvadite, Zemarite, Hittite.

4. Raamah (s. Cush) = Sheba, Dedan.

III. Elam = Asshur, Arpachshad, Lud, Aram.

1. Aram = Uz, Hul, Gether, Mash (Ch Meshech).

2. Arpachshad = Shelah = Eber = Pelcg, Joktan.

3. Joktan (s. Eber) = Almodad, Sheleph, Haz-armaveth, Jerah, Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, Obal, Abimael, Sheba, Ophir, Havilah, Jobab.

4. Pelcg (s. Eber) = Reu = Serug = Nahor = Terah = Abraham.

Nearly all these names are of peoples, cities or districts. That Noah, Shem, Ham, Japheth, Nahor, Terah, Abraham, Nimrod, and probably Pelcg, Reu, Serug, represent actual persons the general tenor of the narrative and the general teaching of Scripture clearly indicate, although many critics consider these also as purely eponymous. The others can mostly be more or less clearly identified ethnographically or geographically. This table represents the nations known to the writer, and in general, although not in all particulars, expresses the ethnographical relationships as far as they are now known to modern research. It follows a partly ethnological, partly geographical scheme, the descendants of Japheth in general representing the Aryan stock settled in Asia Minor, Media, Armenia, Greece, and the islands of the Mediterranean; those of Ham representing the Hamitic races in Ethiopia, Egypt, in Southwest Arabia, and Southern Babylonia. Many modern writers hold that in making "Nimrod" the son of "Cush," the Scripture writer has confused "Cush," the son of Ham, with another "Cush," the Cassel, living near Elam, since the later Babylonians and Assyrians were clearly Sem in language and racial characteristics. Nevertheless the Scripture statement is accordant with early traditions of a Hamitic settlement of the country (Oannes the fish-god coming out of the Red Sea, etc.) and perhaps also with the fact that the earliest language of Babylonia was non-Sem. The sons of Canaan represent the nations and peoples found by the Hebrews in Pal, the Phoenicians and the Canaanites. Heth is the great Hittite nation, by language and racial type strikingly non-Sem. Among the sons of Shem, Eber is by many considered eponymous or imaginary, but the hypothesis is not necessary. Most Assyriologists deny the connection of Elam with Shem, the later Elamites being non-Sem; the inscriptions, however, show that the earlier inhabitants up to 2300 BC were Sem. Lud must be the Lydians of Asia Minor, whose manners and older names resemble the Sem. Asia Minor presents a mixture of races as manifold as does Pal. The sons of Joktan are tribes in Western and Southern Arabia. Havilah is given both as a son of Cush, Hamite, and of Joktan, Semite, perhaps because the district was occupied by a mixed race. It would seem, however, that "begat," or "son of" often represents geographical as well as ethnological relations. And where the classification of the Scripture writer does not accord with the present deliverances of archaeology, it must be remembered that at this distance conclusions drawn from ethnology, philology and archaeology, considering the present incomplete state of these sciences, the kaleidoscopic shifting of races, dynasties and tongues through long periods, and our scanty information, are liable to so many sources of error that dogmatism is precarious. The ancient world possessed a much larger amount of international knowledge than was, until recently, supposed. A writer of 300 BC had a closer range and could have had sources of information much more complete than we possess. On the assumption of the Mosaic authorship, that broad, statesmanlike mind, learned in all the knowledge of the Egyptians, and, clearly, profoundly influenced by Bab law and lit., may be credited with considerable breadth of vision and many sources of information. Aside from the question of inspiration, this Table of Nations, for breadth of scope, for inclusiveness (though not touching peoples outside of the life of its writer), for genial broad-mindedness, is one of the most remarkable documents in any literature.

(6) Gen 11 10-27. The Generations of Shem (assigned to P).

From Shem to Abraham. The list is also chronological, but the versions differ, MT making 290 years, from Shem to Abraham, Sam Heb, 940, and LXX 1,070. LXX inserts Calnan, 130 years, otherwise agreeing with Sam to the birth of Abraham. Arpachshad may be rendered "the territory of Chemed," i.e. of the Chasdim, Chaldeans. Eber therefore is descended from Arpachshad, Abraham, his descendant, coming from Ur-Chasdim.

(6) Gen 11 23-26; 22 20-24. The Children of Nahor (11 23-26 P; 22 20-24 J).

Us, Buz, Kemuel, etc. These descendants of Abraham's brother probably represent Aramaean tribes chiefly E. or N.E. of Canaan. Aram may be the ancestor of the Syrians of Damascus. Us and Buz probably belong to Arabia Petraea, mentioned in Jer 26 23 with the Arabian tribes Dedan and Tema. Chemed in this list probably stands, not for the Chaldeans of Babylonia, but for a related tribe of Northern Syria. In Gen 10 23 (assigned to P) Us is the son of Aram, and in 10 22 Aram is a son of Shem. On the purely tribal hypothesis, this is either a contradiction, or the later statements represent other tribal relationships or subdivisions. Probably other individuals or tribes are indicated. Ch does not have this list, it being a side stream.

(7) Gen 16 15; 21 1-3; 25 (also 1 Ch 1 28-33). The Sons of Abraham by Sarah, Hagar, Keturah (16 15 assigned to P; 21 1-3 to J, P, J, P; Gen 25 1-6 J; 7-11 P; 11b J; 12-17 P; 18 J; 19-20 P; 21-26a J; 26b P; 27-34 J).

The descendants of Abraham through Hagar and Ishmael represent the Ishmaelite tribes of Arabia living N. and N.W. of the Jordanides, who chiefly peopled Arabia. Twelve princes are named, possibly all sons of Ishmael, perhaps some of them grandsons. The number has seemed "suspicious" as balancing too exactly the twelve tribes of Israel. But twelve is an approved Sem number, determining not necessarily the sons born, but the "sons" mentioned. The Arabians generally were frequently given the name Ishmaelites, perhaps because of the greater prominence and closer contact of these northern tribes with the Hebrews. The sons of Keturah seem to have been chiefly Arabian tribes, whose locations are unknown. Midian of the sons of Keturah is the well-known and powerful tribe in the Arabian desert near the Asiatic Gulf, bordered by Edom on the N.W. Sheba and Dedan are also mentioned as Cushites (Gen 10 7). Very likely the tribes extensively intermarried, and could claim descent from both, or were adopted into one or the other family. Sheba was in Southwestern Arabia. Dedan lived near Edom, where the caravan routes to various parts of Arabia converged. Amshurim are of course not Amyrins, but an Arabian tribe, mentioned by the side of Egypt in Hittite inscriptions. While the two sons of Isaac are to be accepted as real persons, their typical character is also unmistakable, the history of the two nations, Israel and Edom, being prefigured in their relations.

(8) Gen 29 31-30 24; 35 16-26. The Children of Jacob (29 31-35 assigned to P; 30 1-3a JE; 4a P; 4b-24 JE; 35 16-22 JE; 23-26 P).

The account of the parentage, birth and naming of the founders of the twelve tribes, by Leah, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun (d. Dinah), by Bilhah, Dan, Naphtali, by Zilpah, Gad, Asher, by Rachel, Joseph, Benjamin. Much modern criticism agrees that these names are purely those of tribes, some of them perhaps derived from persons or places impossible now to trace, but mostly synonymous. Accordingly these chapters are to be treated as follows. An Arab tribe, Jacob, wanders in Canaan, quarrels with Edom, migrates to Haran, forms alliances with the Aramaean clans Rachel, Bilhah, Leah, Zilpah. Rachel and Jacob constitute a new tribe, Joseph. The federation takes the name Jacob. The other allied clans divide into sub-clans, or new clans join them, until Leah has six "sons," Reuben, Simeon, etc., Zilpah, two; Bilhah, two. Zilpah and Bilhah are "concubines" because inferior members of the federation, or else have a left-handed connection with it.

The formation of the new tribe Benjamin broke up the old tribe Rachel, which (who) accordingly "died." Although such are the original facts imbedded in the documents, they are now set in a framework of personal narrative, and were understood as narrative by the first hearers and readers. The history thus constituted is necessarily "an enigma which it is very hard to solve" (Bennett, Gen, 284), and with almost as many answers as students. For critical purposes it presents a rich field for exploration, analysis and conjecture, but its edificatory value is chiefly found in reading the narratives as personal, a serious and reverent religious romance founded on facts or legends, whose real value lies in the insights it throws on national character and ethical principles, expressed in a naive, vivid, lifelike story, full of suggestion and teaching. This present article, however, proceeds on the Scripture representation of these details and incidents as personal.

The explanations of the names illustrate the Hebrew, coming from a attached to words and ad mere popular etymology being fully capable easily represent the name, but may give to the maternal or many to be so called "ah" tribe. Reuben, down, unless Leah's name, rather than is with looked upon my, be r's s'n. "Son, a the second statement; I another etymology, a lover of amonances can find more than one. The tribe is not prominent after Deborah's time. Simeon, considered by some an animal (totem) name, the Arab. s'm'u, cross between hyena and wolf, suggests to the mother (or is suggested by that) its likeness to s'm'u, "bear." "Jeh hath beard." It is not much known after the Conquest. Levi, "adhesion, associate," thought by many a gentile adjective from Leah, the Leah tribe par excellence, the name is adjectival in form. Leah connects it with yillaweh, "He will join." "Now will my husband be joined unto me." A similar allusion is found in Nu 18 24, there applied to the "joining" of the tribe to Aaron. Judah is associated with the vb. yaddah, "praise." "Now will I praise Jeh." Jacob makes the same suggestion in Gen 29 35, no other plausible suggestion of the origin of the name can be made. The etymology and origin of Bilhah are unknown. Dan is associated with dānāh, "Judge." "God hath judged," no other etymology can be found. Naphtali is derived from naphal, "wrestle": "I have wrestled," the only discoverable etymology. Zilpah, niphah, perhaps is "dropping," drop "Gad, gad," "fortunate," according to Leah. Gad was the well-known Syrian god of "fortune"; but there is no necessary connection here. Asher, from asher, "happy," asher, "call happy," so Leah; no connection with Amshur, Amyr, god, Issachar, from isshar, "hire," "man of hire." "God hath given me mine hire, also because Leah had "hired" Jacob with her son's man-drakes, a similar allusion in Gen 29 26, "a servant under taskwork." Wellhausen would read 'ish-asher, "man of [some deity, unknown]." Zebulun, from zibul, "habitation, dwelling." Leah gives two explanations, the first assigned by critics to E (probably), connecting the name with a root found in Zebudiah, Zabdī, etc., "endow." "God hath endowed me with a good dowry." the second with sēkel, "dwell." "Now will my husband dwell with me." Dinah, like Dan, is from dān, "judge." Supposed by some to be an old tribe of Israel, in some way associated with Dan, possibly a twin division. Rachel is "ewe," hence identified with a "ewe" tribe. Joseph has a twofold suggestion, the first (assigned to E) from dapha, "take away." "God hath taken away my reproach"; the second (assigned to J) from yēphah, "add." "Jeh will add to me another son." None of these three cases of double explanation would so far exhaust Heb maternal imagination as to require the hypotheses of two documents, even though in the last "God" is used in the first suggestion and "Jeh" in the second. Benjamin is called by Rachel Benoni, "the son of my sorrow," which is supposed to be an old tribal name, perhaps related to Onan, a clan of Judah, or the Benjamite city, Ono, and possibly to the Egypt On. Benjamin, Jacob's name for him, "son of the right hand," i.e. of happiness, is understood as "son of the south," because originally the southern section of the Joseph tribe. The attempts to trace these names to tribal origins, local allusions, cognate languages, customs and religions have engaged much research and ingenuity, with results exceedingly diverse.

(9) Gen 36. The Generations of Esau (P)

I. The descent of the Edomite chiefs and clans from Esau through his three wives, the Hittite or Canaanite Adah, the Ishmaelite Basemath, and the Horite Oholibamah (vs 1-19).

The wives' names here differ from the other statements:
In 26 34 and 28 9: 1. Judith, d. of Beerl the Hittite.
2. Bashemath, d. of Elon, the Hittite.
3. Mahalath, d. of Ishmael, sister of Nebaloth.

In Gen 36: 1. Oholibamah, d. of Anah, d. of Zibeon, the Hivite.
2. Adah, d. of Elon the Hittite.
3. Bashemath, d. of Ishmael, sister of Nebaloth.

It is not necessary to resort to the hypothesis of different traditions. Bashemath and Adah are clearly identical. Esau perhaps having changed the name; as are Mahalath and the Ishmaelite Basemath, a transcriber's error being probably responsible for the change. As to Judith and Oholibamah, Anah is probably a man, identical with Beerl (ver 24), the son of Zibeon. Both "Hivite" and "Hittite" are apparently errors for "Horite," the difference being in only one consonant. Or "Hittite" may be used as the larger term embracing "Horite." "Edom" (vs 1.8.19) is a personal name; in vs 9.43 (Heb ARVm) it is national, indicating that to the writer Esau was a person, not an eponym. Nowhere are personal characteristics more vividly and unmistakably portrayed than in the accounts of Jacob and Esau. In these Esauite names are but two compounds of "El" ('*š*l), none of "Jah" ('yāh).

II. The aboriginal leaders or clans in Edom, partly subdued by, partly allied with, the Esauites (vs 20-30).

These are descendants of "Seir the Horite" in seven branches, and in sub-clans. "Seir" looks like an eponym or a personification of the country, as no personal details have been preserved. Among these names are no "El" ('*š*l) or "Jah" ('yāh) compounds, although they are clearly cognate with the Heb. Several close similarities to names in Judah are found, esp. the Hezronite. Many animal names, "Aiah," "bird of prey," "Aran," "wild goat," etc.

III. Eight Edomite "kings" before the Hebrew monarchy (vs 31-39).

One '*š*l compound, "Mehitabel," one ba'al compound. It is to be noted that the "crown" was not hereditary and that the "capital" shifted; the office was elective, or fell into the hands of the local chief who could win it.

IV. A list of Esauite clan chiefs; "dukes" (EV), "chiefs" (ARV); "sheiks" (vs 40-43).

Apparently arranged territorially rather than tribally. The names seem used here as either clans or places and should perhaps be read: "the chief of Teman," etc. The original ancestor may have given his name to the clan or district, or obtained it from the district or town.

In general this genealogy of Esau shows the same symmetry and balance which arouses suspicion in some minds: excluding Amalek, the son of the concubine, the tribes number twelve. Amalek and his descendants are clearly separated from the other Edomites early and are found historically about Kadesh-barnea, and later roaming from the border of Egypt to North Central Arabia.

(10) Gen 46 8-27 (in different form, Nu 26 1-51, and much expanded in parts of 1 Ch 2-8; cf Ex 6 14-16). Jacob's posterity at the descent into Egypt (considered a late addition to P).

A characteristic genealogy. It includes the ideal number of 70 persons, obtained by adding to the 66 mentioned in Gen 46 26, Jacob, Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh, the two latter born in Egypt. LXX, followed by Stephen (Acts 7 14), reckons 75, adding to Gen 46 20 the names of three grandsons and two great-grandsons of Joseph, obtained from Nu 26 29.35 ff. Some may have been omitted to secure the ideal number so fascinating to the Heb mind. It is to be noted that Leah's male descendants are double those of Zilpah, and Rachel's double those of Bilhah, showing the ideal (but not the fictitious) character of the list. The design, also, seems to be to include those descendants of Jacob from whom permanent divisions sprang, even though, like Manasseh and Ephraim and probably Hezron and Hamul, born after the migration, but before Jacob's death. A comparison with the partial parallels also illustrates the corruption of the text, and the difficulty of uniformity in lists of names. The full list follows:

1. Jacob.
2. Leah's descendants.
 - A. Reuben=Hanoch, Pallu, Hezron, Carmi.
 - B. Simeon=Jemuel, Jamin, Ohad, Jachin, Zohar, Shaul.
 - C. Levi=Gershon, Kohath, Merari.
 - D. Judah=Er, Onan, Shelah, Perez, Zerah; Perez, Hezron, Hamul.
 - E. Issachar=Tolah, Puvah, Iob, Shimron.

F. Zebulun=Sered, Elon, Jahleel.

G. Dinah, daughter.

3. Zilpah's descendants, 16.

A. Gad=Ziphion, Haggi, Shuni, Ezbon, Eri, Arodi, Areli.

B. Asher=Imnah, Ishvah, Ishvi, Beriah, Serah (daughter); Beriah=Heber, Malchiel.

4. Rachel's descendants, 14.

A. Joseph=Manasseh, Ephraim.

B. Benjamin=Bela, Becher, Ashbel, Gera, Naaman, Ehi, Rosh, Muppim, Huppin, Ard.

5. Bilhah's descendants, 7.

A. Dan=Hushim.

B. Naphthali=Jahzeel, Guni, Jezer, Shilem.

The list differs in many respects from those in Nu and Ch, and presents some chronological and other problems. Without entering upon an exhaustive study, a number of names may be touched on.

Carmi (2A), like the other names in i, might be a gentilic, "the Carmite," like "the Amorite," etc, esp. if these names are those of clans, as they are in Nu, instead of persons, as the Gen narrative states. A town, "Beth-hachcherem," is mentioned in Jer 6 1. But "the vine-dresser" is also a good rendering.

Hezron (2A). Another Hezron is given as a descendant of Judah. This duplication of names is possible in clans; see instances below, but more likely in persons.

Jemuel (2B). Nemuel in Nu 26 12; 1 Ch 4 24, an easy error in transcription, ḡ, yōdh, and ḡ, nūn, being easily confused. In Nu, Nemuel is also a Reubenite name.

Jamin (or Jachin) (2B) is Jarib in Ch.

Ohad (2B). Not in Nu or Ch.

Zohar (2B) is Zerah in Nu and Ch.

Gershon (2C). In 1 Ch 6 16 Gershom; identified by some with Gershom, son of Moses, on the theory that the priestly family of Gershom originally traced its descent to Moses, but its later members were reckoned, not as priests, but as Levites, thus becoming identified with Levi; precarious; its principal foundation being similarity of name and tribe.

Hezron and Hamul (2D) rouse chronological or exegetical difficulties. Pharez (Gen 38) could not have been old enough at the migration to have two sons; but very possibly Gen 38 is introduced episodically, not chronologically, and therefore its events may have occurred before those of Gen 37. Jacob was 130 years old at the descent, making Judah not 42 but 62, and Pharez old enough for sons. And, as suggested above, the writer may have done with Hezron and Hamul as with Ephraim and Manasseh—Included them constructively, they having been born in Egypt, but before Jacob's death, belonging therefore to the generation of the migration and so reckoned, esp. as they founded permanent tribal divisions.

Puvah (2E). Puvah in 1 Ch 7 1. In Jgs 10 1, centuries later, Puvah is father of Tola, an illustration of the descent of fathers' names.

Iob (2E) is Jashub (Nu, Ch), the latter probably correct. LXX has it here. A copyist, no doubt, omitted the "shn," "sh."

Dinah (2G) is thought by some to be a later insertion, on account of the "awkward Heb," "with Dinah." Dinah and Serah as unmarried, and no doubt because of other distinguishing facts, now unknown, are the only women descendants mentioned; married women would not be. On the clan theory of the names, the "Dinah" clan must have disappeared in Egypt, not being found in Nu.

Ziphion (3A). Zephon in Nu, perhaps giving its name to the Gadite city of Zaphon (Josh 13 27).

Ezbon (3A). Ozni (Nu 26 16). Possibly Ozni, on Ezbon's death, took his place, founding a tribal family, like Hezron and Hamul in Judah. Copyist's error unlikely.

Arodi (3A). In Nu 26 17 Arod.

Ishvah (3B). Omitted in Nu; perhaps died childless, or his descendants did not constitute a tribal family.

Beriah (3B). Also an Ephraimite (1 Ch 7 23); a Benjamite (8 13.16); a Levite (23 10.11). The repetition of the name indicates individuals rather than clans; but both the Asherite and Benjamite were heads of families.

Serah (3B), שֶׂרָא, "serah," "abundance," not the same name as that of Abraham's wife, שָׂרָה, "sārāh," "princess."

Heber (3B), הֶבֶר, "heber"; in 1 Ch 4 18, a clan of Judah; 8 17, of Benjamin. Not the same name as Eber, עֶבֶר, "ebher" (5 13; 8 22; and Gen 10 21).

The Sons of Benjamin. The three lists, Gen, Nu, Ch, represent marked divergences, illustrating the corruption of perhaps all three texts. This list illustrates the genealogical method of counting all descendants as sons, though of different generations. It gives Benjamin ten "sons." Nu 26 38-40 gives five sons, Naaman and Ard being sons of Bela. The LXX of our passage gives only three sons, Bela, Becher, Ashbel. 1 Ch 7 6 gives three sons, Bela, Becher, Jediel (Ashbel), and Shupplim and Hupplim are Bela's grandsons. Becher is omitted in § 1, probably through a copyist's error, who took בֶּכֶר bekher we'-ashbel, for "Becher and Ashbel." בֶּכֶר אֲשֶׁל, bekher we'-ashbel, for "his first-born, Ashbel." Jediel, both by older and newer scholars, is usually, but not with absolute certainty, identified with Ashbel. He may be a later chief. Another explanation is that 7 6 is part of a Zebulunite genealogy which has been transformed into a Benjaminite list, Jediel being a remaining Zebulunite "pebble."

Naaman (4B) perhaps appears, by a transcriber's error in § 2, as נֹחָה, נֹחָה for נֹחָה. If Nohah is not Naaman, and not (Kell) Shephupham, or a chief who succeeded him, he may have been one who was born after the migration and not needed to make up the seventy.

Gera (4B) in similar fashion may appear in § 2 as Rapha. If not, Rapha also may be one born after the migration, and did not found a family.

Ehi (4B) is Ahiram (Nu 26 38); Aharah (1 Ch 8 1). Ehi probably arises from some copyist omitting the "ram."

Rosh (4B) is not in Nu or Ch. He founded no family. Mupplim (4B) troubled the scribes greatly. In Nu 26 39 he is Shephupham, though as compounded in his family name it is Shupham. In 1 Ch 7 12 he is Shupplim, and it is not made clear whether he is a son, or other descendant, of Benjamin. He is apparently called, with Hupplim, a son of Ir (Iri), son of Bela. In § 8 he is catalogued as a son of Bela, as Shephupham. In old Heb mem מ (m) and shin ש (sh) closely resemble each other. As the sh also appears in the gentilic names, it is probably the correct form. The corrupt state of the Chronicler's text esp. is apparent, and also the fact that "son" may refer to any male descendant.

Hupplim (4B) in Nu 26 39 is Hupham; in 1 Ch 8 5 is Huram.

Ard (4B) in 1 Ch 8 3 is a son of Bela, Addar, the copyist having transposed l, d, and r, or mistaken one for the other. In LXX at Gen 46 21 Ard is son of Gera, son of Bela.

Hushim (5A), the same in 1 Ch 7 12, is Shuham (Nu 26 42), by transposition of consonants. Another Hushim is a Benjaminite, son of Aher, but Aher may possibly be a corruption of the numeral "one," it being the Chronicler's frequent habit to add numerals. But see under Dan 21 6, (3), p. 1194.

Jahzeel (5B) is Jahziel in 1 Ch 7 13.

Guni (5B) in 1 Ch 8 15 is also a Gadite name.

Shillem (5B), in 1 Ch 7 13, Shallum, the commoner form.

(11) Ex 6 14-25 (assigned to P). Partial list of heads of fathers' houses of Reuben, Simeon and Levi.

Reuben and Simeon are as in Gen. Levi follows:

1. Gershon = Libni, Shimei.

2. Kohath.

A. Amram m. Jochebed = Aaron, Moses; Aaron m. Elisheba, d. of Amminadab, sister of Nahshon = Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, Ithamar; Eleazar m. d. of Putiel = Phinehas.

B. Izhar = Korah, Nepheg, Zichri; Korah, Assir, Elkanah, Abiasaph.

C. Hebron.

D. Uzziel = Mishael, Elzaphan, Sithri.

3. Merari = Mahli, Mushi.

The interest of the list is partly chronological, but chiefly to illustrate the genealogical place of Aaron and Moses. It probably exhibits the genealogical practice of omitting links, Amram the father of Moses apparently being several links from Amram the son of Kohath. By Moses' time the Amramites numbered some 2,000 males (Nu 3 27, etc.). Jochebed (2A) is an instance of Jah in compounds before the Exodus. Putiel (2A) has been considered a partly Egypt name, Puti or Poti, "devoted to" -El ('el'), but probably Heb., "afflicted by God." Hebron is often identified with the city. It is also found in 1 Ch 2 42, 43, as Judahite.

(12) Nu 1 5-54; 2 3-29; 7 12 ff; 10 4 ff. The heads of houses representing and leading the tribes (assigned to P).

I. Reuben: Elizur, s. of Shedeur.

II. Simeon: Shelumiel, s. of Zurishaddai.

Shelumiel found in Jth.

III. Judah: Nahshon, s. of Amminadab.

Both found also in Ex 6 23; Ruth 4 9-22; 1 Ch 2 10-12; Mt 1 4; Lk 3 32 (genealogies of Christ).

IV. Issachar: Nethanel, s. of Zuar.

Neth., name of nine persons in Ch, Neh, Ezr, same as Nathaniel.

V. Zebulun: Eliab, s. of Helon.

Other Eliabs, Nu 16 1 (Reubenite); 1 S 16 6 (Jesse's son, Judah).

VI. Joseph: Ephraim: Elishama, s. of Ammihud.

Other Elishamas: 2 S 5 16 (s. of David); Jer 36 12; 2 Ch 17 8. Ammihuds: 2 S 13 37 m; Nu 34 20, 28; 1 Ch 9 4 (Judahite).

VII. Joseph: Manasseh: Gamaliel, s. of Pedahzur. NT Gamaliel.

VIII. Benjamin: Abidan, s. of Gideon.

IX. Dan: Ahiezer, s. of Ammishaddai.

Another, 1 Ch 12 8 (Benjamite).

X. Asher: Pagiel, s. of Ochran.

XI. Gad: Eliasaph, s. of Deuel.

Another, Nu 3 24 (Levite).

XII. Naphtali: Ahira, s. of Enan.

Seven of these names, Amminadab, Ammihud, Abidan, Ahrah, Ahiezer, Eliab, Elishama, are conceded early. The 5 compounded in Shaddai or Zur are said to be of a type found only in P; 9 of the 24 are compounded in el, said to be a characteristic of late names. The el is postfixed more times, 5, than it is prefixed, 4; also a characteristic of late names. The proportion of compound names is also greater than in the older names; for these and similar reasons (Gray, ICC, "Nu," 6; HPN, 191-211; Expos 7, September, 1897, 173-90) it is concluded that though several of the names are, and more may be, early, the list is late. But see AHT, 74, 83 ff, 85 ff, 320. The contention rests largely on the late date of P and of Ch. But while fashions in names changed in Heb life as elsewhere, in view of the persistence of things oriental, the dating of any particular names is somewhat precarious. They may be anticipations or late survivals of classes of names principally prevalent at the later or earlier date. Two of the names, otherwise unknown, have come to us through Ruth, and indicate a source now unknown to us, from which all the names could have been drawn. The fondness for names in el very likely indicates not a late date but an early one. El is the Divine name appearing in personal names previous to Moses, succeeded by Jah from Moses and Joshua on. The recurrence of el in the time of Ezra and later probably indicates the renewed interest in antiquity as well as the at once wider and narrower outlook brought about by the exile and return. Numerous S. Arabian compounds both with the "ilu," "il" ("el"), affixed and prefixed, occur in monuments about 1000 BC (AHT, 81 ff).

(13) Nu 3 1-37. The family of Aaren, with the "princes" of Levi.

Adds nothing to list in Ex 16 16-25 except the Levite "princes."

I. Gershonites: Eliasaph, s. of Lael.

Also a Benjaminite Eliasaph (Nu 1 14).

II. Kohathites: Elizaphan, s. of Uzziel.

A Zebulunite Elizaphan (Nu 34 25). Five other Uzziels, Benjamite, Levite, Simeonite.

III. Merarites: Zuriel, s. of Abihail.

A Gadite Abihail (1 Ch 5 14); also father of Queen Esther; also two women: wife of Abishur (1 Ch 2 29); wife of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11 18). Four 'el' suffixes, two prefixes.

(14) Nu 13 4-16. The Twelve Spies (P).

I. Reuben: Shammua, s. of Jaccur.

Other Shammuas (2 S 5 14; 1 Ch 14 4 [David's son]; Neh 11 17, Levite; 13 18, priest). Seven other Zaccurs, Simeonites and Levites.

II. Simeon: Shaphat, s. of Hori.

Four other Shaphats, one Gadite, one Judahite; Elisha's father. Hori looks like the national name of the Horites; perhaps Hori or an ancestor had been adopted, through marriage or otherwise.

III. Judah: Caleb, s. of Jephunneh, the Kenizite (Nu 32 12; Josh 14 6, 14).

Another Caleb, Chelubai, s. of Hezron, brother of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2 9). Either as an individual, or as a clan, Caleb seems to be originally of the pre-Israelitish stock in Canaan, absorbed into the tribe of Judah. Perhaps Jephunneh the Kenizzite married a woman of Caleb's (brother of Jerahmeel) household, and to their firstborn was given the name of Caleb, he becoming head of the house and prince of Judah. Another Jephunneh, an Asherite (7 38).

IV. Issachar: Igal, s. of Joseph.

Other Igal: 2 S 23 36 (one of David's heroes); 1 Ch 3 22. Note the name of another tribe given to a man of Issachar—Joseph (Nu 13 7).

V. Ephraim: Hoshea, s. of Nun.

Hoshea, Joshua's early name. Others: 1 Ch 27 20; King Hoshea, 2 K 15 30; Neh 10 23; Heb name of prophet Hosea.

VI. Benjamin: Palti, s. of Raphu. See 16 IV.

VII. Zebulun: Gaddiel, s. of Sodi.

VIII. Joseph-Manasseh: Gaddi, s. of Susi.

A Gaddi is in 1 Macc 2 2.

IX. Dan: Ammiel, s. of Gemalli.

Another Ammiel (2 S 9 4).

X. Asher: Sethur, s. of Michael.

Nine other Michaels, Gadite, Levite, Issacharite, Benjaminite, Manassite, Judahite.

XI. Naphtali: Nahbi, s. of Vophsi.

XII. Gad: Geuel, s. of Machi.

Four names in 'al. Nine ending with i; unusual number. The antiquity of the list cannot be readily questioned.

(15) Nu 26 5-62 (P). The heads of houses at the second census.

Related to Nu 1 and 2, and closely follows Gen 46. The divergences in individual names have been noted under (10). This list adds to

I. Reuben:

1. Eliab, s. of Pallu (also Nu 16 1.12).
2. Dathan, Abiram, Nemuel, ss. of Eliab.

II. Manasseh:

1. Machir; also Gen 50 23.
2. Gilead, s. of Machir.
3. Iezer (abbreviation for Abiezer), Helek (not in Ch), Asriel, Shechem, Shemida, ss. of Gilead.
4. Zelophehad, s. of Hephher.
5. Mahlah, Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, Tirzah, d. of Zelophehad.

III. Ephraim:

1. Shuthelah; also 1 Ch 7 21.
2. Becher.
3. Tahan (Tahath, 1 Ch 7 20).
4. Eran (Elead, 1 Ch 7 21).

The names of Manasseh's grandsons and great-grandsons are puzzling. Gilead is the district except in Jgs 11 1.2, where it is the father of Jephthah. Shechem sounds like the Ephraimite town. Hephher reminds of Gath-Hephher. In Josh 17 1.2 the six sons of Gilead are described as sons of Manasseh; loosely, it is probable; they are to be understood as descendants. Perhaps the references may be summarized: The family of Machir, the son of Manasseh, conquered Gilead, and took its name therefrom, either as a family or in the person of a son, Gilead, whose six sons founded clans named from or giving names to certain towns or districts.

The daughters of Zelophehad are noted for the interesting case at law they presented, claiming and receiving the inheritance of their father, which by Gray, ICC, "Nu," is considered not historical but a fictitious instance, for the purpose of raising the question, these daughters being clans, and not persons.

Among the sons of Ephraim, Becher has perhaps been misplaced from ver 38, and possibly displaces Bered (1 Ch 7 20) between Shuthelah and Tahath. It is not found here in the LXX. It is possible that an alliance between the Becherites and the Ephraimites caused one portion of the former to be counted with Ephraim and another with Benjamin; or that at different times the clan was allied with the two different tribes. An error in transcription is more probable. Another Shuthelah is found later in the line (1 Ch 7 21).

(16) Nu 34 16-28. Tribal representatives in the allotment.

Reuben, Gad, half-Manasseh, omitted because their allotments had already been assigned E. of Jordan; Levi, because receiving none. Changing to the order in (10):

I. Reuben: None.

II. Simeon: Shemuel, s. of Ammihud.

Shemuel is Heb of Samuel. Another S. is of Issachar, 1 Ch 7 2. Samuel the prophet, a Levite.

III. Judah: Caleb, s. of Jephunneh.

IV. Issachar: Paltiel, s. of Azzan.

Another Paltiel, otherwise Palti, David's wife Michal's temporary husband (2 S 3 15). Another Benjaminite spy (Nu 13 9).

V. Zebulun: Elizaphan, s. of Parnach.

Another E., Kohathite Levite (Ex 6 18.22).

VI. Gad: None.

VII. Asher: Ahihud, s. of Shelomi.

Another Ahihud, Benjaminite (1 Ch 8 7).

VIII. Joseph-Ephraim: Kemuel, s. of Shiftan.

Another Kemuel, s. of Nahor, an Aramæan chief (Gen 22 21); also Levite of David's time (1 Ch 27 17).

IX. Joseph-Manasseh: Hanniel, s. of Ephod.

Hanniel, also an Asherite (1 Ch 7 39).

X. Benjamin: Elidad, s. of Chislon.

XI. Dan: Bukki, s. of Jogli.

Bukki, abbreviation of Bukkiah; another, in high-priestly line of Phinehas (1 Ch 6 5.51).

XII. Naphtali: Pedahel, s. of Ammihud.

A Simeonite Ammihud above. Seven "El" names, only one "Jah."

(17) Ruth 4 20. The ancestry of David (Perez: Hezron: Ram: Amminadab: Nahshon: Salmon [Salmah]: Boaz: Obed: Jesse: David).

Contained unchanged in 1 Ch 2 9-15; also Mt 1 1-6; also Lk 3 32. Some links have been omitted between Obed and Jesse. Salmon might be traced to the ancestor of the Bethlehemite (1 Ch 2 51.54), who is, however, of Caleb's line, not Ram's; but the lines may mingle.

(18) 2 S 3 2-5; 5 14.15. David's children (also in 1 Ch 3 1-9; 14 4-7).

I. Born in Hebron: Amnon, Chileab, Absalom, Adonijah, Shephatiah, Ithream.

II. Born in Jerus: Shammua, Shobab, Nathan, Solomon, Ithar, Elishua, Nepheg, Japhia, Elishama, Eliada, Eliphelet.

Four names in 'al, all prefixed. Two in "Jah." Chileab is Daniel in 1 Ch 3 1; uncertain which is right, but probably Daniel is a corruption. Ch adds Nogah to the Jerus sons, probably developed in transcription. 3 6-8 has two Eliphelets; 14 6 has Eliphelet in place of the first; more probable. This gives David 6 sons in Hebron, and, if both Nogah and Eliphelet be correct, 12 in Jerus. Eliada is Beelada in 14 7, perhaps the original form, a relic of the time before the Hebrews turned against the use of Baal, "lord," as applied to Jeh; in which case Baalada, "Lord knows," was changed to Eliada, "God knows." 3 6 reads Elishama for Elishua. Japhia is also the name of a king of Lachish in Joshua's time (Josh 10 3-7).

(19) 2 S 23 (also 1 Ch 11 11-41). David's knights.

1. Josheb-bashebeth, the Tahchemonite.

In Ch it is Jashobeam, and should read Ishbaal, the writer's religious horror of Baal leading him to substitute the consonants of basheth, "shame," as in Mephibosheth, Ishbosheth. LXX has Isosada (B), Isosada, Isosada (A), in Ch, and Isosada (B), Isosada (A), here. In Ch he is a Hachmonite, probably correct. "Adino the Hezrite" is probably a corruption for "He wielded his spear" (Ch).

2. Eleazar, s. of Dodai, the Ahohite.

Dodo in Ch; 8 other Eleazars in the OT. Another Dodo is father of Elhanan.

3. Shammah, s. of Agee, a Hararite.

Omitted by Ch. Three other Shammahs, one of them a knight of David. "Harari" may be "mountaineer," or "inhabitant of the village Harar."

4. Abishai, s. of Zeruiah, brother of Joab.

Abshai (1 Ch 18 13m). Zeruiah perhaps David's half-sister (2 S 17 25). Father never mentioned.

5. Benaiah, s. of Jehoida of Kabzeel.

11 other OT Benaiahs, one of them also a knight. This B. succeeded Joab as commander-in-chief. 4 other Jehoidas, one B.'s grandson, high in David's counsel, unless a scribe has inverted the order in 1 Ch 27 34, which should then read B., s. of Jehoida.

6. Asahel, brother of Joab.

Three other Asahels.

7. Elhanan, s. of Dodo of Bethlehem.

Another E., slayer of the brother of Goliath (2 S 21 19; 1 Ch 20 5). Perhaps the same.

8. Shammah the Harodite.

Ch. Shammoth. From Harod, near Gideon's well (Jgs 7 1).

9. Elika the Harodite.

10. Heles the Paltite.

Paltite perhaps local or family name from Pelet, or Palt.

11. Ira, s. of Ikkeiah the Tekoite.

Two others, one a knight. Tekoah, Judaite town, home of Amos, etc.

12. Abiezer the Anathothite.

One other, a Manasseite (Josh 17 2). Anathoth an hour N.E. of Jerus. Jeremiah's town.

13. Mebunnai the Hushathite.

Should read, with Ch, Sibbecai.

14. Zalmon the Ahoite.

Z., also name of mountain (Jgs 9 48). Descendant of Ahoah, Benjamite of Bela's line. See 1 Ch 8 14.

15. Maharai the Netophathite.

From Netophah, town.

16. Heleb, s. of Baanah.

1 Ch 11 30. Heled. Three other Baanahs.

17. Ittai, s. of Ribai of Gibeah of the children of Benjamin.

1 Ch 11 31. Ithal. An Ittai of Gath also followed David.

18. Benaiah a Pirathonite.

Pirathon, Amalekite town in Ephraimite territory.

19. Hiddai of the brooks of Gaash.

Ch. Hurai (7 for 7). Ga'ash, a wady in Ephraim.

20. Abi-albon the Arbathite.

Ch. Abiel, perhaps corrupted from Abi-Baal; from Beth-arabah, Judah or Benjamin.

21. Asnaveth the Barhumite.

Three others, and a Judaite town, of the same name. Baharumite, Ch. B., a Benjamite town.

22. Eliahba the Shaalbonite.

S., a Danite town.

23. The sons of Jashen (better, Hashem).

Ch. "the sons of Hashem the Gilonite." "Sons of" looks like a scribal error, or interpolation, perhaps a repetition of "bni" in "Shaalboni" above.

24. Jonathan, s. of Shammah the Hararite.

Ch adds, "the son of Shagee the Hararite." Shagee should perhaps be Agee (2 S 23 11); but LXX indicates Shammah here; both S and Ch should read "J., s. of Shammah the Ararite."

25. Ahiam, s. of Sharar the Ararite.

Ch. Sacar the Hararite. S is supported by LXX.

26. Eliphelet, s. of Ahasvai, the son of the Maacathite.

Ch has "Eliphal, s. of Ur," and adds "Hepher the Mecherathite." Both texts are corrupt. Ch should perhaps read, "Eliphelet the son of . . . , the Maacathite, Ellam," etc.

27. Eliham, s. of Ahithophel the Gilonite.

E., possibly father of Bathsheba. Ahithophel, David's counselor. Gilonite, native of Giloh.

- 27a. Ahijah the Pelonite (in Ch but not S).

Seven other Ahijahs. Pelonite uncertain, probably a corruption; perhaps inserted by a scribe who could not decipher his "copy," and means "such and such a one," as in 1 S 21 2.

28. Haezo (Hesrai) the Carmelite.

Scribe confused 7 and 7. Carmel, near Hebron.

29. Paarai the Arbite.

Ch. "Naarai, s. of Esai." Uncertain. Arab., a town of Judah.

30. Igal, s. of Nathan of Zobah.

Ch. Joel, brother of Nathan. Igal less common than Joel, hence more likely to be corrupted; 2 other Igals; 12 other Joels; 5 other Nathans.

- 30a. Mibhar, s. of Hagri (Ch, not S).

Text uncertain as between this and 31.

31. Bani the Gadite (omitted Ch).

Possibly the Gerarite.

32. Zelek the Ammonite.

Ammon E. of Jordan and upper Jabbok.

33. Naharai the Beerothite, armor-bearer to Joab, s. of Zeruiah.

Beeroth, Benjamite town.

34. Ira the Ithrite.

Ithrites, a family of Kirjath-jearim, Judah.

35. Gareb the Ithrite.

Gareb also a hill W. of Jerus.

36. Uriah the Hittite.

Bathsheba's husband; 3 others. From some Hittite town surrounded by Israel at the Conquest.

37. Zabad, s. of Ahlai (perhaps dropped out of S), Ch.

Ch adds 13 others. The filling of vacancies makes the number 37 instead of 30. Two names, perhaps, in ba'at, 5 in yah, 7 in ai. As far as guessable, 5 from Judah, 3 from Benjamin, 2 from Ephraim, 1 from Dan, 1 from Issachar, 1 Ammonite, 1 Hittite, 2 (or 4) Hararites, 2 Harodites, 2 Ithrites.

- (20) 1 K 4 1-19. Solomon's "princes" and commissaries.

11 princes, 12 officers. No mention of their tribal connections; assigned only partly by tribal bounds. 7 yah names, 1 ai; 5 of the officers are prefixed ben as if their own names had dropped out.

- (21) 1 Ch 1-9. Genealogies, with geographical and historical notices.

Suggests that the genealogies were put together for contemporary families, implying an accommodating insertion of names "after the manner of genealogies" today. Two main purposes, however, seem clear: the first historical, to give the historical and personal basis and setting to elucidate the Chronicler's main thesis, that national prosperity depended upon, and national character was measured by, fidelity to the law of God, esp. as it centered upon the worship and services of Jeh's house. To do this it was necessary to trace the descent of the prominent characters, families, tribes. Hence the space given to Judah, Levi, Benjamin, the main line of fidelity, the survival of the fittest. The other purpose was to conserve purity of blood in the restored nation, to include all who were entitled and to exclude all who were not. We may also credit him with such regard for his material that he preserved it all (with certain comprehensible exceptions), even though extremely fragmentary here and there. His materials are of many degrees of age. It is thought by some that the antiquity is indicated by the last stage in the descent, the genealogy of Sheshan, e.g. ending with Hezekiah's time; Heman's and Asaph's (1 Ch 6 33) in David's. Name-study and historico-literary criticism seeks still other marks of relative age. The text has suffered much, as lists of names will, from scribal errors. Details of his method will be pointed out in the following analysis. As in this whole article, space forbids exhaustive treatment of the endless textual, critical, historical questions arising. A few illustrative cases only are given.

I. Primeval Genealogies (1 Ch 1 1-54).

To show Israel's place among the nations; follows Gen closely, omitting only the Cainites; boldly, skillfully compressed, as if the omitted facts were well known.

- (1) The ten antediluvian Patriarchs, and Noah's three sons (vs 1-4).

Follows Gen 4 5, giving only the names.

- (2) Japheth's descendants (vs 5-7) (Gen 10 2-4 unchanged).
- (3) The Hamites (vs 8-16) (Gen 10 6-8, 13-18a unchanged).
- (4) The Semites (vs 17-23) (Gen 10 22-29; only scribal changes).
- (5) Abram's descent (vs 24-27) (Gen 11 10-26 abridged, giving only the Patriarchs).
- (6) The sons of Abraham, Keturah, Isaac (vs 28-34).

Gen 25 1-4, 13-16, 25, 26; 32 28. Reverses the order of Ishmael's and Keturah's descendants.

- (7) Sons of Esau (vs 35-52) (Gen 36 4-10).
- (8) Kings and sheikhs of Edom (vs 43, 54) (Gen 36 31-43). Scribal changes.

II. Descendants of Jacob (1 Ch 2-9).

The tribes arranged chiefly geographically. Judah, as the royal line, is given 100 verses, Levi, as the priestly, 31 verses, Benjamin 50, the other ten 56. Dan and Zebulun neglected. His purpose practically confines him to the first three; and these were also the best preserved.

- (1) Sons of Israel.

Follows substantially the order in Gen 35. Dan is placed before Rachel's sons. 17 different orders of the tribes in Bible lists.

- (2) Genealogies of Judah (2 3-4 23).
 - (a) Descent of Jesse's sons from Judah (2 3-17).

Largely gleaned from the historical books. The sons of Zerach (vs 6-8) are not found elsewhere. Chelubal is Caleb. Only 7 sons of Jesse are mentioned. Abishai, Joab, Asahel are always designated by their mother's name, Zerulah.

- (b) Genealogy of Bezael (vs 18-20).

The artificer of the tabernacle, hence greatly interests the Chronicler.

- (c) Other descendants of Hezron (vs 21-24).
- (d) The Jerahmeelites (vs 25-41).

Concededly a very odd list of this important clan not found elsewhere. Sheshan (ver 35), who married his daughter to Jarha, an Egypt servant, illustrates the introduction of a foreigner into the nation and tribe.

- (e) The Calebites (vs 41-55).

Not elsewhere. The names are largely geographical. A subdivision of the Hezronites. Not Caleb the son of Jephunneh.

- (f) David's descendants (3 1-24).

Gives first the sons and their birthplaces, then the kings to Jeconiah and Zedekiah, then the Davidic line from Jeconiah to Zerubbabel, then the grandsons of Zerubbabel and the descendants of Shecaniah. Two other lists of David's sons (2 S 5 14-16; 1 Ch 14 4-17). Eliphelet and Nogah here are thought to have developed in transcription, with some other changes. Johanan's name (s. of Josiah) is given among the kings, though he never reigned. Zedekiah is called son (instead of brother) of Jehoiachin, perhaps a scribal error. "Jah" names extremely numerous. Names of Zerubbabel's sons are highly symbolic: Meshullam, "Recompensed"; Hananiah, "Jah is gracious"; Shelomith, "Peace"; Hashubah, "Consideration"; Ohel, "Tent," i.e. "Dwelling of Jah"; Berechiah, "Jah blesses"; Hasadiah, "Jah is kind"; Jushab-besed, "Loving-kindness returns"; characteristic of the Exile.

Vs 19-24, beginning with Zerubbabel's descendants, are obscure, and a battleground of criticism on account of their bearing on the date of Ch. There are three possible interpretations: (1) Following the Heb. Zerubbabel's descendants stop with Pelatiah and Jesaiiah, his grandsons. Then follow three unclassified sets of "sons." No connection is shown between Jesaiiah and these. Then follows Shecaniah's line with four generations. There are several other instances of unrelated names thus being thrown in. This gives two generations after Zerubbabel. (2) Still following the Heb., assume that Shecaniah after Obadiah is in Z.'s line. This gives six generations after Z. (3) Following LXX, Syr., Vulg. (but the two latter are of very small critical weight), read in ver 21, "Rephaiah his son, Arnan his son," etc.—a very possible change: eleven generations after Z. According to (3), Ch was written at least 253 years (allowing 23 years to a generation; more probable than 30 or 40) after Zerubbabel (515), hence after 262 BC; (2) makes it after 373; (1) makes it 459, during Ezra's life. The book's last recorded event is Cyrus' decree (538), which indicates the earliest date. The NT casts no light here, none of these names appearing in the genealogies in Mt or Lk. If LXX is correct, Kell suggests that it is a later insertion, a critical device too frequently used to nullify inconvenient facts. The passage itself justifies the statement that "there is no shadow of proof that the families enumerated in ver 21, latter part, were descendants of Hananiah the son of Zerubbabel." Against this, and the other indications, the admittedly faulty LXX furnishes an insufficient basis for so far-reaching a conclusion.

- (g) Fragmentary genealogies of families of Judah (4 1-23).

Contains (1) "sons" of Judah, four or five successive generations; (2) sons of Shobal and Hur; (3) sons of Chelub; (4) sons of Caleb, s. of Jephunneh; (5) son of Jehaleel; (6) sons of Ezra (of course, not the priest-scribe of the return); (7) sons of "Bethiah the daughter of Pharaoh whom Mered took"; (8) sons of Shimon; (9) sons of Ishi; (10) sons of Sheleah. It is hard to trace the law of association here; which fact has its bearing on the discussion under (f) above. Chelub may be another Caleb. Vs 9-11 give an interesting name-study, where Jabex by prayer transforms into prosperity the omen of his sorrowful name: "Because I bare him with sorrow," a characteristic note. Vs 21-23 speak of the linen-workers and potters. Similar, even identical, names have been found on pot-handles in Southern Pal.

- (3) Genealogy of Simeon (4 24-43).

- (a) Simeon's sons. Genealogy of Shimei. After Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15; Nu 26 12-14.

- (b) Dwelling-places of Simeon. After Josh 19 2-8.

- (c) Princes and conquests (vs 34-43).

Source unknown, but considered old. Gray, however, thinks the names of late formation. Meshobab, Jamlech, Joshah, Amaziah, Joel, Jehu, Josiblah, Seraiah, Asiel, Elloenal, Jaakobah, Jeshohalah, Asalah, Adiel, Jesimiel, Benalah, Ziza, Shiphi, Allon, Jedalah, Shimri, Shemalah, Ishi, Pelatiah, Neariah, Rephaiah, Uzziel; many undoubtedly old ones; 11 in ydh, 5 in sh. Elloenal sounds post-exilic. The section mentions several exploits of Simeon.

- (4) East-Jordanic tribes (5 1-24).

As in Simeon above, the usual order, deviated from in instances, is (1) Introductory: Sons and immediate descendants; (2) Territory; (3) Princes or Chiefs; (4) Incidents.

- (a) Reuben (vs 1-10).

Partly follows Gen, Nu; but only as to first generation. Very fragmentary and connections obscure.

- (b) Gad (vs 11-17).

First generation omitted. Chronicler draws from genealogies "in the days of" Jotham and Jeroboam.

- (c) Half-Manasseh (vs 23, 24).

The whole tribe is treated of (7 14 ff). Here only the seats and heads of houses.

(5) Levi (6 1-81).

Illustrates more fully the Chronicler's attitude and methods.

(a) High priests from Levi to Jehozadak (the Exile) (vs 1-15).

(a) Levi's sons: Gerahon, Kohath, Merari (Gen 46 11; Ex 6 16).

(b) Kohath's sons: Amram, Ishar, Hebron, Uzziel (Ex 6 18).

(c) Amram's "sons": Aaron, Moses, Miriam (Ex 6 20.23 [except Miriam]; Nu 26 59 f).

(d) High priests from Eleazar. Also (partly) Ezra (7 1-5):

- | | |
|--------------|---------------|
| 1. Eleazar | 12. Azariah |
| 2. Phinehas | 13. Johanan |
| 3. Abishua | 14. Azariah |
| 4. Bukki | 15. Amariah |
| 5. Uzai | 16. Ahitub |
| 6. Zerachiah | 17. Zadok |
| 7. Merathoth | 18. Shallum |
| 8. Amariah | 19. Hilkiah |
| 9. Ahitub | 20. Azariah |
| 10. Zadok | 21. Seraiah |
| 11. Ahimaas | 22. Jehozadak |

Noteworthy omissions: Eli's house, Eli, Phinehas, Ahitub, Ahimelech, Abiathar, because set aside for Zadok's in Solomon's time; Bukki to Zadok being their contemporaries; but the list also omits Amariah in the reign of Jehoshaphat (perhaps), Jehoiaha, Josiah's "power behind the throne," Urijah in Ahas' day, Azariah in Heskiah's. It has been thought that this was done in the interests of a chronological scheme of the Chronicler, making 23 generations of 40 years from the Exodus to the Captivity, or 920 years. The Heb generation, however, was as likely to be 30 as 40 years, and as a matter of fact was nearer 20. The apparent number of generations from Aaron to the Captivity, adding the data from the historical books, is 29, making a generation about 24 years. The reasons for the omission here, as for many others, are not apparent. Outside of Ch and Ezr we know nothing of Abishua, Bukki, Uzai, Zerachiah, Merathoth, the first Amariah, Johanan, Amariah, Ahitub, Zadok 2, Shallum, Azariah 3. The list touches historical notices in Aaron, Eleazar, Phinehas, Zadok, Ahimaas, Azariah 2, contemporary of Solomon, perhaps Amariah, contemporary of Jehoshaphat, Azariah, contemporary of Uziah, Hilkiah, contemporary of Josiah, Seraiah slain by the Chaldeans, and Jehozadak. The recurrence of similar names in close succession is characteristically Jewish (but compare names of popes and kings). It is seen in the list beginning with Jehozadak: Joshua, Joiakim, Eliaahab, Joiada, Jonathan, Jaddua, Onias, Simon, Eleazar, Manasseh, Onias, Simon, Onias, Joshua. Also about Christ's time: Eleazar, Jesus, Annas, Ismael, Eleazar, Simon, Joseph, Jonathan, Theophilus, Simon, although these latter do not succeed in a genealogical line.

(b) The three Levitical clans (vs 16-19). After Ex 6 17-19; Nu 3 17-20.

(c) Lineal descendants of Gershom: seven, vs 20.21; thirteen, vs 39-43. See also 1 Ch 23 7.

The two lists (vs 20.21 and vs 39-43) are clearly the same:

- | | |
|-----------|-----------|
| Gershom | Gershom |
| Libni | Jahath |
| Zimnah | Zimnah |
| Joah | Ethan |
| Iddo | Adalah |
| Zerah | Zerah |
| Jeatherai | Ethni |
| | Malchiah |
| | Baaseiah |
| | Michael |
| | Shimea |
| | Berechiah |
| | Asaph |

Jahath, Zimnah, Zerah are in both. By slight changes Joah, יְהוֹאֵל, is Ethan, יְתָנִי; Iddo, יִדְדוֹ, is יִדְדִי. Adalah: Jeatherai. יְתָנִי, is Ethni. יְתָנִי. Shimea may have dropped from one and Libni from the other. Jahath and Shimea have been transposed. In 1 Ch 23 7 Libni is Ladan.

(d) Pedigrees of Samuel (vs 27.28; 33-35). See also 1 S 1 1; 2.

We have three pedigrees of Samuel, all suffering in transcription:

born son to Jeh, beyond recall or redemption, and to seal his consecration by the significant symbol of the unshorn head, is not hard to imagine in either a Levite or an Ephraimite, and equally "unnecessary" in either case. Heman, ending the pedigree (2), was David's contemporary.

(e) Pedigree of Asaiah the Merarite (1 Ch 6 29.30).

Merari: Mahli; Libni; Shimea; Uzah; Shimea; Haggliah; Asaiah. Hard to adjust or place. Libni and Shimea are elsewhere Gershonites, but the same name is frequently found in different tribes or clans. Information below Mahli is entirely wanting.

(f) Descent of David's three singers, Heman, Asaph, Ethan (vs 33-47).

(a) Heman has been given under (d); 20 links.

(b) Asaph: Gershom: Jahath: Shimea: Zimnah: Ethan: Adah: Zerah: Ethni (Jeatherai): Malchiah: Baaseiah: Michael: Shimea: Berechiah: Asaph; 15 links.

(c) Ethan: Merari: Muhi: Mahli: Shemer: Bani: Anzi: Hilkiah: Amasiah: Haahabiah: Malluch: Abdi: Kishi: Ethan; 12 links.

Hardly anywhere is the Chronicler's good faith more questioned than in these lists. Finding in his day the three guilds of singers claiming descent from David's three, and through these from Levi, he fits them out with pedigrees, borrowing names from vs 16-20, and filling out with his favorite names, or those of his own invention, or from current lists. To make Asaph contemporary with David, he adds Malchiah, Maaseiah, Michael, Shimea, Berechiah. He helps out Ethan with Bani, Anzi, Hilkiah, Amasiah, Haahabiah, Malluch, Abdi, Kishi. The names added are very frequent in Ch and Ezr, not frequent in older writings. Aside from the general objection to this thoroughgoing discredit of Ch, and the theory of religious development in Israel on which it is based, it may be said: (1) The Chronicler's failure to give his three families nearly the same number of links is suspicious, but if he took an old list, as it came to him, it is natural. (2) The fact that these added names occur many more times in Ch, Ezr, Neh indicates simply that Levitical names occur frequently in a writer and among a people whose interests are Levitical. No one would look among the Roundheads for either classical or aristocratic names. (3) In no tribe would such names be more likely to recur, naturally or purposely, than in the Levitical. (4) The Chronicler has inserted among his new names 6 in yâh and only 1 in 'el, and that far down the list. (5) Of the "added" names Malchijah occurs in Jer 21 1; Masselah, in 29 21.25; 35 4, in every case priestly or Levitical. Michael occurs in Nu 13 13. Berechiah is the name of the prophet Zechariah's father. Hilkiah is the name of Joshua's high priest. Amaziah reigned 800 BC. Bani is mentioned in 2 S 23 36 (though this is thought to be copied from Ch); Shimea is conceded early. Of the 13 "added names" 8 are found elsewhere. Of the others, Amzi, Abdi, Kishi (Kish, Kushalah) have an early look. Malluch might be late. If Hashabiah is late the author has scattered it well through the history, 1 several generations before David, 3 in David's time, 1 in Josiah's, 1 in Ezra's, 3 in Nehemiah's, in every case a Levite. (7) While these "added" names occur more times in Ch, Ezr, Neh, than elsewhere, and 5 of the 13 occur nowhere else, it is also true that more than 500 other names also occur only in these three books, and that the total names in these, to say nothing of the "P" portions elsewhere, outnumber the names in the other books about three to one. Other things being equal, three mentions of any common name ought to be found in these books to one in the others. Of all names applied to more than four persons the usual proportion in these books by count is four, to one elsewhere.

(g) Pedigree of Ahimaaz (vs 50-53).

Parallel with 6 4-8.

(h) Dwelling-places of Levi.

(6) The six remaining tribes.

(a) Issachar (7 1-5).

Ver 1 derived from Gen 46 13; Nu 26 23.24. The rest peculiar to Ch. Closes with a record of fighting men, instead of the usual statement of dwelling-places.

(b) Benjamin (7 6-13).

A very difficult section. It is considered a Zebulonite genealogy which has been Benjaminized, because (1) there is a Benjaminite list elsewhere; (2) Benjamin is out of place here, while in 13 out of 17 tribal lists Zebulun comes at this point, and in this list has no other place; (3) the numbers of Benjamin's sons differ from other Benjaminite genealogies; (4) the names of Bela's and Becher's sons are different here; (5) many names are not Benjaminite; (6) Tarshish, in this list, is a sea-coast name appropriate to Zebulun, but not Benjamin. But (1) it is called Benjaminite; (2) doublets are not unknown in Ch; (3) Dan is also neglected; (4) many Benjaminite names are found; (5) both the Zebulonite material and the Benjaminite material elsewhere is too scanty for safe conclusions.

(c) Dan, ver 12, from Gen 46 23.

Aher ("another") is a copyist's error or substitute for Dan.

(d) Naphtali, ver 13, from Gen 46 24 (transcriptional changes).

(e) Manasseh, E. and W. (vs 14-19).

The text of vs 14.15 very corrupt. No other notice is found of the sons in vs 16.17: Peresh, Sheresh, Uliam, Rakem, Bedan.

(f) Ephraim to Joshua (vs 20-29).

Contains an interesting personal note in the mourning of Ephraim over his sons Ezer and Elead, and the subsequent birth of Beriah. Interpreted to mean that the clans Ezer and Elead met with disaster, on which the clan Beriah became prominent.

(g) The seats of Joseph's sons (vs 28.29).

Hard to say why this has been placed here.

(h) Asher (vs 30-40).

The earliest names derived from Gen 46 17. Gray considers the others ancient.

(i) Benjamin (8 1-40).

- (a) Sons of Benjamin. After Gen 46 21, with variations. See (6) (b).
- (β) Descendants of Ehud (vs 6-28). Text very corrupt, obscure.

(γ) The house of Saul (vs 29-38); repeated (9 35-44).

In this passage two exceptions to the usual treatment of Baal compounds. Ishbaal and Meribbaal here are Ishbosheth and Mephibosheth in S.

(7) The inhabitants of Jerusalem (9 1-34).

With variations in Neh 11 1-13. This passage has been thought an interpolation, but it is the Chronicler's custom to give dwelling-places. Perhaps this and Neh are two independent abridgments of the same document. This probably describes post-exilic conditions. Vs 1 and 2 here, and Neh 11 seem conclusive on this point. Four classes of returning exiles:

(a) The children of Judah, Benjamin, Ephraim, Manasseh.

Constituting "the laity," "Israel."

(b) The priests.

Agreeing with Neh, but abridged.

(c) The Levites. Paralleling Neh, but not exactly.

(d) Nethinim or porters. Fuller than Neh, and different.

(8) The house of Saul (9 35-44, repeating 8 29-38).

(22) David's knights (1 Ch 11 10-47).

Discussed under (19). Adds to the list, Adina, s. of Shiza, Reubenite; Hanan, s. of Maacah, Joshaphat the Mithnite, Uziah the Ashterathite, Shama and Jelei the sons of Hotham the Aoerite, Jediel the son of Shimri, and Joah his brother, the Tizite, Eilei the Mahavite, and Jeribai and Joshaviah, the sons of Elnaam, and Ithmah the Moabite, Eilei, and Obed, and Jaasiah the Mezo-baite.

(23) David's recruits at Ziklag (1 Ch 12-22).

Found only here. Contains 23 names from Benjamin (some may be Judahite); 11 from Gad; 8 from Manasseh; nothing to show that the names are not old.

(24) David's musicians and porters at the bringing of the ark (1 Ch 15 16-24).

Also 16 5.6.37-43. Each division of the Levites represented by a chief musician.

(25) David's organization of the kingdom (1 Ch 23-27).

I. The Levites (ch 23).

- (1) The family of Gershon (vs 7-11); 9 houses.
- (2) The family of Kohath (vs 12-20); 11 houses.
- (3) The family of Merari (vs 21-23); 4 houses.

II. The priests (ch 24).

24 divisions; 16 divided among descendants of Eleazar, headed by Zadok; 8 among those of Ithamar, headed by Ahimelech (perhaps an error for Abiathar); but perhaps Ahimelech's. Abiathar, s. of Ahimelech, was acting for his father.

- (1) Eleazar's courses: Jehoiarib, Harim, Malchijah, Hakkoz, Joshua, Eliashib, Hupah, Bilgah, Hezer, Aphses, Pethahiah, Jehezkel, Jachin, Gamul, Delaiah, Maaziah.
- (2) Ithamar: Jedaiah, Seorim, Mijamin, Abijah, Shecaniah, Jachim, Joshebeab, Immer.

Jos gives the same names of courses (Ant. VII, xiv, 7; Vita, 1). Several are mentioned in Apoc. Talm. and the NT. Jehoiarib, Jedaiah, Harim, Malchijah, Mijamin, Abijah, Shecaniah, Bilgah, Maaziah, are found in one or both of Nehemiah's lists.

(3) Supplementary list of Levites (1 Ch 24 20-31).

Repeats the Levitical families in 1 Ch 23 6-23, omitting the Gershonites, adding to the Kohathites and Merarites.

III. The singers (1 Ch 25).

- (1) Their families, classified under the three great groups, descendants of Asaph, Jeduthun (Ethan), Heman.

A curious problem is suggested by the fact that the names in ver 4, beginning with Hanani, with a few very slight changes, read: "Hanani ('Have mercy'); -lah ('O Jehovah'); Hanani ('Have mercy'); Eli-athah ('Thou art my God'); Giddai ('I have magnified') (and) Remamti ('exalted') (thy) Ezer ('help'); Josh-bekashah ('In the seat of hardness'); Mallothi ('I spake of it'); Hothir ('Gave still'); Mahazioth ('Visions'); How, or why, this came among these names, cannot be said.

- (2) The 24 courses of 12 singers each, of which courses nos. 1, 3, 5, 7 fell to Asaph; nos. 2, 4, 8, 10, 12, 14 fell to Jeduthun; nos. 6, 9, 11, 13, 15-24 fell to Heman.

IV. Gatekeepers and other officers (1 Ch 26).

- (1) Genealogies and stations of the gatekeepers (vs 1-19).
- (2) Those in charge of the temple treasury (vs 20-28).
- (3) Those in charge of the "outward business."

Subordinate magistrates, tax-collectors, etc.

V. The army, and David's officers (1 Ch 27).

- (1) The army (vs 1-15).

12 officers, each commanding 24,000 men, and in charge for one month; chosen from David's knights.

- (2) The tribal princes (vs 16-24).

After the fashion of Nu 1 2-15. Gad and Asher are omitted. The 12 are made up by including the Levites and the Aaronites.

- (3) The king's twelve stewards (vs 25-31).
- (4) The king's court officers (vs 32-34).

Counselor and scribe: Jonathan, the king's uncle, otherwise unknown; tutor: Jehiel; counselor: Ahithophel; "the king's friend" (closest confidant?): Hushai. Possibly two priests are next included: Jehoiada the son of Benaiah, and Abiathar, high priest of the Ithamar branch. But perhaps it should read, "Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada." If two priests are intended, it seems strange that Zadok is not one. The list ends with the commander-in-chief, Joab.

This elaborate organization in every part and branch of the kingdom is looked upon as the Chronicler's glowing Utopian dream of what must have been, underrating the organizing power of the great soldier and statesman.

(28) Ezr 2 1-63. The exiles who returned with Zerubbabel.

Paralleled in Neh 7 6-73. 9 "Jah," 4 "El" names in 107.

- (1) The leaders (ver 2).
- (2) Numbers, according to families (vs 3-19).

18 of Ezra's numbers differ from Nehemiah's.

- (3) Numbers according to localities (vs 20-35).

10 towns probably Judahite, 7 Benjamite.

- (4) The priests (vs 39-42).

Only 4 families, representing 3 Davidic courses.

- (5) The Levites (vs 43-44).

Among the singers, only Asaphites.

- (6) The porters (ver 45).

3 old names, 3 new ones.

- (7) The "Nethinim" (temple-slaves) (vs 46-56).
- (8) The children of Solomon's servants (slaves) (vs 57-59).
- (9) Those who could not prove their descent.

(a) General population.

Three families, children of Delalah, Tobiah, Nekoda.

(b) Priestly families.

Hobaiah, Hakkoz, Barzillai. Hakkoz, the seventh of the Davidic courses, perhaps succeeded later in establishing their right (Neh 3 21).

(27) Ezr 6 1-5. Ezra's genealogy.

An ascending genealogy: Ezra, s. of Seraiah, s. of Azariah, s. of Hilkiah, s. of Shallum, s. of Zadok, s. of Ahitub, s. of Amariah, s. of Azariah, s. of Meraioth, s. of Zerahiah, s. of Uzzi, s. of Bukki, s. of Abishua, s. of Phinehas, s. of Eleazar, s. of Aaron; 16 links. Follows 1 Ch 6 7-10 down to Zadok, then omits 7 to Shallum, besides the 7 omitted in Ch.

(28) Ezr 8 1-20. Numbers and leaders of those who returned with Zerubbabel.

Numbers much smaller than in Zerubbabel's list (Ezr 2 1-14). Perhaps 3 new families, Shecaniah, Shelomith, Joab; 7 more leaders. A much smaller proportion of Levites; among them a "man of discretion," perhaps a name, "Iahsecel," of the sons of Mahil, therefore a Merarite, with other Merarites, 39 in all.

(29) Ezr 10 18-44. Jews who had married foreign women.

- (1) The priests (vs 18-22).

17 in all; members of the high priest's family, and of the Davidic courses of Immer and Harim, besides the family of Pashhur.

- (2) The Levites (ver 23); 6 in all.
- (3) Singers and porters (ver 24); 4 in all.
- (4) "Israel," "the laity" (vs 25-43).

16 families represented; 86 persons. Out of a total of 163 names, 39 vdh compounds, 19 al compounds, 8 prefixed.

(30) Neh 3 1-12. The leaders in the repair of the wall.

38 leaders; in 30 instances the father's name also given. As far as mentioned, all from Judah and Jerus.

(31) Neh 7 7-63. Those who returned with Zerubbabel.

Follows Ezr 2 1-63, with transcriptional variations in names and numbers.

(32) Neh 8 4-7. Levites and others who assisted Ezra in proclaiming the law.

(33) Neh 10 1-27. The sealers of the Covenant.

22 priests, 17 Levites, 20 heads of families already mentioned, 24 individuals.

(34) Neh 11 3-36. Chief dwellers in Jerusalem and vicinity.

Parallels in 1 Ch 9 9-22. Some omissions and variations; 5 priestly courses given, Jolarib, course no. 1; Jedalah, no. 2; Jachin, no. 23; Malchijah, no. 5; Immer, no. 6. 24 "Jah," 6 "El" names out of 82.

(35) Neh 12 1-8. Priests and Levites who went up with Zerubbabel.

Compare with priests' lists in Neh 10 2-8 (33), and with priests under Joiakim (Neh 12 21-22 [36]). They are names of families. See Neh 12 12.

(36) Neh 12 10-11. High priests from Jeshua to Jaddua.

- (1) Jeshua, 538 to 520 BC.
- (2) Joiakim.
- (3) Eliashib, 446 till after 433.
- (4) Joiada, about 420.
- (5) Jonathan, Johanan, 405 to 362.
- (6) Jaddua, to 323.

This list bears upon the date of Ezr-Neh. Jaddua was high priest when Alexander visited Jerus, 335 BC. If the Darius of ver 22 is Darius Nothus (425 to 405 BC), and Jaddua, a young boy, is mentioned as the heir to the high-priesthood, this passage was written before 400. If Jaddua's actual high-priesthood is meant, and Darius Codomannus (336 to 330 BC) is the Darius here, the date may be about 330. The enumeration of families here is assigned to the time of Joiakim, before 405, and the latest recorded events to the time of the high priest before Jaddua (Neh 12 23; 13 28), hence before 362. The hypothesis of an addition by some scribe after 350 is possible, but not necessary.

(37) Neh 12 12-21. Heads of priestly families.

(38) Neh 12 22-26. Levites and porters under high priest Johanan.

(39) Neh 12 31-42. Princes and priests at dedication of the wall.

(40) Mt 1 1-17. The genealogy of Jesus Christ (see separate article).

(41) Lk 3 23-38. The genealogy of Jesus (see separate article).

LITERATURE

I. Introduction.—The genealogy of Jesus as contained in the First and Third Gospels presents three special problems which lie somewhat apart from general questions of NT criticism: (1) the construction and purpose of each list taken separately; (2) the relation of the two lists, in their coincidences and variations, to each other; (3) the relationship of both lists to the statement concerning the virgin birth of Our Lord with which they are directly connected. These questions necessarily involve the conclusion to be arrived at concerning the trustworthiness of the list of names as forming an actual historical connection between Jesus and His ancestors according to the flesh.

Before these problems are dealt with, it would be well to consider the kind and degree of importance to be attached to the question at issue.

2. The Nature and Importance of the Issue As we see it, the only vital point at stake is the balance, sanity and good judgment of the evangelists.

(1) That Jesus had a line of ancestors by His human birth may be taken for granted. The tradition, universal from the earliest times among believers and granted even by the bitterest opponents, that He was connected with the line of David, may also readily be accepted. The exact line through which that connection is traced is, on general principles, of secondary importance. The fact is that, while natural sonship to David on the part of the Messiah was of vital importance to many Jewish inquirers, it failed of any very enthusiastic endorsement on the part of Jesus Himself (see the truly remarkable interview recorded in Mk 12 35-37). The expressions of Paul in this connection will be referred to later; at this point it is sufficient to say that physical kinship to David cannot be insisted upon as the only justification for his words.

(2) If, then, the purpose of the evangelists in having recourse to these lists is worth while, the question of their correctness need not even be raised. Unless some vital issue is involved, the supposition of a special inspiration to go behind lists currently accepted is gratuitous. No such issue seems to be presented here. The Davidic kinship of Jesus, in any sense essential to His Messiahship, is independent of the lists which are used to justify it. This is preliminary to the actual discussion and need not prevent us from giving all due credit to lists which could not have been carelessly compiled nor lightly used.

II. The Genealogies Separately.—(1) The construction and incorporation of Joseph's genealogical tree is, in the light of all the facts,

1. Peculiarities of Mt's Genealogy—the primary consideration.

(2) The artificial division into three groups of fourteen generations each. The apparent defect in this arrangement as it actually stands (the third group lacks one member) is probably traceable to a defect of the LXX version of 1 Ch 3 11, which is reproduced in the Gr gospel (see Zahn, Intro to the NT, ET, 564, n. 4). This arrangement into groups is the more striking because it makes 14 generations from the captivity to Joseph, where Lk makes 20 or 21, and because the first group of 14 is formed by the omission of three names. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that this artificial grouping is essential to the purpose of the evangelist.

(3) The insertion of the names of brothers, thus following the historical lists and broadening the genealogy by including collateral lines.

(4) The insertion of the names of women—a practice not only foreign but abhorrent to ordinary usage. This peculiarity is the more marked when we notice that these names introduce what would be considered serious blots in the family history of the Davidic house (see vs 5.7).

(5) The principle upon which the division into periods is constructed: (a) from Abraham to David, (b) from David to the Captivity, (c) from the Captivity to Jesus. Attention has repeatedly been called to the fact that this gives a definite historical movement to the genealogy. It involves the origin, the rise to power, the decay and downfall of the house of David (see Allen, ICC, "Matthew," 2; cf Zahn, NT, ET, I, 535).

Of the many theories which have been constructed to explain the foregoing six peculiarities of the genealogy of Mt, altogether the most satisfactory is that of Professor Zahn.

2. Explanation of the Foregoing His contention is that the list was framed not to prove the natural connection of Jesus with the house of David—a fact which no one doubted—but to defend the one vital point where attack had been made, namely, the legitimacy of Jesus' connection with David. No one seems to have questioned that Jesus was born of Mary and was closely connected with the royal house. The question was whether He was of legitimate birth. It was charged—and the slander which was very early in origin and circumstantial in character obtained an extraordinary hold upon the hostile Jewish mind—that Jesus was the illegitimate offspring of Mary. The Gospel of Mt meets that slander by giving a bird's-eye view of the movement of the history from Abraham to the Messiah in the form of a genealogy of Joseph, who in the light of all the facts concerning the origin of Jesus marries Mary and gives her the protection of his stainless name and royal lineage. The extraordinary boldness and brilliancy of this apologetic method ought not to be overlooked. The formal charge that Jesus is son of Mary, not of Joseph, is admitted—the slander involved is refuted by bringing Joseph forward as a witness for Mary. Nothing could have been more natural for a man fearless in the confidence of truth; nothing could have been more impossible for one insecure in his hold upon the facts. So far as the genealogy is concerned, just the moment we realize that the purpose is not to prove the natural sonship of Jesus to David, but to epitomize the history, all hesitancy and apprehension concerning the historicity of the successive names disappear. The continuity of blood relationship through these successive generations becomes of no essential importance. Zahn's explanation (the argument in full should be read by every student), simple in itself, explains all the facts, as a key fits a complicated lock. It explains the choice of a genealogy as a method of epitomizing history and that genealogy Joseph's, the artificial grouping at the expense of changing the traditional lists, the inclusion of the names of brothers and of women.

(1) The choice of Joseph's genealogical tree on the part of one who is so deeply interested in Mary.

(2) The reversal of order in going back from Joseph to his ancestors. 3. Peculiar—back from Joseph to his ancestors. Ities of Lk's Godet emphasizes the fact that, in the Genealogy nature of the case, a genealogy follows the order of succession, each new individual being added to the roll of his family. Luke's method indicates that his genealogy has been constructed for a special purpose.

(3) The carrying of the line back of the history of the covenant, which begins with Abraham, to Adam, who represents the race in general. This fact, together with another, that the line of Joseph is traced to David through Nathan who was not David's heir, proves that Luke was not concerned with establishing the Davidic standing of Jesus.

(4) The placing of the genealogy, not at the beginning of the Gospel, but at the beginning of the ministry, between the baptism and the temptation.

(5) The omission of the article before the name of Joseph.

(1) In his comment upon the fourth peculiarity enumerated above, namely, the placing of the genealogy at the beginning of the ministry,

4. Explana- Godet (Gospel of St. Luke, Am. ed. tion of the 126) has this to say: "In crossing the Foregoing threshold of this new era, the sacred historian casts a general glance over the period which thus reaches its close, and sums it up in this document, which might be called the mortuary register of the earlier humanity." In other words, in connecting the genealogy directly with the ministry, Luke exhibits the fact that his interest in it is historical rather than antiquarian or, so to say, genealogical. As Matthew summarizes the history of the covenant people from the days of Abraham by means of the genealogical register, modified so as to make it graphic by its uniformity, so Luke has written the story of the humanity Jesus, as the Second Adam, came to save, by the register of names summarizing its entire course in the world.

It has recently been commented upon that genealogical lists such as those of Gen and the NT are not infrequently used to convey ideas not strictly germane to the matter of descent or the cognate notion of chronology. For example, the statements as to the longevity of the patriarchs are of historical interest only—they are not and could never have been of value for chronological purposes (see Warfield, "Antiquity and Unity of Human Race," Princeton Review, February, 1911).

(2) In commenting upon the order which Luke adopts, Godet (who has thrown more light upon this portion of the Gospel than anyone else) says: "The ascending form of genealogy can only be that of a private instrument, drawn up from the public document with a view to the particular individual whose name serves as the starting-point of the whole list" (127).

(3) From the fact that the name of Joseph is introduced without an article Godet draws three conclusions: (a) that this name belongs rather to the sentence introduced by Lk; (b) that the genealogical document which he consulted began with the name of Heli; (c) and consequently, that this piece was not originally the genealogy of Jesus or of Joseph, but of Heli (ib, 128).

(4) (a) The importance of these considerations is twofold. In the first place it indicates that Luke is bringing together two separate documents, one of which contained a statement of the foster-fatherhood of Joseph, while the other contained the genealogy of Heli, between whom and Joseph there existed a relationship which made Luke desirous of connecting them. (b) In addition, the absence of the article serves to call attention to something exceptional in the relationship of Joseph to the rest of this ancestral line which is brought into connection with his name. To this point we shall recur later. We have an explanation for all the suggested problems except one, and that one, in a sense, the most difficult of all, namely, the choice of Joseph's genealogy.

III. The Genealogies Compared.—In order, however, to discuss this question intelligently, we must enter upon the second stage of our inquiry—as to the relationship between the two lists.

(1) The most notable fact here is of course the wideness of the divergence together with the contrasted and unintelligible fact of minute correspondence. Between Abraham and David the two lists agree. Between David and Joseph there is evident correspondence in two (see Mt 1 12; Lk 3 27), and possible correspondence in four names (that is, if Abiud [Mt 1 13] and Judah [Lk 3 30] are the same). This initial and greatest difficulty is of material assistance to us because it makes one conclusion certain beyond peradventure. The two lists are not divergent attempts to perform the same task. Whatever difficulties may remain, this difficulty is eliminated at the outset. It is impossible that among a people given to genealogies two lists purporting to give the ancestry of a man in the same line could diverge so widely. There is, therefore, a difference between these lists which includes the purpose for which they were compiled and the meaning which they were intended to convey.

(2) Two of the most striking points in the lists as they stand may be brought into connection and made to explain each other. The two

2. Corre- lists coincide in the names of Zerub- spondence babel and Shealtiel—they differ as to the name of Joseph's father, who is Jacob according to Mt and Heli according to Lk. As to the second of these two important items this much is clear. Either these two lists are in violent contradiction, or else Joseph was in some sense son of both Jacob and Heli. Now, in connection with this seeming impossibility, turn to the other item. The names of Shealtiel and Zerubbabel belong to the captivity. Their being common to both lists is easily explained by the fact that during that troubled period a number of collateral family branches might be narrowed down to one or two common representatives (see Zahn, op. cit., 535). In the NT genealogies Zerubbabel is the son of Shealtiel—according to 1 Ch 3 19 he is the nephew of Shealtiel and the son of Pedaiab. He is, therefore, at one and the same time heir and, legally, son of two men and would appear as such on two collateral lists.

Shealtiel himself appears in Mt (1 12) as the son of Jechoniah and in Lk (3 27) as the son of Nerl. In 1 Ch 3 17 he appears as son of Jechoniah. The name of Nerl is peculiar to Lk, so that we cannot check his use of it and discover the actual parentage of Shealtiel. His appearance in two lists with a double reference of parentage is not surprising in view of what we have already seen. Besides this, a reasonable explanation at once appears. In Jer 36 30 it is asserted that Jehoiakim should have "none to sit upon the throne of David," and of his son (Jehoiachin, Jechoniah, Coniah) it is said (Jer 22 30), "Write ye this man childless," etc. It has been rightly pointed out (see HDB, II, 557) that this means simply legal proscription, not actual childlessness. It suggests, however, that it might be thought necessary to provide in the genealogy an heir not of their blood for the two disgraced and proscribed members of the royal house. In view of these facts the contradictory references as to Joseph's parentage present no difficulty.

Joseph may easily have been and undoubtedly was, legally, son and heir of both Jacob and Heli. Godet's objection to this is based upon the supposition that Heli and Jacob were brothers, which leaves the divergence beyond these two names unexplained. It is evident, however, that the kinship between Jacob and Heli might have been more distant than this supposition calls for.

(3) When we come to explain how it happened that Joseph was connected with both these lines and that Mt chose one list and Lk the other we are necessarily shut up to conjecture. There is one supposition, however, which is worthy of very careful consideration because it solves so many and such difficult problems. The authorities have been divided as to whether Lk's genealogy is Joseph's, as appears, or Mary's. Godet makes a strong showing for the latter, and, after all has been said per contra, some of his representations remain unshaken (cf Godet and Plummer sub loc.). Most of the difficulties are removed at one stroke, and the known facts harmonized, by the simple supposition that Lk has given us the meeting-point of the lineage both of Joseph and Mary who are akin. This explains the apparent choice of Joseph's list; the peculiar position of his name in that list; the reversal of the order; the coincidences and discrepancies with reference to Mt's; the early tradition of Mary's Davidic origin; the strange reference in the Talm (Haghighah 77 4) to Mary as the daughter of Heli; the visit of Mary with Joseph to Bethlehem at the time of the registration; the traditional discrepancy of ages between Joseph and Mary, such that (apparently) Joseph disappears from the scene before Jesus reaches maturity. Against this nothing of real weight can be urged (the kinship with Elisabeth is not such: see Edersheim, LTJM, I, 149) except that it is too simple and too felicitous. Its simplicity and felicitous adjustment to the whole complex situation is precisely its recommendation. And there we may let the matter rest.

IV. The Genealogies and the Virgin Birth.—We have now to deal with the relationship of the genealogies to the virgin-birth statement which forms the vital center of the infancy narratives and to the general question of the Davidic origin of Jesus. See VIRGIN BIRTH.

The first part of this question may be most directly approached by a brief consideration of the text of Mt 1 16. The text upon

1. Text of which RV is based reads: "And Jacob Mt 1:16 begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ." Beside this there are two readings, one contained in the so-called Ferrar group of MSS, and the other in the Sinaitic which, differing among themselves, unite in ascribing the parentage of Jesus to Joseph. This has been seized upon by negative critics (see for list and discussion Machen, Princeton Review, January, 1906, 63; cf Bacon, HDB, art. "Genealogy of Jesus Christ," Am. Jour. Theol., January, 1911, who long ago gave in his advocacy to the supposition that the evangelists could easily reconcile the supernatural birth with the actual paternity of Joseph) to support the idea of a primitive Christian tradition that Joseph was the father of Jesus. Of this contention Zahn leaves nothing, and concludes his argument with this statement: "The hope of finding indications in old MSS and VSS that the authors of lost Gospels or brief writings which may have been worked over in our Mt and Lk regarded Joseph as the physical father of Jesus, should at last be dismissed. An author who knew how to make even the dry material of a genealogy to its least detail contribute to the purpose of his thought concerning the slandered miracle of the Messiah's birth, cannot at the same time have taken over statements from a genealogy of Joseph or Jesus used by him which directly contradicted his conception of this fact. Any text of Mt which contained such statements would be condemned in advance as one altered against the author's interest" (op. cit., 567). It is interesting to note that Allen (ICC, "Matthew," 8), starting from the extreme position that the Sinaitic form of statement, of all extant texts, most nearly represents the original, reaches the same conclusion as Zahn, that Matthew's Gospel from the beginning taught the virgin birth.

(1) It is clear, therefore, from the general trend as well as from specific statements of both Gospels, that the genealogies and the birth-

2. General narratives were not floating traditions. Conclusions which accidentally touched and coalesced in mid-stream, but that they were intended to weld inseparably the two beliefs that Jesus was miraculously conceived and that He was the heir of David. This could be done only on the basis of Joseph's genealogy, for whatever the lineage of Mary, Joseph was the head of the family, and the Davidic connection of Jesus could only be established by acknowledgment of Him as legal son by Joseph. Upon this basis rests the common belief of the apostolic age (see Zahn, ib., 567, note references), and in accordance with it all statements (such as those of Paul, Rom 1 3; 2 Tim 2 8) must be interpreted.

(2) For it must be remembered that, back of the problem of reconciling the virgin birth and the Davidic origin of Jesus, lay the far deeper problem—to harmonize the incarnation and the Davidic origin. This problem had been presented in shadow and intimation by Jesus Himself in the question: "David himself calleth him Lord; and whence is he his Son?" It is further to be noticed that in the annunciation (Lk 1 32) the promised One is called at once Son of God and Son of David, and that He is the Son of God by virtue of His conception by the Spirit—leaving it evident that He is Son of David by virtue of His birth of Mary. With this should be compared the statement of Paul (Rom 1 3 4): He who was God's Son was "born of the seed of David according to the flesh, and declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead." This is at least most suggestive (see Orr, Virgin Birth of Christ, 119, with note, p. 121), for it indicates that as Paul and Luke were in very close sympathy as to the person of Our Lord, so they are in equally close sympathy as to the mystery of His origin. The unanimity of conviction on the part of the early church as to the Davidic origin of Jesus is closely paralleled by its equally firm conviction as to His supernatural derivation. The meeting-point of these two beliefs and the resolution of the mystery of their relationship is in the genealogies in which two widely diverging lines of human ancestry, representing the whole process of history, converge at the point where the new creation from heaven is introduced.

LITERATURE.—The lit. on this subject is very copious. The works referred to in the text will serve to introduce the reader to more extensive investigations. The whole situation is well summarized by Plummer (ICC, "Luke," sub loc.).

LOUIS MATTHEWS SWEET

GENERAL, jen'ér-al, GENERALLY, jen'ér-al-i (קָלָה, kullāh; πανήγυρις, panēguris):

(1) General is the tr of sar, "master," "head," "chief"; used once in AV in the sense of commander-in-chief, "the general of the king's army" (1 Ch 27 34), usually in this connection tr^d "captain," RV "the captain of the king's host."

(2) As an adj. "general assembly" is the tr of panēguris (whence we have panegyric), "an assembly or convocation of the whole people to celebrate any public festival or solemnity, as the public games or sacrifices, hence a high festival, public convocation, joyful assembly" (Robinson); the word occurs in the NT only in He 12 23, "to the general assembly and church of the firstborn"; panēguris is LXX for mō'ēdh (Ezk 46 11; Hos 2 11), "solemn assembly," and for ācārāh (Am 5 21), with the same meaning. The Gr words tr^d "and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the firstborn" (AV) have been variously arranged and tr^d; Robinson gives "and to countless throngs [even] the joyful assembly of angels, i.e. as hymning the praises of God around His throne"; cf Rev 5 11 f; Ps 148 2; Dnl 7 10). From both Heb and Gr analogies, this is probably correct; similarly, Alford, Delitzsch and others have "festival assembly"; Weymouth tr^d "to countless hosts of angels, to the great festal gathering and church of the first-born."

(3) Generally, advb., occurs in Jer 48 38 AV as the tr of kullāh (Pual of kālāh), "the whole of it," "There shall be lamentation generally [universally] upon all the housetops of Moab," RV "every where"; in 2 S 17 11, ācaph, "to be gathered," is tr^d "to be generally gathered," RV "gathered together."

In Apoc we have "general" in the sense of "common," "universal" (Ad Est 15 10 m, koinós; 2 Macc 3 18, pándēmon); "in general" (2 Esd 8 15, "man in general"; Eccles 18 1, "all things in general," koinos, RV "in common").

GENERATION, jen'ér-ā'shun (Lat generatio, from genero, "beget"):

(1) The tr (a) of דֹּר, dōr, "circle," "generation," hence "age," "period," "cycle": "many generations" (Dt 32 7); (b) the people of any particular period or those born about the same time: "Righteous before me in this generation" (Gen 7 1); "four generations" (Job 42 16); (c) the people of a particular class or sort, with some implied reference to hereditary quality; the wicked (Dt 32 5; Prov 30 11); the righteous (Ps 14 5; 112 2).

(2) תולדות, tōl'dōth, "births," hence (a) an account of a man and his descendants: "The book of the generations of Adam" (Gen 5 1); (b) successive families: "The families of the sons of Noah, after their generations" (Gen 10 32); (c) genealogical divisions: "The children of Reuben . . . their generations, by their families" (Nu 1 20); (d) fig., of the origin and early history of created things: "The generations of the heavens and of the earth" (Gen 2 4).

(3) γενεά, genet, "a begetting," "birth," "nativity," therefore (a) the successive members of a genealogy: "All the generations from Abraham unto David" (Mt 1 17); (b) a race, or class, distinguished by common characteristics, always (in the NT) bad: "Faithless and perverse generation" (Mt 17 17); (c) the people of a period: "This generation shall not pass away" (Lk 21 32); (d) an age (the average lifetime, 33 years): "Hid for [Gr "from the"] ages and [from the] generations" (Col 1 26). The term is also by a figurative transference of thought applied to duration in eternity: "Unto all generations for ever and ever" (Eph 3 21) (Gr "all the generations of the age of the ages").

(4) γένεσις, genesis, "source," "origin": "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ" (Mt 1 1; ARV m "The genealogy of Jesus Christ").

(5) γέννημα, gennēma, "offspring," "progeny"; figurative: "O generation of vipers" (Lk 3 7 AV).

(6) γένος, genos, "stock," "race," in this case spiritual: "But ye are a chosen generation" (1 Pet 2 9; ARV "an elect race").

LITERATURE

I. General Data.—The first book of Moses is named by the Jews from the first word, viz.

בְּרֵאשִׁית, brē'shith, i.e. "in the beginning" (cf the Genesis of Origen). In

1. The Name the LXX it is called Γένεσις, Genesis, because it recounts the beginnings of the world and of mankind. This name has passed over into the Vulg (Liber Genesis). As a matter of fact the name is based only on the beginning of the book.

The book reports to us the story of the creation of the world and of the first human beings (ch 1); of paradise and the fall (chs 2 f); of

2. General Contents mankind down to the Deluge (chs 4 f; Survey of ch 4, Cain and Abel); of the Deluge itself (chs 6-9); of mankind down to the age of the Patriarchs (10 1-11

26; cf 11 1 ff, the building of the tower of Babel); of Abraham and his house (11 27-25 18); of Isaac and his house (25 19-37 2); of Jacob and of Joseph (37 2-50 26). In other words, the Book of Gen treats of the history of the kingdom of God on earth from the time of the creation of the world down to the beginning of Israel's sojourn in Egypt and to the death of Joseph; and it treats of these subjects in such a way that it narrates in the 1st part (1 1-11 26) the history of mankind; and in the 2d part (11 27-50 26) the history of families; and this latter part is at the same time the beginning of the history of the chosen people, which history itself begins with Ex 1. Though the introduction, chs 1-11, with its universal character, includes all mankind in the promise given at the beginning of the history of Abraham (12 1-3), it is from the outset distinctly declared that God, even if He did originally set apart one man and his family (Gen 12-50), and after that a single nation (Ex 1 ff), nevertheless intends that this particularistic development of the plan of salvation is eventually to include all mankind. The manner in which salvation is developed historically is particularistic, but its purposes are universal.

By the statements just made it has already been indicated in what close connection Gen stands with the subsequent books of the sacred Scriptures.

3. Connection with Succeeding Books The history of the chosen people, which begins with Ex 1 ff, at the very outset and with a clear purpose, refers back to the history as found in Gen (cf Ex 1 1-6.8 with Gen 46 27; 50 24 ff; and see Exodus, I, 3), although hundreds of years had elapsed between these events; which years are ignored, because they were in their details of no importance for the religious history of the people of God. But to Abraham in Gen 12 1-3 the promise had been given, not only that he was to be the father of a mighty nation that would recognize him as their founder, and the earliest history of which is reported in Ex and the following books of the Pent, but also that the Holy Land had been promised him. In this respect, the Book of Josh, which gives the story of the capture of this land, is also a continuation of the historical development begun in Gen. The blessing of God pronounced over Abraham, however, continued to be efficacious also in the later times among the people who had descended from him. In this way Gen is an introduction to all of the books of the OT that follow it, which in any way have to do with the fate of this people, and originated in its midst as the result of the special relation between God and this people. But in so far as this blessing of God was to extend to all the nations of the earth (12 3), the promises given can be entirely fulfilled only in Christ, and can expand only in the work and success of Christian missions and in the blessings that are found within Christianity. Accordingly, this book treats first of beginnings and origins, in which, as in a kernel, the entire development of the kingdom of God down to its consummation is contained (cf VI below).

II. The Composition of Genesis in General.—The tōl'dhōth.

The fact that Gen is characterized by a far-reaching and uniform scheme has, at least in outline, been already indicated (see I, 2 and 3). This impression is confirmed when we examine matters a

1. Unity of the Text little more closely and study the plan and structure of the book. After the grand introitus, which reports the creation of the world (1 1-2 3) there follows in the form of 10 pericopes the historical unfolding of that which God has created, which pericopes properly in each case bear the name tōl'dhōth, or "generations." For this word never signifies creation or generation as an act, but always the history of what has already been created or begotten, the history of generations; so that for this reason, 2 4a, where mention is made of the tōl'dhōth of heaven and of earth, cannot possibly be a superscription that has found its way here from 1 1. It is here, as it is in all cases, the superscription to what follows, and it admirably leads over from the history of creation of the heavens and the earth in ch 1 to the continuation of this subject in the next chapter. The claim of the critics, that the redactor had at this place taken only the superscription from his source P (the priestly narrator, to whom 1-2 3 is ascribed), but that the section of P to which this superscription originally belonged had been suppressed, is all the more monstrous a supposition as 2 4a throughout suits what follows.

(1) Only on the ground of this correct explanation of the term tōl'dhōth can the fact be finally and fully explained, that the tōl'dhōth of Terah contain also the history of Abraham and of Lot; the tōl'dhōth of Isaac contain the history of Jacob and Esau; the tōl'dhōth of Jacob contain the history of Joseph and his brethren. The ten tōl'dhōth are the following: I, 2 4-4 26, the tōl'dhōth of the heavens and the earth; II, 5 1-6 8, the tōl'dhōth of Adam; III, 6 9-9 29, the tōl'dhōth of Noah; IV, 10 1-11 9, the tōl'dhōth of the sons of Noah; V, 11 10-26, the tōl'dhōth of the sons of Shem; VI, 11 27-25 11, the tōl'dhōth of Terah; VII, 25 12-18, the tōl'dhōth of Ishmael; VIII, 25 19-35 29, the tōl'dhōth of Isaac; IX, 36 1-37 1, the tōl'dhōth of Esau (the fact that 36 9, in addition to the instance in ver 1, contains the word tōl'dhōth a second time, is of no importance whatever for our discussion at this stage, as the entire chapter under any circumstances treats in some way of the history of the generations of Esau; see III, 2 9); X, 37 2-50 26, the tōl'dhōth of Jacob. In each instance this superscription covers everything that follows down to the next superscription.

The number 10 is here evidently not an accidental matter. In the arts, EXODUS, LEVITICUS, DAY OF ATONEMENT, also in EZEKIEL, it has been shown what rôle the typical numbers 4, 7, 10 and 12 play in the structure of the whole books and of the individual pericopes. (In the NT we meet with the same phenomenon, particularly in the Apocalypse of St. John; but compare also in Matthew's Gospel the 3×14 generations in 1 1 ff, the 7 parables in 13 1 ff, the 7 woes in 23 13 ff.) In the same way the entire Book of Lev naturally falls into 10 pericopes (cf LEVITICUS, II, 2, 1), and Lev 19 contains 10 groups, each of 4 (possibly also of 5) commandments; cf possibly also 16 6-18; 20 9-18; see LEVITICUS, II, 2, 21, VI. Further, the number 10, with a greater or less degree of certainty, can be regarded as the basis for the construction of the pericopes: Ex 1 8-7 7; 7 8-13 16 (10 plagues); 13 17-18 27 (see Exodus, II, 2 1-3); the Decalogue (20 1 ff); the first Book of the Covenant (21 1-23 13; 23 14-19), and the whole pericope 19 1-24 18a, as also 32 1-35 3 (see Exodus, II, 2, 4, 6). In the Book of Gen itself cf further the 10 members from Shem to Abraham (11 11-26), as also the pericopes 25 19-35 29; 37 2-50 26 (see III, 2, 8, 10 below), and the 10 nations in Gen 15 19 ff. And just as in the cases cited, in almost every instance, there is to be found a further division into 5×2 or 2×5 (cf, e.g. the two tables of the Decalogue); thus, too, in the Book of Gen in each case, 5 of the 10 pericopes are more closely combined, since I-V (ishmael of Shem inclusive) stand in a more distant, and VI-X (treating of the ishmael of Terah, or the history of Abraham) in a closer connection with the kingdom of God; and in so far, too, as the first series of ishmael bring into the foreground more facts and events, but the second series more individuals and persons. Possibly in this case, we can further unite 2 ishmael; at any rate I+II (the primitive age), III+IV (Noah and his sons), VII+VIII (Ishmael and Isaac), IX+X (Esau and Jacob) can be thus grouped.

(2) Further indication of unity.—In addition to the systematic scheme so transparent in the entire Bib. text of the Book of Gen, irrespective of any division into literary sources, it is to be noticed further, that in exactly the same way the history of those generations that were rejected from any connection with the kingdom of God is narrated before the history of those that remained in the kingdom of God and continued its development. Cain's history (4 17 ff) in J stands before the history of Seth (4 25 f J; 5 3 ff P); Japheth's and Ham's genealogy (10 1 ff P; 10 8 ff P+J) before that of Shem (10 21 ff J+P), although Ham was the youngest of the three sons of Noah (9 24); the further history of Lot (19 29 ff P+J) and of Ishmael's genealogy (25 12 ff P+J) before that of Isaac (25 19 ff P+J+E); Esau's descendants (36 1 ff R+P) before the ishmael of Jacob (37 2 ff P+J+E).

In favor of the unity of the Bib. text we can also mention the fact that the Book of Gen as a whole, irrespective of all sources, and in view of the history that begins with Ex 1 ff, has a unique character, so that e.g. the intimate communion with God, of the kind which is reported in the beginning of this Book of Gen (cf, e.g. 3 8; 7 16; 11 5 J; 17 1.22; 35 9.13 P; 18 1 ff; 32 31 J), afterward ceases; and that in Ex, on the other hand, many more miracles are reported than in the Book of Gen (see Exodus, III, 2); that Gen contains rather the history of mankind and of families, while Ex contains that of the nation (see I, 2 above); that it is only in Ex that the law is given, while in the history of the period of the patriarchs we find only promises of the Divine grace; that all the different sources ignore the time that elapses between the close of Gen and the beginning of Ex; and further, that nowhere else is found anything like the number of references to the names of persons or things as are contained in Gen (cf, e.g. 2 23; 3 20; 4 1.25, etc, in J; 17 5.15.17-20, etc, in P; 21 9.17.31, etc, in E; 21 6; 27 36, etc, in J+E; 28 19, etc, in R; 49 8.16.19, etc, in the blessing of Jacob); that the changing of the names of Abram and Sarai to Abraham and Sarah from 17 5.15 goes on through all the sources, while before this it is not found in any source. Finally, we would draw attention to the psychologically finely drawn portraits of Bib. persons in Gen. The fact that the personal pronoun hū' and the noun na'ar are used of both masc. and fem. genders is characteristic of Gen in common with all the books of the Pent, without any difference in this regard being found in the different documents, which fact, as all those cited by us in number 1 above, militates against the division of this book into different sources. Let us now examine more closely the reason assigned for the division into different sources.

(1) In general.—(a) Statement of the theory: OT scholars of the most divergent Rejection tendencies are almost unanimous in of the dividing the Bib. text of Gen into the Documen- sources P, J and E, namely Priest tary Theory Codex, Jahwist, and Elohist. To P are attributed the following greater and connected parts: 1 1—2 4a; 5; a part of the story of the Deluge in chs 6-9; 11 10 ff; 17; 23; 25 12 ff; 35 22b ff; the most of 36. As examples of the parts assigned to J we mention 2 4b—4 26; the rest of the story of the Deluge in chs 6-9; 11 1 ff; 12 f; 16; 18 f, with the exception of a few verses, which are ascribed to P; ch 24 and others. Connected parts belonging to E are claimed to begin with chs 20 and 21 (with the exception of a number of verses which are attributed to P or J or R), and it is thought that, beginning with ch 22, E is frequently found in the history of Jacob and of Joseph (25 19—50 26), in part, however, interwoven with J (details will be found under III, in each case under 2). This documentary theory has hitherto been antagonized only by a few individuals, such as Klostermann, Lepsius, Eerdmans, Orr, Wiener, and the author of the present article.

(b) Reasons assigned for the customary division into sources: As is well known, the theory of a separation of certain books of the OT into different sources began originally with the Book of Gen. The use made of the two names of God, namely Jehovah and Elohim, caused Astruc to conclude that two principal sources had been used in the composition of the book, although other data were also used in vindication of the theory; and since the days of Ilgen the conviction gained ground that there was a second Elohist (now called E), in contradistinction to the first (now called P, to whom, e.g., Gen 1 is ascribed). This second Elohist, it was claimed, also made use of the name Elohim, as did the first, but in other respects he shows greater similarity to the Jahwist. These sources were eventually traced through the entire Pent and into later books, and for this reason are discussed in detail in the art. PENTATEUCH. In this article we must confine ourselves to the Book of Gen, and limit the discussion to some leading points. In addition to the names for God (see under 2), it is claimed that certain contradictions and duplicate accounts of the same matters compel us to accept different sources. Among these duplicates are found, e.g., Gen 1 1—2 4a P, and 2 4b ff J, containing two stories of creation; Gen 12 9 ff J; 20 1 ff E; 26 1 ff J; with the narrative of how Sarah and Rebekah, the wives of the two patriarchs, were endangered; chs 15 J and 17 P, with a double account of how God concluded His covenant with Abraham; 21 22 ff E and 26 12 ff J, the stories of Abimelech; chs 16 J and 21 E, the Hagar episodes; 28 10 ff J+E and 35 1 ff E+P, the narratives concerning Bethel, and in the history of Joseph the mention made of the Midianites E, and of the Ishmaelites J, who took Joseph to Egypt (37 25 ff; 39 1); the intervention of Reuben E, or Judah J, for Joseph, etc. In addition a peculiar style, as also distinct theological views, is claimed for each of these sources. Thus there is found in P a great deal of statistical and systematic material, as in 5 1 ff; 11 10 ff; 25 12 ff; 36 6 ff (the genealogies of Adam, Shem, Ishmael, Esau); P is said to show a certain preference for fixed schemes and for repetitions in his narratives. He rejects all sacrifices earlier than the Mosaic period, because according to this source the Lord did not reveal himself as Jeh previous to Ex 6 1 ff. Again, it is claimed that E describes God as speaking to men from heaven, or through a dream, and through an angel, while according to J Jeh is said to have conversed with mankind personally. In regard to the peculiarities of language used by the different sources, it is impossible in this place to enumerate the different expressions, and we must refer for this subject to the different Introductions to the OT, and to the commentaries and other literature. A few examples are to be found under (c) below, in connection with the discussion of the critical hypothesis. Finally, as another reason for the division of Gen into different sources, it is claimed that the different parts of the sources, when taken together, can be united into a smooth and connected story.

The documents, it is said, have in many cases been taken over word for word and have been united and interwoven in an entirely external manner, so that it is still possible to separate them and often to do this even down to parts of a sentence or to the very words.

(c) Examination of the documentary theory:

(a) Style and peculiarities of language: It is self-evident that certain expressions will be repeated in historical, in legal, and in other sections similar in content; but this is not enough to prove that there have been different sources. Whenever J brings genealogies or accounts that are no less systematic than those of P (cf 4 17 ff; 10 8 ff; 22 20-24); or accounts and repetitions occur in the story of the Deluge (7 2 ff.7 ff; or 7 4.12.17; 8 6; or 7 4; 8 8.10.12), this is not enough to make the division into sources plausible. In reference to the linguistic peculiarities, it must be noted that the data cited to prove this point seldom agree. Thus, e.g. the vb. bārā, "create," in Gen 1 1 is used to prove that this was written by P, but the word is found also in 6 7 in J. The same is the case with the word rkāsh, "possession," which in 12 5; 13 6; 36 7 is regarded as characteristic of P, but in 14 11 f.16.21 is found in an unknown source, and in 15 14 in J. In 12 5; 13 12a; 16 3; 17 8 it is said that 'ereq k-na'an, "land of Canaan," is a proof that this was written by P; but in chs 42, 44 f, 47, 50 we find this expression in J and E, in Nu 32 32 in J (R); cf also Nu 33 40 (PR) where Nu 21 1-3 (JE) is quoted; shipphāh, "maid servant," is claimed as a characteristic word of J in contrast to E (cf 16 1 ff); but in 16 3; 29 24.29 we find this word not only in P but in 20 14; 30 4.7.18; in E Min, "kind," is counted among the marks of P (cf e.g. 1 11 ff), but in Dt 14 13.14.18 we find it in Dt; rather remarkably, too, in the latest find on the Deluge made by Hilprecht and by him ascribed to 2100 BC. Cf on this subject my book, Wider den Bann der Quellenscheidung, and Orr, POT, ch vii, sec. vi, and ch x, sec. i; perhaps, too, the Concordance of Mandelkern under the different words. Even in the cases when the characteristic peculiarities claimed for the sources are correct, if the problem before us consisted only in the discovery of special words and expressions in the different sources, then by an analogous process, we could dissect and sever almost any modern work of literature. Particularly as far as the pieces are concerned, which are assigned to P, it must be stated that Gen 1 and 23 are, as far as style and language are concerned, different throughout. Gen 1 is entirely unique in the entire OT. Ch 23 has been copied directly from life, which is pictured with exceptional fidelity, and for this reason cannot be claimed for any special source. The fact that the story of the introduction of circumcision in ch 17 in many particulars shows similarities to the terminology of the law is entirely natural. The same is true when the chronological accounts refer one date to another and when they show a certain typical character, as is, e.g., the case also in the chronological parts of any modern history of Israel. On the other hand, the method of P in its narratives, both in matter and in form, becomes similar to that of J and E, just as soon as we have to deal with larger sections; cf 28 1 ff; 35 9 ff; 47 5 ff, and all the more in Ex and Nu.

Against the claim that P had an independent existence, we must mention the fact of the unevenness of the narratives, which, by the side of the fuller accounts in chs 1, 17 and 23, of the genealogies and the story of the Deluge, would, according to the critics, have reported only a few disrupted notices about the patriarchs; cf for this in the story of Abraham, 11 27.31 f; 12 4b f; 13 6a.11b.12a;

16 1a.3.15 f; 19 29; 21 1b.2b-5; 25 7-11a; and in its later parts P would become still more incomprehensible on the assumption of the critics (see III below). No author could have written thus; at any rate he would not have been used by anybody, nor would there have been such care evinced in preserving his writings.

(β) The alleged connection of matter: The claim that the different sources, as they have been separated by critics, constitute a compact and connected whole is absolutely the work of imagination, and is in conflict with the facts in almost every instance. This hypothesis cannot be consistently applied, even in the case of the characteristic examples cited to prove the correctness of the documentary theory, such as the story of the Deluge (see III, 2, in each case under [2]).

(γ) The biblico-theological data: The different Bib. and theological data, which are said to be characteristic in proof of the separation into sources, are also misleading. Thus God in J communes with mankind only in the beginning (Gen 2 f; 7 16 ff; 11 5; 18 f), but not afterward. In the beginning He does this also, according to P, whose conception of God, it is generally claimed, was entirely transcendental (cf 17 1.22; 35 9.13). The mediocrity of the Angel of Jeh is found not only in E, (21 17, 'Ēlōhīm'), but also in J (16 7.9-11). In 22 11 in E, the angel of Jeh (not of the 'Ēlōhīm') calls from heaven; theophanies in the night or during sleep are found also in J (cf 15 12 ff; 26 24; 28 13-16; 32 27). In the case of P, the cultus-theory, according to which it is claimed that this source does not mention any sacrifices before Ex 6 1 ff, is untenable. If it is a fact that the theocracy, as it were, really began only in Ex 6, then it would be impossible that P would contain anything of the cultus before Ex 6; but we have in P the introduction of the circumcision in ch 17; of the Sabbath in 2 1 ff; and the prohibition against eating blood in 9 1 ff; and in addition the drink offerings mentioned in 35 14, which verse stands between vs 13 and 15, and, ascribed to P, is only in the interests of this theory attributed to the redactor. If then the theory here outlined is not tenable as far as P is concerned, it would, on the other hand, be all the more remarkable that in the story of the Deluge the distinction between the clean and the unclean (7 2 ff.8) is found in J, as also the savor of the sacrifice, with the term rēh ha-nihōh, which occurs so often in P (cf Gen 8 21 with Nu 15 3.7.10.13 f. 24; 18 17); that the sacrifices are mentioned in 8 20 ff, and the number 7 in connection with the animals and days in 7 4; 8 8.10.12 (cf in P, e.g. Lev 8 33; 13 5 f.21.26 f.31.33.50.54; 14 8 f.38 f; 14 7.51; 16 14 f; Nu 28 11; 29 8, etc); further, that the emphasis is laid on the 40 days in 7 4.12.17; 8 6 (cf in P, Ex 24 1-8; Lev 12 2-4; Nu 13 25; 14 34), all of which are ascribed, not as we should expect, to the Levitical P, but to the prophetic J. The document P, which, according to a large number of critics, was written during the Exile (see e.g. LEVITICUS, III, 1, or EZEKIEL II, 2) in a most surprising manner, instead of giving prominence to the person of the high priest, would then have declared that kings were to be the greatest blessings to come to the seed of Abraham (17 6.16); and while, on the critical assumption, we should have the right to expect the author to favor particularistic tendencies, he, by bringing in the history of all mankind in Gen 1-11, and in the extension of circumcision to strangers (17 12.23), would have displayed a phenomenal universality. The strongest counter-argument against all such minor and incorrect data of a Bib. and a theological character will always be found in the uniform religious and ethical spirit and world of thought that pervade all these sources, as also in the unity in the accounts of the different patriarchs, who are pictured in such a masterly, psychological and consistent manner, and who could never be the result of an accidental working together and interweaving of different and independent sources (see III below).

(b) Duplicates: In regard to what is to be thought of the different duplicates and contradictions, see below under III, 2, in each case under (2).

(c) The manner in which the sources are worked together: But it is also impossible that these sources could have been worked together in the manner in which the critics claim that this was done. The more arbitrarily and carelessly the redactors are thought to have gone to work in many places in removing contradictions, the more incomprehensible it becomes that they at other places report faithfully such contradictions and permit these to stand side by side, or, rather, have placed them thus. And even if they are thought not to have smoothed over the difficulties anywhere, and out of reverence for their sources, not to have omitted or changed any of these reports, we certainly would have a right to think, that even if they would have perchance placed side by side narratives with such enormous contradictions as there are claimed to be, e.g. in the story of the Deluge in P and J, they certainly would not have woven these together. If, notwithstanding, they still did this without harmonizing them, why are we asked to believe that at other places they omitted matters of the greatest importance (see III, 2, 3)? Further, J and E would have worked their materials together so closely at different places that a separation between the two would be an impossibility, something that is acknowledged as a fact by many OT students; yet, notwithstanding, the contradictions, e.g. in the history of Joseph, have been allowed to stand side by side in consecutive verses, or have even intentionally been placed thus (cf, e.g. 37 25 ff). Then, too, it is in the nature of things unthinkable that three originally independent sources for the history of Israel should have constituted separate currents down to the period after Moses, and that they could yet be dovetailed, often sentence by sentence, in the manner claimed by the critics. In conclusion, the entire hypothesis suffers shipwreck through those passages which combine the peculiarities of the different sources, as e.g. in 20 18, which on the one hand constitutes the necessary conclusion to the preceding story from E (cf ver 17), and on the other hand contains the name Jehovah; or in 22 14 ff, which contains the real purpose of the story of the sacrificing of Isaac from E, but throughout also shows the characteristic marks of J; or in 39 1, where the so-called private person into whose house Joseph has been brought, according to J, is more exactly described as the chief of the body-guard, as this is done by E, in 40 2.4. And when the critics in this passage appeal to the help of the redactor, this is evidently only an ill-concealed example of a "begging of the question." In ch 34, and esp. in ch 14, we have a considerable number of larger sections that contain the characteristics of two or even all three sources, and which accordingly furnish ample evidence for protesting against the whole documentary theory.

(f) Criticism carried to extremes: All the difficulties that have been mentioned grow into enormous proportions when we take into consideration the following facts: To operate with the three sources J, E and P seems to be rather an easy process; but if we accept the principles that underlie this separation into sources, it is an impossibility to limit ourselves to these three sources, as a goodly number of OT scholars would like to do, as Strack, Kittel, Oettli, Dillmann, Driver. The stories of the danger that attended the wives of the Patriarchs, as these are found in Gen 12 9 ff and in 26 1 ff, are ascribed to J, and the story as found in Gen 20 1 ff to E. But evidently two sources are not enough in these cases, seeing that similar stories are always regarded as a proof that there have been different authors. Accordingly, we must claim three authors, unless it should turn out that these three stories have an altogether different signification, in which case they report three actual occurrences and may have been reported by one and the same author. The same use is made of the laughter in connection with the name Isaac in 17 17; 18 12; 21 6, viz. to substantiate the claim for three sources, P and J and E. But since 21 9 E; 26 8 J also contain references to this, and as in 21 6 JE, in addition to the passage cited above, there is also a second reference of this kind, then, in consistency, the critics would be compelled to accept six sources instead of three (Sievers accepts at least 5, Gunkel 4); or all of these references point to one and the same author who took pleasure in repeating such references. As a consequence, in some critical circles scholars have reached the conclusion that there are also such further sources as J¹ and J², as also E¹ and E² (cf Budde, Baudissin, Cornill, Holzinger, Kautzsch, Kuenen, Sellin). But Sievers has already discovered five subordinate sources of J, six of P, and three of E, making a total of fourteen independent sources that he thinks can yet be separated accurately (not taking into consideration some remnants of J, E and P that can no longer be distinguished from others). Gunkel believes that the narratives in Gen were originally independent and separate stories, which can to a great extent yet be distinguished in their original form. But if J and E and P from this standpoint are no longer authors but are themselves, in fact, reduced to the rank of collectors and editors, then it is absurd to speak any more of distinct linguistic peculiarities, or of certain theological ideas, or of intentional uses made of certain names of God in J and E and P, not to say anything of the connection between these sources, except perhaps in rare cases. Here the foundations of the documentary theory have been undermined by the critics themselves, without Sievers or Gunkel or the other less radical scholars intending to do such a thing. The manner in which these sources are said to have been worked together naturally becomes meaningless in view of such hypotheses. The modern methods of dividing between the sources, if consistently applied, will end in splitting the Bib. text into atoms; and this result, toward which the development of OT criticism is inevitably leading, will some day cause a sane reaction; for through these methods scholars have deprived themselves of the possibility of explaining the blessed influence which these Scriptures, so accidentally compiled according to their view, have achieved through thousands of years. The success of the Bible text, regarded merely from a historical point of view, becomes for the critic a riddle that defies all solutions, even if all dogmatical considerations are ignored.

(2) Rejection of documentary theory in view of the names for God.—(a) An error of the hypothesis in principle: The names of God, Jehovah and Elohim, constituted for Astruc the starting-point for the division of Gen into different sources (see [1] above). Two chief sources, based on the two names for God, could perhaps as a theory and in themselves be regarded as acceptable. If we add that in Ex 6 1 ff, in P, we are told that God had not revealed Himself before the days of Moses by the name of Jehovah, but only as "God Almighty," it seems to be the correct thing to separate the text, which reports concerning the times before Moses and which in parts contains the name Jehovah, into two sources, one with Jehovah and the other with Elohim. But just as soon as we conclude that the use made of the two names of God proves that there were three and not two sources, as is done from Gen 20 on, the conclusive ground for the division falls away. The second Elohist (E), whom Ilgen was the first to propose (see [1] above), in principle and a priori discredits the whole hypothesis. This new source from the very outset covers all the passages that cannot be ascribed to the Jehovah or the Elohist portions; whatever portions contain the name Elohim, as P does, and which nevertheless are prophetic in character after the manner of J, and accordingly cannot be made to fit in either the Jahwistic or the Elohist source, seek a refuge in this third source. Even before we have done as much as look at the text, we can say that according to this method everything can be proved. And when critics go so far as to divide J and E and P into many sub-parts, it becomes all the more impossible to make the names for God a basis for this division into sources. Consistently we could perhaps in this case separate a Jehovah source, an Elohim source, a ha-'Elohim source, an 'El Shadday source, an 'Adhōnāy source, a Mal'akh Yahweh source, a Mal'akh 'Elohim source, etc, but unfortunately these characteristics of the sources come into conflict in a thousand cases with the others that are claimed to prove that there are different sources in the Book of Gen.

(b) The false basis for the hypothesis: But the basis of the whole hypothesis itself, viz. Ex 6 1 ff P, is falsely regarded as such. If Jehovah had really been unknown before the days of Moses, as Ex 6 1 ff P is claimed to prove, how could J then, in so important and decisive a point in the history of the religious development of Israel, have told such an entirely different story? Or if, on the other hand, Jehovah was already known before the time of Moses, as we must conclude according to J, how was it possible for P all at once to invent a new view? This is all the more incredible since it is this author and none other who already makes use of the word Jehovah in the composition of the name of the mother of Moses, namely Jochebed (cf Ex 6 20 and Nu 26 59). In addition, we do not find at all in Ex 6 1 ff that God had before this revealed Himself as 'Elohim, but as 'El Shadday, so that this would be a reason for claiming not an 'Elohim but an 'El Shadday source for P on the basis of this passage (cf 17 1; 28 3; 35 11; 48 3 P—48 14 E! cf also 49 25 in the blessing of Jacob). Finally, it is not at all possible to separate Ex 6 1 ff P from that which immediately precedes, which is taken from JE and employs the name Jehovah; for according to the text of P we do not know who Moses and who Aaron really were, and yet these two are in Ex 6 1 ff regarded as well-known persons. The new revelation of God in Ex 6 1 ff (P) by the side of 3 1 ff (JE and E) is also entirely defensible and rests on a good foundation; for Moses after the failure of Ex 5 needed such a renewed encouragement (see Exodus II, 2, 1). If this is the case, then the revelation of the name of Jehovah in Ex 6 1 ff cannot mean that that name had before this not been known at all, but means that it had only been relatively unknown, i.e. that in the fullest and most perfect sense God became known only as Jehovah, while before this He had revealed His character only from certain sides, but esp. as to His Almighty Power.

(c) Improbability that the difference in the use of the names for God is without significance: In view of the importance which among oriental nations is assigned to names, it is absolutely unthinkable able that the two names Jehovah and Elohim had originally been used without any reference to their different meanings. The almost total omission of the name Jehovah in later times or the substitution of the name Elohim for it in Pss 42—53 is doubtless based in part on the reluctance which gradually arose in Israel to use the name at all; but this cannot be shown as probable for older times, in which it is claimed that E was written. In the case of P the rule, according to which the name Elohim is said to have been used for the pre-Mosaic period, and the reason for the omission of Jehovah would have been an entirely different one. Then, too, it would be entirely inexplicable why J should have avoided the use of the name Elohim. The word Elohim is connected with a root that signifies "to fear," and characterizes God from the side of His power, as this is, e.g., seen at once in Gen 1. Jehovah is splendidly interpreted in Ex 3 14 ff, and the word is connected with the archaic form hāwāh for hāyāh, "to be," and the word characterizes God as the being who at all times continues to be the God of the Covenant, and who, according to Gen 2 4—3 24, can manifestly be none other than the Creator of the universe in Gen 1 1—2 3, even if from Gen 12 on He, for the time being, enters into a special relation to Abraham, his family and his people, and by the use of the combined names Jehovah-Elohim is declared to be identical with the God who created the world, as e.g. this is also done in the section Ex 7 8—13 16, where, in the 10 plagues, Jehovah's omnipotent power is revealed (cf Exodus II, 2, 2); and in 9 30 it is charged against Pharaoh and his courtiers, that they did not yet fear Jehovah-Elohim, i.e. the God of the Covenant, who at the same time is the God of the universe (cf also 1 K 18 21.37.39; Jon 4 6).

(d) Real purpose in the use of the names for God: But now it is further possible to show clearly, in connection with a number of passages, that the different names for God are in Gen selected with a perfect consciousness of the difference in their meanings, and that accordingly the choice of these names does not justify the division of the book into various sources.

(a) Decreasing use of name Jehovah: The fact that the tōl'dhōth of Terah, of Isaac, and of Jacob begin with the name Jehovah but end without this name. In the history of Abraham are to be noted the following passages: 12 1.4.7.8.17; 13 4.10.13.14.18; 14 22; 15 1.2.8; 16 2.5-7.9.10.11.13; 17 1; in the history of Isaac: 25 21.22.23; 26 2.12.22.24.25.28.29; and in the tōl'dhōth of Jacob 38 7.10; 39 2.3.5. In these passages the beginnings are regularly made with the name Jehovah, although with decreasing frequency before the name Elohim is used, and notwithstanding that in all these sections certain selections from P and E must also be considered in addition to J. Beginning with Gen 12, in which the story of the selection of Abraham is narrated, we accordingly find emphasized, at the commencement of the history of each patriarch, this fact that it is Jehovah, the God of the Covenant, who is determining these things. Beginning with Gen 40 and down to about Ex 2 we find the opposite to be the case, although J is strongly represented in this section, and we no longer find the name Jehovah (except in one passage in the blessing of Jacob, which passage has been taken from another source, and hence is of no value for the distinction of the sources J, E and P; this is the remarkable passage Gen 49 18). In the same way the story of Abraham (25 1-11) closes without mention being made of the name of Jehovah, which name is otherwise found in all of these histories, except in ch 23 (see below). The tōl'dhōth of Isaac, too, use the name Jehovah for the last time in 32 10; and from this passage down to 37 2 the name is not found. It is accordingly clear that in the history of the patriarchs there is a gradual decrease in the number of times in which the name Jehovah occurs, and in each case the decrease is more marked; and this is most noticeable and clearest in the history of Joseph, manifestly in order to make all the more prominent the fact that the revelation of God, beginning with Ex 3 1 ff, is that of Jehovah. These facts alone make the division of this text into three sources J, E and P impossible.

(β) Selection of the names of God with reference to the approach of man to God and of his departure from God: The fact, further, that the approach of an individual to God or his departure from God could find its expression in the different uses made of the names of God is seen in the following. In connection with Ishmael and Lot the name Jehovah can be used only so long as these men stood in connection with the kingdom of God through their relation to Abraham (cf 16 7.9.10.11.13 and 13 10; 19 13 ff.16), but only the name Elohim can be used as soon as they sever this connection (cf 21 12.17.19.20 and 19 29). On the other hand, Elohim is used in the beginning of the history of the Gentile Abimelech (20 3.6.11.13.17; 21 22 f); while afterward, when he has come into closer relations to the patriarchs, the name Jehovah is substituted (26 28.29). A similar progress is found in separate narratives of the patriarchs themselves, since in 22 1 ff and ch 23 the knowledge of Elohim is changed into that of Jehovah (cf 22 1.3.9 with 22 11.14.15.16, and 23 12 with 23 13.16).

(γ) Selection of the names for God for other reasons: Elohim can, further, in many cases be explained on the basis of an implied or expressed contrast, generally over against men (cf 22 8.12; in the second of these two passages the fear of God is placed in contrast to godlessness); 30 2; 31 50; 32 2 f; cf with vs 4 and 8; 32 29; 35 5; or on the basis of an accommodation to the standpoint of the person addressed, as in 3 1-5 (serpent); 20 3.6.11.13.17; 23 6; 39 9 (Gentiles); or on the basis of grammar, as in 23 6; 32 3; 28 17.22; because the composition with the proper name Jehovah could never express the indefinite article (a prince of God, a camp of God, a Bethel or house of prayer); or finally in consequence of the connection with earlier passages (cf 5 1 ff with ch 1; 21 2.4; 23 3 ff; 35 9 ff with ch 17). A comparison of these passages shows that, of course, different reasons may have induced the author to select the name Elohim, e.g. 23 6; 23 12; 32 12.

(δ) Systematic use of the names of God, particularly in the history of Abraham: That the names for God are systematically used is finally attested by the fact that in the history of Abraham, after the extensive use of the name Jehovah in its beginning (see above under [α]), this name is afterward found combined with a large number of other and different names; so that in each case it is Jehovah of whom all further accounts speak, and yet the name of Jehovah is explained, supplemented and made clear for the consciousness of believers by the new appellations, while the full revelation of His being indeed begins only in Ex 3 and 6 1 ff, at which place the different rays of His character that appeared in earlier times are combined in one brilliant light. The facts in the case are the following. In the story of Abraham, with which an epoch of fundamental importance in the history of revelation begins, we find Jehovah alone in 12 f. With the exception of ch 23, where a characteristic appellation of God is not found, and 25 1-11, where we can claim a decadence in the conception of the Divinity (concerning 23 6; 25 11; see above [γ]+[α]), the name of Jehovah is retained in all of these stories, as these have been marked out (III, 2, 6); but beginning with ch 14 they do not at all use any longer only one name for God. We here cite only those passages where, in each case, for the first time a new name for God is added, viz. 14 18, 'El 'Elyōn; 14 19, Creator of heaven and of earth; 15 2, 'Adhōnāy; 16 7, the Angel of Jehovah; 16 13, the God that seeth; 17 1, 'El Shadday; 17 3, 'Elohim; 17 18, hā-'Elohim; chs 18 f, special relation to the three men (cf 18 2 and 19 1); 18 25, the Judge of the whole earth; 20 13, 'Elohim constructed as a pl.; 21 17, the Angel of God; 24 3, the God of heaven and the God of the earth; 24 12, the God of Abraham.

(ε) Lack and weakness in the materials needed to prove the case: If we add, finally, that to prove the hypothesis we are limited to the meager materials found in Gen 1 1—Ex 6 1 ff; that in this comparatively small number of chapters Gen 40 to Ex 2 cannot be utilized in this discussion (see above under [δ] [α]); that all those passages, in which J and E are inseparably united must be ignored in this discussion; that all other passages in which J and E are often and rapidly interchanged from the very outset are suspiciously akin to begging the question; that Gen 20 18, which with its "Jehovah" is ascribed to R, is absolutely needed as the conclusion of the preceding Elohim story; that in 21 33 with its "Jehovah" in J, on the other hand, the opening Elohim story from E, which is necessary for an explanation of the dwelling of Abraham in the south country, precedes; that the angel of Jehovah (22 11) is found in E; that 2 4—3 24 from J has besides Jehovah the name Elohim, and in 3 15-5 only Elohim (see above); that in 17 1; 21 1 P Jehovah is found; that 5 29, which is ascribed to J, is surrounded by portions of P, and contains the name Jehovah, and would be a torso, but in connection with ch 5 P, in reality is in its proper place, as is the intervening remark (ver 24 P); that, on the other hand, in 4 25; 6 2.4; 7 9; 9 27; 39 9 Elohim is found—in view of all these facts it is impossible to see how a greater confusion than this could result from the hypothesis of a division of the sources on the basis of the use made of the names of God. And then, too, it is from the very outset an impossibility, that in the Book of Gen alone such an arbitrary selection of the names for God should have been made and nowhere else.

(f) Self-disintegration of the critical position: The modern critics, leaving out of consideration entirely their further dissection of the text, themselves destroy the foundation upon which this hypothesis was originally constructed, when Sievers demands for Gen 1 (from P) an original Jehovah-Elohim in the place of the Elohim now found there; and when others in Gen 18 f J claim an original Elohim; and when in 17 1—21 1 the name Jehovah is said to have been intentionally selected by P.

(g) Different uses in the LXX: Naturally it is not possible to discuss all the pertinent passages at this place. Even if, in many cases, it is doubtful what the reasons were for the selection of the names for God, and even if these reasons cannot be determined with our present helps, we must probably, nevertheless, not forget that the LXX in its tr of Gen in 49 passages, according to Eerdman's reckoning, and still more according to Wiener's, departs from the use of the names for God from the Heb original. Accordingly, then, a division of Gen into different sources on the basis of the different names for God cannot be carried out, and the argument from this use, instead of proving the documentary theory, has been utilized against it.

III. The Structure of the Individual Pericopes.—In this division of the article, there is always to be found (under 1) a consideration of the unity of the Bib. text and (under 2) the rejection of the customary division into different sources.

The conviction of the unity of the text of Gen and of the impossibility of dividing it according to different sources is strongly confirmed and strengthened by the examination of the different pericopes. Here, too, we find the division on the basis of the typical numbers 4.7.10.12. It is true that in certain cases we should be able to divide in a different way; but at times the intention of the author to divide according to these numbers practically compels acceptance on our part, so that it would be almost impossible to ignore this matter without detriment, esp. since we were compelled to accept the same fact in connection with the articles EXODUS (II); LEVITICUS (II, 2); DAY OF ATONEMENT (I, 2, 1), and also EZEKIEL (I, 2, 2). But more important than these numbers, concerning the importance or unimportance of which there could possibly be some controversy, are the fundamental religious and ethical ideas which run through and control the larger pericopes of the tōl'dhōth of Terah, Isaac and Jacob in such a way that it is impossible to regard this as merely the work of a redactor, and we are compelled to consider the book as the product of a single writer.

The structure of the proemium (Gen 1 1—3 3) is generally ascribed to P. Following the introduction (vs 1.2; creation of chaos), we have the creation of the seven days with the Sabbath as a conclusion. The first and the second three days correspond to each other (1st day, the light; 4th day, the lights; 2d day, the air and water by the separation of the waters above and the waters below; 5th day, the animals of the air and of the water; 3d day, the dry land and the vegetation; 6th day, the land animals and man; cf also in this connection that there are two works on each day). We find Ex also divided according to the number seven (see EXODUS, II, 1; cf also Ex 24 18b—31 18; see EXODUS, II, 2, 5, where we have also the sevenfold reference to the Sabbath idea in Ex, and that, too, repeatedly at the close of different sections, just as we find this here in Gen); and in Lev cf chs 23, 25, 27; see LEVITICUS, II, 2, 2; the VIII, IX, and appendix; and in Gen 4 17 ff; 5 1-24 P; 6 9—9 29; 36 1-37 1 (see under 2, 1.2.3.9).

The ten tōl'dhōth are found in Gen 2 4—50 26.

1. The tōl'dhōth of the heavens and the earth (2 4—4 26):

(1) The Biblical text.—(a) 2 4-25, Paradise and the first human beings; (b) 3 1-24, the Fall; (c) 4 1-16, Cain and Abel; (d) 4 17-26,

2. Structure the Cainites, in seven members (see of the Ten under 1 above) and Seth. The number Tōl'dhōth 4 appears also in 5 1—6 8 (see under 2); 10 1—11 9 (see under 4); and esp. 11 27—25 11 (under 6). Evidently (a)+(b) and (c)+(d) are still more closely connected.

(2) Rejection of the division into sources (11—2 4a P and 2 4b—4 26 J).—Ch 2 does not contain a new account of creation with a different order in the works of creation. This section speaks of animals and plants, not for their own sakes, but only on account of their connection with man. The creation of the woman is only a further development of ch 1. While formerly the critics divided this section into 2 4—4 26 J, they now cut it up into J¹ and J² (see under II, 2, 1 [c] [5]), because, they say, the tree of life is mentioned only in 2 9 and 3 23, while in 2 17 and 3 3 ff the Divine command is restricted to the tree of knowledge of good and evil. But it is impossible to see why there should be a contradiction here, and just as little can we see why the two trees standing in the midst of the garden should not both have had their significance (cf 2 9; 3 3). It is further asserted that a division of J is demanded by the fact that the one part of J knows of the Fall (6 9 ff), and the other does not know of such a break in the development of mankind (4 17 ff). But the civilization attained by the Cainites could certainly have passed over also to the Sethites (see also 6 2); and through Noah and his sons have been continued after the Deluge. Then, too, the fact that Cain built a city (4 17), and the fact that he became a fugitive and a wanderer (4 12), are not mutually exclusive; just as the beginnings made with agriculture (4 12) are perfectly consistent with the second fact.

2. The tōl'dhōth of Adam (5 1—6 8):

(1) The Biblical text.—(a) 5 1-24, seven generations from Adam to Lamech (see under 1, and Jude ver 14); (b) 5 25-32, four generations from the oldest of men, Methuselah, down to the sons of Noah; (c) 6 1-4, intermingling of the sons of God and the sons of men; (d) 6 5-8, corruption of all mankind. Evidently at this place (a)+(b) and (c)+(d) correspond with each other.

(2) Rejection of the division into sources (ch 5 P with the exception of ver 29 [see II, 2, 2 (e)]; 5 29; 6 1-8 J).—6 7 J presupposes ch 1 P; as, on the other hand, the fact that the generations that, according to ch 5 P, had in the meanwhile been born, die, presupposes the advent of sin, concerning which only J had reported in ch 3. In the case of P, however, in 1 31 it is said that everything was very good.

3. The tōl'dhōth of Noah (6 9—9 29):

(1) The Biblical text.—Seven sections (see 1 above) viz: (a) 6 9-22, the building of the ark; (b) 7 1-9, entering the ark; (c) 7 10-24, the increase of the Flood; (d) 8 1-14, the decrease of the Flood; (e) 8 15-19, leaving the ark; (f) 8 22—9 17, declaration of a covenant relation between God and Noah; (g) 9 18-29, transfer of the Divine blessing upon Shem.

(2) Rejection of the division into sources (7 1-5.7-10.12.16b.17.22 f; 8 2b.3a.6-12.13b.20-22; 9 20-27 J, the rest from P).—In all the sources are found the ideas that the Deluge was the punishment of God for sin; further, the deliverance of the righteous Noah and his wife and three sons Shem, Ham and Japheth and their wives; the deliverance of the different kinds of animals; the announcement of the covenant relations between God and mankind after the Deluge; the designation of the Deluge with the term mabbūl and of the ark with tebādāh. In the Bab account, which without a doubt stands in some connection with the Bib., are found certain measurements of the ark, which in the Bible are only in P, as also the story of the sending out of the birds when the flood was decreasing, and of the sacrifices of those who had been delivered, which in the Bible are said to be found only in J; and these facts are a very powerful argument against the division into sources. Further, P, in case the critics were right, would have contained nothing of the thanks of Noah for his deliverance, although he was a pious man; and in the case of J we should not be informed what kind of an ark it was into which Noah was directed to go (7 1 ff); nor how he can already in 8 20 build an altar, as he has not yet gone out of the ark; and, further, how the determination of Jeh, that He would not again curse the earth but would bless it, can be a comfort to him, since only P has reported concerning the blessing (9 1 ff). Even if the distinction is not always clearly made between clean and unclean animals, and different numbers are found in the case of each (6 19 f; 7 14-16 P, over against 7 2 f in J), yet this is to be regarded merely as a lack of exactness or, perhaps better, rather as a summary method of procedure. The difficulties are not even made any easier through the separation into sources, since in 7 8 f in J both numbers and the distinction between the two kinds of animals are used indiscriminately. Here, too, in J we find the name Elohim used. The next contradiction that is claimed, namely that the Deluge according to J lasted only 61 days, and is arranged in 40 days (7 4.12.17; 8 6) plus 3×7=21 days (8 8.10.12), while in P it continues for 1 year and 11 days (7 11.24; 8 3-5.14), is really a self-inflicted agony of the critics. The report of the Bible on the subject is perfectly clear. The rain descends for 40 days (7 12 J); but as in addition also the fountains of the deep are broken up (7 11 P), we find in this fact a reason for believing that they increased still more (7 24 P and 7 17 J). The 40 days in 8 6 J cannot at all be identified with those mentioned in 7 17; for if this were the case the raven would have been sent out at a time when the waters had reached their highest stage, and even according to J the Deluge covered the entire world. In general see above, II, 2, 1 (c) (γ).

4. The tōl'dhōth of the sons of Noah (10 1—11 9):

(1) The Biblical text.—(a) 10 2-5, the Japhethites; (b) 10 6-20, the Hamites; (c) 10 21-32, the Shemites; (d) 11 1-9, the Bab confusion of tongues. Evidently (a) to (c) is to be regarded as in contrast to (d) (cf also 11 1.9 J in addition to 10 32 P).

(2) Rejection of the division into sources (10 1-7.20.22 f.31 f P, the rest belonging to J).—The distribution of ch 10 between P and J is actually ridiculous, since in this case J does not speak of Japheth at all, and the genealogy of the Hamites would connect directly with P, a phenomenon which must have been repeated in vs 24 ff. The Jewish Midr, in addition, and possibly correctly, counts 70 peoples (cf 48 27; Ex 1 5; Nu 11 16.25; Lk 10 1).

5. The tōl'dhōth of Shem (11 10-26): 10 generations (see under II, 1).

6. The tōl'dhōth of Terah (11 27—25 11):

(1) The Biblical text.—After the introduction (11 27–32), the theme of the history of Abraham is given in 12 1–4a (ver 1, the promise of the holy land; ver 2, promise of many descendants; ver 3, announcement of the double influence of Abraham on the world; ver 4a, the obedience of Abraham's faith in his trust upon the Divine promise). In contrast to the first three thoughts which characterize God's relation to Abraham, the fourth is placed, which emphasizes Abraham's relation to God (see under [d]). But both thoughts give complete expression to the intimate communion between God and Abraham. On the basis of these representations, which run through the entire story and thus contribute materially to its unification, this section can also be divided, as one of these after the other comes into the foreground. These four parts (12 4b–14 24; 15 1–18 15; 18 16–21 34; 22 1–25 11) can each be divided again into four subdivisions, a scheme of division that is found also in Ex 35 4–40 38; Lev 11–15, 16 (cf EXODUS, II, 2, 7; LEVITICUS, II, 2, 2, III and IV; DAY OF ATONEMENT, I, 2, 1), and is suggested by Dt 12–26 (cf also my book, Wider den Bann der Quellenscheidung, the results of the investigation of which work are there reproduced without entering upon the details of the argument).

(a) 12 4b–14 24, in which the reference to the promised land is placed in the foreground; see 12 1, and the passages and statements in parentheses in the following: (α) 12 4b–8, Abraham's journey to Canaan (vs 5 P, 6.7.8 J); (β) 12 9–13 4, descent to Egypt from Canaan, and return (12 9.10; 13 1–4J); (γ) 13 5–18, separation from Lot (vs 6 P, 7.9 J, 12a P, 14f.17.18 J); (δ) ch 14, expedition against Chedorlaomer, etc (Abraham is blessed by the priest-king of the country, and receives as homage from the products of the country bread and wine [vs 18 f], while he in return gives tithes [ver 20]). The division of this section (12 4b–14 24) is to be based on the similarity of the closing verses (12 8; 13 4; 13 18).

(b) 15 1–18 15, unfolding of the promise of descendants for Abraham by this announcement that he is to have a son of his own; cf 12 2 and what is placed in parentheses in the following: (α) ch 15, Jeh's covenant with Abraham (vs 2.3 JE, 4 J, 5 E, 13.14.16.18 J). The promise is not fulfilled through Eliezer, but only through an actual son (vs 3.4); (β) 16 1–16, Hagar gives birth to Ishmael as the son of Abraham. Hagar's son, too, namely Ishmael, is not the genuine heir, notwithstanding the connection between 16 10 and 12 2 (cf 17 18–20 P); (γ) ch 17 P, promise of the birth of Isaac given to Abraham (vs 2–17.19.21); (δ) 18 1–15, Sarah also hears that Isaac is promised (vs 10.12–15).

(c) 18 16–21 34, the double influence of Abraham on the world; cf 12 3 and what is in parentheses in the following: (α) 18 16–19 38, the pericope dealing with Sodom; (i) 18 16–33, Abraham's petition for the deliverance of Sodom; (ii) 19 1–11, the sin of the Sodomites, while Lot shows some of the characteristics of Abraham; (iii) 19 12–28, story of the destruction, in connection with which Lot receives the benefit of his relation to Abraham (vs 16.19.21.22); (iv) Lot ceases to be a part of this history after this destruction; (β) 20 1–18, Abraham with Abimelech (vs 6.9 E, 18 R, punishment; vs 7.17, intercession); (γ) 21 1–21, Ishmael ceases to be part of this history (vs 13 18. 20 E); (δ) 21 22–34, Abraham's agreement with Abimelech (the latter seeks Abraham's friendship and fears his enmity, vs 27.23 E).

(d) 22 1–25 11 ff, Abraham's faith at its culminating point; cf 12 4a and what is in parentheses in the following: (α) 22 1–19, the sacrifice of Isaac (vs 2.12 E, 16.18 R); (β) ch 23, purchase of the place to bury the dead, which act was the result of his faith in the promised land; (γ) ch 24 is introduced by 22 20–24, which has no independent character. With the twelve descendants of Nahor of the twelve sons of Jacob, the twelve of Ishmael (25 12 ff; 17 20), and on the number 12 see Ex 24 18–30 10, under EXODUS, II, 2, 5; Lev 1–7 under LEVITICUS, II, 2, 2, i, and under EZEKIEL, I, 2, 2. Ch 24 itself contains the story of how a wife was secured for Isaac from among his relatives (the faith in the success of this plan is transmitted from Abraham to his servant); (δ) 25 1–11, the sons of the concubine of Abraham (J+R) cease to be a part of this history; transfer of the entire inheritance to the son of promise (J); burial in the ground bought for this purpose (P) (all of these concluding acts stand in close connection with Abraham's faith). In reference to the force of the names of God in connecting Gen 11 27–25 11, see above under II, 2, 2 (d).

We will here discuss also the so-called duplicates (see under II, 2, 1, α+c, δ). The different stories concerning the danger in which the wives of Abraham and Isaac were involved in 12 9 ff J; 20 1 ff E; 26 1 ff J directly presuppose each other. Thus in 20 13 E Abraham regards it as a fact that such situations are often to be met with, and consequently the possibility of an occurrence of such an event could not have appeared so remarkable to an Oriental as it does to a modern critic; ch 26 1 suggests the story in 12 9 ff. The words used here also show that the three stories in question did not originate independently of each other (cf 26 7; 20 5; 12 19–26 7; 20 11; 12 12–26 10; 20 9; 12 18–26 3; 20 1; 12 10 [gūr]; see under II, 2, 1, c, δ). The two Ishmael pericopes (chs 16 J+P+21 E) differ from each other throughout, and, accordingly, are surely not duplicates. The two stories of the conclusion of a covenant in chs 15 J and 17 P are both justified, esp. since in 17 7 the author speaks of an "establishment" of the covenant which already existed since ch 15. Ch 17 P+18 1 ff J are certainly intended to be pendants, so that it is impossible to ascribe them to different authors; of the analogous beginning of the theophanies of Jeh in 17 1 and 18 1 (even the pronoun referring to Abraham in 18 1 J, unless taken in connection with ch 17 P, is without any context), also the laughing of Abraham and of Sarah (17 17; 18 12 f; see under II, 2, 1 [c] [f]), the prominence given to their age (17 17; 18 11 f), and the designation of the time in 17 11; 18 10.14.

Nor can we quote in favor of a division into sources the passage 21 14 f E, on the ground that Ishmael is described here as being so small that he could be laid upon the shoulder of his mother and then be thrown by her under a shrub, while according to the Bib. text he must have been 15 years of age (16 16, 21 5 P). For the original does not say that he was carried on her shoulders; and in Mt 16 30 it is even said of adults that they were thrown down. On the other hand, also according to E, Ishmael could not have been so small a child, for in 21 18 he is led by the hand, and according to ver 9 he already mocks Isaac, evidently because the latter was the heir of the promise.

Sarah's age, too, according to ch 20 E, does not speak in favor of a division into sources. That she was still a beautiful woman is not claimed here.

Evidently Abimelech was anxious only for a closer connection with the powerful Abraham (cf 21 23. 27). Then, too, all the sources ascribe an advanced age to Sarah (cf 21 6 J+E; 18 12 f J; 17 17 P).

7. The tôl'dhōth of Ishmael (25 12-18): 12 princes descended from Ishmael (see under 6 [d] [γ]).

8. The tôl'dhōth of Isaac (25 19-35 29): The correct conception of the fundamental thought can be gained at once in the beginning of this section (25 22 f): Jeh's oracle to Rebekah, that the older of the twins, with whom she was pregnant, should serve the younger; also in Rom 9 10 ff with reference to Mal 1 2 f; and finally, the constant reference made to Esau in addition to Jacob until the former ceases to be a factor in this history in ch 36. Accordingly in the end everything is made dependent on the one hand on Jacob's election, notwithstanding his wrongdoings, on the other hand, on Esau's rejection notwithstanding his being the first-born, or in other words, upon the perfectly free grace of God; and all the different sources alike share in this fundamental thought. But in dividing between the different parts of this section, we must particularly draw attention to this, that in all of these parts both thoughts in some way or other find their expression.

(1) The Biblical text.—Containing 10 parts (see under II, 1), namely (a) 25 19-26, the birth of Esau and Jacob; (b) 25 27-34, Esau despises and loses his birthright; (c) 26 1-35, Isaac receives the blessing of Abraham, which afterward is transmitted to Jacob, while Esau, through his marriage with heathen women, prepares the way for his rejection (vs 34 f); (d) 27 1-40, Jacob steals the blessing of the firstborn; (e) 27 41-45, Jacob's flight out of fear of Esau's vengeance; (f) 27 46-28 9, Jacob is sent abroad out of fear of his brother's bad example; (g) 28 10-32 33, Jacob in a strange land and his fear of Esau, which is overcome in his contest of prayer in Peniel on his return: (a) 28 10-22, the ladder reaching to heaven in Bethel when he went abroad; (b) 29 1-30 43, twenty years with Laban (see 31 38); (γ) 31 1-54, Jacob's departure from Mesopotamia; (δ) 32 1-33, his return home; (h) ch 33, reconciliation with Esau, who returns to Seir (ver 16; cf 32 4), while Jacob becomes the owner of property in the Holy Land (vs 19 f); (i) 34 1-35 22, Jacob remains in this land, notwithstanding the slaughter made by his sons Simeon and Levi (cf 34 30; 35 5); the new appearance of God in Bethel, with a repetition of the story of the changing of Jacob's name, with which the story of Jacob's youth is closed, and which presupposes the episode at Bethel (cf 35 1.6b.9-15 with 28 10 ff), and which is not in contradiction with the first change in the name of Jacob in ch 32 (cf the twofold naming of Peter in Jn 1 43 and Mt 16 18). Esau is yet mentioned in 35 1.7, where there is a reference made to Jacob's flight before him; (j) 35 23-29, Jacob's 12 sons as the bearers of the promise; while Esau is mentioned only as participating in Isaac's burial, but inwardly he has no longer any part in the history of the kingdom of God, as is seen from ch 36, and in 32 4; 33 16 is already hinted at. In this section, too, evidently there are groups, each of two parts belonging together, namely (a)+(b) describing the earliest youth; (c)+(d) in which Isaac plays a prominent part; (e)+(f) both of which do not exclude but supplement each other in assigning the motives for Jacob's flight; (g)+(h) Jacob's flight and reconciliation; (i)+(j) Jacob both according to family and dwelling-place as the recognized heir of the promise.

(2) Rejection of the division into sources.—As 25 29 f 26b; 26 34 f; 27 46-28 9; 29 24.29; 31 18; 35 6a. 9-12.15; 35 22b-29; 36 6-30.40-43 are ascribed to P, it is clear that these are in part such ridiculously small extracts, that we should be justified in attributing them to a sensible author. The whole sojourn in Mesopotamia is ignored in P, according to the critics, except the brief notices in 29 24.29; 33 18. Further, the parts of the rest of the text cannot in many cases be dispensed with; as, e.g. we do not know in 25 26b who was born; nor in 26 34 f who Esau was; nor in 27 46 who Jacob was; nor in 29 24 who Laban was; nor in 29 24.29 in what connection and for what purposes Leah and Rachel are mentioned. P makes no mention of any promise given to Isaac, which is, however, presupposed in 35 12 and later in Ex 2 24. In 28 1 f P is most closely connected with J (cf 12 1-3, the blessing of Abraham, and ch 24). It is, further, impossible to separate the sources E and J in ch 28 (ladder reaching to heaven); cf 28 10-12. 17 f.20-22 E, vs 13-16 J, ver 19, and the name of God in ver 21 R, and this proposed division actually becomes absurd in chs 29 f in the story of the birth of Jacob's children, which are said to be divided between the sources J and E.

9. The tôl'dhōth of Esau (36 1-37 1): In 7 divisions (see under 1), namely (a) 36 1-5 R, Esau's family; the different names for Esau's wives, as compared with 26 34 f; 28 7-9 P, are doubtless based on the fact that oriental women are apt to change their names when they marry; and the fact that these names are without further remark mentioned by the side of the others is rather an argument against the division into sources than for it; (b) 36 6-8, Esau's change of abode to Seir, which, according to 32 4; 33 14.16, already took place before Jacob's return. Only in case that Esau (35 29) would have afterward remained for a longer period in Canaan, could we think of a new separation in this connection. It is more probable that at this place all those data which were of importance in connection with this separation are once more given without any reference to their difference in point of time; (c) 36 9-14, Esau as the founder of the Edomites (in ver 9 the word tôl'dhōth is repeated from ver 1, while the narrative of the descendants of Esau begins only at this later passage in so far as these were from Seir; cf ver 9 with ver 5, and above, under II, 1); (d) 36 15-19, the leading line of the sons of Esau; (e) 36 20-30, genealogy of the original inhabitants of the country, mentioned because of their connection with Esau (cf ver 25 with ver 2); (f) 36 31-39, the elective kingdoms of Edom; (g) 36 40-43, the Edomites' chief line of descent, arranged according to localities. We have here accordingly geographical accounts, and not historical or genealogical, as in 36 15 ff. 20 ff (30); cf also vs 40.43, for which reason we find also names of women.

10. The tôl'dhōth of Jacob (37 2-50 26):

(1) The Biblical text.—The key to the history of Joseph is found in its conclusion, viz. in 50 14-21, in the confession of Joseph, in the light of his past, namely, that God has ended all things well; and in 50 22 ff, in his confidence in the fulfilment of the Divine promise in the lives of those God has chosen; cf also Ps 105 16 ff. According to the two viewpoints in 50 14-26, and without any reference to the sources, this whole pericope (37 2-50 15) is divided into two halves, each of five subdivisions, or a total of ten (see under II, 1). In the exact demonstration of this, not only the contents themselves, but also regard for the different names for God will often render good service, which names, with good effect, are found at the close and in harmony with the fundamental thought of the entire section, viz. (a) 37 2-39 6a, Joseph enters Potiphar's house (4 pieces, see under 6, 1, namely [a] 37 2-11, the hatred of the brethren, [β] 37 12-36, selling Joseph, [γ] 38 1 ff, the Jehovah-displeasing conduct in the house of Judah, cf 38 7.10, [δ] 39 1-6, Jeh's pleasure in Joseph, in contrast to [γ]); (b) 39 6b-23, Joseph is cast into prison, but Jeh was with him (vs 21.23); (c) 40 1-41 52, the exaltation of Joseph, which at the end esp. is shown by the naming of Ephraim and Manasseh as caused by God, but which for the present passes by the history of his family (4 pieces, viz. [a] 40 1, interpretation of the dreams of the royal officials, [b] 41 1-36, interpretation of the two dreams of Pharaoh, [c] 41 37-46a, the exaltation of Joseph, [d] 41 46b-52, Joseph's activity for the good of the country); (d) 41 55-46 7, Joseph becomes a blessing to his family; of the promise of God to Jacob in Beersheba to be with him in Egypt in 46 2 ff with 46 6-9 (in four pieces, viz. [a] 41 53-57, the general famine, [b] 43 1-38, the first journey of the brothers of Joseph, [c] 43 14-4 34, the second journey (in four subdivisions, (i) 43 1-14, the departure, (ii) 43 14-34, the reception by Joseph, (iii) 44 1-17, final trial of the brethren, (iv) 44 18-34, the intercession of Judah); [e] 45 1-46 7, Joseph makes himself known and persuades Jacob to come to Egypt); (e) 46 8-47 26, Joseph continues to be a blessing to his family and to Egypt (in 4 subdivisions, of which the 4th is placed in contrast to the first 3 exactly as this is done in 10 1-11 9 and 11 27-28 11, viz. [a] 46 8-27, list of the descendants of Jacob, [b] 46 28-34, meeting with Joseph, [c] 47 1-12, Jacob in the presence of Pharaoh, [d] 47 13-26, the Egyptians who have sold themselves and their possessions to Pharaoh laud Joseph as the preserver of their lives). From this point on the attention is now drawn to the future: (f) 47 27-31, Jacob causes Joseph to take an oath that he will have him buried in Canaan (cf ver 30 J with ch 23 P); in (e)+(f) there is also lacking a designation for God; (g) ch 48, Jacob adopts and blesses Ephraim and Manasseh (cf also the emphasis placed on the providential guidance of God in vs 8 f. 11. 15 f, esp. vs 16 and 20 ff); (h) 49 1-27, Jacob blesses his 12 sons and prophesies their future fate (here, 49 18, appears the name of Jeh, which had disappeared since ch 40; see under 11, 2, 2 (d) (a), and other designations for God, vs 24 f); (i) 49 28-33, Jacob's death after he had again expressed the wish, in the presence of all his sons, that he should be buried in Canaan; (j) 50 1-13, the body of Jacob is taken to Canaan. In these 10 pericopes again we can easily find groups of two each, viz. (a)+(b), Joseph's humiliation (sold, prison); (c)+(d), Joseph becomes a blessing to Egypt and to his family; (e)+(h), blessing of the grandchildren and the sons of Jacob; (i)+(j), Jacob's death and burial; here too the name of God is lacking as in (e) and (f).

(3) Rejection of the division into sources.—Here, too, the separation of P from the rest of the text as a distinct source is untenable, since in the section from 37 2-46 34, after 37 2, only the following fragments are attributed to this source, viz. 41 46a, 46 6 f (according to some also to ver 27). In the same way P abruptly sets in at 47 27b; 49 28b. Further, 48 3 ff knows nothing of Ephraim or Manasseh, of whom P reports nothing, so that 40 13 f are the only verses that could naturally connect with the preceding statements of P. In 47 5 ff P reports entirely in the manner of ordinary narratives, and there is no sign of any systematic arrangement. But

IV. The Historical Character.—(1) Unfounded attacks upon the historical character.—(a) Proofs from general dogmatic principles: In order to disprove the historical character of the patriarchs, the critics are accustomed to operate largely with general dogmatic principles, such as

1. History order to disprove the historical character of the patriarchs, the critics are accustomed to operate largely with general dogmatic principles, such as this, that no nation knows who its original founder was. In answer to this it can be said that the history of Israel is and was from the beginning to the end unique, and cannot be judged by the average principles of historiography. But it is then claimed that Abraham's entire life appears to be only one continuous trial of faith, which was centered on the one promise of the true heir, but that this is in reality a psychological impossibility. Over against this claim we can in reply cite contrary facts from the history of several thousands of years; and that, too, in the experience of those very men who were most prominent in religious development, such as Paul and Luther.

(b) Argument based on the time that elapsed between these events and their records: Secondly, critics emphasize the long period of time that elapsed between these events themselves and their first records, esp. if these records can be accredited to so late a period as the 9th or the 8th cent. BC. In consequence of this, it is claimed that much of the contents of Gen is myth or fable; and Gunkel even resolves the whole book into a set of unconnected little myths and fables. Over against this claim we can again appeal to the universal feeling in this matter. I do not think that it can be made plausible, that in any race fables and myths came in the course of time more and more to be accepted as actual facts, so that perchance we should now be willing to accept as historical truths the stories of the Nibelungenlied or Red Riding Hood. But this, according to the critics, must have been the case in Israel. Prophets accepted the story of the destruction of the two cities in the Jordan valley, as recorded in Gen 19, as correct (cf Am 4 11; Isa 1 9; Hos 11 8); also Abraham as a historical person (Isa 29 22; 41 8; 51 1 ff; Mic 7 20; Jer 23 26; Eze 33 24; and possibly Mal 2 15); then Isaac (Am 7 9. 16; Jer 23 26); also Jacob (Hos 12 3 ff; Am 9 8; Jer 23 26); also Joseph (Am 8 6. 15); and these prophets evidently thought that these events and persons were regarded as historical by the people in general. In the NT we can cite, for Abraham, Mt 3 9; Gal 3; 4 21 ff; Rom 4 9 ff; 9 7 ff; He 7 1 ff; 11 8 ff; Jas 2 21 ff, and esp. the words of Jesus in Mt 3 11; Lk 16 22 ff; Jn 8 52 ff; finally in Mt 23 31 ff, the whole argument for the resurrection of the dead is without a foundation if the patriarchs are not historical personages. Over against this, there was no period in the history of Israel in which it can be shown that these stories of Gen were regarded only as myths. If these events were actual occurrences, then those things which the patriarchs experienced were so unique that these experiences were not forgotten for a long time. Then, too, we can also refer to the strength of the memory of those nations that were not accustomed to have written records of their history.

(c) Proofs from the Bible itself: Finally, the attempt has been made to discover in the Bible itself a pre-Mosaic stage in its ideas of man concerning God, which is claimed to contradict the higher development of Divine ideas in the patriarchs, for which purpose the critics appeal to Ezk 23 3.8; 20 7 ff; Josh 24 14 ff. But at these places it is evident that the idolatry of the people is pictured as apostasy. And when in Ex 6 2 ff the name of Jeh is as a matter of fact represented as something new, it is nevertheless a fact that in these very passages the revelation given is connected with the history of the patriarchs. The same is true of Ex 3 1 ff. The whole hypothesis that the religion before the days of Moses was polytheistic has not been derived from the Bible, but is interpreted into it, and ends in doing violence to the facts there recorded (cf my book, Die Entwicklung der alttestamentlichen Gottesidee in vorexilischer Zeit).

(d) Comparison with the religion of Arabia: The critics further compare the pre-Mosaic religion of Israel with the low grade of religion in Arabia in the 5th cent. after Christ; but in order to do this, they must isolate Israel entirely, since all the surrounding nations at the time of the Am Tab had attained to an altogether different and higher stage of religious development and civilization.

(2) Unsatisfactory attempts at explaining the patriarchal age.—(a) The explanation based on the "high places": In denying the historical character of the account of the patriarchs in Gen, the critics are forced to contrive some scheme in explanation of the existence of these stories, but in doing this they make some bad breaks. Thus, e.g., they say that the Israelites when they entered Canaan found there the high places of the heathen peoples; and since if they wanted to make use of these in the service of Jeh they must first declare them legitimate places of worship, this was done by inventing the history of the patriarchs, who long before this are said to have already consecrated all these places to the Jeh worship. But how is it possible on this supposition to explain the story of Joseph, which transpired in Egypt? Then, too, the reasons for the origin of the other stories of the patriarchs would be enshrouded in a remarkable mystery and would be of very inferior character. Again, it is nowhere declared in the passages of Gen that here come into consideration that they are reporting the beginnings of a permanent cultus when they give an account of how God appeared to the patriarchs or when they erected altars in His honor. And, finally, while it is indeed true that the cultus localities of the patriarchs are in part identical with those of later times (cf Bethel, Beersheba)—and this is from the outset probable, because certain places, such as hills, trees, water, etc., as it were, of themselves were suitable for purposes of the cultus—yet such an identification of earlier and later localities does not cover all cases. And can we imagine that a prophetic method of writing history would have had any occasion in this manner to declare the worship of calves in Bethel a legitimate service?

(b) Explanation based on dating back later events to earlier times: But we are further told that the pre-prophetic condition of affairs in Israel was in general dated back into the primitive period, and this was done in such a way that the character of Abraham was regarded as reproducing ideal Israel, and the character of Jacob the empirical Israel in the past; something that certainly is from the outset an odd speculation of too much learning! If this explanation is correct, what shall we then do with Isaac and Joseph? And why is the whole story of the condition of civilization pictured in Gen so entirely different from that of later times? And is Abraham really a perfect ideal? Is he not rather, notwithstanding his mighty faith, a human being of flesh and blood, who can even doubt (15 2 f; 17 17); who can make use of sinful means to realize the promise (ch 16, Hagar); who tells a falsehood, although for the best of purposes, viz., to protect his wife (12 9 ff), and for this reason must accept the rebuke of the heathen Abimelech (20 9 f)? In addition, Abraham is married to his half-sister (20 12), which, according to Dt 27 22; Lev 18 9. 11; 20 17, is forbidden with the penalty of death for the transgressor. In the same way Jacob, according to Gen 29 f, has two sisters as wives, which is also declared by Lev 18 18 to be a crime.

(c) The patriarchs as eponymous heroes: In the third place, it is said that the people have in the persons of the patriarchs made for themselves eponymous heroes. But why did they make so many at one time? In addition, Abraham cannot possibly be regarded as such a hero as Jacob or Israel is, and in exceptional cases also Isaac and Joseph (Am 7 9.16; 5 6.15). It is not correct to place genealogies like those in Gen 10 1 ff; 25 1 ff. 13 ff on a level with the stories concerning the patriarchs. In the latter case we are dealing with individualities of pronounced character, who in the experiences of their lives represent great fundamental principles and laws in the kingdom of God—Abraham, the principle of the grace of God, to which faith on the part of man is the counterpart; Jacob, the principle of Divine election; Joseph, that of the providential guidance of life; while Isaac, it is true, when he becomes prominent in the history, evinces no independent character, but merely follows in the footsteps of Abraham (cf 26 1 ff. 3 ff. 15.18.24 ff), but is in this very imitative life pictured in an excellent way.

(d) Different explanations combined: If we combine two or more of these different and unsatisfactory attempts at an explanation of the history of the patriarchs, we must become all the more distrustful, because the outcome of this combination is such an inharmonious scheme.

(3) Positive reasons for the historical character of Genesis.—The individuality of the patriarchs as well as their significance in the entire development of the history of the kingdom of God, and their different missions individually; further, the truthful portraiture of their method of living, which had not yet reached the stage of permanent settlement; and, finally, the fact that the prophets, the NT and above all Jesus Himself regard their historical character as something self-evident (see [1b] above), make the conviction a certainty, that we must insist upon their being historical personages; esp., too, because the attacks on this view (see [1] above), as also the efforts to explain these narratives on other grounds (see [2] above), must be pronounced to be failures. To this we must add the following: If Moses were the founder of the religion of Israel, it would scarcely have been possible that a theory would have been invented and have found acceptance that robs Moses of this honor by the invention of the story of the patriarchs. Rather the opposite would be the case. Besides, this older revelation of God is absolutely necessary in order to make Moses' work and success intelligible and possible. For he himself expressly declares that his work is based on the promises of God given to the fathers. Through this connection with the older revelation it was possible for Moses to win the attention and the confidence of the people (cf Ex 2 24; 3 6.13 ff; 4 5; 6 3.8; 15 2; 32 13 ff; 33 1; cf also my book, Die Entwicklung der alttestamentlichen Gottesidee in vorerzählischer Zeit, 117 ff; and Strack, Genesis, 93 ff).

Individuality of patriarchs: In so far as the history of the patriarchs contains miracles, they are in perfect harmony with the entire character of sacred history (cf Exodus, III, 2); and as far as the number of miracles is concerned, there are in fact fewer reported in the days of the patriarchs than in the times of Moses. On the view that the history of the patriarchs, which is earlier than the period of Moses, was an invention and not history, the opposite condition of affairs could be expected. Leaving out of consideration the unsatisfactory instances cited under V, 2, below, there is to be found also in the Book of Gen absolutely no reference to indicate events of a later period, which would throw a doubt on the historical character of what is here reported. In every direction (e.g. in connection with the theophanies and the cultus worship), there is a noticeable progress to be seen in going from Gen to Ex, a fact which again is an important argument for the historical reliability of the contents of both books. Finally, we add the following. Ch 14 (the Chedorlaomer and the Melchizedek episodes) has through recent archaeological researches been brilliantly confirmed as far as the names are concerned, as also in reference to the political conditions of the times, the general historical situation and the chronology. In the same way the religious conditions of Egypt, as described in Gen 12, and in the entire history of Joseph, are so faithfully pictured that it is absolutely impossible to regard these accounts as the work of imagination. These accounts must be the outcome, on the part of the author, of a personal knowledge of these things and conditions, as they are absolutely correct, even to the details of the coloring.

(1) Prominence of the religious element.—In the primitive history as recorded in the opening chapters of Gen we must yet emphasize, more than is done elsewhere, that the chief interest for the Christian is found in the religious and moral teachings of this account; and that these teachings remain unshaken, even when chronological, historical, archaeological, physical, geographical or philological sciences would tempt us to reach negative conclusions. It is a wise thing, from the outset, not to be too timid in this direction, as to concede considerable liberty in this matter, when we remember that it is not the purpose of the Bible to give us scientific knowledge in scientific forms, but to furnish us with religious and ethical thoughts in a language which a childlike mind, that is open to Divine things, can understand.

(2) Carefulness as regards divergent results of scientific research.—On the other hand, it is right over against the so-called "results" of these different sciences to be very critical and skeptical, since in very many cases science retracts today what with a flourish of trumpets it declared yesterday to be a "sure" result of investigations; e.g. as far as the chronology is concerned, the natural and the historical sciences often base their computations on purely arbitrary figures, or on those which are constructed entirely upon conclusions of analogy, and are far from conclusive. If perchance the history of the earth or of mankind has not at all times developed at the same pace, i.e. has moved upward and downward, as e.g. a child in its earlier years will always learn more rapidly than at any later period of its life.

(3) Frequent confirmations of the Bible by science.—But finally the Holy Scriptures, the statements of which at this period are often regarded slightly by the theologians, are regarded much more highly by men of science. This is done, e.g., by such scientists as Reinke and K. E. von Baer, who declare that Moses, because of his story of the creation, was a man of unsurpassed and unsurpassable scientific thought; or when many geological facts point to such an event as the Deluge in the history of the earth. The history of languages, as a whole and in its details, also furnishes many proofs for the correctness of Gen 10, and that chapter has further been confirmed in a most surprising manner by many other discoveries (cf the existence of Babel at a period earlier than Nineveh, and the colonizing of Assur by Babel). Then facts like the following can be explained only on the presupposition that the reports in Gen are correct, as when a Dutchman in the 17th cent. built an ark after the measurements given in Gen and found the vessel in every particular adapted to its purposes; and when today we again hear specialists who declare that the modern ocean sailing vessel is being more and more constructed according to the relative proportions of the ark.

(4) The superiority of the Bible over heathen mythologies.—Finally, the similarity of the Bib. and the Bab accounts of the creation and the Deluge, as these have been discovered by learned research (and we confine ourselves to these two most important reports)—although this similarity has been misinterpreted and declared to be hostile to the historical reliability and the originality of Gen 1 and 6-9—does not prove what critics claim that it does. Even if we acknowledge that the contents of these stories were extant in Babylon long before the days of Moses, and that these facts have been drawn from this source by Israel, there yet can be no question that the value of these accounts, the fact that they are saturated with a monotheistic and ethical spirit, is found only in Israel and has been breathed into them only by Israel. For the inner value of a story does not depend upon its antiquity, but upon its spirit. But even this conception of the matter, which is shared by most theologians, cannot satisfy us. When we remember how Bab mythology is honeycombed by the grossest superstition and heathenism, and that our ethical feelings are often offended by it in the most terrible manner, it is really not possible to see how such a system could have had any attraction for Israel after the Spirit, and how a man who thought as a prophet could have taken over such stories. If Israel has been a pathfinder in the sphere of religion, as is acknowledged on all hands, why do the critics always talk of their borrowing from others? And then, since similar stories are found also among other nations, and as the natural sciences are anything but a unit in hostility to the Bib. narratives, all these factors can find a satisfactory explanation only on the supposition that there existed an original or primitive revelation, and that in Israel this revelation was transmitted in its greater purity, while among the other nations it was emptied of its contents or was perverted. In this way the universality of these stories can be explained, as also the inferiority in character of similar stories among the other nations.

The particularly close connection that exists between the Bab and the Bib. versions of these stories is in perfect harmony with the fact that it was from Babylon that the dispersion of mankind set in. The purity of the Bib. tradition is further attested by the fact that it reports the actual history of all mankind (see under I, 2), while the mythologies of other nations are restricted nationally and locally, i.e. the beginnings of the history of the individual nations and the beginnings of the history of mankind are identical, and the earliest history is always reported as taking place in the native land of the people reporting it. The fact that in earlier times there prevailed in Babylon too a purer knowledge of God, which, however, steadily degenerated, is proved by many data, and esp. by the recently discovered fragment of a Deluge story, according to which the God who destroyed the world by the Flood and the God who delivered the one family is the same God, which is in perfect agreement with the Bible, but is in contradiction to the later Bab story. That in earlier times a purer conception of God prevailed, seems to be confirmed also by the experiences of the missionaries. Evolutionism, i.e. the development of a higher conception of God out of a lower, is nothing but an unproved theory, which at every step is contrary to actual facts. Cf also my book, Die Entwicklung der Gottesidee in vorerzilischer Zeit, 129 ff, and Schmidt, Die babylonische Religion: Gedanken über ihre Entwicklung, a dissertation in which the fact that religion naturally degenerates is proved also as far as the Greeks, the Egyptians, the East Indians and the Chinese are concerned.

V. Origin and Authorship of Genesis.—That the Book of Gen stands in some kind of literary

1. Connection with Mosaic Times connection with the succeeding books of the Pent is generally acknowledged. But if this is the case, then the question as to the origin and the time of the composition of this whole body of books can be decided only if we take them all into consideration. In this article we have only to consider those facts which are found in Gen for the solution of this problem. It is self-evident that the conclusion we have reached with reference to the literary unity of the book is of great importance for this question (see under II and III above). The historical character of the book, as demonstrated under IV above, also speaks emphatically for this claim that the literary composition of the book must have taken place when the memory of these events was still trustworthy, and the impression and experiences were still fresh and had not yet faded. Such individualistic and vivid pictures of historical personages as are reported by Gen, such a faithful adherence to the accounts of the civilization in the different countries and districts and at different times, such detailed accounts of foreign customs, conditions and historical events, could scarcely have been possible, if the Mosaic age with its powerful new impressions, the period of the Judges, with its characteristic apostasy, or even the division of Israel into two kingdoms, with its dire effects on the external union of the people, had all passed by before these accounts were actually written down. On the other hand, the highly developed prophetic conception of these events, and the skilful plan of the book demand that the author must have been a religious and ethical personality of the first rank. And as, finally, it is scarcely credible that Moses would have failed to provide for a systematic report of the great past of the people, for which account, before this and as long as only family histories were involved, there was no need felt, and as the subsequent books of the Pent, which are acknowledged in a literary way to be connected with Gen, in many of their parts expressly declare that Moses was their author (cf Exodus, IV), the Mosaic authorship of this book is as good as proved. This is not to deny that older sources and documents were used in the composition of the book, such as perhaps the genealogical tables or the events recorded in Gen 14, possibly, too, some referring to the history of the times before the Deluge and before Abraham. This is probable; but as all the parts of the book have been worked together into a literary unity (see under II and III above), and as such sources are not expressly mentioned, it is a hopeless task to try to describe these different sources in detail or even to separate them as independent documents, after the manner refuted under II and III above, as a theory and in its particulars. And for the age of Gen, we can refer to the fact that the personal pronoun here is still used for both genders, masculine and feminine, which is true also of the word na'ar ("youth"), a peculiarity which is shared also by the other books of the Pent almost throughout.

(1) Possibility of later additions.—In itself it would be possible that from time to time some explanatory and interpreting additions could have been made to the original text, in case we find indications of a later period in some statements of the book. But that in this case these additions could not have been made by any unauthorized persons, but only officially, should, in the case of a book like Gen, be regarded as self-evident. But in our times this fact must be emphasized all the more, as in our days the most radical ideas obtain in reference to the way in which sacred books were used in former times. And then it must be said that we cannot prove as an absolute certainty that there is a single passage in Gen that originated in the post-Mosaic period.

(2) Rejection of the "prophecy-after-the-event" idea.—It is self-evident also that the fulfilment of a prophecy is not an evidence of a "prophecy after the event" (vaticinium post eventum), altogether independently of the fact that in this case Gen 12 1-3, which is still in process of fulfilment, could not have been written down even today (cf on this matter, perhaps, Noah's prophecy [9 25 ff]; or the prediction of the career of Esau [25 23; 27 40]; or of Ishmael [16 10 ff; 21 18]; or Jacob's blessing [Gen 49]). The last-mentioned case cannot in any way be interpreted as the product of a later time; cf the curse of Levi in vs 5-8 as compared with the honor bestowed on this tribe already in the Mosaic period (Ex 32 26-29; Dt 33 8-11), and in the time of the Judges (Jgs 17 7-13; 1 S 2 27 f). Zebulun, too, according to 49 13 is regarded as being settled on the coast, which is not in agreement with historical reality (cf Josh 19 10-16.27). In the same way the curse on Simeon in 49 5-7, which declared that his tribe should be distributed among Israel, was not fulfilled in the time when the people entered Canaan (cf Josh 19 1 and 2 Ch 34 6). In 49 10 "Shiloh" cannot refer to the coming of the tabernacle to Shiloh (cf Josh 18 1); for Shiloh is, on the other hand, to be interpreted personally and Messianically. As long as Shiloh was of any importance (cf 1 S 1 ff), Judah was not in the possession of the scepter; but when this scepter did come into the control of Judah, Shiloh had long since ceased to be of any significance (cf my book, Die messianische Erwartung der vorerzilischen Propheten, 360 f).

(3) Special passages alleged to indicate a later date (Gen 12 6; 13 7; 22 2; 36 31 ff; 13 18; 23 2; 14 14).—In Gen 12 6; 13 7, it is claimed that it is presupposed that at the time of the author there were no longer any Canaanites in the country, so that these verses belong to a much later period than that of Moses. But on this supposition these verses would be altogether superfluous and therefore unintelligible additions. For that in the time of Abraham the Canaanites had not yet been expelled by Israel, was a self-evident matter for every Israelite. As a matter of fact, the statements in both verses can easily be interpreted. Abraham leaves his native country to go into a strange land. When he comes to Canaan, he finds it inhabited by the Canaanites (cf 10 6.15; 9 25 ff). This could have made his faith to fail him. God, accordingly, repeats His promise at this very moment and does so with greater exactness (cf ver 7 with ver 1), and Abraham shows that God can trust his faith (vs 7 f). The question whether the Canaanites no longer existed at the time the book was written, has nothing at all to do with the meaning of these verses. The same is true of 13 7, on account of the presence of the Canaanites and of the Perizzites, which latter tribe had probably come in the meanwhile and is not yet mentioned in Gen 10, but is mentioned in

That in Gen 22 2 the land of Moriah is mentioned is claimed by the critics to be a proof that this passage was written after the times of David and even of Solomon, because according to 2 Ch 3 1 the temple stood on Mt. Moriah. But as in this latter passage one particular mountain is called Moriah, but in Abraham's time a whole country was so called, it is scarcely possible that Gen 22 2 could have been written at so late a period.

Usually, too, the list of 8 Edomite kings, who ruled before there was a king of Israel, according to 36 31 ff, is cited as a proof that this part was written only after the establishment of the kingdom in Israel, although the time down to the age of Saul would be entirely too long for only eight kings, as already in the Mosaic period there were kings in Edom (Nu 20 14). Then, too, we find in the days of Solomon a hereditary kingdom in Edom (1 K 11 14), while in Gen 36 31 ff we have to deal with an elective kingdom. Also it would be impossible to understand why this list of kings is carried down only so far and no farther, namely down to the time when there were kings in Israel. This statement can properly be interpreted only in the light of 17 6,16, where the promise is given to Abraham that kings should be found among his descendants (cf also 17 20 with 25 16); and in the light of ch 14, where Abraham is explicitly brought into connection with kings in a number of ways (with the four kings of the East, whom he conquers; with the five kings of the Jordan valley, whom he assists; with the King's Vale [ver 17], which prepared the way for the Melchisedek episode; and with this Priest-King himself, who blesses him and to whom he gives tithes [vs 18 ff]; with the king of Sodom, whom he rebukes [vs 21 ff]). Accordingly, the statement in 36 31 is not merely a dry historical notice, but is a reference to the blessing of God, which is realized in Israel at a much later time than in the kindred tribe of Esau, and which puts the faith of Israel to a new test. As the death of the last Edomite king is not mentioned (cf 36 39 in contrast to the preceding passage and to 1 Ch 1 50 f), but as detailed family data are given, we are doubtless dealing here with living contemporaries of Moses, in whose time already the Edomites possessed a kingdom (Nu 20 14; Jgs 11 17), just as this was the case with Amalek (Nu 24 7), with Moab (21 26; 22 4) and Midian (Nu 31 8). And why would a later writer have mentioned neither Selah (Petra), so important in later times (cf Isa 16 1; Jgs 1 36; 2 K 14 7), nor Ezion-Geber (1 K 9 26; 2 Ch 8 17 f), among the places given in Gen 36 40 ff? In Moses' time, however, the last-mentioned place was only prairie (Nu 33 35 f).

Just as little is it an argument against the Mosaic times that Hebron is mentioned in Gen 13 18; 23 2, which city, according to Josh 14 15; 15 13, is called Kiriath-arba, a name which Gen also is acquainted with (cf 23 2), and which in its signification of "city of Arba" points to an originally proper name. Hebron is the older name, which was resumed at a later period, after it had in the meanwhile been supplanted by the Canaanitic name, just as the name of Salem, which occurs already in the Am Tab, for a period of time gave way to the name of Jebus, but was afterward resumed. That Hebron was an old city and that it existed at a period earlier than the Arba mentioned in Josh 14 15; 15 13, and from whom its later name was derived, can be concluded from Nu 13 22.

Further, the mention of Dan in 14 14 does not necessarily favor the view that this chapter did not originate until after Josh 19 47. Jgs 18 29, where Leshem or Laish is changed into Dan (2 S 24 6; cf vs 2 and 15), does make the existence of another Dan probable. Since in Gen 14 2,3,7,17 so many ancient names are mentioned, and as the author is most fully informed as to the conditions of the political complexion of the old nations of that time (vs 5-7), it would be incomprehensible if he should not have made use of the ancient names Laish and Leshem. However, if this Dan was really meant, we should at most have to deal with a revision, such as that pointed out above. Some other less important arguments against the origin of Gen from the Mosaic times we can here ignore. The most important argument for the Mosaic origin of the book, in addition to those mentioned under 1, will now be discussed.

VII. Significance.—In the history of the creation the most important feature for us is the fact that the world was created out of nothing (cf 1 1 and the word bārā'), which guarantees the absoluteness of God and His perfect control of the entire material world; further, the creation of man, as the crown of all creation, for which all things previously created prepare, and who is to rule over them, but who—most important of all—is created after the image of God (1 26 f), and whose body has been created by the hand of God and his soul breathed into him by God (2 7). On this fact, too, in the end, is founded the possibility of man's redemption even after the Fall (5 1,3; cf Col 3 9; Eph 4 24), as also the possibility of the incarnation of Jesus Christ, who also is the image of God (Col 1 15; 2 Cor 4 4). Then, too, another all-important factor for us is the unity of the human race, for thereby is made possible and can be understood the fact that all men have become subject to sin and all can be the recipients of grace (Rom 5 12 f; 1 Cor 15 22 f,45 f). Also the need of redemption is brought out strongly in the Book of Gen. Cf, in connection with the Fall, the pains that shall attend the birth of a child, the cursing of the land, death (3 15 ff), which finds its first victim in Abel, and the monotonous and emphatic repetition of the formula, "and he died," in Gen 5, as characterizing the dismal fate of mankind, and which finds its expression in the rapid decrease of the length of life in the genealogies and in the ages of the patriarchs (5 1 ff; 11 10 ff; 25 7; 35 28; 47 28; 50 26; Ps 90 10), and in the irresistible and increasing power of death. By the side of this, sin at once assumes its most horrible form (Gen 3, doubt, pride, fear, boldness of Eve and Adam), and is propagated and increases; cf the murder and the despair of Cain (Gen 4 1 ff), which is still surpassed by the defiant blasphemy of Lamech (4 23 f); and in the same way, death, which is coming more and more rapidly (see above), is a proof for this, that sin is being more and more intimately interwoven with the human race. Cf, further, the corruption of the whole earth, which brings with it as a consequence the judgment of the Deluge (6 5 ff), after the period of grace extending over 120 years had fruitlessly passed by; the lack of reverence on the part of Ham (9 22); the arrogance in connection with the building of the tower of Babel (11 1 ff); the Sodomitic sin in 18 16—19 15; the daughters of Lot (19 30 ff). Still worse is it, that the elect also are not without blame. On Abraham, see IV, 1, 2b; then concerning Noah (9 21) and Lot's fearful drunkenness (19 32 ff); Isaac's and Rebekah's preference for Esau or Jacob (25 28); Jacob's deceptions of various kinds, his preference for Joseph (37 3); the horrible deeds of Simeon and Levi (34 25 ff; 49 5 ff); Reuben's incest (35 22; 49 3 f); the cruelty of the brethren of Joseph toward him and his father (ch 37); finally, Joseph's pride and his reporting his brethren (37 2,5 ff). In short, wherever we look, we see in Gen already a proof for the truth of Rom 3 23, "All have sinned, and fall short of the glory of God."

By the side of this need of salvation there is to be found also the longing for salvation; of the name of Noah (5 29), and the word of blessing from the lips of Jacob (49 18);

2. Preparation for Redemption reaches out after the promised heir in Gen 15-18, and his desire for the possession of the land (12-14; 23; 28 20 ff; 33 19 f); and esp. from 47 27 on. And in harmony with this need and this longing for redemption we find above all other things the saving and the promising grace of God. He does not cause the bodily death to follow immediately upon the Fall in Gen 3 (although the beginning of the spiritual death sets in at once with the separation from God); He provides for mankind by Himself making garments for them out of skins (3 21); even the expulsion from Paradise is not merely a punishment; God fears that man might live forever if he should eat from the tree of life (3 22 ff). He sets enmity between the human race and the seed of the serpent, so that at least the possibility of a moral contest yet exists; He strengthens the good in Cain (4 7); He removes the pious Enoch (5 24); He saves Noah and his family and makes a covenant with him (8 21 ff); He gives His promise to Abraham (12 1-3) and makes a covenant with him (chs 15, 17); He delivers Lot (19 13 ff); He is willing even to preserve Sodom at Abraham's prayer, if there are as many as 10 just men in the city (18 32); He bestows a blessing on Ishmael also (16 10 ff; 17 20; 21 13 ff), and permits Isaac to bless Esau (27 39 ff); but above all He is with Isaac, Jacob and Joseph. It is indeed true that the thought runs through Gen that not all men are capable of receiving His grace, and that not all are drawn to the Father. Cain's sacrifice is not acceptable before God, as was Abel's; the Cainites with their advance in civilization (4 17 ff), to whom Lamech also belonged, are different from Seth (4 26; 5 1 ff), who continues the line of the elect. Finally, the godly, too, permit themselves to be deceived (6 1 ff), and Noah stands alone in his piety. After that Ham is cursed in his youngest son, Canaan (9 22; cf 10 6); but Shem is blessed to such a degree that his blessing is to extend to Japheth also; cf, further, the elimination from sacred history of Lot (19 29 ff); of Ishmael (25 12 ff), and of Esau (36 1 ff); of Sodom and Gomorrah (ch 19); then the choice of Jacob in preference to Esau (25 19-37 1); the preference of Ephraim over Manasseh (48 17 ff); the transmission of the Messianic promises to Judah (49 10; cf my book, Messianische Erwartung, 360 f), so that at the close of Gen we find already the hope of a personal Messiah expressed, in whom also the word (3 15) that was originally spoken to all mankind is to be entirely fulfilled, and in whom also the blessing given to Abraham shall find its significance and realization for the benefit of all mankind (12 3, and see above, 1, 2 and 3). But in the history of Abraham this fact also becomes clear, that in the end this was all grace on the part of God, and faith on the part of man; and because both grace and faith are in Gen placed and emphasized at the very beginning of the history of mankind, and before the giving of the law (Ex 19 ff); then this grace and faith cannot be abrogated through the latter or made ineffective. Not by works but by faith is man saved (cf Gal 3 2; Rom 4; He 11 8 ff; Jas 2 21 ff). But the guidance of individuals and of His people by God, the ways which He took with His elect, become clear and intelligible ultimately in the history of Joseph; and all and everything must in the end serve the good of those who are His.

WILHELM MÖLLER

GENNAEUS, ge-nē'us, GENNEUS, ge-nē'us (Γέννατος, Gennatos): Father of Apollonius, one of the Syrian generals who troubled the Jews while Lysias was governor for Antiochus Eupator (2 Mace 12 2). The description is added to distinguish the Apollonius here mentioned from several others of the same name. See APOLLONIUS. There is no need with Luther to take the name simply as an adj. "des edlen Apollonius." The name occurs elsewhere as a proper name.

GENNESARET, ge-nes'a-ret, LAKE OF. See GALILEE, SEA OF.

GENNESARET, LAND OF, ge-nes'a-ret (גֶּנֶזַר, Gēnezār): The first syllable of the name Gennesaret is evidently the Heb 1. The Name gan, "garden"; while the second may be a proper name. Possibly, however, the name may represent the Heb gannē sārīm, "princely gardens." It is applied to a district on the N.W. shore of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 14 34; Mk 6 53), now known as el-Ghuweir, "little Ghör." It curves round from el-Mejdel in the S., to 'Ain el-Tineh, or Khān Minyeh, in the N., a distance of over 3 miles, with an average breadth from the sea to the foot of the mountains of about a mile. The soil is deep, rich loam, of amazing fertility. In the S. it is watered by the stream from Wādī el-Hamām, the 2. Water gorge that opens to the W. of el-Mejdel. The middle portion is supplied from 'Ain el-Madawwerah, a copious fountain near the western edge of the plain, round which a wall has been built, to raise the level of the water; and from the perennial stream, Wādī er-Rubadyeh, which drives a mill before starting on its work of irrigation. Farther N., Wādī el-'Amūd brings down much water in the rainy season. The water from 'Ain el-Tābgha was brought round the promontory at 'Ain el-Tineh by a conduit cut in the rock. It was used to drive certain mills, and also to refresh the neighboring land. This seems to be the fountain called "Capharnaum" by Jos (BJ, III, x, 8). This writer extols the productiveness of the plain. He says the "soil is so fruitful that all sorts of trees can grow upon it." The walnut, the palm, the olive and the fig, which usually require 3. Fertility diverse conditions, flourish together here. "One may call this place the ambition of nature; . . . it is a happy contention of the seasons, as if each of them claimed this country; for it not only nourishes different sorts of autumnal fruit beyond men's expectation, but preserves them a great while." He says that it supplies grapes and figs through ten months of the year, and other fruits as they ripen together throughout the year (ib). The fruits of Gennesaret had such high repute among the rabbis that they were not allowed in Jerus at the time of the feasts, lest any might be tempted to come merely for their enjoyment (Neubauer, Géog. du Talm., 45 f).

Centuries of neglect made a sad change in the plain. It was largely overgrown with thorn-bushes, and it yielded one of the finest crops of thistles in the country. Cultivation was confined to the S.W. part; and the rest furnished grazing ground for a tribe of nomads. Recently the German Catholics made extensive purchases, including the village of el-Mejdel. Considerable portions have also passed into the hands of Jews. The land is almost entirely cleared, and it rewards the toil of the husbandman with all its ancient generosity. W. EWING

GENTILES, jen'tīlz (גֵּוִי, gōy, pl. גֵּוִיִּם, gōyim; ἔθνος, éthnos, "people," "nation"): Goy (or Goi) is rendered "Gentiles" in AV in some 30 passages, but much more frequently "heathen," and oftener still, "nation," which latter is the usual rendering in RV, but it is commonly used for a non-Israelitish people, and thus corresponds to the meaning of "Gentiles." It occurs, however, in passages referring to the Israelites, as in Gen 12 2; Dt 32 28; Josh 3 17; 4 1; 10 13; 2 S 7 23; Isa 1 4; Zeph 2 9, but the word 'ām (אִם) is the term commonly used for the people of God. In the NT éthnos is the word corresponding to gōy in the OT and is rendered "Gentiles" by both VSS, while laós (λαός) is the word which corresponds to 'ām. AV also renders Ἑλλήνες, Hēllēnes, "Gentiles" in six passages (Jn 7 35; Rom 2 9.10; 3 9; 1 Cor 10 32; 12 13), but RV renders "Greeks."

The Gentiles were far less sharply differentiated from the Israelites in OT than in NT times. Under OT regulations they were simply non-Israelites, not from the stock of Abraham, but they were not hated or despised for that reason, and were to be treated almost on a plane of equality, except certain tribes in Canaan with regard to whom there were special regulations of non-intercourse. The Gentile stranger enjoyed the hospitality of the Israelite who was commanded to love him (Dt 10 19), to sympathize with him, "For ye know the heart of the stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Ex 23 9 AV). The Kenites were treated almost as brethren, esp. the children of Rechab (Jgs 1 16; 5 24; Jer 35). Uriah the Hittite was a trusted warrior of David (2 S 11); Ittai the Gittite was captain of David's guard (18 2); Araunah the Jebusite was a respected resident of Jerus. The Gentiles had the right of asylum in the cities of refuge, the same as the Israelites (Nu 35 15). They might even possess Israelitish slaves (Lev 25 47), and a gentile servant must not be defrauded of his wage (Dt 24 15). They could inherit in Israel even as late as the exile (Ezk 47 22.23). They were allowed to offer sacrifices in the temple at Jerus, as is distinctly affirmed by Jos (BJ, II, xvii, 2-4; Ant, XI, viii, 5; XIII, viii, 2; XVI, ii, 1; XVIII, v, 3; Cap, II, 5), and it is implied in the Levitical law (Lev 22 25). Prayers and sacrifices were to be offered for gentile rulers (Jer 29 7; Bar 1 10.11; Ezr 6 10; 1 Macc 7 33; Jos, BJ, II, x, 4). Gifts might be received from them (2 Macc 5 16; Jos, Ant, XIII, iii, 4; XVI, vi, 4; BJ, V, xiii, 6; Cap, II, 5). But as we approach the Christian era the attitude of the Jews toward the Gentiles changes, until we find, in NT times, the most extreme aversion, scorn and hatred. They were regarded as unclean, with whom it was unlawful to have any friendly intercourse. They were the enemies of God and His people, to whom the knowledge of God was denied unless they became proselytes, and even then they could not, as in ancient times, be admitted to full fellowship. Jews were forbidden to counsel them, and if they asked about Divine things they were to be cursed. All children born of mixed marriages were bastards. That is what caused the Jews to be so hated by Greeks and Romans, as we have abundant evidence in the writings of Cicero, Seneca and Tacitus. Something of this is reflected in the NT (Jn 18 28; Acts 10 28; 11 3).

If we inquire what the reason of this change was we shall find it in the conditions of the exiled Jews, who suffered the bitterest treatment at the hands of their gentile captors and who, after their return and establishment in Judaea, were in constant conflict with neighboring tribes and esp. with the Gr rulers of Syria. The fierce persecution of Antiochus IV, who attempted to blot out their religion and Hellenize the Jews, and the desperate struggle for independence, created in them a burning patriotism and zeal for their faith which culminated in the rigid exclusiveness we see in later times. GENTLENESS, jen'tīl-nes (רַחֲמִים, 'anāh; ἐπιεικεία, epiēkeia, χρηστότης, chrēstotēs): In 2 S 22 36 'anāh, "to bend low," "to condescend," is tr^d "gentleness," "Thy gentleness hath made me great." RVm "or condescension"; so also Ps 18 35, where the word is 'anwāh, "humility," "gentleness," or "condescension." In the NT epiēkeia ("fairness," "moderation," in Acts 24 4 tr^d "clemency") is in 2 Cor 10 1 tr^d "gentleness," "the meekness and gentleness of Christ" (2 Macc 2 22 "favour," RV "forbearance"); chrēstotēs, "kindness," "usefulness," is tr^d "gentleness" in Gal 5 22 AV, RV "kindness"; chrēstós is the word tr^d "kind" (to the unthankful and evil, Lk 6 35), and chrēstotēs seems to carry in it a similar idea of active kindness.

Gentle occurs in the OT only in RV of Jer 11 19, "I was like a gentle lamb" (kebbes). In the NT it is the tr of ēpios, "mild," "gentle" (1 Thess 2 7; 2 Tim 2 24), and of epiēkēs, "fitting," "proper," etc (1 Tim 3 3 RV; Tit 3 2; Jas 3 17; 1 Pet 2 18); also, with art., Phil 4 5 (AV "moderation," RV "forbearance"). In 2 Macc 15 12 Onias is said (AV) to be "gentle [prōs] in condition," RV "in manner." W. L. WALKER

GENUBATH, gē-nū'bath (גִּנְבַּת, g'mubhath, "theft"): Son of Hadad, the fugitive Edomite prince, born and brought up at the court of Egypt, whither Hadad had fled when David conquered Edom (1 K 11 20). His mother was a sister of Tahpenes, queen of the Pharaoh who ruled Egypt at that time, and who belonged to the notoriously weak and unimportant 21st dynasty.

GEOGRAPHY, jē-og'ra-fi. See PALESTINE; TABLE OF NATIONS; WORLD.

GEOLOGY, jē-ol'o-ji, OF PALESTINE: The geology of Pal cannot be discussed intelligently without taking into consideration the surrounding regions. The accompanying map shows, with considerable freedom, the distribution of the superficial strata of Syria, Pal and Sinai, with parts of Asia Minor, Arabia and Egypt. (Data for this map were obtained from the "Geological Map of Egypt" [1:1,000,000] and from the "Carte géologique internationale de l'Europe" [1:1,500,000].) It will be noted that Crystalline, or Archaean, rocks (A) occupy extensive areas in Asia Minor, and that they are found in the S. in Sinai, Western Arabia, and Eastern and Southern Egypt. Relatively small areas of Paleozoic rocks (P) adjoin the Crystalline rocks in Sinai and Arabia and E. of Caesarea in Asia Minor. A notable area of Paleozoic occurs S.E. of the Dead Sea. This is also adjacent to Crystalline rocks, which could not be indicated on the map on account of their slight superficial extent. Bordering either the Crystalline or the Paleozoic rocks in Egypt, Sinai and Arabia are large areas of Nubian Sandstone (N). The Nubian Sandstone in turn is generally bounded by Upper Cretaceous limestone (C), and the last by Tertiary deposits (T). The Quaternary, or Recent, deposits (R) and also the Eruptive rocks (E) sustain no constant relations to any particular ones of the other formations. The Quaternary follows the great rivers and the seacoasts. The Eruptive rocks usually overlie the others. They occupy extensive areas in Asia Minor, Syria and Arabia.

If we concentrate our attention upon the Crystalline, Cretaceous, and Tertiary, which are the most extensive formations, we find that the Crystalline rocks are abundant in the S. and in the N., that the Cretaceous are most widely spread in Pal

This name was given by Russegger, who in the middle of the 19th cent. followed and studied this formation from the Suddân to Syria.

4. Nubian Sandstone (N) Wherever the Nubian Sandstone is found in contact with the Upper Cretaceous limestone it underlies the latter conformably. In Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon and Hermon (but not farther S.) it is conformably overlaid by Jurassic limestone. It follows, therefore, that its upper strata (the only ones found in the N.) must be of Lower or Middle Cretaceous age. In the S., however, the Jurassic limestone is entirely absent. In Western Sinai the Nubian Sandstone rests conformably on Carboniferous limestone, and by the Dead Sea on Cambrian limestone, while at Petra and at many other places it rests unconformably on Crystalline rocks. While the consideration of the age of the Nubian Sandstone presents no difficulty in Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon and Hermon, it is a very different matter in Western Sinai, and by the Dead Sea. Sandstone is generally supposed to be formed more rapidly than most other rocks. It is, therefore, rather stag-and Southern Syria, and the Tertiary in Northern Syria and Egypt. We may believe that the Crystalline areas of the N. and S. have been land since the end of the Archæan age, and that what are now Syria, Pal and most of Egypt remained sea for a long time afterward. The Paleozoic areas were lifted above the sea and added to the northern and southern land areas during or at the end of the Paleozoic era. The regions in which we find Nubian Sandstone or Upper Cretaceous limestone became land by the end of the Mesozoic era. Finally the Tertiary areas were lifted out of the sea. During the Quaternary period the Nile and the rivers of Mesopotamia have added large areas to the land surface.

The Crystalline rocks consist mainly of granite and crystalline schists, frequently interrupted with dykes of porphyry, diorite and other eruptives. It will be seen by the map that the Crystalline rocks are nowhere adjacent to the Mediterranean, but that they touch the Nile at Aṣūdān, where the river in pouring over these rocks makes the First Cataract, or rather did before the construction of the great dam. Granite quarried at Aṣūdān could be loaded on boats and conveyed to any city on the shores of the Mediterranean, and it is the granite of Aṣūdān of which are composed not only many of the monuments of Egypt, but also the pillars which adorned many temples in Syria and Pal.

2. Paleozoic Rocks (P) The Paleozoic rocks of Sinai and Arabia are of Carboniferous age, but do not include any beds of coal. Those E. of Caesarea are Devonian. Those S.E. of the Dead Sea are the oldest of all, being of Cambrian age.

Several formations which are well developed in the British Islands, are not found in Pal, but a small Triassic area is found near the

3. Triassic and Jurassic Rocks (J) Gulf of Alexandretta, while Jurassic strata are found in the region of Hermon and in Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon.

The small scale of the accompanying map makes it impossible to represent accurately the extent of these rocks.

gering to try to conceive of even the 2,000 ft. of sandstone at the S.E. end of the Dead Sea as having been in process of formation from the Cambrian to the Cretaceous. The Nubian Sandstone is commonly brown or reddish, but in places shows great variety of color. The temples and tombs of Petra were all carved in this rock. It is in places very friable, and in others compact and hard. The sands of the Arabian deserts have been in the main derived from it, being carried by the prevailing west winds. Where it is covered by a sheet of eruptive rock (harrah), it is protected from erosion, with the result that the land to the E. is not converted into a sandy desert (Hogarth, Penetration of Arabia). It frequently includes strata of clay and shale and thin seams of coal or lignite, and must have been deposited in seas which were at the time relatively shallow.

This is the principal rock of Pal, Lebanon, and Anti-Lebanon. Many of its strata are very fossiliferous, and no doubt exists as to its age. It furnishes the best of building stone and is a source of lime. The soils formed from it are fertile, and the mountain sides have been terraced by the patient labor of centuries.

5. Upper Cretaceous Limestone (C) A notable Tertiary fossil is the Nummulite, which occurs in abundance in the rock of the pyramids of Gizeh and in other places. Relatively small masses of Tertiary strata (not shown on the map) are found on the coast at the mouths of the principal streams of Lebanon, showing that while the mass of Lebanon had risen from the sea by the beginning of the Tertiary, the elevation was not complete. The principal river courses had, however, already been formed, and the streams were already carrying into the sea the scourings of the rocks of early Lebanon, which were being laid down to form these Tertiary strata.

These consist mainly of the superficial deposits of the Nile, the Euphrates and other large streams. At various points along the coast of Syria and Pal are extensive sand dunes. Frequently under the loose sand, or exposed, is found a sandstone which instead of being entirely siliceous, like most sandstones, is partly calcareous, containing from 15 to 25 per cent of calcium-carbonate. This is probably an aeolian formation, i.e. consolidated under the influence of the atmosphere, and not formed under the sea, like most stratified rocks. It is easily worked and is much used for building.

It may be gathered from the foregoing statements that the rocks of Pal are mainly Cretaceous. The Jurassic limestone, which in Lebanon 8. Palestine and Anti-Lebanon underlies the Nubian Sandstone, is absent in Pal, but, at least in Eastern Pal, as in Lebanon, we find the Upper Cretaceous limestone to be underlaid by the Nubian Sandstone. A striking feature of the geology of Pal is the Jordan valley fault. At some time, probably at the beginning of the Tertiary period, when Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon, and the Judean hills were being lifted out of the sea, the earth's crust was rent for at least several hundred miles along a line nearly N. and S., or more exactly from a little W. of S. to a little E. of N. This line runs through the Gulf of 'Akabah, the Wādī-'Arabah, the Dead Sea, the Jordan valley, the Sea of Tiberias, the Huleh, and the valley between Hermon and Anti-Lebanon on the one hand and Lebanon on the other. The resulting disturbance of the strata is most evident in the region of the Dead Sea. There is no evidence that the two walls of the fissure separated from one another, but the E. wall slipped up and the W. wall down for perhaps 2,000 ft., so that on the E. shore of the Dead Sea and in the valleys entering the Jordan, Dead Sea, and 'Arabah from the E., the Nubian Sandstone is exposed, underlying the Upper Cretaceous limestone, while on the W. side, even down to the level of the Dead Sea, 1,290 ft. below the Mediterranean, the Nubian Sandstone is nowhere visible, although it may be presumed to exist there also below the upper limestone. (See the accompanying ideal section, after Lartet, through Judaea, the Dead Sea and Moab.) The great fault and the subsidiary faults which accompany it occasioned the outpourings of igneous rock which are abundant along the line of the fault. The numerous hot springs (e.g. Tiberias, Wādī-Yarmūk, Wādī-Zarka-Mā'in [Callirrhoe], Wādī-ul-Hisā) may be due to subterranean streams of water coming in contact with deeply buried and still heated masses of igneous rock.

ALFRED ELY DAY

GEON, gē'on. See GIHON (Apoc).

GEPHYRUN, ge-fī'run (Γεφυρόν, Gephyrōin): In 2 Macc 12 13, referring to the capture by Judas of a stronghold E. of Jordan, RV reads, "And he also fell upon a certain city Gephyrun, . . . it was named Caspin." There appears to be some confusion in the text. There is nothing to indicate the relation between the two names. AV renders, "He went also about to make a bridge." The name of the city in Jos (Ant, XII, viii, 5) is ΕΡΗΘΩΝ (q.v.).

GERA, gē'ra (גֶּרָא, gērā, "grain"): A family name of the tribe of Benjamin, hence not necessarily a separate individual in (3) and (4) below:

- (1) A son of Benjamin (Gen 46 21).
- (2) According to 1 Ch 8 3.5.7, son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin. The name is repeated (ver 5) in the list of Bela's sons.
- (3) Father, or ancestor, of the judge Ehud (Jgs 3 15).
- (4) Father, or ancestor, of Shimei, the Benjamite, who cursed David when he fled from Absalom (2 S 16 5; 19 16.18; 1 K 2 8).

GERAH, gē'ra (גֶּרָה, gērāh, "grain" or "kernel"): A weight, the 20th part of a shekel (Ex 30 13; Lev 27 25; Nu 3 47; 18 16; Ezk 45 12). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

GERAR, gē'rār (גֶּרָר, gērār, "circle," "region"; Γεραρά, Gerarā): A town in the Philistine plain S. of Gaza (Gen 10 19), where both Abraham and Isaac sojourned for a time, and where they came into contact with Abimelech, king of G. (Gen 20 and 26, passim). The place has not been fully identified, but the site is probably in one of the branches of Wādī Sheri'a, at a place called Um Jerrār, near the coast S.W. of Gaza and 9 miles from it (SWP, III, 389-90). The site answers fairly well to the statements of Eusebius and Jerome, Onom, that it was 25 (Rom) miles S. of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin). It is actually 30 Eng. miles, but distances were not very accurately determined in early times. G. was known in the first 5 cents. AD, when it was the seat of a bishopric, and its bishop, Marcian, attended the Council of Chalcedon 451 AD. It was also the seat of a monastery.

The statements in Gen indicate that G. belonged to the Philis, and we are led to infer that Abimelech was king of that people, but it is quite certain that they did not occupy this region until after the time of Abraham, in fact only a short time before the Exodus. It is probable, however, that the writer of Gen would refer to the country as it was known in his day. The town certainly existed in the Philistine period, for it is mentioned in connection with Asa, who defeated the Ethiopian host under Zerah and pursued them in their flight unto G. (2 Ch 14 13). Besides the locality of Um Jerrār, another place in the vicinity known as Jurf el-Jerrār has been thought by some to be the site of G. Jerrār in Arab. means "jars," and it is doubtful whether it represents the Heb Gērār. Jurf means usually "steep declivity," or "precipice," and at the place mentioned many fragments of pottery were found, but this does not necessarily indicate the site of an ancient town. The site of G. is discussed in Thomson's LB, I, 196-99 (ed. 1882); Robinson's BR, II, 43-44; PEFS, 1871, 84; 1875, 162-64; 1881, 38.

GERASA, ger'a-sa, GERASENES, ger'a-sēns (Γέρασα, Gérasa; Γερασσηνός, Gerasēnōn):

(1) The town itself is not named in Scripture, and is referred to only in the expression, "country of the Gerasenes" (Mk 5 1; Lk 8 26.37; see WH, App., 11). This describes the district in which Christ met and healed the demoniac from the tombs, where also took place the destruction of the swine. It was on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, and must have been a locality where the steep edges of the Bashan plateau drop close upon the brink of the lake. This condition is fulfilled only by the district immediately S. of Wādī Semak, N. of Kal 'at el-Huyn. Here the slopes descend swiftly almost into the sea, and animals, once started on the downward run, could not avoid plunging into the depths. Many ancient tombs are to be seen in the face of the hills. Gerasa itself is probably represented by the ruins of Kurseh on the S. side of Wādī Semak, just where it opens on the seashore. The ruins of the town are not considerable; but there are remains of a strong wall which must have surrounded the place. Traces of ancient buildings in the vicinity show that there must have been a fairly numerous population in the district.

(2) The great and splendid city in the Decapolis is first mentioned as taken after a siege by Alexander Jannaeus, 85 BC (BJ, I, iv, 8). Jos names it as marking the eastern limit of Peraea (BJ, III, iii, 3). He calls the inhabitants Syrians, when, at the beginning of the Jewish revolt, the district round Gerasa was laid waste. The Syrians made reprisals, and took many prisoners. With these, 2. History however, the Gerasenes dealt mercifully, letting such as wished go free, and escorting them to the border (BJ, II, xviii, 1, 5). Lucius Aunius, at the instance of Vespasian, sacked and burned the city, with much slaughter (BJ, IV, ix, 1). From this disaster it appears soon to have recovered, and the period of its greatest prosperity lay, probably, in the 2d and 3d cents. of our era. It became the seat of a bishopric, and one of its bishops attended the Council of Chalcedon. Reland (Pal, II, 806) notes certain extant coins of Gerasa, from which it is clear that in the 2d cent. it was a center of the worship of Artemis. It was besieged by Baldwin II, in 1121 AD. Mention is made of the strength of the site and the mighty masonry of its walls. William of Tyre calls the city Jarras, and places it 16 miles E. of Jordan (Hist, xii, 16). The distance is about 19 miles from the river. It was conquered by the Moslems in the time of Omar (Guy le Strange, Pal under the Moslems, 462). The sultan of Damascus is said to have fortified it; but there is nothing to show that the Moslems occupied it for any length of time.

Modern Jerash lies on both banks of Wady Jerash, about 6 miles from its confluence with Wady es-Zorka (the Jabbok). It is almost 20 miles from Ammān (Philadelphia), and 22 from Pāhā (Pella). The ruins are wide and imposing and are better preserved than any others on the E. of Jordan. They include several splendid temples, theaters, basilica, palaces and baths, with hippodrome and naumachia. The triumphal arch to the S. of the city is almost entire. Two paved streets with double colonnades cut through the city at right angles, four massive pedestals still marking the point of intersection. An excellent account of the ruins is given in Thomson's LB, III, 558 ff.

There is nothing above ground of older date than the 2d and 3d cents. of our era; but there is no reason to doubt that the Gr city of Gerasa stood on the same site. The presence of a copious spring of sweet water makes it probable that the site has been occupied from olden time; but no trace remains of any ancient city. Some would identify the place with Ramoth-Gilead, which see.

The site is now occupied by a colony of Circassians, and there is reason to fear that, unless something is done to preserve them, many valuable remains of antiquity will perish.

GERGESENES, gŭr'ge-sēns, gŭr-ge-sēnz': A false reading of "Gadarenes" retained in AV of Mt 8 28. See GADARA.

GERIZIM, ger'i-zim, gŕ-r'zim, MOUNT (גֵּרִיזִים, har gŕrizzim): Named in the directions for the reading of the law (Dt 11 29), and 1. Scriptural in the account of that great ceremony (References (Dt 27 12; Josh 8 33 f). Mts. Ebal and Gerizim stood over against each other, and on their sides the peoples were placed, half upon one and half upon the other, while in the vale which separates the mountains stood the ark, with the Levites. Those who stood on Gerizim responded to the blessings, those on Mt. Ebal to the cursings, as these were spoken "with a loud voice" by the Levites. From a spur of Mt. Gerizim Jotham spoke his taunting parable to the men of Shechem (Jgs 9 7). The name appears no more in canonical Scripture. In consequence of the dispute which arose over the marriage of Manasseh, who belonged to the high-priestly family, with a daughter of Sanballat the Horonite (Neh 13 28), a temple was built on Gerizim as a rival to that in Jerus (c 432 BC). This was the beginning of the schism which lasts to the present day (Ant, XI, viii, 2, 4). See SAMARITANS. The temple was destroyed by John Hyrcanus c 110 BC (Ant, XIII, ix, 1; BJ, I, ii, 6).

Mt. Gerizim, the modern Jebel et-Tŭr, stands on the S., Mt. Ebal on the N., of the narrow pass which cuts through the mountain range,

2. Description—opening a way from the sea to the Jordan. In the throat of this pass to the W., on the S. of the vale, and close to the foot of Gerizim, lies the town of Nablŭs, the ancient Shechem. Here copious fountains rise, filling the valley with beauty and fruitfulness. The sides of the mountain are steep and rocky on E. and N.; on the W. the ascent is more gradual, and here, by means of a system of terraces carried almost to the summit, it is cultivated with great care and success. Its height is 2,849 ft. above the level of the sea, 228 ft. lower than its northern companion.

Abraham came through the pass and camped near Gerizim at the oak of Moreh (Gen 12 6).

3. Samaritan Traditions According to Sam tradition it was on this mountain that he prepared to sacrifice Isaac, and at Salem, not far distant, he met Melchizedek (Gen 14 17 ff). The scene of Jacob's dream is placed at Khirbet Lauzeh on the summit (Gen 28 11 f). In a little hollow W. of the ridge, the Samaritans annually celebrate the Passover in accordance with the directions of the Pent. This is done in the open air, their temple having long since disappeared.

The most important remains on the mountain today are those of Justinian's fortress, built in 533

4. Antiquities AD, to protect the church which had been erected in 475 AD. Near the center of the plateau is a bare piece of rock, on which, tradition says, the altar stood in the Sam temple. A cup-like hollow in it may have been used for libations. In the western wall of el-Kal'ah, Justinian's castle, there are 12 stones under which, it is said, are the stones which Israel took from the bed of the Jordan (Josh 4 20).

Mount Gerizim with Shechem.

Gerizim was certainly "this mountain" pointed to by the woman of Samaria in her conversation with Jesus (Jn 4 20 f); the cliffs of the mountain almost overhanging the Well of Jacob.

For the reason why Gerizim was chosen for the blessing and Ebal for the cursing we are left to conjecture. The directions were fixed by one looking to the E., not, as with us, looking to the N. For one standing in the valley, therefore, Gerizim was on the right hand, "the side of good fortune" (Driver, Deuteronomy on 11 28).

Onom places Ebal and Gerizim much nearer the Jordan valley. This was doubtless to meet the difficulty raised by the long distance from Ai to Shechem. But their nearness to the "oaks of Moreh" (Dt 11 30) points to this locality, and this is confirmed by Jos, who speaks of Shechem, the metropolis of the Samaritans, as "a city situated at Mt. Gerizim" (Ant., XI, viii, 6).

Andronicus, appointed governor of Gerizim by Antiochus Epiphanes, is mentioned in 2 Macc 5 23 (AV "Garizim"). W. EWING

GERON, gē'run (Γέρων, Gērōn): Not much seems to be gained by translating with RVm "Geron, an Athenian," for "an old man of Athens" in 2 Macc 6 1.

GERRENIANS, ge-rē'ni-anz (ἄνδρες τῶν Γερρενίων, hōs tōn Gerrēniōn): The name indicates the southern limit of the territory assigned by Antiochus Eupator to the government of Judas Maccabaeus when he "left Hegemonides governor from Ptolemais even unto the Gerrenians" (2 Macc 13 24, AV "Gerrhenians"). It is not easy to say exactly who the G. were. They were wrongly associated by Grotius with the town Gerrha, and are with more probability connected with the ancient city of Gerar, S.E. of Gaza. One MS reads Gerarēnōn, which could easily be corrupted into Gerrēnōn, and would place the government of Hegemonides between Ptolemais and Gerar.

GERSHOM, gūr'shom (גֶּרְשֹׁם, gēr'shōm, from gārash, "to cast out"; explained, however, in Ex 2 22 and 18 3 as from gūr, "For he said, I have been a sojourner in a foreign land"):

(1) Firstborn son of Moses and Zipporah. The only details of his life contained in the Pent are the account of his circumcision (Ex 4 25), and his remaining under the care of Jethro, while Moses was in Egypt leading the Exodus. His descendants were numbered among the tribes of Levi (1 Ch 23 14). One of them apparently was the Jonathan who officiated as priest of the idolatrous sanctuary at Dan, and whose descendants held the office until the captivity. The MT inserts a suspended נ, n, in the name of Moses (מֹשֶׁה), causing it to be read מֹנֶשֶׁה, Manasseh, for the purpose, according to tradition, of disguising the name out of respect for the revered Lawgiver. Another descendant described as a "son" was Shebuel, a ruler over the treasures of David.

(2) A son of Levi, so called in 1 Ch 6 16.17. 20.43.62.71 (Heb 1.2.5.28.47.56); 15 7; elsewhere GERSHON (q.v.).

(3) A descendant of Phinehas, the head of a father's house, who journeyed with Ezra from Babylon to Jerus in the reign of Artaxerxes (Ezr 8 2).

ELLA DAVIS ISAACS

GERSHON, gūr'shon, GERSHONITES, gūr'shon-its (גֶּרְשֹׁן, gēr'shōn, written also gēr'shōm): Firstborn of the 3 sons of Levi (Ex 6 16; Nu 3 17; 1 Ch 6 1.16 m; 23 6). He had two sons, Libni, also known as Ladan (1 Ch 23 7; 26 21), and Shimei (Ex 6 17; Nu 3 18; 1 Ch 6 17.20), and consequently two groups of descendants, enumerated in the census taken in the Wilderness of Sinai (Nu 3 21 ff) and that in the Plains of Moab (Nu 26 57). In the distribution of functions among the Levites, the Gershonites were charged with the carrying of the curtains, coverings, screens, hangings, cords and instruments of the tabernacle and the tent of meeting on the journeys in the wilderness, under the supervision of Ithamar the son of Aaron. Their function was thus more exalted than that of the Merarites, who carried the boards, and less so than that of the Kohathites, who carried the most holy utensils and symbols. The Gershonites were given two wagons with four oxen—half as many as the Merarites, according to their service (Nu 7 7). Thirteen cities were assigned to the Gershonites in Northern Pal by Eleazar and Joshua (Josh 21 6. 27-33 || 1 Ch 6 62.71-76).

Among the Gershonites who achieved distinction in later Bib. times was the family of Asaph, the singers from the time of David to the days of the Second Temple (1 Ch 6 31-47; 25 1-7; 15 7.17. 19; 16 5.7; 2 Ch 35 15; Ezr 2 41; 3 10; Neh 11 17.22; 12 35; 1 Ch 9 15). Other Gershonites named are the heads of the fathers' houses in the days of David in connection with the dividing of the Levites into courses (1 Ch 23 7-11); the superintendents of the treasures of the house of the Lord of the same time (1 Ch 26 21.22; 29 8); and, finally, Gershonites are mentioned among those who cleansed the house of the Lord in the days of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29 12.13).

GERSON, gūr'sun (Γερσών, Gērōn; 1 Esd 8 29): Called Gershom in Ezr 8 2.

GERUTH CHIMHAM, gēr'roōth kim'ham (גֶּרֻחַ כִּימָחַם, gērūth kimhām): If the reading gērūth is correct, a "lodging-place" or "khan" on the highway to Egypt, may be meant (Jer 41 17). It may have been built by Chimham son of Barzillai; or it may have been named from him as owner of the land on which it stood. But probably with Jos we should read gidhrōth, "hurdles" or "sheep pens" (Ant., X, ix, 5).

GERZITES, gūr'zits (1 S 27 8 AVm). See GIRZITES.

GESHAN, gē'shan (גֶּשָׁן, gēshān, "firm," "strong"): A descendant of Judah through Caleb (1 Ch 2 47). AV has "Gesham," but not in the original 1611 edition.

GESHEM, gē'shem (גֶּשֶׁם, geshem, גֶּשְׁמִי, gashmī; גֶּשֶׁם, Gēsam, "rain storm"): An Arabian, probably chief of an Arabian tribe that had either settled in Southern Pal during the exile in Babylon, or had been settled in or near Samaria by Sargon (Neh 2 19; 6 1.2.6). He was a confederate of Sannaballat and Tobiah, and strenuously opposed the building of the wall under Nehemiah. He with the others mocked at the first efforts to build the wall, and afterward repeatedly sought to entice Nehemiah to the plains of Ono. The name also occurs in the form Gashmū, perhaps an Assyrian form of the same name Geshem.

GESHUR, gē'shur (גֶּשֻׁר, gēshūr, "bridge"): An Aramaean kingdom (2 S 15 8) of no great size which lay probably to the S. of Maacah, and formed with it the western boundary of the land of Bashan (Dt 3 14; Josh 12 5; 13 11). The territory of these two probably corresponded roughly with modern Jaulān. It may not have reached quite to the Jordan on the W.; in which case the Geshurites lit. dwelt "in the midst" of Israel (Josh 13 13), since they were not expatriated by the half-tribe of Manasseh, and they retained their independence. David married Maacah, daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur, who became the mother of Absalom and Tamar (2 S 3 3). To Talmi Absalom fled for safety after the murder of Amnon (13 37 f), and thence Joab brought him back to Jerus (14 23). The Geshurites and Aram are said to have taken the cities of Jair—i.e. Havvoth-jair—which lay in the land of Gilead (1 Ch 2 23). It is possible that "Geshurites" should be read, with Vulg, Syr, etc, instead of "Ashurites" in 2 S 2 9. The only difficulty is that Geshur was an independent kingdom, and there is nothing to show how it was brought under the sway of the son of Saul. In the catalogue of land still to be possessed in Josh 13 2, AV reads "Geshuri," RV "the Geshurites," referring evidently to a district bordering on the Philis. Both AV and RV render the same word by "Geshurites" in 1 S 27 8, where apparently the same territory is indicated as invaded by David. In neither passage is the text above suspicion; in 1 S 27 8 LXX B omits the name. No satisfactory explanation has been suggested. W. EWING

GESHURITES, gesh'û-rits, gē-shōō'rits (גֶּשׁוּרִים, גִּשְׁשׁוּרִים). See preceding article.

GESTURE, jes'tur, jes'tûr: The Oriental is rich in gestures by which feelings are expressed and force added to words. Of this we have abundant illustration in the Bible. Almost every available part of the body was employed in gesture. In salutations the whole body was bowed, sometimes to the ground (Gen 18 2; 19 1; 33 7; 42 6; 33 3, 7 t), falling on the face to the ground and bowing to the ground, 3 t (1 S 20 41; cf Gen 23 7; 2 S 9 8; 18 21; 1 K 2 19); it was common also to embrace and kiss (Ex 18 7), etc, weeping for joy. Esau "fell on [Jacob's] neck, and kissed him: and they wept" (Gen 33 4); cf Joseph and his brethren (45 14, 15); David and Jonathan (1 S 20 41), and the father of the prodigal (Lk 15 20). We have the kiss also in the story of Judas with his Master (Mt 26 49). Bowing the knee was also in Egypt an act of homage to a superior (Gen 41 43); bowing the knee and bowing down were common in prayer and worship (1 K 19 18; 2 Ch 6 13; Ezr 9 5; Isa 45 23); in prayer the head and whole body were also bowed (Gen 24 26; 2 K 5 18; 2 Ch 29 28 f). The rabbins decreed that in prayer "in bowing down, the back must be bent so low that every vertebra becomes conspicuous," and endless questions arose as to what it was lawful to do during prayer (Edersheim). We read also of prayer offered standing (1 S 1 26; 1 K 8 22; Mt 6 5; Mk 11 25), lifting up and spreading forth the hands (1 K 8 22; 2 Ch 6 13; Ezr 9 5; Neh 8 6; 1 Tim 2 8); "lifting up the hands" was synonymous with prayer (Ps 77 2; 141 2; Lam 2 19; 1 Tim 2 8); falling on the knees in pleading (1 K 1 13). Reverence for the aged was expressed by rising up in their presence (Lev 19 32, "Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head"; cf Lam 5 12). The hand was also laid on the mouth in token of respect (Job 29 9); in token of blessing the right hand was placed on the head (Gen 48 14; cf 49 28; Prov 10 6). The hands were laid on the head of the animal to be sacrificed; on the scapegoat and sin offering as denoting the transference of sin; on the burnt offering, perhaps as representing the offerer (Lev 1 4; 16 21). The hands were lifted up in blessing (Lev 9 22), in solemn swearing (Gen 14 22; Ex 6 8 m; Dt 32 40), in defiance and threatening (2 S 20 21); extended in pleading (Isa 65 2). Giving the hand or joining hands as a pledge of friendship and fidelity (2 K 10 15; Prov 11 21) was the origin of the widespread custom of "shaking hands"; "striking hands" signified the clenching of a bargain or agreement (Prov 6 1 RV); as a solemn pledge the hand was placed under the thigh of the person to whom it was given (Gen 24 2; 47 29); plucking the hand out of the bosom was a sign of action (Ps 74 11); clapping the hands, of rejoicing (2 K 11 12; Ps 47 1; 98 8; Isa 55 12), also of ridicule, contempt and rejoicing over one (Job 27 23; Lam 2 15; Nah 3 19). We read of "beckoning with the hand" (Lk 6 7; Jn 13 24), preliminary to speaking (Acts 12 17; 13 16; 19 33; 21 40; 26 1, he "stretched forth his hand"); drooping of the hands indicated failure, weakness or distress (He 12 12; cf Isa 35 3; Eccles 25 23); washing the hands (publicly) was a declaration of innocence, "of freedom from complicity" (Dt 21 6, 7; Mt 27 24).

Mohammedans Praying in the Mosque at Damascus.

The head lifted up was a sign of arrogance or pride (Ps 83 2); of exaltation, or recovery from trouble, etc (Jgs 8 28; Ps 27 6; 110 7; Zec 1 21); to cover the head was a symbol of grief or mourning (2 S 15 30; Est 6 12; Jer 14 3), also putting the hand on the head (2 S 13 19; Jer 2 37), or ashes, dust or earth (Josh 7 6; 1 S 4 12; 2 S 1 2; 13 19; Est 4 1); wagging (or shaking) the head expressed contempt or malicious enjoyment (Job 16 4; Ps 64 8; Jer 18 16; Lam 2 15; with "hissing," cf Mt 27 39; Mk 15 29; cf Ps 22 7; 44 14; 109 25; Jer 48 27).

Uncovering the feet was a sign of grief (2 S 15 30; Isa 20 2, 4); lifting up the heel against one was a symbol of opposition (Ps 41 9; Jn 13 18); shaking the dust from the feet, of freeing from responsibility and of complete rejection (Mt 10 14; Acts 13 51; at Corinth Paul "shook out his raiment," Acts 18 6); strong joyous feeling found (as elsewhere) expression in dancing (Jgs 11 34; 21 21; 1 S 18 6; Jer 31 4, 13), before Jeh (Ex 15 20; 2 S 6 14, 16).

Shooting out the lip was an expression of contempt (Ps 22 7); to incline the ear signified attention (Ps 45 10); rending the garments expressed the sense of horror (as in the presence of disaster, blasphemy, etc) (Nu 14 6; Josh 7 6; 1 S 4 12; 2 S 1 2; 13 19; 15 32; Mt 26 65; Acts 14 14); the smile indicated favor and gave confidence (Job 29 24); lifting up the eyelids was a sign of pride (Prov 30 13); Isaiah speaks also of the "outstretched necks and wanton eyes" of the haughty daughters of Zion, "walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet" (Isa 3 16). The perverse man "winketh with his eyes . . . speaketh with his feet . . . maketh signs with his fingers" (Prov 6 13).

It is interesting to note the gestures ascribed in the Gospels to Jesus. The expression of His eyes is often referred to; we read how He "lifted up his eyes on his disciples" before pronouncing the Beatitudes, indicating a loving regard for them (Lk 6 20); how He "looked upon" the young ruler and "loved him," and, with another expressive "look" (round about)—a sad look—said, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God" (Mk 10 21, 23); how He "looked up to heaven" before He blessed and brake the loaves (Mt 14 19; Mk 6 41; Lk 9 16); also before healing (Mk 7 34); how He "looked round" on His adversaries in the synagogue (Lk 6 10), "with anger, being grieved at the hardening of their heart" (Mk 3 5); how He "turned and looked upon Peter" so that he remembered his boasting and fall, and went out and wept bitterly (Lk 22 61); we read also how He took a little child into His arms and held him up as an example to His disciples (Mk 9 36), and how He "took [little children] in his arms, and blessed them, laying his hands upon them" (Mk 10 16); how He "stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground" when the woman accused of adultery was brought to Him, then "lifted up himself" and spake, again "stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground," till the woman's accusers had departed one by one, condemned and ashamed, when He again "lifted up himself" and sent the woman away (Jn 8 6 ff); how on His way to the tomb of Lazarus, He was agitated, AV and RV "was troubled," in "troubled himself." Meyer has "shuddered." Some tr "shook himself" (Jn 11 33). See, further, ATTITUDES. W. L. WALKER

GET, GETTING: A great many Heb words are in the OT tr^d "get," "got," etc. The word "get" has two meanings: (1) with the idea of movement, "to go," etc.; (2) with that of acquisition, "to gain," "obtain," etc. (1) In the first sense the most frequent words are hā, "to come, or go in" (Gen 45 17; 1 S 22 5, etc.); yālak "to go on" (Gen 12 1; 22 2; Ex 5 4; Jer 5 5, etc.); yārād, "to go down" (Gen 42 2; Joel 3 13); ālāh, "to go up" (Gen 44 17; Isa 40 9; Jer 49 31, etc.). Other words are nādh, "to move off" (Jer 49 30 AV; Dnl 4 14); nādh, "to remove" (Nu 14 25); yācā, "to go out" (Gen 19 14; 31 13; Ex 11 8). (2) In the sense of acquisition, the words most frequently tr^d "get," etc., are āsāh, "to do," "to make" (Gen 12 5; 31 1; Dt 8 17, 18); hānāh, "to get," "obtain" (Gen 4 1; Prov 4 5, 7; Eccl 2 7 AV, RV "bought"; Jer 13 1, RV "buy"); mācā "to find" (Nu 31 50; 2 S 20 6); rākāsh, "to acquire," "gain" (Gen 31 18; 36 6 AV, RV "gathered"; 46 6).

Getting is the tr of pō'al (Prov 21 6), of hinyān "obtaining" (Gen 31 18; Prov 4 7, ERV text and ARV in "all thou hast gotten"). In the NT "get" in the first sense is the tr of exérchomai, "to go out or forth" (Lk 13 31; Acts 7 3; 22 18); of éxeimi, "to go out or forth" (Acts 27 43); of kalabainō, "to go down" (Acts 10 20); hupagō, "to go away or under," "Get . . . behind" (Mt 16 23; Lk 4 8 AV, "Get . . . hence"; Mt 4 10). The only separate word tr^d "get" in the second sense is heuriskō, "to begin to find" (usually tr^d "find") (Lk 9 12 AV, "that they may go . . . and get victuals").

For "get" RV has "mount" (Dt 22 43), "buy" (Prov 17 16; Jer 13 1; 19 1); for "get you down" (Joel 3 13), "tread ye," in "get you down"; "get" for "possess" (Lk 13 12); "get them away" for "gather themselves together" (Ps 104 22); "get us" for "apply" (Ps 90 12); "let us get grain" for "therefore we take up corn for them," and for "that we might buy corn" (Neh 5 2, 3); "get you no" for "provide neither" (Mt 10 9); "getteth prudence" for "is prudent," in "dealt eth prudently" (Prov 15 5); "getteth" for "coveteth" (Hab 3 9).

GETHER, gē'thār (גֵּתָר, gether): In Gen 10 23 named as one of the 4 sons of Aram. In 1 Ch 1 17 mentioned simply among the sons of Shem.

GETHSEMANE, geth-sem'a-nē (Γεθσημανη, Gethsemane [for other spellings and accents see Thayer, s.v.]; probably from the Aram. ܡܬܢܗܝܡܢܐ, meth-nāhīmān, "oil press"): Mentioned (Mt 26 36; Mk 14 32) as a place (chōrtōn), in "enclosed piece of ground," to which Jesus and the disciples retired after the last supper; in Jn 18 1 it is described as a "garden" (κήπος, kēpos), while Lk (22 40) simply says "place" (τόπος, lópos). From Jn 18 1 it is evident that it was across the Kidron, and from Lk 22 39, that it was on the Mount of Olives. Very possibly (Lk 21 37; 22 39) it was a spot where Jesus habitually lodged when visiting Jerus. The owner—whom conjecture suggests as Mary the mother of Mark—must have given Jesus and His disciples special right of entry to the spot.

Tradition, dating from the 4th cent., has fixed on a place some 50 yds. E. of the bridge across the Kidron as the site. In this walled-in enclosure once of greater extent, now primly laid out with garden beds, by the owners—the Franciscans—are eight old olive trees supposed to date from the time of Our Lord. They are certainly old, they appeared venerable to the traveler Maundrell more than two centuries ago, but that they go back to the time claimed is impossible, for Jos states (BJ, VI, i, 1) that Titus cut down all the trees in the neighborhood of Jerus at the time of the siege. Some 100 yds. farther N. is the "Grotto of the Agony," a cave or cistern supposed to be the spot "about a stone's cast" to which Our Lord retired (Lk 22 41). The Greeks have a rival garden in the neighborhood, and a little higher up the hill is a large Russian church. The traditional site may be somewhere near the correct one, though one would think too near the public road for retirement, but the contours of the hill slopes must have so much changed their forms in the troublous times of the first and second centuries, and the loose stone walls of such enclosures are of so temporary a character, that it is impossible that the site is exact. Sentiment, repelled by the artificiality of the modern garden, tempts the visitor to look for a more suitable and less artificial spot farther up the valley. There is today a secluded olive grove with a ruined modern olive press amid the trees a half-mile or so farther up the Kidron valley, which must far more resemble the original Gethsemane than the orthodox site.

GEUEL, gū'el, gē-ū'el (גְּעֻל, גְּעֻ'ֵל, "majesty of God"): The spy from the tribe of Gad (Nu 13 15), sent by Moses to spy out the land of Canaan.

GEZER, gē'zēr (גִּזְר, gezer): A city of great military importance in ancient times, the site of which has recently been thoroughly explored. The excavations at this spot are the most thorough and extensive of any in Pal, and have not only done much to confirm the history of the place, as known from Bib. and other sources, but have also thrown a flood of light upon the general history, civilization and religion of Pal in pre-Israelite and Israelitish times.

Olty Wall at Gezer. [From Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer.]

The long-lost site of Gezer was discovered by M. Clermont-Ganneau in 1873, and his suggestion that the modern name for the place, Tell

1. The Dis- Jezer (or Tell el Jezereh) was a discovery and vival of the ancient name was confirmed by his further discovery of three the Site bilingual inscriptions, in Heb and Gr, cut on surfaces of rock by a certain Alkios, apparently once the governor of the city; in one of them occurred the expression "the boundary of Gezer."

The natural features and the position of Tell Jezer abundantly explain the extreme importance of Gezer in ancient times. The buried remains crown a narrow hill, running from N.W. to S.E., about 1,700 ft. long by 300 to 500 ft. broad. The approach is steep on every side, and in early times, before the accumulation around the sides of the rubbish of some millenniums, must have been much more so. The hill stands, like an outpost, projecting into the great plain, and is connected with the low hills behind it, part of the Shephelah, with but a narrow neck. At the foot of the hill runs a great high road from Egypt to Syria; to the N. lies the Vale of Ajalon, across which runs the modern carriage road to Jerus, and up which ran the great high road, by the Beth-horons, to the plateau N. of Jerus; to the S. lies the Vale of Sorek, where stood Bethshemesh, and along which went a great highway from the country of the Philis to the hill country of Judah. Today the Jerus-Jaffa railway, after sweeping some miles away in the plain round the whole western and southern sides of the site, passes along this open vale to plunge into the narrow defile—the Wady Isma'in, which it follows to Jerus. From the summit of the Tell, a vast expanse of country is visible between the long blue line of the Mediterranean to the W., and the abrupt and lofty mountains of Judah to the E. That it has been all through history the scene of military contest is fully understood when its strategic position is appreciated; no military leader even today, if holding the highlands of Pal against invasion, could afford to neglect such an outpost.

Although the excavation of the site shows that it was occupied by a high civilization and a considerable population at an extremely early

2. History period, the first historical mention is of Gezer in the list of the Palestinian cities captured by Tahutmes III (XVIIIth Dynasty, about 1500 BC). From this time it was probably under Egyp governors (the Egyp remains at all periods are considerable), but from the Am Tab, a century or so later, we learn that Egyp influence was then on the wane. Three of these famous clay tablets are dated from Gezer itself and are written in the name of the governor Yapahi; he was then hard pressed by the Khabiri, and he appealed for help in vain to Egypt. In other letters belonging to this series, there are references to this city. In one, a certain freebooter named Lapaya makes excuses that he had broken into the city. He "has been slandered. Is it an offence that he has entered Gazri and levied the people?" (no. CCXL, Petrie's tr.).

In the well-known "Song of Triumph" of Merenptah, who is considered by many to be the Pharaoh of the Exodus, occurs the expression "Gezer is taken." (In connection with this it is interesting to notice that an ivory pectoral with the cartouche of Merenptah was unearthed at Gezer.)

In the time of Joshua's invasion a certain "king of Gezer" named Horam (חֹרָם, hōrām, but in LXX Ἀδύμ, Adām, or Ἐλὺμ, Elām) came to the assistance of Lachish against the Israelites, but was slain (Josh 10 33). Gezer was taken, but the Canaanites were not driven out, but remained in servitude (Josh 16 10; Jgs 1 29). The city became one of the towns on the southern border of Ephraim (Josh 16 3), but was assigned to the Kohath clan of the Levites (21 21). In 2 S 5 25 (AV "Gazer") we read that David chased the Philis after their defeat in the valley of Rephaim "from Geba until thou come to Gezer," showing that this was on the frontier of the Philis territory; and in 1 Ch 20 4 it states, "There arose war at Gezer with the Philis; then Sibbecai the Hushathite slew Sippai, of the sons of the giant; and they were subdued." In the corresponding account in 2 S 21 18 the scene of this event is said to be Gob, which is probably a copyist's error—גֹּב for גִּזְר. According to Jos (Ant, VIII, vi, 1), at the commencement of Solomon's reign Gezer was in the hands of the Philis, which may explain 1 K 9 16, where it is stated that a certain Pharaoh, whose daughter Solomon married, captured and burnt Gezer and gave the site to his daughter. Solomon rebuilt it (ver 17). There are no further references to Gezer during the later Jewish monarchy, but there are several during the Maccabean period. Judas pursued Gorgias to "Gazara and into the plains of Idumaea and Azotis and Jamnia" (1 Macc 4 15); Bacchides, after his defeat by Jonathan, "fortified also the city of Bethsura, and Gazara, and the tower, and put forces in them and provision of victuals" (1 Macc 9 52 AV); a little later Simon "camped against Gazara and besieged it round about; he made also an engine of war, and set it by the city and battered a certain tower, and took it" (1 Macc 13 43 AV), after which he purified it (vs 47, 48). From Jos (Ant, XIII, viii, 2) we gather that Antiochus had taken Gezer from the Jews.

The governor, Alkios, who made the bilingual inscriptions, may come in about this time or a little later; the rock inscriptions, of which half a dozen are now known, give no information regarding their date.

In the period of the Crusades this site, under the name "Mount Gisart," was a crusading fort and gave its name to a family. Here King Baldwin IV gained a victory over Saladin in 1177, and in 1191 the latter monarch camped here while conducting some fruitless negotiations with King Richard Cœur de Lion. In 1495 a skirmish occurred here between the governor of Jerus and certain turbulent Bedouin. The history of Gezer, as known, is thus one of battles and sieges extending over at least 3,000 years; from the archaeological remains we may infer that its history was similar for at least 1,000 years earlier.

In 1904 the Pal Exploration Fund of England obtained a "permit" for the excavation of Tell Jezer.

The whole site was the private property of certain Europeans, whose agent, living much of the time on the Tell itself, was himself deeply interested in the excavations, so that unusually favorable conditions obtained for the work. Mr. (now Professor) R. A. Stewart Macalister, M.A., was sent out, and for 3 years (1904-7) he instituted an examination of the hidden remains in the mound, after a manner, till then, unexampled in Pal exploration. His ambition was to turn over every cubic foot of soil down to the original rock, so that nothing of importance could be overlooked. As at the expiration of the original "permit" much remained unexplored, application was made to the authorities for a second one, and, at the end of 1907, Mr. Macalister embarked on a further 2 years of digging. Altogether he worked for the greater part of 5 years, except for necessary interruptions of the work due to unfavorable weather. Some two-thirds of the total accumulated debris on the mound was ransacked, and besides this, many hundreds of tombs, caves and other antiquarian remains in the neighborhood were thoroughly explored.

It was found that the original bare rock surface of the hill was crowned with buried remains, in some parts 20 and 30 ft. deep, made up of the debris of all the cities which had stood on the site during three or four thousand years; on the part excavated there were no remains so late as the commencement of the Christian era, the Gezer of that time, and the crusading fort, being built on a neighboring site. The earliest inhabitants were Troglodytes living in the many caves which riddled the hill surface; they were apparently a non-Sem race, and there was some evidence that they at least knew of cremation. These, or a race soon after—the earliest Semites—inclosed the hill-top with high earth rampart faced with rough stones—the earliest "walls" going back at least before 3000 BC. At an early period—probably about 3000 BC—a race with a relatively high civilization fortified the whole hilltop with a powerful and remarkably well-built wall, 14 ft. thick, with narrow towers of short projection at intervals of 90 ft. At a point on the S. side of this was unearthed a very remarkable, massive, brick gateway (all the other walls and buildings are of stone), with towers on each side still standing to the height of 16 ft., but evidently once much higher. This gate showed a strong Egypt influence at work long before the first historic reference (XVIIIth Dynasty), for both gateway and wall to which it belonged had been ruined at an early date, the former indeed, after its destruction, was overlaid by the buildings of a city, which from its datable objects—scarabs, etc.—must have belonged to the time of Amenhotep III, i.e. as early as 1500 BC.

The later wall, built, we may conclude, soon after the ruin of the former, and therefore about 1500 BC, was also a powerful construction and must have existed considerably over a thousand years, down, indeed, till 100 BC at least, when Gezer disappears from history as a fortified site. These walls inclosed a larger area than either of the previous ones; they show signs of destruction and repairs, and Mr. Macalister is of the opinion that some of the extensive repairs—in one place a gap of 150 ft.—and the 28 inserted towers are the work of Solomon (1 K 9 17). This wall must have existed in use through all we know of Gezer from Bible sources. When, from the ruined remains, we reconstruct in imagination these mighty ramparts, we need not wonder that the Hebrews, fresh from long wanderings in the wilderness, found it no easy task to capture cities so fortified as was this (Nu 13 28; Dt 1 28).

Scarab with Name of Amenhotep III, from Gezer.
[From Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer.]

The foundations of a powerful building, which were found inserted in a gap in the southern walls, turned out conclusively to be the palace of Simon Maccabaeus—who captured the city (1 Macc 13 43)—a graffito being found upon one of its stones running thus:

Πάμφρα(ς) Σιμωνος καταπέγχε(?) π(ῑ)ρ) βασίλειον

which seems to mean, "Pamphras, may he bring down [fire] on the palace of Simon."

Within the city walls the foundations of some seven or eight cities of various successive periods were found, superimposed one above the other. The city's best days appear to have been shortly before the time of Joshua; the next, perhaps, at the time of the Judges. With the period to which we should probably assign the arrival of the Hebrews, there is a great increase in the population, the hitherto inviolate environs of the "temple" being encroached upon by private dwellings: an interesting commentary on Josh 16 10.

The great "High Place" which was uncovered is one of unique interest, and its discovery has thrown a flood of light upon the religion of the early Canaanites, that religion—"the worship of Baal and Ashteroth"—which was the great rival of the purer religion of Israel. This Ba'al temple, or dāmōth, consisted of a row of 8 maccebbōth or rude stone pillars ranging in height from 5 ft. 5 in. to 10 ft. 9 in. (see HIGH PLACE; PILLAR), together with a curious trough which may have been a socket for the 'Ashērāh (see ASHERAH), or some kind of altar. The area around these pillars had a kind of rough floor of consolidated earth under which were found a number of large jars containing infant bones, considered to be the remains of infant sacrifice. In close proximity to this "temple" was a double cave, the construction of which strongly suggested that it had been arranged for the giving of oracles. This high place had been used for very many centuries; the maccebbōth were not all of one period but had gradually been increased from one to seven, and an eighth of a more definitely sculptured form—as a simulacrum priapi—had been added some time later. In the accumulated rubbish around these pillars were found enormous numbers of small stone phallic images, together with pottery plaques of Astarte, made with rude exaggeration of the sexual organs (see BAAL; ASHTEROTH).

Sacrificed Infant Buried in a Jar at Gezer. [From Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer.]

Another monument of great interest—and high antiquity—was the great rock-cut tunnel. It is about 23 ft. high, and 13 ft. wide, and descends by 80 steps, 94½ ft. through the solid rock, to a cave in which there is a spring. It is very similar to the great tunnel known as "Warren's tunnel and shaft" which was clearly constructed by the early Jebusites to reach from within the city's walls to the fountain of Gihon (see SILOAM; ZION). This Gezer tunnel must date at least to 2000 BC; it is evident from the nature of the accumulated debris which blocked its mouth that it was actually abandoned about 1400 BC. Its antiquity is confirmed by the fact that it was evidently excavated with flint knives.

At a much later period in history, in that of the Maccabees, the water supply of the city, in time of siege, at any rate, was largely dependent on an enormous open cistern which Mr. Macalister cleared of earth and found capable of containing 2,000,000 gallons of water. Among the smaller "finds" which throw light upon the Bible history may be mentioned two much broken, cuneiform tablets, both referring to land contracts, which, from the names of the eponyms, can be dated to 651 and 649 BC respectively. They therefore belong to the time of the last, and one of the greatest, of the Assyrian monarchs, Ashurbanipal, the "noble Osnappar" of Ezer 4 10, and they show that he was not only a great conqueror, but that in Pal he had an organized government and that legal civil business was transacted in the language of Assyria.

The illumination of OT history which the excavations of Gezer have afforded can here be only hinted at, but references to it will occur in many of the articles in other parts of this Encyclopaedia.

LITERATURE.—In Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer Professor R. A. S. Macalister has described in a popular form with illustrations some of his most remarkable discoveries; while in the Memoirs of the Excavations at Gezer (1912), published by the Palestine Exploration Fund, Professor Macalister deals with the subject exhaustively.

GHOST, gōst (שָׁדַי, nephesh; πνεῦμα, pneuma): "Ghost," the middle-Eng. word for "breath," "spirit," appears in AV as the tr of nephesh ("breath," "the breath of life," animal soul or spirit, the vital principle, hence "life"), in two places of the OT, viz. Job 11 20, "the giving up of the ghost" (so RV), and Jer 15 9, "She hath given up the ghost"; gāwa, "to gasp out," "expire" (die), is also several times so tr'd (Gen 25 8.17; 35 29; 49 33; Job 3 11;

10 18; 13 19; 14 10; Lam 1 19). In Apoc (Tob 14 11) psuchē is tr'd in the same way as nephesh in the OT, and in 2 Mac 3 31, en eschālē pnoē is rendered "give up the ghost," RV "quite at the last gasp."

In the NT "to give up the ghost" is the tr of ekpnoō, "to breathe out" (Mk 15 37.39; Lk 23 46; so RV); of ekpnoō, "to breathe out," "expire" (Acts 5 5.10; 12 23); in Mt 27 50, aphēken to pneuma, and in Jn 19 30, paredōken to pneuma, are rendered respectively, "yielded" and "gave up the ghost." RV "yielded up his spirit," "gave up his spirit."

"The Holy Ghost" is also frequent in AV; in ARV it is invariably changed to "Holy Spirit," in ERV sometimes only, chiefly in the Gospels. See HOLY SPIRIT; SPIRIT. W. L. WALKER

GHOST, HOLY. See HOLY SPIRIT.

GIAH, gī'a (גֵּיָא, gī'a): An unidentified place on the route followed by Abner in his flight, pursued by Joab (2 S 2 24). LXX renders Gai, corresponding to the Heb gē, "valley." The form gī'a may be due to corruption of the text.

GIANTS, jī'ants: The word appears in AV as the tr of the Heb words גִּבּוֹרִים, nephilim (Gen 6 4; Nu 13 33); גִּבּוֹרִים, nephilim (Dt 2 11.20; 3 11.13; Josh 12 4, etc); גִּבּוֹרִים, rāphā' (1 Ch 20 4.6.8), or גִּבּוֹרִים, rāphāh (2 S 21 16.18.20.22); in one instance of גִּבּוֹרִים, gibbōr, lit. "mighty one" (Job 16 14).

In the first two cases RV changes "giants" into the Heb words "Nephilim," nephilim, and "Rephaim," rāphā'im, respectively (see these words). The "Nephilim" of Gen 6 4 are not to be confounded with the "mighty men" subsequently described as the offspring of the unlawful marriages of "the sons of God" and "the daughters of men." It is told that they overspread the earth prior to these unhallowed unions. That the word, whatever its etymology, bears the sense of men of immense stature is evident from the later passages, Nu 13 33. The same is true of the "Rephaim," as shown by the instance of Og (Dt 3 11; Josh 12 4). There is no doubt about the meaning of the word in the case of the giants mentioned in 2 S 21 and 1 Ch 20. See also ANTE-DILUVIANS.

GIBBAR, gib'ār (גִּבְבָּר, gibbār, "hero"): In Ezer 2 20 the "children of Gibbar" are mentioned among those who returned with Zerubbabel. The passage (Neh 7 25) has "children of Gibeon."

GIBBETHON, gib'e-thon (גִּבְתֹּן, gibbithon): A city in the territory of Dan in the plain named with Elekeh and Bealath (Josh 19 44), and assigned to the Kohathite Levites (21 23). Later we find it in the hands of the Philistines; and it was while besieging the city that Nadab was slain by Baasha (1 K 15 27). After 25 years Omri, the general of Baasha, was here made king of the army when news reached them of Zimri's regicide (1 K 16 15 ff). It may possibly be identified with Kibbiah, which lies about 16 miles S.E. of Jaffa; but no certain identification is possible. W. EWING

GIBEA, gib'e-a (גִּבְעָא, gib'ea, "hill"): A grandson of Caleb (1 Ch 3 49). His father was Sheva, whose mother was Maacah, Caleb's concubine (ver 48).

GIBEAH, gib'ê-a (גִּבְעָה, gibh'ah, "hill"): The Heb word denotes generally an eminence or hill, in distinction from har, which is used for mountain, or mountain range. It occurs, however, in two instances, as a place-name. Under GEBÄ (q.v.) we have seen that Geba, Gibeah, and Gibeon are liable to be confused. This arises from their resemblance in form and meaning.

(1) An unidentified city in the territory of Judah (Josh 15 57). It is named in the group containing Carmel, Ziph and Kain; it is therefore probably to be sought to the S.E. of Hebron. It may be one of the two villages mentioned by Onom (s.v. "Gabbathōn"), Gabaa and Gabatha, in the E. of the Daroma. It is probably identical with Gibeah mentioned in 2 Ch 13 2.

(2) A city described as belonging to Benjamin (Josh 18 28; Jgs 19 14), Gibeah of Benjamin (1 S 13 2.15; 14 16), Gibeah of God (1 S 10 5 m); see GIBEATH, 4. The narrative in which it first appears is one of extraordinary and tragic interest, casting priceless light on the conditions prevailing in those days when "there was no king in Israel" (Jgs 19 ff). A Levite sojourning on the farther side of Mt. Ephraim was deserted by his concubine who returned to her father's house in Beth-lehem-judah. Thither he went to persuade her to return. Hospitably entertained by her father, he tarried till the afternoon of the fifth day. The evening was nigh when they came over against Jebus—Jerusalem—but, rejecting his servant's suggestion that they should lodge in this "city of a stranger"—i.e. the Jebusite—the Levite pressed on, and when they were near to Gibeah the sun set. They entered the city and sat down in the street. The laws of hospitality today do not compel the entertainment of strangers who arrive after sunset. But it may have been through disregard of all law that they were left unfriended. An old man from Mt. Ephraim took pity on them, invited them to his house, and made himself responsible for their necessities. Then follows the horrible story of outrage upon the Levite's concubine; the way in which he made known his wrongs to Israel; and the terrible revenge exacted from the Benjamites, who would not give up to justice the miscreants of Gibeah.

Gibeah was the home of Saul, the first king of Israel, and thither he returned after his election at Mizpah (1 S 10 26). From Gibeah he summoned Israel to assemble for the relief of Jabesh-gilead, which was threatened by Nahash the Ammonite (1 S 11 4 ff). In the wars of Saul with the Philis, Gibeah seems to have played a conspicuous part (1 S 13 15). Here were exposed the bodies of the seven sons of Saul, slain by David's orders, to appease the Gibeonites, furnishing the occasion for Rizpah's pathetic vigil (2 S 21 1 ff). Gibeah is mentioned in the description of the Assy advance on Jerus (Isa 10 29).

The site now generally accepted as that of Gibeah is on Teilel el-Fal, an artificial mound about 4 miles N. of Jerus, a short distance E. of the high road to Shechem. A little way N. of Teilel el-Fal, the high road bifurcates, one branch turning eastward to Jeba', i.e. Geba (which should be read instead of "Gibeah" in Jgs 20 31); the other continuing northward to Bethel. Not far from the parting of the ways, on the road to Jeba' lies er-Ram, corresponding to Ramah (Jgs 19 13). At Gibeah, about 30 furlongs from Jerus, Titus encamped for the night on his advance against the city from the N. Teilel el-Fal quite satisfactorily suits all the data here indicated.

The words in Jgs 20 33 rendered by AV "the meadows of Gibeah," RV "Maareh-geba"—simply transliterating—and RvM "the meadow of Geba" (or Gibeah), by a slight emendation of the text, read "from the west of Gibeah," which is certainly correct.

GIBEATH, gib'ê-ath (גִּבְעָת, gibh'ath): This is the status constructus of the foregoing (Gibeah). It is found in several compound place-names.

(1) Gibeath-ha-araloth (גִּבְעַת הָאֲרָלוֹת, gibh'ath ha'araloth). EV tr^s lit. "hill of the foreskins"; but the margins suggest the proper name. Here the Israelites were circumcised after the passage of the Jordan (Josh 5 3). The place was therefore between that river and Jericho.

(2) Gibeath Phinehas (גִּבְעַת פִּינְחָס, gibh'ath pin'has), the burial place of Eleazar the son of Aaron in Mt. Ephraim (Josh 24 33 AV "a hill that pertained to Phinehas," RV "the hill of Phinehas," RvM "Gibeah of Phinehas"). Conder would identify it with 'Avertah in the plain of Makhneh, not far from Nablās, where "the Samaritans show the tombs of Phinehas and Eleazar, Abishuah and Ithamar" (Tent Work, 41 f). The "tomb of Eleazar" is 18 ft. long, plastered all over and shaded by a splendid terebinth. Guérin places it at Jibia, 3 miles N. of Karyat el-Anab (Judee, III, 37 f; Samaria, 106 ff). There is no certainty.

(3) Gibeath hammoreh (גִּבְעַת הַמּוֹרֶה, gibh'ath hamoreh), a hill on the N. side of the valley from the camp of Gideon, beside which lay the Midianites (Jgs 7 1, EV "the hill of Moreh"; the Heb is lit. "hill of the teacher"). It is probably identical with Jebel Duhy, which rises on the N. of the Vale of Jezreel. Moore (Judges, 200) mistakenly calls the mountain Nabi Daht. This is, of course, the name of the "prophet" whose shrine crowns the hill. See MOREH.

(4) Gibeath ha-Elohim (גִּבְעַת הָאֱלֹהִים, gibh'ath ha-'elohim), the place where Saul, after leaving Samuel, met the company of prophets, and prophesied with them (1 S 10 5.10). It is defined as the place "where is the garrison [or pillar] of the Philis." This may be intended to distinguish it from GIBEAH (2), with which it is often identified. In this case it may be represented by the modern Ramallah, about 10 miles N. of Jerus. See also TABOR.

(5) Gibeath ha-Hachilah (1 S 23 19; 26 1) is identical with HACHILAH (q.v.).

(6) Gibeath Ammah (2 S 2 24) is identical with AMMAH (q.v.).

(7) Gibeath Gareb (Jer 31 39) is identical with GAREB (q.v.).

GIBEON, gib'ê-un (גִּבְעוֹן, gibh'un): One of the royal cities of the Hivites (Josh 9 7). It was a greater city than Ai; and its inhabitants were reputed mighty men (10 2). It fell within the territory allotted to Benjamin (18 25), and was one of the cities given to the Levites (21 17).

By a stratagem the Gibeonites secured for themselves and their allies in Chephirah, Beeroth and Kiriath-jearim immunity from attack by the Israelites. Terrified by the fate of Jericho and Ai, a company disguised as ambassadors from a far country, their garments and shoes worn, and their provisions moldy as from the length of their journey, went to Joshua at Gilgal, and persuaded him and the princes of Israel to make a covenant with them. Three days later the deception was discovered and the wrath of the congregation of Israel aroused. In virtue of the covenant their lives were secured; but for their duplicity Joshua cursed them, and condemned them to be bondmen, "hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God" (Josh 9 23), "for the congregation and for the altar of the Lord" (ver 27 AV). This points to their employment in the sanctuary; and possibly may shed some light on the massacre of the Gibeonites by Saul (2 S 21 1 f). The rest of the Canaanites resented the defection of the Hivites which so greatly weakened the forces for defence, and, headed by Adoni-zedek of Jerus, they assembled to wreak vengeance on Gibeon. The threatened city appealed to Joshua, who made a swift night march, fell suddenly upon the confederates, routed them, and "chased them by the way of the ascent of Beth-horon, and smote them to Azekah, and unto Makkedah" (Josh 10 1 f).

A three years' famine in the days of David was attributed to God's anger at the unexpiated crime of Saul in slaying the Gibeonites. He did this "in his zeal for . . . Israel and Judah," who may have fretted at the inconvenience of having the Gibeonites among them. The latter believed that Saul's desire was to destroy them utterly. When David tried to arrange matters with them they stood upon their ancient rights, claiming life for life. They would take no blood money: they demanded blood from the family of the slayer of their people. This demand David could not resist, and handed over to them seven sons of Saul (2 S 21 1 f).

The army of Ishbosheth under Abner, and that of David under Joab, met at the pool of Gibeon.

2. The Champions An attempt to settle the quarrel, by means of 12 champions on either side, failed, as each man slew his fellow, and the 24 perished side by side. A "sore battle" ensued in which Abner was beaten; he was pursued by the fleet-footed Asahel, brother of Joab, whom he slew. See HELKATH-HAZZURIM.

Possibly we should read "Gibeon" instead of "Geba" in 2 S 5 25, as in the || passage, 1 Ch 14 16 (HDB, s.v.). From Baal-perazim David was to make a circuit and fall upon the Philis who were encamped in the plain of Rephaim W. of Jerus. Perhaps, however, we should read "Gibeah" in both places. Cheyne (EB, s.v.) thinks the hill town of Baal-perazim may be intended.

When, after the death of Absalom and the suppression of his rebellion, Bichri raised the standard of revolt, Amasa was sent to call out the men of Judah against him.

3. Murder of Amasa The men of Judah against him. Tarrying longer than the time appointed, there was danger lest Bichri might have opportunity to strengthen his position; so David dispatched Abishai and the troops that were with him to attack Bichri at once. Joab went with this expedition. Obviously he could never be content with a second place. The force of Amasa was met at "the great stone of Gibeon." There Joab treacherously slew that unsuspecting general, and, himself assuming command, stamped out the rebellion with his accustomed thoroughness (2 S 20 4 ff). "The great stone" appears to have been well known, and may have possessed some religious character.

Gibeon was the seat of an ancient sanctuary, called in 1 K 3 4 "the great high place." Here, according to 2 Ch 1 3, was the tabernacle made in the wilderness—but see

4. The Sanctuary 1 K 8 4. It was the scene of Solomon's great sacrifice after which he slept in the sanctuary and dreamed his famous dream (1 K 3 4 ff; 9 2; 2 Ch 1 3.13, etc.).

By "the great waters that are in Gibeon" Johanan overtook Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and freed the captives he had taken from Mizpah (Jer 41 11 ff). Among those who returned with Zerubbabel were 95 "children of Gibeon" (Neh 7 25; cf 3 7). At Gibeon Cestius Gallus encamped when marching against Jerus from Antipatris (BJ, II, xix, 1).

The ancient city is represented by the modern village el-Jib. It is fully 5 miles N.W. of Jerus, and about a mile N. of Neby Samwil, on a double knoll, with terraced slopes, but cation and rocky and precipitous to the E. The Description village stands amid striking remains of antiquity. About a hundred paces from the village to the E. is a large reservoir with a spring. Lower down, among the olives, are the remains of another and larger reservoir, which collected the overflow from the first. This is probably the "pool" of 2 S 2 13, and "the great waters" of Jer 41 12. El-Jib stands in the midst of a rich upland plain not far S. of the great pass which goes down by way of the Beth-horons into the vale of Ajalon.

GIBLITES, gib'lits. See GEBALITES.

GIDDALTI, gi-dal'ti (גִּדְּלָתִי, giddalti, "I magnify [God]"): A son of Heman (1 Ch 25 4.29), one of David's musicians.

GIDDEL, gid'el (גִּדְּעַל, giddēl, "very great," "stout"):

(1) The name of the head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 47=Neh 7 49=1 Esd 5 30 [here as Cathual]).

(2) The name of the head of a family of Solomon's servants (Ezr 2 56=Neh 7 58=1 Esd 5 33 [here Isdael]).

GIDEON, gid'ē-un (גִּדְּעוֹן, gidh'on, "cutter down," "feller" or "hewer"): Also named Jerubbaal (Jgs 6 32) and Jerubbesheth (2 S 11 21), youngest son of Joash, of the clan of Abiezer in the tribe of Manasseh. His home was at Ophrah, and his family an obscure one. He became the chief leader of Manasseh and the fifth recorded judge of Israel. The record of his life is found in Jgs 6-8.

Joash was an idolater, and sacrifices to Baal were common among the entire clan. Gideon seems to have held this worship in contempt, and to have pondered deeply the causes of Israel's reverses and the injuries wrought upon his own family by the hand of the Midianites.

The Midianites under Zebah and Zalmunna, their two greatest chiefs, accompanied by other wild tribes of the eastern desert, had gradually encroached on the territory of Israel in Central Pal. They came first as marauders and pillagers at the time of the harvests, but later they forcibly took possession of lands, and thus inflicted permanent injury and loss, esp. upon Manasseh and Ephraim. The conflicts became so numerous, the appropriation of land so flagrant, that the matter of sustenance became a serious problem (6 4). The multitude of these desert hordes and the cruelty of their depredation rendered defence difficult, and, lacking in the spirit of national unity, the Israelites were driven to dens, caves and rocky strongholds for safety (6 2). After seven years of such invasion and suffering Gideon comes upon the scene.

It is probable that Gideon had already distinguished himself in resistance to the Midianites (6 12), but he now receives Divine

3. The Call of Gideon commission to assume the leadership. Having taken his own little harvest to a secret place for threshing, that it might escape the greed of the Midianites, he is surprised while at work by a visit from the Lord in the form of an angel. However this scene (6 11 ff) and its miraculous incidents may be interpreted, there can be no question of the divineness of Gideon's call or that the voice which spoke to him was the voice of God. Neither the brooding over the death of his brothers at Tabor (8 18) nor the patriotic impulses dwelling within him can account for his assumption of leadership. Nor did he become leader at the demand of the people. He evidently had scarcely thought of himself as his country's deliverer. The call not only came to him as a surprise, but found him distrustful both of himself (6 15) and of his people (ver 13). It found him too without inclination for the task, and only his conviction that the command was of God persuaded him to assume leadership. This gives the note of accuracy to the essential facts of the story. Gideon's demand for a sign (ver 17) being answered, the food offered the messenger having been consumed by fire at the touch of his staff, Gideon acknowledged the Divine commission of his visitor, and at the place of visitation built an altar to Jeh (vs 19 ff).

The call and first commission of Gideon are closely joined. He is at once commanded to destroy the altars of Baal set up by his father at 4. His First Ophrah, to build an altar to Jeh at the Commission same place and thereon to offer one of his father's bullocks as a sacrifice (vs 25 f). There is no reason to look on this as a second version of Gideon's call. It is rather the beginning of instruction, and is deeply significant of the accuracy of the story, in that it follows the line of all revelation to God's prophets and reformers to begin their work at home. Taking ten men, under the cover of darkness, Gideon does as commanded (ver 27). The morning revealed his work and visited upon him the wrath of the people of Ophrah. They demand of Joash that he put his son to death. The answer of Joash is an ironical but valid defence of Gideon. Why should the people plead for Baal? A god should be able to plead his own cause (vs 28 ff). This defence gained for Gideon the name Jerubbaal (y'rubba'al, i.e. yārebbā bō ha-ba'al, "Let Baal plead," 6 32 AV).

The time intervening between this home scene and the actual campaign against the Midianites cannot definitely be named. It is probable that it took months for Gideon even to rally the people of his own clan. The fact is that all the subsequent events of the story are somewhat confused by what looks like a double narrative in which there are apparent but not vital differences. Without ignoring this fact it is still possible to get a connected account of what actually transpired.

When the allied invaders were in camp on the plain of Jezreel, we find Gideon, having recruited the Abiezrites and sent messengers to

5. Gideon's Army the various tribes of Israel (6 34 f), pitching his camp near the Midianites.

The location of the various camps of Gideon is difficult, as is the method of the recruiting of the tribes. For instance, 6 35 seems to be in direct contradiction to 7 23, and both are considered of doubtful origin. There was evidently, however, a preliminary encampment at the place of rallying. While waiting here, Gideon further tested his commission by the dry and wet fleece (6 37 ff) and, convinced of God's purpose to save Israel by his leadership, he moves his camp to the S.E. edge of the plain of Jezreel nearby the spring of Harod. From his point of vantage here he could look down on the tents of Midian. The account of the reduction of his large army from 32,000 to 300 (7 2 ff) is generally accepted as belonging to a later tradition. Neither of the tests, however, is unnatural, and the first was not unusual. According to the account, Gideon at the Lord's command first excused all the fearful. This left him with 10,000 men. This number was reduced to 300 by a test of their method of drinking. This test can easily be seen to evidence the eagerness and courage of men for battle (Jos).

Having thus reduced the army and having the assurance that the Lord would deliver to him and his little band the forces of Midian, 6. The Midianites' Discom-figure and Flight Gideon, with a servant, went by night to the edge of the camp of his enemy, and there heard the telling and interpretation of a dream which greatly encouraged him and led him to strike an immediate blow (7 9 ff). Again we find a conflict of statement between 7 20 and 7 22, but the conflict is as to detail only. Dividing his men into three equal bands, Gideon arranges that with trumpets, and lights concealed in pitchers, and with the cry, "The sword of Jeh and of Gideon!" they shall descend and charge the Midianites simultaneously from three sides. This stratagem for concealing his numbers and for terrifying the enemy succeeds, and the Midianites and their allies flee in disorder toward the Jordan (7 18 ff). The rout was complete, and the victory was intensified by the fact that in the darkness the enemy turned their swords against one another. Admitting that we have two narratives (cf 7 24; 8 3 with 8 4 ff) and that there is some difference between them in the details of the attack and the progress of the conflict, there is no need for confusion in the main line of events. One part of the fleeing enemy evidently crossed the Jordan at Succoth, being led by Zebah and Zalmunna. The superior force followed the river farther south, toward the ford of Beth-barah. Gideon sent messengers to the men of Ephraim (7 24), probably before the first attack, asking them to intercept the Midianites, should they attempt to escape by the fords in their territory. This they did, defeating the

7. Death of Zebah and Zeeb enemy at Beth-barah and slaying the princes Oreb and Zeeb ("the Raven" and "the Wolf"). As proof of their victory and valor they brought the heads of the princes to Gideon and accused him of having discounted their bravery by not calling them earlier into the fight. But Gideon was a master of diplomacy, as well as of strategy, and won the friendship of Ephraim by magnifying their accomplishment in comparison with his own (8 1 ff).

Gideon now pursues Zebah and Zalmunna on the E. side of the river. The people on that side are still in great fear of the Midianites and refuse even to feed his army. At Succoth they say to him, "Are the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna now in thy hand, that we should give bread unto thine army?" (8 6). At Penuel he meets with the same refusal (8 8). Promising to deal with Succoth and Penuel as they deserve when he is through with his present task, Gideon pushes on with his half-famished but courageous men, overtakes the Midianites, defeats them, captures Zebah and Zalmunna, and, returning, punishes, according to his promise, both Succoth and Penuel (8 7.9.13 ff).

Thus was the power of the Midianites and the desert hordes broken in Canaan and a forty years' peace came to Israel. But the two

8. Death of Zebah and Zalmunna kings of Midian must now meet their fate as defeated warriors. They had led their forces at Tabor when the brothers of Gideon perished. So Gideon commands his young son Jether to slay them as though they were not worthy of death at a warrior's hand (8 20). The youth fearing the task, Gideon himself put them to death (8 21).

The people clamored to make Gideon king. He refused, being moved possibly by a desire to maintain the theocracy. To this end he

9. Gideon's asks only the jewelry taken as spoil Ephod in the battles (8 24 ff), and with it makes an ephod, probably an image of Jeh, and places it in a house of the Lord at Ophrah. By this act it was later thought that Gideon contributed to a future idolatry of Israel. The narrative properly closes with 8 28. The remaining verses containing the account of Gideon's family and death (8 30 ff) and the record of events immediately subsequent to Gideon's death (8 33 ff) come from other sources than the original narrators.

GIDEONI, gid-ē-ō-nī (גִּדְעוֹנִי, gidh'ōnī): The father of Abidan who was prince of Benjamin, mentioned only in connection with the son (Nu 1 11; 2 22; 7 60.65; 10 24).

GIDOM, gid-ōm (גִּדְוֹם, gidh'ōm): The limit eastward, from Gibeah toward the wilderness, of the pursuit of Benjamin by Israel (Jgs 20 45). No name suggesting this has yet been recovered. It is not mentioned elsewhere.

GIER-EAGLE, jēr'-ē-g'ī (גִּירֵי עֵקֶל, gīrīm; ekēl, kuknos, in Lev, πορφύρεον, porphureion, in Dt): The name applied to one of the commonest of the vultures, and not an eagle at all. The word is derived from a Heb root, meaning "to love," and was applied to the birds because mated pairs seldom separated. These were smaller birds and inferior to the largest members of the family. They nested on a solid base, lived in pairs, and not only flocked over carrion as larger species permitted, but also ate the vilest offal of all sorts, for which reason they were protected by a death penalty by one of the Pharaohs.

Gier-Eagle (Neophron percnopterus).

Because of this the birds became so frequent and daring around camps, among tent-dwellers, and in cities, that they were commonly called "Pharaoh's chickens." They are mentioned in the Bible in the lists of abominations found in Lev 11 13 and Dt 14 12 (AV "osifrage"); 14 17 AV (RV "vulture").

GIFT, gift (תְּרוּמָה, terūmah; נְדָבָה, nedabah; שְׁחָדָה, shōhadh; דָּרוֹן, dōron; דְּפָעָה, dōreā; χάρισμα, charisma): In Gen 25 6; Ex 25 23; Nu

18 6.7.29; Ezk 20 26, etc, matānāh, "a gift," is so rendered; minhāh, an offering or present, used esp. of the "meat offerings," is tr^d "gift" (2 S 8 2.6 AV; 2 Ch 26 8), in which passages "tribute" is meant, as RV; 22 23; Ps 45 12. A few other words occur singly, e.g. 'eshkar, "a reward" (Ps 72 10); mas'ah, "lifting up" (Est 2 18); nāthan is tr^d "gifts" (Nu 8 19; RVm "Heb n'thānim, given"); nēdheh, nādhān, "impure gifts" (Ezk 18 33); nis'ah, "a thing lifted up" (2 S 19 42); shōhadh means "a bribe" (Ex 23 8; Dt 16 19; 2 Ch 19 7; Prov 6 35; 17 8.23; Isa 1 23; Ezk 22 12); in each instance ARV has "bribe" except Prov 6 35, "gifts"; terūmah, "a present" (Prov 29 4), may also mean a bribe, AV "he that receiveth gifts," RV "he that exacteth gifts," in "imposeth tribute, Heb a man of offerings."

In the NT dōron, "a present," "gift" (from didōmi, "to give"), is tr^d "gift" (Mt 2 11; 5 23.24 bis; Mk 7 11 AV; He 6 1; Rev 11 10, etc, referring chiefly to gifts or offerings to God); dōrea, "a free gift" (Jn 4 10; Acts 2 38; Rom 5 15.17; 2 Cor 9 15; He 6 4, etc, referring to the gifts of God); dōrema, "a free gift" (Rom 6 16; Jas 1 17, ERV "boon"); dōris, "a giving" (Jas 1 17, "every good gift," RVm "giving"); charisma, "grace," "favor," a benefit or good conferred, is also used of Divine gifts and favors, esp. of the supernatural gifts imparted by the Holy Spirit (charismata) enumerated in Rom 12; 1 Cor 12; the word occurs tr^d "gift, gifts" (Rom 1 11), "some spiritual gift" (5 15.16, "free gift"); 6 23, "The gift of God is eternal life," RV "free gift"; 11 29; 1 Cor 1 7; 7 7; 2 Cor 1 11; 1 Tim 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6; 1 Pet 4 10); charis, "grace," "favor" (2 Cor 8 4, RV "grace"); merismōs, "distribution," "parting" (He 2 4, RVm "distributions"); anathōma, "a thing devoted to God," is once (Lk 21 5) used of "the goodly gifts" (RV "offerings") which adorned the Temple at Jerus.

In RV "gift" is substituted in the text of Gen 23 11 for blessing, in "Heb blessing"; "boasteth himself of his gifts falsely" (Prov 25 14) for "boasteth himself of a false gift," in "Heb in a gift of falsehood"; "a parting gift" for "presents" (Mic 1 14); "Given to God" for "a gift" (Mk 7 11).

GIHON, gī'hon (גִּיחוֹן, gīhōn; Γῆζον, Gēzon): One of the four rivers of Eden (Gen 2 13). It is said to compass the whole land of Cush (Ethiopia), probably a province E. of the Tigris. The Gihon is thought by Sayce to be the Kerkha, coming down from Luristan through the province known in the cuneiform texts as Kassi, probably the Cush of the Bible. See EDEN.

Used fig. of wisdom in Sir 24 27, "as Gihon [AV Geon] in the days of vintage."

GIHON (גִּיחוֹן, gīhōn, גִּיחוֹן, gīhōn [in 1 K], from root גִּחַ, "to burst forth"):

(1) See preceding article.

(2) The Nile in Jer 2 18 LXX (Γῆζον, Gēzon); in Heb גִּיחוֹן, gīhōn (see SHIHON).

(3) A spring in Jerus, evidently sacred, and, for that reason, selected as the scene of Solomon's coronation (1 K 1 38). It is without doubt the spring known to the Moslems as 'Ain Umm ed deraj ("the spring of the steps") and to the Christians as 'Ain Sitti Miriam ("the spring of the lady Mary"), or commonly as the "Virgin's Fount." It is the one true spring of Jerus, the original source of attraction to the site of the early settlers; it is situated in the Kidron valley on the E. side of "Ophel," and due S. of the temple area. See JERUSALEM. The water in the present day is brackish and impregnated with sewage. The spring is intermittent in character, "bursting up" at intervals; this feature may account for the name Gihon and for its sacred characters. In NT times it was, as it is today, credited with healing virtues. See BETH-ESDA. Its position is clearly defined in the OT. Manasseh "built an outer wall to the city of David, on the W. side of Gihon, in the valley" (= Nahal, i.e. the Kidron; 2 Ch 33 14). From Gihon Hezekiah made his aqueduct (2 Ch 32 30), now the Siloam tunnel. See SILOAM.

The Virgin's Fount.

The spring is approached by a steep descent down 30 steps, the water rising deep underground; the condition is due to the vast accumulation of rubbish—the result of the many destructions of the city—which now fills the valley bed. Originally the water ran down the open valley. The water rises from a long deep crack in the rock, partly under the lowest of the steps and to a lesser extent in the mouth of a small cave, 11½ ft. long by 5 ft. wide, into which all the water pours. The village women of Siloam obtain the water at the mouth of the cave, but when the supply is scanty they actually go under the lowest step—where there is a kind of chamber—and fill their vessels there. At the farther end of this cave is the opening leading into the aqueduct down which the water flows to emerge after many windings at the pool of Siloam. The first part of this aqueduct is older than the time of Hezekiah and led originally to the perpendicular shaft, connected with "Warren's tunnel" described elsewhere (see SILOAM; ZION).

The preëminent position of importance which Gihon held in the eyes of the earlier inhabitants of Jerus is shown by the extraordinary number of passages, rock cuttings, walls and aqueducts which exist all about the spring. Walls have been made at different periods to bank up the waters and direct them into the channels provided for them. Of aqueducts, besides the "Siloam aqueduct," two others have been formed. One running from the source at a considerable lower level than that of Hezekiah was followed by the present writer (see PEFS, 1902, 35–38) for 176 ft. It was very winding, following apparently the W. side of the Kidron valley. It was a well-cemented channel, about 1½ ft. wide and on an average of 4½ ft. high, roofed in with well-cut stones. There are no certain indications of age, but in the writer's opinion it is a much later construction than Hezekiah's aqueduct, though the rock-cut part near the source may be older. It was discovered by the Siloam fellahin, because, through a fault in the dam, all the water of the "Virgin's Fount" was disappearing down this channel. A third aqueduct has recently been discovered running off at a higher level than the other two. It is a channel deeply cut in the rock with curious trough-like stones all along its floor. It appears to be made for water, but one branch of it actually slopes upward toward its end. The pottery, which is early Hebrew, shows that it is very ancient. The whole accumulated debris around the source is full of pre-Israelite and early Israelite pottery.

GILALAI, gil'a-li, gi-lā'il (גִּלְיָאִי, gilday): A musician in the procession at the dedication of the wall, son of a priest (Neh 12 36).

GILBOA, gil-bō'a, MOUNT (גִּלְבּוֹא הַר, har ha-gilboa, "Mount of the Gilboa"): Unless we should read "Gilboa" for "Gilead" in Jgs 7 3 (see GILEAD, 2) this mountain is mentioned in Scripture only in connection with the last conflict of Saul with the Philis, and his disastrous defeat (1 S 28 4; 31 1, 8; 2 S 1 6 21; 21 12; 1 Ch 10 1, 8). If Zer'in be identical with Jezreel—a point upon which Professor R. A. S. Macalister has recently cast some doubt—Saul must have occupied the slopes on the N.W. side of the mountain, near "the fountain which is in Jezreel" (1 S 29 1). The Philis attacked from the plain, and the battle went sore against the men of Israel, who broke and fled; and in the flight Jonathan, Abinadab and Malchi-ahua, sons of Saul, were slain. Rather than be taken by his lifelong foes, Saul fell upon his sword and died (1 S 31 1 ff).

The modern name of the mountain is Jebel Faku'a. It rises on the eastern edge of the plain of Esdraelon, and, running from Zer'in to the S.E., it then sweeps southward to join the Samarian uplands. It presents an imposing appearance from the plain, but the highest point, Sheikh Burkan, is not more than 1,696 ft. above sea level. In the higher reaches the range is rugged and barren; but vegetation is plentiful on the lower slopes, esp. to the W. The Kishon takes its rise on the mountain. Under the northern cliffs rises 'Ain Jalud, possibly identical with HAROD, WELL OF, which see. In Jalud, a village on the western declivity, there is perhaps an echo of the old name. W. EWING

GILEAD, gil'e-ad (גִּלְעָד, ha-gil'ad, "the Gilead"): The name is explained in Gen 31 46 ff. 51, as derived from Heb gal, "a cairn," and 'ad, "witness," agreeing in meaning with the Aram. y'ghar-ashadhalu. The Arab. jilad means "rough," "rugged."

(1) A city named in Hos 6 8; 12 11, possibly to be identified with Gilead near to Mispah (Jgs 10 17). If this is correct, the ancient city may be represented by the modern Jil'ad, a ruin about 5 miles N. of es-Salt.

(2) A mountain named in Jgs 7 3. Gideon, ordered to reduce the number of men who were with him, commanded all who were "fearful and trembling" to "return and depart from Mt. Gilead." RVm reads "return and go round about from Mt. Gilead." Gideon and his army lay to the S. of the plain of Jezreel on the lower slopes of Gilboa. It has been suggested (Studer, Comm., ad loc.) that, as the Midianites lay between the men of the northern tribes and their homes, they were told to cross the Jordan, make a détour through Gilead, and thus avoid the enemy. Possibly, however, we should read Gilboa for Gilead; or part of the mountain may have borne the name of Gilead. The last suggestion is favored by the presence of a strong spring under the northern declivity of Gilboa, nearly 2 miles from Zer'in, possibly to be identified with the Well of Harod. In the modern name, 'Ain Jalud, there may be an echo of the ancient Gilead.

(3) The name is applied generally to the mountain mass lying between the Yarmūk on the N., and Wādy Hesbān on the S.; the Jordan 1. The Land being the boundary on the W., while of Gilead on the E. it marched with the desert.

Mount Gilead—lit. "Mount of the Gilead"—may refer to some particular height which we have now no means of identifying (Gen 31 23). The name Jebel Jil'ād is still, indeed, applied to a mountain S. of Nahr ez-Zerkā and N. of es-Salt; but this does not meet the necessities of the passage as it stands. The same expression in Dt 3 12 obviously stands for the whole country. This is probably true also in Cant 4 1. The name Gilead is sometimes used to denote the whole country E. of the Jordan (Gen 37 25; Josh 22 9; 2 S 2 9, etc). Again, along with Bashan, it indicates the land E. of Jordan, as distinguished from the

2. Bashan Moab plateau (Dt 3 10; Josh 13 11; 2 K 10 33). In the N. Gilead bordered upon Geshur and Maacah (Josh 13 11.13); and here the natural boundary would be formed by the deep gorge of the Yarmūk and Wādy esh-Shellāleh. In pre-Israelite times the Jabbok (Nahr ez-Zerkā), which cuts the country in two, divided the kingdom of Sihon from that of Og (Dt 3 16; Josh 12 2). The frontiers between the tribes of Reuben, Gad and Manasseh cannot be indicated with any certainty. Probably they varied at different times (cf Josh 13 24 ff; 1 Ch 5 8.9.11.16). It greatly increases the difficulty that so many of the cities named are still unidentified. But in any case it is clear that the bulk of Gilead fell to Gad, so that Gilead might stand for Gad (Jgs 5 17). HAVVOTH-JAIR (which see), "the villages of Jair," lay in Gilead (Jgs 10 4). The modern division of the country follows the natural features. From the Yarmūk to Nahr ez-Zerkā is the district of 'Ajlūn; and from the Zerkā to the Arnon is el-Belkā.

The geological formation is the same as that of Western Pal, but the underlying sandstone, which does not appear W. of the Jordan, 3. Geology forms the base slopes of the chain of Moab and Gilead, and is traceable as far as the Jabbok. It is covered in part by the more recent white marls which form the curious peaks of the foothills immediately above the Jordan valley; but reaches above them to an elevation of 1,000 ft. above the Mediterranean on the S., and forms the bed of the Bukei'a basin farther E., and 1,000 ft. higher. Above this lies the hard, impervious dolomite limestone which appears in the rugged hills round the Jabbok and in Jebel 'Ajlūn, rising on an average 1,500 ft. above the sandstone and forming the bed of the copious springs. It also dips toward the Jordan valley, and the water from the surface of the plateau, sinking down to the surface of their formation, bursts out of the hill slopes on the W. in perennial brooks. It was from the ruggedness of this hard limestone that Gilead obtained its name. Above this again is the white chalk of the desert plateau, the same as that found in Samaria and Lower Galilee, with bands of flint or chert in contorted layers, or strewn in pebbles on the surface. Where this formation is deep the country is bare and arid, supplied by cisterns and deep wells. Thus the plateau becomes desert, while the hill slopes abound in streams and springs; and for this reason Western Gilead is a fertile country, and Eastern Gilead is a wilderness (Conder, DB, s.v.).

The uplands of Gilead may be described as the crumpling of the edge of the great eastern plateau ere it plunges into the Ghōr. The average height of the range is about 4,000 ft. above the Jordan valley, or 3,000 ft. above the Mediterranean. The greatest height is toward the S., where it culminates in Jebel Osh'a (3,597 ft.), to the N. of es-Salt. This mountain commands a most spacious view. To the E. of it lies the hollow (an old lake bottom) of el-Bukei'a, fully 1,500 ft. lower. In the N. we have Jebel Hakart (3,408 ft.), W. of Reimūn. Almost as high (3,430 ft.) is Jebel Kafkafah, about 12 miles to the N.E. A striking point (2,700 ft.) fully 2 miles N.W. of 'Ajlūn, is crowned by Kal'at er-Rabad, whence again a view of extraordinary extent is gained.

The Yarmūk and the Zerkā—see JABBOK—are the main streams, but almost every valley has its perennial brook. While not so rich

5. Streams as the volcanic loam in the N. and in and the S., the soil of Gilead amply repays Products the labor of the husbandman. Of flowers the most plentiful are the phlox, the cistus and the narcissus. Hawthorn, mastic and arbutus abound, while many a glen and slope is shady with shaggy oak woods, and, in the higher reaches, with pines. The streams are fringed with oleander. The monotony of the stony plateau is broken by clumps of the hardy white broom. In the lower ground are found the tamarisk and the lotus, with many a waving cane-brake. The scenery is more beautiful and picturesque than that of any other district of Pal. The soil is not now cultivated to any great extent; but it furnishes ample pasture for many flocks and herds (Cant 6 5).

The Ishmaelites from Gilead (Gen 37 25) were carrying "spicery and balm and myrrh." From old time Gilead was famed for its BALM (q.v.). The lōl, tr^d "myrrh" in the above passage, was probably the gum produced by the Cistus ladaniferus, a flower which still abounds in Gilead.

After the conquest, as we have seen, Gilead passed mainly into the hands of Gad. An Ammonite attack was repulsed by the prowess

6. History of Jephthah (Jgs 11 1 ff); and the spite of the Ephraimites was terribly punished (12 1 ff). Gilead at first favored the cause of Ishbosheth (2 S 2 9), but after the murder of that prince the Gileadites came with the rest of Israel to David (5 1). By the conquest of the fortress Rabbah, which the Ammonites had continued to hold, the land passed finally under the power of David (12 26 ff). David fled to Mahanaim from Absalom, and that rebel prince perished in one of the forests of Gilead (2 S 17 24; 18 6 ff). Job's census included Gilead (24 6). Solomon had two commissariat districts in Gilead (1 K 4 13 f.19). Before Ramoth-gilead, which he sought to win back from the Syrians who had captured it, Ahab received his death wound (22 1 ff). The Syrians asserted their supremacy in Gilead (2 K 10 32 f) where Moab and Israel had contended with varying fortune (M S). At length Tiglath-pileser overran the country and transported many of the inhabitants (2 K 15 29). This seems to have led to a reconquest of the land by heathenism, and return to Gilead was promised to Israel (Zec 10 10).

At a later time the Jewish residents in Gilead were exposed to danger from their heathen neighbors. On their behalf Judas Maccabaeus invaded the country and met with striking success (1 Macc 5 9 ff). Alexander Jannaeus, who had subdued Gilead, was forced to yield it again to the king of Arabia (Ant, XIII, xiv, 2; BJ, I, iv, 3). During the Roman period, esp. in the 2d and 3d cents. AD, the land enjoyed great prosperity. Then were built such cities as Gadara and Gerasa, which are still imposing, even in ruins. The appearance of the Moslem armies was the signal for its decay. Attempts were made to recover it for Christianity by Baldwin I (1118 AD) and Baldwin II (1121 AD); and the Crusaders left their mark in such strongholds as Kal'at er-Rabad, and the castle at es-Salt. With the reassertion of Moslem supremacy a curtain falls over the history of the district; and only in comparatively recent times has it again become known to travelers. The surveys directed by the Pal Exploration Fund, in so far as they have been carried out, are invaluable. N. of the Jabbok are many villages, and a fair amount of cultivation. Es Salt is the only village of any importance in the S. It is famous for its raisins. Its spacious uplands, its wooded and well-watered valleys have been for centuries the pasture-land of the nomads.

GILGAL, gil'gal (גִּלְגָּל, gilgal, "circle"; גִּלְגָּלָא, Gilgala): The art. is always with the name except in Josh 5 9. There are three places to which the name is attached:

(1) The first camp of Israel after crossing the Jordan (Josh 4 19; 5 9.10; 9 6; 10 7; 14 6; 15 7; Dt 11 30). According to Josh 15 7 it lay to the N. of the valley of Achor, which formed the border between Judah and Benjamin. Here 12 memorial stones taken from the bed of the river were set up by Joshua, after the miraculous crossing of the Jordan; and here (Josh 5 5 ff) the people were circumcised preparatory to their possession of the land, when it is said in Josh, with a play upon the word, "This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you." Whereupon the Passover was celebrated (ver 10) and the manna ceased (ver 12). To Gilgal the ark returned every day after having compassed the city of Jericho during its siege (6 11). Hither the Gibeonites came to make their treaty (9 3 ff), and again (10 6) to ask aid against the Amorites. Gilgal was still the headquarters of the Israelites after the battle with the Amorites (ver 15); again after Joshua's extensive victorious campaign in the hill country of Judaea extending to Kadesh-barnea and Gaza (10 15 ff); and still later upon his return from the great battle at the Waters of Merom (14 6). At the conclusion of the conquest (18 1), the headquarters were transferred to Shiloh on the summit of the mountain ridge to the W.

Gilgal reappears frequently in subsequent history. Samuel (1 S 7 16) made it one of the three places where he annually held circuit court, the other places being Bethel and Mizpah. The LXX text adds that these were holy places. The place continued as one of special resort for sacrifices (10 8; 13 8.9.10; 15 21), while it was here that Samuel hewed Agag to pieces before the Lord (15 33), and that Saul was both crowned (11 14.15) and rejected as king. It was at Gilgal, also (2 S 19 15), that the people assembled to welcome David as he returned from his exile beyond Jordan during Absalom's rebellion. The early prophets refer to Gilgal as a center of idolatry in their day (Hos 4 15; 9 15; 12 11; Am 4 4; 5 5). Micah (6 5) represents Gilgal as at the other end of the Dead Sea from Shittim.

In 1874 Conder recognized the name Gilgal as surviving in Birket Jiljūlieh, a pool beside a tamarisk tree 3 miles E. of old Jericho. The pool measures 100 ft. by 84, and is surrounded with a wall of roughly hewn stones. N. of the pool Bliss discovered lines of masonry 300 yds. long, representing probably the foundations of an ancient monastery. S. of the pool there are numerous mounds scattered over an area of one-third of a sq. mile, the largest being 50 ft. in diameter, and 10 in height. On excavation some pottery and glass were found. These ruins are probably those of early Christian occupation, and according to Conder there is nothing against their marking the original site. Up to the Middle Ages the 12 stones of Joshua were referred to by tradition.

(2) According to 2 K 2 1; 4 38, Elisha for a time made his headquarters at Gilgal, a place in the mountains not far from Bethel identified by Conder as Jiljilia, standing on a high hill on the N. side of the Wādī el-Jib. It is lower than Bethel, but the phrase in 2 K 2 2, "they went down to Beth-el," may refer to their initial descent into the wādī. It could not have been said that they went down from Gilgal to Bethel in the Jordan valley. The place seems to be referred to in Neh 12 29 as Beth-gilgal.

(3) Gilgal of the nations: In Josh 12 23 Gilgal is mentioned as a royal city associated with Dor, evidently upon the maritime plain. Dor is identified with Tantura, while Conder identifies this Gilgal with Jiljūlieh, 30 miles S. of Dor and 4 miles N. of Anti-patris.

GEORGE FREDERICK WRIGHT

GILLOH, gil'lo (גִּלְלוֹ, gilloh): A town in the hill country of Judah mentioned along with Jattir, Socoh, Debir, Eshtemoa, etc (Josh 15 51). Ahithophel came from here (2 S 15 12) and is called the Gilonite (2 S 23 34). Driver infers from this last that the original form was Gilon, not Giloh. Probably the ruins Kh. Jālā, in the hills 3 miles N.W. of Hulhul, mark the site (PEF, III, 313, Sh XXI).

GILONITE, gil'lo-nit. See preceding article.

GIMEL, gē'mel, gim'el (גִּמְלָה, gimlā): The 3d letter of the Heb alphabet, and used as such to designate the 3d part of Ps 119; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia with the dagesh as g, and without as gh (aspirated g). It came also to be used for the number three (3), and with the dieresis for 3,000. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

GIMZO, gim'zō (גִּמְצוֹ, gimzō; ΓΑΜΖΟ, Gamzō): A town of Judah on the border of the Philistines, captured by the Philis in the days of Ahaz (2 Ch 28 18). It is the modern Jimzu, a small mud village about 3½ miles S.E. of Ludd (Lydda), on the old mule road from there to Jerus (Robinson, BE, II, 248-49; SWP, II, 297).

GIN, jīn (גִּין, mōkēsh, ḡīn, paḥ): A noose of hair or wire for snaring wild birds alive. There are over half a dozen traps and net devices indicated by different terms in the Bible. The gin was of horse-hair for small birds and wire for larger ones. It is mentioned in Am 3 5: "Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth, where no gin is set for him? shall a snare spring up from the ground, and have taken nothing at all?" Job writing in mental and physical discomfort on the ash heap included all methods mentioned in one outburst:

"For he is cast into a net by his own feet,
And he walketh upon the toils.
A gin shall take him by the heel,
And a snare shall lay hold on him.
A noose is hid for him in the ground,
And a trap for him in the way" (Job 18 8 ff.).

GINATH, g'nath (גִּנְאֹת, ginath): Father of Tibni, the unsuccessful rival of Omri (1 K 16 21. 22).

GINNETHOI, gin-ē-thō'i (AV Ginnetho), GINNETHON, gin-ē-thon (גִּנְתְּהוֹן, ginnethōy, and גִּנְתְּהוֹן, ginnethōn): The head of a priestly family. Ginnethoi (Ginnetho) is found in Neh 12 4, and Ginnethon in 10 6; 12 16.

GIRDLE, gūr'd'l. See ARMOR; DRESS.

GIRGASHITE, gūr'ga-shīt (גִּרְגָּשִׁי, girgāshī; Γεργασίτης, Gergasatos; also punctuated [?] Girgasite [Gen 10 16 AV]): A son of (the land of) Canaan (Gen 10 16), and accordingly enumerated along with the Canaanite in the list of tribes or nationalities inhabiting that country (Gen 15 21; Dt 7 1; Josh 3 10; 24 11; Neh 9 8). It has been supposed that the name survived in that of "the Gergesenes," AV (RV "the Gadarenes"), of Mt 8 28, on the E. side of the Sea of Galilee; Jos (Ant, I, vi, 2), however, states that nothing was known about it. The inscriptions of the Egypt king, Ramses II, mention the Qarqish who sent help to the Hittites in their war with Egypt; but Qarqish was more probably in Asia Minor than in Syria. Pinches (The OT in the Light of the Historical Records, 324) would identify the Girgashites with the Kirkishati of an Assyrian tablet; the latter people, however, seem to have lived to the E. of the Tigris, and it may be that, as in the case of the Hittites, a colony of the Qarqish, from Asia Minor, was established in Pal. A. H. SAYCE GIRL, gūrl: Twice in the OT as the rendering of יָלְדָּה, yaldāh (Joel 3 3; Zec 8 5), in both cases in association with boys. Same word rendered "damsel" in Gen 34 4. See DAUGHTER; MAID, MAIDEN.

GIRZITES, gūr'zīts. See GIZRITES.

GISHPA, gish'pa (AV Gīšpa; גִּישְׁפָּא, gishpā): An officer of the Nethinim (Neh 11 21). A comparison with Ezr 2 43 makes it probable that he is to be identified with Hasupha, and quite possible that this word is a corruption of Hasupha.

GITTAH-HEPHER, git-ā-hē'fēr (גִּתְּהָהֶפֶר, gittāh hēpher): AV (Josh 19 13) for Gath-hepher. Gittah is correctly Gath with ḥē (הֶ) locale, meaning "toward Gath."

GITTAIM, git'ā-im (גִּתַּיִם, gittayim): The town to which the Beerothites fled, and where they lived as gerim, or protected strangers (2 S 4 3). The place need not have been beyond the boundaries of Benjamin, so it may be identical with Gittaim of Neh 11 33, which was occupied by Benjamites after the exile. It is named with Hazor and Ramah; but so far the site has not been discovered.

GITTITES, git'tits (גִּתִּיטִּים, gittim, pl. of gitti): The inhabitants of Gath. They are mentioned along with the inhabitants of the other chief Philistines in Josh 13 3. It would seem that numbers of them emigrated to Judah, for we find 600 of them acting as a bodyguard to David with Ittai at their head (2 S 15 18 ff; 18 2). Obed-edom, to whom David intrusted the ark when he was frustrated in bringing it into the city of David, was a Gittite (2 S 6 11 f; 1 Ch 13 13). The Gittites seem to have been remarkable for their great stature (2 S 21 19; 1 Ch 20 5 ff).

GITTITH, git'ith. See MUSIC; PSALMS.

GIVE (נָתַן, nāthan, נָתַן, yāhāh, נָתַן, sūm; δίδωμι, didōmi): "Give" is a very common word in the OT. It is most frequently the tr of nāthan, "to give" (Gen 1 29; 3 6; Ex 2 9; Dt 1 8.20, etc., over 800 instances); nāthan is also tr^d "to give up" (Dt 23 14; Isa 43 6; Hos 11 8); of yāhāh, "to give" (Gen 30 1; 1 Ch 16 28 AV). In Ps 55 22 we have the perfect with suffix, "Cast thy burden upon Jeh," m "what he hath given thee"; elsewhere it is the imperative "Give!" (AV in Gen, "Go to"); sūm, "to put," "place" (Nu 6 26; Prov 8 29); rūm, "to lift up," "exalt" (2 Ch 30 24 bis; 35 7.8.9, "to give to"); shūbh, "to cause to turn back" (Lev 25 51.52; 2 K 17 3, "to give again"); various other words are in single instances tr^d "give."

In the NT, the common word is didōmi, "to give" (Mt 4 9; Jn 1 12; Rev 1 1; 21 6, etc.); we have also apodidōmi, "to give away [from one's self]" (Mt 12 36; Lk 16 2; Acts 4 33; 19 40; Rev 22 12); diadidōmi, "to give throughout" (Rev 17 13); epididōmi, "to give upon or besides" (Mt 7 9.10; Jn 13 26); metadidōmi, "to give a share" (Rom 12 8); paradidōmi, "to give over to" (Rom 1 28; 1 Cor 13 3; Gal 2 20, etc); prodidōmi, "to give forth or foremost" (Rom 11 35); aponēmō, "to apportion" (1 Pet 3 7); dōreōmai, "to give as a gift" (Mk 15 45, RV "granted"; 2 Pet 1 3.4 AV); marturēō, "to give testimony or witness" (1 Jn 5 10); pareisphēō, "to bring forward therewith" (2 Pet 1 5); paréchō, "to hold near by" (Col 4 1; 1 Tim 6 17); kataphēō, "to bear against or down" (Acts 26 10); charizomai, "to grant as a favor" (Lk 7 21; Acts 27 24; Rom 8 32; Gal 3 18; Phil 2 9; Philem ver 22 AV). A few other words mostly occurring singly are tr^d "give."

Of the many changes in RV, the following are among the most important: for "Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies," "Thou hast also made mine enemies turn their backs unto me" (2 S 22 41; Ps 18 40); for "He that made him can make his sword to approach unto him" (Job 40 19), ARV has "He only that made him giveth him his sword"; ERV m "furnished"; for "hasten after another god" (Ps 16 4), ARV has "give gifts for" (ERV m); for "give" (Ps 29 1.2, etc), ARV has "ascribe"; for "give myself unto wine" (Eccl 2 3), "cheer my flesh with wine"; for "giveth his life" (Jn 10 11), "layeth down"; "given" is supplied (Acts 19 2), where we read instead of "We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost," "We did not so much as hear whether the Holy Spirit was given," m "there is a Holy Spirit"; for "Christ shall give thee light" (Eph 5 14), "Christ shall shine upon thee"; for "give in charge" (1 Tim 5 7), "command"; for "not given to wine" (1 Tim 3 3; Tit 1 7), "no brawler," m "not quarrelsome over wine"; for "she that liveth in pleasure" (1 Tim 5 6), "giveth herself to"; for "All scripture is given by inspiration of God" (2 Tim 3 16), "Every scripture inspired of God" m "Every scripture is inspired of God"; for "given to filthy lucre" (Tit 1 7), "greedy of"; in He 2 16, ARV has "For verily not to angels doth he give help," m "For verily not of angels doth he take hold, but he taketh hold" etc (cf Isa 41 9; Eccles 4 11; 8 9 [in the Gr] ERV, "not of angels doth he take hold") (the idea is that of taking hold of to lift up or help); in 13 15 for "giving thanks to his name," RV reads "make confession to his name"; for "giving all diligence" (2 Pet 1 5), "adding."

The prominence of "give" in the Bible reminds us that God is the great Giver (Jas 1 5), and of the words of the Lord Jesus, "It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20 35), "Freely ye received, freely give" (Mt 10 8). W. L. WALKER

GIZONITE, gi'son-it: This gentilic name in 1 Ch 11 34, "Hashem the Gizonite," is probably an error for "Gunite" (cf Nu 26 48), and the passage should be corrected, after 2 S 23 32, into "Jaashen the Gunite."

GIZRITES, gi'rites (גִּזְרִי, gi'ri [K'thbbh]; AV Gezrites): Inhabitants of GEZER (q.v.). K't reads גִּזְרִי, gi'ri, Girsites (1 S 27 8).

GLAD TIDINGS, t'dings (εὐαγγέλιον, euaggelizō): "Glad-tidings" occurs in AV in the tr of the vb. euaggelizō, "to tell good news" (Lk 1 19; 8 1; Acts 13 32; Rom 10 15); in each instance, except the last, RV tr "good tidings." The vb. is also very frequently tr'd in AV "to preach the gospel," the original meaning of which word (god-spell) is "good news or tidings" (Mt 11 5; Lk 4 18; 7 22; 9 6; 20 1); in the first two passages RV substitutes "good tidings," in "the gospel"; in the last two instances "the gospel" is retained, ARV m "good tidings"—the gospel or good tidings being the announcement of the near approach of the promised, long-looked-for salvation and kingdom of God; in Rom 1 15; 15 20; 1 Cor 1 17, etc., AV has "the gospel," viz. that of God's reconciliation of the world to Himself in Christ; RV in some passages substitutes "good tidings," or gives this in the margin; but "glad tidings" stands only in Rom 10 15.

GLASS, glas (זכוכית, zkhukhith; ὕαλος, hualos): Glass is of great antiquity. The story of its discovery by accident, as related by Pliny

1. History (NH, xxxvi.65), is apocryphal, but it was natural for the Greeks and Romans to ascribe it to the Phoenicians, since they were the producers of the article as known to them. The Egypt monuments have revealed to us the manufacture in a time so remote that it must have preceded that of the Phoenicians. A representation of glass-blowing on monuments of the Old Empire, as formerly supposed, is now regarded as doubtful, but undoubted examples of glazed pottery of that age exist. A fragment of blue glass has been found inscribed with the name of Antef III, of the XIth cians, so apt in all lines of trade and manufacture, naturally seized on glass-making as a most profitable art and they became very proficient in it. The earliest glass was not very transparent, since they did not know how to free the materials used from impurities. It had a greenish or purplish tinge, and a large part of the examples we have of Phoenician glass exhibit this. But we have many examples of blue, red and yellow varieties which were purposely colored, and others quite opaque and of a whitish color, resembling porcelain (Perrot and Chipiez, Art in Ancient Phoenicia and Its Dependencies). But both they and the Egyptians made excellent transparent glass also, and decorated it with brilliant coloring on the surface (ib; Beni Hasan, Archaeol. Survey of Egypt, Pt IV). Layard (Nineveh and Babylon) mentions a vase of transparent glass bearing the name of Sargon (522-505 BC), and glass was early known to the Babylonians.

Phoenicia was the great center, and the quantities found in tombs of Syria and Pal go to confirm the statement that this was one of the great industries of this people, to which ancient authors testify (Strabo, Geog.; Pliny, NH). Jos refers to the sand of the Belus as that from which glass was made (BJ, II, x, 2). It seems to have been esp. adapted for the purpose, but there are other places on the coast where plenty of suitable sand could be obtained. The potash required was obtained by burning certain marine and other plants, and saltpetre, or nitre, was also employed. The manufacture began centuries BC on this coast, and in the 12th cent. AD a factory is mentioned as still being worked at Tyre, and the manufacture was later carried on at Hebron, even down to recent times (Perrot and Chipiez).

Both the Egyptians and Phoenicians gained such proficiency in making transparent and colored glass that they imitated precious stones with such skill as to deceive the unwary. Necklaces are found composed of a mixture of real brilliants and glass imitations. Cut glass was manufactured in Egypt as early as the XVIIIth Dynasty, and diamonds were made use of in the art. Glass composed of different colors in the same piece was made by placing layers of glass wire, of different colors, one above the other and then fusing them so that they became united in a solid mass without intermingling. Colored designs on the surface were produced by tracing the patterns, while the glass was still warm and plastic, deep enough to receive the threads of colored glass which were imbedded in them. The whole was heated again sufficiently to fuse the threads and attach them to the body. The surface was then made even by polishing. By this process vessels and ornaments of very beautiful design were produced. Many of the specimens, as found, are covered by an exquisite iridescence which is due wholly to the decomposition of the surface by chemical action, from lying buried for centuries in the soil which thus acts upon it. This is often lost in handling by the scaling off of the outer surface.

Glass, in the strict sense, is rarely mentioned in Scripture, but it was certainly known to the He-

Glass Bottles.

Dynasty, dating from 2000 or more BC (Davis, Ancient Egypt, 324). The oldest dated bottle, or vase, is one bearing the name of Thothmes III, 1500 or more BC, and numerous examples occur of later date. The close connection between Egypt and Syria from the time of Thothmes on must have made glass known in the latter country, and the Phoeni-brews, and occurs in Job 28 17 (tr^d "crystal" in AV). Bottles, cups and other vessels in glass must have been in use to some extent. The wine cup of Prov 23 31 and the bottle for tears mentioned in Ps 56 8 were most likely of glass. Tear bottles are found in great quantities in the tombs throughout the land and were undoubtedly connected with funeral rites, the mourners collecting their tears and placing them in these bottles to be buried with the dead. As mourners were hired for the purpose, the number of these bottles would indicate the extent to which the deceased was honored. These were, of course, small, some quite diminutive (see illustration), as also were the vials or pots to contain the ointment for the eyebrows and eyelashes, used to heighten the beauty of the women, which was probably a custom among the Hebrews as well as their neighbors. Rings, bracelets and anklets of glass are very common and were doubtless worn by the Heb women (see Isa 3 18f). In the NT the Gr hualos occurs in Rev 21 18, 21, and the adj. derived from it (hualinos) in 4 6 and 16 2. In the other passages, where in AV "glass" occurs, the reference is to "looking-glass," or mirror, which was not made of glass, but of bronze, and polished so as to reflect the light similar to glass. The Heb word for this is gūlayōn (Isa 3 23), or mar'ah (Ex 38 8), and the Gr ἐσόπτρον, esopton (1 Cor 13 12; Jas 1 23; cf Wisd 7 26; Sir 12 11).

The composition of the Phoen glass varies considerably. The analysis shows that, besides the ordinary constituents of silica, lime, lead, potash or soda, other elements are found, some being used for the purpose of coloring, such as manganese to give the purplish or violet hue, cobalt for blue, copper for red, etc. The articles illustrated above are of ordinary transparent glass with an iridescent surface, caused by decomposition, as mentioned above, indicated by the scaly appearance. Nos. 1, 4 and GLASS, SEA OF (θάλασσα ὑάλινη, thalassa hualina; Rev 4 6; 16 2): In the vision of heaven in these two apocalyptic passages a "glassy sea" is seen before the throne of God. The pure translucency of the sea is indicated in the former reference by the words, "like unto crystal"; and the fiery element that may symbolize the energy of the Divine holiness is suggested in the latter passage by the trait, "mingled with fire." On the margin of this sea—on the inner side—stood the victorious saints, with harps, singing the song of Moses and of the Lamb (16 2-4). The imagery here points to a relation with the triumphal song in Ex 15, after the deliverance from Pharaoh at the Red Sea. It is not easy to define the symbolism precisely. The sea, reflecting in its crystalline depths the purity and holiness of the Divine character and administration, speaks at the same time of difficulties surmounted, victory obtained and safety assured, the after-glow of the Divine judgments by which this result has been secured still illuminating the glassy expanse that has been crossed. JAMES ORR

GLEANNING, glen'ing (גָּלַעַת, lakat, לָקַט, 'alaf): The custom of allowing the poor to follow the reapers in the field and glean the fallen spears of grain is strikingly illustrated in the story of Ruth (Ruth 2 2-23). This custom had back of it one of the early agricultural laws of the Hebrews (Lev 19 9; 23 22; Dt 24 19-21). Breaking this law was a punishable offence. The generosity of the master of the crop determined the value of the gleanings, as the story of Ruth well illustrates (Ruth 2 16). A reaper could easily impose upon the master by leaving too much for the gleaners, who might be his own children. The old Levitical law no longer holds in the land, but the custom of allowing the poor to glean in the grain fields and vineyards is still practised by generous landlords in Syria. The writer has seen the reapers, even when they exercised considerable care, drop from their hands frequent spears of wheat. When the reapers have been hirelings they have carelessly left bunches of wheat standing behind rocks or near the boundary walls. The owner usually sends one of his boy or girl helpers to glean these. If he is of a generous disposition, he allows some needy woman to follow after the reapers and benefit by their carelessness. It is the custom in some districts, after the main crop of grapes has been gathered, to remove the watchman and allow free access to the vineyards for gleaners the last grapes.

Gideon touched the local pride of the men of Ephraim when he declared that the glory of their conquest surpassed his, as the gleanings of their vineyards did the whole crop of Abiezer (Jgs 8 2). Gleaned is used of a captured enemy in Jgs 20 45.

Figurative: Israel, because of her wickedness, will be utterly destroyed, even to a thorough glean and destruction of those who first escape (Jer 6 9). The same picture of complete annihilation is given in Jer 49 9, 10. JAMES A. PATCH

GLEDE, glēd (גִּלְדֵּי, gā'ah; γύψ, gups): A member of the hawk species. It is given among the list of abominations in Dt 14 13, but not in the Lev list (Lev 11 14). The kite is substituted. The Arabs might have called one of the buzzards the glēde. In England, where specimens of most of these birds appear in migration, the glēde is synonymous with kite, and was given the name from glide, to emphasize a gliding motion in flight. See illustration, p. 1235.

GLISTERING, glis'ter-ing (תִּלְשִׁי, pākh, "dye" [spec. "stibium"], "fair colors"; στίλβοντα, stilbonta); "Glistering stones" (1 Ch 29 2) is better than the 'inlaid' of RV; for some kind of colored, brilliant stone seems meant" (HDB, II, 182); cf Isa 54 11 R^Vm. The term is employed in Mk 9 3 to denote the white, lustrous appearance of Christ's garments at the transfiguration. It occurs nowhere else in the NT. For once the Divine effulgence shone through the veil of the humiliation (cf Jn 1 14).

Mirror of Polished Bronze.

5 are tear bottles, no. 4 being only 1½ in. in height; nos. 2 and 3 are ointment vases which were used for the ointment with which ladies were accustomed to color their eyebrows and eyelashes to enhance their beauty. This custom still prevails in the East. The small ladle by the side of the larger vase is of bronze, used in applying the ointment. This vase is double and 6½ in. high, ornamented with glass wire wound upon it while plastic. The larger vases (nos. 6 and 7) are about 6 in. in height. The hand-mirror ("looking-glass" AV) is bronze, and had originally a polished surface, but is now corroded.

nouns which are fully discussed in the article GLORY, and the general meaning is the same, for the glorious objects or persons have the quality which is described by the word "glory," that is, they are honorable, dignified, powerful, distinguished, splendid, beautiful or radiant. It is worthy of note that in many passages in the NT where AV has "glorious," RV has the noun "glory." So among others in Rom 8 21, AV has "glorious liberty," RV "liberty of the glory of the sons of God." The obsolete use of the word glorious in the sense of "boastful," "vain-glorious," "eager for glory," as it is used in Wycliffe, Tindale and Bacon, and once or twice in Shakespeare, as in Cymbeline, I, 7, in the first speech of Imogen, "Most miserable is the desire that's glorious," and in Gower's Prologue to Pericles, 1.9, "The purchase of it is to make men glorious" occurs at least once in the apocryphal books, Ad Est 16 4 AV, "but also lifted up with the glorious words of lewd persons." LITERATURE

I. Method of Treatment.—In this art. we deal, first, with a group of words, tr^d "glory" in the EV, and in which the ideas of size, rarity, beauty and adornment are prominent, the emphasis being laid in the first instance in each case upon some external physical characteristic which attracts the attention, and makes the object described by the word significant or prominent.

These are 'addereth (אֲדָרֶת), perhaps to be connected with the Assy root 'adaru, meaning "wide," "great"; hādhar, hādārah (הָדָר, הִדְרָה), perhaps with root-meaning of "brightness"; hōdā (הֹדָה), with essentially the same meaning of "brightness," "light"; fēdā (פִּדְיָה), Ps 89 44, tr^d "glory" in AV, in RV rendered "brightness"; yēdā-d' (יְדָדָה), an Aram. root meaning "rare"; ḥp'h'arāh (חֲפִי'אֲרָה), with the root-meaning of "beauty"; and finally ḥēdā (חֵדָה), perhaps on the basis of the Assy yabu, meaning "desire," "desirable."

Secondly, this art. will discuss the most common and characteristic word for "glory" in the OT, the Heb kābhōdā (כְּבוֹד) including the special phrase "the glory of God" or "the glory of Jeh." In dealing with the OT usage, attention will also be called to the original Heb of the Book of Ecclesiastes or Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, cited in this art. as Sir. Thirdly, with the Gr word dōxa (δόξα) in the Apoc and in the NT. The nouns kaichēma, kaichēsis, tr^d "glory" or "glorying" in the NT, will be dealt with in the concluding paragraphs in which the use of the word glory as a vb. will briefly be discussed. It will be possible within the limits of this art. to give only the main outlines of the sub-

Glode (Buteo ferox).

GLITTER, glit'ēr, GLITTERING, glit'ēr-ing (קִּיץ, bārāh, "lightning"): The word is used in sense of "glittering" in the OT with "sword," "spear" (Dt 32 41; Job 20 25; Ezk 21 10, 28; Nah 3 3; Hab 3 11). In Ezk 21 10 RV changes "glitter" to "as lightning," and in Dt 32 41 R^Vm gives, "the lightning of my sword." In Job 39 23, where the word is different (lahabāh), RV has "flashing."

GLORIFY, glō'ri-fi: The Eng. word is the equivalent of a number of Heb and Gr words whose essential significance is discussed more fully under the word GLORY (q.v.). The word "glorious" in the phrases "make or render glorious" is used most frequently as a tr of vbs. in the original, rather than of genuine adjs. In dealing with the vb. it will be sufficient to indicate the following most important uses.

(1) Men may glorify God, that is, give to Him the worship and reverence which are His due (Isa 24 15; 25 3; Ps 22 23; Dnl 5 23; Sir 43 30; Mt 5 16, and generally in the Synoptic Gospels and in some other passages of the NT).

(2) God, Yahweh (Jehovah), glorifies His people, His house, and in the NT, His Son, manifesting His approval of them and His interest in them, by His interposition on their behalf (Isa 55 5; Jer 30 19; Wisd 18 8; Sir 45 3; Jn 7 39, and often in the Fourth Gospel).

(3) By a usage which is practically confined to the OT, Jeh glorifies Himself, that is, secures the recognition of His honor and majesty, by His direction of the course of history, or by His interposition in history, either the history of His own people or of the world at large (Lev 10 3; Isa 26 15; Ezk 23 22; Hag 1 8). WALTER R. BETTERIDGE

GLORIOUS, glō'ri-us: The adj. "glorious" is used in the majority of cases as the tr of one of the ject as illustrated by a few of the most significant references. The lexicons and the commentaries must be consulted for the details.

II. General Use of the Term.—In the first group, as has already been stated, the ideas of beauty, majesty and splendor are prominent.

1. As Applied to External Things And these qualities are predicated first of all, of things. David determines to make the temple which Solomon is to build "a house of fame and of glory" (1 Ch 22 5). Then, and more commonly, glory belongs to men, and esp. to men of prominence, like kings. This glory may consist in wealth, power, position, or even in the inherent majesty and dignity of character of its possessor. The reference is most frequently, however, to the external manifestations. Physical power is suggested in Dt 33 17, where "glory" of AV is replaced by "majesty" in RV. The king's glory consists in the multitude of his people (Prov 14 28). The glory and the pomp of the rebellious people shall descend into Sheol (Isa 5 14). Here the reference is clearly to those external things upon which the people depend, and the possession of which is the ground of their confidence.

But chiefly glory is the possession and characteristic of Jeh, and is given by Him to His people or to anything which is connected with

2. As Applied to Jehovah Him. In Isa 60 7 the Lord promises to glorify the house of His glory, and the meaning is clearly that He will impart to His house something of the beauty and majesty which belong to Him. Glory is one of the qualities which are distinctive of Jeh (1 Ch 29 11); and Isaiah, in one of his earliest utterances, uses the word "glory" to describe Jeh's self-manifestation in judgment to bring to naught the pride and power of men (Isa 2 10, 19, 21). The use of the word in Ps 78 61 is not quite certain. The most natural interpretation would perhaps be to refer it to the ark as the symbol of the presence of Jeh, but in view of the || word "strength," it is perhaps better to interpret glory as meaning power, and to suppose that the Psalmist means that Jeh allowed His power to be temporarily obscured, and Himself to be seemingly humiliated on account of the sin of His people.

III. The Uses of kābhōdh.—The use and significance of kābhōdh in the OT and in Sir: The fundamental idea of this root seems to be "weight," "heaviness" and hence in its primary uses it conveys the idea of some external, physical manifestation of dignity, preëminence or majesty. At least three uses may be distinguished: (1) It defines the wealth or other material possessions which give honor or distinction to a person; (2) the majesty, dignity, splendor or honor of a person; (3) most important of all, it describes the form in which Jehovah (Yahweh) reveals Himself, or is the sign and manifestation of His presence.

In Gen 31 1 (m "wealth") it describes the flocks and herds which Jacob has acquired; in Ps 49 16 f, as the parallelism indicates, it

1. Material Wealth refers to the wealth of the sinner; and in Isa 10 3 it is said that in the day of desolation the heartless plunderers of the poor shall not know where to leave their ill-gotten gain. This idea is also probably to be found in Hag 2 7, where the parallelism seems to indicate that the glory with which Jeh will fill the house is the treasure which He will bring into it. See also Sir 9 11, where the glory of the sinner which is not to be envied is probably his wealth.

It describes the majesty and dignity or honor of men due to their adornment or to their position. In Gen 45 13, Joseph bids his brethren tell their father of his glory in Egypt; according to Ex 28 40, the priestly garments are intended for the glorification of their wearers; in 1 S 4 21 f, the loss of the ark means, for Israel, the loss of her

2. Human Dignity and Majesty glory, that which gave her distinction from, and preëminence over, her neighbors; in Isa 22 23 it is said that Eliakim is to be a throne of glory, i.e. the source and manifestation of the splendor and dignity of his father's house; in Job 19 9 the complaint that God has stripped him of his glory must be taken to refer to his dignity and honor. Reference may also be made to the numerous passages in which the glory of Israel and other nations describes their dignity, majesty or distinction; so we hear of the glory of Ephraim (Hos 9 11), of Moab (Isa 16 14), of Kedar (Isa 21 16). This use is quite common in Sir. Sir 3 10 f states that the glory of man comes from the honor of his father; the possessor of wisdom shall inherit glory (4 13; 37 26); note also 4 21 with its reference to "a shame that is glory and grace," and 49 5 where the forfeited independence of Judah is described by the terms "power" and "glory."

Closely related to this use of kābhōdh to describe the majesty of men is the group of passages in which the phrase "my glory," in parallelism with nepheesh (נֶפֶשׁ), "soul,"

3. "My Soul": the Self "self," or some similar expression, means the man himself in his most characteristic nature. In the blessing of Jacob (Gen 49 6) we read, "Unto their assembly, my glory, be not thou united." Other passages are Ps 4 2; 7 5; 16 9; 30 12; 57 8; 108 1 and perhaps Job 29 20. Some recent interpreters, partly because of the LXX rendering in Gen 49 6 (id hēpatā mou), "my liver," and partly because of the Assyrian root, kabīṭu, meaning "temper" or "heart" (see Delitzsch, Assyrisches Handwörterbuch, 317a), would read in all these passages kābhēdh, lit. "liver," as in Lam 2 11, and interpret the figure as referring to the emotions as the expression of the self. The arguments in favor of the change are not without weight. Of course on either interpretation the language is highly figurative. It hardly seems necessary to change the reading, esp. as the LXX renders the passages in the Ps and in Job by doxa, the ordinary Gr rendering for kābhōdh, and it does not seem improbable that in poetry the word kābhōdh might be used to describe the man himself, indicating that man as such is honorable and glorious, possibly because as in Ps 8 1, he is thought of as having been crowned by his Creator with glory and honor.

Before leaving this use of kābhōdh it is necessary to call attention to the fact that in a few cases it is used to describe things, perhaps because these things are thought of as practically personified. The "glory of the forest" (Isa 10 18) is clearly a personification, referring to the majestic force of the Assyrians. We may probably assume a personification also in the case of the glory of Lebanon in Isa 35 2; 60 13, and the nature of the parable in Ezk 31 makes it probable that personification is intended in ver 18.

But unquestionably the most important use of the word kābhōdh is its employment either with the following gen. God or Jeh, or absolutely, to describe the method or the circumstances of the self-manifestation of God. In discussing this subject we shall deal first of all with the use of the term as connected with actual or historical manifestations of the Deity, and then with its use to describe the characteristic features of the ideal state of the future, or, otherwise stated, the Messianic kingdom.

4. Self-manifestation of God (Jehovah) (1) Ex 23 18 ff.—The significance of the phrase in its earliest occurrence is by no means clear. Notwithstanding the uncertainty as to the exact documentary connection of the famous passage in Ex 33 18 ff, it seems quite certain that we may claim that this is the earliest historical reference that the OT contains to the glory of Jeh. "And he [Moses] said, Show me, I pray thee, thy glory. And he [Jeh] said Thou canst not see my face; . . . and it shall come to pass, while my glory passeth by, that I will put thee in a cleft of the rock, and will cover thee with my hand until I have passed by: and I will take away my hand, and thou shalt see my back; but my face shall not be seen." The passage in its present form bears unmistakable evidences of the editorial hand, due perhaps, as Baentsch (Handkommentar zum AT, "Ex-Lev-Nu," 279) suggests, to a desire to transform the primitive, concrete, physical theophany into a revelation of the ethical glory of God, but in its basis it belongs to J and is therefore the earliest literary reference to the glory of God in the OT. The glory of Jeh is clearly a physical manifestation, a form with hands and rear parts, of which Moses is permitted to catch only a passing glimpse, but the implication is clear that he actually does see Jeh with his physical eyes.

It seems not improbable that in its original form it was related that Moses saw the glory, i.e., the form of Jeh, and thus that we are to find in this narrative the source for the statement in Nu 12 8, that he (Moses) will behold (or perhaps better rendering the tense as a frequentative), beholds the form of Jeh (see also the description in Ex 24 9-11). The mention of the cloud (Ex 34 5) as the accompaniment of the manifestation of Jeh suggests that the form of Jeh was thought of as being outlined in cloud and flame, and that Jeh was originally thought of as manifesting Himself in connection with meteorological or more probably volcanic phenomena.

(2) Isa 6.—Later the glory of Jeh and the form of Jeh are no longer identical terms, but the glory is still the physical manifestation of the Divine presence. This is clear from Isaiah's account of his great inaugural vision. The prophet sees the enthroned Jeh with His skirts filling the temple. There is no indication of what it was that he saw or how he recognized that it was Jeh. The attendant seraphim in addition to the solemn "Holy, Holy, Holy" declare that "the whole earth is full of his glory."

Unquestionably His glory is here regarded as something visible, something, a part of which at least, Isaiah sees. The glory as such has no ethical significance except in so far as it is the method of manifestation of one who is undoubtedly an ethical being. The phraseology suggests that the skirts which fill the temple and the glory which fills the whole earth refer to the phenomena of fire and smoke. Some think that the smoke is caused by the clouds of incense that would fill the temple in connection with the sacrificial observances. But in view of Isaiah's horror of these observances, this interpretation is very questionable. A more probable interpretation connects the clouds and gloom with the phenomena of a great storm, and even possibly of an earthquake, for it seems highly plausible that the call of Isaiah in the year of the death of King Uzziah coincided with the great earthquake in the days of Uzziah referred to in Zec 14 5. (It seems at least probable that the references to the darkness and light in Zec 14 6 f may have their origin in the phenomena attendant upon this earthquake. It is probable that the earthquake by which the prophecy of Amos is dated [Am 1 1] is also this same historic earthquake.) The clouds and fire attendant upon this storm or earthquake become the media by which the glory of Jeh is made known to the youthful prophet, and this glory partly reveals and partly conceals the presence of Jeh of which, through, and in part by means of, these phenomena, Isaiah is made so vividly conscious.

(3) Ps 19 1.—This conception of Isaiah that the glory of Jeh fills the earth is closely related to the thought of Ps 19 1 that "the heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handiwork," the difference being that in the psalm Jeh's glory is manifested in the ordinary rather than in the extraordinary phenomena. Parallel thoughts may be found in Ps 8 1; 57 5; 108 5; 113 4. In Ps 29 1.2.3.9, as in Isaiah, the glory of Jeh is revealed in the extraordinary physical phenomena which the psalm describes. Glory here is a purely external, meteorological thing and is the manifestation of the presence of Jeh, no matter whether the psalm is regarded, as it usually is, as a description of a thunderstorm, or whether with von Gall and others it is taken as a description of the phenomena which accompany the inauguration of the Messianic kingdom (see Joel 2 30 f ERV).

(4) Sinai and the Temple.—Dt 5 24 indicates that in the theophany at the time of the giving of the law, the glory and the greatness of Jeh consisted in the fire and thick darkness which enveloped the mountain, and out of which Jeh spoke to the people. Essentially the same idea is expressed in the account of the dedication of Solomon's temple (1 K 8 10 f; 2 Ch 5 14). The cloud which filled the house of Jeh, preventing the priests from ministering, is identified with the glory of Jeh which filled the house. It is noteworthy that in 2 Ch 7 1-3 the glory of Jeh which fills the house manifests itself in the form of the cloud of smoke from the sacrifices which were consumed by the fire coming down from heaven.

(5) Ezekiel's visions.—Perhaps the most elaborate description of the glory of Jeh to be found in the OT is that given by Ezekiel in the various accounts of his visions. It is not easy to interpret his conception, but it seems clear that he does not identify the glory with the stormy clouds, the fire, the cherubim and the chariots. "The appearance of the likeness of the glory of Jeh" (Ezk 1 28) is not applied to all the phenomena which have been described in the preceding verses, but only to the likeness of form which looked like a man above the sapphire throne (ver 26). The same idea is indicated in 9 3 which states that "the glory of the God of Israel was gone up from the cherub, whereupon it was"; that is, the glory is something peculiar to Jeh, and is not quite identical with the phenomena which accompany it. This is true of all his visions. The glory of Jeh manifests itself with all the accompaniments which he describes with such richness of imagery, but the accompaniments are not the glory. For other descriptions of the glory of Jeh in Ezekiel, see 3 12.23; 8 4; 10 4.18 ff; 11 22 f.

Very similar to this conception of Ezekiel is that given in those passages of the Pent which are usually assigned to the PC. When the children of Israel murmured against Moses and Aaron on account of the lack of food, the glory of Jeh appeared in the cloud as they "looked toward the wilderness" (Ex 16 7.10; cf Ex 24 16 f). And just as in Ezk, the glory is distinguished from its attendant circumstances; for after the completion of the Tent of Meeting, the cloud covers the tent, and the glory of Jeh fills the tabernacle (Ex 40 34 f; see also Lev 9 6.23; Nu 14 21 f; 16 19.42; 20 6). The same thought is suggested in the references in Sir 17 13; 45 3.

(6) Messianic ideal.—These passages just cited stand on the border between the historical and the ideal descriptions of the glory of Jeh, for whatever may be one's views as to the historical worth of P's account of the Exodus and the wilderness sojourn, all must agree in seeing in it really the program or constitution for the ideal state of the future. And in this state the distinguishing characteristic is to be the manifest presence of Jeh in His sanctuary, and this manifestation is the glory. This is the view of Ezekiel, for whom the essential action in the establishment of the new community is the return of the glory of Jeh to the house of Jeh (Ezk 43 2.4.5; 44 4). The same thought is expressed very clearly in Isa 4 5 f, which may be rendered on the basis of a slight rearrangement and regrouping of the original, 'And Jeh will create over . . . Mt. Zion

... , a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night; for over everything the glory [of Yahweh] shall be a canopy and a pavilion, and it shall serve as a shelter from the heat, and a refuge and a covert from the storm and the rain.' This tr has the advantage that it furnishes an intelligible and characteristic conclusion to the description of the Messianic age which the chapter contains. Isa 11 10, reading with RVm, "and his resting-place shall be glory," has the same thought, for it is clearly the glory of Jeh that is manifested in the resting-place of the root of Jesse, and this resting-place can be none other than Mt. Zion (cf also Isa 24 23).

The Pss and Deutero-Isa have many passages in which this phase of the thought is brought out. For both books the restoration of the people from captivity is to be accompanied by, or, perhaps better, itself is, a revelation of the glory of Jeh (Isa 40 5). The children of Israel have been created for the glory of Jeh, and hence they must be restored that His glory may be made manifest (43 7). The light of the restored community is to be the glory of Jeh (60 1f). The presence of Jeh brings grace and glory (Ps 84 11), and His salvation of those that fear Him causes glory to dwell in the land (Ps 85 9). To these and many similar passages in Isa and the Pss may also be added Sir 36 14, which refers probably to the manifestation of God in glory in the Messianic kingdom.

(7) Its ethical content.—But these passages make it quite evident that "glory" is not always used in the external, lit. or fig. physical sense. It comes to have an ethical significance, and this because, like the holiness with which it is associated in Isa 6, it is connected with Jeh, who is more and more exclusively viewed as an ethical being. As holiness gradually loses its physical sense of aloofness, apartness, and comes to describe moral purity, so glory, because it is an attribute or expression of Jeh, comes to have a moral sense. This transformation, as we have seen, is already being made in the present text of Ex 33 18,20, and the connection with holiness in Isa 6 makes it almost certain that Isaiah gave the word an ethical connotation. So the God of glory of Ps 29 3 suggests a moral quality because Jeh is a moral being. All doubt on this matter disappears when we find the word "glory" used as the term for the essential nature of Jeh, as we have already found it to be used of man. In Isa 42 8, "I am Jeh, that is my name; and my glory will I not give to another," the meaning would seem to be, my essential character and power, that is, my glory, I will not share with other gods (cf also Isa 48 11). And in Isa 58 8 the glory must be taken in a figurative sense and refer to Jeh Himself in His saving grace, who attends His people in advance and in the rear. It hardly seems possible to deny the ethical sense in Ezk 39 21, where the manifestation of the glory of Jeh comes as a result of the execution of His purposes of justice and righteousness upon His people. And in Hab 2 14, the glory of Jeh which is to be known throughout the earth cannot be limited to any physical, external thing. It is equivalent to the righteous and just will of Jeh. These passages are sufficient to prove the ethical significance of the word kābhōdh, but it may be worth while to quote one more passage and this time from Ps 97 with its wonderful description of the blessings of the righteous rule of Jeh. It is stated in ver 6 that "the heavens declare his righteousness, and all the peoples have seen his glory." His righteousness may include, as Kirkpatrick suggests, "His faithfulness to His people and His sovereign justice in the punishment of all," or it may refer only to the former of these qualities; but in any case, it is a moral act, and by it the peoples recognize the glory of Jeh as the supreme moral ruler.

IV. In Apoc and NT.—"Glory" in the apocryphal books and in the NT is almost exclusively the tr of the Gr noun dōxa. In all these writings the OT usage seems to be the most important, and it seems to be the fact, if one may judge from the LXX and from the original Heb of Sir, that the Gr noun dōxa, in the great majority of cases, represents the Heb kābhōdh, so that the underlying thought is Heb, even though the words may be Gr.

(1) As applied to external things.—It will be perhaps a little more convenient to deal with the usage of the Apoc separately, following essentially the order that has been adopted for the OT discussion of kābhōdh, and bearing in mind that the usage of Sir has been discussed under the OT. The use of the word "glory" to describe the honor, reputation and splendor which belong to men is quite common. In this sense 1 Ead 1 33 refers to the glory of Josiah, while in Wisd 10 14 the perpetual glory given by Wisd to Joseph must be interpreted in the same way. In 2 Macc 5 16,20 glory refers to the beautification and adornment of the temple in a sense like that of tiqb'ārāh in Isa 60 7. In Jhn 15 9 "glory" is the tr of the Gr glōria, and indicates that Judith is the pride of Israel.

(2) As applied to God.—But the most significant use of dōxa in the Apocrypha is that in which it refers to the light and splendor of God which are regarded as the invariable accompaniments of God. The reference may be to the historic manifestation of God in glory at Mt. Sinai, as in 2 Ead 3 19, or to the manifestation of God in Israel, which is to be the special characteristic of the Messianic kingdom. In 1 Ead 5 61 songs sung to the praise of the Lord, "because his goodness and his glory are forever in all Israel," are based upon the hope that Jeh is about to establish the Messianic kingdom among the people who have bound themselves to obey His law. In several passages in 2 Ead the reference seems to be not to the Messianic kingdom in the historical sense, but rather to that kingdom of God which the saints are to inherit after death. This is clearly the thought in 2 Ead 2 36 and in 7 52; also in 8 51 where the context shows clearly that the reference is to the glory of Paradise, which is the heritage of all those who are like Ezra in their devotion to Jeh (cf also 10 50).

But most frequently in the Apoc, in a sense which approximates that of the NT, the word "glory" refers to the blaze of light and splendor which is the essential expression of the holy majesty of Jeh. The prayer of Manasseh refers to the unbearable majesty of the glory of Jeh; while 2 Ead 8 30, trusting in Jeh's glory is equivalent to trusting in Jeh Himself; and in 16 53 the oath "before God and his glory" is simply before the Lord God Himself. The same thought is expressed in Tob 12 15; 13 14; Wisd 7 25. In the Three, vs 31,33, the glory of Jeh refers to His self-manifestation in His heavenly kingdom, and this is undoubtedly the significance in the frequently recurring doxologies, "Thine is the glory forever."

(1) As applied to men.—In the NT, much the same variety of usage is to be noted as in the OT and the Apoc, and it is not easy to trace the exact relationship and order of the various meanings. The ordinary classical use of the word in the sense of "opinion," "judgment," "view," occurs in Hellenistic Gr only in 4 Macc 5 17 (18) on the authority of Thayer.

It is perhaps as convenient to follow generally the order adopted in the preceding discussion. In some places the word refers to the manifestations and insignia of rank and power, as in the familiar phrase, "Solomon in all his glory" (Mt 6 29), or the glory of the kingdoms of the world (4 8), or the glory of the kings and nations of the earth which shall be brought into the heavenly city (Rev 21 24, 26). Dōxa also defines the praise, honor and dignity of men. This is the meaning in Jn 5 41,44, where Christ distinguishes between His accusers and Himself in that He receives not glory from men, while they receive glory one of another (cf also Jn 7 18). In Eph 3 13, Paul declares that his tribulations for those to whom he is writing are a glory or distinction to them, while in 1 Thess 2 20 he declares that the Thessalonian Christians are his glory and joy.

(2) As applied to God.—Closely related to this usage is the employment of the word to ascribe honor and praise to God; see Lk 17 18, where only the stranger returned to give glory to God; or Jn 9 24, where the man who had been born blind is bidden to give glory to God; or the phrase "to the glory of God" in Rom 15 7, where the meaning is to secure the honor and praise of God among men. Similar is the use in the frequently recurring doxologies such as, "Glory to God in the highest," "to him," that is, to God, "be glory," etc.

While the foregoing meanings are frequently illustrated in the NT, it is undoubtedly true that the characteristic use of the word doxa in the NT is in the sense of brightness, brilliance, splendor; and first of all, in the literal sense, referring to the brightness of the heavenly bodies, as in 1 Cor 15 40 f, or to the supernatural brightness which overcame Saul of Tarsus on the road to Damascus (Acts 22 11).

(3) As applied to the saints.—But the most common use of the word is to describe the brilliance which is the characteristic of all persons who share in the heavenly glory. Moses, Elijah and Jesus Himself have this glory on the Mt. of Transfiguration (Lk 9 31 f). It was the same glory which gave the angel who came out of heaven power to lighten the earth (Rev 18 1), and also which shone about the shepherds when the angel appeared unto them (Lk 2 9). Paul refers to this glory, when he speaks of the face of Moses as it appeared after God had spoken with him (2 Cor 3 7 f). And as in the case of Moses, so here, the source of this glory is God Himself, who is the God of glory (Acts 7 2, and frequently).

(4) As applied to the Messianic kingdom.—It is also used to describe the ideal Messianic kingdom of the future. It is applied to Christ to describe His royal majesty when He comes to set up His kingdom. So James and John ask to sit, one on His right hand and one on His left in His glory (Mk 10 37). Christ is to appear in glory with the angels (Mt 16 27 and often), for His condition in the coming age as it was before the incarnation is a condition of glory (Lk 24 26; Jn 17 5, 22, 24). But not merely the Messiah, but also all His followers shall share in the glory of the Messianic kingdom. This use is so common that it is scarcely necessary to illustrate it by reference. This glory is to be revealed to all Christians in the future (Rom 8 18, 21; 9 23; cf also 1 Cor 2 7; 2 Cor 4 17).

In all these cases it has a distinctly ethical significance, for it is the term which is used to describe the essential nature, the perfection of the Deity, and is shared by others

3. Its Ethical Significance—because they are made partakers of the Divine nature. So Paul refers to "the glory of the incorruptible God" (Rom 1 23; cf also Eph 1 17 f, and often). And the essential nature of Christ comes to be described in the same way. He has glory as of the only begotten of the Father (Jn 1 14); he shows His glory in the performance of miracles (Jn 2 11); and like the Father, He is the Lord of glory (1 Cor 2 8).

As a vb. in the OT the most common signification of the word "glory" is, to make one's boast in or of anything, usually of the pious glorying in Yahweh (Jeh), but occasionally with some other reference, as in Jer 9 23 of man glorying in his riches, might or wisdom. In all these cases it represents the Heb hüh-hallél. In Ex 8 9 the phrase, "Have thou this glory over me," is the tr of the Heb hüh-pä'ér, and means take to thyself the honor or distinction as regards me. In 2 K 14 10 it translates the Heb hük-kabbèdh, "honor thyself," i.e. be satisfied with the home which you have already attained.

In the apocryphal books it means either "glorify thyself," the middle voice of the vb. doxázō, as in Sir 3 10, where the original Heb has hüh-kabbèdh, or "to exult,"

"boast over," as in Jth 9 7, where it represents the Gr gaurodomai; or "to boast," "take pride in," where it represents, as it does usually in the NT, the Gr kauchdomai (Sir 17 9; 24 1; 38 25; 39 8; 48 4, in the second and fourth of which cases it represents the Heb hüh-pä'ér).

In the NT the vb. is used 3 t in Jas, and several times in the Epp. of Paul, and everywhere is used to translate the vb. kauchdomai, or, in two cases in Jas, the same vb. is compounded with the preposition kata. In all these cases the meaning is "to take pride in," "to congratulate oneself," upon anything.

In this connection attention may be called to the use of the noun "glorying," once or twice rendered "to glory," where the meaning is either the occasion or ground of glorying, or sometimes the act of glorying. The original has kauchēma or kauchēsis. This usage occurs in Jas 4 16; He 3 6, and several times in the Epp. of Paul.

GLOWING, glō'ing, SAND (Isa 35 11). See MIRAGE.

GLUTTON, glut'n, GLUTTONOUS, glut'n-us (גָּלָל, zālal, "to be lavish"; φάγος, phagos): "Glutton" (from glut, to swallow greedily) is the tr of zōlēl from zālal, "to shake or pour out," "to be lavish, a squanderer." In Dt 21 20, "This our son . . . is a glutton, and a drunkard," the word may mean a squanderer or prodigal; ERV has "a riotous liver." In Prov 23 21, "For the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty" (following zōlē bhāsār, "squanderers of flesh," RV "gluttonous eaters of flesh"), "glutton" in the usual sense is intended; "a man gluttonous," "a gluttonous man" (RV) (phagos, "an eater," "a glutton") was a term applied to Christ in His freedom from asceticism (Mt 11 19; Lk 7 34).

RV has "idle gluttons" (m Gr, "bellies") for "slow bellies" (Tit 1 12); "gluttonous" "gluttons," for "riotous" (Prov 23 20; 28 7).

GNASH, nash (נָחַשׁ, hāraḥ; βρυγμός, brugmós): "Gnash" is used of grinding or striking together the teeth in rage, pain or misery of disappointment. In the OT it is the tr of hāraḥ, a mimetic word, and represents for the most part rage, anger, hatred (Job 16 9, "He gnasheth upon me with his teeth," RV "hath gnashed upon me"; Ps 35 16; 37 12; 112 10, grief; Lam 2 16, contempt or derision); brūchō, "to gnash the teeth in rage," indicates anger, rage, LXX for hāraḥ (Acts 7 54, of Stephen, "They gnashed on him with their teeth"). The several instances of brugmos, "gnashing," in the Gospels seem to express disappointment rather than anger (Mt 8 12, "There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth," RV "the weeping and the gnashing of teeth"; 13 42, 50; 22 13; 24 51; 25 30; Lk 13 28—a vivid representation of the misery of disappointed expectations; cf Eccles 30 10, "lest thou shalt gnash thy teeth in the end," gomphidzō, "to have the teeth set on edge"); trizō (Mk 9 18), which means "to give out a creaking, grating sound," "to screek," is used in the NT (in the above instance only) to mean "to grate or gnash with the teeth," indicating the effect of a paroxysm, RV "grindeth his teeth."

GNAT, nat (in EV, only in Mt 23 24, κνέφυ, kónōps). In Ex 8 16, for EV "lice," one of the plagues of Egypt, קנני, kinnim, קניני, kinnim, or קניני, kinnim, we find in RVm "sand flies" or "fleas" [Gesenius "gnat"; Mandelkern "culex"]. For k-mō kēn [Isa 51 6], EV "in like manner," LXX ὡςπερ ταύτα, hōsper taúta, Vulg sicut haec, RVm has "like gnats," since קנ, kēn, elsewhere "thus," may here be taken to be a sing. of the form קניני, kinnim, which occurs in Ex 8): In the NT passage, the difference between AV and RV should be noted. "Strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel" is changed to "strain out the gnat and swallow the camel," the reference being to the inconsistency of the Jewish religious leaders in taking extraordinary pains in some things, as in the preparation of food, while leaving weightier matters unattended to.

In Isa 51 6, the suggestion of RVm, "They that dwell therein shall die like gnats," seems a decided improvement on the "shall die in like manner" of EV, esp. as kēn, "thus" (see supra), is a repetition of k-mō, whose meaning is practically the same, "in like manner" being the rendering in EV of k-mō kēn.

As to the creatures, kinnim, of the Egypt plague, there is little choice between "lice" of EV and the others suggested, except as we may be influenced by the LXX rendering, sknīphes, which may mean "gnats" or "mosquitoes." See FLEA; LICE.

Gnosticism—except perhaps in 1 Tim 6 20, where St. Paul warns Timothy against "the gnōsis, which is falsely so called"—is not directly alluded to in the NT. Nevertheless its leaven was actually working, as will immediately be seen, and constituted a most serious peril in the apostolic church. "That strange, obscure movement, partly intellectual, partly fanatical . . . in the 2d cent. spread with the swiftness of an epidemic over the church from Syria to Gaul" (Law, The Tests of Life, 26). It is therefore of high importance to gain a right conception of the nature of this potent anti-Christian influence. This is not easy. The difficulty in dealing with Gnosticism is that it was not a homogeneous system of either religion or philosophy, but embraced many widely diversified sects holding opinions drawn from a great variety of sources. "The infinitely varied shapes assumed by the systems render it almost impossible to classify them, or even to give an account of their leading ideas, which shall not be open to objection. We might as well try to classify the products of a tropical jungle, or the shapes and hues of the sunset clouds, which change under our view as we look at them" (Orr, The Progress of Dogma, 58).

I. General Definition.—On the general definition of Gnosticism a few authorities may be cited. "Gnosticism," says Dr. Gwatkin, "may be provisionally described as a number of schools of philosophy, oriental in general character, but taking in the idea of a redemption through Christ, and further modified in different sects by a third element, which may be Judaism, Hellenism, or Christianity . . . the Gnostics took over only the idea of a redemption through Christ, not the full Christian doctrine, for they made it rather a redemption of the philosophers from matter, than a redemption of mankind from sin" (Early Church History to AD 513, II, 20).

Dr. Orr writes, "Gnosticism may be described generally as the fantastic product of the blending of certain Christian ideas—particularly that of redemption through Christ—with speculations and imaginings derived from a medley of sources (Gr, Jewish, Parsic; philosophies, religions, theosophies, mysteries) in a period when the human mind was in a kind of ferment, and when opinions of every sort were jumbled together in an unimaginable welter. It involves, as the name denotes, a claim to 'knowledge,' knowledge of a kind of which the ordinary believer was incapable, and in the possession of which 'salvation' in the full sense consisted. This knowledge of which the Gnostic boasted, related to the subjects ordinarily treated of in religious philosophy; Gnosticism was a species of religious philosophy" (The Early Church, 71).

Neander has described Gnosticism as "the first notable attempt to introduce into Christianity the existing elements of mental culture, and to render it more complete on the hitherto rather neglected side of theoretical knowledge; it was an attempt of the mind of the ancient world in its yearning after knowledge, and in its dissatisfaction with the present, to bring within its grasp and to appropriate the treasures of this kind which Christianity presented" (Antignostikus, Intro, 199).

Gnosticism accordingly comprehends in itself many previously existing tendencies; it is an amalgam into which quite a number of different elements have been fused. A heretical system of thought, at once subtle, speculative and elaborate, it endeavored to introduce into Christianity a so-called higher knowledge, which was grounded partly on the philosophic creed in which Greeks and Romans had taken refuge consequent on the gradual decay and breaking-up of their own religions, partly, as will be shown, on the philosophies of Plato and of Philo, and still more on the philosophies and theosophies and religions of the East, especially those of Persia and of India.

"For a long time the pagan beliefs had ceased to be taken seriously by thoughtful men and had been displaced by various creeds derived from philosophical speculation. These in themselves were abstract and unsatisfying, but had been partly vitalized by union with the theosophies of the East. An attempt was made on the part of this philosophical religion to effect an alliance with Christianity. A section of the church was dissatisfied with the simplicity of the gospel, and sought to advance to something higher by adopting the current speculations. . . . The late books of the NT are all occupied, more or less, with this movement, which was the more dangerous as it threatened the church from within" (Professor E. Scott, The Apologetic of the NT, 14).

Gnosticism, though usually regarded as a heresy, was not really such: it was not the perverting of Christian truth; it came, rather, from outside. Having worked its way into the Christian church, it was then heretical. "Although it became a corrupting influence within the church, it was an alien by birth. While the church yet sojourned within the pale of Judaism, it enjoyed immunity from this plague; but as soon as it broke through these narrow bounds, it found itself in a world where the decaying religions and philosophies of the West were in acute fermentation under the influence of a new and powerful leaven from the East; while the infusion of Christianity itself into this fermenting mass only added to the bewildering multiplicity of gnostic sects and systems it brought forth" (Law, The Tests of Life, 26).

II. Sources of Gnosticism.—Mansel (in his work on The Gnostic Heresies, 32) sums up the principal sources of Gnosticism in these three, Platonism, the Pers religion, and the Buddhism of India. To Platonism it owed much of its philosophical form and tendencies. From the Dualism of the Pers religion it derived its speculations regarding the origin of evil, and much of what it taught about emanations. To Buddhism, he thinks, it owed the doctrine of the antagonism between matter and spirit, and the unreality of derived existence—the germ of Doctism. Mansel also holds that there is the possibility that Gnosticism derived certain of its features from the Kabbala (kabbālāh), or secret teaching of the Jews in the two books, the Šēpher ṿṣīrah, or Book of Creation, and the Zōhar, or Book of Light. An influence of Buddhism on Gnosticism, however, may safely be doubted, as there is no reason to believe that the knowledge of Buddhist doctrine had so early penetrated into the West. The Jewish works named by Mansel are really products of the Middle Ages (Westcott, Intro to the Study of the Gospels, 144–45). The other sources named were really influential. We notice two—the Alexandrian philosophy and the Parsic dualism.

Alexandrian philosophy endeavored to unite Gr philosophy and Heb religion. Philo, the great Jewish commentator of Alexandria, had tried to interpret the ancient Jewish Scriptures by the aid of the Gr philosophy, to expound the OT in terms of Plato's thought and to discover allegorical meanings where none were intended. In Philo's teaching there is a sharp line drawn between God and the material world: with him God cannot exert any action upon the world of matter, except through intermediate agency, the Jewish angels and the heathen demons. Philo has much to say in regard to the Logos. His utterances on this subject may be compared with what is said of the attributes of "Wisdom" in ch 8 of the Book of Prov, and also with the Logos or "Word" of the Gospel of John. With Philo, the Logos is the power of God, or the Divine reason endowed with energy, and embracing within itself all subordinate powers. The Logos is impersonal in its relations to God; and herein is one huge difference between Philo's conception and that in the gospel. Philo teaches that the Logos is the only firstborn of God, the chief of the angels, the viceroy of God, and representative of man. See LOGOS.

According to Philo the creation of the universe was a gradual molding out of matter; hence arises evil. He also teaches the preëxistence of the soul, which is now imprisoned in the flesh. The wise man, therefore, will break the thralldom of the flesh, and will rise by a sort of ecstasy to the immediate vision of God. It will be seen how much of this teaching was assimilated by the various gnostic sects.

The Zoroastrian or Pers system was based on the assumption that there existed two original and independent powers of good and evil, of light and darkness, Ormuzd (Ahura-Mazda), the wise Lord, and Ahriman (Angra-Mainyu), the wicked spirit. These powers were believed to be equal, and each supreme in his own domain. The earth, which was created by Ormuzd, became the battlefield of the two powers. Ahriman led away the first man and woman from their allegiance to Ormuzd, and so all evils result to mankind.

"In oriental (Pers) dualism," says Professor Bousset, "it is within this material world that the good and the evil powers are at war, and this world beneath the stars is by no means conceived as entirely subject to evil. Gnosticism has combined the two, the Gr opposition between spirit and matter, and the sharp Zoroastrian dualism, which, where the Gr mind conceived of a higher and a lower world, saw instead two hostile worlds standing in contrast to each other like light and darkness. And out of the combination of these two dualisms arose the teaching of Gnosticism with its thoroughgoing pessimism and its fundamental asceticism" ("Gnosticism," in Enc Brit, 11th ed, XII, 154).

III. Nature of Gnosticism.—"Gnosticism," says Dr. Gwatkin, "is Christianity perverted by learning and speculation" (Early Church History, 73). The intellectual pride of the Gnostics refined away the gospel into a philosophy. The clue to the understanding of Gnosticism is given in the word from which it is derived—gnōsis, "knowledge." Gnosticism puts knowledge in the place which can only rightly be occupied by Christian faith. To the Gnostic the great question was not the intensely practical one, "What must I do to be saved from sin?" but "What is the origin of evil?" "How is the primitive order of the universe to be restored?" In the knowledge of these and of similar questions, and in the answers given to these questions, there was redemption, as the Gnostic understood it.

"These little gnostic sects and groups all lived in the conviction that they possessed a secret and mysterious knowledge, in no way accessible to those outside, which was not to be proved or propagated, but believed in by the initiated, and anxiously guarded as a secret. This knowledge of theirs was not based on reflection or scientific inquiry and proof, but on revelation. It was derived directly from the times of primitive Christianity, from the Saviour Himself and His disciples and friends, with whom they claimed to be connected by a secret tradition, or else from later prophets, of whom many sects boasted. It was laid down in wonderful mystic writings, which were in the possession of the various circles.

"In short, Gnosticism in all its various sections; its form and its character, falls under the category of mystic religions, which were so characteristic of the religious life of decadent antiquity. In Gnosticism, as in the other mystic religions, we find the same contrast of the initiated and the uninitiated, the same loose organization, the same kind of petty sectarianism and mystery-mongering. All alike boast a mystic revelation and a deeply veiled wisdom" (Bousset, op. cit., 153).

The questions, therefore, with which Gnosticism concerned itself were those of the relation of the finite and the infinite, the origin of the world and of evil, the cause, meaning, purpose and destiny of all things, the reason of the difference in the capacities and in the lot in life of individual men, the method of salvation. The following may be regarded as the chief points in the characteristics of the gnostic systems: (1) A claim on the part of the initiated to a special knowledge of the truth, a tendency to regard knowledge as superior to faith, and as the special possession of the more enlightened, for ordinary Christians did not possess this secret and higher doctrine. (2) The essential separation of matter and spirit, the former of these being essentially evil, and the source from which all evil has arisen. (3) An attempt at the solution of the problems of creation and of the origin of evil by the conception of a Demiurge, i.e. a Creator or Artificer of the world as distinct from the Supreme Deity, and also by means of emanations extending between God and the visible universe. It should be observed that this conception merely concealed the difficulties of the problem, and did not solve them. (4) A denial of the true humanity of Christ, a docetic Christology, which looked upon the earthly life of Christ and esp. on His sufferings on the cross as unreal. (5) The denial of the personality of the Supreme God, and the denial also of the free will of man. (6) The teaching, on the one hand, of asceticism as the means of attaining to spiritual communion with God, and, on the other hand, of an indifference which led directly to licentiousness. (7) A syncretistic tendency which combined certain more or less misunderstood Christian doctrines, various elements from oriental and Jewish and other sources. (8) The Scriptures of the OT were ascribed to the Demiurge or inferior Creator of the world, who was the God of the Jews, but not the true God. Some of these characteristic ideas are more obvious in one, and some of them in others of the gnostic systems. The relation of these ideas to Christian facts and doctrines is dealt with more particularly below.

IV. Gnosticism in the Christian Church.—(1) In the NT and the Apostolic Age.—The germ of Gnosticism in the Christian church made its appearance in the apostolic age, and is referred to by St. Paul in several of his epistles, notably in that to the Colossians and in the Pastoral Epistles. It is also referred to by the apostles Peter and Jude; references to it are found, besides, in the Apocalypse, the First Epistle of John and the Gospel of John.

In Col a great deal is said regarding a false teaching, an insidious theosophist doctrine, the teachers of which were alienating the Christians in Colossae from the gospel, and were disseminating their speculations, which led to the worship of angels in contrast to the worship of Christ, to esoteric exclusiveness wholly opposed to the universality of the gospel, and to an asceticism injurious to Christian freedom, and derogatory to the human body as indwelt by the Holy Ghost. These tenets are identical with the more fully developed Gnosticism of the generation succeeding that of the apostles; and at the root of the Colossian false teaching there lay the same error which the gnostic mind had no way of meeting, viz. that there could be no connection between the highest spiritual agency, that is God, and gross corporeal matter.

From this theoretical basis arose another error—that as sin is inherent in the material substance of the body, therefore the only way by which perfection can be reached is to punish the body by asceticism, so that through the infliction of pain and the mortification of the flesh the region of pure spirit may be reached, and thus man may be etherealized and become like God. This ascetic tendency is wonderfully widespread; it reappears century after century, and shows itself in many forms of religion, not merely in distorted forms of Christianity, but in the Hindu religions, in Buddhism and elsewhere. In the Epistle to the Col, accordingly, there are definite references to ascetic practices which were inculcated by the false teachers at Colossae. The very terms which they employed have been preserved, "Touch not," "Taste not," "Handle not." It was in this way that these teachers had "at their own hand" invented a worship different from that of the Christian faith, which endeavored to attain the deliverance of the soul by "the neglecting of the body" (Col 2 21.23 AV). These gnostic teachers showed these tendencies still more boldly when Paul wrote his First Epistle to Tim (see below), for he describes them as "forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats" (1 Tim 4 3). These ascetic practices were afterward taught by various gnostic sects, the Encratites, the followers of Saturninus, and others.

These tendencies in the Colossian church St. Paul set himself to correct in his epistle. The method which he adopts is not so much to demolish error, as to establish the contrary truth, setting before the Colossians the person and work of Christ, Christ the Creator, Christ in whom there dwells not merely some or even much of the fulness of God, but all the fulness of the Godhead bodily; Christ the God of providence, the Upholder of all things, in whom matter and all creatures and all events "consist," and have their being; Christ the Reconciler who has reconciled us unto God through the blood of the cross. In view of truths like these, Colossian error and all other forms of Gnosticism crumble into decay and vanish. See COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.

The Epistle to the Col is the first of the Pauline Epistles in which distinctively gnostic teaching is found in its attack upon the Christian faith. But from incidental notices in

2. 1 Cor: epistles of Paul written at an earlier period, it can be seen how congenial "Knowledge" was the soil into which gnostic teaching was about to fall. For even in Corinth when Paul wrote his First Epistle to the church there, there had been a claim on the part of some that they possessed "knowledge," as if others were destitute of it, a claim which the apostle refuses to admit, and meets with stern resistance. They thought themselves "wise," they were given to disputing, they professed that they "all had knowledge" (1 Cor 8 1), nay, they could "know all mysteries and all knowledge" (13 2); but this knowledge did not edify them, did not build them up, it only puffed them up (8 1); it did not make them sympathetic or tender-hearted toward the weak (8 7-11).

In 1 Tim 6 20.21 Paul speaks of the "knowledge [the gnōsis] which is falsely so called; which some professing have erred concerning the faith." In other places in that epistle reference is made to tenets which are exactly those of Gnosticism. In 1 4 the apostle speaks of "fables and endless genealogies, which minister questionings, rather than a dispensation of God which is in faith." Philo had given a great impetus to an allegorizing interpretation of the OT. His writings were well known and were popular in many of the Jewish schools. These fanciful interpretations would hinder the growth of the Christian church; and this allegorizing of Scripture, joined to the teaching of the genealogies of the aeons, would leave no place for a Redeemer. In 4 3, as already noted, Paul describes ascetic practices which were regarded by their votaries as most meritorious. To abstain from marriage and from various kinds of food was the teaching of the Essenes and also of the Gnostics. This ascetic teaching was unnatural, as contrary to the constitution of the world, as that has been arranged by a holy and wise Creator, and it is also subversive of Christian liberty. Nothing can be esteemed common or unclean without throwing a reproach upon the Creator.

Antinomian development.—But another and contrary result also followed from the principles of the sinfulness of matter, and of redemption as deliverance from the flesh, viz. that there was an easier way of relief, by treating the soul and the body as separate entities which have nothing in common. Let the soul go its way on the wings of spiritual thought, while the body may indulge its fleshly desires. For, so it was held, as body and soul are entirely distinct in their nature, the spiritual cannot be defiled by anything, however carnal and gross, that the body can do. This was the antinomian development of Gnosticism. Many traces of this are apparent in the Pastoral Epistles and in 2 Pet and Jude. The Gnostics, against whom Paul warns Timothy, were "lovers of self, lovers of money, boastful, haughty, railers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, implacable, slanderers, without self-control, fierce, no lovers of good, traitors, headstrong, puffed-up, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God; holding a form of godliness, but having denied the power thereof" (2 Tim 3 2,3,4). Such, too, is the testimony borne regarding them by Ignatius (Law, The Tests of Life, 30): "They give no heed to love, caring not for the widow, the orphan or the afflicted, neither for those who are in bonds, nor for those who are released from bonds, neither for the hungry nor the thirsty." Such persons professed that they knew God, but by their works they denied Him; they were "abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate" (Tit 1 16). They enticed others into sins of impurity (2 Tim 3 5,6). They allured others through the fusts of the flesh; and the means by which they succeeded in doing this was that they spoke great swelling words of vanity, and the end was that in their destroying of others they themselves also were surely destroyed (2 Pet 2 12,18). They were ungodly men, turning the grace of God into lasciviousness and denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ; they gave themselves up to the sins of the flesh, and ran riotously after error in hope of a gain in money; they were sensual men, not having the Spirit (Jude vs 4,8,11,19). The entire Ep. of Jude is directed against this antinomian and licentious development of Gnosticism, and against its terrible permission of an unholy life (see below on Book of Rev).

(1) Gnostic claims.—The gnostic claim to knowledge throws light upon many passages in this epistle. St. John refers to his opponents' using such phrases as "I know God," "I abide in Christ," "I am in the light." These lofty claims were made by persons who did not love their brethren on earth, who did not walk in Christ's footsteps, and who were destitute of love. The apostle therefore describes these lofty claims as false, because those who made them possessed neither love nor obedience.

test of the profession which any man may make that he knows God. "Every one also that doeth righteousness is begotten of him" (§ 20);
"Whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother" (§ 10).

(2) Its loveless nature.—Gnosticism was distinguished by an unethical, loveless intellectualism. This seems to be the explanation of the false teaching against which this epistle is directed. The apostle describes the dry head-knowledge which left the heart and life untouched by love, and which led men, while they professed to love God, nevertheless to remain destitute of love to their fellow-men. They did not fold their human brethren to their hearts, they were dead to the fact that where pity dwells, the love of God dwells also. In Gnosticism knowledge was in itself the supreme end and purpose of life, the sum of highest good to which a man could attain, the crown of life. The system was loveless to the core.

(3) Docetism.—Now, when the attempt was made to amalgamate these gnostic ideas with the Christian faith, the inevitable result was Docetism. Just because God cannot have any immediate contact with matter, therefore the incarnation of Almighty God in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ is inconceivable. From this position it is, of course, only a step to deny that the incarnation and the true human life of Christ ever took place at all.

(4) The Antichrist.—The Antichrist of the First

Epistle of John is docetic Gnosticism. The soul of the apostle rushes onward, with glowing zeal for the honor of his Master whom Gnosticism dishonored, to identify personally the historical Jesus with the Divine Being: "the Son of God," "the Word of Life," "the Christ." "Who is the liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? This is the antichrist, even he that denieth the Father and the Son. Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father: he that confesseth the Son hath the Father also" (§ 22,23). It should be noted that the last clause in ver 23, which is printed in italics in AV, is restored in RV to its rightful position in the original text. "Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: and every spirit that confesseth not Jesus is not of God: and this is the spirit of the antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it cometh; and now it is in the world already" (§ 2,3).

(5) Its antinomian side.—The antinomian side of Gnosticism is not so directly referred to in the First Epistle of John as Docetism is; but evidences are manifest that the apostle had it clearly before him. "Little children," he writes, "let no man lead you astray: he that doeth righteousness is righteous even as he is righteous: he that doeth sin is of the devil" (§ 7,8). And these were the methods by which those deceivers endeavored to lead the members of the church astray. They alleged that sin was a thing indifferent in itself. It made no difference to the spiritual man whether he sinned with his body or not. It is for this reason that the apostle, in opposing those teachers, insists that "sin is lawlessness" (§ 4): "All unrighteousness is sin" (§ 17). "Whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin" (§ 9): "In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother" (§ 10). The whole passage presupposes, as familiar to its readers, a doctrine of moral indifference, according to which the status of the 'spiritual' man is not to be tested by the commonplace facts of moral conduct" (The Tests of Life, 34). See JOHN, FIRST EPISTLE OF.

As time advanced, and the later books of the NT were written, Gnosticism assumed more of its distinctive peculiarities. "Those who

5. "To had knowledge" regarded themselves
Know the as a superior order of believers. One Depth": of their phrases was "to know the Rev depths" (Rev 3 24 AV), and this was valued far more highly than love and obedience. "From this language, we may, I think, infer the existence of an Ophite sect, boasting of its peculiar gnōsis, before the date of the Apocalypse" (Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, 105). The claim of the Ophites was that they alone knew "the depths." "Yes," is the apostle's reply to claims of this kind, "yes, the depths, but not of God, the depths of Satan"; for such is a just description of a teaching which ascribed the origin and the working of evil to God. It is in the light of gnostic teaching of this sort that the meaning can be seen of the same apostle's language in his First Epistle, "And this is the message which we have heard from him and announce unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all" (1 Jn 1 5).

The Nicolaitans.—In the Epistles to the Seven Churches in the Apocalypse there are other references to Gnosticism. Who the Nicolaitans were (§ 6,15) is not absolutely certain; but it is not unlikely that they were so called because of their having assumed the name of "Nicolai, a proselyte of Antioch" (Acts 6 5). The first step to the reception of gentile believers into the Christian church on an equal footing with the Jews may have been the appointment of Nicolaus as one of the first deacons, for the facts that he was a native of Antioch and a proselyte, show that he had been a heathen by birth. And it is noteworthy to find such a person appointed to office in the church at so very early a period, even before the conversion of the apostle Paul. The Nicolaitans therefore may have distorted in an antinomian sense the doctrine taught by Nicolaus, who in all probability proclaimed the liberty of the gospel, as his fellow-deacon, Stephen, did (Acts 7 throughout). But the liberty claimed by the Nicolaitans was liberty to sin. They are mentioned in the Epistle to Ephesus, and their deeds are characterized as deeds which Christ hates (Rev 2 6). Their name occurs again in the Epistle to Pergamum, and there also their doctrine is described as a doctrine which the Lord hates (ver 15). Their teaching was one of licentiousness—eating things sacrificed to idols, and committing fornication (ver 14). Again in the Epistle to Thyatira, the Gnostics are spoken of as practising the same evil courses, and as holding a doctrine of "the depths of Satan" (vs 20.21.24 AV)—see above. The persons mentioned in the Epistle to Philadelphia were also evidently Gnostics. They are described as being "of the synagogue of Satan" (3 9).

"In the language of St. Jude, as in that of St. Peter, which it closely imitates, we may clearly discern a reference to the gnostic sect of the Nicolaitans mentioned by name in Rev. The comparison in all these passages, of the error condemned with that of Balaam, is decisive as to the identity of the persons intended. The other characteristics noted by St. Peter are also repeated by St. Jude—their denial of the Lord, their profligate lives, their contempt of government, and evil speaking of dignities and of things that they know not, their pollution of the feast of charity, their great swelling words. The antinomian, no less than the ascetic side of Gnosticism, seems by this time to have fully manifested itself" (Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, 71).

V. The Christian Antithesis.—The principal points of contrast between Gnosticism and Christian teaching in regard to leading doctrines will now be apparent, and can be briefly summarized.

According to the Gnostics, God is thought of as the ultimate, nameless, unknowable Being, of whom they speak as the "Abyss." He is perfect, but the material world is alien to the Divine nature. How then does it come to exist at all? What is the source of its imperfections and evils?

How did the world originate?—The Gnostic answer is that the plerōma or fullness of the Deity (see FULNESS) could flow out in no other way than in emanations or aeons or angels, all of which are necessarily imperfect, the highest of these emanations or aeons or angels being more spiritual than the grade immediately below it. Of these aeons there is a gradation so numerous, that at length the lowest of them is almost wholly corporeal, the spiritual element having been gradually diminished or eliminated, until at last the world of man and of matter is reached, the abode of evil. In this way the gulf is bridged between God and the world of mankind. The highest aeons approximate closely to the Divine nature, so spiritual are they and so nearly free from matter. These form the highest hierarchy of angels, and these as well as many other grades of the angelic host are to be worshipped.

In opposition to this view, Christian faith worships God as the free self-sufficient Creator, infinitely good and wise and powerful and holy, the Author of all things, and affirms creation as an incomprehensible fact revealed to faith, and which rises above the grasp of the understanding. "By faith we understand that the worlds have been framed by the word of God, so that what is seen hath not been made out of things which do appear" (He 11 3 AV).

The doctrine of evil follows directly from the above account of the relation of God to the world.

According to Gnosticism the manifestation of God is possible only through self-limitation on His part, for in His essence God is the unfathomable Abyss. Through this Divine self-limitation are evolved, first, the Divine powers or attributes, which previously were hidden in the Abyss of His being. These Divine powers (the plerōma) become the principles of all further developments of life. Life continues to be unfolded in such a way that its successive grades sink farther and farther from the purity of God, the life is feeblere the nearer they come to matter, with which, at length, they blend. Such, according to Gnosticism, is the origin of evil.

Whenever men are not content with acknowledging evil to be the act of their own free will, which has chosen to forsake its absolute dependence upon God; whenever they go beyond this and seek for another origin of evil, then one of two results follows. They either limit the holiness of God, and find the cause of evil in God Himself, thus annihilating all distinction between good and evil—which is Pantheism; or they limit the power of God by granting the existence of an eternal evil power beyond the control of God—which is Dualism. In avoiding Pantheism, Gnosticism accepted the dualistic solution, ascribing to evil an eternal self-subsistent nature, which is to make it absolute as God Himself is. As absolute self-subsistence can be affirmed of none but God, the eternally self-subsistent evil of Dualism must be God, which it cannot possibly be, because it is not good. Here is the self-contradiction on which Gnosticism was wrecked.

(1) The Christian doctrine of sin.—Directly contrary to this is the Christian doctrine, according to which evil is the refusal of the creature-will to lean absolutely and utterly on God, upon His care and love and upholding grace. Sin is that which ought not to be; it has no right to exist at all; it is defiance of God; it is moral transgression; its magnitude cannot be exaggerated. If it could, it would dethrone God. It has defied His righteousness and wisdom and holiness and even His grace. Sin therefore is dealt with by God in two ways, either by direct punishment or by redemption, in which provision is made for its removal by its being borne by the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world.

The gnostic idea of the origin of evil follows at once from, and is inseparably involved in, their dualistic interpretation of nature. The question "What is sin?" is no mere academic or philosophical discussion, in which one opinion may be as good as another. "Everything in Christianity is connected more or less directly with the great facts of Sin and Redemption; and the plan of Redemption, which is the essence of Christianity, cannot be rightly understood until the doctrine of Sin be adequately recognized and established. Here, certainly, if anywhere, Christian theology must fight pro aris et focis" (Julius Müller, quoted in Dr. Orr's Sin as a Problem of Today, 6).

(2) Sin and the moral law.—The universality of sin, its persistence, its gravity, its power to destroy and to deprave—these are facts which can hardly be exaggerated. To view sin aright, it is impossible to leave out of sight its relation to moral law, to God, and to His kingdom. Sin is the transgression of moral law; it is transgression also against a holy God, of whose character and will moral law is a transcript or reflection. "Sin is transgression against God, the substitution of the creature-will for the will of the Creator; revolt of the creature-will from God" (Sin as a Problem of Today, 7). It is the resolve of the will to make itself independent of God and to renounce His authority. Sin is self-will, false independence, freedom which ends in bondage and misery.

But in Gnosticism sin is something quite different; it is not the act and the disposition of the human will in rebellion against God; it is only a physical fact or quality inherent in the body and in matter everywhere. Redemption therefore does not consist in the work of Christ for us on the cross, and the applying of the benefits of that work by the Holy Spirit of God in the renewal of the moral nature of man. Redemption is simply each man's efforts to secure emancipation from the flesh—from physical evil.

It is easily seen that a system of this kind had no need of Christ and leaves no place for redemption in the Christian sense of that term.

3. Christ and Redemption Redemption in this scheme of thought is not deliverance from sin, it is not removal of guilt and renewing of the mind. It is something quite different, and consists in the restoration of the cosmic order and illumination of the mind of the select few through knowledge. Christ is not the Saviour who saves His people from their sins, and who gives them unceasingly, through union with Himself, deliverance from the power of sin. He is only one of the aeons, the highest of them. He is an originated being, and not God. There is thus no place in Gnosticism either for the creation of the universe by God, or for the incarnation and work of Christ. Once grant that matter is essentially evil, and there is excluded the possibility of Christ's having assumed a true human nature, simply for the one reason that the world and human nature are originally and necessarily evil. Thus, as already seen, we are landed in Docetism.

The Christology of the Gnostics accordingly assumed one of two types. "One class of early Gnostics separated the spiritual being Christ from the man Jesus; they supposed that the Christ entered Jesus at the time of His baptism, and left Him at the moment of His crucifixion. Thus the Christ was neither born as a man nor suffered as a man. In this way they obviated the difficulty, insuperable to the gnostic mind, of conceiving the connection between the highest spiritual agency and gross corporeal matter, which was involved in the Catholic doctrine of the Incarnation and Passion, and which Gnostics of another type more effectually set aside by the doctrine of Docetism, i.e. by assuming that the human body of Our Lord was only a phantom body, and not real flesh and blood. Irenaeus represents the former class as teaching that 'Jesus was the receptacle of the Christ,' and that the Christ 'descended upon Him from heaven in the form of a dove, and after He had declared to mankind the nameless Father, entered again into the plērōma imperceptibly and invisibly.' Here no names are given. But in another passage he ascribes precisely the same doctrine, without however naming the plērōma, to Cerinthus" (Lightfoot, Col., 264). How strenuously this doctrine was combated in apostolic circles has already been shown in speaking of St. John's First Epistle.

The necessary consequence of the gnostic theory in an ascetic morality which passed over by sure steps into antinomian license has likewise been fully illustrated in the foregoing, and need not be further enlarged on. The whole has its root in a false intellectualism, to which the gospel in its inculcation of humility, faith and dependence upon God's Spirit for guidance into truth is, in its inmost principle, opposed.

VI. Harnack's View of Gnosticism.—Harnack's view of Gnosticism differs from that now given in laying the chief emphasis on its Judaeo-Hellenistic side. He describes well how, when Christianity appeared, an extensive spiritualizing or allegorizing of the OT had already taken place. "This spiritualizing was the result of a philosophic view of religion, and this philosophic view was the outcome of a lasting influence of Gr philosophy, and of the Gr spirit generally, upon Judaism. In consequence of this view, all facts and sayings of the OT in which one could not find his way, were allegorized. Nothing was what it seemed, but was only the symbol of something invisible. The history of the OT was here sublimated to a history of the emancipation of reason from passion" (History of Dogma, I, 223).

This allegorical interpretation disclosed to the mature mind a wealth of relations, of hints and of intuitions from the OT, which to the uninitiated was only a dry record of fact. This view of the OT gave its readers a strange interest, which proceeded to transfer their ancient Jewish hopes into the world of Gr philosophy, and transformed the result into a metaphysic. When these thinkers entered the Christian church, Christian hopes and terms were added to the already existing Judaic-Gr-Alexandrian compound, and such was Gnosticism. It represented the acute secularizing or Hellenizing of Christianity. The Gnostics "are therefore those Christians, who, in a swift advance, attempted to capture Christianity for Hellenic culture, and Hellenic culture for Christianity, and who gave up the OT in order to facilitate the conclusion of the covenant between the two powers and make it possible to assert the absoluteness of Christianity" (p. 227).

Harnack indeed grants that there were other elements in Gnosticism, but he strongly asserts that the Gr element was the predominating one. In this he seems to us to be in error. Laying the chief emphasis on Hellenism, he fails to give the due and preponderating place to eastern dualism. As already seen, an eastern dualistic theosophy is the chief element in Gnosticism. This eastern source is also acknowledged by Harnack, but only as if it were subsidiary to Hellenism. As he regards it, "Gnosticism was an acute Hellenizing of Christianity" (p. 230).

In regard to the fundamental philosophic doctrines of Gnosticism, the indefinable nature of the Divine primeval Being, the sinfulness of matter, the fulness of God in aeons, the Demiurge, etc., Harnack agrees generally with other writers, and adds, "All these are ideas for which we find the way prepared in the philosophy of the time, anticipated by Philo, and represented in neo-Platonism as the great final result of Gr philosophy" (p. 233).

VII. Influence and Development of Gnosticism.

—Gnosticism is peculiarly the heresy of the 2d cent., and in itself a proof of the extent to which a knowledge of the Christian faith had, at that early period, penetrated in literary and philosophical circles. Though it is true that Christianity at first influenced chiefly the humbler classes, yet it was not among these persons that the various gnostic heresies arose.

Gnosticism "was a product which did not spring up spontaneously in the minds of the mechanics and slaves and women and children, whom most, like Celsus, suppose to have formed the bulk of the Christian communities, but could only have taken its rise in minds of a more cultured and speculative cast. This, indeed, was its claim—to be a religion of the 'gnōsis' or knowledge, for the more highly trained or élite. It could only exist at all, therefore, as the result of a Christian ferment which had entered these speculative circles, and was there powerfully at work. Baur rightly appreciates the situation, when he says: 'Gnosticism gives the clearest proof that Christianity had now come to be one of the most important factors in the history of the time, and it shows esp. what a mighty power of attraction the new Christian principles possessed for the highest intellectual life then to be found either in the pagan or in the Jewish world.' Above all, these systems are a striking witness to the impression produced on the heathen mind by the great Christian idea of redemption. 'When the gnostic systems,' says Neander, 'describe the movement which was produced in the kingdom of the Demiurge by the appearance of Christ as the manifestation of a new and mighty principle which had entered the precincts of this lower world, they give us to understand how powerful was the impression which the contemplation of the life of Christ and His influence on humanity, had left on the minds of the founders of these systems, making all earlier institutions seem to them as nothing in comparison with Christianity.' We must beware, therefore, of underestimating either the extent or the intensity of this great intellectual ferment set up by the gospel in the heart of heathenism" (Orr, Neglected Factors, etc, 196).

4. Asceticism and Anti-nomianism

The earliest of the Gnostics known to us by name is Cerinthus, the antagonist of the apostle John.

It seems to be beyond reasonable doubt that these two encountered each other at Ephesus. Irenaeus relates on the authority of those who heard the story from Polycarp how the apostle and Cerinthus met in the public baths in that city. When St. John discovered that Cerinthus was in the same building with him, he instantly left, exclaiming that he could not remain while Cerinthus, the enemy of God and of man, was there. From the accounts which have been preserved of Cerinthus and of his teaching, it can be gathered that he taught that the world was created not by the Supreme God, but by an inferior power, and that he also taught a docetic theory of the Incarnation. Caius of Rome, a disciple of Irenaeus, records that Cerinthus held that there would be a millennium of unrestrained sensuality. Dionysius of Alexandria (c 260 AD) more than confirms this. "Thus so far as they go, the historical data harmonize with the internal evidence of the Epistle [of John] itself, in giving the impression that the different tendencies it combats are such as were naturally combined in one consistently developed gnostic system, and that the object of its polemic is, throughout, one and the same" (The Tests of Life, 37).

As regards the Gospel of John there is the testimony of Irenaeus, that it was written to oppose that form of Gnosticism which was taught by Cerinthus, and, before him, by the Nicolaitans. The nature of that heresy may be stated in the words of Irenaeus himself:

"A certain Cerinthus," he says, "in Asia, taught that the world was not made by the Supreme God, but by some power altogether separate and distinct from that Sovereign Power which is over the universe, and one ignorant of the God who is over all things. He taught, moreover, that Jesus was not born of a virgin (for this seemed to him to be impossible), but was the son of Joseph and Mary, born after the manner of other men; though preëminent above other men in justice and prudence and wisdom; and that after His baptism the Christ, in the form of a dove, descended upon Him from that Sovereign Power which is over all things; and that He then announced the unknown Father and wrought miracles; but that, at the end, the Christ departed again from Jesus, and that Jesus suffered and was raised from the dead, while the Christ continued impassible, as a spiritual being" (Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, 74).

Such a passage as Jn 19 34.35 seems to refer to docetic Gnosticism, and to be a personal protest against it. After describing the piercing of Christ's side by the soldier's spear, and how "straightway there came out blood and water," the apostle adds, "And he that hath seen hath borne witness, and his witness is true: and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye also may believe."

There are many other passages which seem to be directed against Docetism, e.g. "The Word became flesh, and dwelt among us (and we beheld his glory)" (1 14); "Jesus therefore, being wearied with his journey, sat thus by the well" (4 6); "Reach hither thy finger, and see my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and put it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing" (20 27).

Cerinthus seems to have taught that the religion of Christ was identical with undiluted Judaism, including even circumcision and the earthly kingdom of the future. The Cerinthian theory, however, was held under various forms by its adherents, some teachers holding that the God of the OT was, at the best, a subordinate angel of limited power, wisdom and goodness, and that the creation of the world was very imperfect. Others went so far as to identify the God of the OT with Satan. The ethic of systems such as these was antinomian, sometimes even going the length of libertinism.

Generally, the forms under which Gnosticism appeared varied greatly in different periods. Some went farther than others from the Christian faith.

Some communities, such as the Encratites, laid the greatest stress on the necessity for asceticism; other communities were wholly docetic; the

4. Various Carpocratians taught the philosophy and communism of Plato. One of these teachers, Epiphaneus, was honored as a god, and this sect crowned the image of Jesus along with those of Pythagoras, Plato and Aristotle. Further, there were impostors of all varieties: magicians, soothsayers, jugglers, deceivers and hypocrites, "who appeared using mighty words with a host of unintelligible formulae and taking up with scandalous ceremonies in order to rob men of their money" (Harnack, op. cit., 239), and even for viler purposes.

(1) The Ophites.—Gnosticism, before reaching its full development, is chiefly represented by the ophite sects or systems. These were so named from the word óphis, "serpent," to which they paid honor as the symbol of intelligence. They held that the Creator of the world was an ignorant and imperfect being, Ialdabaoth, the Son of Chaos; and that it was a meritorious act when the serpent persuaded Adam and Eve to disobey him. There were several of the ophite sects, such as the Cainites, who reversed all the standards of moral judgment, choosing as their heroes the persons whom the Bible condemned, such as Cain, the men of Sodom, Esau and Korah.

(2) Valentinus.—By the time of Justin Martyr (c 150 AD), Gnosticism had become divided into a variety of sects and schools, Valentinians, Basilideans, Saturninians and Marcionites. In the Valentinian system, Christ and the Holy Spirit were two aeons. The Valentinians granted that ordinary Christians were better than the heathen, and that they might look forward to a kind of salvation; even now ordinary Christians occupied a middle position, better than the "hylic" or "psychic," but inferior to the "pneumatic" or "spiritual," as the Gnostics termed themselves.

(3) Basilides.—The Basilideans take their name from Basilides of Alexandria, a man of powerful intellect. He and his son Isidore taught this system, which was afterward considerably modified for the purpose of popular apprehension. The world is continuously evolved from a panesperma or "seed of the world," in which all things were originally potentially contained. It is ruled by two great Archons, who yet subserve the designs of the Supreme. There are no aeons, but the highest "light" descends through the successive spheres till it rests on Jesus of Nazareth. The process is complete when the Divine element ("sonship") is all drawn out and restored to God; oblivion then falls on lower intelligences. Many fine sayings are attributed to Basilides, e.g. "I will say anything rather than doubt the goodness of Providence" (Orr, The Early Church, 75).

(4) Saturninus.—The Saturninians were so called from Saturninus, said to be a disciple of Menander, who in turn is said to have been a disciple of Simon Magus. The system of Saturninus is marked both by a strong dualism and by a gloomy asceticism. He is also reported to have been one of the founders of the Encratite heresy, which condemned marriage. Tatian, Justin Martyr's disciple, became a member of this gnostic sect, holding, it is alleged, the usual theory of aeons, and that there was a Demiurge, who was not the Supreme God.

(5) Marcion.—Marcion, a native of Pontus, taught in Rome c 140-55 AD. His system differs much from ordinary gnostic theories, except that he absolutely distinguished between the God of the OT, who is regarded as merely great, harsh, rigorous, and the good God of the NT, who is wholly love. He also held to the usual gnostic dualism and docetism. Marcion's system has been described as an overstrained Paulinism, as he lays the stress on faith, not on knowledge. Marcion was the author of a book called the Anthitheses, which contrasted the OT with the NT. He also drew up a canon of Scripture, which contained only one gospel, viz. Lk in a mutilated state, and ten Epp. of Paul. Marcion was a rigorous ascetic. In the Lord's Supper he allowed only water to be used instead of wine. The Marcionites refused baptism to married persons. This sect or "church" endured for several centuries.

"All the gnostic systems had one feature in common, viz. that they regarded the OT and the NT as revelations of two different Gods,

5. Relation to the OT and considered the mission of Christ to proceed from a higher power than the God of the Jewish religion, who was identified with the Demiurge, or Maker of the world. But under this common assumption there was room for two very opposite estimates of the older revelation and of the God whom it reveals. Some of the gnostic sects regarded the Demiurge as being altogether alien from and opposed to the Supreme God; others considered him merely as a subordinate power, inferior but not hostile to the Supreme God, and acting before the coming of a more perfect revelation, as his unconscious organ" (Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, 45). "There can be no doubt that the gnostic propaganda was seriously hindered by the inability to organize and discipline churches, which is characteristic of all philosophic systems of religion" (Harnack, History of Dogma, I, 252). "From about 210 they ceased to be a factor of the historical development, though the church of Constantine and Theodosius was alone really able to suppress them" (ib, 251).

In contrast to Gnosticism the Christian church held fast to these great facts, that Jesus Christ is

6. The Christian Verities the Son of God, preëxistent before the Incarnation, and manifest in the flesh and crucified for us men and for our salvation; that He rose from the dead; that the OT is a true revelation of the one supreme and holy God, the Creator of all things. Dualism, the eternity of matter and its inherent evil, as well as Docetism and oriental mythologies were accordingly rejected as contrary to the Christian faith. During the period of the prevalence of

7. Influence on Theology Gnosticism there took place the earlier developments of Christian theology. Gnosticism gave a powerful impetus to the formation of a NT canon of Scripture, and to the shaping of the earliest creed. See APOSTLES' CREED.

In the revulsion from Gnosticism and Docetism it should not be forgotten that there is truth to be

8. Truth Underlying Docetism found even amid the errors of these systems. Docetism was an overstatement of a great truth, an overstatement so large as to destroy the true humanity of Our Lord. But the truth in Docetism is that the eternal Christ touches and appeals to and has a definite relationship to and actually influences every human heart; and also, that, to the Christian believer, Christ is more and does more than this; Christ dwells in the believer's heart by faith, "Christ in you, the hope of glory" (Col 1 27). "Docetism was not all folly. Rather we may regard it as one primitive form of the assertion of that mystical element which has never been wanting to Christianity from the first days until now, and we may be sure, never will be wanting to it" (Sanday, Christologies Ancient and Modern, 9).

VIII. Modern Gnosticism.—Gnosticism in its ancient form has passed away, but it is interesting to observe how its spirit reappears from time to time in modern days. Gnosticism, as already seen, is not one aspect of thought alone, but many. And in one form or another it is seen again and again. For example, the modern denial of the virgin birth of Our Lord is that form of Gnosticism which taught that the man Jesus became Christ only at His baptism, when the Holy Ghost descended upon Him from heaven.

Phases of gnostic teaching are reproduced in modern pantheistic philosophies and other forms of religious doctrine, which hold that there has been no objective atonement and no resurrection of Christ from the dead. "Basilides with his powerful speculative grasp and all-embracing evolutionary process might be termed the Hegel of the movement; Valentinus with his robe of fantasy and triple fall and redemption was its Schelling; Marcion with his severe practical bent, his doctrine of faith, and his antitheses of the just God and the good, might without straining be termed its Ritschl" (Orr, The Progress of Dogma, 59).

"Fichte said, 'There were no external realities at all, they were the mere objectivity of the subject or creations of the inward eye'; after Fichte came Schelling, and Schelling said, 'Then this creating eye is God's own eye'; and after Schelling came Hegel, and Hegel said that 'God and man are one, and God all men, and all men God, and the whole universe God eternally thinking in the process of development,' and that or something like it is Hegelianism. I feel in studying this philosophy, as Baron Humboldt says he felt, when he experienced the first shock of an earthquake. I feel a dreadful sense of restlessness and insecurity. The ground seems to give way beneath, and the earth and the heaven to dissolve, the universe becomes a dream, a myth" (W. B. Robertson, D.D., Martin Luther, German Student Life, etc, 138).

"Philosophy," says Mansel, "striving after a first principle which shall be one and simple and unconditioned and incapable of all further analysis in thought, is naturally tempted to soar above that complex combination of attributes which is implied in our conception of personality, and in endeavoring to simplify and purify our representation of the Divine nature, ends by depriving it of every attribute which can make God the object of any religious feeling or the source of any moral obligation" (The Gnostic Heresies, 11). God is no longer the author and source of goodness and truth and moral law, but the mind is occupied with the metaphysical relation between God and the world, as absolute and relative, cause and effect, principle and consequence, and God becomes identical with the world.

It is easily seen how teaching of this sort strikes at the root of all religion and morality. The personality of God, the personality and free will of man, the existence of moral evil, the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, the redemption which He accomplished for the world, His resurrection, the whole significance of His person and His work—all is denied. This is the spirit and the meaning of Gnosticism.

Dr. Gwatkin sums up the matter thus: "Gnosticism undermined Christian monotheism by its distinction of the Creator from the Supreme, Christian morals by its opposition of the philosopher to the unlearned, Christian practice by its separation of knowledge from action; and it cut away the very basis of the gospel whenever it explained away its history. In every case it had got hold of truth on one side—the reality of evil in the world, the function of knowledge in religion, the difference between the letter and the spirit; but fragments of truth are not enough for a gospel, which is false if all truth is not summed up in Christ. Therefore there could be no peace between the gnostic illuminati and the Christian churches" (Early Church History, II, 68).

JOHN RUTHERFORD

GO (לָךְ, halakh, לָךְ, yalakh, מָלַךְ, malakh, מָלַךְ, malakh; אָזַן, ago, to go, hupago, anabainō, erchomai, apērchomai, apērchomai, porēnomai): "Go" ("went," etc) occurs very frequently in the Eng. Bible, and is the tr of a great many different Heb and Gr terms. As the word implies movement of all kinds, physical and mental, it has naturally many applications.

In the OT halakh and yalakh are among the commonest words, meaning "to go" in its original sense of "to walk," but also in the most

1. In the varied senses, according to the verbal OT conjugations, etc, the prep. attached, and the words in connection with which the terms stand; halakh and yalakh are often used figuratively (tr^d "to walk," etc) for to live, to pursue a way of life, e.g., "to walk ever in his ways" (Dt 19 9; cf Ps 15 2; 89 30; 1 K 2 31; 2 3, etc); to die, "He departed" (Heb "went") without being desired" (2 Ch 31 20); to go in, "to enter" (e.g. Gen 7 9), is very common, and yāqā, "to go or come out," also occurs frequently; yāqā has frequently the meaning "to go forth," e.g. Gen 8 7, "He sent forth a raven, and it went forth." Other frequent words are yāradh, "to go down" (Gen 11 7, etc); alakh, "to go or come up" (Gen 3 6, etc; Isa 15 5, "goit up," AV); used also figuratively, e.g., "to rise up or excel," "Thou excellest them all" (Prov 31 29), "to come up on the heart," "to be remembered," "The former things shall not be remembered, nor come into mind" (Isa 66 17; cf Jer 3 16); abhar, "to go or pass over," "to cross" (Gen 41 46, etc), also used figuratively "to pass away," e.g., "as chaff that passeth away" (Isa 29 5), "passeth by transgression" (Mic 7 18); shūbh, "to go again" (Gen 43 2, etc); adakh and gūr, "to go aside," occur several times with the meaning of wrongdoing (e.g. Nu 5 12; Dt 29 14, RV "turn aside"); nādh, "to remove" (Ex 14 15), "Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward" (ver 19 "removed"; Nu 2 24, etc); dal (Aram.), "to go away or about" (Esr 4 23; Dnl 2 17, etc). Many other words occur only once or twice, e.g., arakh, "to travel" (Job 34 8); ashar, "to go straight or right" (Prov 4 14; 9 6, RV "walk"); darakh, "to tread" (Isa 50 8); dakhakh, "to go softly" (Ps 43 4; Isa 36 15, RVm "as in solemn procession"); radghal, "to stir," "to move," "I taught Ephraim to go" (Hos 11 3, RV "to walk").

The obsolete expression "go to" (derived from Tindale) is the tr of yāhabh in Gen 11 34.7; 28 16; Ex 1 10, "come on," RV "come"; of bb (2 K 5 5 RV), "go now"; nd (Jgs 7 3; Isa 5 5; Jer 18 11, omitted in RV).

In the NT anabainō is "to go up" (Mt 3 16; 5 1, etc); erchomai, "to go on" (Mt 12 9, etc); apērchomai, "to go off or away" (Mt

2. In the 2 22; 4 24, etc); porēnomai, "to go or pass on" (Mt 2 8.20, etc); hupago, "to go away" (Mt 5 41; 8 32, etc). We have also other combinations with different shades of meaning, e.g. huperbainō, "to go over or beyond" (1 Thess 4 6); eisērchomai, "to go into" (Mt 7 13; 18 11, etc); proporenomai, "to go before" (Lk 1 76; Acts 7 40), and other forms; ago (agōmen),

"Let us go" (Mt 28 46; Jn 14 31, etc); ago is rendered "go to" (Jas 4 13; 5 1), RV "come."

"Go about [to]" AV is the tr of skēdō, "to seek," in Jn 7 19 "Why go ye about to kill me?" RV "Why seek ye?" and Rom 10 3; of peirōō, "to try," "attempt" (Acts 24 6, RV "assayed"), and of peirōomai (28 21, RV "assayed"), of epichēōō "to lay hands on" (Acts 9 29), which remains in ERV unchanged, ARV "seeking"; "to let go" is the tr of apōidō, "to loose off" or "away" (Lk 14 4, etc), "to go astray," of plandō (Mt 18 12, etc).

Various other words occurring singly are tr^d by forms of "go," e.g. phēōō, "to bear on," AV "Let us go on unto perfection" (He 6 1, see below); epidūō, "to go in upon," "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath" (Eph 4 26).

Many changes in RV are the following: 1. 26, "alone"; Lev 9 7, "draw near"; 10 4, "carry it"; Isa 11 15; Mt 11 4; Jn 8 11, "Go your way"; no straightway"; 13 26, "enter in"; na, "Go" is substituted for "pass"; 18 4, "away" (18 24), "be put"; 2; cf 26, "return" (Eccl 1 7); 2; cf 26, "should be cast"; 1 go up" for "I will come up" (Ex 23 go forth" for "bring forth" (Ps 87 6); for "gave them up" (Ps 81 12). For a whoring, "ARV has 'play the harlot'; "commit fornication"; for "go about even now" (Dt 31 21, ARV), "frame this day"; for "go well" (Prov 20 29) "are stately in their march"; for "suffer us to go" (Mt 8 31), "send us" (a different text) for "not to think of men above that which is written" (1 Cor 4 6), "not [to go] beyond the things which are written"; for "that no man go beyond" (1 Thess 4 6), "transgress"; m "overreach"; for "Let us go on unto perfection" (Heb 6 1), ERV "and press," ARV "Let us press on unto perfection."

GOAD, gōd (מִדְבָּר, dōr-bhān, מִדְבָּר, malakh; ἀνέστην, anesthōn): The goad used by the Syrian farmer is usually a straight branch of oak or other strong wood from which the bark has been stripped, and which has at one end a pointed spike and at the other a flat, chisel-shaped iron. The pointed end is to prod the oxen while plowing. The flattened iron at the other end is to scrape off the earth which clogs the ploughshare. The ancient goad was probably similar to this instrument. It could do villainous work in the hands of an experienced fighter (Jgs 3 31). If 1 S 13 21 is correctly tr^d, the goads were kept sharpened by fleas.

Figurative: "The words of the wise are as goads" (Eccl 12 11). The only reference to goads in the NT is the familiar passage, "It is hard for thee to kick against the goad" (Acts 26 14). It was as useless for Saul to keep on in the wrong way as for a fractious ox to attempt to leave the furrow. He would surely be brought back with a prick of the goad.

GOAH, gō'a (מִדְבָּר, gō'ah; AV GOATH, gō'ath; LXX reads ἐκλεκτὸν λίθον, ex eklektōn lithōn): A place named in describing the boundaries of Jerus as restored in the "days to come" (Jer 31 39). If Gareb is the N.E. hill, then probably Goah is to be identified with the N.W. hill, which is called by Jos "the camp of the Assyrians" (BJ, V, vii, 3; xii, 2). See JERUSALEM.

GOAT, gōt: The common generic word for "goat" is מִדְבָּר, gōt (cf Arab. جاء, gaw, "she-goat"; gōt, gōt), used often for "she-goat" (Gen

1. Names 16 9; Nu 16 27), also with מִדְבָּר, gōt, "kid," as מִדְבָּר מִדְבָּר, gōt, "kid of the goats" (Gen 38 17), also with מִדְבָּר, gōt, "he-goat," as מִדְבָּר מִדְבָּר, gōt, "kid of the goats" or "he-goat," or tr^d simply "kids" as in 1 K 20 27, "The children of Israel encamped before them like two little flocks of kids." Next frequently used is שָׂרִיר, sa'ir, lit. "hairy" (cf Arab. شَعِير, sha'ir, "hair"; خفا, chér, "hedgehog"; Lat hircus, "goat"; hircus, "hairy"; also Ger. Haar; Eng. "hair"), like 'es and 'attadh used of goats for offerings. The goat which is sent into the wilderness bearing the sins of the people is sa'ir (Lev 16 7-22). The same name is used of devils (Lev 17 7; 2 Ch 11 15, RV "he-goats") and of satyrs (Isa 13 21; 34 14, RVm "he-goats," ARV "wild goats"). Cf also שָׂרִירָה, sa'irah 'izzim, "a female from the flock" (Lev 4 28; 5 6). The male or leader of the flock is שָׂרִיר, 'attadh; Arab. 'atad, "yearling he-goat"; fig. "chief ones" (Isa 14 9; cf Jer 50 8). A later word for "he-goat," used also figuratively, is שָׂפִיר, saphir (2 Ch 29 21; Exr 8 35; Dnl 8 5.8.21). In Prov 30 31, one of the four things "which are stately in going" is the he-goat, שָׂפִיר, saphir (Arab. تيس, taiis, "he-goat"), also mentioned in Gen 30 35; 32 14 among the possessions of Laban and Jacob, and in 2 Ch 17 11 among the animals given as tribute by the Arabians to Jehoshaphat. In He 9 12.13.19; 10 4, we have τράγος, trágos, the ordinary Gr word for "goat"; in Mt 25 32.33, ἐρίφος, eriphos, and its dim. ἐρίφω, eriphon; in He 11 37 δέρμα αἰγίου, derma aigeion, "goatskin," from αἶς (see supra). "Kid" is קִידָה, qidi (cf En-gedi [1 S 23 29], etc), fem. קִידָה, qidiyah (Cant 1 8), but also 'ez, qadi 'izzim, sa'ir 'izzim, sa'irah 'izzim, bnas 'izzim, and eriphos. There remain שָׂרִיר, sa'ir (1 S 24 2; Job 39 1; Ps 104 18), EV "wild goat"; שָׂרִירָה, sa'irah (Prov 5 19), AV "roe," RV "doe"; קִידָה, qidi (Dt 14 5), EV "wild goat"; and שָׂמֶר, semer (Dt 14 5), EV "chamois."

The original of our domestic goats is believed to be the Pers wild goat or pasang, Capra aegagrus, which inhabits some of the Gr islands,

2. Wild Goats

Asia Minor, Syria, Mesopotamia, Persia, Afghanistan, and Northwestern India. It is called wa'i (cf Heb sa'ir) by the Arabs, who in the N. apply the same name to its near relative, the Sinaitic ibex, Capra bedou. The last, doubtless the "wild goat" (sa'ir) of the Bible, inhabits Southern Pal, Arabia, Sinai, and Eastern Egypt, and within its range is uniformly called bedou by the Arabs. It is thought by the writer that the "chamois" (semer) of Dt 14 5 may be the Pers wild goat. The word occurs only in this passage in the list of clean animals. See CHAMOIS; DEER; ZOOLOGY. Wild goats are found only in Southern Europe, Southwestern Asia, and Northeastern Africa. They include the well-known, but now nearly extinct, Alpine ibex, steinbok, or bouquetin, the markhor, and the Himalayan ibex, which has enormous horns. The so-called Rocky Mountain goat is not properly a goat, but is an animal intermediate between goats and antelopes.

Domestic goats differ greatly among themselves in the color and length of their hair, in the size and shape of their ears, and in the size and shape of their horns, which are usually larger in the males, but in some breeds may be absent in both sexes. A very constant feature in both wild and domestic goats is the bearded chin of the male. The goats of Pal and Syria are usually black (Cant 4 1), though sometimes partly or entirely white or brown. Their hair is usually long, hanging down from their bodies. The horns are commonly curved outward and backward, but in one very handsome breed they extend nearly outward with slight but graceful curves, sometimes attaining a span of 2 ft. or more in the old males. The profile of the face is distinctly convex. They are herded in the largest numbers in the mountainous or hilly districts, and vie with their wild congeners in climbing into apparently impossible places. They feed not only on herbs, but also on shrubs and small trees, to which they are most destructive. They are largely responsible for the deforested condition of Judaea and Lebanon. They reach up the trees to the height of a man, holding themselves nearly or quite erect, and even walk out on low branches.

Apart from the ancient use in sacrifice, which still survives among Moslems, goats are most valuable animals. Their flesh is eaten, and

4. Economy may be had when neither mutton nor beef can be found. Their milk is drunk and made into cheese and semm, a sort of clarified butter much used in cooking. Their hair is woven into tents (Cant 1 5), carpets, cloaks, sacks, slings, and various camel, horse and mule trappings. Their skins are made into bottles (na'ah; Gr askos; Arab. kirbeh) for water, oil, semm, and other liquids (cf also He 11 37).

Just as the kid was often slaughtered for an honored guest (Jgs 6 19; 13 19), so the kid or goat was frequently taken for sacrifice

5. Religious use (Lev 4 23; 9 15; 16 7; Nu 15 24; Exr 8 35; Est 4 23; He 9 12).

A goat was one of the clean animals (sa'ir 'izzim, Dt 14 4). In Dnl, the powerful king out of the W. is typified as a goat with a single horn (8 5). One of the older goats is the leader of the flock. In some parts of the country the goatherd makes different ones leaders by turns, the leader being trained to keep near the goatherd and not to eat so long as he wears the bell.

In Isa 14 9, "... stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the chief ones of the earth," the word tr "chief ones" is 'attadh, "he-goat." Again, in Jer 50 8, we have "Go forth out of the land of the Chaldeans, and be as the he-goats before the flocks." In Mt 25 32, in the scene of the last judgment, we find "He shall separate them one from another, as the shepherd separateth the sheep from the goats." It is not infrequent to find a flock including both goats and sheep grazing over the mountains, but they are usually folded separately.

ALFRED ELY DAY

GOATSKINS, göt'skins (fr aigélos lappas, en aigélos dermasin): Such skins are mentioned only once (He 11 37), where the wearing of goatskins, indicating extreme poverty, is referred to, by implication, as the possible lot of the faithful Christian, even as it had been of others. Ascetics of different religions, esp. of the Moslem sects, are frequently seen going about Syria and Pal today, clad in sheepskins or goatskins, a sign of their renunciation of all things worldly.

GOATS' HAIR (שָׂרִיר, 'ez): The word for she-goat is used elliptically to mean goats' hair, which was used in the tabernacle furnishings in the form of curtains (Ex 26 7; 36 14). Goats' hair was probably used in the Midianite and Israelitish camps in much the same way as in the Bedouin camps today (cf Nu 31 20). The tents, tent ropes and rugs are made of spun goats' hair. The provision sacks which hold wheat, rice, etc, and the saddlebags are made of the same material. A strip of the cloth rolled up furnishes a bolster for the head while sleeping (cf 1 S 19 13.16). Goats' hair cloth is admirably suited to stand the hard usage of a frequently shifting encampment. The children of Israel appreciated its utility, even for the tabernacle, where to the modern critical eye it would have looked out of place, matched against scarlet and fine linen (Ex 25 4; 35 6.26). The fact that goats' hair was used is good indication of the comparative crudeness of the tabernacle, when contrasted with present-day furnishings. See also HAIR; WEAVING. JAMES A. PATCH

GOB, gob (גֹּב, גֹּבִי, gōb): A place mentioned in 2 S 21 18 f as the scene of two of David's battles with the Philis. The name appears here only. In the || passage, 1 Ch 20 4, it is called Gezer (cf Ant, VII, xii, 2). Certain texts read "Nob" for "Gob," while Syr and LXX read "Gath." The latter is probably correct.

GOBLET, gob'let (גִּבְלֵת, 'aggān): A bowl or basin (Cant 7 2), the only place where the word is used. 'Aggān is used in the pl. in Ex 24 6 and Isa 22 24, and is trd "basins" and "cups." These "basins" were used to hold the blood of the sacrifices and must have been of moderate size. The "cups" were bowl-shaped vessels and belonged evidently to the smaller class of vessels used in a house.

LITERATURE

I. Introduction to the General Idea.—Religion gives the idea of God, theology construes and organizes its content, and philosophy establishes

1. The Idea its relation to the whole of man's experience. The logical order of treatment might appear to be, first, to establish its truth by philosophical proofs; secondly, to develop its content into theological propositions; and finally, to observe its development and action in religion. Such has been the more usual order of treatment. But the actual history of the idea has been quite the reverse. Men had the idea of God, and it had proved a creative factor in history, long before reflection upon it issued in its systematic expression as a doctrine. Moreover, men had enunciated the doctrine before they attempted or even felt any need to define its relation to reality. And the logic of history is the truer philosophy. To arrive at the truth of any idea, man must begin with some portion of experience, define its content, relate it to the whole of experience, and so determine its degree of reality.

Religion is as universal as man, and every religion involves some idea of God. Of the various philosophical ideas of God, each has its counterpart and antecedent in some actual religion. Pantheism is the philosophy of the religious consciousness of India. Deism had prevailed for centuries as an actual attitude of men to God, in China, in Judaism and in Islam, before it found expression as a rational theory in the philosophy of the 18th cent. Theism is but the attempt to define in general terms the Christian conception of God, and of His relation to the world. If Pluralism claims a place among the systems of philosophy, it can appeal to the religious consciousness of that large portion of mankind that has hitherto adhered to Polytheism.

But all religions do not issue in speculative reconstructions of their content. It is true in a sense that all religion is an unconscious philosophy, because it is the reaction of the whole mind, including the intellect, upon the world of its experience, and, therefore, every idea of God involves some kind of an explanation of the world. But conscious reflection upon their own content emerges only in a few of the more highly developed religions. Brahmanism, Buddhism, Judaism, Islam and Christianity are the only religions that have produced great systems of thought, exhibiting their content in a speculative and rational form. The religions of Greece and Rome were unable to survive the reflective period. They produced no theology which could ally itself to a philosophy, and Gr philosophy was from the beginning to a great extent the denial and supersession of Gr religion.

Bib. lit. nearly all represents the spontaneous experience of religion, and contains comparatively little reflection upon that experience. In the OT it is only in Second Isa, in the Wisdom literature and in a few Pss that the human mind may be seen turning back upon itself to ask the meaning of its practical feelings and beliefs. Even here nothing appears of the nature of a philosophy of Theism or of religion, no theology, no organic definition and no ideal reconstruction of the idea of God. It never occurred to any OT writer to offer a proof of the existence of God, or that anyone should need it. Their concern was to bring men to a right relation with God, and they propounded right views of God only in so far as it was necessary for their practical purpose. Even the fool who "hath said in his heart, There is no God" (Ps 14 1; 53 1), and the wicked nations "that forget God" (Ps 9 17) are no theoretical atheists, but wicked and corrupt men, who, in conduct and life, neglect or reject the presence of God.

The NT contains more theology, more reflection upon the inward content of the idea of God, and upon its cosmic significance; but here also, no system appears, no coherent and rounded-off doctrine, still less any philosophical construction of the idea on the basis of experience as a whole. The task of exhibiting the Bib. idea of God is, therefore, not that of setting together a number of texts, or of writing the history of a theology, but rather of interpreting the central factor in the life of the Heb and Christian communities.

Logically and historically the Bib. idea stands related to a number of other ideas. Attempts have

2. Definition of the idea of God—general a nature as to comprehend them all. The older theologians assumed the Christian standpoint, and put into their definitions the conclusions of Christian doctrine and philosophy. Thus Melancthon: "God is a spiritual essence, intelligent, eternal, true, good, pure, just, merciful, most free and of infinite power and wisdom." Thomas Aquinas more briefly defines God as "the absolute personality." These definitions take no account of the existence of lower religions and ideas of God, nor do they convey much of the concreteness and nearness of God revealed in Christ. A similar recent definition, put forward, however, avowedly of the Christian conception, is that of Professor W. N. Clarke: "God is the personal Spirit, perfectly good, who in holy love creates, sustains and orders all" (Outline of Christian Theology, 66). The rise of comparative religion has shown that "while all religions involve a conscious relation to a being called God, the Divine Being is in different religions conceived in the most different ways; as one and as many, as natural and as spiritual, as like to and manifested in almost every object in the heavens above or earth beneath, in mountains and trees, in animals and men; or, on the contrary, as being incapable of being represented by any finite image whatsoever; and, again, as the God of a family, of a nation, or of humanity" (E. Caird, Evolution of Religion, I, 62). Attempts have therefore been made to find a new kind of definition, such as would include under one category all the ideas of God possessed by the human race. A typical instance of this kind of definition is that of Professor W. Adams Brown: "A god in the religious sense is an unseen being, real or supposed, to whom an individual or a social group is united by voluntary ties of reverence and service" (Christian Theology in Outline, 30). Many similar definitions are given: "A supersensible being or beings" (Lotze, A. M. Fairbairn); "a higher power" (Allan Menzies); "spiritual beings" (E. B. Tylor); "a power not ourselves making for righteousness" (Matthew Arnold). This class of definition suffers from a twofold defect. It says too much to include the ideas of the lower religions, and too little to suggest those of the higher. It is not all gods that are "unseen" or "supersensible," or "making for righteousness," but all these qualities may be shared by other beings than gods, and they do not connote that which is essential in the higher ideas of God. Dr. E. Caird, looking for a definition in a germinative principle of the genesis of religion, defines God "as the unity which is presupposed in the difference of the self and not-self, and within which they act and re-act on each other" (op. cit., I, 40, 64). This principle admittedly finds its full realization only in the highest religion, and it may be doubted whether it does justice to the transcendent personality and the love of God as revealed in Jesus Christ. In the lower religions it appears only in fragmentary forms, and it can only be detected in them at all after it has been revealed in the absolute religion. Although this definition may be neither adequate nor true, its method recognizes that there can be only one true idea and definition of God, and yet that all other ideas are more or less true elements of it and approximations to it. The Bib. idea does not stand alone like an island in mid-ocean, but is rather the center of light which radiates out in other religions with varying degrees of purity.

It is not the purpose of this article to deal with the problem of the philosophy of religion, but to give an account of the idea of God at certain stages of its development, and within a limited area of thought. The absence of a final definition will present no practical difficulty, because the denotation of the term God is clear enough; it includes everything that is or has been an object of worship; it is its connotation that remains a problem for speculation.

A third class of definition demands some attention, because it raises a new question, that of the knowledge or truth of any idea whatsoever. Herbert Spencer's definition may be taken as representative: God is the unknown and unknowable cause of the universe, "an inscrutable power manifested to us through all phenomena" (First Principles, V, 31). This means that there can be no definition of the idea of God, because we can have no idea of Him, no knowledge "in the strict sense of knowing." For the present purpose it might suffice for an answer that ideas of God actually exist; that they can be defined and are more definable, because fuller and more complex, the higher they rise in the scale of religions; that they can be gathered from the folklore and traditions of the lower races, and from the sacred books and creeds of the higher religions. But Spencer's view means that, in so far as the ideas are definable, they are not true. The more we define, the more fictitious becomes our subject-matter. While nothing is more certain than that God exists, His being is to human thought utterly mysterious and inscrutable. The variety of ideas might seem to support this view. But variety of ideas has been held of every subject that is known, as witness the progress of science. The variety proves nothing.

And the complete abstraction of thought from existence cannot be maintained. Spencer himself does not succeed in doing it. He says a great many things about the "unknowable" which implies an extensive knowledge of Him. The traditional proofs of the "existence" of God have misled the Agnostics. But existence is meaningless except for thought, and a noumenon or first cause that lies hidden in impenetrable mystery behind phenomena cannot be conceived even as a fiction. Spencer's idea of the Infinite and Absolute are contradictory and unthinkable. An Infinite that stood outside all that is known would not be infinite, and an Absolute out of all relation could not even be imagined. If there is any truth at all in the idea of the Absolute, it must be true to human experience and thought; and the true Infinite must include within itself every possible and actual perfection. In truth, every idea of God that has lived in religion refutes Agnosticism, because they all qualify and interpret experience, and the only question is as to the degree of their adequacy and truth.

A brief enumeration of the leading ideas of God that have lived in religion will serve to place the Bib. idea in its true perspective.

4. Ethnic Ideas of God

(1) Animism is the name of a theory which explains the lowest (and perhaps the earliest) forms of religion, and also the principle of all religion, as the belief in the universal presence of spiritual beings which "are held to affect or control the events of the material world, and man's life here and hereafter; and, it being considered that they hold intercourse with men, and receive pleasure or displeasure from human actions, the belief in their existence leads naturally, and, it might almost be said, inevitably, sooner or later, to active reverence and propitiation" (E. B. Tylor, Primitive Culture, I, 426-27). According to this view, the world is full of disembodied spirits, regarded as similar to man's soul, and any or all of these may be treated as gods.

(2) Fetichism is sometimes used in a general sense for "the view that the fruits of the earth and things in general are divine, or animated by powerful spirits" (J. G. Fraser, Adonis, Attis, Osiris, 234); or it may be used in a more particular sense of the belief that spirits "take up their abode, either temporarily or permanently, in some object, . . . and this object, as endowed with higher power, is then worshipped" (Tiele, Outlines of the History of Religion, 9).

(3) Idolatry is a term of still more definite significance. It means that the object is at least selected, as being the permanent habitation or symbol of the deity; and, generally, it is marked by some degree of human workmanship, designed to enable it the more adequately to represent the deity. It is not to be supposed that men ever worship mere "stocks and stones," but they address their worship to objects, whether fetiches or idols, as being the abodes or images of their god. It is a natural and common idea that the spirit has a form similar to the visible object in which it dwells. Paul reflected the heathen idea accurately when he said, "We ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and device of man" (Acts 17:29).

(4) Polytheism.—The belief in many gods, and the worship of them, is an attitude of soul compatible with Animism, Fetichism and Idolatry, or it may be independent of them all. The term Polytheism is more usually employed to designate the worship of a limited number of well-defined deities, whether regarded as pure disembodied spirits, or as residing in the greater objects of Nature, such as planets or mountains, or as symbolized by images "graven by art and device of man." In ancient Greece or modern India the great gods are well defined, named and numerable, and it is clearly understood that, though they may be symbolized by images, they dwell apart in a spiritual realm above the rest of the world.

(5) Henotheism.—There is, however, a tendency, both in individuals and in communities, even where many gods are believed to exist, to set one god above the others, and consequently to confine worship to that god alone. "The monotheistic tendency exists among all peoples, after they have reached a certain level of culture. There is a difference in the degree in which this tendency is emphasized, but whether we turn to Babylonian, Egypt, India, China, or Greece, there are distinct traces of a trend toward concentrating the varied manifestations of Divine powers in a single source" (Jastrow, The Study of Religion, 76). This attitude of mind has been called Henotheism or Monolatry—the worship of one God combined with the belief in the existence of many. This tendency may be governed by metaphysical, or by ethical and personal motives, either by the monistic demands of reason, or by personal attachment to one political or moral rule.

(6) Pantheism.—Where the former principle predominates, Polytheism merges into Pantheism, as is the case in India, where Brahma is not only the supreme, but the sole, being, and all other gods are but forms of his manifestation. But, in India, the vanquished gods have had a very complete revenge upon their vanquisher, for Brahma has become so abstract and remote that worship is mainly given to the other gods, who are forms of his manifestation. Monolatry has been reversed, and modern Hinduism were better described as the belief in one God accompanied by the worship of many.

(7) Deism.—The monistic tendency, by a less thorough application of it, may take the opposite turn toward Deism, and yet produce similar religious conditions. The Supreme Being, who is the ultimate reality and power of the universe, may be conceived in so vague and abstract a manner, may be so remote from the world, that it becomes a practical necessity to interpose between Him and men a number of subordinate and nearer beings as objects of worship. In ancient Greece, Necessity, in China, Tien or Heaven, were the Supreme Beings; but a multiplicity of lower gods were the actual objects of worship. The angels of Zoroastrianism, Judaism and Islam and the saints of Romanism illustrate the same tendency. Pantheism and Deism, though they have had considerable vogue as philosophical theories, have proved unstable and impossible as religions, for they have invariably reverted to some kind of polytheism and idolatry, which seems to indicate that they are false processes of the monistic tendency.

(8) Semitic monolatry.—The monistic tendency of reason may enlist in its aid many minor causes, such as tribal isolation or national aggrandizement. It is held that many Sem tribes were monolatrists for either or both of these reasons; but the exigencies of intertribal relations in war and commerce soon neutralized their effects, and merged the tribal gods into a territorial pantheon.

(9) Monotheism, ethical and personal: One further principle may combine with Monism so as to bring about a stable Monotheism, that is the conception of God as standing in moral relations with man. Whenever man reflects upon conduct as moral, he recognizes that there can be only one moral standard and authority, and when God is identified with that moral authority, He inevitably comes to be recognized as supreme and unique. The belief in the existence of other beings called gods may survive for a while, but they are divested of all the attributes of deity when they are seen to be inferior or opposed to the God who rules in conscience. Not only are they not worshipped, but their worship by others comes to be regarded as immoral and wicked. The ethical factor in the monistic conception of God safeguards it from diverging into Pantheism or Deism and thus reverting into Polytheism. For the ethical idea of God necessarily involves His personality, His transcendence as distinct from the world and above it, and also His intimate and permanent relation with man. If He rules in conscience, He can neither be merged in dead nature or abstract being, nor be removed beyond the heavens and the angel host. A thoroughly moralized conception of God emerges first in the OT where it is the prevailing type of thought.

II. The Idea of God in the OT.—Any attempt to write the whole history of the idea of God in the OT would require a preliminary study of the literary and historical character of the documents, which lies beyond the scope of this article and the province of the writer. Yet the OT contains no systematic statement of the doctrine of God, or even a series of statements that need only to be collected into a consistent conception. The OT is the record of a rich and varied life, extending over more than a thousand years, and the ideas that ruled and inspired that life must be largely inferred from the deeds and institutions in which it was realized; nor was it stationary or all at one level. Nothing is more obvious than that revelation in the OT has been progressive, and that the idea of God it conveys has undergone a development. Certain well-marked stages of the development can be easily recognized, without entering upon any detailed criticism. There can be no serious question that the age of the Exodus, as centering around the personality of Moses, witnessed an important new departure in Heb religion. The most ancient traditions declare (perhaps not unanimously) that God was then first known to Israel under the personal name Jehovah (Yahweh [YHWH]) is the correct form of the word, Jehovah being composite of the consonants of Yahweh and the vowels of 'ādhōnāy, or lord. Jeh is retained here as the more familiar form). The Heb people came to regard Him as their Deliverer from Egypt, as their war god who assured them the conquest of Canaan, and He, therefore, became their king, who ruled over their destinies in their new heritage. But the settlement of Jeh in Canaan, like that of His people, was challenged by the native gods and their peoples. In the 9th cent. we see the war against Jeh carried into His own camp, and Baal-worship attempting to set itself up within Israel. His prophets therefore assert the sole right of Jeh to the worship of His people, and the great prophets of the 8th cent. base that right upon His moral transcendence. Thus they at once reveal new depths of His moral nature, and set His uniqueness and supremacy on higher grounds. During the exile and afterward, Israel's outlook broadens by contact with the greater world, and it draws out the logical implications of ethical monotheism into a theology at once more universalistic and abstract. Three fairly well-defined periods thus emerge, corresponding to three stages in the development of the OT idea of God: the pre-prophetic period governed by the Mosaic conception, the prophetic period during which ethical monotheism is firmly established, and the post-exilic period with the rise of abstract monotheism. But even in taking these large and obvious divisions, it is necessary to bear in mind the philosopher's maxim, that "things are not cut off with a hatchet." The most characteristic ideas of each period may be described within their period; but it should not be assumed that they are altogether absent from other periods; and, in particular, it should not be supposed that ideas, and the life they represent, did not exist before they emerged in the clear witness of history. Mosaism had undoubtedly its antecedents in the life of Israel; but any attempt to define them leads straight into a very morass of conjectures and hypotheses, archaeological, critical and philosophical; and any results that are thus obtained are contributions to comparative religion rather than to theology.

Religious experience must always have had an inward and subjective aspect, but it is a long and difficult process to translate the objective language of ordinary life for the uses of subjective experience. "Men look outward before they look inward." Hence we find that men express their consciousness of God in the earliest periods in language borrowed from the visible and objective world. It does not follow that they thought of God in a sensuous way, because they speak of Him in the language of the senses, which alone was available for them. On the other hand, thought is never entirely independent of language, and the degree in which men using sensuous language may think of spiritual facts varies with different persons.

(1) The face or countenance (pānīm) of God is a natural expression for His presence. The place where God is seen is called Peniel, the face of God (Gen 32 30). The face of Jeh is His people's blessing (Nu 6 25). With His face (RV "presence") He brought Israel out of Egypt, and His face (RV "presence") goes with them to Canaan (Ex 33 14). To be alienated from God is to be hid from His face (Gen 4 14), or God hides His face (Dt 31 17, 18; 32 20). In contrast with this idea it is said elsewhere that man cannot see the face of God and live (Ex 33 20; cf Dt 5 24; Jgs 6 22; 13 22). In these later passages, "face" stands for the entire being of God, as distinguished from what man may know of Him. This phrase and its cognates enshrine also that fear of God, which shrinks from His majesty even while approaching Him, which enters into all worship.

(2) The voice (kōl) and word (dābhār) of God are forms under which His communion with man is conceived from the earliest days to the latest. The idea ranges from that of inarticulate utterance

(1 K 19 12) to the declaration of the entire law of conduct (Dt 5 22-24), to the message of the prophet (Isa 2 1; Jer 1 2), and the personification of the whole counsel and action of God (Ps 105 19; 147 18, 19; Hos 6 5; Isa 40 8).

(3) The glory (kābhōdh) of God is both a peculiar physical phenomenon and the manifestation of God in His works and providence. In certain passages in Ex, ascribed to the PC, the glory is a bright light, "like devouring fire" (24 17); it fills and consecrates the tabernacle (29 43; 40 34, 35); and it is reflected as beams of light in the face of Moses (34 29). In Ezk, it is a frequent term for the prophet's vision, a brightness like the appearance of a rainbow (1 28; 10 4; 43 2). In another place, it is identified with all the manifested goodness of God, and is accompanied with the proclamation of His name (Ex 33 17-23). Two passages in Isa seem to combine under this term the idea of a physical manifestation with that of God's effectual presence in the world (3 8; 6 3). God's presence in creation and history is often expressed in the Pss as His glory (19 1; 57 5, 11; 63 2; 97 6). Many scholars hold that the idea is found in Isa in its earliest form, and that the physical meaning is quite late. It would, however, be contrary to all analogy, if such phenomena as rainbow and lightning had not first impressed the primitive mind as manifestations of God. See GLORY.

(4) The angel (mal'āk) of God or of Jeh is a frequent mode of God's manifestation of Himself in human form, and for occasional purposes. It is a primitive conception, and its exact relation to God, or its likeness to man, is nowhere fixed. In many passages, it is assumed that God and His angel are the same being, and the names are used synonymously (as in Gen 16 7 ff; 22 15, 16; Ex 3 2, 4; Jgs 2 4, 5); in other passages the idea blurs into varying degrees of differentiation (Gen 18; 24 40; Ex 23 21; 33 2, 3; Jgs 13 8, 9). But everywhere, it fully represents God as speaking or acting for the time being; and it is to be distinguished from the subordinate and intermediate beings of later angelology. Its identification with the Messiah and the Logos is only true in the sense that these later terms are more definite expressions of the idea of revelation, which the angel represented for primitive thought.

(5) The spirit (rūḥ) of God in the earlier period is a form of His activity, as it moves warrior and prophet to act and to speak (Jgs 6 34; 13 25; 1 S 10 10), and it is in the prophetic period that it becomes the organ of the communication of God's thoughts to men. See HOLY SPIRIT.

(6) The name (shēm) of God is the most comprehensive and frequent expression in the OT for His self-manifestation, for His person as it may be known to men. The name is something visible or audible which represents God to men, and which, therefore, may be said to do His deeds, and to stand in His place, in relation to men. God reveals Himself by making known or proclaiming His name (Ex 6 3; 33 19; 34 5, 6). His servants derive their authority from His name (Ex 3 13, 15; 1 S 17 45). To worship God is to call upon His name (Gen 12 8; 13 4; 21 33; 26 25; 1 K 18 24-26), to fear it (Dt 28 58), to praise it (2 S 22 50; Ps 7 17; 64 6), to glorify it (Ps 86 9). It is wickedness to take God's name in vain (Ex 20 7), or to profane and blaspheme it (Lev 8 21; 24 16). God's dwelling-place is the place where He chooses "to cause his name to dwell" (2 S 7 13; 1 K 3 2; 5 3, 5; 8 16-19; 18 32; Dt 12 11, 21). God's name defends His people (Ps 20 1; Isa 30 27). For His name's sake He will not forsake them (1 S 12 22), and if they perish, His name cannot remain (Josh 7 9). God is known by different names, as expressing various forms of His self-manifestation (Gen 16 13; 17 1; Ex 3 6; 34 6). The name even confers its revelation-value upon the angel (Ex 23 20-23). All God's names are, therefore, significant for the revelation of His being.

(7) Occasional forms.—In addition to these more or less fixed forms, God also appears in a variety of exceptional or occasional forms. In Nu 12 6-8, it is said that Moses, unlike others, used to see the form ('mūnāh) of Jeh. Fire, smoke and cloud are frequent forms or symbols of God's presence (e.g. Gen 15 17; Ex 3 2-4; 19 18; 24 17), and notably "the pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night" (Ex 13 21f). According to later ideas, the cloud rested upon the tabernacle (Ex 40 34), and in it God appeared upon the ark (Lev 16 2). Extraordinary occurrences or miracles are, in the early period, frequent signs of the power of God (Ex 7 ff; 1 K 17 ff).

The questions of the objectivity of any or all of these forms, and of their relation to the whole Divine essence raise large problems. OT thought had advanced beyond the naive identification of God with natural phenomena, but we should not read into its figurative language the metaphysical distinctions of a Gr-Christian theology.

All the names of God were originally significant of His character, but the derivations, and therefore the original meanings, of several have been lost, and new meanings have been sought for them.

3. The Names of God

(1) Generic names.—One of the oldest and most widely distributed terms for Deity known to the human race is 'Ēl, with its derivations 'Ēlīm, 'Ēlōhīm and 'Ēlōh. Like theos, Deus and God, it is a generic term, including every member of the class deity. It may even denote a position of honor and authority among men. Moses was 'Ēlōhīm to Pharaoh (Ex 7 1) and to Aaron (Ex 4 16; cf Jgs 5 8; 1 S 2 25; Ex 21 5.6; 22 7 ff; Ps 58 11; 82 1). It is, therefore, a general term expressing majesty and authority, and it only came to be used as a proper name for Israel's God in the later period of abstract monotheism when the old proper name Jeh was held to be too sacred to be uttered. The meaning of the root 'Ēl, and the exact relation to it, and to one another, of 'Ēlōhīm and 'Ēlōh, lie in complete obscurity. By far the most frequent form used by OT writers is the pl. 'Ēlōhīm, but they use it regularly with sing. vbs. and adjs. to denote a singular idea. Several explanations have been offered of this usage of a pl. term to denote a sing. idea—that it expresses the fulness and manifoldness of the Divine nature, or that it is a pl. of majesty used in the manner of royal persons, or even that it is an early intimation of the Trinity; other cognate expressions are found in Gen 1 26; 3 22; 1 K 22 19 f; Isa 6 8. These theories are, perhaps, too ingenious to have occurred to the early Heb mind, and a more likely explanation is, that they are survivals in language of a polytheistic stage of thought. In the OT they signify only the general notion of Deity.

(2) Attributive names.—To distinguish the God of Israel as supreme from others of the class 'Ēlōhīm, certain qualifying appellations are often added. 'Ēl 'Elyōn designates the God of Israel as the highest, the most high, among the 'Ēlōhīm (Gen 14 18-20); so do Jeh 'Elyōn (Ps 7 17) and 'Elyōn alone, often in Pss and in Isa 14 14.

'Ēl Shaddāy, or Shaddāy alone, is a similar term which on the strength of some tradition is tr^d "God Almighty"; but its derivation and meaning are quite unknown. According to Ex 6 3 it was the usual name for God in patriarchal times, but other traditions in the Pent seem to have no knowledge of this.

Another way of designating God was by His relation to His worshippers, as God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (Gen 24 12; Ex 3 6), of Shem (Gen 9 26), of the Hebrews (Ex 3 18), and of Israel (Gen 33 20).

Other names used to express the power and majesty of God are cūr, "Rock" (Dt 32 18; Isa 30 29), 'abhīr (cstr fr 'abhīr), "the Strong One" (Gen 49 24; Isa 1 24; Ps 132 2); melekh, "King"; 'ādhōn, "lord," and 'ādhōnāy, "my lord" (Ex 23 17; Isa 10 16.33; Gen 18 27; Isa 6 1). Also ba'al, "proprietor" or "master," may be inferred as a designation once in use, from its appearance in such Heb proper names as Jerubbaal and Ishbaal. The last three names describe God as a Master to whom man stands in the relation of a servant, and they tended to fall into disuse as the necessity arose to differentiate the worship of Jeh from that of the gods of surrounding nations.

A term of uncertain meaning is Yahweh or 'Ēlōhīm ḥbhā'ōh, "Jeh" or "God of hosts." In Heb usage "host" might mean an army of men, or the stars and the angels—which, apart or in conjunction, made up the host of heaven. God of Hosts in early times meant the war god who led the armies of Israel (1 S 4 4; 2 S 7 8). In 1 S 17 45 this title stands in parallelism with "the God of the armies of Israel." So all Israel is called the host of Jeh (Ex 12 41). In the Prophets, where the term has become a regular appellation, it stands in relation to every form of the power and majesty, physical and moral, of God (e.g. Isa 2 12; 6 3.5; 10 23.33). It stands in parallelism with Isaiah's peculiar title, the Holy One of Israel (Isa 5 16.24). It has, therefore, been thought that it refers to the host of heaven. In the Prophets it is practically a proper name. Its original meaning may well have been forgotten or dropped, but it does not follow that a new special significance was attached to the word "hosts." The general meaning of the whole term is well expressed by the LXX tr, kūrios pantokrātōr, "Lord Omnipotent."

(3) Jehovah (Yahweh).—This is the personal proper name par excellence of Israel's God, even as Chemosh was that of the god of Moab, and Dagon that of the god of the Philis. The original meaning and derivation of the word are unknown. The variety of modern theories shows that, etymologically, several derivations are possible, but that the meanings attached to any one of them have to be imported and imposed upon the word. They add nothing to our knowledge. The Hebrews themselves connected the word with hāyāh, "to be." In Ex 3 14 Jeh is explained as equivalent to 'ehyeh, which is a short form of 'ehyeh 'āsher 'ehyeh, tr^d in RV "I am that I am." This has been supposed to mean "self-existence," and to represent God as the Absolute. Such an idea, however, would be a metaphysical abstraction, not only impossible to the time at which the name originated, but alien to the Heb mind at any time. And the imperfect 'ehyeh is more accurately tr^d "I will be what I will be," a Sem idiom meaning, "I will be all that is necessary as the occasion will arise," a familiar OT idea (cf Isa 7 4.9; Ps 23).

This name was in use from the earliest historical times till after the exile. It is found in the most ancient lit. According to Ex 3 13 f, and esp. 6 2.3, it was first introduced by Moses, and was the medium of a new revelation of the God of their fathers to the children of Israel. But in parts of Gen it is represented as being in use from the earliest times. Theories that derive it from Egypt or Assyria, or that would connect it etymologically with Jove or Zeus, are supported by no evidence. We have to be content either to say that Jeh was the tribal God of Israel from time immemorial, or to accept a theory that is practically identical with that of Ex—that it was adopted through Moses from the Midianite tribe into which he married. The Kenites, the tribe of Midianites related to Moses, dwelt in the neighborhood of Sinai, and attached themselves to Israel (Jgs 1 16; 4 11). A few passages suggest that Sinai was the original home of Jeh (Jgs 5 4.5; Dt 33 2). But there is no direct evidence bearing upon the origin of the worship of Jeh: to us He is known only as the God of Israel.

(1) Jeh alone was the God of Israel.—Heb theology consists essentially of the doctrine of Jeh and its implications. The teachers and leaders of the people at all times worship and enjoy the worship of Jeh alone.

4. Pre-prophetic Conceptions of Jeh "It stands out as a prominent and incontrovertible fact, that down to the reign of Ahab . . . no prominent man in Israel, with the doubtful exception of Solomon, known by name and held up for condemnation, worshipped any other god but Yahveh. In every national and tribal crisis, in all times of danger and of war, it is Yahveh and Yahveh alone who is invoked to give victory and deliverance" (Montefiore, Hibbert Lectures, 21). This is more evident in what is, without doubt, very early lit., even than in later writings (e.g. Jgs 5; Dt 33; 1 S 4-6). The isolation of the desert was more favorable to the integrity of Jeh's sole worship than the neighborhood of powerful peoples who worshipped many other gods. Yet that early religion of Jeh can be called monotheistic only in the light of the end it realized, for in the course of its development it had to overcome many limitations.

(a) The early worship of Jeh did not exclude belief in the existence of other gods. As other nations believed in the existence of Jeh (1 S 4 8; 2 K 17 27), so Israel did not doubt the reality of other gods (Jgs 11 24; Nu 21 29; Mic 4 5). This limitation involved two others: Jeh is the God of Israel only; with them alone He makes a COVENANT (q.v.) (Gen 15 18; Ex 6 4.5; 2 K 17 34.35), and their worship only He seeks (Dt 4 32-37; 32 9; Am 3 2). Therefore He works, and can be worshipped only within a certain geographical area. He may have been associated with His original home in Sinai long after the settlement in Canaan (Jgs 5 4; Dt 33 2; 1 K 19 8.9), but gradually His home and that of His people became identical (1 S 26 19; Hos 9 3; Isa 14 2.25). Even after the deportation of the ten tribes, Canaan remains Jeh's land (2 K 17 24-28). Early Israelites are, therefore, more properly described as Monolatrists or Henotheists than as Monotheists. It is characteristic of the religion of Israel (in contrast with, e.g. Gr thought) that it arrived at absolute Monotheism along the line of moral and religious experience, rather than that of rational inference. Even while they shared the common Sem belief in the reality of other gods, Jeh alone had for them "the value of God."

(b) It is necessary to distinguish between the teaching of the religious leaders and the belief and practice of the people generally. The presence of a higher religion never wholly excludes superstitious practices. The use of Teraphim (Gen 31 30; 1 S 19 13.16; Hos 3 4), Ephod (Jgs 18 17-20; 1 S 23 6.9; 30 7), Urim and Thummim (1 S 28 6; 14 40, LXX), for the purposes of magic and divination, to obtain oracles from Jeh, was quite common in Israel. Necromancy was practised early and late (1 S 28 7 ff; Isa 8 19; Dt 18 10.11). Sorcery and witchcraft were not unknown, but were condemned by the religious leaders (1 S 28 3). The burial places of ancestors were held in great veneration (Gen 35 20; 50 13; Josh 24 30).

But these facts do not prove that Heb religion was animistic and polytheistic, any more than similar phenomena in Christian lands would justify such an inference about Christianity.

(c) Yet the worship of Jeh maintained and developed its monotheistic principle only by overcoming several hostile tendencies. The Baal-worship of the Canaanites and the cults of other neighboring tribes proved a strong attraction to the mass of Israelites (Jgs 2 13; 3 7; 8 33; 10 10; 1 S 8 8; 12 10; 1 K 11 5.33; Hos 2 5.17; Ezk 20; Ex 20 5; 22 20; 34 16.17). Under the conditions of life in Canaan, the sole worship of Jeh was in danger of modification by three tendencies, coördination, assimilation and disintegration.

(i) When the people had settled down in peaceful relations with their neighbors, and began to have commercial and diplomatic transactions with them, it was inevitable that they should render their neighbor's gods some degree of reverence and worship. Courtesy and friendship demanded as much (cf 2 K 5 18). When Solomon had contracted many foreign alliances by marriage, he was also bound to admit foreign worship into Jerus (1 K 11 5). But Ahab was the first king who tried to set up the worship of Baal, side by side with that of Jeh, as the national religion (1 K 18 19). Elijah's stand and Jehu's revolution gave its death blow to Baal-worship and vindicated the sole right of Jeh to Israel's allegiance. The prophet was defending the old religion and Ahab was the innovator; but the conflict and its issue brought the monotheistic principle to a new and higher level. The supreme temptation and the choice transformed what had been a natural monolatry into a conscious and moral adherence to Jeh alone (1 K 18 21.39).

(ii) But to repudiate the name of Baal was not necessarily to be rid of the influence of Baal-worship. The ideas of the heathen religions survived in a more subtle way in the worship of Jeh Himself. The change from the nomad life of the desert to the agricultural conditions of Canaan involved some change in religion. Jeh, the God of flocks and wars, had to be recognized as the God of the vintage and the harvest. That this development occurred is manifest in the character of the great religious festivals. "Three times thou shalt keep a feast unto me in the year. The feast of unleavened bread shalt thou keep . . . and the feast of harvest, the first-fruits of thy labors, which thou sowest in the field: and the feast of ingathering, at the end of the year, when thou gatherest in thy labors out of the field" (Ex 23 14-16). The second and the third obviously, and the first probably, were agricultural feasts, which could have no meaning in the desert. Israel and Jeh together took possession of Canaan. To doubt that would be to admit the claims of the Baal-worship; but to assert it also involved some danger, because it was to assert certain similarities between Jeh and the Baalim. When those similarities were embodied in the national festivals, they loomed very large in the eyes and minds of the mass of the people (W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, 49-57). The danger was that Israel should regard Jeh, like the Baals of the country, as a Nature-god, and, by local necessity, a national god, who gave His people the produce of the land and protected them from their enemies, and in return received from them such gifts and sacrifices as corresponded to His nature. From the appearance in Israel, and among Jeh worshippers, of such names as Jerub-baal, Esh-baal (son of Saul) and Beeliada (son of David, 1 Ch 14 7), it has been inferred that Jeh was called Baal, and there is ample evidence that His worship was assimilated to that of the Canaanite Baalim. The bulls raised by Jeroboam (1 K 12 26 ff) were symbols of Jeh, and in Judah the Canaanite worship was imitated down to the time of Asa (1 K 14 22-24; 15 12.13). Against this tendency above all, the great prophets of the 8th cent. contended. Israel worshipped Jeh as if He were one of the Baalim, and Hosea calls it Baal-worship (Hos 2 8.12.13; cf Am 2 8; Isa 1 10-15).

(iii) And where Jeh was conceived as one of the Baalim or Masters of the land, He became, like them, subject to disintegration into a number of local deities. This was probably the gravamen of Jeroboam's sin in the eyes of the "Deuteronomic" historian. In setting up separate sanctuaries, he divided the worship, and, in effect, the godhead of Jeh. The localization and naturalization of Jeh, as well as His assimilation to the Baals, all went together, so that we read that even in Judah the number of gods was according to its cities (Jer 2 28; 11 13). The vindication of Jeh's moral supremacy and spiritual unity demanded, among other things, the unification of His worship in Jerus (2 K 23).

(d) In one respect the religion of Jeh successfully resisted the influence of the heathen cults. At no time was Jeh associated with a goddess. Although the corrupt sensual practices that formed a large part of heathen worship also entered into Israel's worship (see ASHERAH), it never penetrated so far as to modify in this respect the idea of Jeh.

(e) It is a difficult question how far human sacrifices at any time found place in the worship of Jeh. The outstanding instance is that of Jephthah's daughter, which, though not condemned, is certainly regarded as exceptional (Jgs 11 30-40). Perhaps it is rightly regarded as a unique "survival." Then the story of the sacrifice of Isaac, while reminiscent of an older practice, represents a more advanced view. Human sacrifice, though not demanded, is not abhorrent to Jeh (Gen 22). A further stage is represented where Ahaz' sacrifice of his son is condemned as an "abomination of the nations" (2 K 16 3). The sacrifice of children is emphatically condemned by the prophets as a late and foreign innovation which Jeh had not commanded (Jer 7 31; Ezk 16 20). Other cases, such as the execution of the chiefs of Shittim (Nu 25 4), and of Saul's sons "before Jeh" (2 S 21 9), and the harem or ban, by which whole communities were devoted to destruction (Jgs 21 10; 1 S 15), while they show a very inadequate idea of the sacredness of human life, are not sacrifices, nor were they demanded by Jeh's worship. They were survivals of savage customs connected with tribal unity, which the higher morality of Jeh's religion had not yet abolished.

(2) The nature and character of Jeh are manifested in His activities. The OT makes no statements about the essence of God; we are left to infer it from His action in Nature and history and from His dealing with man.

(a) In this period, His activity is predominantly martial. As Israel's Deliverer from Egypt, "Jeh is a man of war" (Ex 15 3). An ancient account of Israel's journey to Canaan is called "the book of the Wars of Jeh" (Nu 21 14). By conquest in war He gave His people their land (Jgs 5; 2 S 5 24; Dt 33 27). He is, therefore, more concerned with men and nations, with the moral, than with the physical world.

(b) Even His activity in Nature is first connected with His martial character. Earth, stars and rivers come to His battle (Jgs 5 4.20.21). The forces of Nature do the bidding of Israel's Deliverer from Egypt (Ex 8-10; 14 21). He causes sun and moon to stand while He delivers up the Amorites (Josh 10 12). Later, He employs the forces of Nature to chastise His people for infidelity and sin (2 S 24 15; 1 K 17 1). Amos declares that His moral rule extends to other nations and that it determines their destinies. In harmony with this idea, great catastrophes like the Deluge (Gen 7) and the overthrow of the Cities of the Plain (Gen 19) are ascribed to His moral will. In the same pragmatic manner the oldest creation narrative describes Him creating man, and as much of the world as He needed (Gen 2), but as yet the idea of a universal cause had not emerged, because the idea of a universe had not been formed. He acts as one of great, but limited, power and knowledge (Gen 11 5-8; 18 20). The more universal conception of Gen 1 belongs to the same stratum of thought as Second Isa. At every stage of the OT the metaphysical perfections of Jeh follow as an inference from His ethical preëminence.

(3) The most distinctive characteristic of Jeh, which finally rendered Him and His religion absolutely unique, was the moral factor. In saying that Jeh was a moral God, it is meant that He acted by free choice, in conformity with ends which He set to Himself, and which He also imposed upon His worshippers as their law of conduct.

(a) The most essential condition of a moral nature is found in His vivid personality, which at every stage of His self-revelation shines forth with an intensity that might be called aggressive. Divine personality and spirituality are never expressly asserted or defined in the OT; but nowhere in the history of religion are they more clearly asserted. The modes of their expression are, however, qualified by anthropomorphisms, by limitations, moral and physical. Jeh's jealousy (Ex 20 5; Dt 5 9; 6 15), His wrath and anger (Ex 32 10-12; Dt 7 4) and His inviolable holiness (Ex 19 21.22; 1 S 6 19; 2 S 6 7) appear sometimes to be irrational and immoral; but they are the assertion of His individual nature, of His self-consciousness as He distinguishes Himself from all else, in the moral language of the time, and are the conditions of His having any moral nature whatsoever. Likewise, He dwells in a place and moves from it (Jgs 5 5); men may see Him in visible form (Ex 24 10; Nu 12 8); He is always represented as having organs like those of the human body, arms, hands, feet, mouth, eyes and ears. By such sensuous and figurative language alone was it possible for a personal God to make Himself known to men.

(b) The content of Jeh's moral nature as revealed in the OT developed with the growth of moral ideas. Though His activity is most prominently martial, it is most permanently judicial, and is exercised through judges, priests and prophets. Tôrâh and mishpât, "law" and "judgment," from the time of Moses onward, stand, the one for a body of customs that should determine men's relations to one another, and the other for the decision of individual cases in accordance with those customs, and both were regarded as issuing from Jeh. The people came to Moses "to inquire of God" when they had a matter in dispute, and he "judged between a man and his neighbor, and made them know the statutes of God, and his laws" (Ex 18 15.16). The judges appear mostly as leaders in war; but it is clear, as their name indicates, that they also gave judgments as between the people (Jgs 3 10; 4 4; 10 2.3; 1 S 7 16). The earliest literary prophets assume the existence of a law which priest and prophet had neglected to administer rightly (Hos 4 6; 8 1.12; Am 2 4). This implied that Jeh was thought of as actuated and acting by a consistent moral principle, which He also imposed on His people. Their morality may have varied much at different periods, but there is no reason to doubt that the Decalogue, and the moral teaching it involved, emanated substantially from Moses. "He taught them that Yahveh, if a stern, and often wrathful, Deity, was also a God of justice and purity. Linking the moral life to the religious idea, he may have taught them too that murder and theft, adultery and false witness, were abhorred and forbidden by their God" (Montefiore, Hibbert Lectures, 49). The moral teaching of the OT effected the transition from the national and collective to the individual and personal relation with Jeh. The most fundamental defect of Heb morality was that its application was confined within Israel itself and did little to determine the relation of the Israelites to people of other nations; and this limitation was bound up with Henotheism, the idea that Jeh was God of Israel alone. "The consequence of this national conception of Jeh was that there was no religious and moral bond regulating the conduct of the Hebrews with men of other nations. Conduct which between fellow-Hebrews was offensive in Jeh's eyes was inoffensive when practised by a Hebrew toward one who was not a Hebrew (Dt 23 19f). . . . In the latter case they were governed purely by considerations of expediency. This ethical limitation is the real explanation of the 'spoiling of the Egyptians'" (Ex 11 23) (G. Buchanan Gray, The Divine Discipline of Israel, 46, 48).

The first line of advance in the teaching of the prophets was to expand and deepen the moral demands of Jeh. So they removed at once the ethical and the theological limitations of the earlier view. But they were conscious that they were only developing elements already latent in the character and law of Jeh.

Two conditions called forth and determined the message of the 8th-cent. prophets—the degradation of morality and religion at home and the growing danger to Israel and Judah from the all-victorious Assyrian. With one voice the prophets declare and condemn the moral and social iniquity of Israel and Judah (Hos 4 1; Am 4 1; Isa 1 21-23). The worship of Jeh had been assimilated to the heathen religions around (Am 2 8; Hos 3 1; Isa 30 22). A time of prosperity had produced luxury, license and an easy security, depending upon the external bonds and ceremonies of religion. In the threatening attitude of Assyria, the prophets see the complement of Israel's unfaithfulness and sin, this the cause and that the instruments of Jeh's anger (Isa 10 5,6).

5. The Idea of God in the Prophetic Period

(1) Righteousness.—These circumstances forced into first prominence the righteousness of Jeh. It was an original attribute that had appeared even in His most martial acts (Jgs 5 4; 1 S 12 7). But the prophet's interpretation of Israel's history revealed its content on a larger scale. Jeh was not like the gods of the heathen, bound to the purposes and fortunes of His people. Their relation was not a natural bond, but a covenant of grace which He freely bestowed upon them, and He demanded as its condition, loyalty to Himself and obedience to His law. Impending calamities were not, as the naturalistic conception implied, due to the impotence of Jeh against the Assyr gods (Isa 31 1), but the judgment of God, whereby He applied impartially to the conduct of His people a standard of righteousness, which He both had in Himself and declared in judgment upon them. The prophets did not at first so much transform the idea of righteousness, as assert its application as between the people and Jeh. But in doing that they also rejected the external views of its realization. It consists not in unlimited gifts or in the costliest oblations. "What doth Jeh require of thee, but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God?" (Mic 6 8). And it tends to become of universal application. Jeh will deal as a righteous judge with all nations, including Israel, and Israel as the covenant people bears the greater responsibility (Am 1-3). And a righteous judge that metes out even justice to all nations will deal similarly with individuals. The ministry of the prophets produced a vivid consciousness of the personal and individual relation of men to God. The prophets themselves were not members of a class, no order or school or profession, but men impelled by an inner and individual call of God, often against their inclination, to proclaim an unpopular message (Am 7 14,15; Isa 6; Jer 1 6-9; Ezk 3 14). Jeremiah and Ezekiel in terms denounced the old idea of collective responsibility (Jer 31 29 ff; Ezk 18). Thus in the prophets' application of the idea of righteousness to their time, two of the limitations adhering to the idea of God, at least in popular religion hitherto, were transcended. Jeh's rule is no longer limited to Israel, nor concerned only with the nation as a collective whole, but He deals impartially with every individual and nation alike. Other limitations also disappear. His anger and wrath, that once appeared irrational and unjust, now become the intensity of His righteousness. Nor is it merely forensic and retributive righteousness. It is rather a moral end, a chief good, which He may realize by loving-kindness and mercy and forgiveness as much as by punishment. Heb thought knows no opposition between God's righteousness and His goodness, between justice and mercy. The covenant of righteousness is like the relation of husband to wife, of father to child, one of loving-kindness and everlasting love (Hos 3 1; 11 4; Isa 1 18; 30 18; Mic 7 18; Isa 43 4; 54 8; Jer 31 3 ff,34; 9 24). The stirring events which showed Jeh's independence of Israel revealed the fulness of grace that was always latent in His relation to His people (Gen 33 11; 2 S 24 14). It was enshrined in the Decalogue (Ex 20 6), and proclaimed with incomparable grandeur in what may be the most ancient Mosaic tradition: "Jeh, Jeh, a God merciful and gracious, slow to anger and abundant in lovingkindness and truth; keeping lovingkindness for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin" (Ex 34 6,7).

(2) The holiness of Jeh in the Prophets came to have a meaning closely akin to His righteousness. As an idea more distinctly religious and more exclusively applied to God, it was subject to greater changes of meaning with the development or degradation of religion. It was applied to anything withdrawn from common use to the service of religion—utensils, places, seasons, animals and men. Originally it was so far from the moral meaning it now has that it was used of the "sacred" prostitutes who ministered to the licentiousness of Canaanitish worship (Dt 23 18). Whether or not the root-idea of the word was "separateness," there is no doubt that it is applied to Jeh in the OT to express his separateness from men and his sublimity above them. It was not always a moral quality in Jeh; for He might be unapproachable because of His mere power and terror (1 S 6 20; Isa 8 13). But in the Prophets, and esp. in Isa, it acquires a distinctly moral meaning. In his vision, Isaiah hears Jeh proclaimed as "holy, holy, holy," and he is filled with the sense of his own sin and of that of Israel (Isa 6; cf 1 4; Am 2 7). But even here the term conveys more than moral perfection. Jeh is already "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy" (Isa 57 15). It expresses the full Divinity of Jeh in His uniqueness and self-existence (1 S 2 2; Am 4 2; Hos 11 9). It would therefore seem to stand in antithesis to righteousness, as expressing those qualities of God, metaphysical and moral, by which He is distinguished and separated from men, while righteousness involves those moral activities and relations which man may share with God. But in the Prophets, God's entire being is moral and His whole activity is righteous. The meanings of the terms, though not identical, coincide; God's holiness is realized in righteousness. "God the Holy One is sanctified in righteousness" (Isa 5 16). So Isaiah's peculiar phrase, "the Holy One of Israel," brings God in His most exalted being into a relation of knowledge and moral reciprocity with Israel.

(3) The moralizing of righteousness and holiness universalized Deity.—From Amos downward Jeh's moral rule, and therefore His absolute power, were recognized as extending over all the nations surrounding Israel, and the great world-power of Assyria is but the rod of His anger and the instrument of His righteousness (Am 1-2; Isa 10 5; 13 5 ff; 19 1 ff). Idolatrous and polytheistic worship of all kinds are condemned. The full inference of Monotheism was only a gradual process, even with the prophets. It is not clear that the 8th-cent. prophets all denied the existence of other gods, though Isaiah's term for them, 'elilim ("things of nought," "no-gods"), points in that direction. At least the monotheistic process had set in. And Jeh's control over other nations was not exercised merely from Israel's point of view. The issue of the judgment upon the two great powers of Egypt and Assyria was to be their conversion to the religion of Jeh (Isa 19 24-25; cf 2 2-4 = Mic 4 1-3). Yet Heb universalism never went beyond the idea that all nations should find their share in Jeh through Israel (Zec 8 23). The nations from the ends of the earth shall come to Jeh and declare that their fathers' gods were "lies, even vanity and things wherein there is no profit" (Jer 16 19). It is stated categorically that "Jeh he is God in heaven above and upon the earth beneath; there is none else" (Dt 4 39).

(4) The unity of God was the leading idea of Josiah's reformation. Jerus was cleansed of every accretion of Baal-worship and of other heathen religions that had established themselves by the side of the worship of Jeh (2 K 23 4-8, 10-14). The semi-heathen worship of Jeh in many local shrines, which tended to disintegrate His unity, was swept away (2 K 23 8, 9). The reform was extended to the Northern Kingdom (2 K 23 15-20), so that Jerus should be the sole habitation of Jeh on earth, and His worship there alone should be the symbol of unity to the whole Heb race.

But the monotheistic doctrine is first fully and consciously stated in Second Isa. There is no God but Jeh: other gods are merely graven images, and their worshippers commit the absurdity of worshipping the work of their own hands (Isa 42 8; 44 8-20). Jeh manifests His deity in His absolute sovereignty of the world, both of Nature and history. The prophet had seen the rise and fall of Assyria, the coming of Cyrus, the deportation and return of Judah's exiles, as incidents in the training of Israel for her world-mission to be "a light of the Gentiles" and Jeh's "salvation unto the end of the earth" (42 1-7; 49 1-6). Israel's world-mission, and the ordering of historical movements to the grand final purpose of universal salvation (45 23), is the philosophy of history complementary to the doctrine of God's unity and universal sovereignty.

(5) Creator and Lord.—A further inference is that He is Creator and Lord of the physical universe. Israel's call and mission is from Jeh who "created the heavens, and stretched them forth; he that spread abroad the earth and that which cometh out of it; he that giveth breath unto the people upon it, and spirit to them that walk therein" (42 5; cf 40 12, 26; 44 24; 45 18; Gen 1). All the essential factors of Monotheism are here at last exhibited, not in abstract metaphysical terms, but as practical motives of religious life. His counsel and action are His own (Isa 40 13). Nothing is hid from Him; and the future like the past is known to Him (40 27; 42 9; 44 8; 48 6). Notwithstanding His special association with the temple in Jerus, He is "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity"; the heaven is His throne, and no house or place can contain Him (57 15; 66 1). No force of history or Nature can withstand His purpose (41 17-20; 42 13; 43 13). He is "the First and the Last," an "Everlasting God" (40 28; 41 4; 48 12). Nothing can be likened to Him or compared with Him (46 5). As the heavens are higher than the earth, so His thoughts and ways transcend those of men (55 8, 9). But anthropomorphic and anthropopathic expressions still abound. Eyes, mouth, ears, nostrils, hands, arms and face are His; He is a man of war (42 13; 63 1 ff); He cries like a travelling woman (42 14), and feeds His flock like a shepherd (40 11). Thus alone could the prophet express His full concrete Divinity.

(6) His compassion and love are expressed in a variety of ways that lead up directly to the NT doctrine of Divine Fatherhood. He folds Israel in His arms as a shepherd his lambs (40 11). Her scattered children are His sons and daughters whom He redeems and restores (43 5-7). In wrath for a moment He hides His face, but His mercy and kindness are everlasting (64 8). Greater than a mother's tenderness is Jeh's love for Israel (49 15; 66 13). "It would be easy to find in the prophet proof-texts for everything which theology asserts regarding God, with the exception perhaps that He is a spirit, by which is meant that He is a particular kind of substance" (A. B. Davidson in Skinner, Isa, II, xxix). But in truth the spirituality and personality of God are more adequately expressed in the living human language of the prophet than in the dead abstractions of metaphysics.

Monotheism appears in this period as established beyond question, and in the double sense that Jeh the God of Israel is one Being, and that beside Him there is no other God. God in He alone is God of all the earth, and Post-exilic all other beings stand at an infinite distance from Him (Ps 18 31; 24 1 ff; Judaism 115 3 ff). The generic name God is frequently applied to Him, and the tendency appears to avoid the particular and proper name Jeh (see esp. Pss 73-89; Job; Eccl).

(1) New conditions.—Nothing essentially new appears, but the teaching of the prophets is developed under new influences. And what then was enforced by the few has now become the creed of the many. The teaching of the prophets had been enforced by the experiences of the exile. Israel had been punished for her sins of idolatry, and the faithful among the exiles had learned that Jeh's rule extended over many lands and nations. The foreign influences had been more favorable to Monotheism. The gods of Canaan and even of Assyria and Babylonia had been overthrown, and their peoples had given place to the Persians, who, in the religion of Zarathushtra, had advanced nearer to a pure Monotheism than any gentile race had done; for although they posited two principles of being, the Good and the Evil, they worshipped only Ahura-Mazda, the Good. When Persia gave way to Greece, the more cultured Greek, the Greek who had ideas to disseminate, and who established schools at Antioch or Alexandria, was a pure Monotheist.

(2) Divine attributes.—Although we do not yet find anything like a dogmatic account of God's attributes, the larger outlook upon the universe and the deeper reflection upon man's individual experience have produced more comprehensive and far-reaching ideas of God's being and activity. (a) Faith rests upon His eternity and unchangeableness (Ps 90 1.2; 102 27). His omniscience and omnipresence are expressed with every possible fullness (Ps 139; Job 26 6). His almighty power is at once the confidence of piety, and the rebuke of blasphemy or frowardness (Ps 74 12-17; 104 et passim; Job 36; 37 et passim; Eccles 16 17 ff). (b) His most exalted and comprehensive attribute is His holiness; by it He swears as by Himself (Ps 89 35); it expresses His majesty (Ps 99 3.5.9) and His supreme power (Ps 60 6 ff). (c) His righteousness marks all His acts in relation to Israel and the nations around her (Ps 119 137-144; 129 4). (d) That both holiness and righteousness were conceived as moral qualities is reflected in the profound sense of sin which the pious knew (Ps 51) and revealed in the moral demands associated with them; truth, honesty and fidelity are the qualities of those who shall dwell in God's holy hill (Ps 15); purity, diligence, kindness, honesty, humility and wisdom are the marks of the righteous man (Prov 10-11). (e) In Job and Prov wisdom stands forth as the pre-eminent quality of the ideal man, combining in itself all moral and intellectual excellences, and wisdom comes from God (Prov 2 6); it is a quality of His nature (Prov 8 22) and a mode of His activity (Prov 3 19; Ps 104 24). In the Hellenistic circles of Alexandria, wisdom was transformed into a philosophical conception, which is at once the principle of God's self-revelation and of His creative activity. Philo identifies it with His master-conception, the Logos. "Both Logos and Wisdom mean for Him the reason and mind of God, His image impressed upon the universe, His agent of creation and providence, the mediator through which He communicates Himself to man and the world, and His law imposed upon both the moral and physical universe" (Mansfield Essays, 296). In Book of Wisd it is represented as proceeding from God, "a breath of the power of God, and a clear effulgence of the glory of the Almighty . . . an unspotted mirror of the working of God, and an image of his goodness" (7 25.26). In man, it is the author of knowledge, virtue and piety, and in the world it has been the guide and arbiter of its destiny from the beginning (chs 10-12). (f) But in the more purely Heb lit. of this period, the moral attribute of God that comes into greatest prominence is His beneficence. Goodness and mercy, faithfulness and loving-kindness, forgiveness and redemption are His willing gifts to Israel. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so Jeh pitieth them that fear him" (Ps 103 13; 145 8; 103 8; Eccles 2 11). To say that God is loving and like a father goes far on the way to the doctrine that He is Love and Father, but not the whole way; for as yet His mercy and grace are manifested only in individual acts, and they are not the natural and necessary outflow of His nature. All these ideas of God meant less for the Jewish than for the Christian mind, because they were yet held subject to several limitations.

(3) Survival of limitations.—(a) We have evidence of a changed attitude toward anthropomorphisms. God no longer walks on earth, or works under human limitation. Where His eyes or ears or face or hands are spoken of, they are clearly figurative expressions. His activities are universal and invisible, and He dwells on high forevermore. Yet anthropomorphic limitations are not wholly overcome. The idea that He sleeps, though not to be taken literally, implies a defect of His power (Ps 44 23).

(b) In the metaphysical attributes, the chief limitation was the idea that God's dwelling-place on earth was on Mt. Zion in Jerus. He was no longer confined within Pal; His throne is in heaven (Ps 11 4; 103 19), and His glory above the heavens (113 4); but

"In Judah is God known:
His name is great in Israel.
In Salem also is his tabernacle,
And his dwelling-place in Zion."
(Ps 76 1.2; 110 2; cf Eccles 24 8 ff).

That these are no figures of speech is manifested in the yearning of the pious for the temple, and their despair in separation from it (Pss 42, 43; cf 123).

(c) This involved a moral limitation, the sense of God's favoritism toward Israel, which sometimes developed into an easy self-righteousness that had no moral basis. God's action in the world was determined by His favor toward Israel, and His loving acts were confined within the bounds of a narrow nationalism. Other nations are wicked and sinners, adversaries and oppressors, upon whom God is called to execute savage vengeance (Ps 109; 137 7-9). Yet Israel did not wholly forget that it was the servant of Jeh to proclaim His name among the nations (Ps 96 2.3; 117). Jeh is good to all, and His tender mercies are over all His works (Ps 145 9; Eccles 18 13; cf Ps 104 14; Zec 14 16, and the Book of Jonah, which is a rebuke to Jewish particularism).

(d) God's holiness in the hands of the priests tended to become a material and formal quality, which fulfilled itself in established ceremonial, and His righteousness in the hands of the scribes tended to become an external law whose demands were satisfied by a mechanical obedience of works. This external conception of righteousness reacted upon the conception of God's government of the world. From the earliest times the Heb mind had associated suffering with the punishment of sin, and blessedness with the reward of virtue. In the post-exilic age the relation came to be thought of as one of strict correspondence between righteousness and reward and between sin and punishment. Righteousness, both in man and God, was not so much a moral state as a measurable sum of acts, in the one case, of obedience, and in the other, of reward or retribution. Conversely, every calamity and evil that befell men came to be regarded as the direct and equivalent penalty of a sin they had committed. The Book of Job is a somewhat inconclusive protest against this prevalent view.

These were the tendencies that ultimately matured into the narrow externalism of the scribes and Pharisees of Our Lord's time, which had substituted for the personal knowledge and service of God a system of mechanical acts of worship and conduct.

(4) Tendencies to abstractness.—Behind these defective ideas of God's attributes stood a more radical defect of the whole religious conception. The purification of the religion of Israel from Polytheism and idolatry, the affirmation of the unity of God and of His spirituality, required His complete separation from the manifoldness of visible existence. It was the only way, until the more adequate idea of a personal or spiritual unity, that embraced the manifold in itself, was developed. But it was an unstable conception, which tended on the one hand to empty the unity of all reality, and on the other to replace it by a new multiplicity which was not a unity. Both tendencies appear in post-exilic Judaism.

(a) The first effect of distinguishing too sharply between God and all created being was to set Him above and apart from all the world. This tendency had already appeared in Ezk, whose visions were rather symbols of God's presence than actual experiences of God. In Dnl even the visions appear only in dreams. The growth of the Canon of sacred lit. as the final record of the law of God, and the rise of the scribes as its professional interpreters, signified that God need not, and would not, speak face to face with man again; and the stricter organization of the priesthood and its sacrificial acts in Jerus tended to shut men generally out from access to God, and to reduce worship into a mechanical performance. A symptom of this fact was the disuse of the personal name Jeh and the substitution for it of more general and abstract terms like God and Lord.

(b) Not only an exaggerated awe, but also an element of skepticism, entered into the disuse of the proper name, a sense of the inadequacy of any name. In the Wisdom literature, God's incomprehensibility and remoteness appear for the first time as a conscious search after Him and a difficulty to find Him (Job 16 18-21; 23 3.8.9; Prov 30 2-4). Even the doctrine of immortality developed with the sense of God's present remoteness and the hope of His future nearness (Ps 17 15; Job 19 25). But Jewish theology was no cold Epicureanism or rationalistic Deism. Men's religious experiences apprehended God more intimately than their theology professed.

(c) By a "happy inconsistency" (Montefiore) they affirmed His immanence both in Nature (Ps 104; Wisd 8 1; 12 1.2) and in man's inner experience (Prov 15 3.11; 1 Ch 28 9; 29 17.18). Yet that transcendence was the dominating thought is manifest, most of all, in the formulation of a number of mediating conceptions, which, while they connected God and the world, also revealed the gulf that separated them.

(5) Logos, memra (mēm'rā) and angels.—This process of abstraction had gone farthest in Alexandria, where Jewish thought had so far assimilated Platonic philosophy, that Philo and Wisd conceive God as pure being who could not Himself come into any contact with the material and created world. His action and revelation are therefore mediated by His Powers, His Logos and His Wisdom, which, as personified or hypostatized attributes, become His vicegerents on earth. But in Pal, too, many mediating agencies grew up between God and man. The memra, or word of God, was not unlike Philo's Logos. The deified law partly corresponded to Alexandrian Wisdom. The Messiah had already appeared in the Prophets, and now in some circles He was expected as the mediator of God's special favor to Israel. The most important and significant innovation in this connection was the doctrine of angels. It was not entirely new, and Bab and Pers influences may have contributed to its development; but its chief cause lay in the general scheme of thought. Angels became intermediaries of revelation (Zec 1 9.12.19; 3 1 ff), the instruments of God's help (Dnl 3 28; 2 Macc 11 6), and of His punishment (Apoc Bar 21 23). The ancient gods of the nations became their patron angels (Dnl 10 13-20); but Israel's hatred of their gentile enemies often led to their transforming the latter's deities into demons. Incidentally a temporary solution of the problem of evil was thus found, by shifting all responsibility for evil from Jeh to the demons. The unity and supremacy of God were maintained by the doubtful method of delegating His manifold, and esp. His contradictory, activities to subordinate and partially to hostile spirits, which involved a new Polytheism. The problem of the One and the Many in ultimate reality cannot be solved by merely separating them. Heb Monotheism was unstable; it maintained its own truth even partially by affirming contradictories, and it contained in itself the demand for a further development. The few pluralistic phrases in the OT (as Gen 1 26; 3 22; 11 7; Isa 6 8, and 'Ēlōhīm) are not adumbrations of the Trinity, but only philological survivals. But the Messianic hope was an open confession of the incompleteness of the OT revelation of God.

III. The Idea of God in the NT.—The whole of the NT presupposes and rests upon the OT. Jesus Christ and His disciples inherited the

1. Depend- idea of God revealed in the OT, as it ence on OT survived in the purer strata of Jewish religion. So much was it to them and their contemporaries a matter of course, that it never occurred to them to proclaim or enforce the idea of God. Nor did they consciously feel the need of amending or changing it. They sought to correct some fallacious deductions made by later Judaism, and, unconsciously, they dropped the cruder anthropomorphisms and limitations of the OT idea. But their point of departure was always the higher teaching of the prophets and Ps, and their conscious endeavor in presenting God to men was to fulfil the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5 17). All the worthier ideas concerning God evolved in the OT reappear in the NT. He is One, supreme, living, personal and spiritual, holy, righteous and merciful. His power and knowledge are all-sufficient, and He is not limited in time or place. Nor can it be said that any distinctly new attributes are ascribed to God in the NT. Yet there is a difference. The conception and all its factors are placed in a new relation to man and the universe, whereby their meaning is transformed, enhanced and enriched. The last trace of particularism, with its tendency to Polytheism, disappears. God can no longer bear a proper name to associate Him with Israel, or to distinguish Him from other gods, for He is the God of all the earth, who is no respecter of persons or nations. Two new elements entered men's religious thought and gradually lifted its whole content to a new plane—Jesus Christ's experience and manifestation of the Divine Fatherhood, and the growing conviction of the church that Christ Himself was God and the full and final revelation of God.

Gr thought may also have influenced NT thought, but in a comparatively insignificant and subordinate way.

2. Gentile Its content was not taken over bodily as was that of Heb thought, and it did not influence the fountain head of NT ideas.
Influence It did not color the mind and teaching of Jesus Christ. It affected the form rather than matter of NT teaching. It appears in the clear-cut distinction between flesh and spirit, mind and body, which emerges in Paul's Epp., and so it helped to define more accurately the spirituality of God. The idea of the Logos in John, and the kindred idea of Christ as the image of God in Paul and He, owe something to the influence of the Platonic and Stoic schools. As this is the constructive concept employed in the NT to define the religious significance of Christ and His essential relation to God, it modifies the idea of God itself, by introducing a distinction within the unity into its innermost meaning.

Philosophy never appears in the NT on its own account, but only as subservient to Christian experience. In the NT as in the OT, the existence of God is taken for granted as the universal basis of all life and thought. Only in three passages of the NT Paul's, addressed to heathen audiences, do we find anything approaching a natural theology, and these are concerned rather with defining the nature of God, than with proving His existence. When the people of Lystra would have worshipped Paul and Barnabas as heathen gods, the apostle protests that God is not like men, and bases His majesty upon His creatorship of all things (Acts 14 15). He urges the same argument at Athens, and appeals for its confirmation to the evidences of man's need of God which he had found in Athens itself (Acts 17 23-31). The same natural witness of the soul, face to face with the universe, is again in Rom made the ground of universal responsibility to God (1 18-21). No formal proof of God's existence is offered in the NT. Nor are the metaphysical attributes of God, His infinity, omnipotence and omniscience, as defined in systematic theology, at all set forth in the NT. The ground for these deductions is provided in the religious experience that finds God in Christ all-sufficient.

The fundamental and central idea about God in NT teaching is His Fatherhood, and it determines all that follows. In some sense the

4. Divine idea was not unknown to heathen Fatherhood religions. Greeks and Romans acknowledged Father Zeus or Jupiter as the creator and preserver of Nature, and as standing in some special relation to men. In the OT the idea appears frequently, and has a richer content. Not only is God the creator and preserver of Israel, but He deals with her as a father with his child. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so Jeh pitieth them that fear Him" (Ps 103 13; cf Dt 1 31; 32 6; Jer 3 4.19; 31 20; Isa 63 16; Hos 11 1; Mal 3 17). Even His chastisements are "as a man chasteneth his son" (Dt 8 5; Isa 64 8). The same idea is expressed under the figure of a mother's tender care (Isa 49 15; 66 13; Ps 27 10), and it is embedded in the covenant relation. But in the OT the idea does not occupy the central and determinative position it has in NT, and it is always limited to Israel.

(1) In the teaching of Jesus Christ—God is pre-eminently the Father. It is his customary term for the Supreme Being, and it is noteworthy that Jesus' usage has never been quite naturalized. We still say "God" where Jesus would have said "the Father." He meant that the essential nature of God, and His relation to men, is best expressed by the attitude and relation of a father to his children; but God is Father in an infinitely higher and more perfect degree than any man. He is "good" and "perfect," the heavenly Father, in contrast with men, who, even as fathers, are evil (Mt 5 48; 7 11). What in them is an ideal imperfectly and intermittently realized, is in Him completely fulfilled. Christ thought not of the physical relation of origin and derivation, but of the personal relation of love and care which a father bestows upon his children. The former relation is indeed implied, for the Father is ever working in the world (Jn 5 17), and all things lie in His power (Lk 22 42). By His preserving power, the least as well as the greatest creature lives (Mt 6 26; 10 29). But it is not the fact of God's creative, preserving and governing power, so much as the manner of it, that Christ emphasizes. He is absolutely good in all His actions and relations (Mt 7 11; Mk 10 18). To Him men and beasts turn for all they need, and in Him they find safety, rest and peace (Mt 6 26.32; 7 11). His goodness goes forth spontaneously and alights upon all living things, even upon the unjust and His enemies (Mt 5 45). He rewards the obedient (Mt 6 1; 7 21), forgives the disobedient (Mt 6 14; cf 18 35) and restores the prodigal (Lk 15 11 ff). "Fatherhood is love, original and undervied, anticipating and undeserved, forgiving and educating, communicating and drawing to his heart" (Beyschlag, NT Theol., I, 82). To the Father, therefore, should men pray for all good things (Mt 6 9), and He is the ideal of all perfection, to which they should seek to attain (Mt 5 48). Such is the general character of God as expressed in His Fatherhood, but it is realized in different ways by those who stand to Him in different relations.

(a) Jesus Christ knows the Father as no one else does, and is related to Him in a unique manner. The idea is central in His teaching, because the fact is fundamental in His experience. On His first personal appearance in history He declares that He must be about His Father's business (Lk 2 49), and at the last He commends His spirit into His Father's hands. Throughout His life, His filial consciousness is perfect and unbroken. "I and the Father are one" (Jn 10 30). As He knows the Father, so the Father knows and acknowledges Him. At the opening of His ministry, and again at its climax in the transfiguration, the Father bears witness to His perfect sonship (Mk 1 11; 9 7). It was a relation of mutual love and confidence, unalloyed and infinite. "The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand" (Jn 3 35; 5 20). The Father sent the Son into the world, and intrusted Him with his message and power (Mt 11 27). He gave Him those who believed in Him, to receive His word (Jn 6 37.44.45; 17 6.8). He does the works and speaks the words of the Father who sent Him (Jn 5 36; 8 18.29; 14 24). His dependence upon the Father, and His trust in Him are equally complete (Jn 11 41; 12 27 f; 17). In this perfect union of Christ with God, unclouded by sin, unbroken by infidelity, God first became for a human life on earth all that He could and would become. Christ's filial consciousness was in fact and experience the full and final revelation of God. "No one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him" (Mt 11 27). Not only can we see in Christ what perfect sonship is, but in His filial consciousness the Father Himself is so completely reflected that we may know the perfect Father also. "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father" (Jn 14 9; cf 8 19). Nay, it is more than a reflection: so completely is the mind and will of Christ identified with that of the Father, that they interpenetrate, and the words and works of the Father shine out through Christ. "The words that I say unto you I speak not from myself: but the Father abiding in me doeth his works. Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me" (Jn 14 10.11). As the Father, so is the Son, for men to honor or to hate (5 23; 15 23). In the last day, when He comes to execute the judgment which the Father has intrusted to Him, He shall come in the glory of the Father (Mt 16 27; Mk 8 38; Lk 9 26). In all this Jesus is aware that His relation to the Father is unique. What in Him is original and realized, in others can only be an ideal to be gradually realized by His communication. "I am the way, and the truth, and the life: no one cometh unto the Father, but by me" (Jn 14 6). He is, therefore, rightly called the "only begotten son" (3 16), and His contemporaries believed that He made Himself equal to God (5 18).

(b) Through Christ, His disciples and hearers, too, may know God as their Father. He speaks of "your Father," "your heavenly Father." To them as individuals, it means a personal relation; He is "thy Father" (Mt 6 4.18). Their whole conduct should be determined by the consciousness of the Father's intimate presence (6 1.4). To do His will is the ideal of life (7 21; 12 50). More explicitly, it is to act as He does, to love and forgive as He loves and forgives (5 45); and, finally, to be perfect as He is perfect (5 48). Thus do men become sons of their Father who is in heaven. Their peace and safety lay in their knowledge of His constant and all-sufficient care (6 26.32). The ultimate goal of men's relation to Christ is that through Him they should come to a relation with the Father like His relation both to the Father and to them, wherein Father, Son, and believers form a social unity (Jn 14 21; 17 23; cf ver 21).

(c) While God's fatherhood is thus realized and revealed, originally and fully in Christ, derivatively and partially in believers, it also has significance for all men. Every man is born a child of God and heir of His kingdom (Lk 18 16). During childhood, all men are objects of His fatherly love and care (Mt 18 10), and it is not His will that one of them should perish (18 14). Even if they become His enemies, He still bestows His beneficence upon the evil and the unjust (Mt 5 44.45; Lk 6 35). The prodigal son may become unworthy to be called a son, but the father always remains a father. Men may become so far unfaithful that in them the fatherhood is no longer manifest and that their inner spirits own not God, but the devil, as their father (Jn 8 42-44). So their filial relation to God may be broken, but His nature and attitude are not changed. He is the Father absolutely, and as Father is He perfect (Mt 5 48). The essential and universal Divine Fatherhood finds its eternal and continual object in the only begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father. As a relation with men, it is qualified by their attitude to God; while some by faithlessness make it of no avail, others by obedience become in the reality of their experience sons of their Father in heaven. See CHILDREN OF GOD.

(2) In the apostolic teaching, although the Fatherhood of God is not so prominently or so abundantly exhibited as it was by Jesus Christ, it lies at the root of the whole system of salvation there presented. Paul's central doctrine of justification by faith is but the scholastic form of the parable of the Prodigal Son. John's one idea, that God is love, is but an abstract statement of His fatherhood. In complete accord with Christ's teaching, that only through Himself men know the Father and come to Him, the whole apostolic system of grace is mediated through Christ the Son of God, sent because "God so loved the world" (Jn 3 16), that through His death men might be reconciled to God (Rom 5 10; 8 3). He speaks to men through the Son who is the effulgence of His glory, and the very image of His substance (He 1 2.3). The central position assigned to Christ involves the central position of the Fatherhood.

As in the teaching of Jesus, so in that of the apostles, we distinguish three different relationships in which the fatherhood is realized in varying degrees: (a) Primarily He is the God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ (Rom 15 6; 2 Cor 1 3). As such He is the source of every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places in Christ (Eph 1 3). Through Christ we have access unto the Father (Eph 2 18). (b) He is, therefore, God our Father (Rom 1 7; 1 Cor 1 3). Believers are sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus (Gal 3 26). "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God" (Rom 8 14). These receive the spirit of adoption whereby they cry, Abba, Father (Rom 8 15; Gal 4 6). The figure of adoption has sometimes been understood as implying the denial of man's natural sonship and God's essential Fatherhood, but that would be pressing the figure beyond Paul's purpose. (c) The apostles' teaching, like Christ's, is that man in sin cannot possess the filial consciousness or know God as Father; but God, in His attitude to man, is always and essentially Father. In the sense of creaturehood and dependence, man in any condition is a son of God (Acts 17 28). And to speak of any other natural sonship which is not also morally realized is meaningless. From God's standpoint, man even in his sin is a possible son, in the personal and moral sense; and the whole process and power of his awakening to the realization of his sonship issues from the fatherly love of God, who sent His Son and gave the Spirit (Rom 5 5.8). He is "the Father" absolutely, "one God and Father of all, who is over all, and through all, and in all. But unto each one of us was the grace given according to the measure of the gift of Christ" (Eph 4 6.7).

After the Divine Fatherhood, the kingdom of God (Mk and Lk) or of heaven (Mt) is the next ruling conception in the teaching of 5. God is Jesus. As the doctrine of the Fatherhood sets forth the individual relation of men to God, that of the kingdom defines their collective and social condition, as determined by the rule of the Father.

(1) The kingdom of God.—Christ adopted and transformed the OT idea of Jeh's rule into an inner and spiritual principle of His gospel, without, however, quite detaching it from the external and apocalyptic thought of His time. He adopts the Jewish idea in so far as it involves the enforcing of God's rule; and in the immediate future He anticipates such a reorganization of social conditions in the manifestation of God's reign over men and Nature, as will ultimately amount to a regeneration of all things in accordance with the will of God (Mk 9 1; 13 30; Mt 16 28; 19 28). But He eliminated the particularism and favoritism toward the Jews, as well as the non-moral, easy optimism as to their destiny in the kingdom, which obtained in contemporary thought. The blessings of the kingdom are moral and spiritual in their nature, and the conditions of entrance into it are moral too (Mt 8 11; 21 31.43; 23 37.38; Lk 13 29). They are humility, hunger and thirst after righteousness, and the love of mercy, purity and peace (Mt 5 3-10; 18 1.3; cf Mt 20 26-28; 25 34; 7 21; Jn 3 3; Lk 17 20.21). The king of such a kingdom is, therefore, righteous, loving and gracious toward all men; He governs by the inner communion of spirit with spirit and by the loving coordination of the will of His subjects with his own will.

(2) Its king.—But who is the king? (a) Generally in Mk and Lk, and sometimes in Mt, it is called the kingdom of God. In several parables, the Father takes the place of king, and it is the Father that gives the kingdom (Lk 12 32). God the Father is therefore the King, and we are entitled to argue from Jesus' teaching concerning the kingdom to His idea of God. The will of God is the law of the kingdom, and the ideal of the kingdom is, therefore, the character of God. (b) But in some passages Christ reveals the consciousness of his own Kingship. He approves Peter's confession of his Messiahship, which involves Kingship (Mt 16 16). He speaks of a time in the immediate future when men shall see "the Son of man coming in his kingdom" (Mt 16 28). As judge of all men, He designates Himself king (Mt 25 34; Lk 19 38). He accepts the title king from Pilate (Mt 27 11.12; Mk 15 2; Lk 23 3; Jn 18 37), and claims a kingdom which is not of this world (Jn 18 36). His disciples look to Him for the restoration of the kingdom (Acts 1 6). His kingdom, like that of God, is inner, moral and spiritual. (c) But there can be only one moral kingdom, and only one supreme authority in the spiritual realm. The coordination of the two kingdoms must be found in their relation to the Fatherhood. The two ideas are not antithetical or even independent. They may have been separate and even opposed as Christ found them, but He used them as two points of apperception in the minds of His hearers, by which He communicated to them His one idea of God, as the Father who ruled a spiritual kingdom by love and righteousness, and ordered Nature and history to fulfil His purpose of grace. Men's prayer should be that the Father's kingdom may come (Mt 6 9.10). They enter the kingdom by doing the Father's will (Mt 7 21). It is their Father's good pleasure to give them the kingdom (Lk 12 32). The Fatherhood is primary, but it carries with it authority, government, law and order, care and provision, to set up and organize a kingdom reflecting a Father's love and expressing His will.

And as Christ is the revealer and mediator of the Fatherhood, He also is the messenger and bearer of the kingdom. In his person, preaching and works, the kingdom is present to men (Mt 4 17,23; 12 28), and as its king He claims men's allegiance and obedience (Mt 11 28,29). His sonship constitutes His relation to the kingdom. As son He obeys the Father, depends upon Him, represents Him to men, and is one with Him. And in virtue of this relation, He is the messenger of the kingdom and its principle, and at the same time He shares with the Father its authority and Kingship.

(3) Apostolic teaching.—In the apostolic writings, the emphasis upon the elements of kingship, authority, law and righteousness is greater than in the gospels. The kingdom is related to God (Gal 5 21; Col 4 11; 1 Thess 2 12; 2 Thess 1 5), and to Christ (Col 1 13; 2 Tim 4 1,18; 2 Pet 1 11), and to both together (Eph 5 5; cf 1 Cor 15 24). The phrase "the kingdom of the Son of his love" sums up the idea of the joint kingship, based upon the relation of Father and Son.

The nature and character of God are summed up in the twofold relation of Father and King in which He stands to men, and any abstract statements that may be made about Him, any attributes that may be ascribed to Him, are deductions from His royal Fatherhood.

(1) Personality.—That a father and king is a person needs not to be argued, and it is almost tautology to say that a person is a spirit. Christ relates directly the spirituality of God to His Fatherhood. "The true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth: for such doth the Father seek to be his worshippers. God is Spirit" (Jn 4 23,24 m). Figurative expressions denoting the same truth are the Johannine phrases, 'God is life' (1 Jn 5 20), and "God is light" (1 Jn 1 5).

(2) Love is the most characteristic attribute of Fatherhood. It is the abstract term that most fully expresses the concrete character of God as Father. In John's theology, it is used to sum up all God's perfections in one general formula. God is love, and where no love is, there can be no knowledge of God and no realization of Him (1 Jn 4 8,16). With one exception (Lk 11 42), the phrase "the love of God" appears in the teaching of Jesus only as it is represented in the Fourth Gospel. There it expresses the bond of union and communion, issuing from God, that holds together the whole spiritual society, God, Christ and believers (Jn 15 10; 14 21). Christ's mission was that of revelation, rather than of interpretation, and what in person and act He represents before men as the living Father, the apostles describe as almighty and universal love. They saw and realized this love first in the Son, and esp. in His sacrificial death. It is "the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom 8 39). "God commendeth his own love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom 5 8; cf Eph 2 4). Love was fully made known in Christ's death (1 Jn 3 16). The whole process of the incarnation and death of Christ was also a sacrifice of God's and the one supreme manifestation of His nature as love (1 Jn 4 9,10; cf Jn 3 16). The love of God is His fatherly relation to Christ extended to men through Christ. By the Father's love bestowed upon us, we are called children of God (1 Jn 3 1). Love is not only an emotion of tenderness and beneficence which bestows on men the greatest gifts, but a relation to God which constitutes their entire law of life. It imposes upon men the highest moral demands, and communicates to them the moral energy by which alone they can be met. It is law and grace combined. The love of God is perfected only in those who keep the word of Jesus Christ the Righteous (1 Jn 2 5). "For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments" (1 Jn 5 3). It is manifested esp. in brotherly love (1 Jn 4 12,20). It cannot dwell with worldliness (1 Jn 2 15) or callous selfishness (3 17). Man derives it from God as he is made the son of God, begotten of Him (4 7).

(3) Righteousness and holiness were familiar ideas to Jesus and His disciples, as elements in the Divine character. They were current in the thought of their time, and they stood foremost in the OT conception. They were therefore adopted in their entirety in the NT, but they stand in a different context. They are coördinated with, and even subordinated to, the idea of love. As kingship stands to fatherhood, so righteousness and holiness stand to love.

(a) Once we find the phrase "Holy Father" spoken by Jesus (Jn 17 11; cf 1 Pet 1 15,16). But generally the idea of holiness is associated with God in His activity through the Holy Spirit, which renews, enlightens, purifies and cleanses the lives of men. Every vestige of artificial, ceremonial, non-moral meaning disappears from the idea of holiness in the NT. The sense of separation remains only as separation from sin. So Christ as high priest is "holy, guileless, undefiled, separated from sinners" (He 7 26). Where it dwells, no uncleanness must be (1 Cor 6 19). Holiness is not a legal or abstract morality, but a life made pure and noble by the love of God shed abroad in men's hearts (Rom 5 5). "The kingdom of God is . . . righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" (Rom 14 17).

(b) Righteousness as a quality of character is practically identical with holiness in the NT. It is opposed to sin (Rom 6 13,20) and iniquity (2 Cor 6 14). It is coupled with goodness and truth as the fruit of the light (Eph 5 9; cf 1 Tim 6 11; 2 Tim 2 22). It implies a rule or standard of conduct, which in effect is one with the life of love and holiness. It is brought home to men by the conviction of the Holy Spirit (Jn 16 8). In its origin it is the righteousness of God (Mt 6 33; cf Jn 17 25). In Paul's theology, "the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ unto all them that believe" (Rom 3 22) is the act of God, out of free grace, declaring and treating the sinner as righteous, that he thereby may become righteous, even as "we love, because he first loved us" (1 Jn 4 19). The whole character of God, then, whether we call it love, holiness or righteousness, is revealed in His work of salvation, wherein He goes forth to men in love and mercy, that they may be made citizens of His kingdom, heirs of His righteousness, and participators in His love.

The abstract being of God and His metaphysical attributes are implied, but not defined, in the NT.

His infinity, omnipotence and omniscience are not enunciated in terms, but they are postulated in the whole scheme of salvation which He is carrying to completion. He is Lord of heaven and earth (Mt 11 25). The forces of Nature are at His command (Mt 5 45; 6 30). He can answer every prayer and satisfy every need (Mt 7 7-12). All things are possible to Him (Mk 10 27; 14 36). He created all things (Eph 3 9). All earthly powers are derived from Him (Rom 13 1). By His power, He raised Christ from the dead and subjected to Him "all rule, and authority, and power, and dominion" in heaven and on earth (Eph 1 20,21; cf Mt 28 18). Every power and condition of existence are subordinated to the might of His love unto His saints (Rom 8 38,39). Neither time nor place can limit Him: He is the eternal God (Rom 16 26). His knowledge is as infinite as

7. Meta-physical Attributes

His power; He knows what the Son and the angels know not (Mk 13 32). He knows the hearts of men (Lk 16 15) and all their needs (Mt 6 8.32). His knowledge is esp. manifested in His wisdom by which He works out His purpose of salvation, "the manifold wisdom of God, according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Eph 3 10.11). The teaching of the NT implies that all perfections of power, condition and being cohere in God, and are revealed in His love. They are not developed or established on metaphysical grounds, but they flow out of His perfect fatherhood. Earthly fathers do what good they can for their children, but the Heavenly Father does all things for the best for His children—"to them that love God all things work together for good"—because He is restricted by no limits of power, will or wisdom (Mt 7 11; Rom 8 28).

It is both assumed through the NT and stated categorically that God is one (Mk 12 29; Rom 3 30; Eph 4 6). No truth had sunk more deeply into the Heb mind by this time than the unity of God.

8. The Unity of God

(1) The divinity of Christ.—Yet it is obvious from what has been written, that Jesus Christ claimed a power, authority and position so unique that they can only be adequately described by calling Him God; and the apostolic church both in worship and in doctrine accorded Him that honor. All that they knew of God as now fully and finally revealed was summed up in His person, "for in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" (Col 2 9). If they did not call Him God, they recognized and named Him everything that God meant for them.

(2) The Holy Spirit.—Moreover, the Holy Spirit is a third term that represents a Divine person in the experience, thought and language of Christ and His disciples. In the Johannine account of Christ's teaching, it is probable that the Holy Spirit is identified with the risen Lord Himself (Jn 14 16.17; cf ver 18), and Paul seems also to identify them in at least one passage: "the Lord is the Spirit" (2 Cor 3 17). But in other places the three names are ranged side by side as representing three distinct persons (Mt 28 19; 2 Cor 13 14; Eph 4 4-6).

(3) The church's problem.—But how does the unity of God cohere with the Divine status of the Son and the distinct subsistence of the Holy Spirit? Jesus Christ affirmed a unity between Himself and the Father (Jn 10 30), a unity, too, which might be realized in a wider sphere, where the Father, the Son and believers should form one society (17 21.23), but He reveals no category which would construe the unity of the Godhead in a manifoldness of manifestation. The experience of the first Christians as a rule found Christ so entirely sufficient to all their religious needs, so filled with all the fulness of God, that the tremendous problem which had arisen for thought did not trouble them. Paul expresses his conception of the relation of Christ to God under the figure of the image. Christ "is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation" (Col 1 15; 2 Cor 4 4). Another writer employs a similar metaphor. Christ is "the effulgence of [God's] glory, and the very image of his substance" (He 1 3). But these figures do not carry us beyond the fact, abundantly evident elsewhere, that Christ in all things represented God because He participated in His being. In the prologue to the Fourth Gospel, the doctrine of the Word is developed for the same purpose. The eternal Reason of God who was ever with Him, and of Him, issues forth as revealed thought, or spoken word, in the person of Jesus Christ, who therefore is the eternal Word of God incarnate. So far and no farther the NT goes. Jesus Christ is God revealed; we know nothing of God, but that which is manifest in Him. His love, holiness, righteousness and purpose of grace, ordering and guiding all things to realize the ends of His fatherly love, all this we know in and through Jesus Christ. The Holy Spirit takes of Christ's and declares it to men (Jn 16 14). The problems of the coördination of the One with the Three, of personality with the plurality of consciousness, of the Infinite with the finite, and of the Eternal God with the Word made flesh, were left over for the church to solve. The Holy Spirit was given to teach it all things and guide it into all the truth (Jn 16 13). "And lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world" (Mt 28 20).

GOD, IMAGE OF: In Gen 1 26.27, the truth is declared that God created man in His own "image" (celem), after His "likeness" (d'muth). The two ideas denote the same thing—resemblance to God. The like conception of man, tacit or avowed, underlies all revelation. It is given in Gen 9 6 as the ground of the prohibition of the shedding of man's blood; is echoed in Ps 8; is reiterated frequently in the NT (1 Cor 11 7; Eph 4 24; Col 3 10; Isa 3 9). The nature of this image of God in man is discussed in other arts.—see esp. ANTHROPOLOGY. It lies in the nature of the case that the "image" does not consist in bodily form; it can only reside in spiritual qualities, in man's mental and moral attributes as a self-conscious, rational, personal agent, capable of self-determination and obedience to moral law. This gives man his position of lordship in creation, and invests his being with the sanctity of personality. The image of God, defaced, but not entirely lost through sin, is restored in yet more perfect form in the redemption of Christ. See the full discussion in the writer's work, God's Image in Man and Its Defacement; see also Dr. J. Laidlaw, The Bible Doctrine of Man.

LITERATURE

1. Introduction.—To an extent beyond the appreciation of modern and western minds the people of Bib. times and lands valued the name of the person. They always gave to it symbolical or character meaning.

While our modern names are almost exclusively designatory, and intended merely for identification, the Bib. names were also descriptive, and often prophetic. Religious significance nearly always inhered in the name, a parent relating his child to the Deity, or declaring its consecration to the Deity, by joining the name of the Deity with the service which the child should render, or perhaps commemorating in a name the favor of God in the gracious gift of the child, e.g. Nathanael ("gift of God"); Samuel ("heard of God"); Adonijah ("Jeh is my Lord"), etc. It seems to us strange that at its birth, the life and character of a child should be forecast by its parents in a name; and this unique custom has been regarded by an unsympathetic criticism as evidence of the origin of such names and their attendant narratives long subsequent to the completed life itself; such names, for example, as Abraham, Sarah, etc. But that this was actually done, and that it was regarded as a matter of course, is proved by the name given to Our Lord at His birth: "Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for it is he that shall save his people" (Mt 1 21). It is not unlikely that the giving of a character name represented the parents' purpose and fidelity in the child's training, resulting necessarily in giving to the child's life that very direction, which the name indicated. A child's name, therefore, became both a prayer and a consecration, and its realization in character became often a necessary psychological effect. Great honor or dishonor was attached to a name. The OT writings contain many and varied instances of this. Sometimes contempt for certain reprobate men would be most expressively indicated by a change of name, e.g. the change of Esh-baal, "man of Beal," to Ish-bosheth, "man of shame" (2 S 2 8 ff), and the omission of Jeh from the name of the apostate king, Ahas (2 K 15 38, etc.). The name of the last king of Judah was most expressively changed by Nebuchadnezzar from Mattaniah to Zedekiah, to assure his fidelity to his overlord who made him king (2 K 24 17). See NAMES, PROPER.

Since the Scriptures of the OT and NT are essentially for purposes of revelation, and since the Hebrews laid such store by names, we should confidently expect them to make the Divine name a medium of revelation of the first importance. People accustomed by long usage to significant character indications in their own names, necessarily would regard the names of the Deity as expressive of His nature. The very phrase "name of Jeh," or "His name," as applied to the Deity in Bib. usage, is most interesting and suggestive, sometimes expressing comprehensively His revelation in Nature (Ps 8 1; cf 138 2); or marking the place of His worship, where men will call upon His name (Dt 12 5); or used as a synonym of His various attributes, e.g. faithfulness (Isa 48 9), grace (Ps 23 3), His honor (Ps 79 9), etc. "Accordingly, since the name of God denotes this God Himself as He is revealed, and as He desires to be known by His creatures, when it is said that God will make a name for Himself by His mighty deeds, or that the new world of the future shall be unto Him for a name, we can easily understand that the name of God is often synonymous with the glory of God, and that the expressions for both are combined in the utmost variety of ways, or used alternately" (Schultz, OT Theology, ET, I, 124-25; cf Ps 72 19; Isa 63 14; also Davidson, OT Theol., 37-38).

From the important place which the Divine name occupies in revelation, we would expect frequency of occurrence and diversity of form;

2. Classification of the Subject and this is just that which we find to be true. The many forms or varieties of the name will be considered under the following heads: (1) Absolute or Personal Names, (2) Attributive, or Qualifying Names, and (3) Names of God in the NT. Naturally and in course of time attributive names tend to crystallize through frequent use and devotional regard into personal names; e.g. the attributive adj. kadhōsh, "holy," becomes the personal, transcendental name for Deity in Job and Isa. For fuller details of each name reference may be made to separate articles.

II. Absolute or Personal Names.—The first form of the Divine name in the Bible is אֱלֹהִים, 'Elohim, ordinarily tr^d "God" (Gen 1 1). This 1. 'Elohim, is the most frequently used name in "God" the OT, as its equivalent θεός, theos, is in the NT, occurring in Gen alone approximately 200 t. It is one of a group of kindred words, to which belong also 'El and 'Eloah. (1) Its form is pl., but the construction is uniformly sing., i.e. it governs a sing. vb. or adj., unless used of heathen divinities (Ps 96 5; 97 7). It is characteristic of Heb that extension, magnitude and dignity, as well as actual multiplicity, are expressed by the pl. It is not reasonable, therefore, to assume that plurality of form indicates primitive Sem polytheism. On the contrary, historic Heb is unquestionably and uniformly monotheistic.

(2) The derivation is quite uncertain. Gesenius, Ewald and others find its origin in אָל, 'al, "to be strong," from which also are derived ayil, "ram," and 'alah, "terebinth"; it is then an expanded pl. form of 'al; others trace it to אָלָה, 'alah, "to terrify," and the sing. form is found in the infrequent אֱלֹהָהּ, 'Eloah, which occurs chiefly in poetical books; BDB inclines to the derivation from אָלָה, 'alah, "to be strong," as the root of the three forms. 'El, 'Eloah and 'Elohim, although admitting that the whole question is involved in uncertainty (for full statement see BDB, s.v. אָלָה); a somewhat fanciful suggestion is the Arab. root 'al, "to be in front," from which comes the meaning "leader"; and still more fanciful is the suggested connection with the prep. אֵל, 'el, signifying God as the "goal" of man's life and aspiration. The origin must always lie in doubt, since the derivation is prehistoric, and the name, with its kindred words 'El and 'Eloah, is common to Sem languages and religions and beyond the range of Heb records.

(3) It is the reasonable conclusion that the meaning is "might" or "power"; that it is common to Sem language; that the form is pl. to express majesty or "all-mightiness," and that it is a generic, rather than a specific personal, name for Deity, as is indicated by its application to those who represent the Deity (Jgs 5 8; Ps 82 1) or who are in His presence (1 S 28 13).

The sing. form of the preceding name, אֱלֹהָהּ, 'Eloah, is confined in its use almost exclusively to poetry, or to poetic expression, being

2. 'Eloah characteristic of the Book of Job, occurring oftener in that book than in all other parts of the OT. It is, in fact, found in Job oftener than the elsewhere more ordinary pl. 'Elohim. For derivation and meaning see above under 1 (2). Cf also the Aram. form, אֱלָה, 'alah, found frequently in Ezr and Dnl.

In the group of Sem languages, the most common word for Deity is El (אֱל, 'el), represented by the Bab ilu and the Arab. Allah. It is found throughout the OT, but oftener in Job and Pss than in all the other books. It occurs seldom in the historical books, and not at all in Lev. The same variety of derivations is attributed to it as to ELOHIM (q.v.), most probable of which is אָל, 'al, "to be strong." BDB interprets 'al as meaning "to be in front," from which came ayil, "ram," the one in front of the flock, and 'alah, the prominent "terebinth," deriving El from 'alah, "to be strong." It occurs in many of the more ancient names; and, like Elohim, it is used of pagan gods. It is frequently combined with nouns or adjectives to express the Divine name with reference to particular attributes or phases of His being, as 'Ēl 'Elyōn, 'Ēl-Rō'i, etc (see below under III, "Attributive Names").

An attributive name, which in prehistoric Heb had already passed over into a generic name of God, is יְהוָה, 'Ādhōn, יְהוָה, 'Ādhōnāy, the latter formed from the former, being 'Ādhōnāy the const. pl., 'ādhōnē, with the 1st pers. ending ay, which has been lengthened to āy and so retained as characteristic of the proper name and distinguishing it from the possessive "my Lord." AV does not distinguish, but renders both as possessive, "my Lord" (Jgs 6 15; 13 8), and as personal name (Ps 2 4); RV also, in Ps 16 2, is in doubt, giving "my Lord," possessive, in text and "the Lord" in m. 'Ādhōnāy, as a name of Deity, emphasizes His sovereignty (Ps 2 4; Isa 7 7), and corresponds closely to Kurios of the NT. It is frequently combined with Jeh (Gen 15 8; Isa 7 7, etc) and with 'Ēlōhīm (Ps 86 12). Its most significant service in MT is the use of its vowels to point the unpronounceable tetragrammaton יהוה, indicating that the word 'Ādhōnāy should be spoken instead of Yahweh. This combination of vowels and consonants gives the transliteration "Jehovah," adopted by ARV, while the other EV, since Coverdale, represents the combination by the capitals LORD. LXX represents by Kurios.

The name most distinctive of God as the God of Israel is Jehovah (יהוה), a combination of the tetragrammaton with the vowels of 'Ādhōnāy, transliterated Y'hōwāh, but read by the Hebrews 'ādhōnāy).

While both derivation and meaning are lost to us in the uncertainties of its ante-Bib. origin, the following inferences seem to be justified by the facts: (1) This name was common to religions other than Israel's, according to Friedr. Delitzsch, Hommel, Winckler, and Guthe (EB, s.v.), having been found in Bab inscriptions. Ammonite, Arab. and Egypt names appear also to contain it (cf Davidson, OT Theol., 52 f); but while, like Elohim, it was common to primitive Sem religion, it became Israel's distinctive name for the Deity. (2) It was, therefore, not first made known at the call of Moses (Ex 3 13-16; 6 2-8), but, being already known, was at that time given a larger revelation and interpretation: God, to be known to Israel henceforth under the name "Jehovah" and in its fuller significance, was the One sending Moses to deliver Israel; "when I shall say unto them, The God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say to me, What is his name? what shall I say unto them? And God said . . . I WILL BE THAT I WILL BE . . . say . . . I WILL BE hath sent me" (Ex 3 13-14 m). The name is assumed as known in the narrative of Gen; it also occurs in pre-Mosaic names (Ex 6 20; 1 Ch 2 25; 7 8). (3) The derivation is from the archaic יהוה, hāwāh, "to be," better "to become," in Bib. Heb hāyāh; this archaic use of w for y appears also in derivatives of the similar יהוה, hāyāh, "to live," e.g. hāwāh in Gen 3 20. (4) It is evident from the interpretative passages (Ex 3; 6) that the form is the fut. of the simple stem (Qal) and not fut. of the causative (Hiph'il) stem in the sense "giver of life"—an idea not borne out by any of the occurrences of the word. The fanciful theory that the word is a combination of the fut., pres. and perfect tenses of the vb., signifying "the One who will be, is, and was," is not to be taken seriously (Stier, etc, in Oehler's OT Theol., in loc.). (5) The meaning may with some confidence be inferred from Origen's transliteration, Iaō, the form in Sam, Iabe, the form as combined in OT names, and the evident signification in Ex 3 and other passages, to be that of the simple fut., יהוה, yahweh, "he will be." It does not express causation, nor existence in a metaphysical sense, but the covenant promise of the Divine presence, both at the immediate time and in the Messianic age of the future. And thus it became bound up with the Messianic hope, as in the phrase, "the Day of Jehovah," and consequently both it and the LXX tr Kurios were applied by the NT as titles of Christ. (6) It is the personal name of God, as distinguished from such generic or essential names as 'Ēl, 'Ēlōhīm, Shadday, etc. Characteristic of the OT is its insistence on the possible knowledge of God as a person; and Jehovah is His name as a person. It is illogical, certainly, that the later Hebrews should have shrunk from its pronunciation, in view of the appropriateness of the name and of the OT insistence on the personality of God, who as a person has this name. ARV quite correctly adopts the transliteration "Jehovah" to emphasize its significance and purpose as a personal name of God revealed.

Five t in the "Song" of Moses (Dt 32 4.15.18. 30.31) the word צֶרֶךְ, ṣūr, "Rock," is used as a title of God. It occurs also in the Pss, Isa and

6. "Rock" poetical passages of other books, and also in proper names, Elizur, Zuriel, etc. (Ṣūr)

Once in AV (Isa 44 8) it is tr'd "God," but "Rock" in ARV and ARVm. The effort to interpret this title as indicating the animistic origin of OT religion is unnecessary and a pure product of the imagination. It is customary for both OT and NT writers to use descriptive names of God: "rock," "fortress," "shield," "light," "bread," etc, and is in harmony with all the rich figurativeness of the Scriptures; the use of the article in many of the cases cited further corroborates the view that the word is intended to be a descriptive title, not the name of a Nature-deity. It presents the idea of God as steadfast: "The appellation of God as ṣūr, 'rock,' 'safe retreat,' in Dt refers to this" (Oehler, OT Theol.). It often occurs, in a most striking figure, with the pers. suffix as "my rock," "their rock," to express confidence (Ps 28 1).

The name קָדוֹשׁ, kādhōsh, "holy" is found frequently in Isa and Pss, and occasionally in the other prophets. It is characteristic

7. Kādhōsh, of Isa, being found 32 t in that book. "Holy One" It occurs often in the phrase קָדוֹשׁ

יִשְׂרָאֵל, kādhōsh yisrā'el, "Holy One of Israel." The derivation and meaning remain in doubt, but the customary and most probable derivation is from kādash, "to be separate," which best explains its use both of man and of the Deity. When used of God it signifies: (1) His transcendence, His separateness above all other beings, His aloneness as compared to other gods; (2) His peculiar relation to His people Israel unto whom He separated Himself, as He did unto other nations. In the former sense Isaiah used it of His sole deity (40 25), in the latter of His peculiar and unchanging covenant-relation to Israel (43 3; 48 17), strikingly expressed in the phrase "Holy One of Israel." Kādhōsh was rather attributive than personal, but became personal in the use of such absolute theists as Job and Isaiah. It expresses essential Deity, rather than personal revelation.

In the patriarchal lit., and in Job particularly, where it is put into the mouths of the patriarchs, this name appears sometimes in the

8. Shadday, compound שֹׁדַי, 'ēl shadday, some "Almighty" times alone. While its root meaning also is uncertain, the suggested derivation from שָׁדַד, shādhadh, "to destroy," "to terrify," seems most probable, signifying the God who is manifested by the terrible nature of His mighty acts. "The Storm God," from שָׁדַד, shaddā, "to pour out," has been suggested, but is improbable; and even more so the fanciful שָׁ, she, and יָ, day, meaning "who is sufficient." Its use in patriarchal days marks an advance over looser Sem conceptions to the stricter monotheistic idea of almightiness, and is in accord with the early consciousness of Deity in race or individual as a God of awe, or even terror. Its monotheistic character is in harmony with its use in the Abrahamic times, and is further corroborated by its use in LXX and NT, παντοκράτωρ, pantokrátōr, "all-powerful."

III. Attributive, or Qualifying Names.—It is often difficult to distinguish between the personal and the attributive names of God, the two divisions necessarily shading into each other. Some of the preceding are really attributive, made personal by usage. The following are the most prominent descriptive or attributive names.

This name (אֲבִיר, 'ābhīr), tr^d in EV "Mighty One," is always combined with Israel or Jacob; its root is אָבַר, 'ābhar, "to be strong," 1. 'Ābhīr, from which is derived the word אֲבִיר, "Mighty One," 'ābher, "pinion," used of the strong wing of the eagle (Isa 40 31), fig. of God in Dt 32 11. It occurs in Jacob's blessing (Gen 49 24), in a prayer for the sanctuary (Ps 132 2.5), and in Isa (1 24; 49 26; 60 16), to express the assurance of the Divine strength in behalf of the oppressed in Israel (Isa 1 24), or in behalf of Israel against his oppressors; it is interesting to note that this name was first used by Jacob himself.

The name 'Ēl is combined with a number of descriptive adjs. to represent God in His various attributes; and these by usage have

2. 'Ēl- become names or titles of God. For 'Ēlōhē-Israel the remarkable phrase 'Ēl-'Ēlōhē-Israel (Gen 33 20), see separate art.

This name (עֶלְיוֹן, 'elyōn, "highest") is a derivative of עָלָה, 'ālāh, "to go up." It is used of persons or things to indicate their elevation or exaltation: of Israel, favored above other nations (Dt 26 19), of the aqueduct of "the upper pool" (Isa 7 3), etc. This indicates that its meaning when applied to God is the "Exalted One," who is lifted far above all gods and men. It occurs alone (Dt 32 8; Ps 18 13), or in combination with other names of God, most frequently with El (Gen 14 18; Ps 78 35), but also with Jeh (Ps 7 17; 97 9), or with Elohim (Ps 56 2 AV; 78 56). Its early use (Gen 14 18 f) points to a high conception of Deity, an unquestioned monotheism in the beginnings of Heb history.

The ancient Hebrews were in constant struggle for their land and their liberties, a struggle most intense and patriotic in the heroic 4. Gibbōr, days of Saul and David, and in which "Mighty [One]" there was developed a band of men whose great deeds entitled them to the honorable title "mighty men" of valor (גִּבּוֹרִים, gibbōrīm). These were the knights of David's "Round Table." In like manner the Hebrew thought of his God as fighting for him, and easily then this title was applied to God as the Mighty Man of war, occurring in David's psalm of the Ark's Triumphant Entry (Ps 24 8), in the allegory of the Messiah-King (45 3), either alone or combined with El (Isa 9 6; Jer 32 18), and sometimes with Jeh (Isa 42 13).

When Hagar was fleeing from Sarah's persecutions, Jeh spoke to her in the wilderness of Shur, words of promise and cheer. Where-

5. 'Ēl-Rō'i upon "she called the name of Jeh that spake unto her, Thou art El roi" (Gen 16 13 m). In the text the word רֹאִי, rō'i, deriv. of rā'āh, "to see," is tr^d "that seeth," lit. "of sight." This is the only occurrence of this title in the OT.

One of the covenant attributes of God, His righteousness, is spoken of so often that it passes from adj. to subst., from attribute to

6. Ḥaddīk, name, and He is called "Righteous" "Right- (חַדִּיק, ḥaddīk), or "the Righteous eous"

One." The word is never transliterated but always tr^d in EV, although it might just as properly be considered a Divine name as 'Elyōn or Kādōsh. The root חָדַק, ḥadhak, "to be straight" or "right," signifies fidelity to a standard, and is used of God's fidelity to His own nature and to His covenant-promise (Isa 41 10; 42 8; cf Hos 2 19); it occurs alone (Ps 34 17), with El (Dt 32 4), with Elohim (Ezr 9 15; Ps 7 9; 116 5), but most frequently with Jeh (Ps 129 4, etc.). In Ex 9 27 Pharaoh, in acknowledging his sin against Jeh, calls Him 'Jeh the Righteous," using the article. The suggestive combination, "Jeh our Righteousness," is the name given to David's "righteous Branch" (Jer 23 6) and properly should be taken as a proper noun—the name of the Messiah-King.

Frequently in the Pent, oftenest in the 3 VSS of the Commandments (Ex 20 5; 34 14; Dt 5 9),

God is given the title "Jealous" (כַּנְאָה, kannā), most specifically in the phrase "Jealous" "Jeh, whose name is Jealous" (Ex 34 14). This word, however, did not bear the evil meaning now associated with it in our usage, but rather signified "righteous zeal," Jeh's zeal for His own name or glory (cf Isa 9 7, "the zeal of Jeh," כִּנְיָה, kin'āh; also Zec 1 14; 8 2).

Connected with the personal and covenant name Jeh, there is found frequently the word Sabaoth (צְבָאוֹת, ṣəbhā'ōth, "hosts"). Inva-

8. Ṣəbhā' rially in the OT it is tr^d "hosts" (Isa oth, "Lord 1 9; Ps 46 7.11, etc), but in the NT it is transliterated twice, both in the Gr and Eng. (Rom 9 29; Jas 5 4).

The passage in Rom is a quotation from Isa 1 9 through LXX, which does not translate, but transliterates the Heb. Origin and meaning are uncertain. It is used of heavenly bodies and earthly forces (Gen 2 1); of the army of Israel (2 S 8 16); of the Heavenly beings (Ps 103 21; 148 2; Dnl 4 35). It is probable that the title is intended to include all created agencies and beings, of which Jeh is maker and leader.

When God appeared to Moses at Sinai, commissioning him to deliver Israel; Moses, being well aware of the difficulty of impressing

9. "I am the people, asked by what name of That I am" God he should speak to them: "They shall say to me, What is his name?"

Then "God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM . . . say . . . I AM hath sent me unto you" (Ex 3 14). The name of the Deity given here is similar to Jeh (yahweh) except that the form is not 3d pers. fut., as in the usual form, but the 1st pers. ('ehyeh), since God is here speaking of Himself. The optional reading in ARV^m is much to be preferred: "I WILL BE THAT I WILL BE," indicating His covenant pledge to be with and for Israel in all the ages to follow. For further explanation see above, II, 5.

IV. NT Names of God.—The variety of names which characterizes the OT is lacking in the NT, where we are all but limited to two names, each of which corresponds to several in the OT. The most frequent is the name "God" (Θεός, Theós) occurring over 1,000 t, and corresponding to El, Elohim, etc. of the OT. It may, as 1. Theos, "God" Elohim, be used by accommodation of heathen gods; but in its true sense it expresses essential Deity, and as expressive of such it is applied to Christ as to the Father (Jn 20 28; Rom 9 5).

Five t "Lord" is a tr of δεσπότης, despótēs (Lk 2 29; Acts 4 24; 2 Pet 2 1 AV; Jude ver 4; Rev 6 10 AV). In each case there is evident emphasis on sovereignty and correspondence to the Ἀδὼν of the OT. The most common Gr word for Lord is Κύριος, Kýrios, representing both Jeh and Ἀδωναι of the OT, and occurring upwards of 600 t. Its use for Jeh was in the spirit of both the Heb scribes, who pointed the consonants of the covenant name with the vowels of Adonay, the title of dominion, and of the LXX, which rendered this combination as Kurios. Consequently quotations from the OT in which Jeh occurs are rendered by Kurios. It is applied to Christ equally with the Father and the Spirit, showing that the Messianic hopes conveyed by the name Jeh were for NT writers fulfilled in Jesus Christ; and that in Him the long hoped-for appearance of Jeh was realized.

As in the OT, so in the NT various attributive, descriptive or fig. names are found, often corresponding to those in the OT. Some of these are: The "Highest" or "Most High" (ὕψιστος, hypsistos), found in this sense only in Lk (1 32.35.76; 2 14, etc), and equivalent to Elyon (see III, 3, above); "Almighty," Παροκράτωρ, Pantokrátōr

(2 Cor 6 18; Rev 1 8, etc), corresponding to Shad-day (see II, 8 above; see also ALMIGHTY); "Father" as in the Lord's Prayer, and elsewhere (Mt 6 9; 11 25; Jn 17 25; 2 Cor 6 18); "King" (1 Tim 1 17); "King of kings" (1 Tim 6 15); "King of kings," "Lord of lords" (Rev 17 14; 19 16); "Potentate" (1 Tim 6 15); "Master" (kurios, Eph 6 9; 2 Pet 2 1; Rev 6 10); "Shepherd," "Bishop" (1 Pet 2 25).

GODDESS, god'ez (אֱלֹהִים, 'ēlōhīm, θεά, thēa): There is no separate word for "goddess" in the OT. In the only instance in which the word occurs in EV (1 K 11 5.33), the gender is determined by the noun—"Ashtoreth, the god [goddess] of the Sidonians." In the NT the term is applied to Diana of Ephesus (Acts 19 27.35.37).

GODHEAD, god'hed: The word "Godhead" is a simple doublet of the less frequently occurring "Godhood." Both forms stand side by side in the Ancren Riwele (about 1225 AD), and both have survived until today, though not in equally common use. They are representatives of a large class of abstract substs., formed with the suffix -head or -hood, most of which formerly occurred in both forms almost indifferently, though the majority of them survive only, or very preponderantly (except in Scottish speech), in the form -hood. The two suffixes appear in Middle Eng. as -hēde and -hōd, and presuppose in the Anglo-Saxon which lies behind them a fem. hædda (which is not actually known) by the side of the masc. hād. The Anglo-Saxon word "was originally a distinct subst., meaning 'person, personality, sex, condition, quality, rank'" (Bradley, in A New Eng. Dict. on a Historical Basis, s.v. "-hood"), but its use as a suffix early superseded its separate employment. At first -hēde appears to have been appropriated to adjs., -hōd to substs.; but, this distinction breaking down and the forms coming into indiscriminate use, -hēde grew obsolete, and remains in common use only in one or two special forms, such as "Godhead," "maidenhead" (Bradley, as cited, s.v. "-head").

The general elimination of the forms in -head has been followed by a fading consciousness, in the case of the few surviving instances in this form, of the qualitative sense inherent in the suffix. The words accordingly show a tendency to become simple denotatives. Thus "the Godhead" is frequently employed merely as a somewhat strong synonym of "God," although usually with more or less emphasis upon that in God which makes Him God. One of its established usages is to denote the Divine essence as such, in distinction from the three "hypostases" or "persons" which share its common possession in the doctrine of the Trinity. This usage is old: Bradley (op. cit.) is able to adduce instances from the 13th cent. In this usage the word has long held the rank of a technical term, e.g. the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England, 1571, Art. I: "And in the unitie of this Godhead, there be three persons" (cf the Irish Articles of 1615, and the Westminster Confession, II, 3); Westminster Shorter Catechism, Q. 6: "There are three persons in the Godhead." Pursuant to the fading of the qualitative sense of the word, there has arisen a tendency, when the qualitative consciousness is vivid, to revive the obsolescent "Godhood," to take its place; and this tendency naturally shows itself esp. when the contrast with humanity is expressed. Carlyle, for example (French Revolution, III, Book vi, ch iv, § 1), speaking of the posthumous reaction against Marat, writes: "Shorter godhood had no divine man"; and Phillips Brooks (Sermons, XIII, 237) speaks of Christ bridging the gulf "between the Godhood and the manhood." "Godhood" seems, indeed, always to have had a tendency to appear in such contrasts, as if the qualitative consciousness were more active in it than in "Godhead." Thus it seems formerly to have suggested itself almost as inevitably to designate the Divine nature of Christ, as "Godhead" did to designate the common Divine essence of the Trinity. Bradley cites instances from 1563 down.

The fundamental meaning of "Godhead" is, nevertheless, no less than that of "Godhood," the state, dignity, condition, quality, of a god, or, as monotheists would say, of God. As manhood is that which makes a man a man, and childhood that which makes a child a child, so Godhead is that which makes God, God. When we ascribe Godhead to a being, therefore, we affirm that all that enters into the idea of God belongs to Him. "Godhead" is thus the Saxon equivalent of the Lat "Divinitas", or, as it is now becoming more usual to say, "Deity." Like these terms it is rendered concrete by prefixing the article to it. As "the Divinity," "the Deity," so also "the Godhead" is only another way of saying "God," except that when we say "the Divinity," "the Deity," "the Godhead," we are saying "God" more abstractly and more qualitatively, that is with more emphasis, or at least with a more lively consciousness, of the constitutive qualities which make God the kind of being we call "God."

The word "Godhead" occurs in AV only 3 t (Acts 17 29; Rom 1 20; Col 2 9), and oddly enough it translates in these 3 passages, 3 different, though closely related, Gr words, ló theion (τὸ θεῖον), theiōtēs (θεϊότης), theotēs (θεότης).

To theion means "that which is Divine," concretely, or, shortly, "the Deity." Among the Greeks it was in constant use in the sense of "the Divine Being," and particularly as a general term to designate the Deity apart from reference to a particular god. It is used by Paul (Acts 17 29) in an address made to a heathen audience, and is inserted into a context in which it is flanked by the simple term "God" (ho theós, ὁ θεός) on both sides. It is obviously deliberately chosen in order to throw up into emphasis the qualitative idea of God; and this emphasis is still further heightened by the direct contrast into which it is brought with the term "man." "Being, then, the offspring of God, we ought not to think that it is to gold or silver or stone graven by art and device of man that the Godhead is like." In an effort to bring out this qualitative emphasis, RVm suggests that we might substitute for "the Godhead" here the periphrastic rendering, "that which is Divine." But this seems both clumsy and ineffective for its purpose. From the philological standpoint, "the Godhead" is a very fair equivalent for to theion, differing as it does from the simple "God" precisely by its qualitative emphasis. It may be doubted, however, whether in the partial loss by "Godhead" of its qualitative force in its current usage, one of its synonyms, "the Divinity" (which is the rendering here of the Rhemish version) or "the Deity," would not better convey Paul's emphasis to modern readers.

Neither of these terms, "Divinity," "Deity," occurs anywhere in AV, and "Deity" does not occur in RV either; but RV (following the Rhemish version) substitutes "Divinity" for "Godhead" in Rom 1 20. Of the two, "Divinity" was originally of the broader connotation; in the days of heathendom it was applicable to all grades of Divine beings. "Deity" was introduced by the Christian Fathers for the express purpose of providing a stronger word by means of which the uniqueness of the Christians' God should be emphasized. Perhaps "Divinity" retains even in its Eng. usage something of its traditional weaker connotation, although, of course, in a monotheistic consciousness the two terms coalesce in meaning. There exists a tendency to insist, therefore, on the "Deity" of Christ, rather than his mere "Divinity," in the feeling that "Divinity" might lend itself to the notion that Christ possessed but a secondary or reduced grade of Divine quality. In Acts 17 29 Paul is not discriminating between grades of Divinity, but is preaching monotheism. In this context, then, to theion does not lump together "all that is called God or is worshipped," and declare that all that is in any sense Divine should be esteemed beyond the power of material things worthily to represent. Paul has the idea of God at its height before his mind, and having quickened his hearers' sense of God's exaltation by his elevated description of Him, he demands of them whether this Deity can be fitly represented by any art of man working in dead stuff. He uses the term to theion, rather than ho theos, not merely in courteous adoption of his hearers' own language, but because of its qualitative emphasis. On the whole, the best Eng. tr of it would probably be "the Deity." "The Godhead" has ceased to be sufficiently qualitative: "the Godhood" is not sufficiently current: "the Divine" is not sufficiently personal: "the Divinity" is perhaps not sufficiently strong: "Deity" without the article loses too much of its personal reference to compensate for the gain in qualitiveness: "the Deity" alone seems fairly to reproduce the apostle's thought.

The Gr term in Rom 1 20 is theiōtēs, which again, as a term of quality, is not unfairly rendered by "Godhead." What Paul says here is that "the everlasting power and Godhead" of God "are clearly perceived by means of His works." By "Godhead" he clearly means the whole of that by which God is constituted what we mean by "God." By coupling the word with "power," Paul no doubt intimates that his mind is resting esp. upon those qualities which enter most intimately into and constitute the exaltation of God; but we must beware of limiting the connotation of the term—all of God's attributes are glorious. The context shows that the thought of the apostle was moving on much the same lines as in Acts 17 29; here, too, the contrast which determines the emphasis is with "corruptible man," and along with him, with the lower creatures in general (ver 23). How could man think of the Godhead under such similitudes—the Godhead, so clearly manifested in its glory by its works! The substitution for "Godhead" here of its synonym "Divinity" by RV is doubtless due in part to a desire to give distinctive renderings to distinct terms, and in part to a wish to emphasize, more strongly than "Godhead" in its modern usage emphasizes, the qualitative implication which is so strong in theiōtēs. Perhaps, however, the substitution is not altogether felicitous. "Divinity," in its contrast with "Deity," may have a certain weakness of connotation clinging to it, which would unsuit it to represent theiōtēs here. It is quite true that the two terms, "Divinity" and "Deity," are the representatives in Lat Patristic writers respectively of the Gr theiōtēs and theotēs. Augustine (The City of God, VII, 1; cf X, 1) tells us that "Deity" was coined by Christian writers as a more accurate rendering of the Gr theotēs than the current "Divinity." But it does not follow that because "Deity" more accurately renders theotēs, therefore "Divinity" is always the best rendering of theiōtēs. The stress laid by the Gr Fathers on the employment of theotēs to express the "Deity" of the Persons of the Trinity was in sequence to attempts which were being made to ascribe to the Son and the Spirit a reduced "Divinity"; and it was the need the Lat Fathers felt in the same interests which led them to coin "Deity" as a more accurate rendering, as they say, of theotēs. Meanwhile theiōtēs and "Divinity" had done service in the two languages, the former as practically, and the latter as absolutely, the only term in use to express the idea of "Deity." Theotēs is very rare in classical Gr, "Deity" non-existent in classical Lat. To represent theiōtēs uniformly by "Divinity," if any reduced connotation at all clings to "Divinity," would therefore be to represent it often very inadequately. And that is the case in the present passage. What Paul says is clearly made known by God's works, is His everlasting power and all the other everlasting attributes which form His Godhead and constitute His glory.

It is theotēs which occurs in Col 2 9. Here Paul declares that "all the fulness of the Godhead" dwells in Christ "bodily." The phrase "fulness of the Godhead" is an esp. emphatic one. It means everything without exception which goes to make up the Godhead, the totality of all that enters into the conception of Godhood. All this, says Paul, dwells in Christ "bodily," that is after such a fashion as to be manifested in connection with a bodily organism. This is the distinction of Christ: in the Father and in the Spirit the whole plenitude of the Godhead dwells also, but not "bodily"; in them it is not manifested in connection with a bodily life. It is the incarnation which Paul has in mind; and he tells us that in the incarnate Son, the fulness of the Godhead dwells. The term chosen to express the Godhead here is the strongest and the most unambiguously decisive which the language affords.

Theiōtēs may mean all that theōtēs can mean; on monotheistic lips it does mean just what theōtēs means; but theōtēs must mean the utmost that either term can mean. The distinction is, not that theōtēs refers to the essence and theiōtēs to the attributes; we cannot separate the essence and the attributes. Where the essence is, there the attributes are; they are merely the determinants of the essence. And where the attributes are, there the essence is; it is merely the thing, of the kind of which they are the determinants. The distinction is that theōtēs emphasizes that it is the highest stretch of Divinity which is in question, while theiōtēs might possibly be taken as referring to Deity at a lower level. It is not merely such divinity as is shared by all the gods many and lords many of the heathen world, to which "heroes" might aspire, and "demons" attain, all the plenitude of which dwells in Christ as incarnate; but that Deity which is peculiar to the high gods, or, since Paul is writing out of a monotheistic consciousness, that Deity which is the Supreme God alone. All the fulness of supreme Deity dwells in Christ bodily. There is nothing in the God who is over all which is not in Christ. Probably no better rendering of this idea is afforded by our modern Eng. than the term "Godhead," in which the qualitative notion still lurks, though somewhat obscured behind the individualizing implication, and which in any event emphasizes precisely what Paul wishes here to assert—that all that enters into the conception of God, and makes God what we mean by the term "God," dwells in Christ, and is manifested in Him in connection with a bodily organism.

GODLESS, god'les: This word is not found in the text of AV. It is found, however, in Apoc (2 Macc 7 34, "O godless [RV "unholy"] man"). RV substitutes the word "godless" for the word "hypocrite" in the following passages: Job 8 13; 13 16; 15 34; 17 8; 20 5; 27 8; 34 30; 36 13; Prov 11 9; Isa 33 14. RV does not seem to be consistent in carrying out the idea of "godless" for "hypocrite," for in Isa 9 17; 10 6; Ps 35 16 this same Heb word hānēph is tr^d "profane." The principal idea lying at the root of the word is that of pollution and profanity; a condition of not merely being without God but assuming an attitude of open and blatant opposition toward God. The godless man is not merely the atheistic, unbelieving or even irreligious, but the openly impious, wicked and profane man. Indeed it can hardly be rightly claimed that the idea of hypocrisy is involved in the meaning of the word, for the "godless" man is not the one who professes one thing and lives another, but the one who openly avows not only his disbelief in, but his open opposition to, God. Doubtless the idea of pollution and defilement is also to be included in the definition of this word; see Jer 3 9; Nu 35 33; Dnl 11 31.

GODLINESS, god'li-ness, GODLY, god'li (εὐθελα, εὐσεβεία, εὐσεβής, -ος, εὐσεβής, -ος): In the OT the word rendered "godly" in Ps 4 3; 32 6 (צדק, hāṣidh) is lit. "kind," then "pious" (RVm renders it in the former passage, "one that he favor-eth"). Sometimes in both the OT and the NT a periphrasis is employed, "of God," "according to God" (e.g. "godly sorrow," 2 Cor 7 10). Godliness, as denoting character and conduct determined by the principle of love or fear of God in the heart, is the summing up of genuine religion. There can be no true religion without it: only a dead "form" (2 Tim 3 5). The term is a favorite one in the Pastoral Epistles. The incarnation is "the mystery of godliness" (1 Tim 3 16).

3. Gods of the Nations
4. Superiority of Jehovah to Other Gods
5. Regulations Regarding the Gods of the Nations
6. Israel's Tendency to Idolatry

II. IN THE APOC

III. IN THE NT

The Heb pl. 'ēlōhīm is generally known as the pl. of "majesty" and is the ordinary name for God. The meaning of the pl. seems to be "plenitude of powers." It denotes the fulness of those attributes of power which belonged to the Divine Being. Thus it is usually tr^d in the sing., "God," when referring to the God of Israel. When reference is made to the gods of the other nations the word is tr^d in the pl., "gods." The heathen nations usually had a plurality of gods. Among the Semites it was customary for one nation or tribe to have its own particular god. Often there were many tribes, or families, or communities, in one nation, each having a particular god. Thus even among Semites a nation may have many gods and be polytheistic. Among the other nations, Iranian, Hamitic, etc., there were always a number of deities, sometimes a multitude. There are many references to these in the OT. In a few cases where the pl. is used, the sing. would be better, e.g. Gen 3 5 AV; Ex 32 4.8.23; Ruth 1 15 AV; Jgs 17 5; 18 24; 1 S 17 43. This, however, might be disputed.

I. In the OT.—The following are the more important usages of the word in the OT: The tr of Ps 8 5 is disputed. LXX and AV translate it "angels," RV and ARV, "God,"

1. Super-human Beings (God and Angels). RV and ARV, "God," with "angels" in the margin. The Epistle to the He has the word "angels." This seems to be more in keeping with the OT ideas of the relation between God, men and angels. Gen 1 26 has the pl. "us," but it is not certain to whom it refers, most probably to the angels or mighty ones which surrounded the throne of God as servants or counsellors; cf Job 38 7, and see Sons of God. In Ps 97 7 the expression "worship him, all ye gods," may possibly refer to the gods of the nations, but more probably to the angels or mighty ones.

Judges, rulers, are regarded "either as Divine representatives at sacred places, or as reflecting Divine majesty and power" (see BDB,

2. Judges, Rulers. s.v.). Ex 21 6 might better be tr^d as in the margin, "the judges." These were men appointed to represent God and adjudicate on important matters of law. LXX has "Criterion of God." In Ex 22 8 the word is used in the same sense, and ver 9 would also be better tr^d "the judges"; ver 28 likewise. See also 1 S 2 25; Ps 82 1.6, where the reference is to those who act as judges.

(1) The ancestors of Israel "beyond the River" had their gods (Josh 24 14 f). While there is no mention of idolatry before the Deluge,

3. Gods of the Nations. were idolaters. Ur of the Chaldees as Objects was the center for the worship of Sin, of Worship the Moon-god. Many others were worshipped in the various cities of Babylon. See BABYLONIA.

(2) The gods of Laban and his family (Gen 31 30.32; 35 2.4) were household gods or terāphim, and were stolen by Rachel and carried off in her flight with Jacob. See TERAPHIM.

(3) Gods of Egypt: For many centuries before the time of Abraham there had been numerous objects of worship in Egypt. Many of these were animals, birds and natural objects. Horus, the hawk, was one of the earliest of all. The cat, the bull, etc., were worshipped at times. The plagues of Egypt were specially directed against these wretched deities (Nu 33 4; Ex 12 12). Jeh took vengeance on all the gods of Egypt. These terrible events showed that "Jeh is greater than all gods" (18 11). He redeemed His people from the nations and its gods (2 S 7 23). Jeremiah predicted the time when Jeh should destroy the gods of Egypt (Jer 43 12 f; 46 25).

(4) Of the gods of the Amorites (Jgs 6 10) no names are given, but they probably were the same as the gods of the Canaanites.

(5) The gods of the Canaanites were Nature-gods, and their worship was that of the productive and chiefly reproductive powers of Nature. Their service was perhaps the most immoral and degrading of all. The high places and altars of the different Baals, Ashtoreths, etc., were numerous throughout Canaan. These deities were always represented by images and Moses makes frequent reference to them with warnings against this seductive worship (Dt 7 25; 12 3.30.31; 13 7; 20 18; 29 18; 32 16, etc.). See also IDOLATRY; BAAL; ASHTORETH; ASHERAH, etc.

(6) Gods of the Philis: The champion Goliath cursed David by his gods (1 S 17 43). Perhaps it would be better rendered "god." Saul's and his son's armor was put into the house of their gods (1 Ch 10 10). See also DAGON; BAALZEBUB.

(7) The two golden calves erected by Jeroboam at Dan and Bethel to keep the people from going to Jerus to worship are called gods (1 K 12 28; 2 Ch 13 8 f). See CALF, GOLDEN.

(8) The gods of Damascus: Ben-hadad was accustomed to worship in the house of the god Rimmon (2 K 5 18). No other names are mentioned, but from 2 Ch 28 23 it is clear that there were many gods in Syria. See RIMMON.

(9) Solomon's many wives worshipped their own gods, and he provided the means for their worship. Chief among these were Chemosh of Moab and Molech of Ammon (1 K 11 2.4.8). See CHEMOSH; MOLECH.

(10) The mixed peoples transplanted into Samaria by Sargon had their various gods and mingled their service with that of Jeh, after being taught by a priest of Jeh. The names of some of these gods were Succoth-benoth, Nergal, Ashima, Nibhaz, Tartak, Adrammelech (2 K 17 29.30.31.33). See separate articles.

(11) Of the gods of Seir, which were brought to Jerus by Amaziah, the names are not given (2 Ch 25 14).

(12) The gods of the nations conquered by Sennacherib and his fathers, viz. Hamoth, Arpad, Sepharvaim, Hena, Ivvah (2 K 18 33-35; 19 13). Also those conquered by Sennacherib's fathers, Gozan, Haran, Rezeph, Eden or Telassar (2 K 19 12; Isa 36 18.19.20; 2 Ch 32 13 f).

(13) Gods of Moab are mentioned in Ruth 1 15; 1 K 11 1.7. Possibly Ruth 1 15 should be tr'd "god." See CHEMOSH.

(14) Gods of Babylon: The graven images of her gods referred to in Isa 21 9; 42 17; Bel and Nebo mentioned in Isa 46 1; other gods of silver and gold (Ezr 1 7; Dnl 4 8.9.18; 5 4.11.14.23).

(15) Nineveh's gods are merely referred to in Nah 1 14. Sennacherib was worshipping in the house of Nisroch his god when slain by his sons (2 K 19 37).

(16) The coastlands or borders and peninsulas of the Aegean Sea had numerous idol gods, shrines and devotees. Isaiah challenges them to prove that they are gods (Isa 41 22 f).

Jeh was "greater than all gods" (Ex 15 11; 18 11); "God of gods, and Lord of lords" (Dt 10 14.

17); "The Mighty One" (Josh 22 22); "to be feared above all gods" (1 Ch 16 25; 2 Ch 2 5; Ps 96 4 f); "King above all gods" (Ps 95 3;

4. The Superiority of Jehovah to Other Gods 97 7.9; 86 8; 135 5; 136 2; 138 1; Jer 10 11; Zeph 2 11; Dnl 2 18.47). Jehovah to Jeremiah advances so far toward a pure and well-defined monotheism that he speaks of all other gods as "not gods." They have no existence to him (Jer 2 11; 5 7; 16 20). A similar position is taken in Isa 41, 43, etc.

The laws of Moses give no uncertain sound concerning them. The Decalogue begins: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me."

5. Regulations Regarding the Gods of the Nations Whatever may be the exact meaning of this, it is perfectly clear that Israel was to have nothing to do with any God but Jeh (Ex 20 3; Dt 5 7). No images shall be made of them (Ex 20 4.23; 34 17; Lev 19 4; Dt 5 8 f).

No mention shall be made of them (Ex 23 13; Josh 23 7). They are not to be worshipped but destroyed (Ex 23 24). They are to make no covenant with the people or their gods would be a snare to them (Ex 23 32; Dt 6 14; 7 4.25). A curse will follow any defection from Jeh to them (Dt 11 28; 28 14 ff; 12 3.30; 13 7; 20 18; 29 17). These gods are an abomination to Jeh (Dt 12 31; 20 18; 29 17; 32 37; Ezk 7 20; 1 K 11 5; 2 K 23 13). They are to be as foreign gods to Israel (1 S 7 3 f; Josh 24 20.23; Jgs 10 16; 2 Ch 14 3; 33 15).

The constant tendency of Israel to go after other gods was first made manifest at Sinai (Ex 32 1.4.8.23.31; 34 15). Hosea says (1 2), 6. Israel's Tendency to Go after Other Gods "The more the prophets called them, the more they went from them." Eze-kiel declares (16 3), "The Amorite was thy father, and thy mother was a Hittite," referring doubtless to the idolatrous taint in the blood of Israel.

The tendency manifested itself also at Baal-peor where Israel was led into the licentious rites of the Moabites (Nu 25 2 f). Moses saw the taint in the blood, foresaw the danger and repeatedly warned them (Dt 17 3; 18 20; 29 26; 30 17; 31 18). Perhaps the most striking passages in Dt are chs 13, 28, 30, where are pictured the consequences of going after other gods. Joshua also warns them (23 7), and the history of the period of the Judges is the story of their periodical defection from Jeh and the punishment resulting therefrom (Jgs 2 12.17.19; 5 8; 10 6 f; 1 S 8 8). Solomon himself gave an impetus in that direction (1 K 11 5-8). After the disruption, the religion of the Northern Kingdom became very corrupt (1 K 14 9; 2 Ch 13 8 f). The golden calves of Jeroboam opened the door for an inrush of idols and other gods. Ahab's marriage to Jezebel threatened to wipe out Jeh-worship and substitute Baal-worship, and, but for the powerful ministry of Elijah and Elisha, might have effected such a result. Partly checked for a time, the evil broke out in other forms, and even the preaching of Amos and Hosea failed to turn the tide of idolatry. The result was the destruction of the kingdom (2 K 17 7 ff; Jer 3 6-8; 1 Ch 5 25). The Southern Kingdom fared better. Other gods were countenanced by Rehoboam, Abijah, Athaliah, Jehoram, Ahaz, Amon, Manasseh, Jehoiaakim, etc. Reform movements were attempted by Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah and Josiah, but did not wholly avail. In the reign of Manasseh the nation plunged into the worship of other gods. The ministries of Isaiah, Jeremiah, etc., availed not to stop the tide (2 Ch 34 25; Jer 11 13; 5 19; 2 K 23 17; Jer 1 16; 19 4; 7 6; 13 10; 16 11; 44 5.8). The nation was carried into exile because of its going after other gods (2 K 22 17; Dt 29 25 f). The captivity had its desired effect. The Israel that returned and perpetuated the nation never again lapsed into the worship of other gods.

II. In the Apocrypha.—The Apoc reiterates much of the OT teaching: the defection of Israel (2 Esd 1 6); the gods of the nations (Jth 3 8; 8 18); the gods which their fathers worshipped (5 7 f); the sin of Israel (Ad Est 14 7). The Book of Wisd refers to the "creatures which they supposed to be gods" (12 27; 13 2.3.10; 15 15). Mention is made of the gods of Babylon (Bar 1 22; 6 6-57 passim; Bel 1 27).

III. In the NT.—The expression "gods" occurs in six places in the NT: (1) Jesus, in reply to the Pharisees, who questioned His right to call Himself the son of God, quoted Ps 82 6: "I said, Ye are gods." He argues from this that if God Himself called them gods to whom the word of God came, i.e. the judges who acted as representatives of God in a judicial capacity, could not He who had been sanctified and sent into the world justly call Himself the Son of God? It was an argumentum ad hominem (Jn 10 34-37). (2) When Paul and Barnabas preached the gospel in Lystra they healed a certain man who had been a cripple from birth. The Lycaonians, seeing the miracle, cried out in their own dialect, "The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. And they called Barnabas, Jupiter; and Paul, Mercury" (Acts 14 11 f). Their ascription of deity to the apostles in such times shows their familiarity with the Gr pantheon. (3) As Paul preached Jesus and the resurrection at Athens the people said he seemed to be a setter forth of strange gods. The conception of only one God seemed to be wholly foreign to them (Acts 17 18). (4) In 1 Cor 8 5 Paul speaks of "gods many, and lords many," but the context shows that he did not believe in the existence of any god but one; "We know that no idol is anything in the world." (5) While at Ephesus, Paul was said to have "persuaded and turned away much people, saying that they are no gods, that are made with hands" (Acts 19 26). (6) The Galatians had been "in bondage to them that by nature are no gods" (Gal 4 8). Indirect references are also found in Acts 17 16, where Paul observed the city full of idols. Likewise in Rom 1 22 f.25 ff. Paul refers to the numerous gods of the heathen world. These were idols, birds, four-footed beasts and creeping things. The results of this degrading worship are shown in the ver following. See also IDOLATRY; GOD, NAMES OF.

J. J. REEVE

GOD(S), STRANGE, strānj: The word "strange," as used in this connection in the OT, refers to the fact that the god or gods do not belong to Israel, but are the gods which are worshipped by other families or nations. In several cases a more exact tr would give us the "gods of the stranger" or foreigner. So in Gen 35 2.4; Josh 24 2; Jgs 10 16; Dt 31 16; 32 12, etc. In a few passages like Dt 32 16; Ps 44 20; 81 9; Isa 43 12, the word is an adj., but the idea is the same: the gods are those which are worshipped by other peoples and hence are forbidden to Israel, which is under obligation to worship Yahweh alone (cf 2 Esd 1 6).

In the NT the phrase occurs only once, in the account of Paul's experiences in Athens (Acts 17 18), when some of his auditors said, "He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange gods" (τίνα δαιμόνια, ζένα δαιμόνια). Here the thought is clearly that by his preaching of Jesus he was regarded as introducing a new divinity, that is one who was strange or foreign to the Athenians and of whom they had never heard before. Like the Romans of this period the Athenians were doubtless interested in, and more or less favorable to, the numerous new cults which were coming to their attention as the result of the constant intercourse with the Orient. GODSPEED, god'spēd (χαίρω, chaitrō): "God-speed" occurs only in 2 Jn vs 10.11 AV as the tr of chaitrein, the infin. of chaitrō, and is rendered in RV "greeting." It means "rejoice," "be of good cheer," "be it well with thee"; chaitre, chaitrele, chaitrein, were common forms of greeting, expressive of good-will and desire for the person's prosperity, tr'd in the Gospels, "Hail!" "All Hail!" (Mt 26 49; 27 29; 28 9, etc); chaitrein is the LXX for shālōm (Isa 48 22; 57 21; cf 2 Macc 1 10). "Godspeed" first appears in Tindale's version; Wyclif had "heill!" Rheims, "God save you."

In the passage cited Christians are forbidden thus to salute false teachers who might come to them. The injunction does not imply any breach of charity, since it would not be right to wish anyone success in advocating what was believed to be false and harmful. We should be sincere in our greetings; formal courtesy must yield to truth, still courteously, however, and in the spirit of love.

GOEL, gō'el (גֹּאֵל, gō'āl, "redeemer"): Goel is the participle of the Heb word gō'āl ("to deliver," "to redeem") which aside from its common usage is frequently employed in connection with Heb law, where it is the technical term applied to a person who as the nearest relative of another is placed under certain obligations to him. (1) If a Jew because of poverty had been obliged to sell himself to a wealthy "stranger or sojourner," it became the duty of his relatives to redeem him. Cf Lev 25 47 ff and the art. JUBILEE. (2) The same duty fell upon the nearest kinsman, if his brother, being poor, had been forced to sell some of his property. Cf Lev 25 23 ff; Ruth 4 4 ff, and the art. JUBILEE. (3) It also devolved upon the nearest relative to marry the childless widow of his brother (Ruth 3 13; Tob 3 17). (4) In Nu 5 5 ff a law is stated which demands that restitution be made to the nearest relative, and after him to the priest, if the injured party has died (Lev 6 1 ff). (5) The law of blood-revenge (Blut-Rache) made it the sacred duty of the nearest relative to avenge the blood of his kinsman. He was called the gō'āl ha-dām (גֹּאֵל הַדָּם), "the avenger of blood." This law was based upon the command given in Gen 9 5 f: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," and was carried out even if an animal had killed a man; in this case, however, the payment of a ransom was permitted (Ex 21 28 ff). A clear distinction was made between an accidental and a deliberate murder. In both cases the murderer could find refuge at the altar of the sanctuary; if, however, the investigation revealed presumptuous manslaughter, he was taken from the altar to be put to death (Ex 21 12 ff; 1 K 1 50; 2 28). In Nu 35 9 ff definite regulations as to the duties of the Goel are given. Six cities were to be appointed as "cities of refuge," three on each side of the Jordan. The congregation has judgment over the murderer. There must be more than one witness to convict a man. If he is found guilty, he is delivered to the Goel; if murder was committed by accident he is permitted to live within the border of the city of refuge; in case the manslayer leaves this city before the death of the high priest, the avenger of blood has a right to slay him. After the death of the high priest the murderer may return to his own city. Ransom cannot be given for the life of a murderer; no expiation can be made for a murder but by the blood of the murderer (Dt 19 4 ff; Josh 20; 2 S 14 6 ff). According to the law the children of a murderer could not be held responsible for the crime of their father (Dt 24 16; 2 K 14 6), but see 2 S 21 1 ff. The order in which the nearest relative was considered the Goel is given in Lev 25 48 f: first a brother, then an uncle or an uncle's son, and after them any other near relative. This order was observed in connection with (1) above, but probably also in the other cases except (4).

For the figurative use of Goel ("redeemer") see Ps 119 154; Prov 23 11; Job 19 25; Isa 41 14b. See also AVENGE; MURDER; REFUGE, CITIES OF.

GOG, gog (גֹּג, gōg; גֹּגִי, Gōgi):

(1) A son of Joel, and descendant of the tribe of Reuben (1 Ch 5 4).

(2) The prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal (Ezk 38 2 f; 39 1-16). His territory was known as the land of Magog, and he was the chief of those northern hordes who were to make a final onslaught upon Israel while enjoying the blessings of the Messianic age. He has been identified with Gagi, ruler of Sakhi, mentioned by Assurbanipal, but Professor Sayce thinks the Heb name corresponds more closely to Gyges, the Lydian king, the Gugu of the cuneiform inscriptions. According to Ezekiel's account Gog's army included in its numbers Persia, Cush, Put, Gomer or the Cimmerians, and Togarmah, from the extreme N. They are represented as a vast mixed horde from the far-off parts of the N., the limits of the horizon, completely armed and equipped for war. They were to come upon the mountains of Israel and cover the land like a cloud. Their purpose is plunder, for the people of Israel are rich and dwell in towns and villages without walls. His coming, which had been prophesied by the seers of Israel, shall be accompanied by a theophany and great convulsions in Nature. A panic shall seize the hosts of Gog, rain, hailstones, pestilence, fire and brimstone shall consume them. Their bodies shall be food for the birds, their weapons shall serve as firewood for seven years and their bones shall be buried E. of the Jordan in Hamon-gog and thus not defile the holy land. The fulfilment of this strange prophecy can never be literal. In general it seems to refer to the last and desperate attempts of a dying heathenism to overturn the true religion of Jeh, or make capital out of it, profiting by its great advantages.

(3) In Rev 20 7 Satan is let loose and goes to the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog, to muster his hosts for the final struggle against God. In Ezk the invasion of Gog occurs during the Messianic age, while in Rev it occurs just at the close of the millennium. In Ezk Gog and Magog are gathered by Jeh for their destruction; in Rev they are gathered by Satan. In both cases the number is vast, the destruction is by supernatural means, and is complete and final. See MAGOG.

GOIIM, gōi'im (גוֹיִם, gōyim): This word, rendered in AV "nations," "heathen," "Gentiles," is commonly tr^d simply "nations" in RV. In Gen 14 1 where AV has "Tid, king of nations," RV retains in the text the Heb "Goiim" as a proper name. Some identify with Gutium. The Heb word is similarly retained in Josh 12 23.

GOING, gō'ing, GOINGS, gō'ingz: Besides, occasionally, forms of the common words for "go" (see Go), for "going" and "goings," the Heb has גֹּשְׁשׁוּר, 'ashshur ('āshūr, 'āshūr), "step," מִצְעָד, māṣāḏ, מִצְעָדֹת, māṣāḏōth, "goings out," "outgoings." The word "goings" is sometimes used lit., as in Nu 33 2, "Moses wrote their goings out" (Heb māṣāḏ). "Going up," ma'āleh, is in many passages rendered in RV (as in Nu 34 4; 2 S 15 30 AV) "ascent," as e.g. Josh 15 7; Jgs 1 36; Neh 12 37 (ARV only). In Ezk 44 5, ARV substitutes "egress" (way out or place of exit) for "going forth." "The goings out [place of exit; hence, boundary] of it" (Nu 34 4.5.9. 12 AV) occurs frequently. The verbal forms bō', mābhō', also mē'al (Dnl 6 14), are used of the sunset, "the going down of the sun." Thus Josh 8 29 RV, AV "as soon as the sun was down."

In the NT, RV substitutes "going out" for "gone out" (sbēnnumi) (Mt 25 8); "going up" for "ascending" (Lk 19 28); "going in" for "coming in" (Acts 9 28); "going about" for "wandering" (1 Tim 5 13); "seeking" for "going about" (Rom 10 3).

Metaphorically: "Goings" is used for a man's ways or conduct (Ps 17 5, RV "steps"; 40 2; Prov 14 15, etc.). In Ps 17 5 "Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not" becomes in RV "My steps have held fast to thy paths, my feet have not slipped"; Prov 5 21, "He pondereth all his goings," is in RV "He maketh level all his paths," m "weigheth carefully"; conversely, in Ps 37 23, RV has "goings" for "steps"; in Jas 1 11 "goings" for "ways." In the important prophetic passage, Mic 5 2, it is said of the Ruler from Bethlehem, "whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting," RV "are from of old, from everlasting," m "from ancient days." Of God it is said in Hab 3 6 "His ways are everlasting," RV "His goings were as of old," m "His ways are everlasting." W. L. WALKER

GOLAN, gō'lan (גֹּלָן, gōlān), GAULONITIS (Γαυλονίτις, Gaulanitis): Golan was a city in the territory allotted to Manasseh in Bashan, the most northerly of the three cities of refuge E. of the Jordan (Dt 4 43; Josh 20 8); assigned with its "suburbs" to the Gershonite Levites (Josh 21 27; 1 Ch 6 71). It must have been a great and important city in its day; but the site cannot now be determined with any certainty. It was known to Jos (Ant, XIII, xv, 3). Near Golan Alexander was ambushed by Obodas, king of the Arabians; and his army, crowded together in a narrow and deep valley, was broken in pieces by the multitude of camels (BJ, I, iv, 4). This incident is located at Gadara in Ant, XIII, xiii, 5. Later, Golan was destroyed by Alexander. It had already given its name to a large district, Gaulonitis (BJ, III, iii, 1, 5; IV, i, 1). It formed the eastern boundary of Galilee. It was part of the tetrarchy of Philip (Ant, XVII, viii, 1; XVIII, iv, 6). The city was known to Eusebius as "a large village," giving its name to the surrounding country (Onom, s.v. Γαυλόν, Gaulōn). This country must have corresponded roughly with the modern Jaulān, in which the ancient name is preserved. The boundaries of the province today are Mt. Hermon on the N., Jordan and the Sea of Galilee on the W., Wādī Yarmūk on the S., and Nahr 'Allān on the E. This plateau, which in the N. is about 3,000 ft. high, slopes gradually southward to a height of about 1,000 ft. It is entirely volcanic, and there are many cone-like peaks of extinct volcanoes, esp. toward the N. It affords good pasturage, and has long been a favorite summer grazing-ground of the nomads. Traces of ancient forests remain, but for the most part today it is treeless. To the E. of the Sea of Galilee the soil is deep and rich. Splendid crops of wheat are grown here, and olives flourish in the hollows. The country is furrowed by deep valleys that carry the water southwestward into the Sea of Galilee. This region has not yet been subjected to thorough examination, but many important ruins have been found, which tell of a plentiful and prosperous population in times long past. The best description of these, and of the region generally, will be found in Schumacher's The Jaulān, and Across the Jordan. To him also we owe the excellent maps which carry us eastward to the province of el-Haurān.

Schumacher inclines to the belief that the ancient Golan may be represented by Sahm el-Jaulān, a large village fully 4 miles E. of Nahr 'Allān, and 4 miles S.E. of Tail. The extensive ruins probably date from early in the Christian era. The buildings are of stone, many of them of spacious dimensions, while the streets are wide and straight. The inhabitants number not more than 280. The surrounding soil is rich and well watered, bearing excellent crops. The present writer, after personal examination, corroborates Dr. Schumacher's description. Standing in the open country, it would be seen from afar; and it was easily accessible from all directions.

GOLD, göld (זָהָב, zāhābh; χρυσός, chrysós): No metal has been more frequently mentioned in OT writings than gold, and none has 1. Terms had more terms applied to it. Among these terms the one most used is zāhābh. The Arab. equivalent, dhahab, is still the common name for gold throughout Pal, Syria and Egypt. With zāhābh frequently occur other words which, tr^d, mean "pure" (Ex 25 11), "refined" (1 Ch 28 18), "finest" (1 K 10 18), "beaten" (1 K 10 17), "Ophir" (Ps 45 9).

Other terms occurring are: זָהָב, pās, "fine gold" (Job 28 17; Ps 19 10; 21 3; 119 127; Prov 8 19; Cant 5 11.15; Isa 13 12; Lam 4 2); זָהָבִית, dhābūt (Ps 68 13; Prov 3 14; 8 10.19; 16 16; Zec 9 3); כֶּתֶם, ketem, lit. "carved out" (Job 28 16.19; 31 24; Prov 25 12; Lam 4 1; Dnl 10 5); זָהָבִית, zāhābūt (1 K 6 20; 7 50; Job 28 15); בֶּצֶר, bezer (In AV only: Job 22 24; RV "treasure").

Sources definitely mentioned in the OT are: Havilah (Gen 2 11.12); Ophir (1 K 9 28; 10 11; 22 48; 1 Ch 29 4; 2 Ch 8 18; 9 10; 2. Sources Job 22 24; 28 16; Ps 45 9; Isa 13 12; Sheba (1 K 10 2.10; 2 Ch 9 1.9; Ps 72 15; Isa 60 6; Ezk 27 22; 38 13); Arabia (2 Ch 9 14). We are not justified in locating any of these places too definitely. They probably all refer to some region of Arabia.

The late origin of the geological formation of Pal and Syria precludes the possibility of gold being found in any quantities (see METALS), so that the large quantities of gold used by the children of Israel in constructing their holy places was not the product of mines in the country, but was from the spoil taken from the inhabitants of the land (Nu 31 52), or brought with them from Egypt (Ex 3 22). This gold was probably mined in Egypt or India (possibly Arabia), and brought by the great caravan routes through Arabia to Syria, or by sea in the ships of Tyre (1 K 10 11.22; Ezk 27 21.22). There is no doubt about the Egypt sources. The old workings in the gold-bearing veins of the Egypt desert and the ruins of the buildings connected with the mining and refining of the precious metal still remain. This region is being reopened with the prospect of its becoming a source of part of the world's supply. It might be inferred from the extensive spoils in gold taken from the Midianites (£100,000 HDB, s.v.) that their country (North-western Arabia) produced gold. It is more likely that the Midianites had, in turn, captured most of it from other weaker nations. The tradition that Northwestern Arabia is rich in gold still persists. Every year Moslem pilgrims, returning from Mecca by the Damascus route, bring with them specimens of what is supposed to be gold ore. They secure it from the Arabs at the stopping-places along the route. Samples analyzed by the writer have been iron pyrites only. No gold-bearing rock has yet appeared. Whether these specimens come from the mines mentioned by Burton (The Land of Midian Revisited) is a question.

Gold formed a part of every household treasure (Gen 13 2; 24 35; Dt 8 13; 17 17; Josh 22 8; Ezk 28 4). It was probably treas-

3. Forms (a) in the form of nuggets (Job 28 6 RVm), (b) in regularly or irregularly shaped slabs or bars (Nu 7 14.20.84.86; Josh

7 21.24; 2 K 5 5), and (c) in the form of dust (Job 28 6). A specimen of yellow dust, which the owner claimed to have taken from an ancient jar, unearthed in the vicinity of the Hauran, was once brought to the writer's laboratory. On examination it was found to contain iron pyrites and metallic gold in finely divided state. It was probably part of an ancient household treasure. A common practice was to make gold into jewelry with the dual purpose of ornamentation and of treasuring it. This custom still prevails, esp. among the Moslems, who do not let out their money at interest. A poor woman will save her small coins until she has enough to buy a gold bracelet. This she will wear or put away against the day of need (cf Gen 24 22.53). It was weight and not beauty which was noted in the jewels (Ex 3 22; 11 2; 12 35). Gold coinage was unknown in the early OT times.

(1) The use of gold as the most convenient way of treasuring wealth is mentioned above. (2)

Jewelry took many forms: armlets (Nu 31 50), bracelets (Gen 24 22), chains (Gen 41 42), crescents (Jgs 8 26), crowns (2 S 12 30; 1 Ch 20 2), earrings (Ex 32 2.3; Nu 31 50; Jgs 8 24.26), rings (Gen 24 22; 41 42; Jas 2 2). (3) Making and decorating objects in connection with places of worship: In the description of the building of the ark and the tabernacle in Ex 25 ff, we read of the lavish use of gold in overlaying wood and metals, and in shaping candlesticks, dishes, spoons, flagons, bowls, snuffers, curtain clasps, hooks, etc (one estimate of the value of gold used is £90,000; see HDB). In 1 K 6 ff; 1 Ch 28 ff; 2 Ch 1 ff are records of still more extensive use of gold in building the temple. (4) Idols were made of gold (Ex 20 23; 32 4; Dt 7 25; 29 17; 1 K 12 28; Ps 115 4; 135 15; Isa 30 22; Rev 9 20). (5) Gold was used for lavish display. Among the fabulous luxuries of Solomon's court were his gold drinking-vessels (1 K 10 21), a throne of ivory overlaid with gold (1 K 10 18), and golden chariot trimmings (1 Ch 28 18). Sacred treasure saved from votive offerings or portions dedicated from booty were principally gold (Ex 25 36; Nu 7 14.20.84.86; 31 50.52.54; Josh 6 19.24; 1 S 6 8.11.15; 2 S 8 11; 1 Ch 18 7.10.11; 22 14.16; Mt 23 17). This treasure was the spoil most sought after by the enemy. It was paid to them as tribute (1 K 15 15; 2 K 12 18; 14 14; 16 8; 18 14-16; 23 33.35), or taken as plunder (2 K 24 13; 25 15).

Gold is used to symbolize earthly riches (Job 3 15; 22 24; Isa 2 7; Mt 10 9; Acts 3 6; 20 33; Rev 18 12). Finer than gold, which,

5. Figurative physically speaking, is considered non-perishable, typifies incorruptibility (Acts 17 29; 1 Pet 1 7.18; 3 3; Jas

5 3). Refining of gold is a figure for great purity or a test of steadfastness (Job 23 10; Prov 17 3; Isa 1 25; Mal 3 2; 1 Pet 1 7; Rev 3 18). Gold was the most valuable of metals. It stood for anything of great value (Prov 3 14; 8 10.19; 16 16.22; 25 12), hence was most worthy for use in worshipping Jeh (Ex 25 ff; Rev 1 12.13.20, etc), and the adornment of angels (Rev 15 6) or saints (Ps 45 13). The head was called golden as being the most precious part of the body (Cant 5 11; Dnl 2 38; cf "the golden bowl," Eccl 12 6). "The golden city" meant Babylon (Isa 14 4), as did also "the golden cup," sensuality (Jer 51 7). A crown of gold was synonymous with royal honor (Est 2 17; 6 8; Job 19 9; Rev 4 4; 14 14). Wearing of gold typified lavish adornment and worldly luxury (Jer 4 30; 10 4; 1 Tim 2 9; 1 Pet 3 3; Rev 17 4). Comparing men to gold suggested their nobility (Lam 4 1.2; 2 Tim 2 20). JAMES A. PATCH

GOLDEN, göld"n, CALF: Probably a representation of the sun in Taurus. See ASTROLOGY, 7; CALF, GOLDEN.

GOLDEN, göld"n, CITY: The tr "golden city" (Isa 14 4) is an attempt to render the received text (מְדִינַת הַזָּהָב, madhēbhāh), but can hardly be justified. Almost all the ancient VSS read מְרִינַת (marhēbhāh), a word which connotes unrest and insolence, fitting the context well.

GOLDEN NUMBER, göld"n num'bēr: Used in the regulation of the ecclesiastical calendar, in the "Metonic cycle" of 19 years, which almost exactly reconciles the natural month and the solar year. See ASTRONOMY, 1, 5.

GOLDSMITH, göld'smith (צִרְיָה, ṣōrēph): Goldsmiths are first mentioned in connection with the building of the tabernacle (Ex 31 4; 36 1). Later, goldsmiths' guilds are mentioned (Neh 3 8, 32). The art of refining gold and shaping it into objects was probably introduced into Pal from Phoenicia (see CRAFTS). Examples of gold work from the earliest Egypt periods are so numerous in the museums of the world that we do not have to draw on our imaginations to appreciate the wonderful skill of the ancient goldsmiths. Probably their designs and methods were those later used by the Jews. The goldsmiths' art was divided into (1) the refining of the impure gold (Job 28 1; Prov 17 3; 25 4; 27 21; Isa 1 25; Mal 3 3); (2) shaping of objects, (a) casting idols (Nu 33 52; Hos 13 2), (b) making graven images (2 Ch 34 3, 4; Jer 10 14; Nah 1 14), (c) the making of beaten or turned work (Ex 25 18), (d) plating or overlaying (Ex 25 11; 1 K 6 20), (e) soldering (Isa 41 7), (f) making of wire (Ex 28 6; 39 3). Most of these processes are carried on in Bible lands today. In Damascus there is a goldsmiths' quarter where the refining, casting and beating of gold are still carried on, probably in much the same way as in Solomon's time. Jews are found among the goldsmiths. In Beirūt, it is a Jew who is esp. skilled in making refiners' pots. Daily, one can see the gold being refined, cast into lumps, beaten on an anvil, rolled between rollers into thin sheets, cut into narrow strips (wire), and wound on bobbins ready for the weaver. There are houses in Damascus and Aleppo still possessing beautiful gold overlaid work on wooden walls and ceilings, the work of goldsmiths of several centuries ago. JAMES A. PATCH

GOLGOTHA, gol'gō-tha (Τολυγαῶ, Golgothā, from Aram. גּוּלְגַלְתָּא, gulgallā, "a skull"): In three references (Mt 27 33; Mk 15 22; Jn 19 17) it is interpreted to mean κρανίου τόπος, kranīou tōpos, "the place of a skull." In Lk 23 33 AV it is called "Calvary," but in RV simply "The skull." From the NT we may gather that it was outside the city (He 13 12), but close to it (Jn 19 20), apparently near some public thoroughfare (Mt 27 39), coming from the country (Mk 15 21). It was a spot visible, from some points, from afar (Mk 15 40; Lk 23 49).

Four reasons have been suggested for the name Golgotha or "skull": (1) That it was a spot where skulls were to be found lying about

1. The Name and probably, therefore, a public place of execution. This tradition apparently originates with Jerome (346-420 AD), who refers to (3), to condemn it, and says that "outside the city and without the gate there are places wherein the heads of condemned criminals are cut off and which have obtained the name of Calvary—that is, of the beheaded." This view has been adopted by several later writers. Against it may be urged that there is no shadow of evidence that there was any special place for Jewish executions in the 1st cent., and that, if there were, the corpses could have been allowed burial (Mt 27 58; Jn 19 38), in conformity with Jewish law (Dt 21 23) and with normal custom (Jos, BJ, IV, v, 2). (2) That the name was due to the skull-like shape of the hill—a modern popular view. No early Lat or Gr writer suggests such an idea, and there is no evidence from the Gospels that the Crucifixion occurred on a raised place at all. Indeed Epiphanius (4th cent.) expressly says: "There is nothing to be seen on the place resembling this name; for it is not situated upon a height that it should be called [the place] of a skull, answering to the place of the head in the human body." It is true that the tradition embodied in the name Mons Calvary appears as early as the 4th cent., and is materialized in the traditional site of the Crucifixion in the church of the Holy Sepulcher, but that the hill was skull-like in form is quite a modern idea. Guthe combines (2) and (3) and considers that a natural skull-like elevation came to be considered, by some folklore ideas, to be the skull of the first man. One of the strangest ideas is that of the late General Gordon, who thought that the resemblance to a skull lay in the contours of the ground as laid down in the ordinance survey map of Jerus. (3) That the name is due to an ancient pre-Christian tradition that the skull of Adam was found there. The first mention of this is by Origen (185-253 AD), who himself lived in Jerus 20 years. He writes: "I have received a tradition to the effect that the body of Adam, the first man, was buried upon the spot where Christ was crucified," etc. This tradition was afterward referred to by Athanasius, Epiphanius, Basil of Caesarea, Chrysostom and other later writers. The tomb and skull of Adam, still pointed out in an excavated chamber below the traditional Calvary, marks the survival of this tradition on the spot. This is by far the most ancient explanation of the name Golgotha and, in spite of the absurdity of the original tradition about Adam, is probably the true one.

(4) The highly improbable theory that the Capitolium of Ælia Capitolina (the name given by Hadrian to his new Jerus) stood where the Church of the Holy Sepulcher now is, and gave rise to the name Golgotha, is one which involves the idea that the site first received the name Golgotha in the 2d cent., and that all the references in the Gospels were inserted then. This is only mentioned to be dismissed as incompatible with history and common sense.

With regard to the position of the site of the Crucifixion (with which is bound up the site of the Tomb) the NT gives us no indication

2. The Site whatever; indeed, by those who abandon tradition, sites have been suggested on all sides of the city—N., S., E., and W. Two views hold the field today: (1) that the site of the Crucifixion, or at any rate that of the Tomb itself, is included within the precincts of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher; and (2) that a prominent, rounded, grassy hill above the so-called "Grotto of Jeremiah," N.E. of the Modern Damascus Gate, has at least a very high probability of being the true site. It is impossible here to go into the whole question, which requires minute and long elaboration, but excellent review of the whole evidence may be consulted in "Golgotha and the Holy Sepulcher," by the late Sir Charles W. Wilson, of PEF. Here only a few points can be touched upon. (1) For the traditional view it may be said that it seems highly improbable that so sacred a spot as this, particularly the empty tomb, could have been entirely forgotten. Although it is true that Jews and Heb Christians were driven out of Jerus after the second great revolt (130-33 AD), yet gentle Christians were free to return, and there was no break long enough to account for a site like this being entirely lost. Indeed there are traditions that this site was deliberately defiled by pagan buildings to annoy the Christians. Eusebius, at the time of Constantine, writes as if it were well known that a Temple of Aphrodite lay over the tomb.

Grotto of Jeremiah—"Gordon's Calvary."

He gives an account of the discovery of the spots still venerated as the Golgotha and the Tomb, and of the erection of churches in connection with them (Life of Constantine, III, 25-40). From the time of Constantine there has been no break in the reverence paid to these places. Of the earlier evidence Sir C. Wilson admits (loc. cit.) that "the tradition is so precarious and the evidence is undoubtedly so unsatisfactory as to raise serious doubts."

The topographical difficulties are dealt with in the art. JERUSALEM. It is difficult for the visitor to Jerus sufficiently to realize that the center of gravity of the city has much changed; once it was on the Hill Ophel, and the southern slopes, now bare, were in Christ's time crammed with houses; in later times, from the 4th cent., it was the Church of the Holy Sepulcher round which the city tended to center. There is no insurmountable difficulty in believing that the site of the Crucifixion may be where tradition points out. As Sir C. Wilson says at the end of his book, "No objection urged against the sites [i.e. Golgotha and the Tomb] is of such a convincing nature that it need disturb the minds of those who accept, in all good faith, the authenticity of the places which are hallowed by the prayers of countless pilgrims since the days of Constantine" (loc. cit.).

(2) The so-called "Skull Hill" or "Green Hill" appears to have appealed first to Otto Thenius (1842), but has received its greatest support through the advocacy of the late Col. Conder and of the late Dr Selah Merrill, U.S.A. consul at Jerus. The arguments for this site are mainly: (a) its conspicuous and elevated position—a position which must impress every reverent pilgrim as strikingly suitable for an imaginary reconstruction of the scene. The very greenness of the hill—it is the first green spot in the neighborhood of the city—may influence the subconsciousness of those who have been brought up from childhood to think of the "green hill far away," as the popular hymn puts it. When, however, we consider the question historically, there is not the slightest reason to expect that the crucifixion of Jesus, one of many hundreds, should have been dramatically located in a setting so consonant with the importance with which the world has since learned to regard the event. There is no evidence whatever that the crucifixion was on a hill, much less on such a conspicuous place. (b) The supposed resemblance to a human skull strikes many people, but it may be stated without hesitation that the most arresting points of the resemblance, the "eye-holes" and the rounded top, are not ancient; the former are due to artificial excavations going back perhaps a couple of centuries. Probably the whole formation of the hill, the sharp scarp to the S. and the 10 or more feet of earth accumulated on the summit are both entirely new conditions since NT times. (c) The nearness of the city walls and the great N. road which make the site so appropriate today are quite different conditions from those in NT times. It is only if the present N. wall can be proved to be on the line of the second wall that the argument holds good. On this see JERUSALEM. (d) An argument has been based upon a supposed tradition that this spot was the Jewish place of stoning. This so-called tradition is worthless, and not a trace of it can be found outside interested circles, and even if it were the "place of stoning," it would be no argument for its being "Golgotha." To the Oriental, with his great respect for traditional sites, the church of the Holy Sepulcher, covering at once the Tomb, the Calvary, and other sacred spots, will probably always appeal as the appropriate spot, to the western tourist who wishes to visualise in the environs of Jerus in an appropriate setting the great world's tragedy, such a site as this "Skull Hill" must always make the greater appeal to his imagination, and both may find religious satisfaction in their ideas, but cold reason, reviewing the pros and cons, is obliged to say "not proven" to both, with perhaps an admission of the stronger case for the traditional spot.

GOLIATH, gō-l'ath (גִּלְיָת, golyāth; גִּלְיָת, Goliath):

(1) The giant of Gath, and champion of the Philistines (1 S 17 4-23; 21 9; 23 10; 2 S 21 19; 1 Ch 20 5 ff). He defied the armies of Israel, challenging anyone to meet him in single combat while the two armies faced each other at Ephesdammim. He was slain by the youthful David. Goliath was almost certainly not of Philistines, but belonged to one of the races of giants, or aboriginal tribes, such as the Anakim, Avvim, Rephaim, etc. The Avvim had lived at Philistia, and most probably the giant was of that race. His size was most extraordinary. If a cubit was about 21 in., he was over 11 ft. in height; if about 18 in., he was over 9 ft. in height. The enormous weight of his armor would seem to require the larger cubit. This height probably included his full length in armor, helmet and all. In either case he is the largest man known to history. His sword was wielded by David to slay him and afterward carried about in his wanderings, so it could not have been excessively heavy. The story of his encounter with David is graphic, and the boasts of the two champions were perfectly in keeping with single combats in the Orient.

(2) The Goliath of 2 S 21 19 is another person, and quite probably a son of the first Goliath. He was slain by Elhanan, one of David's mighty men. The person mentioned in 1 Ch 20 5 is called Lahmi, but this is almost certainly due to a corruption of the text. "The brother of Goliath" is the younger Goliath and probably a son of the greater Goliath, who had four sons, giants, one of them having 24 fingers and toes. See ELHANAN; LAHMI.

GOMER, gō-mēr (גֹּמֶר, gōmer): Given in Gen 10 2 f; 1 Ch 1 5 f as a son of Japheth. The name evidently designates the people called Gimirra by the Assyrians, Kimmerians by the Greeks. They were a barbaric horde of Aryans who in the 7th cent. BC left their abode in what is now Southern Russia and poured through the Caucasus into Western Asia, causing serious trouble to the Assyrians and other nations. One division moved eastward toward Media, another westward, where they conquered Cappadocia and made it their special abode. They fought also in other parts of Asia Minor, conquering some portions. The Armenian name for Cappadocia, Gamir, has come from this people. In Eak 23 6 Gomer is mentioned as one of the northern nations.

GEORGE RICKER BERRY

GOMER, gō-mēr (גֹּמֶר, gōmer; Γαμὴρ, Gamēr): Wife of Hosea. Hosea married Gomer according to Divine appointment, and this was the beginning of God's word to him (Hos 1 3; 2 1-4). She was to be a wife of whoredom and they were to have children of whoredom. This need not mean that at the time of marriage she was thus depraved, but she had the evil taint in her blood, had inherited immoral instincts. These soon manifested themselves, and the unfaithful, depraved wife of the prophet went deeper into sin. She seems to have left him and become the slave of her paramour (8 1). Hosea is now commanded by Jeh to buy her back, paying the price of the ordinary slave. The prophet keeps her in confinement and without a husband for some time. This experience of the prophet was typical of Israel's unfaithfulness, of Israel's exile, and of God bringing her back after the punishment of the exile. See HOSEA.

GOMORRAH, gō-mor'a (גִּמְזָרָה, 'āmōrah; LXX and NT Γομόρρα, Gomōrra, or Γόμορρα, Gómorra; Arab. Ghamara, "to overwhelm with water"): One of the CITIES OF THE PLAIN (q.v.) destroyed by fire from heaven in the time of Abraham and Lot (Gen 19 23-29). It was located probably in the plain S. of the Dead Sea, now covered with water. See ARABAH; CITIES OF THE PLAIN; DEAD SEA. De Saulcy, however, with others who place the Cities of the Plain at the N. end of the Dead Sea, fixes upon Khumran (or Gumran), marked on the Survey Map of Pal N. of Ras Feshkeh, where there are ruins about a mile from the Dead Sea. But there is nothing to support this view except the faint resemblance of the name and the inconclusive arguments placing the Cities of the Plain at that end of the sea.

GEORGE FREDERICK WRIGHT

GOOD, gōd (טוֹב, ṭōb, טוֹב, ṭōb, yāṭab; ἀγαθός, agathós, ἀγαθόν, agathón, καλός, kalós, καλόν, kalón): In Eng. "good" is used in various senses, most of which are represented in the Bible.

(1) In the OT the commonest word is ṭōb, occurring very frequently and tr^d in a great variety of ways. Of the different shades of meaning, which frequently run into each other, the following may be distinguished: (a) Possessing desirable qualities, beneficial, agreeable, e.g. "good for food" (Gen 2 9); "We will do thee good" (Nu 10 29); "Who will show us any good?" (Ps 4 6); "good tidings of good" (Isa 52 7). (b) Moral excellence, piety: "to know good and evil" (Gen 3 22); "that which is right and good" (Dt 6 18a; 1 S 12 23); "good and bad" (1 K 3 9, RV "evil"); "Depart from evil and do good" (Ps 37 27); "a good man" (Prov 12 2); cf Isa 5 20; Mic 6 8, etc. (c) Kind, benevolent: "The men were very good unto us" (1 S 25 15); "Give thanks unto Jeh; for he is good" (1 Ch 16 34); "the good Jeh" (2 Ch 30 18); "God is good to Israel" (Ps 73 1); "Jeh is good to all" (Ps 145 9), etc. (d) Serviceable, adequate, sufficient: "saw the light that it was good" (Gen 1 4; so vs 10.12, etc.); "not good that the man should be alone" (2 18); in the frequent phrase, "if it seem good" (1 Ch 13 2; Est 5 4, etc), sometimes rendered, "if it please" (Neh 2 5. 7; Est 1 19, etc). (e) Not small or deficient (full, complete): "a good old age" (Gen 15 15; 25 8); "a good dowry" (30 20); "good ears," i.e., years, "kine" (41 24.26.35); "good understanding" (1 S 25 3); "good trees"—"land" (2 K 3 19.25), etc. (f) Not blemished, fair, honorable: "tender and good" (Gen 18 7); "good kids" (27 9); "good report" (1 S 2 24; cf 2 K 20 3; Jer 24 2); and the renderings "fair" (Gen 26 7, etc), "beautiful" (2 S 11 2), "pleasant" (2 K 2 19), etc. (g) Pleasure-giving, happy: "glad of heart" (1 K 8 66; Est 5 9); sometimes in AV and RV tr^d "merry" (Jgs 16 25; 1 S 25 36; 2 S 13 28; Prov 15 15, RV "cheerful"), etc.

Changes that may be noted in RV are such as, "good" for "ready" (Isa 41 7); "I have no good beyond thee" for "My goodness extendeth not to thee" (Ps 16 2); "goodly" for "good" (45 1); "good" for "goodness" (107 9); "good" for "well" (Zec 8 15).

Tābh means something good, e.g. "the good of the land" (Gen 45 18.20; Dt 6 11; Job 21 16, RV "prosperity").

Yāṭab, "to do good," occurs several times, as, "I will surely do thee good" (Gen 32 12); "to do good" (Lev 5 4); "Make your ways and your doings good," RV "amend" (Jer 18 11; Zeph 1 12, etc).

Numerous other Heb words are rendered "good" in various verbal connections and otherwise, as "to bring good tidings" (2 S 4 10; Isa 40 9, etc); "take good heed" (Dt 2 4; 4 15; Josh 23 11); "make good" (Ex 21 34), etc; "good will" (raṣōn, Dt 33 16; Mal 2 13); "what good?" RV "what advantages?" (kishrōn, Eccl 5 11); "good for nothing," RV "profitable" (ṣāḥōn, Jer 13 10), etc. In Jer 18 4, "as seemed good to the potter," the word is yāshār, which means lit. "right."

(2) In the NT the words most frequently tr^d "good" are agathos and kalos. The former, agathos, denotes good as a quality, physical or moral. Thus, "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good" (Mt 5 45); "good gifts" (7 11); "Good Master [RV "Teacher"] . . . Why callest thou me good? none is good save one" (Mk 10 17; Lk 18 18; cf Mt 19 16 f); "they that have done good" (Jn 5 29). Sometimes it is equivalent to "kind" (thus Tit 2 5 RV); to agathon is "that which is good" (Lk 6 45; Rom 7 13; 1 Thess 5 15; 1 Pet 3 13), etc; "that which is honest," RV "honorable" (2 Cor 13 7); "meet" (Mt 15 26; Mk 7 27); "worthy," RV "honorable" (Jas 2 7); agathon is "a good thing," as "good things to them that ask him" (Mt 7 11); "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (Jn 1 46), etc; agathoergēō (1 Tim 6 18), and agathopoieō (Mk 3 4; Acts 14 17), etc, "to do good."

Kalos is properly, "beautiful," "pleasing," "useful," "noble," "worthy" in a moral sense, e.g. "that they may see your good works" (Mt 5 16); "She hath wrought a good work on me" (Mt 26 10; Mk 14 6); "the good shepherd" (Jn 10 11.14); "Many good works have I showed you" (10 32); "good and acceptable before God" (1 Tim 5 4; RV omits "good"); "the good fight" (2 Tim 4 7); "good works" (Tit 2 7); "the good word of God" (He 6 5). But it is often practically equivalent to agathos, e.g. "good fruit" (Mt 3 10); "good ground" (13 23); "good seed" (13 24); but the idea of useful may underlie such expressions; to kalon is properly "that which is beautiful." It occurs in Rom 7 18.21; 1 Thess 5 21, "Hold fast that which is good." In Rom 7 it seems to be used interchangeably with agathon. In Rom 5 7, "the good man" (ho agathos) is distinguished from "a righteous man" (dikaïos): "For the good man some one would even dare to die" (cf Rom 7 16; He 5 14; Jas 4 17); kalos, "well," "pleasantly," is tr^d "good" (Lk 6 27; Jas 2 3); kalodidaskalos (Tit 2 3), "teachers of good things," RV "of that which is good."

"Good" occurs in the rendering of many other Gr words and phrases, as eudokia, "good pleasure" (Eph 1 9); "good will" (Lk 2 14; Phil 1 15); sumphērō, "to bear together," "not good to marry" (Mt 19 10), RV "expedient"; philágathos, "a lover of good" (Tit 1 8); chrēstologia, "good words" (Rom 16 18, RV "smooth speech," etc).

The following changes in RV may be noted. In Lk 2 14 for "men of good will" (eudokia) RV reads "in whom he is well pleased," m "good pleasure among men, Gr men of good pleasure." The meaning is "men to whom God is drawing nigh in good-will or acceptance"; cf Lk 4 19, "the acceptable year of the Lord"; 4 43, "Preach the good tidings of the kingdom of God." In Mt 11 5; Lk 4 43; 7 22; 1 Pet 1 25 and (ARV) Rev 14 6 "the gospel" is changed into "good tidings." In Mt 13 8 f; Mk 9 43, 45, 47; Lk 5 39, "good" is substituted for "better"; on the last passage in notes "Many authorities read 'better'"; in 1 Cor 9 15, "good . . . rather" for "better"; "good" is substituted in Lk 1 19; 8 1 and Acts 13 32 for "glad"; in Acts 6 3 for "honest"; in He 13 9 for "a good thing." In 2 Thess 1 11, "all the good pleasure of his goodness" becomes "every desire of goodness" (in "Gr good pleasure of goodness"); in 1 Tim 3 2, "good" (kósmios) becomes "orderly." There are many other instances of like changes. See GOODNESS; Good, Chief.

GOOD, CHIEF: What this consisted in was greatly discussed in ancient philosophy. Varro enumerated 288 answers to the question. By Plato "the good" was identified with God.

In the OT while the "good" of the nation consisted in earthly well-being or prosperity (Dt 28 etc), that of the individual was to be found only in God Himself (Ps 16 2 RV, "I have no good beyond thee"; 42 1-5; 43 5; 73 25-28; Jer 31 33 f; Hab 3 17-19). This implied godly conduct (Mic 6 8, etc), and led to the experience described as "blessedness" (Ps 1, etc; Jer 17 7, etc). It is the "Wisdom" extolled in Prov 1 20; 8 1 f (cf Eccles 1 1 f; 5 1 f), elsewhere described as "the fear of Jeh." That God alone can be the true "good" of man is implied in the fact that man was created in the image of God (Gen 1 27).

In the NT the true "good" is placed by Jesus in "the kingdom of God" (Mt 6 33; 13 44 f, etc). This means nothing earthly merely (Mt 6 19), but heavenly and eternal. It implies the OT conception that God is the true "good"; for to seek the Kingdom supremely means whole-hearted devotion to God as our heavenly Father and to His righteousness. It was also spoken of by Jesus, as sonship to the heavenly Father (Mt 5 45, etc). This "good" is not something merely to be given to men, but must be sought after and won through taking up a right attitude toward God and our fellows, cherishing the Love that God is, and acting it out in kindness and righteousness, in resemblance to our God and Father (Mt 5 43-48; here Gen 1 27 is implied).

In some of the epistles Christ is represented as the true "good" (Phil 3 8 f; Col 3 1-4.11). This is because in Him God was manifested in His Truth and Grace; in Him "the Kingdom" was present; through His cross the world is so reconciled to God that men can find acceptance and rest in Him as their "good"; Christ Himself in the Spirit is our Life; in Him we have "God with us." Having God as our "good," nothing but good, in the truest and highest sense, can come to us. Even the most seemingly adverse things are turned into good "to them that love God" (Rom 8 28).

Our true "good" is found thus in God even in this present life; but its fullness can be realized only in the eternal life beyond. Placing our "good" in God leads to such life in devotion to the "good" that God is, as tends to bring all that is best to this present world. It is men's failure to do this that is the source of our misery (Jer 2 13, etc). The ultimate ideal is that God shall be "all in all" (1 Cor 15 28).

GOODLINESS, gōd'li-nes: This word is found in Isa 40 6 as the tr of ḥesedh, commonly tr^d "mercy," "kindness," etc: "All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness [beauty, charm, comeliness] thereof is as the flower of the field." The rendering is retained by ERV and ARV as appropriate in this place; ḥesedh is frequently tr^d "goodness." In Isa 40 6 LXX has dóxa, "glory" (so also 1 Pet 1 24), which also fitly expresses the idea of the passage.

GOODLY, gōd'li (טוֹב, tōb; καλός, kalós, λαμπρός, lampρός): In the OT various words are tr^d "goodly," the most of them occurring only once; tōb (the common word for "good") is several times tr^d "goodly," chiefly in the sense of form or appearance, e.g. "a goodly child" (Ex 2 2); "that goodly mountain" (Dt 3 25); yāpneh ("fair") is similarly tr^d in Gen 39 6, RV "comely," and mar'eh in 2 S 23 21. Other words, such as 'addir imply excellence, honor, etc, e.g. Ezk 17 23, "bear fruit, and be a goodly cedar"; hōdā, "his goodly horse" (Zec 10 3); others imply beauty, ornament, such as p'et, "goodly bonnets," RV "headtires" (Ex 39 28); shāphar ("bright," "fair"), "a goodly heritage" (Ps 16 6); once 'ēl ("God of might") is employed, RV "cedars of God," m "goodly cedars" (Ps 80 10); ṣānānīm ("joyous soundings or shoutings") is tr^d in Job 39 13, "goodly wings," probably from the sound made in flying or flapping; ERV has "The wing of the ostrich rejoiceth" ARV (wings) "wave proudly." For "goodly castles" (Nu 31 10) RV has "encampments"; "goodly vessels" (2 Ch 32 27) for "pleasant jewels"; "goodly" is substituted for "good" (Ps 45 1; Cant 1 3); "goodly things" for "all the goods" (Gen 24 10); "goodly frame," ARV for "comely proportion" (Job 41 12).

In the NT kalos ("beautiful") is tr^d "goodly" in Mt 13 45, "goodly pearls" and Lk 21 5 "goodly stones"; lampros ("bright") in Jas 2 2, "goodly apparel," RV "fine clothing," and Rev 18 14, "dainty and goodly," RV "dainty and sumptuous." In He 11 23, RV substitutes "goodly" for "proper." "Goodly" occurs in Apoc, 1 Ead 4 18; Jth 8 7 (hōratos); 2 Macc 9 16, "goodly gifts," kállistos, RV "goodliest."

GOODLY TREES (טֵמָר, ṭēmār, ṭēr; ἁδῆρ, hādēr, "the fruit [AV 'boughs'] of goodly [=beautiful or noble] trees"): One of the four species of plants used in the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev 23 40). In the Talm (Šukkah 35a) this is explained to be the citron Citron (Citrus medica).

(Citrus medica) known in Heb as 'ethrōgh. This tradition is ancient, at least as old as the Maccabees. Jos (Ant, XIII, xiii, 5) records that Alexander Jannaeus, while serving at the altar during this feast, was pelted by the infuriated Jews with citrons. This fruit also figures on coins of this period. It is probable that the citron tree (Malum Persica) was imported from Babylon by Jews returning from the captivity. A citron is now carried in the synagogue by every orthodox Jew in one hand, and the lulāb (of myrtle, willow, and palm branch) in the other, on each day of the Feast of Tabernacles.

Originally the "goodly trees" had a much more generic sense, and the term is so interpreted by the LXX and Vulg. See FEASTS AND FASTS; BOOTH.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

GOODMAN, gōd'man (עֲבֵד, 'ish; οἰκοδεσπότης, oikodespotēs): The word occurs once in the OT and is a tr of the ordinary word for "man," 'ish (Prov 7 19). "The goodman is not at home," so AV and RV, but ARV, more correctly, "The man is not at home"; i.e. the husband is not at home; the Geneva and Douay VSS have "My husband is not at home": so Wycliffe; while the Vulg has "There is not a man in her house." In the NT "goodman" is a tr of oikodespotēs. This word occurs 12 t in the Synoptists, and nowhere else. AV and RV have 3 translations of the word, ARV 2. In 4 places AV has "goodman" while ARV has "householder" or "master of the house" (Mt 20 11; 24 43; Lk 12 39; 23 11). In all the other places it is tr^d "householder" or "master of the house." RV retains "goodman" in Mk 14 14 and Lk 23 11. The word lit. means "master of the house," or "husband." The adj. is a mark of respect, and is used somewhat as our word "Mr.," an appellative of respect or civility. Relationship by marriage was distinguished by this epithet, as "good-father," "good-sister," both in England and Scotland. Later the adj. lost its distinguishing force and was swallowed up in the word.

J. J. REEVE

GOODNESS, gōd'nēs: This word in the OT is the tr of ṭōbb (Ex 18 9; Ps 16 2, RV "good"; 23 6), etc.; of ṭābh (Ex 33 19; Ps 31 19; Jer 31 14; Hos 3 5), etc.; of ḥesedh (Ex 34 6), "abundant in g.," ERV "plenteous in mercy," ARV "abundant in loving kindness"; "The g. of God endureth continually," RV "mercy," ARV "loving kindness" (Ps 52 1), etc.

In the NT it is the tr of chrēstotēs ("usefulness," benignity); "the riches of his g.," (Rom 2 4; 11 22, thrice); of chrēstos ("useful," "benign," "kind," as in Lk 6 35); "The g. of God leadeth thee to repentance" (Rom 2 4); of agathōsinē (found only in the NT and LXX and writings based thereon), "full of g." (Rom 15 14); "gentleness, goodness, faith" (Gal 5 22); "in all g. and righteousness and truth" (Eph 5 9); "all the good pleasure of his g.," RV "every desire of g." (2 Thess 1 11).

The thought of God as good and the prominence given to "good" and "goodness" are distinctive features of the Bible. In the passage quoted above from Gal 5 22, "goodness" is one of the fruits of the indwelling Spirit of God, and in that from Eph 5 9 it is described as being, along with righteousness and truth, "the fruit of the light" which Christians had been "made" in Christ. Here, as elsewhere, we are reminded that the Christian life in its truth is likeness to God, the source and perfection of all good. 2 Thess 1 11 regards God Himself as expressing His goodness in and through us. See Good; Good, Chief.

GOODS, gōdz (טָבָא, ṭābh; טובים, ṭōbbim; ἁγὰς, hagās; ὑπάρχοντα, huparchonta): In the OT ṭābh ("substance") is most frequently tr^d "goods," as in Gen 14 11, 12, 16, 21, etc.; ṭōbbim is also 3 t so tr^d in AV (Gen 24 10, RV "goodly things," m "all the goods"; Neh 9 25, RV "good things"; Job 20 21, RV "prosperity"). Other words are 'ōn (Job 20 10, RV "wealth"); ḥayil ("force," Nu 31 9; Zeph 1 13, RV "wealth"); ṭōbb (Dt 28 11, RV "for good"; Eccl 5 11); m'lā'khāh ("work," Ex 22 8.11); nikhshin (Aram. "riches," Ezr 6 8; 7 26); ḥinyān, "getting" (Ezk 38 12 f). We have ta huparchonta (lit. "the things existing") in Mt 24 47, "ruler over all his goods," RV "all that he hath," etc. Agathōs is tr^d "goods" in Lk 12 18 f; skeuos ("instrument") in Mt 12 29; Mk 3 27; ta ad ("the things belonging to thee") in Lk 6 30; ousia ("substance") in Lk 15 12, RV "substance"; huparxis ("existence," "substance") in Acts 2 45; ploutōs ("to be rich") in Rev 3 17, RV "have gotten riches." In RV "goods" stands instead of "carriage" (Jgs 18 21), of "stuff" (Lk 17 31), of "good" (1 Jn 3 17). "Goods" was used in the sense of "possessions" generally; frequently in this sense in Apoc (1 Eed 6 32); ta huparchonta (Tob 1 20); Eccles 5 1, "Set not thy heart upon thy goods" (chrēma), etc.

GOPHER WOOD, gō'fēr wōd (קֶפֶר, qēphēr, ἄρε γόφης, gōphēr): The wood from which Noah's ark was made (Gen 6 14). Gopher is a word unknown elsewhere in Heb or allied languages. Lagarde considered that it was connected with קֶפֶר, qēphēr, meaning "brimstone," or "pitch," while others connect it with קֶפֶר, kēphēr, also meaning "pitch"; hence, along both lines, we reach the probability of some resinous wood, and pine, cedar, and cypress have all had their supporters. A more probable explanation is that which connects gōphēr with the modern Arab. kufa, a name given to the boats made of interwoven willow branches and palm leaves with a coating of bitumen outside, used today on the rivers and canals of Mesopotamia. In the Gilgamesh story of the flood it is specially mentioned that Noah daubed his ark both inside and out with a kind of bitumen. See DELUGE OF NOAH.

GORE, gōr (דָּחַק, nāghah): "Gore" occurs only three times in AV, viz. Ex 21 28.31 bis, "if an ox gore a man or a woman," etc.; in vs 29.32.36, AV has "push" (with his horn), RV "gore." The same vb. in Piel and Hithpael is elsewhere tr^d "push" and "pushing" (Dt 33 17, "He shall push the peoples," RVm "gore"; 1 K 22 11; Ps 44 5; Ezk 34 21; Dnl 8 4; 11 40, RV "contend," m "Heb push at," as an ox pushes with his horns so should the king fight—a fitting description of warfare).

GORGEOUS, gōr'jus, GORGEOUSLY, gōr'-jus-li (תְּקֵלֵל, mikhlēl; λαμπρός, lamprós): Mikhlēl occurs twice in the OT, tr^d in AV and RV "most gorgeously" (Ezk 23 12); in Ezk 38 4, AV translates "all sorts" (of armor), RV "clothed in full armor." Lamprós ("shining," "bright"), is only once tr^d "gorgeous" (Lk 23 11); "Herod . . . arrayed him in a gorgeous robe," RV "gorgeous apparel." We have also in Lk 7 25, "They that are gorgeously apparelled (éndozos, "splendid," "glorious") . . . are in kings' courts." They were scarcely to be looked for among the prophets, or in the new community of Jesus.

GORGET, gōr'jet: Appears only once in AV (1 S 17 6), being placed in the margin as an alternative to "target [of brass]" in the description of the armor worn by Goliath of Gath. The Heb word thus tr^d (קִידָן, kīdhōn) really means a "javelin," and is so rendered in RV and ARV here and in 1 S 17 45 ("Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a javelin"). See ARMOR, I, 4, (3). Gorget, though so rarely used in Scripture and now displaced in our revised versions, occurs not infrequently and in various senses in Eng. lit. In the meaning of "a piece of armor for the gorge or throat" which seems to have been in the mind of King James's translators, it is found in early Eng.

writers and down to recent times. Spenser has it in Faerie Queene, IV, iii, 12:

"His wasand-pipe it through his gorget cleft";

Scott, Marmion, V, ii:

"Their brigantines and gorgets light"; and Prescott, Ferdinand and Isabella, III, 47: "The gorget gave way and the sword entered his throat."

T. NICOL

GORGAS, gôr'ji-as (Topylas, Gorgias): A general in the service of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc 3 38; 2 Macc 8 9). Lysias, who had been left as regent during the absence of Antiochus in Persia, appointed Gorgias to take the command against Judaea in 166 BC. In 1 Macc 4 1-24 is recorded a night attack by Gorgias with 5,000 foot and 1,000 horse upon the camp of Judas Maccabaeus in the neighborhood of Emmaus, in which Judas was completely victorious. The victory was all the more striking as the force of Judas was considerably smaller in number and had "not armor nor swords to their minds" (1 Macc 4 6). Later on (164 BC) he held a garrison in Jamnia, and gained a victory over the forces of Joseph and Azarias who, envying the glory of Judas and Jonathan, in direct disobedience to the orders of Judas, attacked Gorgias and were defeated.

Jamnia as given in Jos, Ant, XII, viii, 6, is probably the correct reading for Idumaea in 2 Macc 12 32. The doings of Gorgias in 2 Macc are recorded with some confusion. He was regarded with special hostility by the Jews. In 2 Macc 12 35 he is described as "the accursed man." J. HUTCHISON

GORTYNA, gor-tî'na (Γορτίνα, Gortînai): A city in Crete, next in importance to Gnosus. It is mentioned in 1 Macc 15 23. See CRETE.

GOSHEN, gô'shen (גֹּשֶׁן, gôshen; Γεσέμ, Gesém): The region where the Hebrews dwelt in Egypt. If the LXX reading Gesem be correct,

1. Meaning the word, which in its Heb form has of Name no known meaning, may mean "cultivated"—comparing the Arab. root jashima, "to labor." Egyptologists have suggested a connection with the Egypt word kds, meaning "inundated land" because Goshen was apparently the same region, called by the Greeks the "Arabian nome," which had its capital at Phakousa representing the Egypt Pa-kas (Brugsch, Geog., I, 298), the name of a town, with the determinative for "pouring forth." Van der Hardt, indeed, more than a century ago (see Sayce, Higher Criticism, 235), supposed the two words to be connected. Dr. Naville in 1887 found the word as denoting the vicinity of Pi-sopt (now Saft el Henneh), 6 miles E. of Zagazig—in the form K-s-m. He concludes that this was the site of Phakousa, but the latter is usually placed at Tell el Fakas, about 15 miles S. of ZOAN (q.v.), and this appears to be the situation of the "City of Arabia" which St. Silvia, about 385 AD, identifies with Gesse or Goshen; for she reached it in her journey from Heroöpolis, through Goshen to Tathnis or Taphnis (Daphnai), and to Pelusium.

It is generally agreed that Goshen was the region E. of the Bubastic branch of the Nile; and in Ps

2. Situation 78 12,43, it seems to be clearly identified with the "field (or pastoral plain) of Zoan," which was probably also the "land of Rameses" mentioned (Gen 47 11) as possessed by Jacob's family (see RAAMES; ZOAN). Where first mentioned (Gen 45 10), Goshen is promised by Joseph to Jacob as a land fit for flocks, and the LXX here reads, "Gesem of Arabia," probably referring to the Arabian nome which took its name from the "desert" which defended the E. border of Egypt. In the second notice (Gen 46 28 f), the boundary of the land of Goshen, where Joseph met his father, is called in the LXX Hērōd(n)-polis, and also (ver 28) "the land of Ramesse(s)"; so that in the 3d cent. BC Goshen seems to have been identified with the whole region of the Arabian nome, as far S. as Heroöpolis which (see PITHOM) lay in Wady Tumeildt. Goshen included pastoral lands (Gen 46 34; 47 1,4,6,27; 50 8) and was still inhabited by the Hebrews at the time of the Exodus (Ex 8 22; 9 26), after which it is unnoticed in the OT. The name, however, applied to other places which were probably "cultivated" lands, including a region in the S. of Pal (Josh 10 41; 11 16), "all the country of Goshen [LXX Gosém], even unto Gibeon," and a city of Judah (Josh 15 51) in the mountains near Beersheba. These notices seem to show that the word is not of Egypt origin.

The region thus very clearly indicated was not of any great extent, having an area of only about 900 sq. miles, including two very different districts. The western half, immediately E. of the Bubastic branch of the Nile, stretches from Zoan to Bubastis (at both of which cities records of the Hyksos ruler Apepi have been found), or a distance of about 35 miles N. and S. This region is an irrigated plain which is still considered to include some of the best land in Egypt. The description of the land of Rameses (see RAAMES), in the 14th cent. BC, shows its fertility; and St. Silvia says that the land of Goshen was 16 miles from Heroöpolis, and that she traveled for two days in it "through vineyards, and balsam plantations, and orchards, and tilled fields, and gardens." The region narrows from about 15 miles near the seashore to about 10 miles between Zagazig and Tell el Kebir on the S. E. of this, a sandy and gravelly desert lies between the Nile plain and the Suez Canal, broadening southward from near Daphnai (Tell Defeneh) to Wady Tumeildt, where it is 40 miles across E. and W. S. of this valley an equally waterless desert stretches to Suez, and from the Bitter Lakes on the E. to the vicinity of Helopolis (S.E. of Cairo) on the W. Thus Wady Tumeildt, which is fertilized by the Nile waters (see PI-HAHIROTH), and contains villages and corn fields, is the only natural route for a people driving with their flocks and herds by which the vicinity of the Red Sea can be reached, the road leading from the S. end of the "field of Zoan" near Bubastis, and 40 miles eastward to the "edge of the wilderness" (see ETHAM) and the head of the Bitter Lakes. This physical conformation is important in relation to the route of the Israelites (see EXODUS); and Wādy Tumeildi may very possibly be intended to be included in Goshen, as the LXX translators supposed.

GOSHEN, gō'shen (גֹּשֶׁן, gōshen):

(1) Mentioned as a country (גֹּשֶׁן, 'erec) in the S. of Judah distinct from the "hill country," the Negeb and the Shephelah (Josh 10 41; 11 16). Unidentified.

(2) A town in the S.W. part of the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 51), very probably connected in some way with the district (1).

(3) See preceding article.

GOSPEL, gos'pel (τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, to euaggelion): The word "gospel" is derived from the AS word which meant "the story concerning God." In the NT the Gr word euaggelion, means "good news." It proclaims tidings of deliverance. The word sometimes stands for the record of the life of Our Lord (Mk 1 1), embracing all His teachings, as in Acts 20 24. But the word "gospel" now has a peculiar use, and describes primarily the message which Christianity announces. "Good news" is its significance. It means a gift from God. It is the proclamation of the forgiveness of sins and sonship with God restored through Christ. It means remission of sins and reconciliation with God. The gospel is not only a message of salvation, but also the instrument through which the Holy Spirit works (Rom 1 16).

The gospel differs from the law in being known entirely from revelation. It is proclaimed in all its fulness in the revelation given in the NT. It is also found, although obscurely, in the OT. It begins with the prophecy concerning the 'seed of the woman' (Gen 3 15), and the promise concerning Abraham, in whom all the nations should be blessed (Gen 12 3; 15 5) and is also indicated in Acts 10 43 and in the argument in Rom 4.

In the NT the gospel never means simply a book, but rather the message which Christ and His apostles announced. In some places it is called "the gospel of God," as, for example, Rom 1 1; 1 Thess 2 2, 9; 1 Tim 1 11. In others it is called "the gospel of Christ" (Mk 1 1; Rom 1 16; 15 19; 1 Cor 9 12, 18; Gal 1 7). In another it is called "the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts 20 24); in another "the gospel of peace" (Eph 6 15); in another "the gospel of your salvation" (Eph 1 13); and in yet another "the glorious gospel" (2 Cor 4 4 AV). The gospel is Christ: He is the subject of it, the object of it, and the life of it. It was preached by Him (Mt 4 23; 11 5; Mk 1 14; Lk 4 18 m), by the apostles (Acts 16 10; Rom 1 15; 2 16; 1 Cor 9 16) and by the evangelists (Acts 8 25).

We must note the clear antithesis between the law and the gospel. The distinction between the two is important because, as Luther indicates, it contains the substance of all Christian doctrine. "By the law," says he, "nothing else is meant than God's word and command, directing what to do and what to leave undone, and requiring of us obedience of works. But the gospel is such doctrine of the word of God that neither requires our works nor commands us to do anything, but announces the offered grace of the forgiveness of sin and eternal salvation. Here we do nothing, but only receive what is offered through the word." The gospel, then, is the message of God, the teaching of Christianity, the redemption in and by Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, offered to all mankind. And as the gospel is bound up in the life of Christ, His biography and the record of His works, and the proclamation of what He has to offer, are all gathered into this single word, of which no better definition can be given than that of Melancthon: "The gospel is the gratuitous promise of the remission of sins for Christ's sake." To hold tenaciously that in this gospel we have a supernatural revelation is in perfect consistency with the spirit of scientific inquiry. The gospel, as the whole message and doctrine of salvation, and as chiefly efficacious for contrition, faith, justification, renewal and sanctification, deals with facts of revelation and experience.

I. Introductory.—The present art. is confined to the consideration of the relations and general features of the first 3 Gospels (Mt, Mk, Lk)—ordinarily named "the Synoptic Gospels," because, in contrast with the Fourth Gospel, they present, as embodying a common tradition, the same general view of the life and teaching of Jesus during His earthly ministry, and of His death and resurrection. The Fourth Gospel, in itself and in its relation to the Synoptics, with the Johannine literature and theology generally, are treated in special articles. See JOHN, GOSPEL OF; JOHANNINE THEOLOGY, etc.

The place of the Gospels in church tradition is secure. Eusebius places the 4 Gospels among the books that were never controverted in the church (HE, III, 25). It is acknowledged that by the end of the 2d cent. these 4 Gospels, and none else, were ascribed to the authors whose names they bear, were in universal circulation and undisputed use throughout the church, stood at the head of church catalogues and of all VSS, were freely used, not only by the Fathers of the church (Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement, Origen, etc), but by pagans and heretics, and by these also were ascribed to the disciples of Christ as their authors. Justin Martyr, in the middle of the century, freely quotes from "Memoirs of the Apostles," "which are called Gospels," "composed by the apostles and those that followed them" (1 Apol. 66-67; Dial. with Trypho, 10, 100, 103). What these Gospels were is made apparent by the Dialektikon, or Harmony of Four, of his disciple Tatian (c 170), constructed from the 4 Gospels we possess. The first to mention Mt and Mk by name is Papias of Hierapolis (c 120-30; in Euseb., HE, III, 39). Dr. Sanday is disposed to carry back the extracts from Papias to about 100 AD (Fourth Gospel, 151); Dr. Moffatt likewise says, "These explanations of Mt and Mk must have been in circulation by the end of the 1st cent." (Intro to Lit. of NT, 187). The gist of the testimony of Papias is: "Mark, having become the interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately, though he did not record in order, that which was either said or done by Christ"; "Matthew composed the Oracles [Logia] in Heb [Aram.], and each one interpreted them as he was able." Eusebius evidently took what he quotes about Mt and Mk from Papias to refer to our present Gospels, but a problem arises as to the relation of the Aram. "Logia" said to be composed by Matthew to our canonical Gr Gospel, which was the only Gospel of Mt known to the early Fathers. There is no ground for the supposition that the Jewish-Christian GOSPEL ACC. TO THE H^E (q.v.) was the original of the Greek Mt; it was on the other hand derived from it. The Gnostic Marcion used a mutilated Lk. Cf, further, below on dating, and for details see special arts. on the respective Gospels; also BIBLE; CANON OF THE NT.

II. The Synoptic Problem.—Arising from their peculiar nature, there has always been a Synoptic

1. Nature of Problem NT. No one could read these Gospels consecutively with attention, without being aware of the resemblances and differences in their contents. Each writer sets forth his own account without reference to the other two, and, with the partial exception of Luke (1 1-4), does not tell his readers anything about the sources of his Gospel. A problem thus arose as to the relations of the three to one another, and the problem, though it approaches a solution, is not yet solved. A history of the Synoptic problem will be found in outline in many recent works; the most elaborate and best is in Zahn's Intro, III. In it Zahn briefly indicates what the problem was as it presented itself to the church in the earlier centuries, and gives in detail the history of the discussion from the time of Lessing (1778) to the present day. It is not possible within the limits of this art. to refer otherwise than briefly to these discussions, but it may be remarked that, as the discussion went on, large issues were raised; every attempt at solution seemed only to add to the difficulty of finding an adequate one; and at length it was seen that no more complex problem was ever set to literary criticism than that presented by the similarities and differences of the Synoptic Gospels.

Of the hypotheses which seek to account for these resemblances and differences, the following are the most important. (1) The hypothesis

2. Proposed of oral tradition: This theory has Solutions rather fallen into disfavor among recent critics. Dr. Stanton, e.g., says,

"The relations between the first 3 Gospels cannot be adequately explained simply by the influence of oral tradition" (Gospels as Hist. Documents, II, 17; similarly Moffatt, op. cit. 180 ff). Briefly stated, the theory is this. It assumes that each of the evangelists wrote independently of the others, and derived the substance of his writing, not from written sources, but from oral narratives of sayings and doings of Jesus, which, through dint of repetition, had assumed a relatively fixed form. The teaching of the apostles, first given in Jerus., repeated in the catechetical schools (cf Lk 1 4, RV), and intrusted to the trained memories of the Christian converts, is held to be sufficient to account for the phenomena of the 3 Gospels. The oral Gospel took its essential form in Pal, and written editions of it would by and by appear in more or less complete form (Lk 1 1). The first distinguished advocate of the oral hypothesis was Gieseler (1818). It was upheld in Britain by Alford and Westcott, and is today advocated, with modifications, by Dr. A. Wright in his Synopsis of the Gospels in Gr (2d ed, 1908).

(2) The mutual use hypothesis: As old as Augustine, this hypothesis, which assumes the use of one of the Gospels by the other two, has been frequently advocated by scholars of repute in the history of criticism. There have been many variations of the theory. Each of the 3 Gospels has been put first, each second, and each third, and each in turn has been regarded as the source of the others. In fact, all possible permutations (6 in number) have been exhausted. As the hypothesis has few advocates at the present day, it is not necessary to give a minute account of these permutations and combinations. Two of them which may be regarded as finally excluded are (a) those which put Lk first; and (b) those which put Mk last (the view of Augustine; in modern times, of F. Baur and the Tübingen school).

(3) The hypothesis of sources: This is the theory which may be said to hold the field at the present time. The tendency in criticism is toward the acceptance of two main sources for the Synoptic Gospels. (a) One source is a Gospel like, if not identical with, the canonical Gospel of Mk. As regards this 2d Gospel there is a consensus of opinion that it is prior to the other two, and the view that the 2d and 3d used it as a source is described as the one solid result of literary criticism. Eminent critics of various schools of thought are agreed on this point (cf W. C. Allen, St. Matthew, Pref. vii; F. C. Burkitt, Gospel History and Its Transmission, 37). It has been shown that most of the contents of Mk have been embodied in the other two, that the order of events in Mk has been largely followed by Mt and Lk, and that the departures from the style of Mk can be accounted for by the hypothesis of editorial amendment. (b) The other source (now commonly named Q) is found first by an examination of the matter not contained in the 2d Gospel, which is common to Mt and Lk. While there are differences as to the extent and character of the 2d source, there is something like general agreement as to its existence. It is not agreed as to whether this source contained narratives of events, as well as sayings, or whether it was a book of sayings alone (the former is thought to be the more probable view), nor is it agreed as to whether it contained an account of the Passion week (on the differing views of the extent of Q, see Moffatt, op. cit., 197 ff); but while disagreement exists as to these and other points, the tendency, as said, is to accept a "two-source" theory in some form as the only sufficient account of the phenomena of the Gospels.

(4) Other sources: To make the source-theory probable, some account must be taken of other sources beyond the two enumerated above. Both the 1st and the 3d Gospels contain material not borrowed from these sources. There is the fore-history of Mt 1 2, which belongs to that Gospel alone, with other things likewise recorded by Mt only (9 27-34; 12 22; 14 23-33; 17 24 ff, etc.). Then not only has Lk a fore-history (chs 1, 2), but a large part of his Gospel consists of material found nowhere else (e.g. 7 11-16, 36-50; 10 25 ff; parables in chs 15, 16, 18 1-14, etc). This Sondergut of Mt and Lk will be more appropriately treated in the arts. which deal with these Gospels respectively. Here it is sufficient to point out that the criticism of the Synoptic Gospels is not complete till it has found a probable source (a) for what is common to them all, (b) for what is common to any two of them, and (c) for what is peculiar to each. The literature on the subject is so voluminous that only a few references can be given. In addition to those named, the following works may suffice to set forth the present condition of the Synoptic problem: B. Weiss, Intro to NT, and other works; Harnack, Luke the Physician, The Sayings of Jesus, The Acts of the Apostles, Date of the Acts of the Apostles and of the Synoptic Gospels (ETs); Wellhausen, Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien, and works on each of the Synoptic Gospels, esp. Studies in the Synoptic Problem, edited by Dr. Sanday.

III. Literary Analysis and Oral Tradition.—

Looked at merely as a problem of literary analysis, it is scarcely possible to advance

1. The Problem farther than has been done in the works of Harnack, of Sanday and his co-adjutors, and of Stanton, referred to as a Literary One above. The work done has been of the most patient and persevering kind.

No clue has been neglected, no labor has been spared, and the interrelations of the three Gospels have been almost exhaustively explored. Yet the problem remains unsolved. For it must not be forgotten that the materials of the Synoptic Gospels were in existence before they assumed a written form. Literary analysis is apt to forget this obvious fact, and to proceed by literary comparison alone. The Gospel was confessedly at first and for some years a spoken Gospel, and this fact has to be taken into account in any adequate attempt to understand the phenomena. It is not enough to say with Dr. Stanton that "the relations of the first three Gospels cannot be adequately explained simply by the influence of oral tradition"; for the question arises, Can the relations between the first three Gospels be explained simply by the results of literary analysis, be it as exhaustive and thorough as it may? Let it be granted that literary analysis has accomplished a great deal; that it has almost compelled assent to the two-source hypothesis; that it has finally made good the priority of Mk; that it has made out a probable source consisting mainly of sayings of Jesus, yet many problems remain which literary analysis cannot touch, at least has not touched. There is the problem of the order of events in the Gospels, which is so far followed by all three. How are we to account for that sequence? Is it sufficient to say, as some do, that Mk set the style of the Gospel narrative, and that the others so far followed that style? All Gospels must follow the method set by Mk, so it is affirmed. But if that is the case, how did Mt and Lk depart from that copy by writing a fore-history? Why did they compile a genealogy? Why did they give so large a space to the sayings of Jesus, and add so much not contained in the Gospel which, on the hypothesis, set the pattern of what a Gospel ought to be? These questions cannot be answered on the hypothesis that the others simply followed a fashion set by Mk. Sometimes the 2d Gospel is described as if it were suddenly launched on the Christian world; as if no one had ever heard of the story contained in it before Mk wrote it. From the nature of the case, it is obvious that the church had knowledge of many of the facts in the life of Christ, and was in possession of much of His teaching before any of the Gospels were written. So much is plain from the Epistles of St. Paul. How many facts about Jesus, and how much of His teaching may be gathered from these epistles, we do not inquire at present. But we do learn much from St. Paul about the historical Jesus.

The Christian church in its earlier form arose out of the teaching, example and influence of the apostles at Jerus. It was based on apostolic

2. Influence testimony as to the life, character, of Oral teaching, death and resurrection of Instruction Jesus Christ. That testimony told the church what Jesus had done, what

He had taught, and of the belief of the apostles as to what He was, and what He continued to be. We read that the early church "continued stedfastly in the apostles' teaching and fellowship" (Acts 2 42). The "teaching" consisted of reminiscences of the Lord, of interpretations of the facts about Jesus and of agreements between these and the OT. The first instruction given to the church was oral. Of this fact there can be no doubt. How long oral teaching continued we may not say, but it is likely that it continued as long as the apostles dwelt together at Jerus. To them an appeal could constantly be made. There was also the strictly catechetical teaching given to the converts, and this teaching would be given after the manner to which they had been accustomed in their earlier education. It consisted mainly in committing accurately to memory, and in repetition from memory (see CATECHIST; CATECHUMEN). There would thus be a stricter tradition, as it was taught in the catechetical classes, and a looser tradition which consisted of as much as the people could carry with them from the preaching of the apostles at the weekly assemblies. Those, besides, who were present at the day of Pentecost, and others present at the feasts at Jerus, who had passed under Christian influence, would carry with them on their return to their homes some knowledge of the life and death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus. It may have been a meager Gospel that these carried with them to Antioch, to Rome, or to other cities in which the diaspora dwelt. But that they did carry a Gospel with them is plain, for from their testimony arose the church at Antioch, where the Christians had without question a knowledge of the Gospel, which informed their faith and guided their action.

IV. Order of Events and Time of Happenings in the Synoptic Gospels.—

It is known from Acts that the main topic of the preaching of the apostles was the resurrection of the Apostolic Lord. "With great power gave the Witness apostles their witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 4 33).

It is evident, however, that the apostolic witness would not be limited to the events of the Passion week, or to the fact of the resurrection. There would arise a thirst for information regarding the life of Jesus, what He had done, what He had said, what manner of life He had lived, and what teaching He had given. Accounts of Him and of His work would be given by the apostles, and once these accounts were given, they would continue to be given in the same form. Tell a story to a child and he will demand that it be always given in the form in which he first knew it. Hearers of a story are impatient of variations in the subsequent telling of it. Memory is very tenacious and very conservative.

It is clear that the first lessons of the apostles were accounts of the Passion week, and of the resurrection. But it went backward to events

2. Bearing and incidents in the life of Jesus, and on Order as we read the Synoptic Gospels, we soon see that the order was dictated by the events themselves. They are grouped together for no other reason than that they happened so. Most of the incidents are hung on a geographical thread. In the 2d Gospel, which seems to preserve most faithfully the traditional order, this is obvious to every attentive reader; but in all the 3 Gospels many of the narratives go in well-established cycles. To take only one illustration, where many might be instanced, the healing of the woman with the issue of blood is represented as occurring in the course of the walk to the house of Jairus (Mk 5 21 ff). The only explanation is that this was the actual mode of its happening. Events happened, incidents arose, in the course of the journeys of Jesus and His disciples, words were also spoken, and in the memories of the disciples, when the journey was recalled, there arose also what had happened in the course of the journey. In fact, as we follow the journey through Galilee, to the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, through Samaria, down the valley of the Jordan, through Jericho to Jerus, we find that the grouping of the material of the Gospels is determined by the facts. Most of what is recorded happened in the course of the journeys, and was borne in the memories of the disciples in the order of its happening. The order, then, is not arbitrary, nor is it the product of reflection; it is the outcome of the facts. It is true that in pursuance of their several plans, Lk sometimes, Mt frequently, deserts the order of Mk, but it is noteworthy that they never do so together. As Professor Burkitt says, "Mt and Lk never agree against Mk in transposing a narrative. Lk sometimes deserts the order of Mk, and Mt often does so; but in these cases Mk is always supported by the remaining Gospel" (op. cit., 36). In Mt, after 19 1, the events follow each other quite as in Mk.

When one studies the rather kaleidoscopic political geography of Pal in the first 40 years of our era, he will find many confirmations of the historic situation in the Synoptic Gospels. The birth of Jesus was in the time of Herod the Great, when the whole of Pal was under one government. After the death of Herod, Pal was under several rulers. Archelaus had possession of Judaea until the year 9 AD. Galilee was under Herod Antipas until the year 37, and the tetrarchy of Philip had a distinct government of its own. About the year 40 Pal was again under one government under Herod Agrippa. Now it is clear that the events of the Gospels happened while Herod Antipas ruled in Galilee and Peraea, and while Pilate was procurator in Judaea (see CHRONOLOGY OF NT, and JESUS CHRIST). Nor is the significance of this environment exhausted by the reference to the time. As Professor Burkitt has shown (op. cit., in his chapter entitled "Jesus in Exile"), in the itinerary recorded in Mk 5, the parts avoided are the dominions of Herod Antipas. It is said in Mk 3 6, "And the Pharisees went out, and straightway with the Herodians took counsel against him, how they might destroy him." The significance of this alliance between the Pharisees and the Herodians is well drawn out by Professor Burkitt in the work cited above. It is simply noted by Mk, and on it the evangelist makes no remark. But the conspiracy had a great effect on the work of Jesus. A little later we find Jesus no more in any of the synagogues. He devotes Himself to the training of the Twelve, and is outside of the dominions of Herod Antipas. It is not to be forgotten that during these months Jesus is an exile from His own land, and it was during that period of exile that the issue of His work became clear to Him, and from the time of the great confession at Caesarea-Philippi He began to tell His disciples of the decease He should accomplish at Jerus (Mt 16 13 ff |).

V. Dating of the Synoptic Gospels.—The question as to the dates at which the Synoptic Gospels appear in a published form may more suitably be dealt with in connection with the arts. on the separate Gospels. It need only be observed here that opinion is tending toward much earlier dates than were common till lately. By all but

1. Return extreme writers it is now admitted that to Earlier the first 3 Gospels fall well within the Dating limits of the apostolic age. In the Preface to his work on Luke (1906), Harnack reminded his readers that 10 years before he had told them that "in the criticism of the sources of the oldest Christianity we are in a movement backward to tradition." The dates he formerly favored were, for Mk between 65 and 70 AD, for Mt between 70 and 75, for Lk between 78 and 93. Harnack's more recent pronouncement as to the date of Acts, which he states with all the emphasis of italics, "It seems now to be established beyond question that both books of this great historical work were written while St. Paul was yet alive" (Date of the Acts and the Synoptic Gospels, 124, ET), must have a determining influence on critical opinion. If Acts were written during the lifetime of St. Paul (cf Acts 28 30f), then the 3d Gospel must have been written earlier. It is likely that Lk had all his material in hand during the imprisonment of St. Paul at Caesarea. If he made use of the 2d Gospel, then Mk must have had a still earlier date, and the whole problem of the dating of the Gospels is revolutionized. The essential thing is that the 3 Gospels were probably written and published before the destruction of Jerus (70 AD). There is nothing in their contents that makes this view untenable.

It is still to be remembered, however, that the materials of which the Gospels are composed existed before they were put into a written form. Every discussion must take note of that fact. The lit. of the NT Still Older presupposes just such accounts of the life of Jesus as we find in the Synoptic Gospels, and readers of the Gospels have a right to rest on their veracity and sufficiency as accounts of Jesus, of what He was, what He said, and what He did. They are their own best witnesses.

VI. The Messianic Idea in Its Bearings on Historicity of the Gospels.—In a striking passage in his Das Evangelium Marci (65, 66), Wellhausen vividly sets forth the significant contrast between the Jewish and the Christian conceptions of the Messiah. We quote the words, notwithstanding the fact that Wellhausen does not regard the passage, Mk 8 31 ff, as historical. With him what is set forth there is not the figure of the historical Jesus, but a picture of the persecuted church.

"The confession of Peter, 'Thou art the Messiah,' affords," he says, "the occasion for the setting forth of what up to this time was latent. He has elicited the confession and accepted it. Nevertheless He accepts it with a correction; a correction that follows as a matter of course. He is not the Messiah who will restore the kingdom of Israel, but another Messiah altogether. Not to set up the kingdom does He go to Jerus, but He goes in order to be crucified. Through sorrow and death He goes into glory, and only by this way can others also enter. The kingdom of God is no Judaistic kingdom; the kingdom is destined only for some chosen individuals, for disciples. The thought of the possibility of a metanoia of the people has wholly disappeared. Into the place of a command to repent addressed to all steps the command to follow, and that can be obeyed only by a very few. The conception of following loses now its proper forces and takes a higher meaning. It does not mean what it meant up to this time, viz. to accompany and to follow Him during His lifetime; it overflows that meaning; one is to follow Him even unto death. The following is an imitatio possible only after His death, and this is to be attained only by a very few. One must bear his cross after Him. . . . The situation of the oldest congregation and its tone is here foreshadowed by Jesus as He goes to meet his fate."

A similar passage occurs in the Einleitung, which ends with the significant sentence, "All these are noteworthy signs of the time in which He takes His standpoint" (81).

Elsewhere Wellhausen admits that the sections of the Gospels following the scene at Caesarea-Philippi contain what was known as the distinctive Gospel of the apostolic church. But this Gospel owed its origin to the apostolic church itself. It is a question of the highest importance, and the answer cannot be determined by mere literary criticism: Is the Christian conception of the Messiah due to Jesus? or is it due to the reflection of the church? Which is the more probable? It is agreed, Wellhausen being witness, that the Christian conception was subversive of the Jewish, that the two were in contradiction in many ways. One can understand the Christian conception, and its triumph over the Jewish among the Christian people, if it had been set forth by the Master; but it is unintelligible as a something which originated in the congregation itself. The conception of a crucified Messiah, of a suffering Saviour, was a conception which was, during the years of His earthly ministry, in the mind of Jesus alone. It was not in the minds of the disciples, until He had risen from the dead. And it was not in the minds of His contemporaries. But it was the ruling conception in the Jesus church as it is in the Epistles of St. Paul. No: the conception of the suffering Saviour was not the invention of the church, nor did it rise from her thought of her own needs; it was a gift to her from the suffering and risen Lord. Not without a great impulse, nor without a strong source of persuasion, do men displace notions which they have cherished for generations, and substitute notions which are contradictory and subversive of those fiercely and firmly held.

We take these chapters therefore as historical, and as descriptive of the historical Jesus. If we can do so, then the matter is intelligible, not otherwise. It is also to be observed in this relation that the needs of the church are new needs. There is no provision in the NT for the needs of the natural man. The critical view often puts the cart before the horse, and this is one illustration of the fact. The needs of the church are the creation of Christ. They are new needs, or needs only imperfectly felt by humanity before Jesus came.

Be the needs of the church as great as they may, they are not creative; they are only responsive to the higher call. Nor is it a possible hypothesis that lies at the basis of the criticism of Wellhausen and of many others. Since the time of Baur it has often been said or assumed that it was the Messianic hope that gave concreteness to Christianity; that through the prevalence of the Messianic hope, Christianity was enabled to enter on its career of victory. This is another case of the hysteron proteron. It is the historical Jesus that has given concreteness and definiteness to the Messianic conceptions which were current in His time. Because at the heart of the Christian conception there was this concrete gracious figure, and because of the commanding influence of Jesus Christ, this form of Messianism entered into human life, flourished and endured, and is with us today. Other forms of Messianism have only an antiquarian value. They may be discussed as of literary interest, but their practical significance is as nothing. No doubt Messianic categories were ransacked by the church to see if they could be used in order more fully to set forth the significance of Jesus Christ. But the essence of the matter did not lie in them but in Him, whom they had known, loved and served. It is time that a newer critical assumption should be found than the obsolete, worn-out one that the church invented the Christ. We know a little of the early church, and we know its immaturity and its limitations. We have learned something, too, of the Jews at the time of Our Lord, and we note that in the Gospels their limitations have been transcended, their immaturity has been overcome, and how? By the fact of Christ. He is so great that He must be real.

VII. The OT in Its Bearing on the Synoptic Gospels.—It is always to be remembered that the OT was the Bible of the early Christians. They accepted it as the Word of God, and as authoritative for the guidance of life and conduct. It is one thing to admit and assert this; it is another thing to say that the story of the OT molded and directed the story of Jesus as it is in the Synoptic Gospels. This has been widely asserted, but without adequate proof. As a matter of fact Christianity, when it accepted the OT as the word of God, interpreted it in a fashion which had not been accepted before. It interpreted it in the light of Jesus Christ. Tendencies, facts, meanings, which had been in the OT came into light, and the Bible of the Christians was a Bible which testified of Christ. That on which the Jews laid stress passed into the background, and that which they had neglected came into prominence. This view is set forth by St. Paul: "Unto this day, whensoever Moses is read, a veil lieth upon their heart" (2 Cor 3 15). Or as it is put in Lk, "O foolish men, and slow of heart to believe in all that the prophets have spoken! Behooved it not the Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into his glory?" (24 25 f). In the Christian interpretation stress was laid on meanings which Jewish readers had neglected, and so the church read the OT in the new light, and things formerly hidden leaped into view. So the suffering servant of Jeh became for them the keystone of the OT, and the ritual sacrifices and ceremonies of the OT obtained a new meaning. The story of Israel and of its patriarchs, lawgivers, priests, kings and prophets, became full of significance for the new religion, and its psalms and prophecies were searched because they testified of Christ. This is not the place to inquire into the truth of the Christian interpretation, but the fact is undeniable. The inference is that the OT did not, as it was understood by the Jews, influence the conceptions which the church had of Christ; rather the influence of Christ, His commanding personality, and His history gave a new meaning to the OT, a meaning undreamt of before. The Epistle to the Hebrews might have as an alternative title, "How to find Christ in the OT." So powerful was the impression made on the disciples by the personality of Jesus, by His whole demeanor, by His teaching, His life, death and resurrection, that they saw all things in the light of it. The difficulty we have in justifying the references to prophecy, in the light of historical criticism, is a testimony to the fact that the prophecy did not dictate the fact; it was the fact that dictated the accommodation of the prophecy. In this relation also, the supreme fact is the personality of Jesus.

VIII. The Jesus of the Gospels as Thinker.—Turning from the conception of the suffering Saviour in the Synoptics, we come to the aspect of Jesus as teacher and thinker, and here also we find abundant evidence of the historical character of the Gospel presentation. As the ethics of Jesus are treated in another art., it is sufficient to say here that the conception of the ethical man and His conduct set forth in His teaching is of unusual breadth, and when worked out in detail, yields an ideal of man in himself, and in relation to others, which transcends all other ethical teaching known to mankind. This, too, we must trace to His unique personality, and not to the reflection of the church.

A glance may be taken at Jesus under His more general aspect as thinker. As thinker, Jesus stands alone. He speaks with authority, 2. Jesus as and whoever understands must obey. Thinker The Synoptic Gospels, in this respect, are unique. There is nothing like them in literature. Not even in the Bible is there anything to compare with them. Even in the other books of the NT we do not find anything like the attitude of Jesus to the common things of life. The world's literature shows no parallel to the parables of the Gospels. Here, at any rate, we are on safe ground in saying that these are not due to the reflection of the church. They have an individual stamp which accredits them as the product of one mind. But a great deal more may be said on the characteristic features of the thinking of Jesus. He is the only thinker who goes straight from the common things of daily life and daily experience into the deepest mysteries of life. The deepest thoughts which man can think are suggested to Him by what everybody sees or does. It is not easy within reasonable limits to do justice to this feature of the Synoptic Gospels. Jesus is at home amid the common things and common occupations of life, because He discerns the Father's presence in them all. What a series of pictures of the world, and of occupations of men, could be gathered from these Gospels! This feature of them was neglected until men under the teaching of poets and painters returned into sympathy with external Nature. We are only beginning to see what wealth, from this point of view, is in the Gospels. Poetic sympathy with Nature is a comparatively modern attainment, yet it is in the Gospels. Wind and weather, mountain and valley, seedtime and harvest, summer and winter, sowing and reaping, buying and selling, all are there, transfigured into higher meanings, and made vocal of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. Other thinkers rise gradually, and by many steps, from common experience, into what they have to describe of the higher thought and wider generalizations through which they seek to interpret the mystery of life and of the universe. But this thinker needs no middle terms. He sees, e.g., a woman preparing bread for the use of the family, and in this process perceives the mystery of the kingdom of heaven. Whenever He touches on these common things, immediately they are transfigured. They become luminous with the presence of the spiritual world, and earth becomes full of heaven, and every bush is aflame with God.

We note these things because they have a close bearing on the origin and character of the Synoptic Gospels. They bear the stamp of a unique, a creative personality. Be the processes through which the materials of the Gospels have passed what they may, yet these have not obliterated nor blurred the essential characteristics of that unique personality. When the comparisons of the similarities and differences of the Gospels have been exhausted, the problem of their origin remains, and that problem can be solved only by the recognition of a creative personality who alike by word and work was unlike any other that the world has ever seen.

IX. The Problem of the Gospels.—The Jesus of the Gospels is the Son of God. Stated in its highest form, the problem which the evangelists had in hand was how to represent a Divine being under human conditions, and to set Him forth in such a way that in that presentation there should be nothing unworthy of the Divine, and nothing inconsistent with the human conditions under which He worked and lived. This was the greatest problem ever set to literature, and how the evangelists presented and solved it is found in the Gospels. There it has been solved. Even a writer like Bousset admits: "Already for Mk is Jesus not only the Messiah of the Jewish people, but the miraculous eternal Son of God, whose glory shone in the world. . . . For the faith of the community, which the oldest evangelist already shares, Jesus is the miraculous Son of God, in whom men believe, whom men put wholly on the side of God" (Was wissen wir von Jesus? 54, 57). The contrast between the Jesus of the Synoptics and the Pauline and Johannine Christ, so often emphasized, thus begins to disappear. The purpose of the Synoptics, as of Jn, is to lead men to "believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God," that, believing, they "may have life in his name" (Jn 20 31).

GOTHIC, goth'ik, VERSION. See VERSIONS.

GOTHOLIAS, goth-ô-li'as (Γοθολίας, Gotholias): Father of Josias, one of the sons of Elam who returned from Babylon with Ezra (1 Eed 8 33). The name corresponds to Athaliah, the Gr G being substituted for the Heb guttural 'ayin, as in Gomorrah, Gaza, etc. Taken with 2 K 11 1, the name would seem to have been used for both men and women.

GOTHONIEL, gô-thô'ni-el (Γοθωνιά, Gothoniël): The same as Othniel, father of Chabris who was one of the governors of the city of Bethulia (Jth 6 15).

GOURD, gôrd, gôord (גִּירָה, gîrah): The Vulg has hedera ("ivy"), which is impossible. Philologically gîrah appears to be connected with kiki (kiki), which was the Egyp name for the castor oil plant (Ricinus communis). This grows plentifully all over the Orient, and under favorable conditions may reach a height of 10 to 15 ft.; its larger leaves afford a grateful shade. The requirements of the narrative in Jon 4 6 ff are, however, much more suitably met by the "bottle gourd" (Cucurbita lagenaria), the Arab. kar'ah. This is a creeping, vinelike plant which may frequently be seen trained over the rough temporary sun-shelters erected in fields or by the roadside in Pal and Mesopotamia. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

GOURD, WILD, wîld (דִּרְשָׁה, dirshâh, pakku'ûh sâdheh, 2 K 4 39): The דִּרְשָׁה, dirshâh, means "to split" or "burst open," and on this ground these "wild gourds" have been identified with the fruit of the squirting cucumber (Ecballium elaterium). This little gourd, 1½ to 2 in. long, when fully ripe falls suddenly when touched or shaken, the bitter, irritating juice is squirted to a considerable distance, and the seeds are thrown all around. It is exceedingly common in Pal, and its familiar poisonous properties, as a drastic cathartic, made it unlikely that under any circumstances its fruit could be mistaken for any edible gourd; it is, too, in no way vinelike ("wild vine," 2 K 4 39) in appearance; the stem is stiff and upright, and there are no tendrils. The traditional plant, Cucumis prophetarum, which grows in the desert, and has very small "gourds," has nothing really to recommend it. By far the most probable plant is the Colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis), belonging like the last two to N.O. Cucurbitaceae. This view has the support of the Colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis).

LXX and Vulg. It is a vinelike plant which spreads over the ground or attaches itself by its spiral tendrils to other plants. The rounded "gourds" are 3 in. or more in diameter, and contain a pulp intensely bitter and, in any but minute quantities, extremely poisonous.

GOVERNMENT, gov'ern-ment: The government of the Hebrews varied at different periods, of which we may distinguish seven: (1) the nomadic period, from the Exodus to the entrance into Pal; (2) the period of transition from nomadic to civil life; (3) the monarchy; (4) the period of subjection to other oriental nations; (5) the period from Ezra to the Greeks; (6) Greek rule; (7) Roman rule.

The government of the primitive period is that proper to nomadic tribes composed of families and

1. The Nomadic Period clans, in no wise peculiar to the Hebrews, but shared in its essential features by the most diverse peoples at a corresponding stage of civilization.

Though we might draw illustrations from many sources, the government of the Bedouins, Sem nomads inhabiting the steppes of Arabia, affords the most instructive parallel. In the patriarchal state the family is the household (including slaves and concubines) of the father, who is its head, having power of life and death over his children (Gen 22; Jgs 11 31 ff). A clan is a collection of families under a common chieftain, chosen for his personal qualifications, such as prowess and generous hospitality. The composition of the clan was essentially shifting, subject, according to circumstances, to the loss or accession of individuals and families. Although the possession of the same grazing-grounds doubtless played a large part in determining the complexion of the clan, the fiction of descent from a common ancestor was maintained, even when kinship was established by the blood covenant. In all probability community of worship, which cemented the tribe, served as the most effective bond of union also in the clan. Vestiges of such clan cults are still to be detected (1 S 20 5 ff; Jgs 18 19). The familiar tradition of the twelve tribes must not be allowed to blind us to the evidence that the tribe also was not constant. Mention of the Kenites (Jgs 1 16) and the list of tribes in the Song of Deborah (Jgs 5) remind us that such organizations vanished. In the readjustment incident to the change from the pastoral life of the nomad to that of the settled agricultural population of Pal, many units were doubtless shifted from one tribe to another, and the same result may be assumed as following from the endless strife between the tribes before and during the period of the kings. The large and powerful tribe of Judah seems to have originated comparatively late. The union of the tribes under the leadership of Moses was essentially similar to the formation of a new tribe out of a group of clans actuated by a desire to accomplish a common end. Many such temporary aggregations must have originated, only to succumb to the centrifugal forces of jealousy and conflicting interests. Even after the entrance of the Hebrews into Pal, their history for long is that of kindred tribes, rather than that of a nation. The leadership of Moses rested on personal, not on constitutional, authority, and was rendered precarious by the claims of family and of clan, as in the case of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Nu 16). The authority of Moses naturally extended to the administration of justice, as well as to matters pertaining to war and religion. He appointed officers to assist him in this judicial function (Ex 18 21 ff), but the laws according to which they rendered judgment were those of custom and usage, not those of a written code. As among the tribal chieftains, important matters were referred to the leader, who, in cases of doubt or in default of recognized custom, resorted to the lot or to the oracle.

When the nomad tribes settled in Pal to become an agricultural people, there ensued a period of

2. The Period of Transition unrest due to the necessity for readjustment to changed conditions. The old tribal organization, admirably adapted to the former, ill suited the new requirements. These may be summed up in the demand for the substitution of local organization, based on the rights of individuals, for the tribal government, which had regard solely to the interests of family, clan and tribe. Such readjustment did not, of course, at once ensue, but came piecemeal in answer to the gradually realized wants of the community. Nor was the development entirely from within, but was unquestionably in large measure influenced by the institutions existing among the Canaanite population, only a part of which had been expelled by the invaders. Although the tribes still clung to the fiction of descent from a common ancestor, which was embodied in the accepted genealogies with their filiation of clans into tribes and of tribes into a nation, that which henceforth passed as a "tribe" was less an aggregation of kindred units than a geographical unit or group of units. The times were turbulent, disturbed by contending elements within and by foes without the tribes. Then it was that there arose a class of chieftains of strongly marked character, called by a new name. The "judge" (שֹׁפֵט, shōphēṭ) was not the ruler of a nation, but the chieftain of a tribe, winning and maintaining his authority by virtue of his personal prowess. The cases of Gideon and Abimelech (Jgs 8, 9) show that the authority of the "judge" was not hereditary. Agreeably to the generally changed conditions, the "elders" (זִקְנֵי, zēqēnīm), who were formerly heads of families or kindreds, now came, possibly under the influence of the Canaanites, to be constituted an aristocratic upper class, with certain functions as administrative officers and councilors. Cities also grew and acquired importance, so that the adjacent hamlets were subordinated to them, probably even ruled from them as executive centers. In all this there is a certain similarity to the process by which, in the period just preceding the beginning of real history, Athens became the metropolis of Attica, and conventional tribes supplanted those based on kinship, while the rise of the purely local organization of the demos led speedily to the appearance of the "tyrants." The high places of clans and tribes continued to be frequented, and certain "seers" (1 S 9 6 ff) enjoyed considerable prestige by virtue of their peculiar relation to the tribal god.

While the succession of tribal chieftains and of the "judges" depended on personal qualifications, the principle of heredity is essential to the institution of monarchy, which originated in the desire to regulate the succession with a view to having an assured authoritative leadership. This principle could not, of course, be invoked in the appointment of Saul, the first king (מֶלֶךְ, melekh), who won this distinction in virtue of his personal prowess, supported by the powerful influence of the "seer," Samuel. His son Ishbosheth ruled two years over Israel, but lost his throne through the disaffection of his subjects (2 S 2-4). The accession of David, king of Judah, to the throne of all Israel was likewise exceptional, owing as much to the character of the heir presumptive as to his own qualifications. Solomon, as the choice of his father David, succeeded by right of heredity with the support of the military and religious leaders. In the Southern Kingdom of Judah, heredity was henceforth observed because of its homogeneity and the consequent absence of internal discord; whereas the principle often failed in the turbulent Northern Kingdom of Israel, which was distracted by tribal jealousies. But even when not effectually operative, heredity was recognized as constituting a claim to the succession, although the popular voice, which had been supreme in the institution of the monarchy, was a power always to be reckoned with.

(1) Royal prerogatives.—The history and functions of monarchy defined the prerogatives and duties of the king. Just as the head of the family, or the chieftain of a tribe, functioned as representative of those subject to him in matters of religion, war, and the administration of justice, so also was it with the king. In all these spheres he was supreme, exercising his authority either personally or through representatives who thus became part of the royal establishment. It is to be noted that the sacerdotal or sacral character of the king, which was merely an extension of his privileges as individual and head of a household, was not emphasized among the Hebrews to a like extent as among other oriental peoples; and the priests whom he appointed were perhaps in the first instance court chaplains, though in time they came to assume greater authority. The responsibility of the king for the public safety carried with it the obligation to guard the state treasures, to which the treasures of the temples were felt to belong; and it was his privilege to use them when necessary for defence. The levying of taxes, also, and the collection and use of revenues from various sources likewise fell of necessity to the king and his representatives.

(2) Officers.—In regard to the constitution of the king's court under Saul and David we learn comparatively little; even touching that of Solomon we are not fully informed, although we know that it must have been far removed from the original simplicity. We may classify the known officers as follows: (a) religious: priests (2 S 8 17; 20 23 ff); (b) household: cupbearer (1 K 10 5); master of the vestry (2 K 10 22); master of the household (1 K 4 6), who probably was a eunuch (1 K 22 9 m; 2 K 8 6 m; 9 32); (c) state: scribe or clerk (2 S 8 17; 20 25, etc); recorder, or prompter (1 K 4 3); king's counselor (2 S 15 12); and, perhaps, the king's friend (2 S 15 37; 16 16); overseer of taskwork (2 S 20 24); (d) military: commander-in-chief of the army (2 S 8 16); commander of the king's guards (?) (2 S 8 18; 20 23).

(3) Fiscal institutions.—The simplicity of Saul's rule was such as to make slight demands upon the resources of the people. He lived in the manner of a tribal chieftain on his ancestral estate, receiving from his subjects voluntary gifts (1 S 10 27; 16 20), and also, without doubt, his due share of the booty. Whether he instituted a regular tax (cf 1 S 17 25) is not certain. With the growth and prosperity of the nation, David changed the character of the court, imitating in a measure the state of other oriental potentates. It is not clear whether he levied a regular tax, although it may be surmised that he had it in view, together with the regulation of taskwork, in ordaining the census taken in his time (2 S 24 1 ff). We know that he received his portion of the booty (2 S 8 11; 12 30). The increasing luxury of Solomon's court required the imposition of additional taxes. It is probable that some income was derived from the enforced cultivation of crown lands (1 S 8 12), although the taskwork, which became extremely burdensome and subsequently provoked the secession of the Northern Kingdom, was chiefly applied to public works. The tribute of subject peoples (1 K 4 21) was considerable (1 K 10 14). We now for the first time hear of taxes upon caravans and merchants, although it was in all probability a source of income even in the time of the nomad chieftains; there was also revenue from the carrying trade of his merchant fleet (1 K 10 11.22) and from the trade in horses and chariots carried on with Egypt (1 K 10 28 ff). Solomon also divided his kingdom into twelve provinces commanded by prefects, who should provide victuals for the king and his household: each prefect had to make provision for a month in the year (1 K 4 7 ff). It does not appear whether Judah, which is not included in the list of provinces, was as a mark of special favor exempted from this tax, or whether the omission is to be otherwise explained. The seizure of the vineyard of Naboth by Ahab (1 K 21) makes it seem not improbable that the property of persons condemned on certain charges was confiscate to the king.

(4) Administration of justice.—The king, like the tribal chieftain of the steppes, still sat in judgment, but chiefly in matters of moment; less important cases were decided by the prefects of provinces and other officers. Under the earlier kings there was no code except the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20-23), but judgment was rendered on the basis of the law of custom or usage, the function of the judge being essentially that of an arbiter. For the later code see DEUTERONOMY.

(5) Religion.—The king was regarded as the natural representative of his people before God; but while he did exercise certain sacerdotal functions in person, such offices were generally performed by the priest whom he had appointed.

(6) Secular administration.—The authority of the king in matters of state was exercised partly by him in person, partly through his ministers, the "princes" (1 K 4 2 ff). Among these functions are to be classed the communication with subject and foreign princes and the direction of the taskwork, which was employed for public improvements, partly military, as in the fortification of cities, partly religious, as in the building of the temple. Local affairs had always been left largely to the tribes and their subdivisions, but, with the gradual increase of royal authority, the king sought to exercise it more and more in the conduct of the village communities.

Conversely, the "elders of the people," as the (albeit aristocratic) representatives of the communes, occasionally had a voice even in larger matters of state.

The principle of local autonomy was widely observed in the oriental states, which concerned themselves chiefly about political and military organization and about the collection of revenues. Hence there is no occasion for surprise on finding that the Jews enjoyed a large measure of autonomy during the period of their subjection to other oriental powers and that even during the exile they resorted, in matters of dispute, to their own representatives for judgment. Under Pers rule Pal formed part of the satrapy lying W. of the Euphrates and had, for a time, its own governor.

Ezra and Nehemiah endeavored to introduce a new code, which, after a period of perhaps two centuries, established a dual form of

5. After the Restoration the government subject to the supreme authority of the suzerain power. By the new code the secular officers were subordinated to the high priest, who thus virtually assumed the position of a constitutional prince, ruling under the Law. The "prince," however, as the representative of the tribes, and the "elders of the people," as the representatives of the communes, continued to exercise a certain limited authority.

Under the Gr rulers of Egypt and Syria the Jews continued to enjoy a large measure of autonomy, still maintaining in general the type of internal government formulated under 6. The Greeks Ezra and Nehemiah. We now hear of a council of "elders" presided over by the high priest. The latter, appointed by the kings, was recognized as ethnarch by both Ptolemies and Seleucids and held accountable for the payment of the tribute, for the exaction of which he was, of course, empowered to levy taxes. The brief period of political independence under the Hasmonaeans (see ASMONEANS) did not materially alter the character of the government, except that the high priest, who had long been a prince in everything but in name, now openly so styled himself. The council of the "elders" survived, although with slightly diminished authority. In other respects the influence of Gr institutions made itself felt.

When Pompey terminated the reign of the Hasmonaeans, the government still continued with little essential change. Following the ex-

7. The Romans ample of the Gr kings, the Romans at first appointed the high priest to the "leadership of the nation." He was soon, however, shorn for a time of his political dignity, the country being divided into five districts, each governed by its "synod"; but Caesar once more elevated the high priest to the office of ethnarch. Under Herod, the high priest and the synedrium (Sanhedrin), appointed or deposed at will as his interests seemed to require, lost much of their former prestige and power. After the death of Herod the land was again divided, and a procurator, subordinate to the governor of Syria, ruled in Judaea, having practical independence in his sphere. In their internal affairs the Jews now, as under former masters, enjoyed a large measure of freedom. The high priest no longer exercising any political authority, the synedrium, of which he was a member, now gained in influence, being in fact an aristocratic council in many respects not unlike the Roman senate. It combined judicial and administrative functions, limited in the exercises of its authority only by the provision that its decisions might be reviewed by the procurator. (See GOVERNOR.) Naturally the outlying jurisdictions were organized on the same model, each with its synedrium competent in local matters. The synedrium at Jerus served also as a governing board for the city.

GOVERNOR, gub'ér-nár: The word "governor" is employed in EV in rendering a great variety of Heb and Gr words. In certain cases strict consistency is neither observed nor possible.

In the rendering of Heb terms account has naturally been taken of the *tr offered in LXX, which, being the work of different hands, is both uneven in quality and inconsistent. But there are inherent difficulties which can never be entirely overcome. First and most important, there is the difficulty arising from our ignorance of many details of the government of the oriental nations to which the terms apply. Hardly less is the embarrassment occasioned by the vague employment of words in indiscriminate reference to persons of superior rank and somehow exercising authority. There is consequently much confusion in the use of titles such as "deputy," "duke," "judge," "lawgiver," "overseer," "prince," "ruler," etc, for which the student may consult the special articles.

(1) מִשְׁלָּט or מִשְׁלָּח, 'allāph, "governor" (RV "chief-tain") in Judah (Zec 9 7; 12 5 f).

(2) מִשְׁלָּט, šēṣṣ (Jgs 5 9; 5 14, AVm "or law-givers"). The word is variously rendered with "ruler" or "lawgiver" in EV of Gen 40 10; Dt 33 21; Isa 33 22.

(3) מִשְׁלָּט, mōshāl, part of מִשְׁלָּח, mōshāl, "to be master," "to rule" (Gen 45 26, RV "ruler").

(4) מִשְׁלָּט, nāsi (2 Ch 1 2, RV "prince").

(5) מִשְׁלָּט, šāghān (Dnl 3 2 f; Jer 51 23, RVm "or lieutenants"; vs 28.57; Ezk 23 6.12.23). The same word is rendered "rulers" or "deputies" (Isa 41 25; Ezr 9 2; Neh 3 16; 5 7; 7 5; 12 40).

(6) מִשְׁלָּט, pehāh, is variously used: (a) of the military governor of a province among the Assyrians (Isa 36 9); (b) among the Chaldees (Ezk 23 6.23; Jer 51 23.28.57); (c) among the Persians (Est 3 12; 8 9; 9 3); (d) of the governor-general of the province beyond the River (Euphrates) (Ezr 8 36; Neh 3 7.9); (e) of Nehemiah as subordinate governor in the land of Judah" under him (Neh 5 14 f); (f) of Zerubbabel as "governor of Judah" (Hag 1 1.14; 2 2.21); (g) of Solomon's governors (1 K 10 15; 20 24 [in Syria]).

(7) מִשְׁלָּט, paṭīdā (Jer 90 1, RV "chief officer"). Elsewhere it is rendered "overseer" or "officer" (cf Gen 41 34; 2 K 25 19; Neh 11 9.22).

(8) שָׂר, sar, "governor of the city" (1 K 22 26). Elsewhere commonly rendered "prince."

(9) שָׂרִיט, shallit (Gen 42 6). Elsewhere rendered "ruler" or "captain."

(10) מִשְׁלָּט, tireshāhā; RV "the governor," AV "the Tirshatha" (Ezr 2 63; Neh 7 70). See TIRSHATHA.

The word "governor" in EV represents an almost equal variety of Gr words. Here again the usage is for the most part lax and untechnical; but since reference is chiefly

2. In the NT had to officers of the Rom imperial administration, concerning which we possess ample information, no embarrassment is thereby occasioned. The words chiefly in use for "governor" are derived from γᾱ, "drive," "lead":

(1) ἡγεῖν, hēgēmai, "lead" (Mt 2 6; of Joseph as grand vizier of Egypt, Acts 7 10).

(2) ἡγεμῶν, hēgemōn, "leader" (Mt 10 18; 1 Pet 2 14; of Pilate, Mt 27 2.11.14.15.21.27; of Felix, Acts 23 24.26.33; of Festus, Acts 24 1.10; 26 30).

(3) ἡγεμονεύω, hēgemoneuō, "function as leader" (Lk 2 2; of Pilate, Lk 3 1).

To these are added terms of more specific meaning: (4) ἐθνάρχης, ethnarchēs, "ethnarch" or "ruler of a nation" (2 Cor 11 32). See GOVERNMENT, 6.7.

(5) εὐθύνομ, euthúnō, "direct," "guide" (Jas 3 4). Here RV properly renders "steersman."

(6) ἀρχιτεράστιος, architēristios, "president of a banquet" (Jn 2 8 f, ARV "ruler of the feast").

(7) οἰκονόμος, oikonomos, "steward," "manager of a household or estate" (Gal 4 2, RV "stewards").

It is thus seen that in the NT "governor" in the political sense occurs chiefly in reference to the Rom procurators of Judaea—Pilate, Felix, and Festus. See PILATE; FELIX; FESTUS. It remains for us here to speak briefly of the government of Rom provinces.

Lat provincia signifies a magistrate's sphere of duty or authority, either (a) judicially or legally, defining the scope of his competence, or (b) geographically, designating the territorial limits within which he may exercise authority. It is in the latter sense that we are now considering the word. When, in the 3d cent. BC, Rome began to rule conquered lands outside Italy, each territory was set under the authority of a single magistrate, and hence came to be called a "province." Conquered territories left under the rule of native princes or kings were not so designated, although their government was practically directed by Rome. At first provinces were governed by proconsuls or praetors (i.e. ex-consuls or ex-praetors); but with the steady multiplication of provinces various expedients became necessary in order to provide governors of suitable rank and dignity. Thus the number of praetors was largely augmented, and the term of possible service as governor was extended. Under Augustus the provinces were parceled out between the emperor and the senate, the former reserving for himself such as seemed to require the maintenance of a considerable armed force. In these the emperor was himself proconsul. Early in the Empire imperial provinces of a different type appear, in which the emperor, regarded as sovereign proprietor, governs by a viceroy (praefectus) or steward (procurator). In some of these, tributary kings or princes ruled with the emperor's representative—a legatus or a procurator—by their side, much as England now rules Egypt. Among the provinces so ruled were Egypt and Judaea, partly, no doubt, because of their strategic position, partly because of the temper of their inhabitants. WILLIAM ARTHUR HEIDEL

GOZAN, gō'zan (גֹּזָן, gōzān; Γωζάν, Gōzān, B, Gōzār in 2 K 17 6, Chōzār in 1 Ch 5 26): A place in Assyria to which Israelites were deported on the fall of Samaria (2 K 17 6; 18 11; 1 Ch 5 26). It is also mentioned in a letter of Sennacherib to Hezekiah (2 K 19 12; Isa 37 12). The district is that named Guzana by the Assyrians, and Gauzanitis by Ptolemy, W. of Nisibis, with which, in the Assyrian geographical list (WAI, II, 53, l. 43), it is mentioned as the name of a city (dlu Guzana; dlu Nasibina). It became an Assyrian province, and rebelled in 759 BC, but was again reduced to subjection. See HABOR; HALAH. JAMES ORR

GRABA, grā'ba. See AGGABA.

GRACE, grās: In the Eng. NT the word "grace" is always a tr of χάρις (charis), a word that occurs in the Gr text something over 170t (the reading is uncertain in places).

1. The Word In secular Gr of all periods it is also a Charis very common word, and in both Bib. and secular Gr it is used with far more meanings than can be represented by any one term in Eng. Primarily (a) the word seems to denote pleasant external appearance, "gracefulness," "loveliness"; cf the personification in "the Graces." Such a use is found in Lk 4 22, where "wondered at the charm of his words" is a good tr; and similarly in Col 4 6. (b) Objectively, charis may denote the impression produced by "gracefulness," as in 3 Jn ver 4 'greater gratification have I none than this' (but many MSS read chará, "joy," here). (c) As a mental attribute charis may be tr'd by "graciousness," or, when directed toward a particular person or persons, by "favor." So in Lk 2 52, "Jesus advanced . . . in favor with God and men." (d) As the complement to this, charis denotes the emotion awakened in the recipient of such favor, i.e. "gratitude." So Lk 17 9 reads lit. 'Has he gratitude to that servant?' In a slightly transferred sense charis designates the words or emotion in which gratitude is expressed, and so becomes "thanks" (some 10t, Rom 6 17, etc.). (e) Concretely, charis may mean the act by which graciousness is expressed, as in 1 Cor 16 3, where AV translates by "liberality," and RV by "bounty." These various meanings naturally tend to blend into each other, and in certain cases it is difficult to fix the precise meaning that the writer meant the word to convey, a confusion that is common to both NT and secular Gr. And in secular Gr the word has a still larger variety of meanings that scarcely concern the theologian.

Naturally, the various meanings of the word were simply taken over from ordinary language by the

NT writers. And so it is quite illegitimate to try to construct on the basis of all the occurrences of the word as Power a single doctrine that will account for all the various usages. That one word could express both "charm of speech" and "thankfulness for blessings" was doubtless felt to be a mere accident, if it was thought of at all. But, none the less, the very elasticity of the word enabled it to receive still another—new and technically Christian—meaning. This seems to have originated in part by fusing together two of the ordinary significances. In the first place, as in (e) above, charis may mean "a gift." In 1 Cor 16 3; 2 Cor 8 19 it is the money given by the Corinthians to the Jerusalemites. In 2 Cor 9 8 it is the increase of worldly goods that God grants for charitable purposes. In 2 Cor 1 15 it is the benefit received by the Corinthians from a visit by St. Paul. In a more spiritual sense charis is the endowment for an office in the church (Eph 4 7), more particularly for the apostolate (Rom 1 5; 12 3; 15 15; 1 Cor 3 10; Eph 3 2.7). So in 1 Cor 1 4-7 charis is expanded into "word and all knowledge," endowments with which the Corinthians were esp. favored. In 1 Pet 1 13 charis is the future heavenly blessedness that Christians are to receive; in 3 7 it is the present gift of "life." In the second place, charis is the word for God's favor, a sense of the term that is esp. refined by St. Paul (see below). But God's favor differs from man's in that it cannot be conceived of as inactive. A favorable "thought" of God's about a man involves of necessity the reception of some blessing by that man, and "to look with favor" is one of the commonest Bib. paraphrases for "bestow a blessing." Between "God's favor" and "God's favors" there exists a relation of active power, and as charis denoted both the favor and the favors, it was the natural word for the power that connected them. This use is very clear in 1 Cor 15 10, where St. Paul says, "not I, but the grace of God which was with me" labored more abundantly than they all: "grace is something that labors." So in 2 Cor 12 9, "My grace is sufficient for thee: for my power is made perfect in weakness"; cf 2 Tim 2 1, "strengthened in the grace," and 1 Pet 4 10, "stewards of the manifold grace." Evidently in this sense "grace" is almost a synonym for the Spirit (see HOLY SPIRIT), and there is little real difference between "full of the Holy Spirit" and "full of grace and power" in Acts 6 5.8, while there is a very striking || between Eph 4 7-13 and 1 Cor 12 4-11, with "gifts of grace" in the one passage, and "gifts of the Spirit" in the other. And this connection between grace and the Spirit is found definitely in the formula "Spirit of grace" in He 10 29 (cf Zec 12 10). And, as is well known, it is from this sense of the word that the Catholic doctrine of grace developed.

This meaning of charis was obtained by expanding and combining other meanings. By the opposite process of narrowly restricting

3. Grace in one of the meanings of the word, it Justification came again into Christian theology as a technical term, but this time in a sense quite distinct from that just discussed. The formation of this special sense seems to have been the work of St. Paul. When charis is used with the meaning "favor," nothing at all is implied as to whether or not the favor is deserved. So, for instance, in the NT, when in Lk 2 52 it is said that "Jesus advanced . . . in favor with God and men," the last possible thought is that Our Lord did not deserve this favor. Cf also Lk 2 40 and Acts 2 47 and, as less clear cases, Lk 1 30; Acts 7 46; He 4 16; 12 15.28. But the word has abundant use in secular Gr in the sense of unmerited favor, and St. Paul seized on this meaning of the word to express a fundamental characteristic of Christianity. The basic passage is Rom 11 5.6, where as a definition is given, "If it is by grace, it is no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace." That the word is used in other senses could have caused no 1st-cent. reader to miss the meaning, which, indeed, is unmistakable. "Grace" in this sense is an attitude on God's part that proceeds entirely from within Himself, and that is conditioned in no way by anything in the objects of His favor. So in Rom 4 4. If salvation is given on the basis of what a man has done, then salvation is given by God as the payment of a debt. But when faith is reckoned for what it is not, i.e. righteousness, there is no claim on man's part, and he receives as a pure gift something that he has not earned. (It is quite true that faith involves moral effort, and so may be thought of as a sort of a "work"; it is quite true that faith does something as a preparation for receiving God's further gifts. But it simply clouds the exegetical issue to bring in these ideas here, as they certainly were not present in St. Paul's mind when the verses were being written.) "Grace," then, in this sense is the antinomy to "works" or to "law"; it has a special relation to the guilt of sin (Rom 5 20; 6 1), and has almost exactly the same sense as "mercy." Indeed, "grace" here differs from "mercy" chiefly in connoting eager love as the source of the act. See JUSTIFICATION. Of course it is this sense of grace that dominates Rom 3-6, esp. in the thesis 3 24, while the same use is found in Gal 2 21; Eph 2 5.8; 2 Tim 1 9. The same strict sense underlies Gal 1 6 and is found, less sharply formulated, in Tit 3 5-7. (Gal 5 4 is perhaps different.) Outside of St. Paul's writings, his definition of the word seems to be adopted in Jn 1 17; Acts 15 11; He 13 9, while a perversion of this definition in the direction of antinomianism is the subject of the invective in Jude ver 4. And, of course, it is from the word in this technical Pauline sense that an elaborate Protestant doctrine of grace has been developed.

A few special uses of the word may be noted. That the special blessing of God on a particular undertaking (Acts 14 26; 15 40) should

4. Special be called a "grace" needs no explanation. In Lk 6 32-34, and 1 Pet 2 19.20, charis seems to be used in the sense of "that which deserves the thanks of God," i.e. a specifically Christian act as distinguished from an act of "natural morality." "Grace for grace" in Jn 1 16 is a difficult phrase, but an almost exact || in Philo (Poster. Cain, 43) may fix the sense as "benefit on benefit." But the tendency of the NT writers is to combine the various meanings the word can have, something that is particularly well illustrated in 2 Cor 8, 9. In these two chapters the word occurs 10 t, but in so many different senses as to suggest that St. Paul is consciously playing with the term. Charis is the money given to the Jerusalemites by the Corinthians (8 19), it is the increase of goods that God will grant the Corinthians (9 8), it is the disposition of the givers (8 6), it is the power of God that has wrought this disposition (8 1; 9 14), it is the act of Christ in the Incarnation (8 9); contrast the distinction between "God's grace" and "Christ's act" in He 2 9), it is the thanks that St. Paul renders (2 Cor 9 15). That all a Christian is and all that he has is God's gift could have been stated of course without the use of any special term at all. But in these two chapters St. Paul has taught this truth by using for the various ideas always the same term and by referring this term to God at the beginning and the end of the section. That is, to the multiplicity of concepts there is given a unity of terminology, corresponding to the unity given the multiple aspects of life by the thought of entire dependence on God. So charis, "grace," becomes almost an equivalent for "Christianity," viewed as the religion of dependence on God through Christ. As one may think of entering Christianity, abiding in it, or falling from it, so one may speak of entering into (Rom 5 2), abiding in (Acts 13 43), or falling from (Gal 5 4) grace; cf 1 Pet 5 12. So the teaching of Christianity may be summed up as the word or gospel of grace (Acts 14 3; 20 24.32). So "grace be with you" closes the Epistles as a sufficient summary of all the blessings that can be wished Christian readers. At the beginning of the Epistles the words "and peace" are usually added, but this is due only to the influence of the Jewish greeting "peace be with you" (Lk 10 5, etc), and not to any reflection on "grace" and "peace" as separate things. (It is possible that the Gr use of chairein, "rejoice," as an epistolary salutation [so in Jas 1 1] influenced the Christian use of charis. But that "grace and peace" was consciously regarded as a universalistic combination of Jewish and gentile custom is altogether unlikely.) The further expansion of the introductory formula by the introduction of "mercy" in 1 and 2 Tim is quite without theological significance.

In the Gr Gospels, charis is used in the words of Christ only in Lk 6 32-34; 17 9. As Christ spoke in Aram., the choice of this word is due

5. Teaching to St. Luke, probably under the influence of its common Christian use in his own day. And there is no word in Our Lord's recorded sayings that suggests that He employed habitually any especial term to denote grace in any of its senses. But the ideas are unambiguously present. That the pardon of sins is a free act on God's part may be described as an essential in Christ's teaching, and the lesson is taught in all manner of ways. The prodigal knowing only his own wretchedness (Lk 15 20), the publican without merit to urge (Lk 18 13), the sick who need a physician (Mk 2 17), they who hunger and thirst after righteousness (Mt 5 6), these are the ones for whom God's pardon is inexhaustible. And positive blessings, be they temporal or spiritual, are to be looked for from God, with perfect trust in Him who clothes the lilies and knows how to give good gifts to His children (Mt 7 11; here Lk 11 13 has "Holy Spirit" for "gifts," doubtless a Lukan interpretation, but certainly a correct one). Indeed, it is not too much to say that Christ knows but one unpardonable sin, the sin of spiritual self-satisfaction—"That which is exalted among men is an abomination in the sight of God" (Lk 16 15; cf Lk 17 7-10; Mt 20 1-16).

There is no word in Heb that can represent all the meanings of charis, and in the LXX charis itself is used, practically, only as a tr of the

6. In the Heb hēn (הֵן), "favor," this restriction
-OT of meaning being due to the desire to represent the same Heb word by the same Gr word as far as possible. And hēn, in turn, is used chiefly only in the phrase "find favor" (Gen 6 8, etc), whether the reference is to God or men, and without theological importance. Much nearer St. Paul's use of charis is rāḥōn (רָחוּן), "acceptance," in such passages as Isa 60 10, "In my favor have I had mercy on thee"; Ps 44 3, "not . . . by their own sword . . . but . . . because thou wast favorable unto them." Perhaps still closer parallels can be detected in the use of hesedh (חֶסֶד), "kindness," "mercy," as in Ex 20 6, etc. But, of course, a limitation of the sources for the doctrine to passages containing only certain words would be altogether unjust. The main lines seem to be these: (1) Technically, salvation by grace in the NT is opposed to an OT doctrine of salvation by works (Rom 4 4; 11 6), or, what is the same thing, by law (Rom 6 14; Jn 1 17); i.e. men and God are thought of as parties to a contract, to be fulfilled by each independently. Most of the legislation seems to presuppose some idea of man as a quantity quite outside of God, while Dt 30 11-14 states explicitly that the law is not too hard nor too far off for man. (2) Yet even this legalism is not without important modifications. The keeping of the law is man's work, but that man has the law to keep is something for which God only is to be thanked. Ps 119 is the essence of legalism, but the writer feels overwhelmed throughout by the greatness of the mercy that disclosed such statutes to men. After all, the initial (and vital!) act is God's not man's. This is stated most sharply in Ezk 23 1-4—Oholibah and her sister became God's, not because of any virtue in them, but in spite of most revolting conduct. Cf Dt 7 7, etc. (3) But even in the most legalistic passages, an absolute literal keeping of the law is never (not even in such a passage as Nu 16 30-31) made a condition of salvation. The thought of transgression is at all times tempered with the thought of God's pardon. The whole sacrificial system, in so far as it is expiatory, rests on God's gracious acceptance of something in place of legal obedience, while the passages that offer God's mercy without demanding even a sacrifice (Isa 1 18; Mic 7 18-20, etc) are countless. Indeed, in Ezk 16, 20, 23, mercy is promised to a nation that is spoken of as hardly even desiring it, a most extreme instance. (4) But a mere negative granting of pardon is a most deficient definition of the OT idea of God's mercy, which delights in conferring positive benefits. The gift to Abraham of the land of Canaan, liberation from Egypt, food in the wilderness, salvation from enemies, deliverance from exile—all of Israel's history can be felt to be the record of what God did for His people through no duty or compulsion, grateful thanksgiving for such unmerited blessings filling, for instance, much of the Psalter. The hearts of men are in God's keeping, to receive from Him the impulse toward what is right (1 Ch 29 18, etc). And the promise is made that the God who has manifested Himself as a forgiving Father will in due time take hold of His children to work in them actual righteousness (Isa 1 26; 4 3-4; 32 1-8; 33 24; Jer 31 33-34; Ezk 36 25-26; Zec 8; Dnl 9 24; Ps 51 10-12) With this promise—for the OT always a matter of the future—the OT teaching passes into that of the NT.

Most of the discussions of the Bib. doctrine of grace have been faulty in narrowing the meaning of "grace" to some special sense, and then

7. Summary endeavoring to force this special sense on all the Bib. passages. For instance, Roman Catholic scholars, starting with the meaning of the word in (say) 2 Cor 12 9, have made Rom 3 24 state that men are justified by the infusion of Divine holiness into them, an interpretation that utterly ruins St. Paul's argument. On the other hand, Protestant extremists have tried to reverse the process and have argued that grace cannot mean anything except favor as an attitude, with results that are equally disastrous from the exegetical standpoint. And a confusion has resulted that has prevented men from seeing that most of the controversies about grace are at cross-purposes. A rigid definition is hardly possible, but still a single conception is actually present in almost every case where "grace" is found—the conception that all a Christian has or is, is centered exclusively in God and Christ, and depends utterly on God through Christ. The kingdom of heaven is reserved for those who become as little children, for those who look to their Father in loving confidence for every benefit, whether it be for the pardon so freely given, or for the strength that comes from Him who works in them both to will and to do.

LITERATURE.—All the Bib. theologies contain full discussions of the subject; for the NT the closest definitions are given by Bernard Weiss. But for the meaning of "grace" in any particular place the commentaries must be consulted, although the student may be warned against discussions that argue too closely from what may seem to be passages.

GRACIOUS, grā'shus (רַחוּם, hānān; χάρις, charis): In general, the word means "to favor," "to show kindness" to an inferior and "to be compassionate." All OT passages are derived from the same root, and yet there are two evident shades of meaning derived from it. (1) As above, "favorable" or, causative, "to cause to be g.," as "Jeh make his face to shine upon thee, and be g. unto thee" (Nu 6 25); "And the Lord was g. unto them" (2 K 13 23 AV); "The Lord is g. and full of compassion" (Ps 145 8 AV). (2) In a modified sense, "graceful," "winsome" or "attractive," as applied particularly to persons and things. Used thus 3t in the OT and once in the NT. "A g. woman retaineth honor" (Prov 11 16 AV; cf Eccl 10 12 and Lk 4 22).

The word is used once in the NT from root of Gr word χρηστός, chrēstós, meaning "useful" as a benefit: "if ye have tasted that the Lord is g." (1 Pet 2 3).

In the main, however, the adj. is applied in the OT to Jeh, as indicative of His favor and mercy, His long-suffering and general inclination of favor and kindness.

GRAFT, graft (ἐκκεντρίζω, egkentrizō; RV GRAFT; AV Graft): The word occurs 6 t in Rom 11. Paul assumed that those living about Rome were familiar with the process of grafting olive trees, for olive culture had been adopted by the Greeks and Romans in Paul's time. The wild olive trees (Arab. colloquial, zeitūn berrī) are cut back, slits made on the freshly sawed branch ends, and two or three grafts from a cultivated olive (Arab. colloquial, zeitūn jouwī) are inserted in such a way that the bark of the scion and of the branch coincide. The exposed ends are smeared with mud made from clay, and then bound with cloth or date straw, which is held by thongs made from the bark of young mulberry branches. The fruit thus obtained is good. Wild olives cannot be made cultivated olives by grafting, as Paul implies (ver 24), but a wild olive branch thus grafted would thrive. So Gentiles would flourish spiritually when grafted into the fulness of God's mercy, first revealed to the world through Israel. JAMES A. PATCH

GRAIN, grān. See AGRICULTURE; GARNER.

GRANARY, gran'a-ri. See GARNER; STORE-HOUSES.

GRAPES, grāps. See VINE.

GRAPES, WILD (רִמְמָה, b'ushim, Isa 5 2.4): A word closely allied to רִמְמָה, bo'shah, Job 31 40, tr^d "cockle" (which see). It implies something noisome or worthless, but no particular fruit.

GRASP, grasp: The word ἀρπαγμός, harpagmós (Phil 2 6), is rendered by AV "robbery," by RV "a prize," and by ARV "a thing to be grasped." By derivation the term may denote either an act of seizing or the aim or result of the action. In the context Paul is discussing, not Christ's opinion of His equality with God, but His amazing self-sacrifice in laying aside His equality for our sakes. He treated it not as a treasure to be held for Himself, but laid it aside for us. It is better to render with RV "a prize."

GRASS, gras:

(1) חֲצִיר, hāṣṣir, from a root meaning "greenness"; cf Arab. Khudra, which includes grasses and green vegetables (1 K 18 5; 2 K 19 26; Job 40 15; Ps 104 14, etc.). Isa 15 6 is tr^d in AV "hay," RV "grass"; Prov 27 25, EV "hay," m "Heb grass"; Nu 11 5 EV translates "leeks." It is a term for herbage in general.

(2) נֶשֶׁה, deshe', from root meaning "to sprout abundantly." Generally tr^d "tender grass" (Gen 1 11f; 2 S 23 4; Job 6 5; Isa 15 6; 66 14; Jer 14 5, etc.); tr^d "grass" (Job 6 5; Jer 14 5); tr^d "herb" (2 K 19 26; Ps 27 2; Isa 37 27; 66 14). In Jer 50 11 we have "heifer at grass" (deshe') in AV and RVm, but in RV "heifer that treadeth out the grain." נֶשֶׁה, deshe', the Aram. form, occurs in Dnl 4 15.23, and is tr^d "tender grass."

(3) חֲשִׁישׁ, hāshash, probably "dry" or "cut grass"; cf Arab. حشيش, hashesh, "dry fodder" or "cut grass" (Isa 5 24, AV "chaff," RV "dry grass"; 33 11, EV "chaff").

(4) לֶקֶשׁ, lekesh, from root meaning "to come late," hence used in Am 7 1 for the "latter growth" of grass after mowing.

(5) יֶרֶק, yerek, lit. "green thing" (Nu 22 4, elsewhere tr^d "herb").

(6) עֵשֶׂב, 'esebh (Dt 11 15, etc), generally tr^d "herb" (for [5] and [6] see HERB).

(7) χόρος, chóros (Mt 6 30; 14 19; Mk 6 39; Lk 12 28; Jn 6 10; Jas 1 10.11; 1 Pet 1 24; Rev 8 7; 9 4); tr^d "blade" (Mt 13 26; Mk 4 28); tr^d "hay" (1 Cor 3 12).

There are 243 species of true grasses (N.O. Gramineae) in Pal, but Heb, like modern Arab., does not discriminate between these and other herbs which together make up herbage. Actual turf is practically unknown in Pal, and grass seed is not artificially sown; young green barley is used in the neighborhood of towns as fresh fodder for horses and cattle. It is not the native custom to cut herbage for hay, though the writer has seen many carloads of sweet-smelling hay being carried from the land by Circassian settlers, E. of the Jordan.

The "grass upon the house tops" (Ps 129 6; Isa 37 27), the growth which springs from the seeds mingled with the mud of which the roof is made, springs up quickly with the rains, but as quickly dries up before it reaches half its normal height—or not infrequently is set on fire.

Dew, rain or showers upon the grass are mentioned (Dt 32 6; Prov 19 12; Mic 6 7; Ps 72 6, "rain upon the mown grass," i.e. the grass eaten short by cattle). E. W. G. MASTERMAN

GRASSHOPPER, gras'hop-ēr. See LOCUST.

GRATE, grāt, GRATING, grāt'ing (רֶשֶׁת, mikh-bār, רֶשֶׁת, resheth; AV Grate): This "grating of network of brass" (Ex 27 4; 38 4), called also "the net" (27 4f), and "grating of brass" (38 4), was that reticulated casting or wrought work of bronze which, in the tabernacle system, formed an element of the altar of sacrifice. Its position is well defined: "Thou shalt put it under the ledge round the altar beneath, that the net may reach halfway up the altar" (27 5; cf 38 4). The altar being a hollow box—"hollow with planks" (27 8)—3 cubits high, overlaid with brass, and presumably filled with stones, there appears to have been a ledge round about it halfway from the base, from which depended vertically this grating of bronze. On the grating were four rings through which the staves were passed by which the altar was borne (27 4.7). If the ledge was for the priests to stand on while handling the sacrifices on the altar, the grating need be thought of only as an ornamental support for the ledge. Others ascribe to it different uses.

GRAVE, grāv. See BURIAL.

GRAVE (adj.). See GRAVITY.

GRAVE, GRAVING, grāv'ing. See CRAFTS; ENGRAVING.

GRAVEL, grav'el (חֲצִיר, hāṣṣir, from root חָצַר, hāṣṣir, "to divide." Kindred roots have the meaning of "to cut," "to hew," "to sharpen," hence חָצַר, hāṣṣir, "arrow" [2 K 13 17; Ps 64 7 and often]; cf Arab. حَصَصَ, hassa, "to fall to the lot of," حَصَّة, hissah, "portion"): In Prov 20 17, we have:

"Bread of falsehood is sweet to a man;
But afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel."

And in Lam 3 16:

"He hath also broken my teeth with gravel stones; he hath covered me with ashes."

The only other occurrence of the word is in Ps 77 17, where it is the equivalent of חָצַר, "arrow" (see supra):

"The clouds poured out water;
The skies sent out a sound:
Thine arrows also went abroad."

Prov 20 17 and Lam 3 16 both suggest the frequent occurrence of grit in the coarse bread, the source of the grit being not necessarily the grindstone, but possibly even small stones originally mingled with the wheat and never properly separated from it. ALFRED ELY DAY

GRAVITY, grav'i-ti (σημνότης, semmnótēs): The word, meaning properly "venerableness," "sanctity," is used in 2 Macc 3 12 of the "sanctity" of the temple. In 1 Tim 3 4 the writer declares that a characteristic of a bishop should be that he has "his children in subjection with all g." Titus is enjoined (2 7 f) in his "doctrine" (teaching) to show "uncorruptness, g., sound speech [RV], that cannot be condemned" (cf 1 Tim 3 8). In 1 Tim 2 2 the same word is tr^d "honesty" (RV "gravity"), "that we may lead a tranquil and quiet life in all godliness and g." A better rendering of semmotēs might be "dignity" or "dignified seriousness" (Ols-hausen), which quality is necessary, both on the part of parents in relation to their children, if they are to be properly trained, and on the part of preachers and teachers, if their "doctrine" is to be worthily represented. All mere lightness of demeanor (the opposite of gravity) tells against the great trusts committed to both parents and teachers (cf 1 Tim 3 11; Tit 2 2). Such "gravity" or "dignified seriousness" ought indeed to characterize Christian demeanor in general, as in 1 Tim 2 2 above.

GRAY, grā. See COLORS; HOARY.

GREASE, grēs (לֶחֶם, hēlebh, "fat," "suet"): The word occurs once in the metaphorical sense "prosperous," then dull, gross, brutal: "Their heart is as fat as grease" (Ps 119 70; cf Isa 6 10, and see FAT).

GREAT, grāt, GREATNESS, grāt'nes: "Great" occurs very often in Scripture. The chief words so tr^d are גָּדוֹל gādhōl, רַב, rabh; μέγας, mégas, πολὺς, polús.

(1) In the OT many other terms are employed: (a) gādhōl is used to express greatness in various senses, chiefly of magnitude, including excellence, e.g. "great lights" (Gen 1 16); "the great city" (10 12); "a great nation" (12 2); "a great sight" (Ex 3 3); "Moses was very great" (11 3); "the great God" (Dt 10 17; Neh 1 5); "great is Jeh" (Ps 48 1). It is sometimes tr^d by "mighty" (Dt 4 37; 7 21, "a mighty God," RV "great"). It is also used to designate the high priest (lit. "great," Lev 21 10; Zec 3 1, etc); also to express the "elder" of a family, e.g. Gen 27 1, "Esau his eldest son," RV "elder"; probably also of great stature: "a great man among the Anakims," RV "the greatest" (Josh 14 15). (b) rabh denotes, rather, quantity, number, therefore, often, "many" (Gen 21 34, etc; Ex 2 23 RV, etc); "abundant" (Ex 34 6, ERV "plenteous"), and similar terms; thus we have "a great people" (Josh 17 14); "His mercies are great," RVm "many" (2 S 24 14; 1 Ch 21 13); "Great was the company," RV "a great host" (Ps 68 11); "great reward" (Ps 19 11); "Mine iniquity . . . is great" (25 11); "exceedingly" (Ps 123 3). In the LXX rabh is, for the most part, tr^d by polus. But it is used for "great" in other senses, e.g. "the great [God]" (Prov 26 10), RV "as an archer," m "master worker; Heb text obscure"; "a saviour, and a great one," RV "defender," m "or a mighty one" (Isa 19 20); "Great shall be the peace" (Isa 54 13), etc. It is sometimes tr^d "mighty" (Ps 89 50, RVm "many"; Isa 63 1). (c) Other words thus tr^d are kābhēdh, "heavy," e.g. "so great a people," RV "thy great people," m "heavy" (1 K 3 9); m'ōdh, implying force, might, e.g. "with all his might" (2 K 23 25). 'El and 'Ēlōhīm are sometimes used to express greatness. In Ps 36 6, we have "Thy righteousness is like the great ['El] mountains," RV "mountains of God"; in Gen 30 8, "with great ['Ēlōhīm] wrestlings," RV "mighty," m "wrestlings of God"; and in 1 S 14 15 "a very great ['Ēlōhīm] trembling," RV "exceeding great," m "a trembling of God."

(2) (a) Megas denotes magnitude, in its various aspects, physical, moral, etc, e.g. "great joy" (Mt 2 10); "a great light" (4 16); "the great King" (5 35); "great in the kingdom" (5 19, etc); "Great is thy faith" (15 28); "The greatest is charity" (love), RVm "greater" (1 Cor 13 13); "a great high priest" (He 4 14); "the great shepherd" (13 20); "a great voice" (Rev 1 10); in Rev megas is very frequent. (b) Polus denotes properly number, multitude, e.g. "great multitudes" (Mt 4 25); "a great company" (Lk 5 29, RV "a great multitude"; frequent in the Gospels); "great possessions" (Mk 10 22). But also "great" in the sense of magnitude, e.g. "great plainness of speech," RV "boldness" (2 Cor 3 12; 7 4); "a great trial of affliction," RV "much proof" (8 2); "great love" (Eph 2 4). (c) Among other terms we have telikōitos, "so great" (in degree), "so great a salvation" (He 2 3); tosōitos, "so great" (in quantity), "so great faith" (Mt 8 10; Lk 7 9); "so great a cloud of witnesses" (He 12 1); hōsos, "how great" (in quantity) (Mk 3 8; 5 19 f); hēlikos, "how great" (in degree) (Col 2 1; Jas 3 5, "how great a matter," RV "how much wood," m "how great a forest"); pēlikos, "how great" (in degree) (He 7 4); pōsos, "how great" (in quantity) (Mt 6 23), etc.

(3) In His person and teaching, Jesus introduced into the world a new conception of greatness. It was to be found in humility and self-forgetting service: "Whosoever would become great among you shall be your minister [RVm "servant"]; and whosoever would be first among you shall be your servant [RVm "Gr bond-servant"]; even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many" (Mt 20 26-28; cf also Mt 18 1-4; 23 11; Phil 2 5-11).

GREAVES, grēvz. See ARMOR, ARMS, IV, 4.

GRECIANS, grē'shanz, GREEKS, grēks: In the OT the word "Grecians" occurs but once (Joel 3 [4] 6). For references to Greece in the OT see JAVAN. In AV of the OT Apoc "Grecians" and "Greeks" are used without distinction, e.g. 1 Macc 1 10; 6 2; 8 9; 2 Macc 4 15.36. Thus in 1 Macc 1 1, Alexander the Great is spoken of as king of Greece, and in 1 Macc 1 10 the Macedonian empire is called "the kingdom of the Greeks" (βασιλεία Ἑλλήνων, basileia Hellēnōn). In 2 Macc 13 2 the army of Antiochus, king of Syria, is called "Grecian" (δυναμὶς Ἑλληνική, dynamis Hellēnikē), and in 2 Macc 6 8 the "Greek cities" (πόλεις Ἑλληνίδες, póleis Hellēnides) are Macedonian colonies. Reference is made in 2 Macc 6 1 to an aged Athenian who was sent by Antiochus the king charged with the duty of Hellenizing the Jews; in 2 Macc 9 15 Antiochus vows that he will make the Jews equal to the Athenians; in 1 Macc 12-14 reference is made to negotiations of Jonathan, the high priest, with the Spartans, whom he calls brethren, seeking the renewal of a treaty of alliance and amity against the Syrians. With the spread of Gr power and influence, everything not specifically Jewish was called Gr; thus in 2 Macc 4 36; 11 2; 3 Macc 3 3.8 the "Greeks" contrasted with the Jews are simply non-Jews, so called because of the prevalence of Gr institutions and culture, and "Greek" even came to be used in the sense of "anti-Jewish" (2 Macc 4 10.15; 6 9; 11 24).

In Isa 9 12 the LXX reads τοὺς Ἑλλήνας, lous Hēllēnas, for פְּלִשְׁתִּים (plištīm), "Philistines"; but we are not therefore justified in assuming a racial connection between the Philis and the Greeks. Further light on the ethnography of the Mediteranean basin may in time show that there was actually such a connection; but the rendering in question proves nothing, since "the oppressing sword" of Jer 46 16 and 50 18 is likewise rendered in the LXX with "the sword of the Greeks" (μάχαιρα Ἑλληνική, máchaira Hellēnikē). In all these cases the translators were influenced by the conditions existing in their own day, and were certainly not disclosing obscure relations long forgotten and newly discovered.

In the NT, EV attempts to distinguish between Ἕλληνες (Hellēnes), which is rendered "Greeks," and Ἑλληνισταί (Hellēnistai), which is rendered "Grecians" or "Grecian Jews," or in RVm "Hellenists," e.g. Acts 6 1; 9 29. These latter were Jews of the Dispersion, who spoke Greek (see Hellenism; HELLENIST), as distinguished from Palestinian Jews; but since many of the latter also spoke Gr by preference, the distinction could in no sense be absolute. Indeed in Jn 7 35, "the Dispersion among [RVm "Gr of"] the Greeks," can hardly refer to any but "Grecian Jews" (Hellēnistai), although Hellēnes is used, and in Jn 12 20 the "Greeks" (Hellēnes) who went up to worship at the feast of the Passover were almost certainly "Grecian Jews" (Hellēnistai). Thus, while EV consistently renders Hellēnes with "Greeks," we are not by that rendering apprised of the real character of the people so designated. This difficulty is aggravated by the fact, already noted in connection with the OT Apoc, that, in consequence of the spread of Hellenism, the term Hellēnes was applied not only to such as were of Hellenic descent, but also to all those who had appropriated the language of Greece, as the universal means of communication, and the ideals and customs collectively known as Hellenism. The latter were thus in the strict sense Hellenists, differing from the "Grecians" of EV only in that they were not of Jewish descent. In other words, Hellēnes (except perhaps in Jn 7 35 and 12 20, as noted above) is, in general, equivalent to tá ethnē, "Gentiles" (see GENTILES). The various readings of the MSS (and hence the difference between AV and RV) in 1 Cor 1 23 well illustrate this. There is consequently much confusion, which it is quite impossible, with our limited knowledge of the facts in particular cases, to clear up. In general, it would seem probable that where "Greeks" are comprehensively contrasted with "Jews," the reference is to "Gentiles," as in Acts 14 1; 17 4; 18 4; 19 10, 17; 20 21; Rom 1 16; 10 12; 1 Cor 1 22-24 (RV "Gentiles," representing Ἕθνη, ēthnē); Gal 3 28; Col 3 11. In Mk 7 26 the woman of Tyre, called "a Greek [RVm "Gentile"], a Syrophenician," was clearly not of Hellenic descent. Whether Titus (Gal 2 3) and the father of Timothy (Acts 16 1, 3) were in the strict sense "Greeks," we have no means of knowing. In Rom 1 14, "I am debtor both to Greeks and to Barbarians," there is an undoubted reference to Greeks strictly so called; possibly, though by no means certainly, the "Greeks" of Acts 21 28, alluding to Trophimus the Ephesian (Acts 21 29), are to be taken in the same sense. References to the Gr language occur in Jn 19 20 (Lk 23 38 is properly omitted in RV); Acts 21 37; Rev 9 11.

In Acts 11 20 the MSS vary between Ἑλληνιστὰς, Hellēnistads, and Ἕλληνας, Hellēnas (AV "Grecians," RV "Greeks"), with the preponderance of authority in favor of the former; but even if one adopts the latter, it is not clear whether true Greeks or Gentiles are intended.

WILLIAM ARTHUR HEIDEL

GREECE, grēs, GRAECIA, grē'sha: In the earliest times there was no single name universally and exclusively in use either of the people or of the land of Greece. In Homer, three appellations, Ἀχαιοί (Achaiot), Δαναοί (Danaot), Ἀργεῖοι (Argeioi), were with no apparent discrimination applied to all the Greeks. By the Orientals they

1. Name were called Ionians. See JAVAN. The name Ἕλληνες (Hellēnes), which in historical times came into general use as a collective appellation, was applied in Homer to a small tribe in Thessaly. But the corresponding name Ἑλλάς (Hellás) was not primarily a geographical term, but designated the abode of the Hellenes wherever they had their own states or cities. In the 4th cent. BC many felt, as did Isocrates, that even "Hellene" stood not so much for a distinction in race, as for preëminence of culture, in contrast to the despised "Barbarian." Hence there was much dispute as touching certain peoples, as, e.g. the Epirotes, Macedonians, and even the Thessalians, whether they should be accounted Hellenes and as included in Hellas. The word Γραικοί (Graikot, Lat Graeci) occurs in Aristotle, who says that it was an older name for those who were later called Hellenes. The meaning and truth of this statement are alike in doubt; but he probably refers only to the tribe inhabiting the vicinity of Dodona, in Epirus. At any rate, Graeci and Graecia owed their introduction practically to the Romans after their contact with the Greeks in the war with Pyrrhus, and in consequence they included (what "Hellenes" and "Hellas" did not) Epirus and Macedonia.

"Hellas," as the land of the Hellenes, is used in a broad sense to include not only Greece proper, but also the islands of the Ionian and Aegean seas, the seaboard of the Hellespont, of the Pontus, and of Asia Minor, the flourishing colonial regions of Magna Graecia and Sicily, Crete, and occasionally Cyprus, Cyrene, and the scattered colonies dotting the shore of the Mediterranean, almost to the Pillars of Hercules. "Graecia," however, was used in a more restricted sense as applying to "Continuous" (or continental) Greece, which forms the southern extremity of the Balkan peninsula. While the Romans included Macedonia and Epirus, it will be well for us to limit Greece to the territory lying roughly below 40°, and extending almost to 36° N. lat., and ranging between 17° and 23° E. long. If, as is proper, we include the immediately adjacent islands, its greatest length, from Mt. Olympus in the N. to Cythera in the S., is about 280 miles; its greatest breadth, from Cephalonia in the W. to Euboea in the E., is about 240 miles. The area, however, owing to the great irregularity of its contour, is far less than one might expect, amounting to about 30,000 sq. miles. With an area, therefore, considerably less than that of Portugal, Greece has a coastline exceeding in length that of Spain and Portugal combined. In Greece the ratio of coastline to area is 1:3½, whereas that of the Iberian peninsula is 1:25.

The northern boundary of Greece is formed by an irregular series of mountain chains, beginning on the W. with the Acroceraunian

3. Mountain range and ending in Mt. Olympus Structure (now, Elymbos, 9,790 ft.) on the E.

Intersecting this line, the lofty Pindus range, forming the backbone of Northern Greece, extends southward to Mt. Tymphrestus (now, Velouchi, 7,610 ft.) in Aetolia, at which point spurs radiate through Central Greece. The highest peaks are Mt. Corax (now, Vardusia, 8,180 ft.) in Aetolia, Mt. Oeta (7,060 ft.), Parnassus (now, Lyakoura, 8,070 ft.), Helicon (now, Paléo Vouno, 5,740 ft.), Cithaeron (now, Elatias, 4,630 ft.), lying on the boundary between Boeotia and Attica, Mt. Geranea (now, Makri-Plaghi, 4,500 ft.), N. of the Isthmus, and, in Attica, Parnes (now, Ozea, 4,640 ft.), Pentelicon (now, Mendeli, 3,640 ft.) and Hymettus (now, Trelovouni, 3,370 ft.). Along the eastern coast extends a broken range of mountains, the highest peaks of which are Ossa (now, Kissavos, 6,400 ft.), Pelion (now, Plessidi, 5,310 ft.); and, in Euboea, which virtually belongs to this range, Dirphys (now, Delphi, 5,730 ft.) and Ocha (now, St. Elias, 4,610 ft.). Southern Greece, or the Peloponnesus, is united to Central Greece only by a narrow isthmus (now cut by a canal 4 miles long), with a minimum altitude of about 250 ft. In the northern portion, a confused mass of mountains rises to great heights in Cyllene (now, Ziria, 7,790 ft.), Erymanthus (now, Olonos, 7,300 ft.), Maenalus (now, Apano Chrepa, 6,500 ft.), all in Arcadia; Panachaicus (now, Votidia, 6,320 ft.), in Achaea; and, running southward through Laconia, the two important ranges called Taygetus (now, Pentedaktylo, 7,900 ft.) and Parnon (now, Malevo, 6,430 ft.). Minor ranges jut seaward in Argolis, Laconia and Messenia.

The rainfall in Greece is not abundant and is confined largely to late autumn and winter. Whether the present rainfall differs much in amount from that of antiquity is a matter in dispute, although it seems reasonable to assume that the progressive denudation of the mountains since the 5th cent. A.D. has entailed a corresponding loss in humidity. Even in antiquity, however, the rivers of Greece were much like the arroyos of the S.W. portion of the U.S.A., which are in winter raging mountain torrents, and in summer dry channels. Owing to the proximity of the sea to all points in Greece, the rivers are short, and the scarcity of springs makes them dependent upon the direct and immediate rainfall. Among the more considerable rivers may be enumerated, in Northern Greece, the Peneius, with its tributaries, in Thessaly; the Spercheus, flowing between Oeta and Othrys into the Mallic Gulf; the storied, but actually insignificant, Ilysus and Cephalus, of the Attic plain; in Southern Greece, the Alphelus, rising in Arcadia and flowing westward through Elis, and the Eurotas, which drains Laconia. Eastern Greece consists of a series of somewhat considerable basins, which become lakes in winter and are pestilent marshes in summer, except where Nature or man has afforded an outlet. The former is the case with the Peneius, which has cut a channel through the celebrated Vale of Tempe. Lake Copais, in Boeotia, affords an example of man's activity. The Minyae, in prehistoric times, are credited with enlarging the natural outlets, and so draining the basin for a time; in recent times the same undertaking has again been brought to a successful issue. Similar basins occur at Lake Boebei, in Thessaly, and at Lake Stymphalus, in Arcadia, besides others of less importance. Western Greece has relatively few such basins, as at Lake Pamotis, in Epirus, and at Lake Trichonis, in Aetolia. In many cases, where there is no surface outlet to these basins, subterranean channels (called by the Greeks Kataothrae) are formed in the calcareous rock, through which the waters are drained and occasionally again brought to the surface at a lower level.

The climate of Greece was probably much the same in ancient times as it is today, except that it may have been more salubrious when the land was more thickly populated and better cultivated. Herodotus says that of all countries, Greece possessed the most happily tempered seasons; and Hippocrates and Aristotle commend it for the absence of extremes of heat and cold, as favorable for intelligence and energy. But owing to the inequalities of its surface, to the height of its mountains and the depth of its valleys, the climate varies greatly in different districts. In the highlands of the interior the winter is often cold and severe, the snow lying on the ground until late in the spring, while in the lowlands near the sea there is rarely any severe weather, and snow is almost unknown. The following data for Athens may be taken as a basis for comparison: humidity 41 per cent, rainfall 13.2 in., distributed over 100 days; mean temperature, Jan. 48.2° F., July 80.6° F. Greece lies open to the northern winds which, during certain seasons, prevail and give a bracing quality to the air not always present in places of the same latitude.

The western half of Greece, in which the mountain ranges run generally from N. to S., consists of a formation of greyish and yellowish-white compact limestone, while the eastern half—Macedonia, Thessaly, Euboea, Cyllene, and the

6. Geology mountains from Artemision to Cape Malea and Taygetus—together with the greater part of Attica and of the Cyclades, consists of mica-schist and crystalline-granular limestone (marble). Tertiary formations occur in narrow strips on the N. and N.W. slopes of the ranges in the Peloponnesus and in the valley of the Eurotas, in Boeotia and Euboea. Volcanic action is evidenced both in the parallel elevations of similar or contemporary formation, and in the earthquakes frequent in all ages, esp. in Southern and Central Greece, and in the islands of the Aegean. Perennially active volcanoes are nowhere found in Greece, but new formations due to volcanic action are most clearly seen on the island of Thera among the Cyclades, where they have occurred within the last half-century. The solfatara between Megara and Corinth, and the abundant hot springs at widely scattered points in Greece also bear witness to the volcanic character of the region. Many an ancient site, venerated for its sanctity in antiquity, like those of Delphi and Olympia, in their ruined temples offer mute testimony to the violence of the earthquakes; and history records repeated instances of cities engulfed by tidal waves of appalling height.

Mention has already been made of the sinuous coastline of Greece, and the land has been spoken of as consisting of three divisions.

7. Topography Northern Greece, to which Epirus and Thessaly belong, is marked off from Central Greece by the deep indentations of the Ambracian Gulf on the W. and the Malia Gulf on the E. The Pegasaeon Gulf, virtually continued by Lake Boebei, reaches far into Thessaly, and divides it from Magnesia, which lies to the eastward. The land of the Dolopians really belongs to Northern Greece. Central Greece consists of Acarnania and Aetolia on the W., and of Phocis, Boeotia and Attica (with the adjacent island of Euboea) on the E., separated by a group of lesser states, Aenis, Oetaea, Doris, Locris and Phocis. Southern Greece is separated from Central Greece by the Corinthian and Saronic Gulfs, which almost meet at the Isthmus of Corinth, and are now, after repeated efforts, dating from the time of Julius Caesar, united by a sea-level canal. Megaris, which, by its position, belongs to Central Greece, is here, in accordance with its political affinities and predilections, classed with Corinth, the keeper of the isthmus, as belonging to Southern Greece. Facing the Corinthian Gulf, Achaea forms the northern division of the Peloponnesus, touching Elis, Arcadia and Argolis, which belt the peninsula in this order from W. to E. Arcadia is the only political division which does not have access to the sea, occupying as it does the great central plateau intersected by lesser ranges of varying height. The southernmost divisions, Messenia and Laconia, are deeply indented by the Messeniac and Laconic Gulfs, and Laconia is separated from the peninsula of Argolis by the Argolic Gulf, all of which head somewhat W. of N. Of the subjacent islands, which a reasonable view must include in the boundaries of Greece, Euboea has already been mentioned; but we should add the group of great islands lying in the Ionian Sea, viz. Corcyra (now, Corfu), Leukas, Ithaca, Cephalonia (now, Cephalonia), Zacynthus (now, Zante), and Cythera (now, Cerigo), at the mouth of the Laconic Gulf, as well as Salamis and Aegina in the Saronic Gulf.

Greece was never, in ancient times, a united state, but consisted of a large number of separate states. These were essentially of two types, (a) city-states, in which a city dominated the adjacent territory whose free population constituted its citizenship, or (b) confederacies, in which neighboring cities or districts combined into political organizations which we may call federal states. These matters cannot, however, be discussed except in connection with the history of Greece, for which the reader must consult the standard works. It may be advisable here, however, to name the principal cities of Greece. Northern Greece had no great cities which developed as commercial centers. Aegina was the first to attain to special importance, then Corinth and Athens; Chalcis and Eretria, in Euboea, were for a time rich and prosperous, and Megara, in Megarid, and Argos, in Argolis, became formidable rivals of Athens. Sparta, though never a commercial center, early won and long maintained the hegemony of Greece, for a while disputed by Athens, in virtue of her power as the home of the militant Dorian aristocracy, which was disastrously defeated by the Boeotians under Epaminondas, when Thebes, for a time, assumed great importance. Megalopolis, in Arcadia, enjoyed a brief prominence at the time of the Achaean League, and Coreyra flourished in the 5th and 4th cents. BC. We should also not fail to mention three great centers of Gr religion: Olympia, in Elis, as the chief sanctuary of Zeus; Delphi, in Phocis, as the oracular seat of Apollo; and Eleusis, in Attica, as the pilgrim-shrine to which all Greeks resorted who would be initiated in the mysteries of Demeter and Cora. Argos also possessed a far-famed shrine of Hera, and Thermopylae and Calauria were the centers at which met the councils of influential amphictyonies. Epidaurus was famous for her sanctuary of Asclepius. Delos, a little island in mid-Aegean, celebrated as a sanctuary of Apollo and as the meeting-place of a most influential amphictyony, falls without the limits of Greece proper; but Dodona, in Southern Epirus, should be mentioned as the most ancient and venerable abode of the oracle of Zeus. The Greeks, incorrigibly particularistic in politics, because of the almost insuperable barriers erected by Nature between neighboring peoples in the lofty mountain ranges, were in a measure united by their religion which, like the sea, another element making for intercourse and union, touched them at nearly every point.

For Greece in the OT, see JAVAN. In the NT "Greece" occurs but once—Acts 20 2—where it is distinguished from Macedonia.

LITERATURE

1. The Greek Gods.—The gods of ancient Greece are well known to our western civilization through the myths which have found so large

1. Greek Myths a place in our literature. In Greece itself, fancy had free play in dealing with these divine beings, and the myths were the main treasure-house from which the poet drew; the same myths and the same gods, under different names, reappear in Rome; and Rome passed them on, a splendid heritage of imagination, to the literatures of later Europe. It is characteristic of myths that they deal with persons, not so different from men in their nature, but with more than human powers.

Gods, nymphs and satyrs, noble "heroes" or evil spirits have superhuman powers in varying degree, but they remain persons with a human interest because of their human type. And, further, as men are organized in families, cities and states, so there is a tendency to organize the beings of myth into social groups, and even to bring men, heroes and gods together into one large social organism, the universe of persons.

These Gr myths, the story of Athena's birth full-armed from the brain of Zeus, of Circe's magic potion, of Poseidon's chariot on the waves, and of Apollo's shafts are familiar to us from childhood. To regard them as expressing the content of Gr religion is as natural as it is false. Very few myths have any religious meaning at all, in spite of the large part the gods play in them. A little comparison with the facts of worship serves to show that here the gods are quite different from the gods of story. Some of the gods hardly

2. Mythology Distinguished from Religion appear in myths, and some of the beings of myth are not worshipped; in worship, each god is for the time being the only god thought of, not a member of the hierarchy established in myth; moreover in myth the gods are treated as universal, while the gods of worship are most closely attached, each to one shrine. Along with these external differences goes the one essential difference between a being of story and an object of worship. The failure to recognize the deep meaning of Gr religion results from the superficial assumption that myths constitute a peculiar kind of theology, when in reality they teach but little, and that, indirectly, about religion proper.

The essential fact about the gods of Gr religion is that each god was worshipped in a unique form at one or another particular

3. Local Shrines shrine by a group of worshippers more or less definite. The group might include the state, the dwellers in one locality or simply the family; whatever its limits, it included those connected with the god by a social-religious tie, and the fundamental purpose of the worship was to strengthen this tie. In a city like Athens there were hundreds of such shrines, varying in importance, each the place where one particular phase of a god was worshipped at specified times. The particular form of the god was ordinarily indicated by an epithet attached to his name, Zeus Olympios, Dionysus Eleutheros, Athena Nike. This epithet might refer to the locality of the worship (Aphrodite of the Gardens), to the center from which the worship was brought (Artemis of the god himself (Apollo Patroos). Each of the many shrines in Athens had thus its unique god, its group of worshippers connected with the god, its particular form of worship of the Gods and times of worship, its own officials.

While the state exercised general supervision over all the shrines, they were not organized in a hierarchy under any distinctly religious officials, but remained as independent units. Religious worship in a given city meant the aggregation of independent worships at the different local shrines.

The god of worship, then, was the god of a local shrine whose blessing and favor were sought at certain times by those who had the right

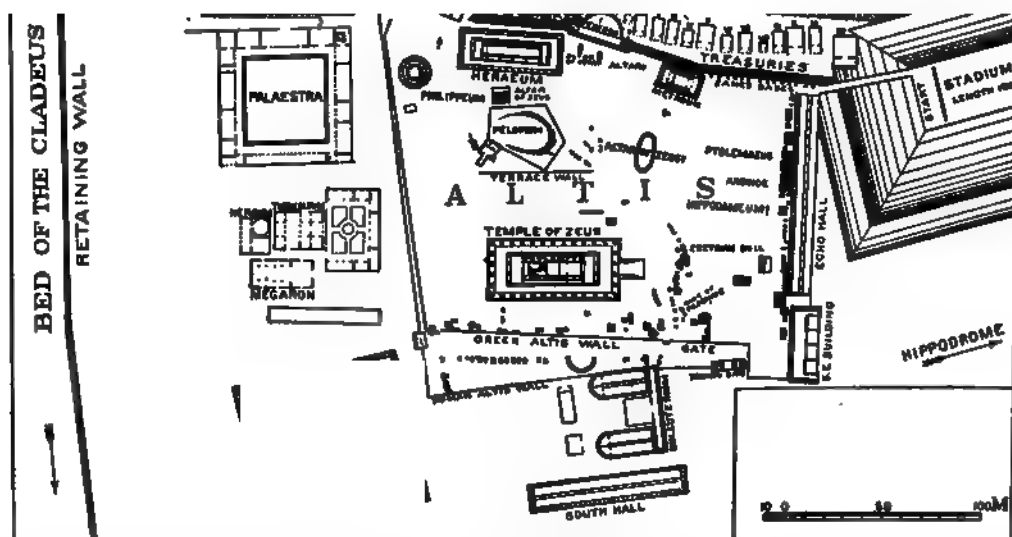

6. Nature of the Gods of Worship to worship there. As in myth the gods were drawn after human types, that is, with human virtues and human frailties, and bodies almost human, except that they were not made to die; so in worship the gods were persons not unlike men in their nature. Worship proceeds on the assumption that gods are like human rulers, in that men honor the gods by games and processions, seek to please them by gifts, and ask them to share banquets made in their honor. Only the humanness of the gods in worship is something more subtle, more intimate than in myth. No stress is laid on human form or the vagaries of human character in the gods of worship; in form they remain spirits more or less vague, but spirits who care for men, who may be approached as a man approaches his ruler, spirits bound to man by close social ties which it is his duty and pleasure to strengthen. Zeus is father of gods and men, a father not untouched by the needs of his children; Athena cares for the city of Athens as her special pride; each family worships gods which are all but akin to the family; in the gymnasium, Apollo or Hermes is represented as the patron and ideal of the youths who exercise there; the drama is part of the service of Dionysus; in a word each form of human activity, be it work or pleasure, was a point of contact with the gods. The real forces at work in the world were first men, and secondly beings with a nature like man's, but with powers superior to man's; worship was the attempt to ally the gods more closely to man by social-religious ties, in order that as both worked together the ends of life might be successfully attained. This conception of the gods as higher members of society is the keynote of Gr religion. In some ethnic religions the gods seem to be evil beings whose desire for mischief man must overcome; in others they are beings to be avoided as much as possible; or again they are rulers who delight in man's abject servitude; or again by cultivating the friendship of one god, man may hope to win blessing and avoid harm from the others. In Greece all the gods of worship were essentially friendly to man, because they were akin to him and a part of the society in which he lived.

forces that enter into human life." The contrast between such a personal point of view and the mechanical view of modern science is as marked as the contrast between it and the Heb conception of a universe brought into being and controlled by a God quite distinct from the physical world.

Of the particular gods, little need be said. The five greater gods, Zeus, Hera, Athena, Apollo and Artemis, are not closely connected with any one phenomenon of Nature or human life, though Zeus has to do with the sky, and Apollo and Artemis acquire a connection with the sun and moon. The most important worship of Zeus was at Olympia, where the pan-Hellenic games were held in his honor. Elsewhere he was

GROUND PLAN OF OLYMPIA.

The relation of the gods to Nature is not so simple as might at first appear. Within certain limits the forces of Nature were subject to the will of the gods. From the Gr point of view, however, the relation is much more intimate, in that the forces in the world, at least in so far as they affect man, are personal activities, activities that express the will of divine beings. We say that Poseidon personifies the sea, Gaia the earth, Helios the sun; and the origin of religion has been sought in man's awe before the forces of Nature. The truer statement is that the Gr world, including the physical world, was made up of spiritual beings, not of physical forces. "The fire, as useful as it is treacherous, is the province of Hephaestus; all the dangers and changeableness of the sea are reflected in Poseidon and his followers; an Artemis is there to guide the hunter, a Demeter to make the grain sprout, a Hermes or Apollo to watch over the herds; Athena is the spirit of wisdom, Hermes of shrewdness, Ares of tumultuous war. . . . In a word the Gr gods are in the world, not above the world, superior beings who embody in personal form all the worshipped mainly in connection with the weather and the changing seasons. Apparently much of his preeminence in Gr thought was due to myth. Hera was worshipped with Zeus on mountain tops, but her special place in worship was as the goddess of marriage. Athena, the maiden goddess of war and of handicrafts, was worshipped esp. in Northern Greece. War dances found a place in her worship, and she was rarely represented without aegis, spear and helmet. All the arts, agriculture, handicrafts, even the art of government, were under her care. Apollo was worshipped widely as the protector of the crops, and of the shepherd's flocks. In this aspect his festivals included purifications and rites to ward off dangers. He was also the god of music and of prophecy. At Delphi his prophetic powers won great renown, but the Pythian games with their contests in music, in rhythmic dancing, and in athletic sports were hardly less important. Artemis, in myth the chaste sister of Apollo, was worshipped as the queen of wild creatures and the mother of life in plants as well as in animals. She was the patron and the ideal of young women, as was Apollo of young men.

The gods most closely associated with Nature were not so important for religion. Gaia, mother earth, received sacrifices occasionally as the

8. Nature abode of the dead. Rhea in Crete, Gods Cybele in Asia Minor, also in origin forms of the earth mother, received more real worship; this had to do primarily with the birth of vegetation in the spring, and again with its destruction by drought and heat. Rivers were honored in many places as gods of fertility, and springs as nymphs that blessed the land and those who cultivated it. Poseidon was worshipped that he might bless fishing and trade by sea; inland he was sometimes recognized as the "father of waters," and a god of fertility; and where horses were raised, it was under the patronage of Poseidon. The heavenly bodies marked the seasons of worship, but were rarely themselves worshipped. In general, the phenomena of Nature seem to have been too concrete to rouse sentiments of worship in Greece.

A third class of gods, gods of human activities and emotions, were far more important for religion.

Demeter, once no doubt a form of the original earth-goddess, was the goddess of the grain, worshipped widely Human Activity and at many seasons by an agricultural Emotions people. Dionysus, god of souls, of the inner life, and of inspiration by divine power, was worshipped by all who cultivated the vine or drank wine. The Attic drama was the most important development of his worship. Hermes was quite generally honored as the god of shepherds and the god of roads. As the herald, and the god of trade and gain, he found a place in the cities. Aphrodite was perhaps first the goddess of the returning life of the spring; in Greece proper she was rather the goddess of human love, of marriage and the family, the special patron of women. Ares, the Thracian god of war, was occasionally worshipped in Greece, but more commonly the god of each state was worshipped to give success in battle to his people. Hephaestus, pictured as himself a lame blacksmith working at the art which was under his protection, was worshipped now as the fire, now as the patron of cunning work in metal. Asclepius received men's prayers for relief from disease.

II. Revelation: Inspiration.—For the Greeks revelation was a knowledge of the divine will in special circumstances, and inspiration was evinced by the power to foresee the divine purpose in a particular case. There is no such thing as the revelation of the divine nature, nor any question of universal truth coming to men through an inspired teacher; men knew a god through his acts, not through any seer or prophet. But some warning in danger or some clue to the right choice in perplexity might be expected from gods so close to human need as were the Gr gods. The Homeric poems depicted the gods as appearing to men to check them, to encourage them or to direct them.

In Homer also men might be guided by signs; while in later times divine guidance came either from signs or from men who were so close to the gods as to foresee something of the divine purpose.

The simplest class of signs were those that occurred in Nature. In the Iliad the thunderbolt marked the presence of Zeus to favor his friends

1. Omens or check those whose advance he chose to stop. The Athenian assembly adjourned when rain began to fall. Portents in Nature—meteors, comets, eclipses, etc.—claimed the attention of the superstitious; but there was no science of astrology, and superstition had no great hold on the Greeks. In the Homeric poems, birds frequently denoted the will of the gods, perhaps because their place was in the sky beyond any human control, perhaps because certain birds were associated with particular gods. The presence of an eagle on the right hand (toward the E.) was favorable, esp. when it came in answer to prayer. At times, the act of the bird is significant, as when the eagle of Zeus kills the geese eating grain in Odysseus' hall—portent of the death of the suitors. In later Gr history there are but few references to signs from birds. The theory of these signs in Nature is very simple: all Nature but expresses the will of the gods, and when the gods wish to give men some vague hint of the future, it is necessary only to cause some event not easily explained to attract man's attention.

From the 5th cent. on, divination by means of sacrificial victims took the place ordinarily of signs such as have just been described. In

2. Divina- the presence of the enemy or before tion by some important undertaking, animals Sacrifice were sacrificed to the gods. If they came willingly to the altar, if the inward parts, esp. the liver, were sound and well shaped and of good color, if the sacrifice burned freely and without disturbing the arrangement on the altar, success might be expected. The theory was very simple: if the gods were pleased and accepted the sacrifice, their favor was assured; but if the sacrifice deviated in any way from the normal, it would not please the gods. Thus any sacrifice might have prophetic significance, while sacrifices offered before important undertakings had special meaning. The practice arose of repeating sacrifices before a battle until a favorable one was obtained, and at length, as religion began to lose its hold, the time came when a general might disregard them completely.

An important means of learning the will of the gods was through dreams, when the ordinary channels of perception were closed and the

3. Dreams mind was free to receive impressions from the gods. The treacherousness of dreams was fully recognized, even in the Homeric poem; students of natural science came to recognize that dreams arose from natural causes; none the less they were generally regarded as a source of knowledge about the future, and gradually a science for interpreting dreams was evolved. For Pindar and for Plato the soul was more free when the body slept, and because the soul was the divine part of man's nature it could exercise the power of divination in sleep. Many of the recorded dreams are signs which came to the mind in sleep, like the dreams of Joseph and of Pharaoh, signs that needed later interpretation. See DIVINATION; DREAMS.

Prophets and seers were not as important in Greece as among many peoples. The blind Teiresias belongs to the realm of myth, though there were great families of seers, like the Iamidae at Olympia, who were specially gifted to interpret dreams, or signs from sacrifices. Ordinarily it was the "chresmologist," the man with a collection of ancient sayings to be applied to present events, whose advice was sought in time of need; or else men turned to the great oracles of Greece.

The most important oracle was that of Apollo at Delphi. Hither came envoys of nations

4. Oracles as well as individuals, and none went away without some answer to their questions. After preliminary sacrifices, the priestess purified herself and mounted the tripod in the temple; the question was propounded to her by a temple official, and it was his function also to put her wild ravings into hexameter verse for the person consulting the oracle. A considerable number of these answers remain to us, all, of course, somewhat vague, many of them containing shrewd advice on the question that was brought to the oracle. The honor paid to the oracle and its influence, on the whole an influence making for high ethical standards and wise statesmanship, must be recognized. The early Christian Fathers held that the Pythian priestess was inspired by an evil spirit; later critics have treated the whole institution as a clever device to deceive the people; but in view of the respect paid to the oracle through so many generations, it is hard to believe that its officials were not honest in their effort to discover and make known the will of the god they served.

III. Forms of Worship.—It has already been pointed out that Gr religion centered about local shrines. While in early times the

1. Shrines shrine consisted of an altar with perhaps a sacred grove, and later it might be no more than a block of stone on which offerings were laid, the more important shrines consisted of a plot of land sacred to the god, a temple or home for the god, and an altar for sacrifices. The plot of land, esp. in the case of shrines outside a city, might be very large, in which case it often was used as a source of income to the shrine, being cultivated by the priests or leased under restrictions to private persons. In this precinct stood the temple, facing

2. Temples toward the E., so that the morning sun would flood its interior when it was opened on a festival day. With one or two exceptions, the temple was not a place of assembly for worship, but a home for the god. It contained some symbol of his presence, after the 5th cent. BC ordinarily an image of the god; it served as the treasure-house for gifts brought to the god; worship might be offered in it by the priests, while the people gathered at the sacrifice outside. And as a home for the god, it was adorned with all the beauty and magnificence that could be commanded. The images of the gods, the noblest creation of sculpture in the 5th and 4th cents., were not exactly "idols"; that is, the images were not themselves worshipped, even though they were thought to embody the god in some semblance to his true form. In Greece men worshipped the gods themselves, grateful as they were to artists who showed them in what beautiful form to think of their deities.

Each of these shrines was directly in the hands of one or more officials, whose duty it was to care for the shrine and to keep up its worship

3. Priests in due form. Occasionally the priesthood was hereditary and the office was held for life; quite as often priests were chosen for a year or a term of years; but it was exceptional when the duties of the office prevented a man from engaging in other occupations. In distinction from the priests of many other forms of religion, the Gr priest was not a sacred man set apart for the service of the gods; the office may be called sacred, but the office was distinct from the man. The result was important, in that the priests in Greece could never form a caste by themselves, nor could they claim any other powers than were conferred on them by the ritual of the shrine. Thus Gr religion remained in the possession of the people, and developed no esoteric side either in dogma or in worship.

The seasons of worship varied with each particular shrine. While the state observed no recurring sabbath, it recognized a certain number of religious festivals as public holidays.

4. Seasons of Worship: days; thus at Athens the number of religious holidays in the year was somewhat larger than our fifty-two Sundays.

The tradition of each shrine determined whether worship should be offered daily or monthly or yearly, and also what were the more important seasons of worship. The principle of the sacred days was that at certain seasons the god was present in his temple expecting worship; just as it was the principle of sacred places that the temple should be located where the presence of the god had been felt and therefore might be expected again. Neither the location of the temple nor the seasons of worship were determined primarily by human convenience.

The elements of worship in Greece were (1) prayers, hymns, and votive offerings, (2) the sacrificial meal, (3) propitiatory sacrifice and

5. Elements of Worship: purification, and (4) the processions, musical contests and athletic games, which formed part of the larger festivals.

The heroes of Homer prayed to the gods at all times, now a word of prayer in danger, now more formal prayers in connection with a sacrifice; and such was doubtless the practice in later times. In the more formal prayers, it was customary to invoke the god with various epithets, to state the petition, and to give the reason why a favorable answer might be expected—either former worship by the petitioner, or vows of future gifts, or former answers to prayer, or an appeal to the pity of the god. Sometimes a prayer reads as if it were an attempt to win divine favor by gifts; more commonly, if not always, the appeal is to a relationship between man and his god, in which man's gifts play a very subordinate part. Thanksgiving finds small place in prayer or in sacrifice, but it was rather expressed in votive offerings. In every temple these abounded, as in certain Roman Catholic shrines today; and as is the case today they might be of value in themselves, they might have some special reference to the god, or they might refer to the human need in which the

The most common form of worship consisted of the sacrificial meal, like the meat offering or meal offering of the Hebrews. The sacrifice consisted of a domestic animal, selected in accordance with the ritual of the shrine where it was to be offered. First the animal was led to the altar, consecrated with special rites and killed by the offerer or the priest while hymns and cries of worship were uttered by the worshippers. Then some of the inward parts were roasted and eaten by priests and worshippers. Finally the remainder of the creature was prepared, the thigh bones wrapped in fat and meat to be burned for the god, the balance of the meat to be roasted for the worshippers; and with libations of wine the whole was consumed. The religious meaning of the act is evidently found in the analogy of a meal prepared for an honored guest. The animal, an object valuable in itself, is devoted to this religious service; the god and his worshippers share alike this common meal; and the god is attached to his worshippers by a closer social bond, because they show their desire to honor and commune with him, while he condescends to accept the gift and to share the meal they have prepared. (Possibly the animal was once thought to have been made divine by the act of consecration, or the god was believed to be present in his flesh, but there is no evidence that such a belief existed in the 5th cent. BC, or later.) The simple, rational character of this worship is characteristic of Gr religion.

9. Propitiatory Sacrifice

A black animal was selected, and brought to a low altar of earth; the sacrifice was offered toward evening or at night, and the whole animal was consumed by fire. While in general this type of sacrifice may be called propitiatory, its form, if not its meaning, varied greatly. It might be worship to spirits of the earth whose anger was to be feared; it might be offered when an army was going into battle, or when the crops were in danger of blight, or of drought; or again it was the normal form of worship in seasons of pestilence or other trouble. Sometimes the emphasis seems to be laid on the propitiation of anger by an animal wholly devoted to the god, while at other times there is the suggestion that some evil substance is removed by the rite. The later conception is clearer in rites of purification, where, by washing, by fire, or by the blood of an animal slain for the purpose, some form of defilement is removed. In the sacrifice of a pig to Demeter for this purpose, or of a dog to Hecate, some mystic element may exist, since these animals were sacred to the respective goddesses.

These various elements of worship were combined in varying degree in the great religious festivals. These lasted from a day to a fortnight. After purification of the worshippers, which might be simple or elaborate, and some preliminary sacrifice, there was often a splendid procession followed giver had found help. So far as the great public festivals are concerned, the prayer seems to have been merged with the hymn of praise in which the element of petition found a small place.

by a great public sacrifice. In the greater festivals, this was followed by athletic games and horse races in honor of the god, and sometimes by

11. The Great Religious Festivals or, in the festivals of Dionysus at Athens, by the performance of tragedy and comedy in the theater. In all this, the religious element seems to retreat into the background, though analogies may be found in the history of Christianity. The religious mystery plays were the origin of our own drama; and as for the horse races, one may still see them performed as a religious function, for example, at Siena. The horse races and the athletic games were performed for the gods as for some visiting potentate, a means of affording them pleasure and doing them honor. The theatrical performances apparently originated in ceremonies more essentially religious, in which men acted some divine drama depicting the experiences attributed to the gods themselves. This

12. Mysteries at Eleusis last feature is most evident in the mysteries at Eleusis, where the experiences of Demeter and Persephone were enacted by the people with the purpose of bringing the worshippers into some more intimate connection with these goddesses, such that their blessing was assured not only for this world, but for the life after death.

In all the forms of Gr worship perhaps the most striking feature was the absence of magic or superstition, almost the absence of mystery.

13. Absence of Magic and Mystery Men approached the gods as they would approach superior men, bringing them petitions and gifts, making great banquets for their entertainment, and performing races and games for their pleasure, although this was by no means the whole of Gr religion, a phase of religion far more highly developed in the rational atmosphere of Gr thought than among other races. As the Gr gods were superior members of the social universe, so Gr worship was for the most part social, even human, in its character.

IV. The Future Life.—Gr thought of the life after death was made up of three elements which developed successively, while the ear-

1. Funeral Rites lier ones never quite lost their hold on the people in the presence of the later. The oldest and most permanent thought of the future found its expression in the worship of ancestors. Whether the body of the dead was buried or burned, the spirit was believed to survive, an unsubstantial shadowy being in the likeness of the living man. And rites were performed for these shades to lay them to rest and to prevent them from injuring their survivors, if not to secure their positive blessing. As at other points in Gr religion, the rites are fairly well known, while the belief must be inferred from the rites. The rites consisted first of an elaborate funeral, including sometimes animal sacrifices and even athletic games, and secondly of gifts recurring at stated intervals, gifts of water for bathing, of wine and food, and of wreaths and flowers. The human wants and satisfaction of the spirit are thus indicated. And the purpose is perhaps to keep the spirit alive, certainly to keep it in good humor so that it will not injure the survivors and bring on them defilement which would mean the wrath of the gods. At the same time, any contact with death demands purification before one can approach the gods in worship.

The second element in Gr thought of the future life appears in the Homeric poems, and through the epic exerted a wide influence on later

2. Future Life in the Homeric Poems periods. Here the separateness of the souls of the dead from the human life is emphasized. Once the bodies of the dead are burned, the souls go to the realm of Hades, whence there is no return even in dreams, and where (according to one view) not even consciousness remains to them. It would seem that the highly rational view of the world in the epic, a point of view which laid stress on the greater Olympian gods, banished the belief in souls as akin to the belief in sinister and magic influences. We might almost say that the thought of the greater gods as personal rulers tended to drive out the thought of lesser and more mystic spiritual influences, and made a place for souls only as shades in the realm of Hades. Certainly the result for Gr religion was to render far less vivid any idea of a real life after death.

The third element was associated with the worship of the gods of the lower world, and in particular Demeter and Persephone. In this

3. Later Beliefs in Immortality worship, particularly at Eleusis, the fact of life after death was assumed, a fact that the Greeks never had denied; but the reality of the future life, the persistence of human relationship after death, and the kindly rule of Persephone as Queen of Souls were vividly impressed on the worshippers. In part through the influence of the Orphic sect, the actual divinity of the soul was believed by many thinkers, a doctrine which was formulated by Plato in a manner which profoundly affected early Christian thought. If the epic emphasis on the greater gods made the souls mere shades in Hades, it was again a religious movement, namely the worship of gods like Persephone and Dionysus, which taught to some Greeks the divine reality of the soul and its hope for a blessed life in communion with the gods.

This development in Greece is the more interesting because there are indications of the same thing in Heb history. In the OT there are found traces of an old worship of souls, practised by races akin to the Hebrews if not by the Hebrews themselves; this worship was brought to an end under the clarifying power of the worship of Jeh; and finally the later prophets perceived the truth that while souls were not to be worshipped, the dead who died in the Lord did not become mere shades, but continued to live as the objects of His Divine love.

V. Sin, Expiation, and the Religious Life.—The ancient Heb religion made much of sin, and of the remedy for sin which God, in loving

1. Greek mercy to His people, had provided; in
Idea of Sin Greece the thought of sin found no such place in the religious life, though of course it was not absent altogether. If sin is defined as that which causes divine displeasure and wrath, it appears in Gr thought in three forms: (1) as the transgression of moral law, (2) as neglect of the gods and consequent presumption, and (3) as pollution. The cause of sin is traced to human folly, either some passion like envy or anger or desire for gain, or to undue self-reliance which develops into presumption; and once a man has started in the wrong direction, his sin so affects judgment and will that he is all but inevitably led on into further sin. According to the simple Gr theodicy, the transgression of moral law brings its penalty, nor can any sacrifice induce the gods to intervene on behalf of the transgressor. All that expiation can accomplish is to set right the spirit of the transgressor so that he will not be led into further sin. Neglect of the gods—the second type of sin—brings its penalty in the results of divine wrath, but in this case, prompt repentance and submission to the gods may appease the wrath and therefore change its results. Pollution, the third cause of divine displeasure, often cannot be called sin; the failure to remove pollution, however, esp. before one approaches the gods, is a just cause of divine anger. In general the Gr thought of sin centers about the idea of undue self-reliance and presumption, ὕβρις (hubris), which is the opposite of the characteristic Gr virtue, σωφροσύνη (sōphrosynē), namely that temperate mode of life in which everything is viewed in right proportion. Inasmuch as the Gr gods are righteous rulers, the nature of sin lies in its opposition to divine justice, not in unholiness or in the rejection of divine love.

Orestes Pursued by Two Erinyes.

The demands of the religious life in Greece were relatively simple. To avoid acts of impiety such as are mentioned above, to perform

2. Religious the ordinary acts of worship regularly Ideals and punctiliously, were all that was required, though the religious man might find many opportunities for worship beyond what was expected of everyone. Little is said of the spirit of worship which underlay the outward acts. Nor does the command, "Be ye therefore holy, even as I am holy," find an echo in Greece. At the same time the fact that the gods so definitely represented human ideals of life, must have meant that in a way men aimed to make their lives conform to divine ideals. The essential feature of the religious life was the true recognition of human dependence on the gods, a dependence which showed itself in obedience to the divine rule, in trustful confidence that the gods would bless their worshippers, in resignation when misfortune came, and particularly in the belief in the loving care and protection of the divine rulers. In Greece, the religious man looked to the gods not so much for salvation from evil, as for positive blessings.

VI. The Influence of Greek Religion on Christianity.—This is not the place to speak of the de-

1. Greek cadence of Gr religion, of its ameliorating influence on the Alexandrian Philosophy world, or of the control it exercised over the Rom state. Its most per-and Chris-manent effect is found rather in Christian tianity. And here its shaping influ-Theology ence is first noted in Christian theology beginning with Paul and the Apostle John. For although Gr religion was more free from dogma or anything that could be called theology than are most religions, it furnished the religious content to the greatest philosophical systems we know; and all through the centuries the leaders of Christian thought have been trained in the religious philosophy of Plato and of Aristotle. Our Christian conceptions of the nature of God and the soul, of the relation of God to the physical universe, and of God's government of the world, have been worked out along the lines laid down by these Gr thinkers. And while the debt is primarily to Gr philosophy, it should never be forgotten that Gr philosophy formulated these conceptions out of the material which Gr religion furnished; indeed one may believe that it was the religious conceptions formulated by centuries of thoughtful worshippers which found final expression in the Gr philosophic systems.

Again, the organization of the early Christian church and its form of government was quite as much Gr as it was Heb in origin.

2. Greek Here the influence of Gr religion as Influence such was less marked; still it must be on Christian remembered that every form of Gr
Liturgy organization had its religious side, be it family, or school, or state; and further, that some phases of religion in Greece were quite thoroughly organized in a manner that was adapted without much difficulty to the conditions of the new religion. Moreover the thought of the Gr priest as not a sacred man, but a man appointed by the community to a sacred office, was naturally adopted by the nascent Christian communities. Even in the organization of worship, in the prayers and hymns and liturgy which gradually developed from the simplest beginnings, it is not difficult to trace the influence of what the Gr converts to Christianity had been brought up to regard as worship of the gods.

The most striking case of the effect of the old religion on the new is found in the method of celebrating the Christian sacraments. In

3. Greek the 2d cent. AD, the baptismal bath Influence took place after a brief period of inon the Sac- struction, and at the common meal raments the bread and wine were blessed in commemoration of the Master. Three centuries passed and this simplicity had given way to splendid ceremony. Baptism ordinarily was performed only on the "mystic night," the night before Easter. Almost magic rites with fasting had exorcised evil from the candidate; ungirded, with loose hair and bare feet, he went down into the water, and later was anointed with oil to signify the gift of the Holy Spirit; then the candidate, dressed in white, wearing crowns, and carrying torches, proceeded to their first communion in which a mixture of honey and milk might take the place of

(1) Halah, hālā express the sense of weakness, sickness, pain (e.g. Samson, in Jgs 16 7.11.17, "Then shall I become weak [halah], and be as another man"; Isa 17 11 AV, "a heap in the day of grief"; Ec 3 4, "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief," "He hath borne our griefs" (hōlī), RVm "Heb sickness, sicknesses"; ver 10, "He hath put him to grief," RVm "made him sick" (hālāh) (tr^d by Dillmann and others, "to crush him incurably"; cf Mic 6 13; Nah 3 19); yāghōn, perhaps from the pain and weariness of toil (Ps 31 10), "For my life is spent with grief," RV "sorrow"; "The Lord added grief to my sorrow," RV "sorrow to my pain" (Jer 45 3); ka'aš implies provocation, anger, irritation; thus Hannah said to Eli (AV), "Out of the abundance of my complaint and my grief [RV "provocation"] have I spoken" (1 S 1 16). Ps 6 7; 31 9, "grief"; Prov 17 25, "A foolish son is a grief to his father" (i.e. source of provocation; the same word is rendered "wrath" in 12 16, AV "a fool's wrath," RV "vexation"; so also 27 3); Job 6 2, "Oh that my grief were thoroughly weighed," RV "Oh that my vexation were but weighed" (in 5 2 AV the same word is tr^d "wrath," RV "vexation"); k'ēbh, is "sorrow," "pain," properly "to hurt." It occurs in Job 2 13, "His grief [RVm "or pain"] was very great"; also 16 6 RV, "grief"; makh'ōbh "sorrows," "pain," "suffering" (2 Ch 6 29, RV "sorrow"; Ps 69 26, RVm "or pain"; Isa 53 3, "a man of sorrows"; ver 4, "Surely he hath carried our sorrows"); mārāh and mārar indicate "bitterness" (Gen 26 35; 49 23; 1 S 30 6; Ruth 1 13; Prov 14 10, "The heart knoweth its own bitterness," mārāh); pūkāh implies staggering, or stumbling, only in 1 S 25 31, "This shall be no grief unto thee," RVm "Heb cause of staggering"; ra' (a common word for "evil") denotes an evil, a calamity, only once in AV tr^d "grief," viz. of Jonah's gourd, "to deliver him from his grief," RV "from his evil case" (Jon 4 6); yāra', "to be evil," Dt 15 10, RV "Thy heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him" (also 1 S 1 8; Neh 2 10; 13 8; several times tr^d "grievous"); hārāh, "to burn," "to be wroth" (e.g. Gen 4 6, "Why art thou wroth?"), is tr^d "grieved" in Gen 45 5, and 1 S 15 11 AV (RV "Samuel was wroth"); the same word is often used of the kindling of anger; lā'āh, "to be weary," "tired," "faint" (Prov 26 15), AV "The slothful hideth his hand in his bosom, it grieveth him to bring it again to his mouth," RV "wearieth"; also Job 4 2; ācabh, "to grieve," "to be vexed," occurs in Gen 6 6; 34 7; 45 5, etc.; Ps 78 40, "How oft did they . . . grieve him in the desert." Of other words sometimes tr^d "grief" may be mentioned kūl, "to weary of," "to loathe" (Ps 95 10), "Forty long years was I grieved with that generation"; in 119 158; 139 21, RVm "loathe"; hāmēc, implying to be bitterly or violently moved, sour (often tr^d "leavened"), only in Ps 73 21, RV "For my soul was grieved," m "Heb was in a ferment."

(2) In the NT "grief," "grieve," etc., are infrequent. The commonest words are lupē (1 Pet 2 19), RV "griefs," elsewhere tr^d "sorrow"; lupēō, "to grieve," "afflict" (Mk 10 22, RV "sorrowful"; Jn 21 17, "Peter was grieved"; Rom 14 15; 2 Cor 2 4, RV "made sorry"; ver 5, "caused sorrow"; Eph 4 30, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God"); diaponēomai, lit. "to labor through," "to grieve self," occurs twice (Acts 4 2; 16 18, RV "sore troubled"); stendzō, "to groan, or sigh," once only tr^d "grief" (He 13 17), RVm "groaning"; prosoch-thizō, "to be indignant," etc., twice (He 3 10-17, RV "displeased"). The reference is to Ps 95 10, where the LXX by this Gr word tr^d kūl (see above).

The less frequency in the NT of words denoting "grief" is significant. Christ came "to comfort all that mourn—to give a garland for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness." Christians, however, cannot but feel sorrow and be moved by grief, and it is to be noted that in both the OT and NT, God Himself is said to be susceptible to grief. W. L. WALKER

GRIEVANCE, grēv'ans (גִּרְוָא, 'āmāl): Occurs only in AV as a tr of Hab 1 3, "Why dost thou show me iniquity, and cause me to behold grievance?" (RV "look upon perverseness"); 'āmāl is also tr^d "perverseness" by AV and RV in Nu 23 21, "perverseness in Israel"; Isa 10 1, AV "grievousness," RV "perverseness." In Hab 1 13, AV tr^d the same word "iniquity" (m "grievance"), "Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil and canst not look on iniquity" (m "grievance"), RV "perverseness." The word means originally "toil," "labor" with sorrow, misery, etc., as the consequence, and is often so tr^d. It is the word in Isa 53 11, "He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied." W. L. WALKER

GRIEVOUS, grēv'us, GRIEVOUSLY, grēv'us-li, GRIEVOUSNESS, grēv'us-nes: In addition to several of the words mentioned under GRIEF (q.v.), we have kābhēdh ("heavy") 8 t., e.g. Gen 12 10, "The famine was grievous in the land," RV "sore"; māraç ("powerful"), "a grievous curse" (1 K 2 8); gūr, "to turn aside" (Jer 6 28), "grievous revolters"; kāsheh, "to make sharp" (1 K 12 4; 2 Ch 10 4); kādhlu'im (Jer 16 4), "They shall die grievous deaths," RVm "deaths of sicknesses"; āhāq (Ps 31 18), "which speak grievous things proudly" RV "against the righteous insolently"; hēl, "sin" (Lam 1 8), "Jerus hath grievously sinned" (lit. "hath sinned a sin"); mā'al, "trespass" (Ezk 14 13), "trespassing grievously" (lit. "trespassing a trespass"); RV "committing a trespass"; kōbhēdh, "weight" (Isa 21 15), "grievousness"; barūs, "heavy," "grievous wolves" (Acts 20 29), "grievous charges" (25 7), "His commandments are not grievous" (1 Jn 5 3); oknērōs, RV "irksome" (Phil 3 1); ponērōs, "evil" (Rev 16 2), "a grievous sore"; dusbāstaktos, "grievous to be borne" (Mt 23 4; Lk 11 46); deinōs, "greatly," "grievously tormented" (Mt 8 6); kakōs, "badly," "grievously vexed" (Mt 15 22). GROAN, grōn (גָּרַן, nā'ak, גָּרַן, 'anāk; στενάω, stendzō, στενάζω, embrimōmai): The Eng. word, noun and vb., is an attempt to imitate the vocal sound which is expressive of severe pain or distress, physical or mental. It is cognate with the Scottish dialect word girn, and with grin in its original obsolete sense, as used in the Anglican Prayer-book version of Ps 59 6, 14, "grin like a dog and go about the city"; here "grin" is a tr of hāmāh, and means the sound of the nightly howling of the pariah dogs in Jerus and other oriental cities. It is used in the OT:

(1) To denote the expression accompanying physical suffering, as in the case of the Israelites in Egypt oppressed by Pharaoh's taskmasters (Ex 2 24; 6 5), or in Pal under the yoke of the Canaanites (Jgs 2 18, n'kāḥāh). It is also used in Job's description of the sufferings and wretchedness of the poor (24 12), as well as in his complaint concerning his own suffering when smitten by the hand of God (23 2). The Psalmist speaks of groaning when fever-stricken and remorseful, AV and RV "roaring all the day long" (Ps 32 3; 38 9; 102 5; 23 1).

(2) The expression of suffering on the part of beasts, hungry and thirsty in drought (Joel 1 18).

(3) The manifestation of mental and spiritual distress as in Ps 6 6; 102 20 (RV "sighing").

(4) Metaphorically groaning is the despairing note of Egypt in the prophecy of her overthrow by Babylon, the sound being that uttered by a deadly wounded man (Ezk 30 24; similarly in the prophecy of the Pers conquest the misery of Babylon is thus represented by Jer 51 52); and the misery of Tyre when taken by Babylon is similarly described (Ezk 26 15, AV "cry").

The word for "sigh" ('ānāhāh) is closely allied, and the meanings are sufficiently akin, so that the terms seem interchangeable. A sigh is physically a sign of respiratory distress due to depressed action of the heart; sighing is consequently the indication of physical weakness or mental disquietude, as Ps 12 5; 31 10; 79 11; Isa 21 2; 24 7; 35 10; Jer 45 3.

Nā'ak is the crying of persons dying or starving, as in Ezk 30 24; Job 24 12. A somewhat similar word, hāghāh, means the complaining sound like that of the cooing of doves (Isa 69 11; Nah 2 7). Nehi is the sound of lamentation of the dead (Jer 9 10; 31 15; Am 5 16).

In the NT "groaning" is used for the expression of mental distress. In Jn 11 33.35 the word used is part of the vb. embrimaomai, which conveys the idea of deep and earnest emotion. The same word in two other passages is tr^d "strictly charged," and indicates the emphasis of the charge (Mt 9 30; Mk 1 43). Elsewhere "sighing" and "groaning" are renderings of words derived from the vb. stenazō, as in Rom 8 23; 2 Cor 5 2.4; Mk 7 34; 8 12. Stephen calls the groaning of Israel in Egypt stenagmōs (Acts 7 34), and the united wail of the travelling creation is expressed by St. Paul by the word sunstenāzei (Rom 8 22). The sigh is a characteristic sign of woe in Isa 21 2; 24 7; Jer 45 3; Lam 1 4.8.11.12; Ezk 9 4; 21 6 f.

GROSS, grōs (עָרֵף, 'ārāphēl): Used twice with "darkness" in Isa 60 2; Jer 13 16. In the NT the vb. παχύνω, pachúnō, "to make fat," is applied twice to "making gross" the heart (Mt 13 15; Acts 28 27). See GREASE.

GROUND, ground, GROUNDED, ground'ed (אֲדָמָה, 'ādāmāh, עֵרֶץ, 'erec; אֲרָץ, 'gē):

(1) "Ground" is in AV the tr of 'ādāmāh, "the soil," the ground so called from its red color, frequently also tr^d "earth" and "land" (Gen 2 5 f, etc; Ex 3 5; 8 21, etc); it is more often the tr of erec, which means rather the earth, oftenest tr^d "earth" and "land" (Gen 18 2; Ps 74 7; Isa 3 26, etc); other words are helekāh, "portion," "field" (2 S 23 12, RV "plot"); hārish, "ploughing" (1 S 8 12); sādheh, "a plain," "a field" (1 Ch 11 13, RV "plot of ground"); for other special words see DRY; FALLOW; PARCHED.

(2) In the NT the common word for "ground" is gē, "earth," "soil," "land" (Mt 13 8; Acts 7 33, "holy ground" etc); other words are āgros, "field" (Lk 14 18, "I have bought a piece of ground," RV "field"); chōrtōn, "spot," "place" (Jn 4 5, "parcel of ground").

(3) As past part. of "to grind," "ground" appears as the tr of rīphōth, pounded corn (2 S 17 19, RV "bruised"); "ground" is also the tr of tāhan (Ex 32 20; Nu 11 8; Dt 9 21, RV "grinding").

(4) "Ground," as the basis or foundation of anything, occurs in 1 Tim 3 15 as the tr of hedratōma (from ēdaphos), "the pillar and ground of the truth," RVm "stay."

"Grounded" is used in the sense of founded, based, fixed in (Isa 30 32), "and in every place where the grounded staff shall pass, which the Lord shall lay upon him," AVm "Heb every passing of the rod founded," RV "and every stroke [m "Heb passing"] of the appointed staff [m "Or staff of doom (Heb foundation)"] which Jeh shall lay upon him"; following, ver 31, "with his rod will he [Jeh] smite him"; Delitzsch, "every stroke of the rod of destiny which Jeh causes to fall upon Asshur"; the word is māsdāhāh, from yāsdāh, "to place," "to found," "to appoint," "to ordain," hence "appointed rod [of punishment]," seems the simplest rendering.

In Eph 3 17 we have "rooted and grounded in love," and in Col 1 23, "if ye continue in the faith, grounded and settled," RV "steadfast," both themeliōō, "to lay a foundation." In Eccles 18 6 "ground" is used for the "bottom of things," but RV has "to track them out" (ezichneūd), "to trace out."

(5) Figurative uses of "ground" are as representing the heart in relation to its reception of words of truth and righteousness (Jer 4 3; Hos 10 12, "Break up your fallow ground"); to the word of the kingdom as preached by Christ (Mt 13 8.23); dry, parched, thirsty ground stands for a poor condition (Ps 107 33.35; Isa 35 7; 44 3; 53 2; Ezk 19 13).

GRUDGE, gruj (נָפַח, nāfar; στενάζω, stendzō, γογγυσμός, goggusmōs): "Grudge" (perhaps a mimetic word, cf Gr grū) is "to grumble" or "murmur" at any person or thing, to entertain an envious or covetous feeling, to do or give anything unwillingly, etc. It occurs in AV as the tr of nāfar, "to keep [anger]" (Lev 19 18, "Thou shalt not . . . bear any grudge against the children of thy people"); in Ps 59 15, as the tr, in text, of Heb lūn or līn, "to pass the night," "to tarry," Niphal, "to show oneself obstinate," "to murmur or complain" (of the enemies who were hunting David like dogs), "Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied," m "If they be not satisfied then will they stay all night," RV "And tarry all night if they be not satisfied"; but see Ex 15 24; 16 2; Nu 14 2; Josh 9 18, etc, where the tr is "murmur"; may not the meaning be "and growl [or howl] if they be not satisfied"? "Grudge" formerly implied open expression of discontent, etc, e.g. Wyclif has in Lk 15 2, "The farisies and scribis grucchiden seinyng," etc.

In Jas 5 9, stenazō, "to groan," "to complain" (from affliction or from impatience or ill-humor), is tr^d "grudge," "Grudge not one against another, brethren," RV "murmur not"; goggusmos, "a murmuring" (cf Jn 7 12 f; Acts 6 1), is rendered "grudging" (1 Pet 4 9), "Use hospitality one to another without grudging," RV "murmuring"; cf Phil 2 14; mē ek lūpēs, "not out of grief," is "without grudging" (2 Cor 9 7, RV "not grudgingly," m "Gr of sorrow"); in Eccles 10 25 we have "will not grudge" (goggūzō), RV "murmur."

"Grudge" was frequent in the earlier VSS, but is changed in AV for the most part into "murmur". RV completes the change, except Lev 19 18, and text of 2 Cor 9 7.

GUARD, gārd: (1) שָׂר הַתְּבָאִיִּים, sar ha-tabbāhīm, "captain of the guard," lit. "slaughterers" (Gen 37 36; 39 1; 40 3.4; 41 10.12); רַב־תְּבָאִיִּים, rabb tabbāhīm (2 K 25 8.11.20; Jer 39 9, etc); רַב־תְּבָאִיִּים, rabb tabbāhayyāh (Dnl 2 14); רָצִים, rācīm, "guard," AV "footmen" (1 S 22 17); שָׂרֵי הַרָצִים, "chief of the guard," AV "captains of the guard" (1 K 14 27); īā' hā-rācīm, "guard-chamber" (1 K 14 28; cf Ezk 40 21, etc, where "lodges" are "guardrooms"; see A. B. Davidson ad loc.). (2) מִשְׁמָר, mishmār, "guard," a defence to a point of danger (Neh 4 22 f; Ezk 38 7). (3) מִשְׁמָרָאֵה, mishma'ah, "guard" (2 S 23 23, where ARVm and RVm have "council," the body over which Benaiah was set by David and whose functions were perhaps those of consultation). (4) Σπεκουλάτωρ, spekoulatōr, "guard" (Mk 6 27, "a man of Herod's guard," where, as in one or two other cases, St. Mark, writing for Romans, simply transliterates the Lat speculator "a scout," "an executioner," as in loc.). (5) Στρατο-ρεδάρχης, stratopedarchēs, "captain of the guard" AV, "captain of the praetorian guard" RVM, Acts 28 16. See CAPTAIN. (6) Κουστωδία, koustōdia, "watch" AV, "guard" ARV and RV (Mt 27 65.66; 28 11).

An oriental monarch's body-guard consisted of picked men attached to his person and ready to fulfil his pleasure in important and confidential concerns. At the courts of Egypt and Babylon the members of the guard were known as "slaughterers," "executioners" (Gen 37 36 AVm, ARVm and RVM, where Potiphar is called their captain); 2 K 25 8, where Nebuzaradan is called their captain (AVm "chief marshal"). Whether it had ever been the function of the body-guard to kill meat for the royal table there is little directly to show; that they acted as executioners can be well understood. In Israel they were known as "the footmen" (1 S 22 17 AV, ARVm and RVM "runners") who acted as royal messengers or couriers from the time of Saul onward (2 K 10 25; 11 6); and this designation connects them with the couriers of the kings of Persia (Est 3 13.15; 8 14, where our VSS render "posts," though the Heb is rāḥīm).

The men of the royal body-guard were usually foreigners like the janissaries of oriental monarchs down to modern times, who prefer to have around their persons warriors uninfluenced by family connection with the people of the land. Rameses II had such a body-guard whose commanders ranked with the great officers of the crown (Maspero, Struggle of the Nations, 766). David's body-guard of 600, known also as the gibbōrīm or "mighty men," consisted of Cherethites, Pelethites, and Gittites (2 S 15 18; 20 23), and we read of Carites (2 K 11 19), who may have been Carians or Cretans, as forming part of the guard at the coronation of King Jehoash.

That this guard had duties in connection with the temple as well as the king's house seems clear.

That they were employed as slaughterers of the sacrifices before the Levites were intrusted with the office is unlikely, inasmuch as this guard is not said to have been composed of "slaughterers" but of "runners." But they accompanied King Rehoboam when he visited the temple (1 K 14 28), and to their captains were committed the shields of brass which took the place of the shields of gold which Solomon had hung up in the temple; Jehoiaada employed their captains to put Athaliah to death and to exterminate the worshippers of Baal who had fled to the temple precincts (2 K 11 4 ff); the temple gate leading to the palace was called "the gate of the guard" (2 K 11 19). At this time, and for this occasion, at least, the royal body-guard were the temple guards; and when Ezekiel drew up his plans for the temple which he conceived to replace the temple destroyed by Nebuchadrezzar, the "lodges" or "little chambers" were rooms for the accommodation of the temple guard (Ezk 40 7.10.21.33, etc.).

GUARDIAN, gār'di-an. See FAMILY; ANGEL.

GUDGODAH, gud-gō'da (גִּדְגָּדָה, gudhgōdhāh): A place in the wilderness journeyings (Dt 10 7), corresponding to Hor-haggidgad in Nu 33 32.

LXX in each case renders Γαδγὰδ, Gadgād. The site cannot now be identified; but there may be an echo of the ancient name in that of Wady Guda-ghid, a confluent of Wady Jerāfeh, which comes down from et Tih into the Arabah nearly due W. of Petra. There are difficulties, however, as the consonants do not correspond.

GUEST, gest (כָּרֵךְ, kārēḥ; ἀνάκτορος, and-keimai): Oriental customs growing out of a nomadic life demand a greater abandon and freedom with respect to the relation of host and guest than are permitted by the conventionalities of western life. A householder is expected to entertain a traveler, and in turn the traveler may accept with perfect ease the hospitality shown without any obligation to pay. See HOSPITALITY. The significance of the word is that of one who is called or invited. A certain sacredness, unknown to modern western society, was attached to the guest, so that a special apartment was set aside for the guests. See GUEST-CHAMBER. In the OT only 3 t is the word itself used, with reference to the guests of Adonijah (1 K 1 41.49), of the foolish woman (Prov 9 18), and of Jeh (Zeph 1 7). In the NT, 3 t (Mt 22 10 f; Lk 19 7 AV, RV "to lodge"). Though but few actual uses of the word occur, there are abounding illustrations of the guest relation in both OT and NT. Esp. is this manifest in the striking social attitudes of Jesus on occasions. Notable among these are the hospitality of Matthew (Lk 5 29 ff); Jesus' relation to Martha and Mary (10 38 ff), and His entrance into the home of Zacchaeus (Lk 19 1 f). Likewise Jesus spoke frequently of the relation which should exist between the guest and his host (see Lk 7 44-46; Mt 25 35; 10 40).

GUEST-CHAMBER, gest'chām-bēr: The tr of (1) לִשְׁכָּה, lishkāh (1 S 9 22, AV "parlor"), and (2) κατάλυμα, kataluma (Mk 14 14 || Lk 22 11). The lishkāh was probably a room in which the sacrificial feasts were held. Kataluma is derived from kataliō, which means "to slacken," i.e. the ropes of the beasts of burden, and hence "to lodge." Kataluma has accordingly often the sense of "inn," but as used in Mk and Lk it has the narrower meaning of a room in which to eat.

GUIDE, gid (נָהָל, 'allāph, נָהָל, nāhāl, נָהָל, nāhāl; ὁδηγός, hodēgós, ὁδηγός, hodēgós): "Guide" (noun) is the tr of 'allāph, "an intimate," "a friend," the leader of a family or tribe: Ps 55 13, "a man mine equal, my guide," RV "my companion"; Prov 2 17, "the guide of her youth," RV "friend," m "or guide"; Jer 3 4, "My father, thou [art] the guide of my youth," RVM "companion"; Mic 7 5, "Put ye not confidence in a guide," ARV "in a friend," m "confidant" (which the context shows to be the meaning), ERV "guide," m "familiar friend"; once of kāḥn, "a judge," "a military leader or commander" (cf Josh 10 24; Dnl 11 18); Prov 6 7, RV "chief," m "judge"; once nāhagh, "to lead," is tr'd "guide" (Ps 48 14). In the NT hodēgós, "a way-leader," is tr'd "guide" (Mt 23 16, "ye blind guides"; 23 24; Acts 1 16; Rom 2 19); "to guide" is the tr of nāhāl, "to lead forth" (Job 38 32; Ps 73 24); once of 'āshar, Piel, "to guide" or "lead straight" (Prov 23 19); of yā'aq, "to command," "to give counsel" ("I will guide thee with mine eye," RV "I will counsel thee with mine eye upon thee," Ps 32 8); of kāl, "to contain," "to sustain" (Ps 112 5, "He will guide his affairs with discretion," RV "He shall maintain his cause in judgment"); of nāhagh, "to drive," "to lead" (Ps 76 52); of hodēgō, "to show the way," "guide" (Jn 16 13, "He shall guide you into all truth," RV "the truth"; Acts 8 31); oikodespotéō is tr^d "to guide the house," RV "rule the household" (1 Tim 5 14); the word means lit. to be a house-master (the head of the house).

RV has "guide" for "lead" (Ps 25 5; Mt 15 14; Lk 6 39; Rev 7 17); "a guide to" for "more excellent than" (Prov 13 26); "guided" for "brought in" (Ps 78 28); "guideth" for "maketh" (2 S 22 33), for "leadeth" (Ps 23 3); "my heart yet guiding me," in "holding its course," for "yet acquainting mine heart" (Eccl 2 3). "Guide-post" is substituted for "high heaps" (Jer 31 21).

GUILE, gil (מִרְמָה, mirmāh; δόλος, dólos): "Guile" is twice the tr of mirmāh, "fraud," "deceit" (Ps 34 13, "Keep . . . thy lips from speaking guile"; 55 11, "deceit and guile," RV "oppression [in "fraud"] and guile"); once of ormāh, "craftiness," "guile" (Ex 21 14); once of rmiyāh, "deception," "fraud" (Ps 32 2, "in whose spirit there is no guile"); in the NT of dólos, "bait," hence generally, "fraud," "guile," "deceit"; LXX for mirmāh (Isa 53 9, EV "deceit") and for rmiyāh (Job 13 7, EV "deceitfully"; Jn 1 47; 2 Cor 12 16, "Being crafty, I caught you with guile"; 1 Thess 2 3; 1 Pet 2 1; 2 22; 3 10, quoted from Ps 34 13; Rev 14 5, "In their mouth was found no guile," RV after corrected text, "no lie").

St. Paul's words in 2 Cor 12 16 have sometimes been quoted in justification of "guile" in religious work, etc; but he is not describing his actual procedure; but that which the Corinthians might have attributed to him; the lips of the Christian must be kept free from all guile (Ps 34 13; 1 Pet 2 1, etc; Wisd 1 5, "A holy spirit of discipline will flee deceit" [dólos], RV "A holy spirit"). "Guile" does not appear in Apoc; dólos is frequently rendered "deceit."

RV has "guile" for "subtily" (Gen 27 35; Acts 13 10); "cover itself with guile" for "is covered by deceit" (Prov 26 26); "with guile" for "deceitfully" (Gen 34 13); "spiritual milk which is without guile" for "sincere milk of the word," ERV "reasonable," ARV "Gr belonging to the reason" (cf Rom 12 1; 1 Pet 2 2); "guileless" for "harmless" (He 7 26).

GUILT, gilt: The Christian idea of guilt involves three elements: responsibility (Gr aitia, "cause," depending upon a man's real freedom), blameworthiness (Lat reatus culpae, depending upon a man's knowledge and purpose) and the obligation to make good through punishment or compensation (Lat reatus poenae; cf Gr ophellema, "debt," Mt 6 12). In other words, in thinking of guilt we ask the questions of cause, motive and consequence, the central idea being that of the personal blameworthiness of the sinner.

I. In the OT.—Not all of this is found at once in the OT. The idea of guilt corresponds to that of

1. The Ritualistic and Legalistic Conception righteousness or holiness. When these are ritual and legal, instead of ethical and spiritual, they will determine similarly the idea of guilt. This legalistic and ritualistic conception of guilt may first be noted. Personal blameworthiness does not need to be present. "If any one sin, and do any of the things which Jeh hath commanded not to be done; though he knew it not, yet is he guilty, and shall bear his iniquity" (Lev 5 17). The man is guilty, not because he might or should have known; he may merely have touched unwittingly the body of an unclean beast (Lev 5 23). The guilt is here because the law has been transgressed and must be made good (cf Lev 5 15. 16; 4 2.3.13.22.27; see also 5 2.3.4.17).

Moreover, the element of personal responsibility is sometimes lacking where guilt is assigned. The priest may sin "so as to bring guilt on the people"

(Lev 4 3). One man's wrongdoing may "cause the land to sin" (Dt 24 4). Israel has sinned in Achan's greed and therefore suffers. Even when the guilty man is found, his children and his very cattle must bear the guilt and punishment with him, though there is no suggestion of their participation or even knowledge (Josh 7; cf 2 S 24). Here the full moral idea of sin and guilt is wanting because the idea of personality and personal responsibility has not come to its own. The individual is still merged here in the clan or nation.

The central idea in all this is not that of the individual, his responsibility, his motive, his blame. It is that of a rule and the transgression of it, which must be made good. For this reason we see the ideas of sin and guilt and punishment constantly passing over into each other. This may be seen by noting the use of the words whose common root is 'shm, the distinctive Heb term for guilt. In Lev 5 to 7 in the adj. form it is rendered "guilty," in the noun as "trespass offering." In Hos 5 15 it seems to mean punishment (see m, "have borne their guilt," and cf Ezk 6 6), while in Nu 5 7.8 the idea is that of compensation (rendered "restitution for guilt").

With the prophets, the ideas of sin and righteousness come out more clearly as ethical and personal, and so we mark a similar advance in

2. Prophetic Teaching the conception of guilt. It is not ritual correctness that counts with God, incense and sacrifices and new moons and Sabbaths, but to cease to do evil, to learn to do well (Isa 1). Thus the motive and the inner spirit come in (Mic 6 8; Isa 57 15; 58 1-12), and guilt gains a new depth and quality. At the same time the idea of personal responsibility comes. A man is to bear his own sins. The children's teeth are not to be set on edge because the fathers have eaten sour grapes (Jer 31 29.30; Ezk 18 29-32; 2 K 14 6; cf 2 S 24 17).

II. In the NT.—Here as elsewhere Jesus came to fulfil. With Him it is the inner attitude of the soul that decides. It is the penitent pub-

1. With Jesus lican who goes down justified, not the Pharisee with his long credit account (Lk 18 9-14). That is why His attitude is so kindly toward some notorious sinners and so stern toward some religious leaders. The Pharisees are outwardly correct, but their spirit of bigotry and pride prevents their entering the kingdom of heaven, while the penitent harlots and publicans take it by storm.

Because it is not primarily a matter of the outward deed but of the inner spirit, Jesus marks different degrees of guilt as depending upon a man's knowledge and motive (Lk 11 29-32; 12 47.48; 23 34). And yet Jesus does not lighten the sense of guilt but rather deepens it. The strength of the OT thought lay in this, that it viewed all transgression as a sin against God, since all law came from Him. This religious emphasis remains with Jesus (Lk 15 21; cf Ps 51 4). But with Jesus God is far more than a giver of rules. He gives Himself. And so the guilt is the deeper because the sin is against this love and mercy and fellowship which God offers us. Jesus shows us the final depth of evil in sin. Here comes the NT interpretation of the cross, which shows it on the one hand as the measure of God's love in the free gift of His Son, and on the other as the measure of man's guilt whose sin wrought this and made it necessary.

Paul also recognizes differences of degree in guilt, the quality of blameworthiness which is not simply determined by looking at the outward transgression (Acts 17 30; Eph 4 18; Paul Rom 2 9; 3 26; 5 13; 7 13). He, too, looks within to decide the question of guilt (Rom 14 23). But sin is not a matter of single acts or choices with Paul. He sees it as a power that comes to rule a man's life and that rules in the race. The question therefore arises, Does Paul think of guilt also as native, as belonging to man because man is a part of the race? Here it can merely be pointed out that Rom 5 12-21 does not necessarily involve this. Paul is not discussing whether all men committed sin in Adam's fall, or whether all are guilty by virtue of their very place in a race that is sinful. It is not the question of guilt in fact or degree, but merely the fact that through one man men are now made righteous as before through one sin came upon them all. This no more involves native guilt as a non-ethical conception than it does the idea that the righteousness through Christ is merely forensic and non-ethical. Paul is simply passing over the other elements to assert one fact. Rom 1 suggests how Paul looked at universal sin as involving guilt because universal knowledge and choice entered in. See also SIN.

GUILT OFFERING. See SACRIFICE.

GUILTLESS, gîl'tles: The primary meaning of the Heb word is "to be clean." Sometimes the meaning is "freedom from blame," at other times to be "free from punishment," these two ideas running over into each other as with the word "guilt." The latter meaning seems to predominate in Ex 20 7; Dt 5 11; 2 S 14 9; 1 K 2 9. The other meaning holds in Nu 32 22; Josh 2 19; 2 S 3 28; Mt 12 5.7.

GUILTY, gîl'ti: In addition to the general discussion under GUILT (q.v.), several NT passages demand special notice because the word "guilty" is not used in the principal sense of blameworthy, but with one of the two lesser meanings noted above which go to make up the complete idea. In 3 of these passages AV renders "guilty" and RV gives another rendering. In Mt 26 66 AV, Jesus' foes declare he is "guilty of death" (ἑνοχος, énokhos, "liable to"). Here "guilty" simply means the one who is legally held, and the reference is not to the blame but to the consequence. This is a true use of the word in the lower and legal sense. It does not correspond with our higher usage, and so we have it in RV "worthy of death." So in Rom 3 19, "guilty" is changed to "under the judgment," and in Mt 23 18, to "debtor."

In Jas 2 10 and 1 Cor 11 27, the word "guilty" is also used in the lesser or more primitive sense, not primarily as involving blame but as involving the sinner's authorship or responsibility. This is the first element suggested in the definition of guilt given above, just as the preceding passages illustrate the third element. The man who stumbles in one point is "guilty" of the whole law. James does not refer here to the degree of blameworthiness. "Guilty of" means transgressor of, and he has transgressed the whole because the law is one. So in 1 Cor 11 27, those "guilty of the body and the blood of the Lord" are those who have transgressed in the matter of the body and the blood of the Lord.

GULF (χάσμα, chásma, "a chasm," "vent," "a gaping opening"—a great interval; from χάλω, chalō, "to gape" or "yawn"): Occurs only in Lk 16 26, "Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed" (cf "afar off" in ver 23). This is very different from, though it probably reflects, the rabbinical conception of the separation between the two compartments of Hades (Sheol) by "a hand's breadth," "a wall," or even, later, "a chasm," as the parable can be given here only a figurative significance, and is of purely ethical import. The fundamental difference between the Rich Man and Lazarus lies not in their conditions but in their characters. For "besides all this" (ver 26) RVm gives "in all these things," thus implying that the moral distinctions which exist in this life (ver 25) become more pronounced ("fixed") in the next world, and the "gulf" is impassable in the sense that a change of condition will not necessarily produce a change of soul. GUNI, gū'nî, GUNITES, gū'nîts (גֻּנִי, gunî):

(1) The name of a Naphtalite clan (Gen 46 24; Nu 26 48; 1 Ch 7 13). In Nu 26 48 the gentilic "Gunites" is also found, having in Heb the same form, with the article.

(2) The head of a Gadite family (1 Ch 5 15).

GUR, gûr, THE ASCENT, a-sent' (מַצְלֵחַ גִּיר, ma'ălêh ghûr): The place where the servants of Jehu mortally wounded Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 K 9 27). The ascent (AV "going up") was hard by Ibleam, the site of which is identified about ½ mile S. of Jenin.

GUR-BAAL, gûr-bā'al (גִּיר-בְּעַל, gûr ba'al): The residence of certain Arabs against whom God helped Uzziah, king of Judah (2 Ch 26 7). Its mention immediately after the Philis may have suggested the "Gerar" of the Tg. Association with the Meunim points to the E. It may be taken as certain that Jebel Neby Hārūn, near Petra, has always been crowned by a sanctuary. This may have been "the dwelling place of Baal"; or, accepting Kittel's emendation (tûr ba'al), "the rock" or "mountain of Baal." The Arabs probably dwelt in the region before the days of Petra (EB, s.v.).

HAHASHETARI, hā-a-hash'ta-ri (חֲשִׁתָּרִי, hā-dhash'tari, possibly a corruption of חֲשִׁתָּרִי, hā-ash'hūri): A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4 6). The name is probably corrupt. If the emendation suggested above is accepted, it means the Ash-hurites, and is a description of the preceding names.

LITERATURE

I. The Author.—Habakkuk (חֲבַקְקֻךְ, hābbakkūk) means "embrace," or "ardent embrace." Some of the ancient rabbis, connecting the name with 2 K 4 16, "Thou shalt embrace a son," imagined that the prophet was the son of the Shunammite woman. The LXX form of the name, Hambakoum, Theod. Hambakouk, presupposes the Heb hābbakūk. A similar word occurs in Assy as the name of a garden plant.

Practically nothing is known of Habakkuk. The book bearing his name throws little light upon his life, and the rest of the OT is silent

2. Life concerning him; but numerous legends have grown up around his name. The identification of the prophet with the son of the Shunammite woman is one. Another, connecting Isa 21 6 with Hab 2 1, makes Habakkuk the watchman set by Isaiah to watch for the fall of Babylon. One of the recensions of the LXX text of Bel declares that the story was taken "from the prophecy of Habakkuk, the son of Jesus of the tribe of Levi." This must refer to an unknown apocryphal book ascribed to our prophet. What authority there may be for calling his father Jesus we do not know. The claim that he was of the tribe of Levi may be based upon the presence of the musical note at the end of the third chapter. According to the Lives of the Prophets, ascribed, though perhaps erroneously, to Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus during the latter part of the 4th cent. AD, he belonged to Bēthgōhar, of the tribe of Simeon. A very interesting story is found in Bel (33-39), according to which Habakkuk, while on his way to the field with a bowl of pottage, was taken by an angel, carried to Babylon and placed in the lions' den, where Daniel ate the pottage, when Habakkuk was returned to his own place. According to the Lives, Habakkuk died two years before the return of the exiles from Babylon. All these legends have little or no historical value.

II. The Book.—It is necessary to consider the interpretation of chs 1 and 2 before giving the contents of the book, as a statement of the contents of these chapters will be determined by their interpretation. The

1. Interpretation of Chs 1 and 2 different interpretations advocated may be grouped under three heads:

(1) According to the first view: 1 2-4: The corruption of Judah; the oppression of the righteous Jews by the wicked Jews, which calls for the Divine manifestation in judgment against the oppressors. 1 5-11: Jeh announces that He is about to send the Chaldeans to execute judgment. 1 12-17: The prophet is perplexed. He cannot understand how a righteous God can use these barbarians to execute judgment upon a people more righteous than they. He considers even the wicked among the Jews better than the Chaldeans. 2 1-4: Jeh solves the perplexing problem by announcing that the exaltation of the Chaldeans will be but temporary; in the end they will meet their doom, while the righteous will live. 2 5-20: Woes against the Chaldeans.

(2) The second view finds it necessary to change the present arrangement of the verses 1 5-11; in their present position, they will not fit into the interpretation. For this reason Wellhausen and others omit these verses as a later addition; on the other hand, Giesebrecht would place them before 1 2, as the opening verses of the prophecy. The transposition would require a few other minor changes, so as to make the verses a suitable beginning and establish a smooth transition from ver 11 to ver 2. Omitting the troublesome verses, the following outline of the two chapters may be given: 1 2-4: The oppression of the righteous Jews by the wicked Chaldeans. 1 12-17: Appeal to Jeh on behalf of the Jews against their oppressors. 2 1-4: Jeh promises deliverance (see above). 2 5-20: Woes against the Chaldeans.

(3) The third view also finds it necessary to alter the present order of verses. Again 1 5-11, in the present position, interferes with the theory; therefore, these verses are given a more suitable place after 2 4. According to this interpretation the outline is as follows: 1 2-4: Oppression of the righteous Jews by the wicked Assyrians (Budde) or Egyptians (G. A. Smith). 1 12-17: Appeal to Jeh on behalf of the oppressed against the oppressor. 2 1-4: Jeh promises deliverance (see above). 1 5-11: The Chaldeans will be the instrument to execute judgment upon the oppressors and to bring deliverance to the Jews. 2 5-20: Woes against the Assyrians or Egyptians.

A full discussion of these views is not possible in this article (see Eiselen, Minor Prophets, 466-68). It may be sufficient to say that on the whole the first interpretation, which requires no omission or transposition, seems to satisfy most completely the facts in the case.

The contents of chs 1 and 2 are indicated in the preceding paragraph. Ch 3 contains a lyrical passage called in the title "Prayer." The 2. Contents petitioner speaks for himself and the community. He remembers the mighty works of Jeh for His people; the thought of them causes him to tremble; nevertheless, he calls for a repetition of the ancient manifestations (ver 2). In majestic pictures the poet describes the wonderful appearances of Jeh in the past (vs 3-11) for His chosen people (vs 12-15). The remembrance of these manifestations fills the Psalmist with fear and trembling, but also with joy and confidence in the God of his salvation (vs 16-19).

Only the Heb student can get an adequate idea of the literary excellence of the Book of Hab. "The literary power of Habakkuk," says

3. Style Driver, "is considerable. Though his book is a brief one, it is full of force; his descriptions are graphic and powerful; thought and expression are alike poetic; he is still a master of the old classical style, terse, parallelistic, pregnant; there is no trace of the often prosaic diffusiveness which manifests itself in the writings of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. And if ch 3 be his, he is, moreover, a lyric poet of high order; the grand imagery and the rhythmic flow of this ode will bear comparison with some of the finest productions of the Heb muse."

More than half of the book, including 1 5-11; 2 9-20, and ch 3 entire, has been denied to the prophet Habakkuk. If the prophecy

4. Integrity is rightly interpreted (see above), no valid reason for rejecting 1 5-11 can be found. Vs 9-20 of ch 2 are denied to Habakkuk chiefly on two grounds: (1) The "woes" are said to be in part, at least, unsuitable, if supposed to be addressed to the Chaldaean king. This difficulty vanishes when it is borne in mind that the king is not addressed as an individual, but as representing the policy of the nation, as a personification of the nation. (2) Some parts, esp. vs 12-14, "consist largely of citations and reminiscences of other passages, including some late ones" (cf ver 12 with Mic 3 10; ver 13 with Jer 51 58; ver 14 with Isa 11 9; ver 16b with Jer 25 15,16; vs 18-20 with Isa 44 9ff; 46 6,7; Jer 10 1-16). Aside from the fact that the argument from literary parallels is always precarious, in this case the resemblances are few in number and of such general character that they do not necessarily presuppose literary dependence. Ch 3 is denied to the prophet even more persistently, but the arguments are by no means conclusive. The fact that the chapter belongs to the psalm literature does not prove a late date unless it is assumed, without good reasons, that no psalms originated in the pre-exilic period. Nor do the historical allusions, which are altogether vague, the style, the relation to other writers, and the character of the religious ideas expressed, point necessarily to a late date. The only doubtful verses are 16 ff, which seem to allude to a calamity other than the invasion of the Chaldaeans; and Driver says, not without reason, "Had the poet been writing under the pressure of a hostile invasion, the invasion itself would naturally have been expected to form a prominent feature in this picture." Hence, while it may be impossible to prove that Habakkuk is the author of the prayer, it is equally impossible to prove the contrary; and while there are a few indications which seem to point to a situation different from that of Habakkuk, they are by no means definite enough to exclude the possibility of Habakkuk's authorship.

III. The Time.—The question of date is closely bound up with that of interpretation. Budde, on the theory that the oppressors, threat-

1. Date ened with destruction, are the Assyrians (see above, 3), dates the prophecy 621 to 615 BC. Granting that the Assyrians are in the mind of the prophet, the date suggested by Betteridge (AJT, 1903, 674 ff), c 701 BC, is to be preferred; but if the Assyrians are not the oppressors, then with the Assyrians fall the dates proposed by Budde and Betteridge. If the prophecy is directed against Egypt, we are shut up to a very definite period, between 608 and 604 BC, for the Egyp supremacy in Judah continued during these years only. If the Egyptians are not the oppressors, another date will have to be sought. If the Chaldaeans are the oppressors of Judah, the prophecy must be assigned to a date subsequent to the battle of Carchemish in 605-604, for only after the defeat of the Egyptians could the Chaldaeans carry out a policy of world conquest; and it was some years after that event that the Chaldaeans first came into direct contact with Judah. But on this theory, 1 2-4.12 ff; 2 8 ff, presupposes the lapse of a considerable period of conquest, the subduing of many nations, the cruel oppression of Judah for some length of time; therefore, Nowack is undoubtedly correct, on this theory, in bringing the prophecy down to a period subsequent to the first exile in 597, or, as he says, "in round numbers about 590 BC."

A different date must be sought if 1 2-4 is interpreted as referring to the oppression of Jews by Jews, and 1 5 ff, as a threat that Jeh will raise up the Chaldaeans, already known as a nation thirsting for blood, to punish the wickedness of Judah. These verses would seem to indicate (1) that the Chaldaeans had not yet come into direct contact with Judah, and (2) that they had already given exhibitions of the cruel character of their warfare. Nebuchadnezzar advanced against Judah about 600 BC; but the years since the fall of Nineveh, in 607-606, and the battle of Carchemish, in 605-604, had given abundant opportunity to the Chaldaeans to reveal their true character, and to the prophet and his contemporaries to become acquainted with this cruel successor of Nineveh. On this theory, therefore, the prophetic activity of Habakkuk must be assigned to shortly before 600 BC.

If Habakkuk prophesied about 600 BC, he lived under King Jehoiakim. The pious and well-meaning Josiah had been slain in an attempt

2. Occasion to stop the advance of Egypt against Assyria. With his death the brief era of reform came to an end. After a reign of three months Jehoahaz was deposed by Pharaoh-necoh, who placed Jehoiakim on the throne. The latter was selfish, tyrannical and godless. In a short time the deplorable conditions of Manasseh's reign returned. It was this situation that caused the prophet's first perplexity: "O Jeh, how long shall I cry, and thou wilt not hear? I cry out unto thee of violence, and thou wilt not save" (1 2).

IV. Its Teaching.—In the Book of Hab a new type of prophecy appears. The prophets were primarily preachers and teachers of religion and ethics. They addressed themselves to their fellow-countrymen in an attempt to win them back to Jeh and a righteous life. Not so Habakkuk. He addresses himself to Jeh, questioning the justice or even the reality of the Divine Providence. He makes complaint to God and expostulates with Him. The prophet Habakkuk, therefore, is a forerunner of the author of the Book of Job. "As a whole, his book is the fruit of religious reflection. It exhibits the communings and questionings of his soul—representative, no doubt, of many other pious spirits of the time—with God; and records the answers which the Spirit of God taught him for his own sake and for the sake of tried souls in every age."

Habakkuk has been called the prophet of faith. He possessed a strong, living faith in Jeh; but he, like many other pious souls, was troubled and perplexed by the apparent inequalities of life. He found it difficult to reconcile these with his lofty conception of Jeh. Nevertheless, he does not sulk. Boldly he presents his perplexities to Jeh, who points the way to a solution, and the prophet comes forth from his trouble with a faith stronger and more intense than ever. It is in connection with his attempts to solve the perplexing problems raised by the unpunished sins of his countrymen and the unlimited success of the Chaldaeans that Habakkuk gives utterance to two sublime truths:

(1) Jeh is interested not only in Israel. Though Habakkuk, like the other prophets, believes in a special Divine Providence over Israel,

1. The Universal Supremacy of Jeh he is equally convinced that Jeh's rule embraces the whole earth; the destinies of all the nations are in His hand. The Chaldeans are punished not merely for their sins against Judah, but for the oppression of other nations as well. Being the only God, He cannot permit the worship of other deities. Temporarily the Chaldeans may worship idols, or make might their god, they may "sacrifice unto their net," and burn incense "unto their drag," because by them "their portion is fat and their food plenteous"; but Jeh is from everlasting, the Holy One, and He will attest His supremacy by utterly destroying the boastful conqueror with his idols.

(2) The second important truth is expressed in 2 4: "The righteous shall live by his faith" (ARV "faithfulness"). Faithfulness assures

2. Faithfulness the permanence. The thought expressed by the prophet is not identical with Guarantee that expressed by the apostle who quotes the words (Gal 3 11); nevertheless, the former also gives expression to a truth of profound significance. "Faithfulness" is with the prophet an external thing; it signifies integrity, fidelity, steadfastness under all provocations; but this implies, in a real sense, the NT conception of faith as an active principle of right conduct. A living faith determines conduct; religion and ethics go hand in hand, and esp. in the hour of adversity a belief in Jeh and unflinching reliance upon Him are the strongest preservers of fidelity and integrity. Faith without works is dead; faith expresses itself in life. Habakkuk places chief emphasis upon the expressions of faith, and he does so rightly; but in doing this he also calls attention, by implication at least, to the motive power behind the external manifestations. As an expression of living faith, 3 17-19 is not surpassed in the OT.

HABAKKUK, THE PRAYER OF. See BETH-HORON, BATTLE OF.

HABAZINIAH (חֲבַצְיָאֵה, ḥabḥaṣṣinyāh). Thus in AV, but more correctly as in RV HABAZZINIAH, hab-a-zi-ni'a [Jer 35 3]: The grandfather of Jaazaniah, who was the leader of the Rechabites who were tested by Jeremiah as to their obedience to their ancestor's command with reference to wine. Their loyalty to the commands of Jonadab was effectively used by Jeremiah in an appeal to the people of Judah to obey the words of Jeh.

HABERGEON, hab'er-jun, ha-būr-jun, AV (חֲבֵרְגִיּוֹן, ḥabḥer-giyyōn): In RV, Ex 28 32; 39 23, etc., "coat of mail"; in Job 41 26, "pointed shaft," m "coat of mail." See ARMS, ARMOR.

HABITATION, hab-i-tā'shun: Properly a place of sojourn or dwelling. The term in AV representing some 16 Heb words (mōshābh, mā'ōn, mishkān, nāweh, etc), and 5 Gr words, is variously changed in certain passages in RV, as Gen 49 5, "swords"; Lev 13 46, "dwelling"; Job 5 24; Jer 25 30b. 37, "fold"; Ps 89 14; 97 2, etc., "foundation"; Ps 132 5, "tabernacle"; Lk 16 9, "tabernacles," etc. Conversely, "habitation" appears in RV for AV "dwelling place" in 2 Ch 30 27; Ps 79 7, "house"; Ps 83 12; 2 Cor 5 2, "tabernacle," Acts 7 46, etc. See HOUSE. JAMES ORR

1. Its Position and Course 17 6; 18 11 (cf 1 Ch 5 26) as "the river of Gozan." It is the Arab. Khabor, and flows in a southerly direction from several sources in the mountains of Karaj Dāgh (Mons Masius), which, in the 37th parallel, flanks the valley of the Tigris on the W. The river ultimately joins the Euphrates after receiving its chief tributary, the Jaghjagha Su (Mygdonius), at Circesium (Kirkisiyeh). The meaning of its name is doubtful, but

2. Etymologies of Habor Delitzsch has suggested a Sumerian etymology, namely, habur, "the fish-waterway," or it may be connected with "mother Hubur," a descriptive title of Tiāmat (see MERODACH; RAHAB). Layard found several interesting Assyrian remains in the district, including man-headed

3. Historical References bulls bearing the name of Mušešal Ninip, possibly an Assyrian governor. Tiglath-pileser I (c 1120 BC) boasts of having killed 10 mighty elephants in Haran and on the banks of the Habor; and Aššurnasir-apli (c 880 BC), after conquering Harrit (Harrit, Harmiš), subjugated the tract around piate ša nār Habur, "the mouths of the Habor." According to 2 K and 1 Ch, Shalmaneser IV and Sargon transported the exiled Israelites thither. Philological considerations exclude the identification of the Chebar of Ezk 1 3, etc., with the Habor.

HACALIAH, hak-a-li'a (חַכְלִיָּה, ḥākhalyāh, meaning doubtful, perhaps "wait for Jeh"; AV Hachaliah): Father of Nehemiah (Neh 1 1; 10 1).

HACHILAH, ha-ki'la, hak'i-la, HILL OF (חִקְלִיָּה, ḥākhilāh): A hill in the wilderness of Judah, associated with the wanderings of David. It is stated (1 S 23 19) to be "on the S. of the desert" (or Jeshimon), and (1 S 26 1) to be "before [on the front (i.e. edge) of] the desert." It was near Ziph and Maon. The only plausible hypothesis is that it is represented by the ridge Dhahret el-Kōlāh in the wilderness of Ziph, toward the desert of Engedi (PEF, III, 313, Sh XXI).

HACHMONI, hak-mō'ni, hak'mō-ni, or probably HACHMONITE (חַכְמוֹנִי, ḥākhmōnī, "wise"): The same word is rendered "Hachmoni," a proper name, in 1 Ch 27 32 and "a Hachmonite" in 1 Ch 11 11. The form of the Heb word suggests that the latter tr should be adopted in both passages, and that it describes the warrior in one case, and the companion or tutor of David's sons in the other, as a member of a certain family—a Hachmonite of which nothing further is known. 2 S 23 8, "Josheb-basshebeth a Tahchemonite," bears the marks of a corrupt text, and should be || with 1 Ch 11 11 so far as the name goes, reading "Jashobeam the Hachmonite." HADAD, hā'dad:

(1) (דָּד, ḥādhad, "sharpness"): One of the twelve sons of Ishmael (Gen 25 15, where AV, following a mistake in Heb text, has "Hadar"; but "Hadaq" is found in || passage 1 Ch 1 30; RV reads "Hadaq" in both places).

(2) (חַדְחַדְחַד, hādhadh): A king of Edom, son of Be-dad (Gen 36 35.36 || 1 Ch 1 46.47), "who smote Midian in the field of Moab," and whose "city was Avith."

(3) Another king of Edom, written "Hadar" in Gen 36 39 by a copyist's mistake, but "Hadad" in the || passage 1 Ch 1 50.51. His city was Pau or Pai.

(4) A member of the royal family of Edom in David's time, who as a child escaped Joab's slaughter of the Edomites, and fled to Egypt. On David's death he returned to Edom, where he made trouble for Solomon by stirring up the Edomites against the rule of Israel (1 K 11 14-22.25).

(5) The supreme god of Syria, whose name is found in Scripture in the names of Syrian kings, Benhadad, Hadadezer. The god Hadad (=perhaps, "maker of loud noise") is mentioned in Assyrian inscriptions, and called on the monolith of Shalmaneser "the god of Aleppo." In the Assyrian inscriptions he is identified with the air-god Rammon or Rimmon. The union of the two names in Zec 12 11 suggests this identity, though the reference is uncertain, some regarding Hadadrimmon as the name of a place, others as the name of the god—"Hadad [is] Rimmon." The name "Hadad" is found in various other forms: Adad, Dadu, and Dadda. See A. H. Sayce in HDB s.v. "Hadad."

HADADEZER, had-ad-ē'zēr (חַדְחַדְחַדְעֶזֶר, hādhadh'ezēr; so 2 S 8; 1 K 11 23, but חַדְחַדְחַדְעֶזֶר, hādhadh'ezēr, 2 S 10; 1 Ch 18): Mentioned in connection with David's wars of conquest (2 S 8 3 ff; 2 S 10 1-19; 1 Ch 18 3 ff); was king of Zobah in Syria. The exact position and size of this Syrian principality are uncertain, but it seems to have extended in David's time southward toward Ammon and eastward to the Euphrates. When the Ammonites had put themselves in the wrong with David by the insult done to his ambassadors (2 S 10 1-5) they summoned to their aid against the incensed king of Israel the Syrians of various adjoining principalities, among them the Syrians of Zobah under Hadadezer, the son of Rehob. The strategy of Joab, who set the force under command of Abishai his brother in array against the Ammonites, and himself attacked the Syrian allies, won for Israel a decisive victory. Not content with this result, Hadadezer gathered together another Syrian force, summoning this time also "the Syrians that were beyond the River" (2 S 10 16), with Shobach the captain of his host at their head. On this occasion David himself took command of the Israelitish forces, and again defeated them near Helam, Shobach being left dead on the field. Hadadezer and his Syrian vassals, finding resistance hopeless, "made peace with Israel, and served them" (2 S 10 19). For the name Hadad- or Hadarezer, see BENHADAD.

HADADRIMMON, hā-dad-rim'on, had-ad-rim'on (חַדְחַדְחַדְרִמּוֹן, hādhadh rimmōn): A name which occurs, along with Megiddon, in Zec 12 11. It was long thought that this was a place in the plain of Megiddo, and that the mourning referred to was that for Josiah, slain in battle with Pharaoh-necoh (2 K 23 29). This last, however, was certainly at Jerus. Jerome (Comm. on Zec) identifies Hadadrimmon with Maximianopolis, a village near Jezreel, probably Legio, the ancient Megiddo. Possibly, however, the form "Hadadrimmon" has arisen through the combination of two divine names; and the weeping may be that for Tammuz (Ezk 8 14), with whom the old Sem deity had become confused in the popular mind.

HADAR, hā'dar (Gen 36 39). See HADAD (3).

HADAREZER, had-ar-ē'zēr. See HADADEZER.

HADASHAH, ha-dā'sha, had'a-sa (חֲדָשָׁה, hādhāshāh, "new"): A town in the Shephelah of Judah, named with Zenan and Migdal-gad (Josh 15 37). According to the Mish (Erūbhīn, v. 6), it was the smallest town in Judah. It is not identified.

HADASSAH, ha-das'a (חֲדַסָּה, hādhassāh, "myrtle"): The Heb name (Est 2 7) formerly borne by ESTHER (q.v.).

HADATTAH, ha-dat'a (חֲדַטָּה, hādhattāh, "new"): See HAZOR.

HADES, hā'dēz (ᾍδης, Haidēs, ᾍδης, haidēs, "not to be seen"): Hades, Gr originally Haidou, in genitive, "the house of Hades," then, as nominative, designation of the abode of the dead itself. The word occurs in the NT in Mt 11 23 (|| Lk 10 15); 16 18; Lk 16 23; Acts 2 27.31; Rev 1 18; 6 8; 20 13 f. It is also found in TR 1 Cor 15 55, but here the correct reading (Tischendorf, WH, RV) is probably Thánatē, "O Death," instead of Haidē, "O Hades." AV renders "Hades" by "hell" in all instances except 1 Cor 15 55, where it puts "grave" (m "hell") in dependence on Hos 13 14. RV everywhere has "Hades."

In the LXX Hades is the standing equivalent for Sheol, but also translates other terms associated with death and the state after it.

1. In OT: The Gr conception of Hades was that of a locality receiving into itself all the dead, but divided into two regions, one a place of torment, the other of blessedness. This conception should not be rashly transferred to the NT, for the latter stands not under the influence of Gr pagan belief, but gives a teaching and reflects a belief which model their idea of Hades upon the OT through the LXX. The OT Sheol, while formally resembling the Gr Hades in that it is the common receptacle of all the dead, differs from it, on the one hand, by the absence of a clearly defined division into two parts, and, on the other hand, by the emphasis placed on its association with death and the grave as abnormal facts following in the wake of sin. The OT thus concentrates the partial light it throws on the state after death on the negative, undesirable side of the prospect apart from redemption. When in the progress of OT revelation the state after death begins to assume more definite features, and becomes more sharply differentiated in dependence on the religious and moral issue of the present life, this is not accomplished in the canonical writings (otherwise in the apocalyptic literature) by dividing Sheol into two compartments, but by holding forth to the righteous the promise of deliverance from Sheol, so that the latter becomes more definitely outlined as a place of evil and punishment.

The NT passages mark a distinct stage in this process, and there is, accordingly, a true basis in Scripture for the identification in

2. In NT: a certain aspect of Sheol—Hades—with Hades hell as reflected in AV. The theory according to which Hades is still in the NT the undifferentiated provisional abode of all the dead until the day of judgment, with the possibility of ultimate salvation even for those of its inmates who have not been saved in this life, is neither in harmony with the above development nor borne out by the facts of NT usage. That dead believers abide in a local Hades cannot be proven from 1 Thess 4 16; 1 Cor 15 23, for these passages refer to the grave and the body, not to a gathering-place of the dead. On the other hand Lk 23 43; 2 Cor 5 6-8; Phil 1 23; Rev 6 9; 7 9 ff; 15 2 ff teach that the abode of believers immediately after death is with Christ and God.

It is, of course, a different matter, when Hades, as not unfrequently already the OT Sheol, designates not the place of the dead but the state of death or disembodied existence. In 2:27.31 this sense even the soul of Jesus was in Hades according to Peter's statement (Acts 2 27.31—on the basis of Ps 16 10). Here the abstract sense is determined by the parallel expression, "to see corruption." None the less from a comparatively early date this passage has been quoted in support of the doctrine of a local descent of Christ into Hades.

The same abstract meaning is indicated for Rev 20 13. Death and Hades are here represented as delivering up the dead on the eve of 4. Rev 20: the final judgment. If this is more 13; 6:8; than a poetic duplication of terms, 1:18 Hades will stand for the personified state of death, Death for the personified cause of this state. The personification appears plainly from ver 14: "Death and Hades were cast into the lake of fire." In the number of these "dead" delivered up by Hades, believers are included, because, even on the chiliastic interpretation of vs 4-6, not all the saints share in the first resurrection, but only those "beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, and for the word of God," i.e. the martyrs. A similar personifying combination of Death and Hades occurs in Rev 6 8 ("a pale horse; and he that sat upon him, his name was Death; and Hades followed with him"). In Rev 1 18, on the other hand, Death and Hades are represented as prisons from which Christ, in virtue of His own resurrection, has the power to deliver, a representation which again implies that in some, not necessarily local, sense believers also are kept in Hades.

In distinction from these passages when the abstract meaning prevails and the local conception is in abeyance, the remaining references

5. Lk 16:23 are more or less locally conceived. Of these Lk 16 23 is the only one which might seem to teach that recipients of salvation enter after death into Hades as a place of abode. It has been held that Hades is here the comprehensive designation of the locality where the dead reside, and is divided into two regions, "the bosom of Abraham" and the place of torment, a representation for which Jewish parallels can be quoted, aside from its resemblance to the Gr bisection of Hades. Against this view, however, it may be urged, that if "the bosom of Abraham" were conceived as one of the two divisions of Hades, the other division would have been named with equal concreteness in connection with Dives. In point of fact, the distinction is not between "the bosom of Abraham" and another place, as both included in Hades, but between "the bosom of Abraham" and Hades as antithetical and exclusive. The very form of the description of the experience of Dives: "In Hades he lifted up his eyes, being in torments," leads us to associate Hades as such with pain and punishment. The passage, therefore, does not prove that the saved are after death in Hades. In further estimating its bearing upon the problem of the local conditions of the disembodied life after death, the parabolic character of the representation must be taken into account. The parable is certainly not intended to give us topographical information about the realm of the dead, although it presupposes that there is a distinct place of abode for the righteous and wicked respectively.

The two other passages where Hades occurs in the teaching of Our Lord (Mt 11 23 || Lk 10 15; and Mt 16 18) make a metaphorical 6. Mt 11:23 use of the conception, which, however, is based on the local sense. In the former utterance it is predicted of Capernaum that it shall in punishment for its unbelief "go down unto Hades." As in the OT Sheol is a figure for the greatest depths known (Dt 32 22; Isa 7 11; 57 9; Job 11 8; 28 6), this seems to be a figure for the extreme of humiliation to which that city was to be reduced in the course of history. It is true, ver 24, with its mention of the day of judgment, might seem to favor an eschatological reference to the ultimate doom of the unbelieving inhabitants, but the usual restriction of Hades to the punishment of the intermediate state (see below) is against this.

In the other passage, Mt 16 18, Jesus declares that the gates of Hades shall not katischuein the church He intends to build. The 7. Mt 16:18 vb. katischuein may be rendered, "to overpower" or "to surpass." If the former be adopted, the figure implied is that of Hades as a stronghold of the power of evil or death from which warriors stream forth to assail the church as the realm of life. On the other rendering there is no reference to any conflict between Hades and the church, the point of comparison being merely the strength of the church, the gates of Hades, i.e. the realm of death, serving in common parlance as a figure of the greatest conceivable strength, because they never allow to escape what has once entered through them.

The above survey of the passages tends to show that Hades, where it is locally conceived, is not a provisional receptacle for all the dead, but plainly associated with the punishment of the wicked. Where it comes under consideration for the righteous there is nothing to indicate a local sense. On 1 Pet 3 19; 4 6 (where, however, the word "Hades" does not occur), see arts. ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT; SPIRITS IN PRISON.

The element of truth in the theory of the provisional character of Hades lies in this, that the NT never employs it in connection 8. Not a with the final state of punishment, as Final State subsequent to the last judgment. For this GEHENNA (q.v.) and other terms are used. Dives is represented as being in Hades immediately after his death and while his brethren are still in this present life. Whether the implied differentiation between stages of punishment, depending obviously on the difference between the disembodied and reëmbodied state of the lost, also carries with itself a distinction between two places of punishment, in other words whether Hades and Gehenna are locally distinct, the evidence is scarcely sufficient to determine. The NT places the emphasis on the eschatological developments at the end, and leaves many things connected with the intermediate state in darkness. GERHARDUS VOS

HADID, hā'did (חַדִּיד, ḥadīdh): A city in Benjamin (Neh 11 33 f) named with Lod and Ono (Ezr 2 33; Neh 7 37), probably identical with Adida (LXX 'Αδιδα, Hadidá) of 1 Macc 12 38; 13 13, "over against the plain," which was fortified by Simon Maccabaeus. It is represented by the modern el-Hadītheh, about 3 miles N.E. of Lydda.

HADLAI, had'lai, had'lā-i (חַדְלָי, ḥadhlāy, "resting"): An Ephraimite (2 Ch 28 12), father of Amasa, who was one of the heads of the tribe in the time of Pekah, king of Israel.

HADORAM, ha-dō'ram (חַדְרָם, hădhōrām):

(1) Son of Joktan and apparently 6th in descent from Noah (Gen 10 27 || 1 Ch 1 21).

(2) Son of Tou, king of Hamath, sent by his father with presents to King David (1 Ch 18 10). In 2 S 8 9.10, written probably incorrectly "Jo-ram," "son of Toi."

(3) Rehoboam's superintendent of the forced labor department (2 Ch 10 18), called Adoram 1 K 12 18, a contraction of ADONIRAM (which see). He was sent by Rehoboam as messenger to Israel at the time of the revolt of the ten tribes and was stoned to death by them. GEORGE RICE HOVEY

HADRACH, hă'drak, had'rak (חֲדָרַח, hădh-rākh): "The land of Hadrach" is mentioned only once in Scripture (Zec 9 1), and there it is grouped with Damascus, Hamath, Tyre and Sidon. It may be safely identified with the "Hatarikka" of the Assyrian inscriptions, against which Assur-dan III made expeditions in his 1st (772 BC), 8th and 18th years. It also appears in inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser III. They place it in the N. of Lebanon.

HAGAB, hă'gab (חֲגַב, hăghābh, "locust"): Ancestor of some of the Nethinim who returned from the Bab captivity with Zerubbabel and Nehemiah. The name occurs second after Hagabah in Ezr 2 46, but is omitted entirely from the || list of Neh 7 48.

HAGABA, ha-gā'ba, hag'a-bā (חֲגַבָּא, hăghābhā'): Same as the following (Neh 7 48).

HAGABAH, ha-gā'ba, hag'a-bā (חֲגַבָּה, hăghābhāh, "locust"): Like Hagab, an ancestor of some of the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 45); spelled Hagaba in the || passage (Neh 7 48).

HAGAR, hă'gar (חֲגָר, hăghār, "emigration," "flight"; Ḥāgar, Hagar, Ḥāgar, Āgar): An Egyptian woman, the handmaid or slave of Sarai; a present, perhaps, from Pharaoh when Abram dissembled to him in Egypt (Gen 12 16). Mention is made of her in two passages (Gen 16; 21 8-21).

In the first narrative (Gen 16) it is related that Sarai, despairing at her age of having children, gave Hagar to Abram as a concubine. 1. The Scornful Handmaid and Her Flight As Hagar was not an ordinary household slave but the peculiar property of her mistress (cf 29 24.29), any offspring which she might bear to Abram would be reckoned as Sarai's (cf 30 3-9). In the prospect of becoming a mother, Hagar, forgetting her position, seems to have assumed an insolent bearing toward her childless mistress. Sarai felt keenly the contempt shown her by her handmaid, and in angry tones brought her conduct before Abram. Now that her plan was not working out smoothly, she unfairly blamed her husband for what originated with herself, and appealed to Heaven to redress her grievance. Abram refused to interfere in the domestic quarrel, and renouncing his rights over his concubine, and her claims on him, put her entirely at Sarai's disposal. Under the harsh treatment of her mistress Hagar's life became intolerable, and she fled into the wilderness, turning her steps naturally toward Egypt, her native land.

But the angel of Jeh (who is here introduced for the first time as the medium of the theophany) appeared to her as she was resting by a spring and commanded her to return and submit herself to her mistress, promising her an innumerable seed through her unborn son, concerning whom he uttered a striking prediction (see Ishmael). To the angel (who is now said to be Jeh Himself) Hagar gave the name "Thou art a God of seeing" (RV "that seeth"), for she said, "Have I even here [in the desert where God, whose manifestations were supposed to be confined to particular places, might not be expected to reveal Himself] looked after him that seeth me?"—the meaning being that while God saw her, it was only while the all-seeing God in the person of His angel was departing that she became conscious of His presence. The spring where the angel met with her was called in Heb tradition B'ēr-lahay-rō'ē, "the well of the living one who seeth me" (RVm).

Obedient to the heavenly vision Hagar returned, as the narrative implies, to her mistress and gave birth to Ishmael, Abram being then eighty-six years old.

The idea in ver 13 is not very clearly expressed. The word *tr*⁴ "here" generally means "hither," and there is no explanation of the "living one" in the name of the well. It has therefore been proposed to emend the Heb text and read "Have I even seen God, and lived after my seeing?"—an allusion to the belief that no one could "see God and live" (cf Gen 32 30; Ex 33 20). But there are difficulties in the way of accepting this emendation. The name of God, "a God of seeing," would require to be interpreted in an objective sense as "a God who is seen," and the consequent name of the well, "He that seeth me liveth," would make God, not Hagar, as in ver 13, the speaker.

The other narrative (Gen 21 8-21) relates what occurred in connection with the weaning of Isaac.

The presence and conduct of Ishmael during the family feast held on the occasion roused the anger and jealousy of Sarah who, fearing that Ishmael would share the inheritance with Isaac, peremptorily demanded the expulsion of the slave-mother and her son. But the instincts of Abraham's fatherly heart recoiled from such a cruel course, and it was only after the revelation was made to him that the ejection of Hagar and her son would be in the line of the Divine purpose—for Isaac was his real seed, while Ishmael would be made a nation too—that he was led to forego his natural feelings and accede to Sarah's demand. So next morning the bondswoman and her son were sent forth with the bare provision of bread and a skin of water into the wilderness of Beersheba. When the water was spent, Hagar, unable to bear the sight of her boy dying from thirst, laid him under a shrub and withdrew the distance of a bowshot to weep out her sorrow. But the angel of God, calling to her out of heaven, comforted her with the assurance that God had heard the voice of the lad and that there was a great future before him. Then her eyes were opened to discover a well of water from which she filled the skin and gave her son to drink. With God's blessing the lad grew up amid the desert's hardships, distinguished for his skill with the bow. He made his home in the wilderness of Paran, and his mother took a wife for him out of her own country.

The life and experience of Hagar teach, among other truths, the temptations incident to a new position; the foolishness of hasty action in times of trial and difficulty; the care exercised over the lonely by the all-seeing God; the Divine purpose in the life of everyone, however obscure and friendless; how God works out His gracious purposes by seemingly harsh methods; and the strength, comfort and encouragement that ever accompany the hardest experiences of His children.

Ch 16 belongs to J (except vs 1a.3.15 f which are from P), and 21 8-21 to E. From the nature of the variations in the narratives many critics hold that we have here two different accounts of the same incident. But the narratives as they stand seem to be quite distinct, the one referring to Hagar's flight before the birth of Ishmael, and the other to her expulsion at the weaning of Isaac. It is said, however, that E represents Ishmael as a child "playing" (RVm, LXX waigorra, paisonia) with Isaac at the weaning festival, and young enough to be carried by his mother and "cast" under a shrub; while according to P (16 16; 21 5), as a child was weaned at the age of two or three years, he would be a lad of sixteen at that time. The argument for the double narrative here does not seem conclusive. The word m'çahšêk (ver 9) does not necessarily mean "playing" when used absolutely; it is so used in ch 19 14, evidently in the sense of "mocking" or "jesting," and Delitzsch gives it that meaning there. Then as to ver 14, the MT does not state that the child was put on her shoulder, although the LXX does; nor does "cast" (ver 15) so "clearly imply" that Ishmael was an infant carried by his mother (cf Mt 15 30). It may be added that the words yalehêh and na'ar, tr'd "child" and "lad" respectively, determine nothing as to age, as they are each used elsewhere in both senses.

5. Critical Points in the Documents

In Gal 4 21 ff St. Paul makes an allegorical use of this episode in the history of Ishmael and Isaac to support his argument for the transitional character of the Jewish ritual and the final triumph of Christian freedom over all Judaizing tendencies. In by St. Paul elaborating his reference, the apostle institutes a series of contrasts. Hagar, the bondwoman, represents the old covenant which was given from Mt. Sinai; and as Ishmael was Abraham's son after the flesh, so the Judaizing Christians, who wish to remain in bondage to the law, are Hagar's children. On the other hand, Sarah, the freewoman, represents the new covenant instituted by Christ; and as Isaac was born to Abraham in virtue of the promise, so the Christians who have freed themselves entirely from the law of carnal ordinances and live by faith are Sarah's children. Thus Hagar corresponds to "the Jerus that now is," that is, the Jewish state which is in spiritual bondage with her children; while Sarah represents "the Jerus that is above," "our mother" (RV), the mother of us Christians, that free spiritual city to which Christians even now belong (Phil 3 20). By this allegory the apostle would warn the Galatian Christians of the danger which beset them from their Judaizing brethren, of their subjection to the covenant of works and their ultimate expulsion from the household of faith.

To us St. Paul's reference does not appeal with the same force as it would do to those to whom he was writing. The incident taken by itself, indeed, does not contain any suggestion of such a hidden meaning. Yet the history of the Heb nation is but typical of the history of the church in all ages, and the apostle's familiarity with rabbinical modes of interpretation may have led him to adopt this method of confirming the truth which he had already proved from the law itself.

HAGGAI, hag'a-i, hag'ā-i (הַגַּי, haggay, an adj. formed from הַגָּה, hagh, "feast"): The word "Haggai" may mean "feast," the prophet having been born perhaps on a festival day; cf the Rom name "Festus." Heb proper names were

1. Name sometimes formed in this manner, e.g. Barzillai, "a man of iron," from barzel, "iron." Haggai may, however, be a shortened form of Haggiah (1 Ch 6 30), meaning "festival of Jeh," as Mattenai is an abbreviation of Mattaniah (Ezr 10 33.26). In Gr Ἀγγαῖος, Haggaios, in Lat, Aggaeus or Aggeus, sometimes Haggaeus. Haggai is the 10th in the order of the Twelve Prophets.

Little is really known of his personal history. But we do know that he lived soon after the captivity, being the first of the prophets of the 2. Personal History Restoration. From 2 3 of his prophecies it is inferred by many that he had seen the first temple, which, as we know, was destroyed in 586 BC. If so, he must have prophesied when a comparatively old man, for we know the exact date of his prophecies, 520 BC. According to Ezr 5 1; 6 14, he was a contemporary of Zechariah, and was associated with him in the work of rebuilding the temple; besides, in the Gr and Lat and Syr VSS, his name stands with Zechariah's at the head of certain pss, e.g. Ps 111 (112), in the Vulg alone; Pss 125, 126, in the Pesh alone; Ps 137, in the LXX alone; Pss 146, 147, 148, in LXX and Pesh; and Ps 145, in LXX, Pesh and Vulg; perhaps these pss were introduced into the temple-service on their recommendation. He was a prophet of great faith (cf 2 1-5); it is possible that he was a priest also (cf 2 10-19). Like Malachi he bears the name of "Jeh's messenger" (1 13; cf Mal 3 1). According to Jewish tradition, he was a member of the Great Synagogue.

Haggai's work was intensely practical and important. Jeh employed him to awaken the conscience and stimulate the enthusiasm of his compatriots in the rebuilding of the temple. "No prophet ever appeared at a more critical juncture in the history of the people, and, it may be added, no prophet was more successful" (Marcus Dods). Zechariah assisted him (cf Hag 1 1; Zec 1 1).

Haggai's prophecies, like Ezekiel's, are dated "in the second year of Darius" (1 1; 2 10), i.e. 520 BC. The Jews, 42,360 strong (Ezr 2 64), had returned from Babylon 16 years before (536 BC), under the circumstances leadership of Zerubbabel, the civil head of the community, and Joshua, the ecclesiastical. The generous edict of Cyrus had made return possible (cf Ezr 1 1-4). The new colonists had settled in Jerus and in the neighboring towns of Bethlehem, Bethel, Anathoth, Gibeon, Kiriath-jearim, and others adjacent (Ezr 2 20 ff). Eager to reestablish the public worship of the sanctuary, they set about at once to erect the altar of burnt offering upon its old site (Ezr 3 2.3; cf Hag 2 14). Plans were also made for the immediate rebuilding of the temple, and the foundation stone was actually laid in the 2d month of the 2d year of the return (Ezr 3 8-10), but the work was suddenly interrupted by the jealous, half-caste, semi-pagan Samaritans, descendants of the foreign colonists introduced into Samaria in 722 BC (cf 2 K 17 24-41), whose offer to coöperate had been refused (Ezr 4 1-5.24). For 16 years thereafter nothing was done toward rearing the superstructure (Ezr 4 5.24; 5 16); indeed, the Jews became indifferent, and began to build for themselves "ceiled houses" (Hag 1 4). (W. H. Koster has attempted to show that there was no return under Cyrus, and that Haggai and Zechariah, who never allude to any return, but rather look upon the return as still in the future [cf Zec 2 6.7], preached to the Jews who remained in Jerus, never having been carried by Nebuchadnezzar into captivity in 586 BC. But this theory is opposed by too many converging lines of Scriptural statement to warrant serious credence.) With the accession of Darius Hystaspes (i.e. Darius, the son of Hystaspes), the tide turned. Darius was a true successor to Cyrus, and favored religious freedom. Through the influence of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, the people were roused from their lethargy, and the work of rebuilding was resumed with energy in 520 BC (Hag 1 14.15). The foundations were relaid (Hag 2 18). Four years later, in the 6th year of Darius, the whole structure was completed and dedicated (Ezr 6 15). Meanwhile important events were taking place in the Pers empire. On the death of Cambyses in 522 BC, the throne had been seized by a usurper, the so-called Pseudo-Smerdis, who held it, however, for some 7 months only. He was murdered by Darius, and the latter was elevated to the throne. But this gave other ambitious pretenders cause to rebel, and many provinces revolted, among them Susiana, Media, Assyria, Armenia, Parthia, and others (cf the famous Behistun inscription). Altogether Darius fought 19 battles in putting down his rivals, and did not succeed in vanquishing all of his foes till the year after Haggai prophesied. This accounts for the prophet's repeated allusions to Jeh's "shaking" the nations (2 6.7.21.22). Haggai seems to regard the "shaking" of the nations as the precursor of the Messianic age. It was, therefore, important from the prophet's point of view, that Jeh's temple should be made ready for the Messiah's advent, that it might become the religious center of the world (cf Isa 2 2-4). The exact date of Haggai's preaching was from September to December, 520 BC.

Haggai's prophecies are dated and therefore easily analyzed. They are composed of four distinct discourses, all four being delivered within 4 months' time in the year 520 BC: (1) Ch 1, delivered on the 1st day of the 6th month (September), in which the prophet reproaches the people for their indifference to the work of rebuilding the temple, and warns them to consider their ways; assuring them that their procrastination was not due to want of means (1 4), and that God on account of their apathy was withholding the produce of the field (1 10). The effect of this appeal was that 24 days later, all the people, including Zerubbabel and Joshua, began the work of reconstruction (1 14.15). (2) 2 1-9, delivered on the 21st day of the 7th month (October), which was about one month after the work had been resumed, and containing a note of encouragement to those who felt that the new structure was destined to be so much inferior to Solomon's temple. The prophet, on the contrary, assures them that the latter glory of the new house shall eclipse that of Solomon's magnificent temple, for soon a great "shaking" on Jeh's part among the nations will usher in the Messianic age, and the precious things of all nations will flow in to beautify it (cf He 12 26-28). (3) 2 10-19, delivered on the 24th day of the 9th month (December) which was exactly 3 months after the building had been resumed, and containing, like the first discourse, a rebuke to the people because of their indifference and inertia. The discourse is couched in the form of a parable (vs 11-14), by means of which the prophet explains why the prayers of the people go unanswered. It is because they have so long postponed the completion of the temple; a taint of guilt vitiates everything they do, and blasting and mildew and hail, and consequently unfruitful seasons, are the result. On the other hand, if they will but press forward with the work, Jeh will again bless them, and fruitful seasons will follow their revived zeal (2 19; cf Zec 8 9-12). (4) 2 20-23, delivered on the 24th day of the 9th month, the very same day as that on which the discourse in 2 10-19 was delivered. The sequence is immediate. For when Jeh "shakes" the nations, He will establish Zerubbabel, the representative of the Davidic dynasty and the object of patriotic hopes. When the heathen powers are overthrown, Zerubbabel will stand unshaken as Jeh's honored and trusted vicegerent, and as the precious signet on Jeh's hand (cf Jer 22 24; Cant 8 6).

The most striking feature in Haggai's message is its repeated claim of Divine origin: 5 t in the 38 verses of his prophecies, he tells us 6. Message that "the word of Jeh came" unto him (1 1.3; 2 1.10.20); 4 t, also, he used the formula, "Thus saith Jeh of hosts" (1 2.5.7; 2 11); 5 t "saith Jeh of hosts" (1 9; 2 6.7.9.23); and 4 t simply "saith Jeh" (1 13; 2 4.14.17). Altogether he uses the exalted phrase "Jeh of hosts" 14 t, besides 19 repetitions of the single but ineffable name "Jeh." The most striking sentence in all his prophecies is probably that found in 1 13, "Then spake Haggai, Jeh's messenger in Jeh's message unto the people." His single purpose, as we have above seen, was to encourage the building of the temple. This he seems to have regarded as essential to the purity of Israel's religion. His key-exhortation is, "Consider your ways" (1 5.7; cf 2 15.18). His prophecies reflect the conditions of his age. He points to judgments as a proof of the Divine displeasure (1 9.10; 2 15-19). Unlike the earlier prophets, he does not denounce idolatry; but like his contemporary, Zechariah, and his successor, Malachi, he does lay stress on the external side of religion. Chief interest centers in the somewhat unusual parable contained in 2 10-19, which teaches that holiness is not contagious, but that evil is. "The faint aroma of sanctity coming from their altar and sacrifices was too feeble to pervade the secular atmosphere of their life" (A. B. Davidson, Exile and Restoration, 82). Haggai argues that Israel's sacrifices for 16 years had been unclean in God's sight, and had brought them no blessing, because they had left the temple in ruins; and, that while a healthy man cannot give his health to another by touching him, a sick man may easily spread contagion among all those about him. The thought is suggestive. Haggai may or may not have been a priest, "but in so short a prophecy this elaborate allusion to ritual is very significant." Another very striking thought in Haggai's book is his reference to Zerubbabel as Jeh's "servant" and "signet," whom Jeh has "chosen" (2 23). Wellhausen regards these words as an equivalent to making Zerubbabel the Messiah; but it is enough to think that the prophet is attempting only to restore him to the honorable position from which his grandfather, Jehoiachin, in Jer 22 24, had been degraded. Thus would the prophet link Zerubbabel, the political hope of the post-exilic congregation, to the royal line of Judah. Isaiah speaks of Cyrus in similar terms without any Messianic implication (Isa 44 28; 45 1). On the other hand, the implicit Messianic import of 2 7.8 is recognized on all sides.

Haggai's style is suited to the contents of his prophecies. While he is less poetical than his predecessors, yet parallelism is not altogether wanting in his sentence (2 8). Compared with the greater books of prophecy, his brief message has been declared "plain and unadorned," "tame and prosaic"; yet it must be acknowledged that he is not wanting in pathos when he reproves, or in force when he exhorts. Though he labors under a poverty of terms, and frequently repeats the same formulae, yet he was profoundly in earnest, and became the most successful in his purpose of all his class. He was esp. fond of interrogation. At best we have only a summary, probably, of what he actually preached.

The critical questions involved in Haggai's case are not serious: 2 5a, for example, is wanting in the LXX; to 2 14 the LXX adds from 8. Criticism Am 5 10; 2 17 is very similar to, and seems dependent on, Am 4 9; 1 7b and 13, are rejected by some as later interpolations; while Klostermann and Marti hold that the book as a whole was not written by Haggai at all, but rather about his prophetic activity, a perfectly gratuitous assumption without any substantial proof in its favor.

HAGGERI, hag'ê-ri. See HAGRI.

HAGGI, hag'î (חַגִּי, haggi, "festive"): The second son of Gad (Gen 46 16; Nu 26 15). The latter refers to his descendants as Haggites, of whom nothing else is known.

HAGGIAH, ha-g'ia (חַגִּיָּה, haggiyâh, "feast of Jeh"): Named in 1 Ch 6 30 as among the descendants of Levi.

HAGGITH, hag'ith (חַגִּית, haggiṭh, "festal"): According to 2 S 3 4; 1 K 1 5.11; 2 13; 1 Ch 3 2, the fifth wife of David and the mother of his fourth son, Adonijah. The latter was born in Hebron while David's capital was there (2 S 3 4.5).

HAGIOGRAPHIA, hag-i-og'ra-fa. See BIBLE; CANON OF OT.

HAGRI, hag'ri (חַגְרִי, hagri, "wanderer"; AV Haggeri): The father of Mibhar, one of the "mighty men" who rallied round David during his foreign wars. Mentioned only in 1 Ch 11 38, whose passage, 2 S 23 36, gives, instead, the name "Bani the Gadite."

HAGRITES, hag'rits (חַגְרִיִּים, hagri'im): An Arab tribe, or confederation of tribes (1 Ch 5 10.19.20 AV "Hagarites"; 27 31 AV "Hagerite"; Ps 83 6 "Hagarenes"), against which the Reubenites fought in the days of Saul. In Gen 25 12-18 are recorded the descendants, "generations," of Ishmael, "whom Hagar the Egypt, Sarah's handmaid, bare unto Abraham." Two, and possibly three, of these tribes, Jetur, Naphish and Kedemah (ver 15), appear to be identical with the 3 tribes whom the Reubenites and the other Israelitish tribes E. of the Jordan conquered and dispossessed (1 Ch 5). The correspondence of names in Gen and 1 Ch leaves little doubt that "Hagrite" is a generic term roughly synonymous with "Ishmaelite," designating the irregular and shifting line of desert tribes stretching along the E. and S. of Pal. Those "E. of Gilead," Jetur, Naphish and Nodah, were overcome by Reuben: "The Hagrites were delivered into their hand, and all that were with them. . . . And they took away their cattle. . . . they dwelt in their stead until the captivity" (1 Ch 5 20-22).

These along with other Arab tribes are mentioned in the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser III (745-727 BC). Jetur gave his name to the Ituraeans of Rom times, who were famed soldiers dwelling in Anti-Libanus. Cf Curtis, Comm. on Ch; Skinner, "Gen," ICC, in loc. EDWARD MACK HAI, hā'i (הַי, hā-'ay, "the heap"): Gen 12 8; 13 3 AV; RV Ai (which see).

HAIL, hāl (הַל, bārādh; χάλαζα, chálaza): Hail usually falls in the spring or summer during severe thunder storms. Hailstones are made

1. Its up of alternate layers of ice and snow, and sometimes reach considerable size, causing great damage by their fall.

Occurrence Upward currents of air carry up raindrops already formed to the colder regions above, where they freeze, and as they again pass through layers of cloud, their bulk increases until, too heavy to be carried by the current, they fall to the ground. Hailstorms, like thunder storms, occur in narrow belts a few miles in breadth and are of short duration. Almost without exception they occur in the daytime. If they take place before the time of harvest they do great damage to grain and fruit, and in extreme cases have injured property and endangered life.

Hailstorms, while by no means common in Syria and Pal, are not unusual and are of great severity. They occasionally take place in Egypt.

2. In Syria Within a few years hailstones of unusual size fell in Port Said, breaking thousands of windows.

(1) The plague of hail (Ex 9 23-24; Ps 78 47), which was a local storm, as they usually are, falling on the Egyptians and not striking the children of Israel in Goshen. It was

3. Biblical Instances of great severity. "There was hail, and fire mingled with the hail, very grievous, such as had not been in all the land of Egypt since it became a nation" (Ex 9 24). It took place in January, for the barley "was in the ear, and the flax was in bloom" (ver 31), and caused great damage. (2) After the battle with the Amorites at Gibeon, "Jeh cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died: they were more who died with the hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword" (Josh 10 11).

Hail is often spoken of as a means of punishing the wicked: "As a tempest of hail . . . will he cast down" (Isa 28 2); "The hail shall

4. As Pun- sweep away the refuge of lies" (ver ishment 17); and as symbols of God's anger: "I will rain . . . great hailstones, fire, and brimstone" (Ezk 38 22); "There shall be . . . great hailstones in wrath to consume it" (Ezk 13 13; cf Isa 30 30; Hag 2 17; Rev 8 7; 11 19; 16 21).

Jeh's power and wisdom are shown 5. God's in controlling the hail: "Hast thou Power seen the treasures of the hail?" (Job 38 22); "Fire and hail, snow and vapor . . . fulfilling his word" (Ps 148 8).

HAIL, hāl: Interjection, found only in the Gospels as the tr of χαῖρε, chaîre, χαίρετε, chaîrete, imp. of χαίρω, chaîrō, "to rejoice," is used as a greeting or salutation. The word "Hail" is OE and was formerly an adj., used with the vb. to be, meaning "well," "sound," "hale," e.g. "Hale be thou." Wiclif has "heil" without the vb., followed by other Eng. VSS, except that the Geneva has "God save thee," in Mt 26 49; 28 9. The word occurs in Mt 26 49; 27 29; 28 9, "all hail!"; Mk 16 18; Lk 1 28; Jn 19 3. See GODSPEED; GREETING.

Fashions Orientals of Bib times, and not always in the same way among the same people in different epochs. We know this clearly from Egypt lit. and monuments, as well as from the writings of Gr authors (esp. Herodotus), that the dwellers on the Nile had their heads shaved in early youth, leaving but a side lock until maturity was attained, when this mark of childhood was taken away. Priests and warriors kept their heads closely shaved; nothing but the exigencies of arduous warfare were allowed to interfere with this custom. On the other hand, the Heb people, like their Bab neighbors (Herod. i.195), affected long and well-cared-for, bushy curls of hair as emblems of manly beauty. Proofs thereof are not infrequent in the Scriptures and elsewhere. Samson's (Jgs 16 13.19) and Absalom's (2 S 14 26) long luxuriant hair is specially mentioned, and the Shulammite sings of the locks of her beloved which are "bushy [RVm "curling"], and black as a raven" (Cant 6 11). Jos (Ant. VIII, vii, 3 [185]) reports that Solomon's body-guard was distinguished by youthful beauty and "luxuriant heads of hair." In the history of Samson we read of "the seven locks of his head" (Jgs 16 19). It is likely that the expression signifies the plaits of hair which are even now often worn by the young Bedáwin warrior of the desert.

It is well known that among the surrounding heathen nations the hair of childhood or youth was often shaved and consecrated at idol-

Idol- Egypt). Frequently this custom Worship marked an initiatory rite into the service of a divinity (e.g. that of Orontal [Bacchus] in Arabia, Herod. iii.8). It was therefore an abomination of the Gentiles in the eyes of the Jew, which is referred to in Lev 19 27; Jer 9 26; 26 23; 49 32. The Syr version of the latter passage renders, "Ye shall not let your hair grow long" (i.e. in order to cut it as a religious rite in honor of an idol). It is, however, probable that among the Jews, as now among many classes of Mohammedans, the periodical cropping of the hair, when it had become too cumbersome, was connected with some small festivity, when the weight of the hair was ascertained, and its weight in silver was given in charity to the poor. At least, the weighing of Absalom's hair (2 S 14 26) may be referred to some such custom, which is not unparalleled in other countries. The use of balances in connection with the shaving-off of the hair in Ezk 5 1 is certainly out of the common. See illustration, "Votive Offering," on p. 1302.

We may also compare the shaving of the head of the Nazirite to these heathen practices, though the resemblance is merely superficial. The man who made a vow to God was responsible to Him with his whole body and being. Not even a hair was to be injured wilfully during the whole period of the vow, for all belonged to God. The conclusion of the Nazirite vow was marked by sacrifices and the shaving of the head at the door of the sanctuary (Nu 6 1-21), indicative of a new beginning of life. The long untouched hair was therefore considered as the emblem of personal devotion (or devotedness) to the God of all strength. Thus it was an easy step to the thought that in the hair was the seat of strength of a Samson (Jgs 16 17.20). God has numbered the very hairs of the head (Mt 10 30; Lk 12 7), which to human beings conveys the idea of the innumerable (Ps 40 12; 69 4). What God can number, He can also protect, so that not even a hair of the head might "fall to the earth" or "perish." These phrases express complete safety (1 S 14 45; 2 S 14 11; 1 K 1 52; Lk 21 18; Acts 27 34).

In NT times, esp. in the Diaspora, the Jews frequently adopted the fashion of the Romans in cropping the hair closely (1 Cor 11 14);
4. Later still the fear of being tainted by the Fashions idolatrous practice of the heathen, which is specially forbidden in Lev 21 5, was so great that the side locks remained untouched and were permitted to grow ad libitum. This is still the custom among the Jews of Eastern Europe and the Orient. See also HEAD.

If Heb men paid much attention to their hair, it was even more so among Heb women. Long black tresses were the pride of the Jewish
5. Woman's maiden and matron (Cant 7 5; Jn Hair 11 2; 1 Cor 11 5.6.15), but many of the expressions used in connection with the "coiffures" of women do not convey to us more than a vague idea. The "locks" of AV in Cant 4 1.3; 6 7; Isa 47 2 (חַרְחַר, ḥarḥar) probably do not refer to the hair, but should be tr'd (as does RV, which follows the LXX) by "veil." חַרְחַר, ḥarḥar (Cant 7 5), signifies the slender threads which represent the unfinished web in the loom (cf Isa 38 12), and thence the flowing hair of women (RV "hair"). חַרְחַר, ḥarḥar (RV "tresses"), in the same ver of the Song of Songs means lit. the "gutters" at which the flocks were watered (cf Gen 30 38.41), and thus the long plaits of the maiden with which the lover toys and in which he is held captive. The braiding or dressing of woman's hair is expressed in 2 K 9 30 and Jth 10 3. In NT times Christian women are warned against following the fashionable world in elaborate hairdressing (1 Tim 2 9; 1 Pet 3 3).

The care of the hair, esp. the periodical cutting of the same, early necessitated the trade of the barber. The Heb word חַרְחַר, ḥarḥar, gallabā,

6. Barbers is found in Ezk 5 1, and the pl. form of the same word occurs in an inscription at Citium (Cyprus) (CIS, 1586), where the persons thus described clearly belonged to the priests or servants of a temple. See BARBER.

Numerous were the cosmetics and ointments applied to the hair (Ecc 9 8; Mt 6 17; perhaps Ruth 3 3), but some, reserved for sacramental purposes, were prohibited for profane use (Ex 30 32; Ps 133 2).

Such distinction we find also in Egypt, where the walls of temple laboratories were inscribed with extensive recipes of such holy oils, the conception "innumerable." Hair is also expressive of minuteness; thus the 700 left-handed men of Benjamin were able to "sling stones

8. Symboli- at a hairbreadth, and not miss" (Jgs cal Use of 20 16). Gray hairs and the hoary Word white of old age were highly honored by the Jews (Prov 16 31; 20 29; 2 Macc 6 23). Besides expressing old age (Isa 46 4), they stand for wisdom (Wisd 4 9 [10]). Sometimes white hair is the emblem of a glorious, if not Divine, presence (Dnl 7 9; 2 Macc 15 13; Rev 1 14). Calamity befalling the gray-headed was doubly terrible (Gen 42 38; 44 29). The "hair of the flesh" is said to "stand up" (Job 4 15; Sir 37 14) when sudden terror or fear takes hold of a person. The symbolical language of Isa 7 20 uses the "hair of the feet" (see FEET) and "the beard" as synonymous with "the humble" and the "mighty of the people."

Camel's hair (Mt 3 4; Mk 1 6) is mentioned in connection with the description of John the Baptist's raiment. It represents, according to Jerome, a rough shirt worn under the coat or wrapper, though a rather soft fabric is produced in Arabia from the finer wool of the camel.

Goat's hair was the material of a cloth used for wearing apparel and for a more or less waterproof covering of tents and bundles. It is the 'black tent-cloth of Kedar' (Cant 1 5; Ex 26 7; 36 14). In NT times it was the special product of St. Paul's native province, Cilicia, whence its name cilicium, and its manufacture formed the apostle's own trade (Acts 18 3). It is also mentioned as a material for stuffing pillows (1 S 19 13). See also WEAVING.

while the medical papyri (see esp. Papyrus Ebers, plates 64-67) contain numerous ointments for the hair, the composition of some of which is ascribed to a renowned queen of antiquity. Even Gr and Rom medical authors have transmitted to us the knowledge of some such prescriptions compounded, it is said, by Queen Cleopatra VI of Egypt, the frivolous friend of Caesar and Antony (see my dissertation, Die über die medizinischen Kenntnisse der alten Aegypter berichtenden Papyri, etc, Leipzig, 1888, 121-32). We know from Jos (Ant, XVI, vii, 3 [185]), that Herod the Great, in his old age, dyed his hair black, a custom, however, which does not appear to be specifically Jewish, as hair-dyes as well as means for bleaching the hair were well known in Greece and Rome. It is certain that the passage Mt 5 36 would not have been spoken, had this been a common custom in the days of the Lord. A special luxury is mentioned by Jos (Ant, VIII, vii, 3 [185]), who states that the young men who formed the body-guard of King Solomon were in the habit, on festive occasions, of sprinkling their long hair with gold-dust (ψήγμα χρυσού, psigma chrusou).

For the Jews the anointing of the head was synonymous with joy and prosperity (cf Ps 23 5; 92 10; He 1 9; cf also "oil of joy," Isa 61 3, and "oil of gladness," Ps 45 7). It was also, like the washing of feet, a token of hospitality (Ps 23 5; Lk 7 46).

On the contrary, it was the custom in times of personal or national affliction and mourning to wear the hair unanointed and disheveled, or to cover the head with dust and ashes (2 S 14 2; Josh 7 6; Job 2 12), or to tear the hair or to cut it off (Ezr 9 3; Neh 13 25; Jer 7 29).

We have referred to the thickness of hair which supplied the Heb with a suitable expression for

HA-JEHUDIJAH, ha-jé-hu-dí'ja (יהודיא, ha-yehudyāh): Named in the genealogical list (1 Ch 4 18). Possibly a proper name (RVm), but probably "the Jewess" (RV). May be so given in order to distinguish from the Egypt named in this verse. AV translates "Jehudijah."

HAKKATAN, hak'a-tan (חכטן, hak-kāṭān, "the little one"): The father of Johanan, who returned with Ezra to Jerus (Ezr 8 12=Akatan, 1 Esd 8 38).

HAKKOZ, hak'oz (חכז, hak-kōz, or ha-kōz, "the nimble"):

(1) A priest and chief of the 7th course of Aaron's sons selected by David (1 Ch 24 10). According to Ezr 2 61; Neh 3 4, 21; 7 63, his descendants returned with Zerubbabel from the captivity. But AV considers the name in Ezr and Neh as having the art. prefixed, hence renders "Koz."

(2) One of Judah's descendants (1 Ch 4 8).

HAKUPHA, ha-kū'fa (חכפא, hakūphā, "incitement"). A family name of some of the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezr 2 51; Neh 7 53).

HALAH, hā'la (הלך, hālāh; 'Αλά, Halde; 'Αλλά, Hallde, Χαλχ, Chalch, for Χαλᾶχ, Chaldach, Χαλᾶ, Chald; Vulg Hala): Mentioned in

1. Many 2 K 17 6; 18 11; 1 Ch 5 26, as Identifica- one of the places to which the kings of tions

Assyria sent the exiled Israelites (see GOZAN; HABOR). Various identifications have been proposed, all of them except the last more or less improbable for philological reasons: (1) the Assy Kalah (Nimrud, the Calah of Gen 10 11); (2) the Assy Hilakku (Cilicia);

(3) Chalkitis in Mesopotamia (Ptol. v.18, 4), adjoining Gauzanitis (Gozan)—a good position otherwise; (4) the Calachene of Strabo, in the N. of Assyria. Equally unsuitable, also, is (5) the Chalonitis of Pliny and Strabo, N.E. of Assyria, notwithstanding that this was apparently called Halah by the Syrians. An attractive identification was (6) with the river Balikh (by change of H into B)—cf LXX “in Halae and in Habor, rivers of Gozan”—but even this has to be abandoned in favor of (7) the Assyrian Halabhu, which

2. The Most Probable of Them (except the doubling and the case-ending) is the same, letter for letter. It is mentioned in the W. Asia Inscr. II, pl. 53, l. 35, between Arrapha (Arrapachitis) and Rasappu (Reseph).

According to the tablet K. 123, where it is called mat Halabhi, “the land of Halabhu,” it apparently included the towns Se-bisê, Se-Irriši, Lu-ammu[ti?], and Se-Akkulani, apparently four grain-producing centers for the Assyrian government. The first quotation implies that Halah was near or in Gauzanitis, and had a chief town of the same name. Of the 8 personal names in K. 123, 5 are Assyrian, the remainder being Syrian rather than Israelitish.

HALAK, ha-lak, MOUNT (הַר הַלָּק, ha-har he-halak): A mountain that marked the southern limit of the conquests of Joshua (Josh 11 17; 12 7). It is spoken of as the “mount Halak [lit. “the bare” or “smooth mountain”] that goeth up to Seir.” The latter passage locates it on the W. of the Arabah. The southern boundary of the land is defined by the ascent of Akabbim (Nu 34 4; Josh 15 3). This may with some certainty be identified with the pass known today as naḥb es-Safa, “pass of the smooth rock” through which runs the road from the S. to Hebron. To the S.W. opens Wady Maderah, a continuation of Wady el-Fikrah, in which there rises a conspicuous hill, Jebel Maderah, composed of limestone, answering well the description of a bare or smooth mountain. It is a striking feature of the landscape viewed from all sides, and may well be the mount here referred to. See also HOR, MOUNT.

HALAKHA, ha-lä'ka. See TALMUD.

HALE, hál, vb., HALING, hál'ing (OE halen): “To pull” or “drag,” the AV tr of σῦρω, sürō, “to draw or drag” (Acts 8 3, “haling men and women,” ARV “dragging”), and of κατασῦρω, katasürō, “to drag down,” or “force along” (Lk 12 58, “lest he hale thee to the judge,” ARV “lest haply he drag thee unto the judge”). A more frequent modern form is “haul.”

HALF, háf. See NUMBER.

HALHUL, hal'hul (חֶלְהוּל, halhul): A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 58), “Halhul, Beth-sur and Gedor.” It is without doubt the modern Halhul, a village on a hill, surrounded by fine fields and vineyards, some 4 miles N. of Hebron and less than a mile to the E. of the modern carriage road. It is conspicuous from a considerable distance on account of its ancient mosque, Wady Nebi Yánas, the “shrine of the Prophet Jonah”—a tradition going back at least to the 14th cent. The mosque, which has a minaret or tower, is built upon a rock platform artificially leveled. In the 14th cent. it was stated by Isaac Chilo (a Jewish pilgrim) that the tomb of Gad the Seer (1 S 22 5; 2 S 24 11 f) was situated in this town. Beth-sur (Beit Súr) and Gedor (Jedúr) are both near. In Jos (BJ, IV, ix, 6) we read of an Alurus (where the Idumaeans assembled), and in Jerome (OS 119 7) of a village

Alula near Hebron, which both probably refer to the same place (PEF, III, 305; Sh XXI).

HALL, há'lí (חָלִי, hálí): A town named with Helkath, Beten and Achshaph on the border of Asher (Josh 19 25). No certain identification is possible; but it may be represented by the modern Khirbet 'Alia, c 13 miles N.E. of Acre.

HALICARNASSUS, hal-i-kār-nas'us (Ἁλικαρνασσός, Halikarnassós): The largest and strongest city of the ancient country of Caria in Asia Minor, situated on the shore of a bay, 15 miles from the island of Cos. Its site was beautiful; its climate temperate and even; the soil of the surrounding country was unusually fertile and noted for its abundance of fig, orange, lemon, olive and almond trees. When the ancient country fell into the possession of the Persians, the kings of Caria were still permitted to rule. One of the rulers was the famous queen Artemisia who fought at the battle of Salamis. The most famous of the kings, however, was Mausollos (Mausölus), who ruled from 373 to 353 BC, and the tomb in which he was buried was long considered one of the wonders of the ancient world. Pliny describes the tomb as a circular structure, 140 ft. high, 411 ft. in circumference, and surrounded by 36 columns; it was covered with a pyramidal dome. The ancient writer Vitruvius, in his description of the city, says that the agora was along the shore; back of it was the mausoleum, and still farther away was the temple of Mars. To the right of the agora were the temples of Venus and Mercury, and to the left was the palace of Mausollos. Alexander the Great destroyed the city only after a long siege, but he was unable to take the acropolis. The city never quite recovered, yet it was later distinguished as the supposed birthplace of Herodotus and Dionysius. That a number of Jews lived there is evident from the fact, according to 1 Macc 15 23, that in the year 139 BC, a letter was written by the Roman Senate in their behalf. In the 1st cent. BC, a decree was issued granting to the Jews in Halicarnassus liberty to worship “according to the Jewish laws, and to make their proseuchê at the sea-side, according to the customs of their forefathers” (Jos, Ant. XIV, x, 23).

The modern town of Budrun, which represents the ancient Halicarnassus and covers a part of its site, stands a little to the W. of the castle of St. Peter. This castle was erected by the Knights of Rhodes in 1404 AD, partly from the ruins of the mausoleum. Lord Redcliffe, who explored the ruins in 1846, sent many of the sculptured slabs from the castle to the British Museum where they may now be seen. Sir C. Newton conducted excavations there in 1857-58, adding other sculptures to the collection in the British Museum. He discovered the foundation of the Ionic temple of Aphrodite, and the greenstone foundation of the mausoleum upon which modern Turkish houses had been built. He also opened several tombs which were outside the ancient city. The city walls, built by Mausollos about 360 BC, and defining the borders of the ancient city, are still preserved; but the ancient harbor which was protected by a mole, has now disappeared. The ruins may best be reached by boat from the island of Cos.

HALLEL, ha-lál', hal'el: In the fifth book of the Ps (107-50) there are several groups of Hallelujah Psalms: 104-6; 111-13; 115-17; 135; 146-50. In the worship of the synagogue Pss 135-136 and 146-50 were used in the daily morning service. Pss 113-18 were called the "Egyp Hallel," and were sung at the feasts of the Passover, Pentecost, Tabernacles and Dedication. At the Passover, Pss 113 and 114 (according to the school of Shammai only Pss 113) were sung before the feast, and Pss 115-18 after drinking the last cup. The song used by Our Lord and the disciples on the night of the betrayal (Mt 26 30), just before the departure for the Mount of Olives, probably included Pss 115-18.

HALLELUJAH, hal-é-lōō'ya (הלל-יהוה, hal-lū-yah, "praise ye Jeh"; ἀλληλουιά, allēlouia): The word is not a compound, like many of the Heb words which are composed of the abbreviated form of "Jehovah" and some other word, but has become a compound word in the Gr and other languages. Even if the Jews perhaps had become accustomed to use it as a compound, it is never written as such in the text. In some Pss, H. is an integral part of the song (Ps 135 3), while in others it simply serves as a liturgical interjection found either at the beginning (Ps 111) or at the close (Ps 104) of the psalms or both (Ps 146). The H. Pss are found in three groups: 104-6; 111-13; 146-50. In the first group H. is found at the close of the psalm as a lit. interjection (106 1 is an integral part of the psalm). In the second group H. is found at the beginning (113 9 is an integral part of the psalm depending on the adj. "joyful"). In the third group H. is found both at the close and at the beginning of the psalms. In all other cases (Pss 115, 116, 117) H. seems to be an integral part of the psalms. These three groups were probably taken from an older collection of psalms like the group Pss 120-34. In the NT H. is found as part of the song of the heavenly host (Rev 19 1 ff). The word is preserved as a liturgical interjection by the Christian church generally. A. L. BRESLICH

HALLOHESH, ha-lō'hesh (הַלֹּהֶשׁ, ha-lōhēsh, "the whisperer," "the slanderer"): A post-exilic chief whose son Shallum assisted in repairing the walls of Jerus (Neh 3 12, AV "Halohesh"). He was also one of the leaders who signed the national covenant (10 24 [Heb 25]).

HALLOW, hal'ō, HALLOWED, hal'ōd, hal'ō-ed ("to render or treat as holy," AS hālgian, from hālig, "holy"): It translates several forms of הִקְדִּישׁ, kādash, "set apart," "devote," "consecrate," frequently rendered in AV, RV, ARV "consecrate," "dedicate," "holy," and esp. "sanctify," closely synonymous, "hallow" perhaps containing more of the thought of reverence, sacredness, holiness. It embraces the idea of marked separateness. It is applied to persons, as the priest (Lev 22 23); to places or buildings, as the middle of the temple court (1 K 8 64); the tabernacle (Ex 40 9); to things, like the portion of the sacrifice set apart for the priests (Nu 18 8); to times and seasons, as the Sabbath (Jer 17 22; Ezk 20 20) and the Jubilee year (Lev 25 10); to God Himself (Lev 22 32). Its underlying idea of the separateness of holy nature or holy use works out into several often overlapping senses: (1) To set apart, dedicate, offer, reserve, for the worship or service of God: Ex 28 38, "The holy things, which the children of Israel shall hallow in all their holy gifts"; also Lev 22 3; Nu 18 29, etc.; 2 K 12 4, "All the money of the hallowed things" (AV "dedicated"), etc. (2) To make holy, by selecting, setting apart, claiming, or acknowledging as His own: Gen 2 3, "God blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it" (AV "sanctified"); but Ex 20 11 (AV, ERV, ARV), "hallowed." So of the temple (1 K 9 7); of the firstborn, spared in Egypt (Nu 3 13). (3) To dedicate or consecrate by formal ceremonial, with the accompanying idea of cleansing from sin and uncleanness: Ex 29 1, "This is the thing that thou shalt do unto them [Aaron and his sons] to hallow them, to minister unto me in the priest's office." The whole chapter is devoted to the elaborate ceremonial, consisting of ablutions, enduement in priestly robes and paraphernalia, anointing with oil, the offering of a bullock for a sin offering, and of a ram, the placing of the blood of another ram upon the right ear, right thumb, right great toe of each, the wave offering, the anointing of the holy garments, and the eating of the consecrated food, all this lasting seven days, and indicating the completeness with which they were set apart, the deep necessity of purification, and the solemnity and sacredness of the office. The tabernacle and its furniture were similarly "hallowed" by a simpler ceremony, using the anointing oil. (4) To render ritually fit for religious service, worship, or use: Lev 16 19, "Hallow it [the altar with the sprinkled blood] from the uncleannesses of the children of Israel"; Nu 6 11, "The priest shall . . . make atonement for him, for that he sinned by reason of the dead, and shall hallow his head that same day." (5) To hold sacred, reverence, keep holy: Jer 17 22, "But hallow ye the Sabbath day," by keeping it distinct and separate, esp. (Jer 17 24, 27) by refraining from unnecessary work, from burden-bearing, travel, or traffic (Neh 13 16). See Ex 20 8-11 (the Sabbath Commandment). (6) To revere, hold in awe, and reverence as holy and "separated from sinners" in majesty, power, sacredness: Lev 22 32, "And ye shall not profane my holy name; but I will be hallowed among the children of Israel." Kādash is elsewhere tr'd "sanctify" in this connection, meaning "to be manifested in awe-producing majesty, power, or grace": Ezk 38 23, "And I will . . . sanctify myself, and I will make myself known in the eyes of many nations; and they shall know that I am Jeh"; cf Ezk 28 22, 23, etc.

In the NT "hallow" occurs only in the "Lord's Prayer," there rendering ἁγιάζω, hagιάzō, the LXX word for kādash: Mt 6 9; Lk 11 2, "Hallowed be thy name." Hagiazō is quite frequent in the NT, and is always (ARV) rendered "sanctify," except here, and in Rev 22 11, "He that is holy, let him be made holy still." To "hallow the name" includes not only the inward attitude and outward action of profound reverence and active praise, but also that personal godliness, loving obedience and aggressive Christlikeness, which reveal the presence of God in the life, which is His true earthly glory.

PHILIP WENDELL CRANNELL

HALT, hōlt (חָלַל, chālā, "to limp"; χαλός, chālós, "lame," "crippled"): ARV in Gen 32 31 prefers "limped"; in Mic 4 6, 7; Zeph 3 19, "is [or was] lame"; in Lk 14 21, ARV and ERV have "lame." In 1 K 18 21 a different word (pāṣah) is used in EV of moral indecision: "How long halt ye between two opinions?" ARV renders, "How long go ye limping between the two sides?"

HAM, ham (חָם, hām; Χάμ, Chām):

The youngest son of Noah, from whom sprang the western and southwestern nations known to the Hebrews. His name first occurs

1. The in Gen 5 32, where, as in 6 10 and Youngest elsewhere, it occupies the second place.
Son of In Gen 9 18 Ham is described as "the Noah father of Canaan," to prepare the reader for vs 25-27, where Noah, cursing Ham for having told Shem and Japheth of his nakedness, refers to him as Canaan. On account of this, it has been suggested that "Canaan" stood originally in all the passages where the three brothers are spoken of, and that this was later changed to "Ham," except in the verses containing the curse. It seems more likely, however, that the name "Canaan" is inserted prophetically, as Noah would not desire to curse his son, but only one branch of that son's descendants, who were later the principal adversaries of the Hebrews.

The name given, in Ps 105 23,27; 106 22 (cf 78 51), to Egypt as a descendant of Ham, son of Noah. As Shem means "dusky," or

2. Ham as a Nationality the like, and Japheth "fair," it has been supposed that Ham meant, as is not improbable, "black." This is supported by the evidence of Heb and Arab., in which the word ḥāmam means "to be hot" and "to be black," the latter signification being derived from the former. That Ham

3. Meaning of the Word is connected with the native name of Egypt, Kem, or, in full pa ta' en Kem, "the land of Egypt," in Bashmurian Coptic Kheme, is unlikely, as this form is probably of a much later date than the composition of Gen, and, moreover, as the Arab. shows, the guttural is not a true kh, but the hard breathing h, which are both represented by the Heb ḥ.

Of the nationalities regarded as descending from Ham, none can be described as really black. First on the list, as being the darkest, is

4. The Nations Descending from Ham Cush or Ethiopia (Gen 10 6), after which comes Micrayim, or Egypt, then Puṭ or Libya, and Canaan last. The sons or descendants of each of these are then taken in turn, and it is noteworthy that some of them, like the Ethiopians and the Canaanites, spoke Sem, and not Hamitic, languages—Seba (if connected with the Sabaeans), Havilah (Yemen), and Sheba, whose queen visited Solomon. Professor Sayce, moreover, has pointed out that Caphtor is the original home of the Phoenicians, who spoke a Sem language. The explanation of this probably is that other tongues were forced upon these nationalities in consequence of their migrations, or because they fell under the dominion of nationalities alien to them. The non-Sem Babylonians, described as descendants of Nimrod (Merodach), as is well known, spoke Sumerian, and adopted Sem Bab only on account of mingling with the Semites whom they found there. Another explanation is that the nationalities described as Hamitic—a parallel to those of the Sem section—were so called because they fell under Egypt dominion. This would make the original Hamitic race to have been Egypt, and account for Ham as a (poetical) designation of that nationality. Professor F. L. Griffith has pointed out that the Egypt Priapic god of Panopolis (Akh-mim), sometimes called Menu, but also apparently known as Khem, may have been identified with the ancestor of the Hamitic race—he was worshipped from the coast of the Red Sea to Coptos, and must have been well known to Egypt's eastern neighbors. He regards the characteristics of Menu as being in accord with the shamelessness of Ham as recorded in Gen 9 20 ff. See JAPHETH; SHEM; TABLE OF NATIONS.

HAM (חָם, hām):

(1) A place E. of the Jordan named between Ashteroth-karnaim and Shaveh-kiriathaim, in which Chedorlaomer smote the Zu-zim (Gen 14 5). No name resembling this has been recovered. LXX reads bāhem, "with them," instead of b'ḥām, "in Ham." Some have thought that "Ham" may be a corruption from "Ammon"; or that it may be the ancient name of Rabbath-ammon itself.

(2) A poetical appellation of Egypt: "the land of Ham" (Ps 105 23, etc) is the land of Jacob's sojourning, i.e. Egypt; "the tents of Ham" (Ps 78 51) are the dwellings of the Egyptians. It may be derived from the native name of Egypt, Kēmi, or Khēmi. See MIZRAIM; SHEM.

HAMAN, ḥā'man (חָמָן, hāmān; Ἀμάν, Hamán):

A Pers noble and vizier of the empire under Xerxes. He was the enemy of Mordecai, the cousin of Esther. Mordecai, being a Jew, was unable to prostrate himself before the great official and to render to him the adoration which was due to him in accordance with Pers custom. Haman's wrath was so inflamed that one man's life seemed too mean a sacrifice, and he resolved that Mordecai's nation should perish with him. This was the cause of Haman's downfall and death. A ridiculous notion, which, though widely accepted, has no better foundation than a rabbinic suggestion or guess, represents him as a descendant of Agag, the king of Amalek, who was slain by Samuel. But the language of Scripture (1 S 15 33) indicates that when Agag fell, he was the last of his house. Besides, why should his descendants, if any existed, be called Agagites and not Amalekites? Saul's posterity are in no case termed Saulites, but Benjamites or Israelites. But the basis of this theory has been swept away by recent discovery. Agag was a territory adjacent to that of Media. In an inscription found at Khorsabad, Sargon, the father of Sennacherib, says: "Thirty-four districts of Media I conquered and I added them to the domain of Assyria: I imposed upon them an annual tribute of horses. The country of Agazi [Agag] . . . I ravaged, I wasted, I burned." It may be added that the name of Haman is not Heb, neither is that of Hammedatha his father. "The name of Haman," writes M. Oppert, the distinguished Assyriologist, "as well as that of his father, belongs to the Medo-Persian."

HAMATH, ḥā'math (חָמָת, hāmāth; Ἡμάθ, Hēmāth, Ἀμάθ, Haimāth; Swete also has Hemath):

The word signifies a defence or citadel, and such designation was very suitable for this chief royal city of the Hittites, situated between their northern and southern capitals, Carchemish and Kadesh, on a gigantic mound beside the Orontes. In Am 6 2 it is named Great Hamath, but not necessarily to distinguish it from other places of the same name.

The Hamathite is mentioned in Gen 10 18 among the sons of Canaan, but in historic times the population, as the personal names testify, seems to have been for the most part Sem. The ideal boundary of

1. Early History Israel reached the territory, but not the city of Hamath (Nu 34 8; Josh 13 5; Ezk 47 13-21). David entered into friendly relations with Toi, its king (2 S 8 9 ff), and Solomon erected store cities in the land of Hamath (2 Ch 8 4). In the days of Ahab we meet with it on the cuneiform inscriptions, under the name mat hamatti, and its king Irhuleni was a party to the alliance of the Hittites with Ben-hadad of Damascus and Ahab of Israel against Shalmaneser II; but this was broken up by the battle of Qarqar in 854 BC, and Hamath became subject to Assyria. Jeroboam II attacked, partially destroyed, and held it for a short time (2 K 14 28; Am 6 2). In 730 BC, its king Enilu paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser, but he divided its lands among his generals, and transported 1,223 of its inhabitants to Sura on the Tigris. In 720, Sargon "rooted out the land of Hamath and dyed the skin of Ilubi'idi [or Jau-bi'idi] its king, like wool," and colonized the country with 4,300 Assyrians, among whom was Deioeces the Mede. A few years later Sennacherib also claims to have taken it (2 K 18 34; 19 13; 1 Ch 36 19; 37 13). In Isa 11 11, mention is made of Israelites in captivity at Hamath, and Hamathites were among the colonists settled in Samaria (2 K 17 24) by Esarhaddon in 675 BC. Their special object of worship was Ashima, which, notwithstanding various conjectures, has not been identified.

The Hamathite country is mentioned in 1 Macc 12 25 in connection with the movements of Demetrius and Jonathan. The Seleucidae 2. Later renamed it Epiphaneia (Jos, Ant, I, vi, History 2), and by this name it was known to the Greeks and the Romans, even appearing as Paphunya in Midr B'r Rab ch 37. Locally, however, the ancient name never disappeared, and since the Moslem conquest it has been known as Hama. Saladin's family ruled it for a century and a half, but after the death of Abul-fida in 1331 it sank into decay.

The position of Hama in a fruitful plain to the E. of the Nusairiyeh Mountains, on the most frequented highway between Mesopotamia and Egypt, and on the new railway, gives it again, as in ancient times, a singular significance, and it is once more rising in importance. The modern town is built in four quarters around the ancient citadel-mound, and it has a population of at least 80,000. It is now noted for its gigantic irrigating wheels. Here, too, the Hittite inscriptions were first found and designated Hamathite.

In connection with the northern boundary of Israel, "the entering in of Hamath" is frequently mentioned (Nu 13 21; 1 K 8 65,

4. Entering etc., ARV "entrance"). It has been in of sought in the Orontes valley, between Hamath Antioch and Seleucia, and also at Wady Nahr el-Bārid, leading down from Homs to the Mediterranean to the N. of Tripoli. But from the point of view of Pal, it must mean some part of the great valley of Coele-Syria (Biqa'a). It seems that instead of translating, we should read here a place-name—"Libo of Hamath"—and the presence of the ancient site of Libo (mod. Leboué) 14 miles N.N.E. of Baalbek, at the head-waters of the Orontes, commanding the strategical point where the plain broadens out to the N. and to the S., confirms us in this conjecture.

HAMATH-ZOBAB, hā'math-zō'ba (חַמַּת צוֹבָא, hāmāth zōbhāh; Βαισὸβά, Baisōbd): Mentioned only in 2 Ch 8 3. Apart from Great Hamath no site answering to this name is known. It does not seem to be implied that Solomon took possession of Hamath itself, but rather that he "confirmed" his dominion over parts of the kingdom of Zobah, which on its fall may have been annexed by Hamath. LXX cod. B suggests a reading—Beth-zobah—omitting all reference to Hamath. On the other hand, the geographical distinctions between Zobah and Hamath having passed away long before Ch was written, the double name may have been used to indicate generally the extent of Solomon's conquests, as also to avoid confusion with the Zobah in the Hauran (2 S 23 36).

HAMMATH, ham'ath (חַמַּת, hāmāth, "hot spring"):

(1) "The father of the house of Rechab" (1 Ch 2 55).

(2) One of the fenced cities of Naphtali, named with Zer, Rakkath and Chinnereth (Josh 19 35). It is doubtless identical with Emmaus mentioned by Jos (Ant, XVIII, ii, 3; BJ, IV, i, 3) as near Tiberias, on the shore of the lake of Gennesareth.

It is represented by the modern el-Hammām, nearly 2 miles S. of Tiberias. It was, of course, much nearer the ancient Tiberias, which lay S. of the present city. The hot baths here, "useful for healing," in the time of Jos, have maintained their reputation. In recent years, indeed, there has been a marked increase in the number of sick persons from all parts who visit the baths. The waters are esteemed specially valuable for rheumatism and skin troubles. In the large public bath the water has a temperature of over 140° Fahr. Parts of the ancient fortification still cling to the mountain side above the baths; and the remains of an aqueduct which brought fresh water from sources in the S.W. may be traced along the face of the slopes. Hammath is identical with Hammon (1 Ch 6 76); and probably also with Hammoth-dor (Josh 21 32). W. EWING HAMMEAH, ha-mē'a, ham'ē-a, THE TOWER OF (הַמֵּאָה, ha-mē'ah [Neh 3 1]; AV Meah): The origin of the name is obscure; in m the meaning is given "Tower of the hundred"; it has been suggested that it may have been 100 cubits high or had 100 steps. It was the most important point on the walls of Jerus in going W. from the Sheep Gate, and is mentioned along with the T. of HANANEL (q.v.) (Neh 3 1), and was therefore near the N.E. corner, and probably stood where the Baris and Antonia afterward were, near the N.W. corner of the haram where are today the Turkish barracks. See JERUSALEM.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

HAMMEDATHA, ham-ē-dā'tha (חַמֵּדָּתָא, ham-mēdhāthā): The father of Haman (Est 3 1). He is generally termed the "Agagite"; the name is of Pers etymology, signifying "given by the moon."

HAMMELECH, ham'ē-lek (הַמֶּלֶךְ, ha-melekh, "the king"): Wrongly tr'd as a proper name in AV. It should be rendered "the king," as in ARV (Jer 36 26; 38 6).

HAMMER, ham'ēr: The Heb מַקְלָבֶּהֶת, maklēbēth, occurs in Jgs 4 21, where it refers to the mallet (probably wooden) used to drive tent-pins into the ground. The same word occurs in 1 K 6 7; Isa 44 12; Jer 10 4 as applied to a workman's hammer. פַּחֲשִׁי, paḥshī (cf Arab. faḥṣ), occurs in Isa 41 7; Jer 23 29; 50 23. It was probably a blacksmith's hammer or heavy hammer used for breaking rock. There is doubt about the rendering of Jgs 5 26, where the word, חַמְלִי, halmūh, occurs. From the context, the instrument mentioned was probably not a hammer. In Ps 74 6, קֶלֶפֶת, kēlēph, is better tr'd "axes," not "hammers." See TOOLS.

JAMES A. PATCH

HAMMIPHEKAD, ha-mif'kad, GATE OF (שַׁעַר הַמִּפְקָד, sha'ar ha-miphkādh, "Gate of the Muster"): One of the gates of Jerus (Neh 3 31) not mentioned elsewhere; probably situated near the N.E. corner of the Temple area.

HAMMOLECHETH, ha-mol'ē-keth (הַמּוֹלֶכֶת, ham-mōlēketh, "the queen"; LXX Μαλέχεθ, Malēcheth; AV Hammolecheth): The daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead (1 Ch 7 18).

HAMMON, ham'on (חַמּוֹן, hāmōn, "glowing"):

(1) A place on the seaward frontier of Asher, named with Rehob and Kanah (Josh 19 28), to be sought, therefore, not far from Tyre. The most probable identification so far suggested is with Umm el-Amūd, "mother of the column" (or 'Avāmūd, "columns"), at the mouth of Wady Hāmūl, on the shore, about 10 miles S. of Tyre. An inscription found by Renan shows that the place was associated with the worship of Ba'al Hamman (CIS, I, 8).

(2) A city in Naphtali, given to the Gershonite Levites (1 Ch 6 76). It is identical with Hammath (Josh 19 35), and probably also with Hammoth-dor (Josh 21 32). W. EWING

HAMMOTH-DOR, ham-oth-dôr' (חמט דור), hammoth dô'r; Ἐμαθδρ, Emathdôr, as also several corrupt forms): A fenced, Levitical city of Naphtali (Josh 19 35; 21 32); also named Hammon (1 Ch 6 61 Heb). Probably the hammatu of the Karnak lists, and the hamalam of WAI, II, 53; certainly the Emmaus of Jos, Ant, XVIII, ii, 3; BJ, IV, i, 3; Hamata of 'Erubhîn v. 5; M'ghillâh 2b, and the modern el-Hammâm, 1½ miles S. of Tiberias. The name signifies "hot springs," and these, 4 in number, still exist. They have a temperature of 144° F., are salt and bitter in taste and sulphurous in smell. Considered invaluable for rheumatism, they are crowded in June and July. This health-giving reputation is of ancient date. It is mentioned in Jos, BJ, IV, i, 3; and a coin of Tiberias of the reign of Trajan depicts Hygeia sitting on a rock beside the springs, feeding the serpent of Aesculapius. Being used for pleasure also, they were permitted to the Jew on the Sabbath, whereas had they been used only medicinally, they would have been forbidden (Talm Bab, Shab 109a; cf Mt 12 10). W. M. CHRISTIE

HAMMUEL, ham'û-el (חמאיאל, hammû'el, "wrath of God"): A son of Mishma, a Simeonite, of the family of Shaul (1 Ch 4 26).

3. Military Operations and Further Pious Works. Inauguration of His Image

9. Hammurabi's Greatness as a Ruler

The name of the celebrated warrior, builder and lawgiver, who ruled over Babylonia about 2000 BC.

In accordance with the suggestion of the late Professor Eb. Schrader, he is almost universally identified with the AMRAPHEL of Gen 14 1, etc (q.v.). Hammurabi was apparently not of Bab origin, the so-called "Dynasty of Babylon," to which he belonged, having probably come from the W. The commonest form of the name is as above, but Hamu(=)-rabi (with mimma) is also found. The reading with initial b in the second element is confirmed by the Bab rendering of the name as Kîmia-rapaštu, "my family is widespread," or the like, showing that rabi was regarded as coming from rabâ, "to be great." A late letter-tablet, however (see PSBA, May, 1901, p. 191), gives the form Ammurapi, showing that the initial is not really kh, and that the b of the second element had changed to p (cf Tiglath-pileser for Tukulti-abil-ešar, etc). Amraphel (for Amrapel, Amrabel, Amrabe) would therefore seem to be due to Assyrian influence, but the final l is difficult to explain. Professor F. Hommel has pointed out, that the Bab rendering, "my family is widespread," is simply due to the scribes, the first element being the name of the Arab. deity 'Am, making 'Ammu-rabi, "Am is great." Admitting this, it would seem to be certain that Hammurabi's dynasty was that designated Arabian by Berossus. Its founder was apparently Sumu-abi, and Hammurabi was the fifth in descent from him. Hammurabi's father, Sin-mubališ, and his grandfather, Abil-Sin, are the only rulers of the dynasty which have Bab names, all the others being apparently Arabic.

Concerning Hammurabi's early life nothing is recorded, but as he reigned at least 43 years, he must have been young when he came to the throne. His accession was apparently marked by some improvement in the administration of the laws, wherein, as the date-list says, he "established righteousness." After this, the earlier years of his reign were devoted to such peaceful pursuits as constructing the shrines and images of the gods, and in his 6th year he built the wall of the city of Laz. In his 7th year he took Unug (Erech) and Isin—two of the principal cities of Babylonia, implying that the Dynasty of Babylon had not held sway in all the states.

While interesting himself in the all-important work of digging canals, he found time to turn his attention to the land of Yamutbâlu (8th year), and in his 10th he possibly conquered, or received the homage of, the city and people (or the army) of Malgia or Malgâ. Next year the city of Rabiku was taken by a certain Ibik-aurugation Ikkur, and also, seemingly, a place called Šalibu. The inauguration of the throne of Zêr-panitum, and the setting up, seemingly, of some kind of royal monument, followed, and was succeeded by other religious duties—indeed, work of this nature would seem to have occupied him every year until his 21st, when he built the fortress or fortification of the city Bazu. His 22d year is described as that of his own image as king of righteousness; and the question naturally arises, whether this was the date when he erected the great stele found at Susa in Elam, inscribed with his Code of Laws, which is now in the Louvre. Next year he seems to have fortified the city of Sippar, where, it is supposed, this monument was originally erected.

Pious works again occupied him until his 30th year, when the army of Elam is referred to, possibly indicating warlike operations, which paved the way for the great campaign of his 31st year, when, "with the help of Anu and Enlil," he captured Yamutbâlu and King Rîm-Sîn, the well-known ruler of Larsa. In his 32d year he destroyed the army of Ašnunna or Ešnunna.

After these victories, Hammurabi would seem to have been at peace, and in his 33d year he dug the canal Hammurabi-nuhuš-niši, "Hammurabi the abundance of the people," bringing to the fields of his subjects fertility, "according to the wish of Enlila." The restoration of the great temple at Erech came next, and was followed by the erection of a fortress, "high like a mountain," on the banks of the Tigris. He also built the fortification of Rabiku on the bank of the Tigris, implying preparations for hostilities, and it was possibly on account of this that the next year he made supplication to Tašmêtu, the spouse of Nebo. The year following (his 37th), "by the command of Anu and Enlila," the fortifications of Maur and Malka were destroyed, after which the country enjoyed a twelve-month of peace. In all probability, however, this was to prepare for the expedition of his 39th year, when he subjugated Turukku, Kagmû and Subartu, a part of Mesopotamia. The length of this yeardate implies that the expedition was regarded as being of importance.

Untroubled by foreign affairs, the chief work of Hammurabi during his 40th year was the digging of the canal Tisit-Enlila, at Sippar.

6. His following this up by the restoration of the temple É-mete-ursag and a splendid temple-tower dedicated to Zagaga and Ištar. The defences of his country were apparently his last thought, for his 43d year, which seemingly terminated his reign and his life, was devoted to strengthening the fortifications of Sippar, a work recorded at greater length in several cylinder-inscriptions found on the site.

Unfortunately none of the documents referring to his reign makes mention of his attack, in company with the armies of Chedorlaomer, Tidal and Arioch, upon the rebel kings of Sodom and Gomorrah. This naturally throws doubt on the identification of Hammurabi with the Amraphel of Gen 14 1 ff. It must be remembered, however, that we do not possess a complete history either of his life or his rule. That he was a contemporary of Arioch seems undoubted, and if this be the case, Chedorlaomer and Tidal were contemporaries too. Various reasons might be adduced for the absence of references to the campaign in question—his pride may have precluded him from having a year named after an expedition—no matter how satisfactory it may have been—carried out for another power—his suzerain; or the allied armies may have suffered so severely from attacks similar to that delivered by Abraham, that the campaign became an altogether unsuitable one to date by.

If Eri-Aku was, as Thureau-Dangin has suggested, the brother of Rīm-Sin, king of Larsa (Elassar), he must have preceded him on the throne, and, in that case, the expedition against the kings of the Plain took place before Hammurabi's 30th year, when he claims to have defeated Rīm-Sin. As the date of Rīm-Sin's accession is doubtful, the date of Eri-Aku's (Arioch's) death is equally so, but it possibly took place about 5 years before Rīm-Sin's defeat. The expedition in question must therefore have been undertaken during the first 25 years of Hammurabi's reign. As Amraphel is called king of Shinar (Babylonia), the period preceding Hammurabi's accession ought probably to be excluded.

Of all the kings of early Babylonia so far known, Hammurabi would seem to have been one of the greatest, and the country made good progress under his rule. His conflicts with Elam suggest that Babylonia had become strong enough to resist that warlike state, and his title of adda or "father" of Martu (=Amurru, the Amorites) and of Yamutbālu on the E. implies not only that he maintained the country's influence, but also that, during his reign, it was no longer subject to Elam. Rīm-Sin and the state of Larsa, however, were not conquered until the time of Samsu-iluna, Hammurabi's son. It is noteworthy that his Code of Laws (see 3, above) not only determined legal rights and responsibilities, but also fixed the rates of wages, thus obviating many difficulties. See AMRAPHEL; ARIOCH; CHEDORLAOMER; TIDAL, etc.

LITERATURE

I. Historical.—When Professor Meissner published, in 1898, some fragments of cuneiform tablets from the library of the Assyrian king Ashurbanipal (668–628 BC), he also then suggested that these pieces were parts of a copy of an old Book of Law from the time of the so-called First Bab Dynasty, one of the kings of which was Hammurabi (more exactly Hammurapi, c 2100 BC). A few years later this suggestion was fully established. In December, 1901, and January, 1902, a French expedition under the leadership of M. J. de Morgan, the chief aim of which was the exploration of the old royal city Susa, found there a diorite stone, 2.25 m. high and almost 2 m. in circumference. This stone had a relief (see below) and 44 columns of ancient Bab cuneiform writing graven upon it. Professor V. Scheil, O.P., the Assyriological member of the expedition, recognized at once that this stele contains the collection of laws of King Hammurabi, and published this characteristic discovery as early as 1902 in the official report of the expedition: Délégation en Perse (Tome IV, Paris).

At the same time Scheil gave the first tr of the text. Since then the text has several times been published, and commented upon: of Ungnad, Hammurabis Gesetz, 5 vols, Leipzig, 1904–11.

The stone has the form of a column the cross-section of which is approximately an ellipse. The upper part of the face has a relief (see illustration). We see the king in supplicating attitude standing before the sun-god who sits upon a throne and is characterized by sun rays which stream out from his shoulders. As the king traced back the derivation of the Code to an inspiration of this god, we may suppose that the relief represents the moment when the king received the laws from the mouth of the god. Lower on the face of the stone are 16 columns of text, which read from top to bottom; 7 other columns were erased some time later than Hammurabi in order to make room for a new inscription. The reverse side contains 28 columns of text.

The stone was set up by the king, toward the end of his reign of 43 years, in the temple Esagila at Babylon, the capital of his dominion (c 2100 BC). It was probably stolen from there by the Elamitic king Shutruk-Nakhunte, in the 12th cent. BC, at the time of the plundering of Babylon, and set up as a trophy of war in the Elamitic capital

4. History of the Stone Susa. The same king had, it would seem, the 7 columns from the face side erased in order to engrave there an account of his own deeds, but through some unknown circumstance this latter was not accomplished. After the discovery of the stele it was brought to Paris where it now forms one of the most important possessions of the Louvre.

Marduk the god of Babylon was elected king of the gods, Hammurabi was predestined by the gods "to cause justice to radiate over the land, to surrender sinners and evildoers to destruction, and to take care that the strong should not oppress the weak." Hammurabi's Code is, indeed, conceived from this standpoint.

Farther on, the king lauds his services to the principal cities of Babylonia, their temples and cults. He appears as a true server of the gods, as a protector of his people and a gracious prince to those who at first would not acknowledge his supremacy. To be sure, this introduction is not entirely free from presumption; for the king describes himself as "god of the kings" and "sun-god of Babylon"! The hopes of a Saviour, which heathen antiquity also knew, he regards as realized in his own person.

The Code itself may be divided into 12 divisions. It manifests, in no way, a very definite logical system; the sequence is often interrupted, and one recognizes that it is not so much a systematic and exhaustive work as a collection of the legal standards accumulated in the course of time. Much that we would expect to find in a Code is not even mentioned.

The first five paragraphs treat of some principles of legal process. In the first place false accusation is considered. The unprovable charge of sorcery is dealt with in an especially interesting manner (§2). The accused in this case has to submit to an ordeal at the hands of the River-god; nevertheless nothing is said concerning the details of this ordeal. If he is convicted by the god as guilty, the accuser receives his house; in the opposite case, the accuser is condemned to death and the accused receives his house. The law also proceeds rigorously against false witnesses: in a process in which life is at stake, conscious perjury is punished with death (§3). Finally the king strives also for an uncorrupt body of judges; a judge who has not carried out the judgment of the court correctly has not only to pay twelve times the sum at issue, but he is also dismissed with disgrace from his office.

The next sections (§§6-25) occupy themselves with serious theft, burglary, robbery and other crimes of a like nature. Theft from palace or temple, or the receiving and concealing of stolen property, is punished with death or a heavy fine according to the nature of what is stolen (§§6, 8). As it was a custom in Babylonia to effect every purchase in the presence of witnesses or with a written deed of sale, one understands the regulation that, in certain cases in which witnesses were not forthcoming, or a deed could not be shown, theft was assumed: the guilty person suffered death (§7). A careful procedure is prescribed for the case in which lost goods are found in the hands of another: he who, in the investigation, cannot prove his legitimate right, suffers death, just as a deceiver who tries to enrich himself through making a false accusation (§§9 ff). Kidnapping of a free child or carrying away and concealing a slave from the palace is punished with death (§§14 ff). As slavery had the greatest economic significance in Babylonia, detailed regulations concerning the seizing of runaway slaves and similar matters were given (§§17 ff). Burglary, as also robbery, is punished with death (§§21 ff). If a robber is not caught, the persons or corporations responsible for the safety of the land had to make compensation (§§22 ff). Whoever attempts to enrich himself from a building in conflagration is thrown into the fire (§25).

The next paragraphs (§§26-41) control vassalage, particularly in reference to rights and duties of a Hammurabi Receiving the Laws.

If, however, Hammurabi was not the first legislator of Babylonia, still he was, as far as we can see, the first one who used the language of the people, i.e. the Sem idiom. We

5. Origin and Later History of the Code know that nearly 1,000 years earlier a king, Urukagina, promulgated laws in Babylonia which have been lost; an ancestor of Hammurabi, Sumulaël, appears also to have given laws. As we are able to recognize from the actual practice of Bab social life, the legislation of Hammurabi signifies nothing essentially new. Even before his time laws after the same principles were administered. His service lies before all in that he gathered together the extant laws and set them up in the Sem language. The laws were promulgated already in the 2d year of his reign, but the stele known to us was set up in the temple at Babylon about 30 years later. Moreover, the laws were set up in more than one copy, for in Susa fragments of another copy were found. How long the laws were in actual use it is impossible to determine. In any case, as late as the time of Ashurbanipal (see above), they used to be copied; indeed we even possess copies in neo-Bab characters which are later than the 7th cent. BC. Fortunately the duplicates contain several passages which are destroyed on the large stele in consequence of the erasure of the seven columns. Thus we are able, in spite of the gaps in the large stele, almost completely to determine the contents of the Code.

II. The Contents of the Code.—The laws themselves are preceded by an introduction which was added later, after the law had already been published about 30 years. The introduction states in the first place that already in the primeval age, when military kind, concerning which we are not yet quite clear. Here also Hammurabi's care for those of a meaner position is exhibited, since he issues rigid regulations against misuse of the power of office and punishes certain offences of this kind even with death (§ 34). The crown had, in every case, authority in reference to estates in fee which a vassal could not sell, exchange or transmit to his wife or daughters (§§ 36 ff, 41); as a rule the sons took over the estates after the death of the father together with the accompanying rights and duties. The same was the case if, in the service of the king, the father had been lost sight of (§§ 28 f). The estates in fee of what we may call "lay-priests" (concerning whom we shall have to speak later) take a special position (§ 40).

3. Laws concerning Vassalage

not the means to do this could be sold with his family into slavery (§§ 53 ff). Special regulations protect the landowner from unlicensed grazing on his fields of crops (§§ 57 f).

The regulations concerning horticulture (§§ 59-66) are similar; here also the relation of the proprietor to the gardener who had to plant or to cultivate the garden is carefully considered; the same is true with respect to the business liabilities of the owner. These regulations concerning horticulture are not entirely preserved upon the stele, but, through the above-mentioned duplicates, we can restore them completely.

Our knowledge concerning the legal relations between house-owners and tenants (§§ 67 ff) is less, because the parts dealing with these on the stele are entirely lost and can only be partially restored from

TEXT OF THE CODE OF HAMMURABI.

A longer section (§§ 41 ff) is given to immovables (field, garden, house); for the economic life of the ancient Babylonians depended first of all upon the cultivation of grain and date-palms; the legal relations of the land tenants are exactly explained (§§ 42 ff): neglect of his work does not liberate the tenant from his duties to his overlord. On the other hand, in cases of losses through the weather, he is so far released from his duties that of the rent not yet paid he has to pay only an amount corresponding to the quantity of the product of his tenancy (§§ 45 f). Also the landowner with liabilities, who suffers through failure of crops and inundation, enjoys far-reaching protection (§ 48), and his business relations generally are adequately regulated (§§ 49 ff). As the regular irrigation of the fields was the chief condition for profitable husbandry in a land lacking rain, strong laws are made in reference to this: damage resulting from neglect has to be compensated for; indeed, whoever had duplicates. Reference is once more made to vassalage (§ 71). The relations between neighbors are also regulated, but we cannot ascertain how in detail (§§ 72 ff). Concerning the precise rights of tenants and landlords we are also but slightly informed (§ 78).

4. Immovables

On account of the gaps, we are not able to determine how far the regulations concerning immovables extended. In the gaps there seem to have been still other laws concerning business liabilities. The number of missing paragraphs can only approximately be determined, so that our further enumeration of the paragraphs cannot be regarded as absolutely correct.

The text begins again with the treatment of the legal relations between the trader and his agents (§§ 100-107); these agents are a kind

5. Trader and Agent of officials for the trader whose business they look after. While the Code discusses their responsibilities and duties to their masters, it also protects them from unjust and deceitful ones.

The taverns of Babylonia (§§ 108–11) seem very often to have been the resort of criminals. As a rule they were in the hands of proprietresses

6. Taverns who were made responsible for what took place on their premises (§ 109). Priestesses were forbidden to visit these houses under penalty of being burned (§ 110).

The next division (§§ 112–26) deals esp. with deposits, although some of its regulations are only indirectly therewith connected.

7. Deposits ceptive messengers are to be punished (§ 112). The debtor is protected from violent encroachments of the creditor (§ 113). Detailed regulations are given concerning imprisonment for debt (§§ 114 ff). The creditor must guard himself from mistreating a person imprisoned for debt, in his house; if a child of the debtor dies through the fault of the creditor, the jus talionis is resorted to: a child of the creditor is killed (§ 116). The members of a family imprisoned for debt have to be released after three years (§ 117). If anyone desires to give something to another to be saved for him, he must do it in the presence of witnesses or draw up a statement of the transaction; otherwise later claims cannot be substantiated (§§ 122 ff). Whoever accepts the objects is responsible for them (§ 125), but is also protected from unjustified claims of his client (§ 126).

The sections occupied with the rights of the family are very extensive (§§ 127–95). Matrimony rests upon a contract (§ 128) and presupposes the persistent fidelity of the wife (§§ 129 ff), while the husband is not bound, in this respect, by regulations of any kind. An unfaithful wife may be thrown into the water, but the partner of her sin may also, under certain circumstances, suffer the penalty of death. Long unpreventable absence of the husband justifies the wife to marry again only when she lacks the means of support (§§ 133 ff). On the part of the husband, there are no hindrances to divorce, so long as he settles any matters with his wife concerning her property, provides for the upbringing of the children and, in certain cases, gives a divorce-sum as compensation (§§ 137 ff). Disorderly conduct of the wife is sufficient for the annulling of the marriage; in this case the husband may reduce the wife to the state of a slave (§ 141). The wife may only annul the marriage if her husband grossly neglects his duties toward her (§ 142). If a wife desires the annulling of the marriage for any other reason, she is drowned (§ 143).

As a rule polygamy is not allowed. If a barren wife gives to her husband a slave girl who bears children to him, then he may not marry another wife (§ 144); otherwise he might do so (§ 145). The slave given to the husband is bound to show due deference to her mistress; if she does not do this she loses her privileged position, but she may not be sold if she has borne a child to the husband (§§ 146 f). Incurable disease of the wife is a ground for the marriage of another wife (§§ 148 f).

Gifts of the husband to the wife may not be touched by the children at the death of the husband, but nevertheless property has to remain in the family (§ 150). Debts contracted before the marriage by one side or the other are not binding for the other, if an agreement has been made to that effect (§ 151 f).

Rigid laws are made against abuses in sexual life. The wife who kills her husband for the sake of a lover is impaled upon a stake (§ 153). Incest is punished, according to the circumstances, with exile or death (§§ 154 ff).

Breach of promise by the man without sufficient reason entails to him the loss of all presents made for the betrothed. If the father of the betrothed annuls the engagement, he must give back to the man twice the value of the presents (§§ 159 ff); esp. the sum paid for the wife to her father (Bab terhātu).

Matters concerning inheritance are carefully dealt with (§§ 162 ff). The dowry of a wife belongs, after her death, to her children (§ 162). Presents made during the lifetime are not reckoned in the dividing of the inheritance (§ 165), apart from the outlay which a father has to make in the case of each of his sons, the chief portion of which is the money for a wife (§ 166). Children borne from different mothers share the paternal inheritance equally (§ 167).

Disinheritance of a child is permitted only in the case of serious offences after a previous warning (§§ 168 f). Illegitimate children borne from slaves have part in the inheritance only if the father has expressly acknowledged them as his children (§ 170); otherwise, at the death of the father, they are released (§ 171).

The chief wife, whose future needs had not been secured during the lifetime of her husband, receives from the property of the deceased husband a portion equal to that received by each child, but she has only the use of it (§ 172). A widow may marry again, but then she loses all claim on the property of her first husband, in favor of his children (§§ 172, 177); the children of both her marriages share her own property equally (§§ 173 f).

The children from free women married to slaves are free (§ 175). The master of the slave has only a claim to half of the property of the slave which he has acquired during such a marriage (§§ 176 f).

Unmarried daughters mostly became priestesses or entered a religious foundation (Bab malgá); they also received, very often, a sort of dowry, which, however, remained under the control of their brothers and which, on the death of the former, fell to the brothers and sisters, if their fathers had not expressly given them a free hand in this matter (§§ 178 f). In cases where the father did not give such a dowry, the daughter received, from the property left, a share equal to that of the others, but only for use; those dedicated to a goddess obtained only a third of such an amount (§ 180 f). The lay-priestesses of the god Marduk of Babylon enjoyed special privileges in that they had full control over any property thus acquired (§ 182).

As a rule, adopted children could not be dismissed again (§§ 185 ff). Parents who had given their child to a master, who had adopted it and taught it handwork, could not claim it again (§§ 188 f). Gross insubordination of certain adopted children of a lower class is severely punished by the cutting off of the tongue (§ 192) or the tearing out of an eye (§ 193). Deceitful wet-nurses are also severely punished (§ 194). The last paragraph of this section (§ 195) states the punishment for children who strike their father as the cutting off of the hand.

The next division (§§ 196–227) occupies itself with wounding of all kinds, in the first place with the jus talionis: an eye for an eye, a

9. Concerning Wounding, bone for a bone, a tooth for a tooth. Persons lower in the social grade usually accepted money instead (§§ 196 ff). A box on the ears inflicted by a free man upon a free man cost the former 60 shekels (§ 203); in the case of one half-free, 10 shekels (§ 204); but if a slave so strikes a free man, his ear is to be cut off (§ 205). Unintentional wounding of the body, which proves to be fatal, is covered by a fine (§§ 207 f). Anyone who strikes a pregnant free woman, so as to cause a miscarriage and the death of the woman, is punished by having his daughter killed (§ 210); in the case of a half-free woman or a slave, a money compensation was sufficient (§§ 212 ff).

The surgeon is responsible for certain operations; if they succeed, he receives a legally determined high reward; if they fail, under certain circumstances his hand might be cut off (§§ 215 ff). Certainly this law was an effective preventive against quacks! Farther on come regulations concerning the fees of surgeons (§§ 221 ff) and veterinary surgeons; to a certain degree the latter are responsible for the killing of an animal under their charge (§§ 224 f).

Later, the building of houses and ships is treated of (§§ 228–40). The builder is responsible for the

10. Build- ing of Houses and Ships it falls down and kills the master of the house, the builder is killed; if it kills a child of the house, a child of the builder is killed (§§ 229 f). For any other damages incurred, the builder is likewise responsible (§§ 231 ff). The regulations for the builders of ships are similar (§§ 234 ff). The man who hires a ship is answerable to the proprietor (§§ 236 ff). With the busy shipping trade on the canals, special attention had to be given to prevent accidents (§ 240).

Already in earlier sections there were regulations concerning hiring (rent) and wages. This eleventh

11. Hiring in General, division (§§ 241–77) deals with the matter more in detail, but it also brings many things forward which are only slightly related thereto. It states etc tariffs for working animals (§§ 242 f), and in conclusion to this makes equally clear to what extent the hirer of such an animal is responsible for harm to the animal (§§ 244 ff). Special attention must be given an ox addicted to goring (§§ 250 ff; see below). Care is taken that unfaithful stewards do not escape their punishment: in gross cases of breach of confidence they are punished with the cutting off of the hand or by being torn (in the manner of being tortured on a rack) by oxen (§§ 253 ff). The wages for agricultural laborers are determined (§§ 257 f), and in connection with this, lesser cases of theft of field-utensils are considered and covered by a money fine (§§ 259 f). The wages of a shepherd and his duties form the subject of some other paragraphs (§§ 261 ff). Finally, matters having to do with hiring are mentioned: the hiring of animals for threshing (§§ 268 ff), of carriages (§ 271), wages of laborers (§ 273) and handworkers (§ 274), and the hire of ships (§§ 276 f).

The last division (§§ 278–82) treats of slaves in so far as they are not already mentioned. The 12. Slaves seller is responsible to the buyer that the slave does not suffer from epilepsy (§ 278), and that nobody else has a claim upon him (§ 279). Slaves of Bab origin, bought in a foreign land, must be released, if they are brought back to Babylonia and recognized by their former master (§ 280). If a slave did not acknowledge his master, his ear could be cut off (§ 282).

Here the laws come to an end. In spite of many regulations which seem to us cruel, they show keen sense of justice and impartiality. Thus the king, in an epilogue, rightly extols himself as a shepherd of salvation, as a helper of the oppressed, as an adviser of widows and orphans, in short, as the father of his people. In conclusion, future rulers are admonished to respect his laws, and the blessings of the gods are promised to those who do so. But upon those who might attempt to abolish the Code he calls down the curse of all the great gods, individually and collectively. With that the stele ends.

III. The Significance of the Code has been recognized ever since its discovery; for, indeed, it is the most ancient collection of laws which we know. For judgment concerning the ancient Bab civilization, for the history of slavery, for the position of woman and many other questions the Code offers the most important material. The fact that law and religion are nearly always distinctly separated is worthy of special attention.

It is not to be wondered at that a monument of such importance demands comparison with similar

1. Hammurabi and Moses monuments. In this reference the most important question is as to the relation in which the Code stands to the Law of Moses. Hammurabi was not only king of Babylonia but also of Amurru (= "land of the Amorites"), called later Pal and Western Syria. As his successors also retained the dominion over Amurru, it is quite possible that, for a considerable time, the laws of Hammurabi were in force here also, even if perhaps in a modified form. In the time of Abraham, for example, one may consider the narratives of Sarah and Hagar (Gen 16 1 ff), and Rachel and Bilhah (Gen 30 1 ff), which show the same juridical principles as the Code (cf §§ 144 ff; see above). Other narratives of the OT indicate the same customs as the Code does for Babylonia; cf Gen 24 53, where the bridal gifts to Rebekah correspond to the Bab terphatu (§ 159); similarly Gen 31 14 f.

Between the Code and the Law of Moses, esp. in the so-called Book of the Covenant (Ex 20 22–23 33), there are indeed extraordinary parallels. We might mention here the following examples:

Ex 21 2: "If thou buy a Heb servant, six years he shall serve; and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing." Similarly, CH, § 117: "If a man become involved in debt, and give his wife, his son or his daughter for silver or for labor, they shall serve three years in the house of their purchaser or bondmaster: in the fourth year they shall regain their freedom."

Ex 21 15: "And he that smiteth his father, or his mother, shall be surely put to death." Cf CH, § 195: "If a son strike his father, his hand shall be cut off."

Ex 21 18 f: "And if men contend, and one smite the other with a stone, or with his fist, and he die not, but keep his bed; if he rise again, and walk abroad upon his staff, then shall he that smote him be quit: only he shall pay for the loss of his time, and shall cause him to be thoroughly healed." Cf CH, § 206: "If a man strike another man in a noisy dispute and wound him, that man shall swear, 'I did not strike him knowingly'; and he shall pay for the physician."

Ex 21 22: "If men strive together, and hurt a woman with child, so that her fruit depart, and yet no harm follow; he shall surely be fined, according as the woman's husband shall lay upon him; and he shall pay as the judges determine." Cf CH, § 209: "If a man strike a free woman and cause her fruit to depart, he shall pay ten shekels of silver for her fruit."

Ex 21 24: "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot." Cf CH, § 196: "If a man destroy the eye of a free man, his eye shall be destroyed." § 197: "If he break the bone of a free man, his bone shall be broken." § 200: "If a man knock out the teeth of a man of the same rank, his teeth shall be knocked out."

Ex 21 28–32: "If an ox gore a man or a woman to death, the ox shall be surely stoned, and its flesh shall not be eaten; but the owner of the ox shall be quit. But if the ox was wont to gore in time past, and it hath been testified to its owner, and he hath not kept it in, but it hath killed a man or a woman; the ox shall be stoned, and its owner also shall be put to death. . . . If the ox gore a man-servant or a maid-servant, there shall be given unto their master 30 shekels of silver, and the ox shall be stoned." Cf CH, §§ 250 ff: "If an ox, while going along the street, gore a man and cause his death, no claims of any kind can be made. If a man's ox be addicted to goring and have manifested to him his failing, that it is addicted to goring, and, nevertheless, he have neither blunted his horns, nor fastened up his ox; then if his ox gore a free man and cause his death, he shall give 30 shekels of silver. If it be a man's slave, he shall give 20 shekels of silver."

Ex 22 7 ff reminds one of CH, §§ 124 ff; Ex 22 10 ff of CH, §§ 244 ff and 266 f.

The resemblances between the other parts of the Pent and the Code are not so striking as those between the Code and the Book of the Covenant; nevertheless one may compare Lev 19 35 f with CH, § 5; Lev 20 10 with CH, § 129; Lev 24 19 f with CH, §§ 196 ff; Lev 25 39 ff with CH, § 117; Dt 19 16 ff with CH, §§ 3 f; Dt 22 22 with CH, § 129; Dt 24 1 with CH, §§ 137 ff and §§ 148 f; Dt 24 7 with CH, § 14; esp. Dt 21 15 ff. 18 ff, with CH, §§ 167, 168 f, where, in both cases, there is a transition from regulations concerning the property left by a man, married several times, to provisions referring to the punishment of a disobedient son, certainly a remarkable agreement in sequence.

One can hardly assert that the parallels quoted are accidental, but just as little could one say that they are directly taken from the Code; for they bear quite a definite impression due to the Israelitish culture, and numerous marked divergences also exist. As we have already mentioned, the land Amurru was for a time Bab territory, so that Bab law must have found entrance there. When the Israelites came into contact with Bab culture, on taking possession of the land of Canaan (a part of the old Amurru), it was natural that they should employ the results of that culture as far as they found them of use for themselves. Under no circumstances may one suppose here direct quotation. Single parts of the Laws of Moses, esp. the Decalogue (Ex 20), with its particularly pointed conciseness, have no || in CH.

It has also been attempted to establish relations between the Code and other legal systems. In the Talm, esp. in the fourth order of the 2. The Code Mishnāh called n'ziḥin (i.e. "dam- and Other ages"), there are many regulations Legal which remind one of the Code. But Systems one must bear in mind that the Jews during the exile could hardly have known the Code in detail; if there happen to be similarities, these are to be explained by the fact that many of the regulations of the Code were still retained in the later Bab law, and the Talm drew upon this later Bab law for many regulations which seemed useful for its purposes. The connection is therefore an indirect one.

The similarities with the remains of old Arabian laws and the so-called Syro-Rom Lawbook (5th cent. AD) have to be considered in the same way, though some of these agreements may have only come about accidentally.

That the similarities between Rom and Gr legal usages and the Code are only of an accidental nature may be taken as assured. This seems all the more probable, in that between the Code and other legal systems there are quite striking similarities in individual points, even though we cannot find any historical connection, e.g. the Salic law, the lawbook of the Salic Franks, compiled about 500 AD, and which is the oldest preserved Germanic legal code.

Until a whole number of lost codes, as the Old Amoritish and the neo-Bab, are known to us in detail, one must guard well against hasty conclusions. In any case it is rash to speak of direct borrowings where there may be a whole series of mediating factors.

ARTHUR UNGNAD

HAMONAH, ha-mō'na (הַמֹּנָה, hāmōnāh): The name of a city which stood apparently near HAMONGOG (q.v.) (Ezk 39 16).

HAMON-GOG, hā'mon-gog (הַמֹּנֶת־גֹּג, hāmōn-gōgh, "the multitude of Gog"): The name of the place where "Gog and all his multitude" are to be buried (Ezk 39 11.15). By a change in the pointing of ver 11, hā-'ābhārīm for hā-'ōbhārīm, we should read "valley of Abarim" for "valley of them that pass through." In that case it would seem that the prophet thought of some ravine in the mountains E. of the Dead Sea.

HAMOR, hā'mor (הַמֹּר, hāmōr, "an ass"; Ἐμμόρ, Emmōr): Hamor was the father of Shechem from whom Jacob bought a piece of ground on his return from Paddan-aram for one hundred pieces of silver (Gen 33 19), and the burial place of Joseph when his body was removed from Egypt to Canaan (Josh 24 32). "The men of Hamor" were inhabitants of Shechem, and suffered a great loss under Abimelech, a prince over Israel (Jgs 9 22-49). Dinah, Jacob's daughter, was criminally treated by Hamor, who requested her to be given to him in marriage, in which plan he had the coöperation of his father, Shechem. The sons of Jacob rejected their proposition and laid a scheme by which the inhabitants of the city were circumcised, and in the hour of helplessness slew all the males, thus wreaking special vengeance upon Hamor and his father Shechem. It is mere conjecture to claim that Hamor and Dinah were personifications of early central Palestinian clans in sharp antagonism, and that the course of Simeon and Levi was really the treachery of primitive tribes. Because the word Hamor means "an ass" and Shechem "a shoulder," there is no reason for rejecting the terms as designations of individuals and considering the titles as mere tribal appellations. HAMRAN, ham'ran. See HEMDAN.

HAMUEL, ham'ū-el, ha-mū'el. See HAMMUEL.

HAMUL, hā'mul (הַמֹּל, hāmūl, "pitied," "spared"): A son of Perez, and head of one of the clans of Judah (Gen 46 12; 1 Ch 2 5; Nu 26 21). His descendants were called Hamulites.

HAMUTAL, ha-mū'tal (הַמֹּטָל, hāmūṭal, "father-in-law" or "kinsman of the dew"): A daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, and wife of King Josiah, and mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (2 K 23 31; 24 18; Jer 52 1). In the last two references and in the LXX the name appears as "Hamital." Swete gives a number of variants, e.g. 2 K 24 18: B, Mīdār, Mīdāl, A, Amūdā, Amīdith; Jer 52 1: B, Amēdād, Hameīdād, A Amēdād, Hamīdād, Q, Amēdāl, Hamīdāl.

HANAMEL, han'a-mel (הַנָּמֶל, hānam'el; AV Hanameel, ha-nam'ē-el): The son of Shalthum, Jeremiah's uncle, of whom the prophet, while in prison, during the time when Jerus was besieged by the Chaldeans, bought a field with due formalities, in token that a time would come when house and vineyards would once more be bought in the land (Jer 32 6-15).

HANAN, hā'nān (חָנָן, hānān, "gracious"):

- (1) A chief of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 23).
- (2) The youngest son of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8 38; 9 44).
- (3) One of David's mighty men of valor (1 Ch 11 43).
- (4) The head of a family of the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 46; Neh 7 49).
- (5) An assistant of Ezra in expounding the law (Neh 8 7). Possibly the same person is referred to in Neh 10 10 (11).
- (6) One of the four treasurers put in charge of the tithes by Nehemiah (Neh 13 13).
- (7, 8) Two who "sealed the covenant" on the eve of the restoration (Neh 10 22 [23].26 [27]).
- (9) A son of Igdaliah, "the man of God," whose sons had a chamber in the temple at Jerus (Jer 35 4).

BYRON H. DEMENT

HANANEL, han'an-el, THE TOWER OF (חֲנַנְיָאֵל, hānān'el, "el is gracious"; AV Hananeel, ha-nan'el): A tower in the walls of Jerus adjoining (Neh 3 1; 12 39) the tower of HAMMEAH (q.v.). The company of Levites coming from the W. passed "by the fish gate, and the tower of Hananel, and the tower of Hammeah, even unto the sheep gate" (Neh 12 39). In Jer 31 38 it is foretold "that the city shall be built to Jeh from the tower of Hananel unto the gate of the corner"—apparently the whole stretch of N. wall. In Zec 14 10 it says Jerus "shall dwell in her place, from Benjamin's gate unto the place of the first gate, unto the corner gate, and from the tower of Hananel unto the king's winepresses." These last were probably near Siloam, and the distance "from the tower of Hananel unto the king's winepresses" describes the greatest length of the city from N. to S. All the indications point to a tower, close to the tower of Hammeah, near the N.E. corner, a point of the city always requiring special fortification and later the sites successively of the Baris and of the Antonia. See JERUSALEM.

HANANI, ha-nā'ni (חֲנַנִי, hānānī, "gracious"):

- (1) A musician and son of Heman, David's seer, and head of one of the courses of the temple service (1 Ch 25 4.25).
- (2) A seer, the father of Jehu. He was cast into prison for his courage in rebuking Asa for relying on Syria (1 K 16 1.7; 2 Ch 19 2; 20 34).
- (3) A priest, of the sons of Immer, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 20).

HANANIAH, han-a-ni'a (חֲנַנְיָהּ, hānanyāhū, חֲנַנְיָהּ, hānanyāh; 'Ananias, Ananias; also with aspirate, "Jeh hath been gracious"): This was a common name in Israel for many centuries.

- (1) A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 24).
- (2) A captain of Uzziah's army (2 Ch 26 11).
- (3) Father of one of the princes under Jehoiakim (Jer 36 12).
- (4) One of the sons of Heman and leader of the 16th division of David's musicians (1 Ch 25 4.23).
- (5) Grandfather of the officer of the guard which apprehended Jeremiah on a charge of desertion (Jer 37 13).
- (6) A false prophet of Gibeon, son of Assur, who opposed Jeremiah, predicting that the yoke of Babylon would be broken in two years, and that the king, the people and the vessels of the temple would be brought back to Jerus. Jeremiah would be glad if it should be so, nevertheless it would not be. The question then arose, Which is right, Jeremiah or Hananiah? Jeremiah claimed that he was right because he was in accordance with all the great prophets of the past who prophesied evil and their words came true. Therefore his words are more likely to be true. The prophet of good, however, must wait to have his prophecy fulfilled before he can be accredited. Hananiah took off the yoke from Jeremiah and broke it in pieces, symbolic of the breaking of the power of Babylon. Jeremiah was seemingly beaten, retired and received a message from Jeh that the bar of wood would become a bar of iron, and that Hananiah would die during the year because he had spoken rebellion against Jeh (Jer 28 passim).

(7) One of Daniel's companions in Babylon whose name was changed to Shadrach (Dnl 1 7.11.19).

(8) A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 19.21).

(9) A Levite, one of the sons of Bebai, one of those who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 28; 1 Esd 9 29).

(10) One of the perfumers (AV "apothecaries") who wrought in rebuilding the wall under Nehemiah (Neh 3 8).

(11) One who helped to repair the wall above the horse gate (Neh 3 30). This may be the same person as no. 10.

(12) A governor of the castle, i.e. the bīrāh or fortress, and by Nehemiah placed in charge of the whole city of Jerus, because "he was a faithful man, and feared God above many" (Neh 7 2).

(13) One of those who sealed the covenant under Nehemiah (Neh 10 23); a Levite.

(14) A priest who was present at the dedication of the walls of Jerus (Neh 12 12.41).

HAND (יָד, yādh, "hand"; כַּף, kaph, "the hollow hand," "palm"; יְמִינִי, yāmīn, "the right hand"; שְׂמֹאלִי, s'mō'li, "the left hand"; χείρ, cheir, "hand"; δεξιá, dexiá, "the right hand"; ἀριστερά, aristerá, "the left hand" [only Lk 23 33; 2 Cor 6 7], or euphemistically [for evil omens come from the left hand; cf Lat sinister, Ger. linkisch, etc]; εὐδνυμος, eudnuyos, lit. "having a good name"): The Heb words are used in a large variety of idiomatic expressions, part of which have passed into the Gr (through the LXX) and into modern European languages (through the translations of the Bible; see Oxford Heb Lex., s.v. "yādh"). We group what has to be said about the word under the following heads:

The human hand (considered physically) and, anthropopathically, the hand of God (Gen 3 22; Ps 145 16): The hand included the wrist, as will be seen from all passages in which bracelets are mentioned as ornaments of the hand, e.g. Gen 24 22.30.47; Ezk 16 11; 23 42, or where the Bible speaks of fetters on the hands (Jgs 15 14, etc). On the other hand, it cannot seem strange that occasionally the expression "hand" may be used for a part, e.g. the fingers, as in Gen 41 42, etc. According to the lex talionis, justice demanded "hand for hand" (Ex 21 24; Dt 19 21). We enumerate the following phrases without claiming to present a complete list: "To fill the hand" (Ex 32 29 m; 1 Ch 29 5 m) means to consecrate, evidently from the filling of hands with sacrificial portions for the altar. Cf also Lev 7 37; 8 22.28.29.31.33, where the sacrifice, the ram, the basket of consecration are mentioned. "To put or set the hand unto" (Dt 15 10; 23 20; 28 8.20), to commence to do; "to put forth the hand" (Gen 3 22; 8 9); "to stretch out the hand" (Ezk 25 13.16; Zeph 2 13); "to shake or wag the hand upon" (Isa 10 32; Zeph 2 15; Zec 2 9), to defy. "To lay the hand upon the head" (2 S 13 19) is an expression of sadness and mourning, as we see from Egypt representations of scenes of mourning. Both in joy and in anger hands are "smitten together" (Nu 24 10), and people "clap their hands" at a person or over a person in spiteful triumph (Job 27 23; Lam 2 15; Nah 3 19). "To put one's life into one's hand" is to risk one's life (1 S 19 5; 28 21). "To lay hands upon" is used in the sense of blessing (Mt 19 13), or is symbolical in the act of miraculous healing (Mt 9 18; Mk 8 23; Acts 28 8), or an emblem of the gift of the Holy Spirit and His endowments (Acts 8 17-19; 13 3; 1 Tim 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6); but it also designates the infliction of cruelty and punishment (Gen 37 22; Lev 24 14), the imposition of responsibility (Nu 8 10; Dt 34 9). Thus also the sins of the people were symbolically transferred upon the goat which was to be sent into the wilderness (Lev 16 21). This act, rabbinical writings declare, was not so much a laying on of hands, as a vigorous pressing. "Lifting up the hand" was a gesture accompanying an oath (Dt 32 40) or a blessing pronounced over a multitude (Lev 9 22; Lk 24 50), a prayer (Ps 119 48). "To put the hands to the mouth" is indicative of (compulsory) silence (Job 21 5; 40 4; Prov 30 32; Mic 7 16). To "slack one's hand" is synonymous with negligence and neglect (Josh 10 6), and "to hide or bury the hand in the dish" is descriptive of the slothful, who is tired even at meals (Prov 19 24; 26 15).

The hand in the sense of power and authority: (cf Assy idu, "strength"); Josh 8 20 m, "They had no hands [RV "power"] to flee this way or that way"; Jgs 1 35, "The hand of the house of Joseph prevailed"; Ps 76 5, "None of the men of might have found their hands"; Ps 89 48 m, "shall deliver his soul from the hand [RV "power"] of Sheol"; 2 K 3 15, "The hand of Jeh came upon him"; Ex 14 31 m, "Israel saw the great hand [RV "work"] which Jeh did upon the Egyptians"; Dt 34 12, "in all the mighty hand . . . which Moses wrought in the sight of all Israel."

The hand used (pars pro toto) for the person: "His hand shall be against every man" (Gen 16 12).

3. The hand also is with David" (1 S 22 17).
Hand for the Person "Jonathan went to David into the wood and strengthened his hand in God" (1 S 23 16). In this sense penalty is exacted "from the hand" or "at the hand" of the transgressor (Gen 9 5; Ezk 33 8).

The hand in the sense of side: "All the side [Heb "hand"] of the river Jabbok" (Dt 2 37); "by the wayside" (Heb "by the hand of the way," 1 S 4 13). The MSS have here the error יך, yakh, for יד, yadh; cf the Heb of Ps 140 5[6] יד-מגדל, l-yadh ma'gal; "On the side [Heb "hand"] of their oppressors there was power" (Ecl 4 1); "I was by the side [Heb "hand"] of the great river" (Dnl 10 4).

Mention must also be made here of the Eng. idiom, "at hand," frequently found in our VSS of the Scriptures. In Heb and Gr there is no reference to the word "hand,"

5. English Idiom but words designating nearness of time or place are used. The usual word in Heb is קרוב, kārah, "to be near," and קרוב, kārōb, "near"; in Gr ἐγγύς, eggús, "near," and the vb. ἐγγίζω, eggízō, "to come near." Rarely other words are used, as ἐπείσθηκεν, enéstēken, "has come," ERV "is now present" (2 Thess 2 2), and ἐφείσθηκεν, ephéstēken, "is come" (2 Tim 4 6).

Frequently the words refer to the "day" or "coming of the Lord"; still it must not be forgotten that it may often refer to the nearness of God in a local sense, as in Jer 23 23, "Am I a God at hand, saith Jeh, and not a God afar off?" and probably in Phil 4 5, "The Lord is at hand," though many, perhaps most, commentators regard the expression as a version of the Aram. mapār dāḏ, marān aḥā (1 Cor 16 22). Passages such as Ps 31 20; 119 151; Mt 28 20 would, however, speak for an interpretation which lays the ictus on the abiding presence of the Lord with the believer.

NOTE.—The ancients made a careful distinction of the respective values of the two hands. This is perhaps best seen from Gen 48 13-19, where the imposition of the hands of aged Israel upon the heads of Joseph's sons seems unfair to their father, because the left hand is being placed upon the elder, the right hand upon the younger son. The very word eudnumos proves the same from the Gr point of view. This word is a euphemistic synonym of aristera, and is used to avoid the unlucky omen the common word may have for the person spoken to. Thus the goats, i.e. the godless, are placed at the left hand of the great Judge, while the righteous appear at His right (Mt 25 33). We read in Eccl 10 2, "A wise man's heart is at his right hand; but a fool's heart at his left," i.e. is inclined to evil. As the Jews orientated themselves by looking toward the rising of the sun (Lat oriens, the east), the left hand represented the north, and the right hand the south (1 S 23 19.24; 2 S 24 5). The right hand was considered the more honorable (1 K 3 19; Ps 45 9); therefore it was given in attestation of a contract, a federation or fellowship (Gal 2 9). It is the more valuable in battle; a friend or protector will therefore take his place at the right to guard it (Ps 16 8; 73 23; 109 31; 110 5; 121 5), but the enemy will, for the same reason, try to assail it (Job 30 12; Ps 109 6; Zec 3 1). It was also the unprotected side, because the shield was carried on the left arm; hence the point of danger and honor. The right hand is also the side of power and strength (Ps 60 5; 63 8; 108 6; 118 15.16; 110 1; Mt 23 44; Mt 20 21.23). Both hands are mentioned together in the sense of close proximity, intimate association, in Mk 10 37.

HANDBREADTH, hand'breadth (תפוח, tephah, תפוח, tephah, 1 K 7 26; 2 Ch 4 5; Ps 39 5; Ex 25 25; 37 12; Ezk 40 5.43; 43 13): A Heb linear measure containing 4 fingers, or digits, and equal to about 3 in. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

HANDFUL, hand'fōl: There are five words in Heb used to indicate what may be held in the hand, either closed or open.

(1) חֶפְצִים, hōphēn, חֶפְצִים, hōphnayim. The fist or closed hand occurs in the dual in Ex 9 8, where it signifies what can be taken in the two hands conjoined, a double handful.

(2) קַף, kaph, "hollow of the hand," the palm; an open handful (Lev 9 17; 1 K 17 12; Eccl 4 6).

(3) עֲמִיר, amīr, "sheaf or bundle." It signifies the quantity of grain a gleaner may gather in his hand (Jer 9 22 [Heb 21]).

(4) קָסֶם, kōmēc, "the closed handful" (Gen 41 47; Lev 2 2; 5 12; 6 15 [Heb 6 8]; Nu 5 26).

(5) שֹׁאֵל, shō'al, "the hollow of the hand," or what can be held in it (1 K 20 10; Ezk 13 19). In Isa 40 12 it signifies "measure."

(6) פִּשְׁשָׁה, piššāh (Ps 72 16) is rendered "handful" by AV, but is properly "abundance" as in RV.

H. PORTER

HANDICRAFT, han'di-kraft. See CRAFTS.

HANDKERCHIEF, han'kēr-chif (σουδάριον, soudáron): A loan-word from the Lat sudarium, found in pl. in Acts 19 12, soudaria; cf sudor, "perspiration"; lit. "a cloth used to wipe off perspiration." Elsewhere it is rendered "napkin" (Lk 19 20; Jn 11 44; 20 7), for which see DRESS; NAPKIN.

HANDLE, han'd'l (כַּף, kaph): The noun occurs once in Cant 5 5, "handles of the bolt" (AV "lock"). The vb. "handle" represents several Heb ('āhaz, māshakh, tāphas, etc) and Gr (ἄγγαυω, thiggānō, Col 2 21; ψηλαφάω, psēlaphādō, Lk 24 39; 1 Jn 1 1) words in AV, but is also sometimes substituted in RV for other renderings in AV, as in Cant 8 8 for "hold"; in Lk 20 11, "handled shamefully," for "entreated shamefully"; in 2 Tim 2 15, "handling aright," for "rightly dividing," etc.

HANDMAID, hand'mād: Which appears often in the OT, but seldom in the NT, like bondmaid, is used to translate two Heb words (שִׁפְחָה, shiphkhāh, and אִמָּה, 'āmāh), both of which normally mean a female slave. It is used to translate the former word in the ordinary sense of female slave in Gen 16 1; 25 12; 29 24, 29; Prov 30 23; Jer 34 11, 16; Joel 2 29; to translate the latter word in Ex 23 12; Jgs 19 19; 2 S 6 20. It is used as a term of humility and respectful self-depreciation in the presence of great men, prophets and kings, to translate the former word in Ruth 2 13; 1 S 1 18; 23 21; 2 S 14 6; 2 K 4 2, 16; it translates the latter word in the same sense in Ruth 3 9; 1 S 1 16; 25 24, 28, 31, 41; 2 S 20 17; 1 K 1 13, 17; 3 20. It is also used to express a sense of religious humility in translating the latter word only, and appears in this sense in but three passages, 1 S 1 11; Ps 86 16; 116 16.

In the NT it occurs 3 t, in a religious sense, as the tr of δούλη, doulē, "a female slave" (Lk 1 38, 48; Acts 2 18), and twice (Gal 4 22, 23) as the tr of παιδίσκη, paidiskē, AV "bondmaid."

HANDS, IMPOSITION, im-pō-zish'un (LAYING ON), OF (ἐπιθεσις χειρῶν, epithesis cheirōn, Acts 8 18; 1 Tim 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6; He 6 2): The act or ceremony of the imposition of hands appears in the OT in various connections: in the act of blessing (Gen 48 14 ff); in the ritual of sacrifice (hands of the offerer laid on head of victim, Ex 29 10, 15, 19; Lev 1 4; 3 2, 8, 13; 4 4, 24, 29; 8 14; 16 21); in witness-bearing in capital offences (Lev 24 14). The tribe of Levi was set apart by solemn imposition of hands (Nu 8 10); Moses appointed Joshua to be his successor by a similar act (Nu 27 18, 23; Dt 34 9). The idea in these cases varies with the purpose of the act. The primary idea seems to be that of conveyance or transference (cf Lev 16 21), but, conjoined with this, in certain instances, are the ideas of identification and of devotion to God.

In the NT Jesus laid hands on the little children (Mt 19 13, 15 || Mk 10 16) and on the sick (Mt 9 18; Mk 6 5, etc), and the apostles laid hands on those whom they baptized that they might receive the Holy Spirit (Acts 8 17, 19; 19 6), and in healing (Acts 12 17). Specially the imposition of hands was used in the setting apart of persons to a particular office or work in the church. This is noticed as taking place in the appointment of the Seven (Acts 6 6), in the sending out of Barnabas and Saul (Acts 13 3), at the ordination of Timothy (1 Tim 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6), but though not directly mentioned, it seems likely that it accompanied all acts of ordination of presbyters and deacons (cf 1 Tim 5 22; He 6 2). The presbyters could hardly convey what they had not themselves received (1 Tim 1 14). Here again the fundamental idea is communication. The act of laying on of hands was accompanied by prayer (Acts 6 6; 8 15; 13 3), and the blessing sought was imparted by God Himself. No ground is afforded by this symbolical action for a sacrament of "Orders." See SACRIFICE; MINISTRY; ORDINATION.

JAMES ORR

HANDSTAFF, hand'staf (מַקְלֵל יָדָה, maklēl yādāh): In pl. in Ezk 39 9, among weapons of war. See STAFF.

HAND WEAPON, hand'wep'un (Nu 35 18 AV). See ARMOR.

HANDWRITING, hand'rit-ing. See WRITING; MANUSCRIPTS.

HANES, hā'nēz (חַנְנֵס, hānēs): Occurs only in Isa 30 4. The one question of importance concerning this place is its location. It has never been certainly identified. It was probably an Egypt city, though even that is not certain. Pharaoh, in his selfish haste to make league with the kingdom of Judah, may have sent his ambassadors far beyond the frontier. The language of Isa, "Their ambassadors came to H.," certainly seems to indicate a place in the direction of Jerus from Tanis. This indication is also the sum of all the evidence yet available. There is no real knowledge concerning the exact location of H. Opinions on the subject are little more than clever guesses. They rest almost entirely upon etymological grounds, a very precarious foundation when not supported by historical evidence. The LXX has, "For there are in Tanis princes, wicked messengers." Evidently knowing no such place, they tried to translate the name. The Aram. version gives "Tahpanhes" for H., which may have been founded upon exact knowledge, as we shall see.

H. has been thought by some commentators to be Heracleopolis Magna, Egypt Hunensuten, abridged to Hunensu, Copt Ahnes, Heb Hānēs, Arab. Ahneyssa, the capital of the XXth Nome, or province, of ancient Egypt. It was a large city on an island between the Nile and the Bahr Yuseph, opposite the modern town of Beni Suef. The Greeks identified the ram-headed god of the place with Heracles, hence, "Heracleopolis." The most important historical notes in Egypt and the best philological arguments point to this city as H. But the plain meaning of Isa 30 4 points more positively to a city somewhere in the delta nearer to Jerus than Tanis (cf Naville's cogent argument, "Ahnas el Medineh," 3-4). Dumichen considered the hieroglyphic name of Tahpanhes to be Hens. Knowledge of this as a fact may have influenced the Aram. rendering, but does not warrant the arbitrary altering of the Heb text.

HANGING, hang'ing (תָּלָה, tālāh, "to hang up," "suspend," 2 S 21 12; Dt 28 66; Job 26 7; Ps 137 2; Cant 4 4; Hos 11 7): Generally, where the word is used in connection with punishments, it appears to have reference to the hanging of the corpse after execution. We find but two clear instances of death by hanging, i.e. strangulation—those of Ahithophel and Judas ((2 S 17 23; Mt 27 5), and both these were cases of suicide, not of execution. The foregoing Heb word is clearly used for "hanging" as a mode of execution in Est 5 14; 6 4; 7 9 ff; 8 7; 9 13, 14, 25; but probably the "gallows" or "tree" (עֵץ, 'ēz) was a stake for the purpose of impaling the victim. It could be lowered for this purpose, then raised "fifty cubits high" to arrest the public gaze. The Gr word used in Mt 27 5 is ἀνὰ γαζοῦ, anagazothai, "to strangle oneself." See HDB, art. "Hanging," for an exhaustive discussion.

FRANK E. HIRSCH

HANGINGS, hang'ingz:

(1) In EV this word in the pl. represents the Heb מִלִּלֵי קָלָיִם, lāl'im, the curtains of "fine twined linen" with which the court of the tabernacle was inclosed.

These were five cubits in height, and of lengths corresponding to the sides of the inclosure and the space on either side of the entrance in front, and were suspended from hooks fastened to the pillars of the court. They are described at length in Ex 27 9-15; 38 9-18. See, besides, Ex 35 17; 39 40; Nu 3 26; 4 26.

(2) In AV another word, māšākḥ (RV uniformly "screen"), is distinguished from the preceding only by the singular, "hanging" (Ex 35 17; 38 18, etc.). It is used of the screen or portière, embroidered in colors, that closed the entrance of the court (Ex 27 16; 35 17; 38 18; 39 40; 40 8.33; Nu 3 26; 4 26); of the screen of similar workmanship at the entrance of the tabernacle (Ex 26 36.37; 35 15; 36 37; 39 38; 40 5.28; Nu 3 25; 4 25); and once (Nu 3 31) of the tapestry veil, adorned with cherubim, at the entrance of the Holy of Holies (elsewhere, pārōkḥeth, "veil" Ex 26 31-33, etc., or pārōkḥeth ha-māšākḥ, "veil of the screen," Ex 35 12, etc.). In Nu 3 26, AV renders māšākḥ "curtain," and in Ex 35 12; 39 34; 40 21 (cf also Nu 4 5), "covering."

(3) In 2 K 23 7 we read of "hangings" (Heb "houses") which the women wove for the Asherah. If the text is correct we are to think perhaps of tent shrines for the image of the goddess. Lucian's reading (stōlās, "robes") is preferred by some, which would have reference to the custom of bringing offerings of clothing for the images of the gods. In 1 K 7 29 RV, "wreaths of hanging work" refers to a kind of ornamentation on the bases of the lavers. In Est 1 6, "hangings" is supplied by the translators.

BENJAMIN RENO DOWNER

HANIEL, han'i-el. See HANNIEL.

HANNAH, han'a (חַנָּה, ḥannāh, "grace," "favor"; Ḥanna, Hanna): One of the two wives of Elkanah, an Ephraimite who lived at Ramathaim-zophim. Hannah visited Shiloh yearly with her husband to offer sacrifices, for there the tabernacle was located. She was greatly distressed because they had no children. She therefore prayed earnestly for a male child whom she promised to dedicate to the Lord from his birth. The prayer was heard, and she called her son's name Samuel ("God hears"). When he was weaned he was carried to Shiloh to be trained by Eli, the priest (1 S 1). Hannah became the mother of five other children, three sons and two daughters (2 2). Her devotion in sending Samuel a little robe every year is one of the tenderest recorded instances of maternal love (2 19). She was a prophetess of no ordinary talent, as is evident from her elevated poetic deliverance elicited by God's answer to her prayer (2 1-10).

BYRON H. DEMENT

HANNATHON, han'a-thon (חַנְּתֹן, ḥannāthōn): A city on the northern boundary of Zebulun (Josh 19 14). It is probably identical with Kefar Hananyah, which the Mish gives as marking the northern limit of lower Galilee (Neubauer, Geog. du Talm., 179). It is represented by the modern Kefr 'Anān, about 3 miles S.E. of er-Rāmeḥ.

HANNIEL, han'i-el (חַנְּיָאֵל, ḥanni'ēl, "grace of God"):

(1) The son of Ephod and a prince of Manasseh who assisted in dividing Canaan among the tribes (Nu 34 23).

(2) A son of Ulla and a prince and hero of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch 7 39); AV "Haniel."

HANOCH, hā'nok, HANOCHITES, hā'nok-its (חֲנוּךְ, ḥānōḥ, "initiation," "dedication"):

(1) A grandson of Abraham by Keturah, and an ancestral head of a clan of Midian (Gen 25 4; 1 Ch 1 33, AV "Henoch").

(2) The eldest son of Reuben (Gen 46 9; Ex 6 14; 1 Ch 5 3).

The descendants of Hanoach were known as Hano-chites (Nu 26 5).

HANUN, hā'nun (חֲנָנִי, ḥānūn, "favored," "pitied"):

(1) A son and successor of Nahash, king of Ammon. Upon the death of Nahash, David sent sympathetic communications to Hanun, which were misinterpreted and the messengers dishonored. Because of this indignity, David waged a war against him, which caused the Ammonites to lose their independence (2 S 10 1 ff; 1 Ch 19 1 ff).

(2) One of the six sons of Zalaph who assisted in repairing the E. wall of Jerus (Neh 3 30).

(3) One of the inhabitants of Zanoah who repaired the Valley Gate in the wall of Jerus (Neh 3 13).

BYRON H. DEMENT

HAP, hap, HAPLY, hap'li (מִקְרֶה, mīqreh, לֵא, lā; μῆπολε, mēpole):

Hap (a Saxon word for "luck, chance") is the tr of mīqreh, "a fortuitous chance," "a lot" (Ruth 2 3, AV "Her hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz"); in 1 S 6 9, the same word is trd "chance" (that happened); "event," in Eccl 9 2.3, with "happeneth," in 2 14.

Haply (from "hap") is the tr of lā, "if that" (1 S 14 30, "if haply the people had eaten freely"); of ei āra, "if then" (Mk 11 13, "if haply he might find anything thereon"); of ei ārage (Acts 17 27, "if haply they might feel after him"); of mēpole, "lest ever," "lest perhaps," etc (Lk 14 29; Acts 5 39); of mē pōs, "lest in any way" (2 Cor 9 4 AV, "lest haply," RV "lest by any means").

RV has "haply" for "at any time" (Mt 4 6; 5 25; 13 15; Mk 4 12; Lk 4 11; 21 34; He 3 1); introduces "haply" (Mt 7 6; 13 29; 15 32; 27 64; Mk 14 2; Lk 3 15; 12 58; 14 8.12; Acts 27 29; He 4 1); has "haply there shall be," for "lest there be" (He 3 12).

HAPHARAIM, haf-a-rā'im (חַפְרָאִים, ḥaphārāyim; AV Haphraim, haf-rā'im, possibly "place of a moat"): A town in the territory of Issachar, named with Shunem and Anaharath (Josh 19 19). Onom identifies it with "Affarea," and places it 6 miles N. of Legio-Megiddo. This position corresponds with that of the modern el-Ferriyeh, an ancient site with remarkable tombs N.W. of el-Lejjūn.

HAPPEN, hap'n (קָרָה, ḥārāh; συμβαίνει, sumbainō): "Happen" (from "hap"), "to fall out," "befall," etc, "come to anyone," is the tr of ḥārāh, "to meet," etc (1 S 28 10, "There shall no punishment happen to thee," RVm "guilt come upon thee"; 2 S 1 6; Est 4 7; Eccl 2 14.15; 9 11 Isa 41 22); of ḥārā, "to meet," "cause to happen," etc (2 S 20 1); of ḥāyāh, "to be" (1 S 6 9, "It was a chance that happened to us"); of nāgha, "to touch," "to come to" (Eccl 8 14 bis). In the NT it is in several instances the tr of sumbainō, "to go" or "come up together," "to happen" (Mk 10 32; Lk 24 14; Acts 3 10; 1 Cor 10 11; 1 Pet 4 12; 2 Pet 2 22); once of gtnomai, "to become," "to happen" (Rom 11 25, RV "befallen"). "Happeneth" occurs (Eccl 2 15, "as it happeneth to the fool" mīqreh); 2 Esd 10 6; Bar 3 10 (it estin). RV supplies "that happened" for "were done" (Lk 24 35). See also CHANCE.

HAPPINESS, hap'i-nes. See BLESSEDNESS.

HAPPIZZEZ, hap'i-zez (חַפְּצֵז, ha-piṣṣēz; AV Aphses): A priest on whom fell the lot for the 18th of the 24 courses which David appointed for the temple service (1 Ch 24 15).

HARA, hā'ra (הָרָא, hārā'; LXX omits): A place named in 1 Ch 5 26 along with Halah, Habor and the river of Gozan, whither the Reubenites, the Gadites and the half-tribe of Manasseh were carried by Tiglath-pileser. In 2 K 17 6; 18 11, Hara is omitted, and in both, "and in the cities of the Medes" is added. LXX renders δρη Μήδων, drē Mēdōn, "the mountains of the Medes," which may represent Heb הָרֵי מְדָי, hārē mādhay, "mountains of Media," or, עָרֵי מְדָי, ārē mādhay, "cities of Media." The text seems to be corrupt. The second word may have fallen out in 1 Ch 5 26, hārē being changed to hārā'. W. EWING HARADAH, ha-rā'da, har'a-dā (הָרָדָה, hārādāh, "fearful"): A desert station of the Israelites between Mt. Shepherd and Makeloth (Nu 33 24 25). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

HARAN, hā'ran (הָרָן, hārān):

(1) Son of Terah, younger brother of Abraham and Nahor, and father of Lot (Gen 11 27). He had two daughters, Milcah and Iscah (ver 29).

(2) A Gershonite, of the family of Shimei (1 Ch 23 9).

HARAN, hā'ran (הָרָן, hārān; Χαράν, Charh-rān): The city where Terah settled on his departure from Ur (Gen 11 31 f); whence Abram set out on his pilgrimage of faith to Canaan (12 1 ff). It was probably "the city of Nahor" to which Abraham's servant came to find a wife for Isaac (24 10 ff). Hither came Jacob when he fled from Esau's anger (27 43). Here he met his bride (29 4), and in the neighboring pastures he tended the flocks of Laban. It is one of the cities named by Rabshakeh as destroyed by the king of Assyria (2 K 19 12; Isa 37 12). Ezekiel speaks of the merchants of Haran as trading with Tyre (27 23).

The name appears in Assyro-Bab as Harran, which means "road"; possibly because here the trade route from Damascus joined that from Nineveh to Carchemish. It is mentioned in the prism inscription of Tiglath-pileser I. It was a seat of the worship of Sin, the moon-god, from very ancient times. A temple was built by Shalmaneser II. Haran seems to have shared in the rebellion of Assur (763 BC, the year of the solar eclipse, June 15). The privileges then lost were restored by Sargon II. The temple, which had been destroyed, was rebuilt by Ashurbanipal, who was here crowned with the crown of Sin. Haran and the temple suffered much damage in the invasion of the Uman-Manda (the Medes). Nabuna'id restored temple and city, adorning them on a lavish scale. Near Haran the Parthians defeated and slew Crassus (53 BC), and here Caracalla was assassinated (217 AD). In the 4th cent. it was the seat of a bishopric; but the cult of the moon persisted far into the Christian centuries. The chief temple was the scene of heathen worship until the 11th cent., and was destroyed by the Mongols in the 13th.

The ancient city is represented by the modern Harrān to the S.E. of Edessa, on the river Belias, an affluent of the Euphrates. The ruins lie on both sides of the stream, and include those of a very ancient castle, built of great basaltic blocks, with square columns, 8 ft. thick, which support an arched roof some 30 ft. in height. Remains of the old cathedral are also conspicuous. No inscriptions have yet been found here, but a fragment of an Assyrian lion has been uncovered. A well nearby is identified as that where Eliezer met Rebekah.

In Acts 7 2.4, AV gives the name as Charran.

HARARITE, hā'ra-rīt (הָרָרִיט, ha-hārārīt, or הָרָרִי, hārārīt): Lit. "mountaineer," more particularly an inhabitant of the hill country of Judah. Thus used of two heroes:

(1) Shammah, the son of Agee (2 S 23 11.33). The passage, 1 Ch 11 34, has "Shage" in place of "Shammah."

(2) Ahiam, the son of Sharar the Ararite (2 S 23 33). In 1 Ch 11 35, "Sacar" for Sharar as here.

HARBONA, HARBONAH, hār-bō'na (הָרְבוֹנָה, hār-bhōnā', הָרְבוֹנָה, hār-bhōnāh): One of the seven eunuchs who served Ahasuerus and to whom was given the command to bring Queen Esther before the king (Est 1 10). It was he who suggested that Haman be hanged upon the self-same gallows that he had erected for Mordecai (7 9). Jewish tradition has it that Harbona had originally been a confederate of Haman, but, upon noting the failure of the latter's plans, abandoned him. The Pers equivalent of the name means "donkey-driver."

HARBOUR, hār'bēr. Used figuratively of God in Joel 3 16 AVm, "Heb, place of repair. or, harbour" (AV "hope," RV "refuge"). See HAVEN; SHIPS AND BOATS, I, II, (1), II, 3.

HARD, hārd, HARDINESS, hār'di-nes, HARDNESS, hārd'nes, HARDLY, hārd'li (קָשָׁה, kāsheh, קָלָה, pālā'; σκληρός, sklērós): The senses in which hard is used may be distinguished as:

(1) "Firm," "stiff," opposite to soft: Job 41 24, yāqāq, "to be firm," "his heart . . . as hard as a piece of the nether millstone," RV "firm"; Ezk 3 7, kāsheh, "sharp," "hard of heart"; hāzāk, "firm," "As an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead"; Jer 5 3, "They have made their faces harder than a rock"; Prov 21 29, āzaz, "to make strong," "hard," "impudent," "a wicked man hardeneth his face"; Prov 13 15 probably belongs here also where āhān is trā "hard": "The way of the transgressor is hard," ERV "The way of the treacherous is rugged"; the Heb word means, "lasting," "firm," poet. "rocks" (the earth's foundations, Mic 6 2), and the meaning seems to be, not that the way (path) of transgressors, or the treacherous (Delitzsch has "uncultivated"), is hard (rocky) to them, but that their way, or mode of acting, is hard, unsympathetic, unkind, "destitute of feeling in things which, as we say, would soften a stone" (Delitzsch on passage); also Mt 23 24, sklēros, "stiff," "thou art a hard man"; Wisd 11 4, sklēros, "hard stone," RV "flinty rock," m "the steep rock."

(2) "Sore," "trying," "painful," kāsheh (Ex 1 14, "hard service"; Dt 26 6; 2 S 3 39; Ps 60 3; Isa 14 3); kāshāh, "to have it hard" (Gen 35 16.17; Dt 15 18); āhāk, "stiff" (Ps 94 4 AV, "They utter and speak hard things"); sklēros (Jn 6 60, "This is a hard saying"—hard to accept, hard in its nature; Acts 9 5 AV; 26 14; Jude ver 15, "hard speeches"; Wisd 19 13).

(3) "Heavy," "pressing hard," kābhādh, "weighty" (Ezk 3 5.6, "a people of a strange speech and of a hard language," RVm "Heb deep of lip and heavy of tongue"); šāmakh, "to lay" (Ps 88 7, "Thy wrath lieth hard upon me").

(4) "Difficult," "hard to do," "know," etc, pālā', "difficult to be done" (Gen 18 14, "Is anything too hard for Jeh?"; Jer 32 17.27; Dt 17 8; 2 S 13 2); kāsheh (Ex 18 26, "hard causes"); kāshāh (Dt 1 17; 2 K 2 10); hīdhāh, "something twisted,"

"involved," "an enigma"; cf Jgs 14 14 (1 K 10 1; 2 Ch 9 1, "to prove Solomon with hard questions"); dhidhān, Aram. (Dnl 5 12); diakolos, lit. "difficult about food," "hard to please," hence "difficult to accomplish" (Mk 10 24, "How hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God"); duśnōēlos, "hard to be understood" (He 5 11; 2 Pet 3 16; cf Eccus 3 21, "things too hard for thee," chalepōs).

(5) "Close," or "near to" (hard by), nāghash, "to come nigh" (Jgs 9 52, ARV "near"); dābhāk and dābhāk, "to follow hard after" (Jgs 20 45; Ps 63 8, etc); ēcel, "near" (1 K 21 1); l'ummah, "over against" (Lev 3 9); adh, "to," "even to" (1 Ch 19 4, AV "hard by," RV "even to").

Hardiness occurs in Jth 16 10 (thrasos), RV "boldness."

Hardness is the tr of mūcāk, "something poured out," "dust wetted," "running into clods" (Job 38 38), RV "runneth into a mass"; "hardness of heart" occurs in the Gospels; in Mk 3 5, it is pōrōsis, "hardness," "callousness"; Mt 19 8; Mk 10 5; 16 14, sklērokardia, "dryness," "stiffness of heart"; cf Eccus 16 10; in Rom 2 5, it is sklērotēs; in 2 Tim 2 3 AV we have, "Endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ," RV "Suffer hardship with me" (corrected text), m "Take thy part in suffering hardship" (kakopathēō, "to suffer evil").

Hardly occurs in the OT (Ex 13 15), "Pharaoh would hardly let us go," kāshāh, lit. "hardened to let us go," RVm "hardened himself against letting us go"; "hardly bested" (Isa 8 21) is the tr of kāshāh, ARV "sore distressed." In the NT "hardly" is the tr of duskōlēos, "hard to please," "difficult," meaning not scarcely or barely, but with difficulty (Mt 19 23, "A rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven," RV "it is hard for"; Mk 10 23; Lk 18 24, "how hardly" ["with what difficulty"]); of mōgis, "with labor," "pain," "trouble" (Lk 9 39, "hardly departeth from him" ["painfully"]); of mōlis "with toil and fatigue" (Acts 27 8, RV "with difficulty"; Wisd 9 16, "Hardly do we guess aright at things that are upon earth"; Eccus 26 29, "A merchant shall hardly keep himself from wrong doing"; 29 6, "He shall hardly receive the half," in each instance the word is mōlis, but in the last two instances we seem to see the transition to "scarcely"; cf also Ex 13 15).

RV has "too hard" for "hidden" (Dt 30 11, m "wonderful"; "hardness" for "boldness" (of face) (Ecc 3 1); for "sorrow" (Lam 3 65); "deal hardly with me" for "make yourselves strong to me" (Job 19 3); omits "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks" (Acts 9 5, corrected text); "hardship" for "trouble" (2 Tim 2 9).

HARDEN, hār'd'n (פִּיץ, hāzak, חִשָּׁק, kāshāh; σκληρύνω, sklērūnō):

(1) "Harden" occurs most frequently in the phrase "to harden the heart," or "the neck." This hardening of men's hearts is attributed both to God and to men themselves, e.g. with reference to the hearts of Pharaoh and the Egyptians; the Hiphil of hāzak, "to make strong," is frequently used in this connection (Ex 4 21, "I will harden his heart," RVm "Heb make strong"; 7 13, "And he hardened P.'s heart," RV "was hardened," m "Heb was strong"; 7 22; 8 19; 9 12; 10 20, 27, etc; 14 17, "I will harden the hearts of the Egyptians," RVm "Heb make strong"; cf Josh 11 20); kāshāh, "to be heavy," "to make hard" (Ex 7 3); kābhēdh, "heavy," "slow," "hard," not easily moved (Ex 10 1, RVm "Heb made heavy"). When the hardening is attributed to man's own act kābhēdh is generally used (Ex 8 15, "He hardened his heart, and hearkened not," RVm "Heb made heavy"; 8 32, "Pharaoh hardened his heart" [RVm as before]; 9 7, 34; 1 S 6 6 bis). The "hardening" of men's hearts by God is in the way of punishment, but it is always a consequence of their own self-hardening. In Pharaoh's case we read that "he hardened his heart" against the appeal to free the Israelites; so hardening himself, he became always more confirmed in his obstinacy, till he brought the final doom upon himself. This is how sin is made to become its own punishment. It was not confined to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, nor does it belong to the past only. As St. Paul says (Rom 9 18), "Whom he will he hardeneth" (sklērūnō); 11 7, "The election obtained it, and the rest were hardened" (RV and AVm, pōrōs, "to make hard" or "callous"); ver 25, a "Hardening in part hath befallen Israel" (pōrōsis); cf Jn 12 40 (from Isa 6 10), "He hath blinded their eyes, and he hardened their heart"; Isa 63 17, "O Jeh, why dost thou make us to err from thy ways, and hardenest our heart from thy fear?" (kāshāh, "to harden"); cf on the other side, as expressing the human blameworthiness, Job 9 4, "Who hath hardened himself against him, and prospered?" Mk 3 5, "being grieved at the hardening of their heart"; 6 52, "Their heart was hardened"; Rom 2 5, "after thy hardness and impenitent heart." In Heb religious thought everything was directly attributed to God, and the hardening is God's work, in His physical and ethical constitution and laws of man's nature; but it is always the consequence of human action out of harmony therewith. Other instances of sklērūnō are in Acts 19 9; He 3 8, 13, 15; 4 7.

(2) "Harden" in the sense of "to fortify one's self" (make one's self hard) is the tr of šālādh, "to leap," "exult" (Job 6 10 AV, "I would harden myself in sorrow," RV "Let me exult in pain," m "harden myself").

(3) In Prov 21 29 "harden" has the meaning of "boldness," "defiance" or "shamelessness" (brazen-faced); āzaz, Hiphil, "to strengthen one's countenance," "A wicked man hardeneth his face"; Delitzsch, "A godless man showeth boldness in his mien"; cf 7 13; Ecc 8 1; see also HARD.

For "harden" RV has "stubborn" (Ex 7 14; 9 7, m "heavy"); "hardenest" (Isa 63 17); "made stiff" (Jer 7 26; 19 15); for "is hardened" (Job 39 16, ARV "dealeth hardly," and ERVm); "at the hardening" instead of "for the hardness" (Mk 3 5); "hardening" for "blindness" (Eph 4 18).

HARDLY, HARDNESS. See HARD.

HARD SAYINGS, sā'ingz; HARD SENTENCES, sen'ten-siz: In Dnl 5 12 AV (Aram. dhidhān), RV "dark sentences," of enigmatic utterances which preternatural wisdom was needed to interpret; in Jn 6 60 (σκληρός . . . ὁ λόγος, sklērōs . . . ho logos), of sayings (Christ's words at Capernaum about eating His flesh and drinking His blood) difficult for the natural mind to understand (cf ver 52).

HARE, hār (חֲרִיף, 'arnebheth [Lev 11 6; Dt 14 7]; cf Arab. أَرْنَب, 'arnab, "hare"): This animal is mentioned only in the lists of unclean animals in Lev and Dt, where it occurs along with the camel, the coney and the swine. The camel, the hare and the coney are unclean, "because they chew the cud but part not the hoof," the swine, "because he parteth the hoof . . . but cheweth not the cud." The hare and the coney are not ruminants, but might be supposed to be from their habit of almost continually moving their jaws. Both are freely eaten by the Arabs. Although 'arnebheth occurs only in the two places cited, there is no doubt that it is the hare. LXX has δαρδρούς, dasipous, "rough-footed," which, while not the commonest Gr word (laγώς, laγōs), refers to the remarkable fact that in hares and rabbits the soles of the feet are densely covered with hair. 'Arnab, which is the common Arab. word for "hare," is from the same root as the Heb 'arnebheth.

Lev 11 4-7: ver 4, EV "camel"; LXX τὸν κάμηλον, tōn kāmēlon; Vulg camelus; Heb חֲמֹל, ha-gāml. Ver 5, EV "coney"; LXX τὸν θασύποδα, tōn dasypoda; Vulg choerogryllus; Heb חֲסִידָה, ha-shēphādh. Ver 6, EV "hare"; LXX τὸν χοιρογρύλλιον, tōn choirogryllion; Vulg lepus; Heb חֲסִידָה, ha-'arnebheth. Ver 7, EV "swine"; LXX τὸν ἕν, tōn hēn; Vulg eus; Heb חֲסִידָה, ha-hēsir.

Dt 14 7: EV "camel"; LXX τὸν κάμηλον; Vulg camelus; Heb חֲסִידָה; EV "hare"; LXX θασύποδα; Vulg leporum; Heb חֲסִידָה; EV "coney"; LXX χοιρογρύλλιον; Vulg choerogryllum; Heb חֲסִידָה.

Dt 14 8: EV "swine"; LXX τὸν ἕν; Vulg eus; Heb חֲסִידָה.

It is evident from the above and from the meanings of θασύπους and χοιρογρύλλιον as given in Liddell and Scott, that the order of LXX in Lev 11 5, 6 does not follow the Heb, but has apparently assimilated the order of that of Dt 14 7, 8. In Ps 104 18, LXX has χοιρογρύλλιον for חֲסִידָה; also in Prov 30 26.

As the word "cone" has been applied to the word "rabbit" i hare, e.g. the gray i which are hares. H are swifter than ral have their eyes open blind. Hares are v Hemisphere, and the Rabbits are apparen ranean countries, al by man all over the world.

Lepus syriacus, the common hare of Syria and Pal, differs somewhat from the European hare. Lepus judeus is cited by Tristram from Northeastern Pal, and he also notes three other species from the extreme south. ALFRED ELY DAY

HAREPH, hā'rif (חָרִיף, hārēph, "scornful"): A chief of Judah, one of the sons of Caleb and father of Beth-gader (1 Ch 2 51). A quite similar name, Hariph, occurs in Neh 7 24; 10 19, but it is probably that of another individual.

HARETH, hā'reth (חָרֶת, hāreth, in pause). See HERETH.

HARHAIHAH, hār-hā'ya (חַרְחִיחַ, harhāyāh, "Jeh protects"): A goldsmith, whose son, Uzziel, helped to repair the walls of Jerus under Zerubbabel (Neh 3 8).

HARHAS, hār'has (חַרְחָשׁ, harhāṣ, "splendor"): Grandfather of Shallum, husband of Huldah (2 K 22 14). Name given as "Hasrah" in || passage (2 Ch 34 22).

HARHUR, hār'hur (חָרְחֹר, harhur, "free-born" or "fever"; Ḥāsur, Hāsour): One of the Nethinim whose descendants came from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Esr 2 51; Neh 7 53; 1 Esd 5 31).

HARIM, hā'rim (חָרִים, hārim): A family name.

(1) A non-priestly family that returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Esr 2 32; Neh 7 35); mentioned among those who married foreign wives (Esr 10 31); also mentioned among those who renewed the covenant (Neh 10 27).

(2) A priestly family returning with Zerubbabel (Esr 2 39; Neh 7 42; 12 3 15 [see REZUM]); members of this family covenanted to put away their foreign wives (Esr 10 21; Neh 10 5). A family of this name appears as the third of the priestly courses in the days of David and Solomon (1 Ch 24 8).

(3) In Neh 3 11 is mentioned Malchijah, son of Harim, one of the wall-builders. Which family is here designated is uncertain. W. N. STEARNS

HARIPH, hā'rif (חָרִיף, hariph, חָרִיף, hariph): One of those who returned from exile under Zerubbabel and helped to seal the covenant under Nehemiah and Esra (Neh 7 24; 10 19 [20]). Esr 2 18 has "Jorah."

HARLOT, hār'lot: This name replaces in RV "whore" of AV. It stands for several words and phrases used to designate or describe the unchaste woman, married or unmarried, e.g. זֹנָה, zōnāh, נְקִימָה, 'ishshāh nokhrīyāh, נְקִימָה, 'd'hēshāh; LXX and NT πόρνη, pōrnē; πορνεία, pornēia is used chiefly of prenuptial immorality, but the married woman guilty of sexual immorality is said to be guilty of pornēia (Mt 5 32; 19 9; cf Am 7 17 LXX). These and cognate words are applied esp. in the OT to those devoted to immoral service in idol sanctuaries, or given over to a dissolute life for gain. Such a class existed among all ancient peoples, and may be traced in the history of Israel. Evidence of its existence in very early times is found (Gen 38). It grew out of conditions, sexual and social, which were universal. After the corrupting foreign influxes and influences of Solomon's day, it developed to even fuller shamelessness, and its voluptuous songs (Isa 23 16), seductive arts (Prov 6 24), and blighting influence are vividly pictured and denounced by the prophets (Prov 7 10; 23 3; Isa 23 16; Jer 3 3; 5 7; Ezk 16 25; cf Dt 23 17). Money was lavished upon women of this class, and the weak and unwary were taken captive by them, so that it became one of the chief concerns of the devout father in Israel to "keep [his son] from the evil woman," who "hunteth for the precious life" (Prov 6 24-26). From the title given her in Prov, a "foreign woman" (23 27), and the warnings against "the flattery of the foreigner's tongue" (6 24; cf 1 K 11 1; Esr 10 2), we may infer that in later times this class was chiefly made up of strangers from without. The whole subject must be viewed in the setting of the times. Even in Israel, then, apart from breaches of marriage vows, immoral relations between the sexes were deemed venial (Dt 22 28 f). A man was forbidden to compel his daughter to sin (Lev 19 29), to "profane [her] and make her a harlot," but she was apparently left free to take that way herself (cf Gen 38). The children of the harlot, though, were outlawed (Dt 23 2), and later the harlot is found under the sternest social ban (Mt 21 31-32).

The subject takes on even a darker hue when viewed in the light of the hideous conditions that prevailed in ancient Syria affecting this practice. The harlot represented more than a social peril and problem. She was a 'd'hēshāh, one of a consecrated class, and as such was the concrete expression and agent of the most insidious and powerful influence and system menacing the purity and permanence of the religion of Jeh. This system defiled the reproductive organs and forces of Nature and its devotees worshipped their idol symbols in grossly licentious rites and orgies. The temple prostitute was invested with sanctity as a member of the religious caste, as she is today in India. Men and women thus prostituted themselves in the service of their gods. The Canaanite sanctuaries were gigantic brothels, legalized under the sanctions of religion. For a time, therefore, the supreme religious question was whether such a cult should be established and allowed to naturalize itself in Israel, as it had done in Babylon (Herod 1 199) and in Greece (Strabo viii 6). That the appeal thus made to the baser passions of the Israelites was all too successful is sadly clear (Am 5 7; Hos 4 13 ff). The prophets give vivid pictures of the syncretizing of the worship of Baal and Astarte with that of Jeh and the extent to which the local sanctuaries were given over to this form of corruption. They denounced it as the height of impiety and as sure to provoke Divine judgments. Asa and Jehoshaphat undertook to purge the land of such vile abominations (1 K 14 24; 15 12; 22 46). The Dt code required that all such "paramours" be banished, and forbade the use of their unholy gains as temple revenue (Dt 23 17-18, Driver's note). The Lev law forbade a priest to take a harlot to wife (Lev 21 7), and commanded that the daughter of a priest who played the harlot should be burned (21 9). See ASHORETH; IMAGES; IDOLATRY.

It is grimly significant that the prophets denounce spiritual apostasy as "harlotry" (AV "whoredom"). But it would seem that the true ethical attitude toward prostitution was unattainable so long as marriage was in the low, transitional stage mirrored in the OT; though the religion of Jeh was in a measure delivered from the threatened peril by the fiery discipline of the exile.

In NT times, a kindred danger beset the followers of Christ, esp. in Greece and Asia Minor (Acts 15 20-29; Rom 1 24 ff; 1 Cor 6 9 ff; Gal 5 19). That lax views of sexual morality were widely prevalent in the generation in which Christ lived is evident both from His casual references to the subject and from His specific teaching in answer to questions concerning adultery and divorce (cf Jos, Ant, IV, viii, 23; Vita, § 76; Sir 7 26; 25 26; 42 9, and the Talm). The ideas of the times were debased by the prevalent polygamous customs, "it being of old permitted to the Jews to marry many wives" (Jos, BJ, I, xxiv, 2; cf Ant, XVII, i, 2). The teaching of Jesus was in sharp contrast with the low ideals and the rabbinical teaching of the times. The controversy on this question waxed hot between the two famous rival rabbinical schools. Hillel reduced adultery to the level of the minor faults. Shammai opposed his teaching as immoral in tendency. Karā rāḥar aīlar, kalā pāsan aīlan (Mt 19 3), gives incidental evidence of the nature of the controversy. It was characteristic of the teaching of Jesus that He went to the root of the matter, making this sin to consist in "looking on a woman to lust after her." Nor did He confine Himself to the case of the married. The general character of the terms in Mt 5 28, rā: ḥ blēwār, pās ho blēpōn, forbids the idea that γυναικα, γυναίκα, and πορεύειν, πορεύειν, are to be limited to post-nuptial sin with a married woman. On the other hand it is a characteristic part of the work of Jesus to rescue the erring woman from the merciless clutches of the Pharisaic tribunal, and to bring her within the pale of mercy and redemption (Mt 21 31-32). He everywhere leaned to the side of mercy in dealing with such cases, as is indicated by the traditional and doubtless true narrative found in the accepted text of the Fourth Gospel (Jn 7 53-8 11).

HARLOTRY, hār'lot-ri. See CRIMES.

HAR-MAGEDON, hār-ma-ged'on (Ἀρμαγεδών, Harmagedōn from Heb hār m'ghiddō, "Mount of Megiddo"; AV Armageddon): This name is found only in Rev 16 16. It is described as the rallying-place of the kings of the whole world who, led by the unclean spirits issuing from the mouth of the dragon, the beast and the false prophet, assemble here for "the war of the great day of God, the Almighty." Various explanations have been suggested; but, as Nestle says (HDB, s.v.), "Upon the whole, to find an allusion here to Megiddo is still the most probable explanation." In the history of Israel it had been the scene of never-to-be-forgotten battles. Here took place the fatal struggle between Josiah and Pharaoh-necho (2 K 23 29; 2 Ch 35 22). Long before, the hosts of Israel had won glory here, in the splendid victory over Sisera and his host (Jgs 5 19). These low hills around Megiddo, with their outlook over the plain of Esdraelon, have witnessed perhaps a greater number of bloody encounters than have ever stained a like area of the world's surface. There was, therefore, a peculiar appropriateness in the choice of this as the arena of the last mighty struggle between the powers of good and evil. The choice of the hill as the battlefield has been criticized, as it is less suitable for military operations than the plain. But the thought of Gilboa and Tabor and the uplands beyond Jordan might have reminded the critics that Israel was not unaccustomed to mountain warfare. Megiddo itself was a hill-town, and the district was in part mountainous (cf Mt. Tabor, Jgs 4 6.12; "the high places of the field," 5 18). It will be remembered that this is apocalyptic. Har-Magedon may stand for the battlefield without indicating any particular locality. The attempt of certain scholars to connect the name with "the mount of congregation" in Isa 14 13 (Hommel, Genkel, etc), and with Bab mythology, cannot be pronounced successful. Ewald (Die Johan. Schrift, II, 204) found that the Heb forms of "Har-Magedon" and "the great Rome" have the same numerical value—304. The historical persons alluded to in the passage do not concern us here. W. EWING

HARNEPHER, hār'nē-fēr, hār-nē'fēr (חַרְנֶפֶת, harnepher): A member of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch 7 36).

HARNES, hār'nes: A word of Celtic origin meaning "armour" in AV; it is the tr of shiryān, "a coat of mail" (1 K 22 34; 2 Ch 18 33); of neshef, "arms," "weapons" (2 Ch 9 24, RV "armor"); of āṣar "to bind" (Jer 46 4), "harness the horses," probably here, "yoke the horses"; cf 1 S 6 7, "tie the kine to the cart" (bind them), Gen 46 29; another rendering is "put on their accoutrements"; cf 1 Macc 6 43, "one of the beasts armed with royal harness" (θώραξ, thōraz), RV "breastplates"; cf 1 Macc 3 3, "warlike harness"; 6 41 (ὅπλα, hōpla), RV "arms"; 2 Macc 3 25, etc; harnessed represents hāmushīm, "armed," "girded" (Ex 13 18, "The children of Israel went up harnessed," RV "armed"). Tindale, Cranmer, Geneva have "harnes" in Lk 11 22, Wiclif "armer."

HAROD, hā'rod, WELL OF (חַרְדֵּי, hārōdh, "fountain of trembling"): The fountain beside which (probably above it) Gideon and his army were encamped (Jgs 7 1). Moore (Judges, in loc.) argues, inconclusively, that the hill Moreh must be sought near Shechem, and that the well of Harod must be some spring in the neighborhood of that city. There is no good reason to question the accuracy of the common view which places this spring at 'Ain Jalūd, on the edge of the vale of Jezreel, about 2 miles E. of Zer'in, and just under the northern cliffs of Gilboa. A copious spring of clear cold water rises in a rocky cave and flows out into a large pool, whence it drains off, in Nahr Jalūd, down the vale past Beisan to the Jordan. This is probably also to be identified with the spring "which is in Jezreel," i.e. in the district, near which Saul encamped before the battle of Gilboa (1 S 29 1). 'Ain el-Meiyyileh, just below Zer'in on the N., is hardly of sufficient size and importance to be a rival to 'Ain Jalūd. See ESDRAELON.

HARODITE, hā'rod-it (חַרְדִּי, hārōdhi): Two of David's heroes, Shamma and Elikah, are so called (2 S 23 25). LXX omits the second name. In 1 Ch 11 27, the first is called "Shammoth the Harorite," while the second is omitted. "Harorite" is a clerical error for "Harodite," being taken for

7. Possibly Harodite may be connected with the well of HAROD (q.v.).

HAROEH, ha-rō'e (הַרְאִי, hā-rō'eh, "the seer"): A Judahite (1 Ch 2 52).

HARORITE, hā'rō-rit. See HARODITE.

HAROSHETH, ha-rō'sheth, OF THE GEN-TILES, or OF THE NATIONS (הַרְשֵׁת הַגּוֹיִם, hārōsheth ha-gōyīm): There is now no means of discovering what is meant by the phrase "of the nations." This is the place whence Sisera led his hosts to the Kishon against Deborah and Barak (Jgs 4 13), to which the discomfited and leaderless army fled after their defeat (ver 16). No site seems so well to meet the requirements of the narrative as el Harīhīyeh. There are still the remains of an ancient stronghold on this great double mound, which rises on the N. bank of the Kishon, in the throat of the pass leading by the base of Carmel, from the coast to Esdraelon. It effectually commands the road which here climbs the slope, and winds through the oak forest to the plain; Megiddo being some 16 miles distant. The modern also preserves a reminiscence of the ancient name. By emending the text, Cheyne would here find the name "Kadshon," to be identified with Kedesh in Galilee (EB, s.v.). On any reasonable reading of the narrative this is unnecessary. W. EWING

HARP, hārp. See MUSIC.

HARROW, har'ō (הַרְדָּה, sādhadh): Sādhadh occurs in 3 passages (Job 39 10; Isa 28 24; Hos 10 11). In the first 2 it is tr^d "harrow," in the last "break the clods." That this was a separate operation from plowing, and that it was performed with an instrument drawn by animals, seems certain. As to whether it corresponded to our modern harrowing is a question. The reasons for this uncertainty are: (1) the ancient Egyptians have left no records of its use; (2) at the present time, in those parts of Pal and Syria where foreign methods have not been introduced, harrowing is not commonly known, although the writer has been told that in some districts the ground is leveled after plowing with the threshing-sledge or a log drawn by oxen. Cross-plowing is resorted to for breaking up the lumpy soil, esp. where the ground has been baked during the long rainless summer. Lumps not reduced in this way are further broken up with a hoe or pick. Seed is always sown before plowing, so that harrowing to cover the seed is unnecessary. See AGRICULTURE. Fig. used of affliction, discipline, etc (Isa 28 24). JAMES A. PATCH

HARROWS, har'ōz (הַרְדָּיִם, hārīc): Hārīc has no connection with the vb. tr^d "harrows." The context seems to indicate some form of pointed instrument (2 S 12 31; 1 Ch 20 3; see esp. RVm).

HARSHA, hār'sha (הַרְשָׁא, harshā'): Head of one of the families of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 52; Neh 7 54); 1 Esd 5 32, "Charea."

HARSITH, hār'sith (הַרְשִׁית, harṣūh): One of the gates of Jerus (Jer 19 2 RV); m suggests "gate of the potsheds"; AV has "east gate" and AVm "sun gate," both deriving the name from הָרֵם, heres, "sun." The gate opened into the valley of Hinnom. See JERUSALEM; POTSHED.

HART, hārt. See DEER.

HARUM, hā'rum, hār'um (הָרֹם, hārum): A Judahite (1 Ch 4 8).

HARUMAPH, ha-rō'maf (הַרְרֹמָף, hārūmaph): Father of Jedaiah who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerus under Nehemiah (Neh 3 10).

HARUPHITE, ha-rō'fīt (הַרְרִיפִי, hārūphī, or הַרְרִיפִי, hārīphī): In 1 Ch 12 5 Shephatiah, one of the companions of David, is called a Haruphite (K) or Hariphite (Q). If the latter be the correct reading, it is connected with HARIPH or perhaps HAREPH (q.v.).

HARUZ, hā'ruz (הַרְרִיץ, hārūc): Father of Meshullemeth, the mother of Amon, king of Judah (2 K 21 19).

HARVEST, hār'vest (קָצִיר, kācīr; θειρισμός, therismós): To many of us, harvest time is of little concern, because in our complex life we are far removed from the actual production of our food supplies, but for the Heb people, as for those in any agricultural district today, the harvest was a most important season (Gen 8 22; 45 6). Events were reckoned from harvests (Gen 30 14; Josh 3 15; Jgs 15 1; Ruth 1 22; 2 23; 1 S 6 13; 2 S 21 9; 23 13). The three principal feasts of the Jews corresponded to the three harvest seasons (Ex 23 16; 34 21.22): (1) the feast of the Passover in April at the time of the barley harvest (cf Ruth 1 22); (2) the feast of Pentecost (7 weeks later) at the wheat harvest (Ex 34 22), and (3) the feast of Tabernacles at the end of the year (October) during the fruit harvest. The seasons have not changed since that time. Between the reaping of the barley in April and the wheat in June, most of the other cereals are reaped. The grapes begin to ripen in August, but the gathering in for making wine and molasses (dibs), and the storing of the dried figs and raisins, is at the end of September. Between the barley harvest in April and the wheat harvest, only a few showers fall, which are welcomed because they increase the yield of wheat (cf Am 4 7). Samuel made use of the unusual occurrence of rain during the wheat harvest to strike fear into the hearts of the people (1 S 12 17). Such an unusual storm of excessive violence visited Syria in 1912, and did much damage to the harvests, bringing fear to the superstitious farmers, who thought some greater disaster awaited them. From the wheat harvest until the fruit harvest no rain falls (2 S 21 10; Jer 5 24; cf Prov 26 1). The harvesters long for cool weather during the reaping season (cf Prov 25 13).

Many definite laws were instituted regarding the harvest. Gleaning was forbidden (Lev 19 9; 23 22; Dt 24 19) (see GLEANING). The first-fruits were required to be presented to Jeh (Lev 23 10). In Syria the Christians still celebrate 'id er-rubb ("feast of the Lord"), at which time the owners of the vineyards bring their first bunches of grapes to the church. The children of Israel were enjoined to reap no harvest for which they had not labored (Lev 25 5). In Prov the ants' harvesting is mentioned as a lesson for the sluggard (Prov 6 8; 10 5; 20 4).

Figurative: A destroyed harvest typified devastation or affliction (Job 5 5; Isa 16 9; 17 11; Jer 5 17; 50 16). The "time of harvest," in the OT frequently meant the day of destruction (Jer 51 33; Hos 6 11; Joel 3 13). "Joy in harvest" typified great joy (Isa 9 3); "harvest of the Nile," an abundant harvest (Isa 23 3). "The harvest is past" meant that the appointed time was gone (Jer 8 20). Jeh chose the most promising time to cut off the wicked, namely, "when there is a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest" (Isa 18 4.5). This occurrence of hot misty days just before the ripening of the grapes is still common. They are welcome because they are supposed to hasten the harvest. The Syrian farmers in some districts call it el-tabbakh el'ainib wa ttn ("the fireplace of the grapes and figs").

In the Gospels, Jesus frequently refers to the harvest of souls (Mt 9 37.38 bis; 13 30 bis.39; Mk 4 29; Jn 4 35 bis). In explaining the parable of the Tares he said, "The harvest is the end of the world" (Mt 13 39; cf Rev 14 15). See also AGRICULTURE.

HASADIAH, has-a-dī'a (הסדיה, hāṣadyāh, "Jeh is kind"): A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 20). In Bar 1 1 the Gr is Asadīas.

HASENUAH, has-e-nū'a (הסנוא, hāṣṣnu'ah): In AV (1 Ch 9 7) for HASSENUAH (q.v.).

(2) A Levite who dwelt in Jerus at the time of Nehemiah (Neh 11 15).

(3) A son of Jeduthun (1 Ch 25 3).

(5) A Levite who was a "ruler" (1 Ch 27 17).

(6) One of the Levite chiefs in the time of Josiah, who gave liberally toward the sacrifices (2 Ch 35 9). In 1 Esd 1 9 it is "Sabias."

(7) A Levite whom Ezra induced to return from exile with him (Ezr 8 19). 1 Esd 8 48 has "Asebias."

(8) One of the twelve priests set apart by Ezra to take care of the gold, the silver, and the vessels of the temple on their return from exile (Ezr 8 24; 1 Esd 8 54, "Assamias").

(9) Ruler of half of the district of "Keilah," who helped to repair the walls under Nehemiah (Neh 3 17), and also helped to seal the covenant (Neh 10 11; 12 24).

(10) A Levite (Neh 11 22).

(11) A priest (Neh 12 21). J. J. REEVE

HASHABNAH, hash-shab'na (השבניה, hāshabhnāh): One who helped to seal the covenant under Nehemiah (Neh 10 25).

HASHABNEIAH, hash-ab-nē-i'a (השביניה, hāshabhnēyāh; AV Hashabniah, hash-ab-nī'a):

(1) Father of one of the builders of the wall (Neh 3 10).

(2) A Levite mentioned in connection with the prayer preceding the signing of the covenant (Neh 9 5); possibly identical with the Hashabiah (hāshabhyāh) of Ezr 8 19.24; Neh 10 11; 11 22; 12 24, or one of these.

HASHBADANA, hash-ba-dā'na, HASHBAD-DANA, hash-bad'a-na (השבדנא, hāshbaddānāh): Probably a Levite. He was one of those who stood at Ezra's left hand when he read the law, and helped the people to understand the meaning (Neh 8 4). 1 Esd 9 44 has "Nabarias" (Naḥapelas, Nabarelas).

HASHEM, hā'shem (השמ, hāshēm): The "sons of Hashem" are mentioned (1 Ch 11 34) among David's mighty men. The || passage (2 S 23 32) has "sons of Jashen."

HASHMONAH, hash'mō-na (השמנה, hāsh-mōnāh, "fatness"): A desert camp of the Israelites between Mithkah and Moseroth (Nu 33 29.30). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

HASHUB, hā'shub, hash'ub. See HASSHUB.

HASHUBAH, ha-shōō'ba (השובה, hāshubhāh, "consideration"): One of the sons of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 20).

HASHUM, hā'shum (השום, hāshum):

(1) In Ezr 2 19; Neh 7 22, "children of Hashum" are mentioned among the returning exiles. In Ezr 10 33 (cf 1 Esd 9 33, "Asom"), members of the same family are named among those who married foreign wives.

(2) One of those who stood on Ezra's left at the reading of the law (Neh 8 4; 1 Esd 9 44, "Lothasubus"). The signer of the covenant (Neh 10 18) is possibly the same.

HASIDAEANS, has-i-dē'ans (ἡσιδαῖοι, Hasi-datoi, a transliteration of hāṣīdīm, "the pious," "Puritans"): A name assumed by the orthodox Jews (1 Macc 2 42; 7 13) to distinguish them from the Hellenizing faction described in the Maccabean books as the "impious," the "lawless," the "transgressors." They held perhaps narrow but strict and seriously honest views in religion, and recognized Judas Maccabaeus as their leader (2 Macc 14 6). They existed as a party before the days of the Maccabees, standing on the ancient ways, caring little for politics, and having small sympathy with merely national aspirations, except when affecting religion (1 Macc 1 63; 2 Macc 6 18 ff; Jth 12 2; Ant, XIV, iv, 3). Their coöperation with Judas went only to the length of securing the right to follow their own religious practices. When Bacchides came against Jerus, they were quite willing to make peace because Alcimus, "a priest of the seed of Aaron," was in his company. Him they accepted as high priest, though sixty of them soon fell by his treachery (1 Macc 7 13). Their desertion of Judas was largely the cause of his downfall. J. HUTCHISON

HASMONEANS. See ASMONEANS.

HASRAH, has'ra, has'ra (הסרה, hāsrāh): Grandfather of Shallum, who was the husband of Hulda the prophetess (2 Ch 34 22). In 2 K 23 14, HARHAS (q.v.).

HASSENAAH, has-ē-nā'a (הסנאה, hāṣṣnā'ah): In Neh 3 3 the "sons of Hassenaah" are mentioned among the builders of the wall. Probably the same as Senaah (Ezr 2 35; Neh 7 38) with the definite article, i.e. has-Senaah. The latter, from the connection, would appear to be a place-name. See also HASSENUAH.

HASSENUAH, has-e-nū'a (הסנוא, hāṣṣnu'ah): A family name in the two lists of Benjamite inhabitants of Jerus (1 Ch 9 7, AV "Hase-nuah"; Neh 11 9, "Senuah"). The name is possibly the same as HASSENAAH (q.v.), yet the occurrence of the singular ("son of H.") does not so well accord with the idea of a place-name.

HASSHUB, hash'ub (השחב, hāshshūb, "considerate"): AV everywhere Hashub except 1 Ch 9 14:

(1) A builder of the wall (Neh 3 11).

(2) Another builder of the same name (Neh 3 23).

(3) One of the signers of the covenant (Neh 10 23).

(4) A Levite chief (Neh 11 15; 1 Ch 9 14). BDB makes (1) and (3) identical.

HASSOPHEREETH, has-o-fē'reth. See SOPHEREETH.

HASTE, hāst (חָשַׁת, hāphaz, חָשַׁת, hāsh, חָשַׁת, māhar; ḥāṣṣā, speūdō): "Haste" (from a root meaning "to pursue") implies "celerity of motion."

(1) The noun occurs as tr of māhar, "to hasten," etc (Ex 10 16; 12 33, "in haste"); of hāphaz, "to make haste" (2 K 7 15; Ps 31 22; 116 11, "I said in my haste [RVM "alarm"], All men are liars"); of hippāzōn, a "hasty flight" (Ex 12 11; Dt 16 3; Isa 52 12); of nāḥaz, "to be urgent" (1 S 21 8, "The king's business required haste").

(2) "Haste" as a vb. is trans and intrans; instances of the transitive use are, hāz, "to hasten," "press" (Ex 5 13, "And the taskmasters hastened them," RV "were urgent"); hāsh, "to make haste" (Isa 5 19); māhar (2 Ch 24 5 bis); shāḥadh, "to watch," "to fix one's attention" on anything (Jer 1 12 AV, "I will hasten my word"); māhīr, "hasting" (Isa 16 5, "hasting righteousness," RV "swift to do"). The intransitive use is more frequent and represents many different words.

Hasty also occurs in several instances (Prov 21 5; 29 20, hāz, etc); in Isa 28 4, hāḥkūr, "first-fruit," is tr'd "hasty fruit," RV "first-ripe fig."

RV has "Haste ye" for "assemble yourselves" (Joel 3 11 m 143 7) mind; end; speak; 5 22; even reason after a gifta fo for "hs for "h and g that he to" (Jo 23), "h

HASUPHA, ha-sū'fa (חֲסֻפָּה, hāṣūphā): Head of a family of Nethinim among the returning exiles (Ezr 2 43; Neh 7 46). Neh 7 46 AV has "Hashupha," and 1 Esd 5 29, "Asipha."

HAT: The original word (כִּתְיָה, karbiā, Aram.) rendered "hat" in Dnl 3 21 AV is very rare, appearing only here in the OT. There is acknowledged difficulty in translating it, as well as the other words of the passage. "Hat" of AV certainly fails to give its exact meaning. The hat as we know it, i.e. headgear distinguished from the cap or bonnet by a circular brim, was unknown to the ancient East. The nearest thing to the modern hat among the ancients was the pelaeus worn by the Romans when on a journey, though something like it was used on like occasions by the early Greeks. In the earlier Heb writings there is little concerning the headgear worn by the people. In 1 K 20 31 we find mention of "ropes" upon the head in connection with "sackcloth" on the loins. On Egypt monuments are found pictures of Syrians likewise with cords tied about their flowing hair. The custom, however, did not survive, or was modified, clearly because the cord alone would afford no protection against the sun, to which peasants and travelers were perilously exposed. It is likely, therefore, that for kindred reasons the later Israelites used a head-covering similar to that of the modern Bedouin. This consists of a rectangular piece of cloth called keffiyeh, which is usually folded into triangular form and placed over the head so as to let the middle part hang down over the back of the neck and protect it from the sun, while the two ends are drawn as needed under the chin and tied, or thrown back over the shoulders. A cord of wool is then used to secure it at the top. It became customary still later for Israelites to use a head-covering more like the "turban" worn by the fellaheen today. It consists in detail of a piece of cotton cloth worked into the form of a cap (taktyeh), and so worn as to protect the other headgear from being soiled by the perspiration. A felt cap, or, as among the Turks, a fez or red tarbush, is worn over this. On the top of these is wound a long piece of cotton cloth with red stripes and fringes, a flowered kerchief, or a striped keffiyeh. This protects the head from the sun, serves as a sort of purse by day, and often as a pillow by night. Some such headgear is probably meant by the "diadem" of Job 29 14 and the "hood" of Isa 3 23, Heb ḥānīph, from ḥānaph, "to roll up like a coil" (cf Isa 23 18).

HATACH, hā'tak. See HATHACH.

HATCHET, hach'et (חֶכֶּט, hachet): Ps 74 6 RV, "hatchet," AV "axes." See AX.

HATE, hāt, HATRED, hā'tred (vb., טָנַף, ṭānāf, "oftenest," טָנַף, ṭānāf, Gen 27 41, etc; noun, טָנַף, ṭānāf; ṭānāf, ṭānāf): A feeling of strong antagonism and dislike, generally malevolent and prompting to injury (the opposite of love); sometimes born of moral resentment. Alike in the OT and NT, hate of the malevolent sort is unparaphrasedly condemned (Nu 35 20; Ps 109 5; Prov 10 12; Tit 3 3; 1 Jn 3 15), but in the OT hatred of evil and evil-doers, purged of personal malice, is commended (Ps 97 10; 101 3; 139 21, 22, etc). The NT law softens this feeling as regards persons, bringing it under the higher law of love (Mt 5 43, 44; cf Rom 12 17-21), while intensifying the hatred of evil (Jude ver 23; Rev 2 6). God himself is hated by the wicked (Ex 20 5; Ps 139 21; cf Rom 8 7). Sometimes, however, the word "hate" is used hyperbolically in a relative sense to express only the strong preference of one to another. God loved Jacob, but hated Esau (Mal 1 3; Rom 9 13); father and mother are to be hated in comparison with Christ (Lk 14 26; cf Mt 10 37). See ENMITY.

HATHACH, hā'thak (חֲתָח, hāthach; LXX Ἀπαρτορος, Hachrathalos): One of the chamberlains of Ahasuerus, appointed to attend on Esther (Est 4 5, 6, 9, 10, AV "Hatach"), through whom she learned from Mordecai of Haman's plot.

HATHATH, hā'thath (חֲתָת, hāthath, "terror"): Son of Othniel and grandson of Kenaz (1 Ch 4 13).

HATIPHA, ha-tī'fa, hat'i-fa (חֲתִיפָה, hātiphā, "taken," "captive" [?]): The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim that returned from Babylon (Ezr 2 54; Neh 7 56 = "Atipha," 1 Esd 5 32).

HATITA, ha-tī'ta, hat'i-ta (חֲתִיטָה, hātitā): Head of a family among the "children of the porters" who returned from exile (Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45; 1 Esd 5 28, "Ateta").

HATSI-HAMMENOCHOTH, hat-si-ham-en-u'-koth: A marginal reading in 1 Ch 2 52 AV. It disappears in RV, which reads in text, "half of the MENUCHOTH" (q.v.) (Heb hāḥi ha-m'nuchōth).

HATTIL, hat'il (חֲטִיל, hātil): A company of servants of Solomon appearing in the post-exilic literature (Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59). Same called "Agia" in 1 Esd 5 34.

HATTUSH, hat'ush (חֲטֹשׁ, hāṭūsh):

(1) Son of Shemaiah, a descendant of the kings of Judah, in the 5th generation from Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 22). He returned with Zerubbabel and Ezra from Babylon to Jerus (Ezr 8 2; Neh 12 2). (There is some doubt as to whether the Hattush of the lineage of David and the priest of the same name, mentioned in Neh 10 4 and 12 2, are one and the same.) He was one of those who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 4).

(2) Son of Hashabneiah; aided Nehemiah to repair the walls of Jerus (Neh 3 10).

HAUNT, hōnt, hānt: The vb. in OE was simply "to resort to," "frequent"; a place of dwelling or of business was a haunt. The noun occurs in 1 S 23 22 as the tr of reghel, "foot," "See his place where his haunt is," RVm "Heb 'foot'"; the vb. is the tr of yāshabh, "to sit down," "to dwell" (Ezk 26 17, "on all that haunt it," RV "dwelt there," m "inhabited her"), and of hālakh, "to go," or "live" (1 S 30 31, "all the places where David himself and his men were wont to haunt").

HAURAN, hō'ran (הורן), haurān; LXX Αὐρανία, Aurantia, also with aspirate: A province of Eastern Pal which, in Ezk 47 16, 18,

1. Extent stretched from Dan in the N. to Gilead in the S., including all that lay between the Jordan and the desert. It thus covered the districts now known as el-Jedūr, el-Jaulān, and el-Haurān.

It corresponded roughly with the jurisdiction of the modern Turkish governor of Hauran. The Aurantites of later times answered more closely to the Hauran of today.

The name Haurān probably means "hollow land." Between Jebel ed-Druze (see BASHAN, MOUNT OF) on the E., and Jedūa and

2. Modern Hauran Jaulān (see GOLAN) on the W., runs a broad vale, from Jebel el 'Aswad in the N., to the Yarmuk in the S.W., and the open desert in the S.E. It is from 1,500 to 2,000 ft. above sea-level, and almost 50 miles in length, by 45 in breadth. Haurān aptly describes it. To the modern Haurān are reckoned 3 districts, clearly distinguished in local

3. En-Nukrah speech: (1) En-Nukrah, "the cavity." This district touches the desert in the S.E., the low range of ez Zumleh on the S.W., Jaulān on the W., el-Lejā on the N. and Jebel ed-Druze on the E. The soil, composed of volcanic detritus, is extraordinarily rich. Here and there may be found a bank of vines; but the country is practically treeless: the characteristic product is wheat, and in its cultivation the village population is almost wholly occupied. (2) El-Lejā, "the asylum." This is a rocky

4. El-Lejā tract lying to the N. of en-Nukrah. It is entirely volcanic, and takes, roughly, the form of a triangle, with apex in the N. at el Burak, and a base of almost 20 miles in the S. For the general characteristics of this district, see TRACHONITIS. Its sharply marked border, where the rocky edges fall into the surrounding plain, have suggested to some the thought that here we have hebbel 'argōbh, "the measured lot of Argob." See, however, ARGOB. There is little land capable of cultivation, and the Arabs who occupy the greater part have an evil reputation. As a refuge for the hunted and for fugitives from justice it well deserves its name. (3) El-Jebel, "the mountain."

This is the great volcanic range which 5. El-Jebel stands on the edge of the desert, protecting the fertile reaches of el-Haurān from encroachment by the sand, known at different times as Mons Asaldamus, Jebel Haurān, and Jebel ed-Druze. This last is the name it bears today in consequence of the settlement of Druzes here, after the massacre in Mt. Lebanon in 1860. Those free-spirited people have been a thorn in the side of the

Turks ever since: and whether or not the recent operations against them (January, 1911) will result in their entire subjugation, remains to be seen. The western slopes of the mountain are well cultivated, and very fruitful; vineyards abound; and there are large reaches of shady woodlands. Sal-khad, marking the eastern boundary of the land of Israel, stands on the ridge of the mountain to the S. Jebel el-Kuleib in which the range culminates, reaches a height of 5,730 ft. Jebel Haurān is named in the Mish (Rōsh ha-shānāh, ii.4) as one of the heights from which fire-signals were flashed, announcing the advent of the new year. For its history see BASHAN. The ruins which are so plentiful in the country date for the most part from the early Christian centuries; and probably nothing above ground is older than the Rom period. The substructions, however, and the subterranean dwellings found in different parts, e.g. at Der'ah, may be very ancient. The latest mention of a Christian building is in an inscription found by the present writer at el-Kufr, which tells of the foundation of a church in 720 AD (PEFS, July, 1895, p. 275, Inscr no. 150). A good account of Hauran and its cities is given in HGHL, XXIX, 611. W. EWING

HAVE, hav: "To have" is to own or possess; its various uses may be resolved into this, its proper meaning.

A few of the many changes in RV are, for "a man that hath friends" (Prov 18 24), "maketh many friends," m "Heb a man of friends"; for "all that I have" (Lk 15 31), "all that is mine"; for "we have peace with God" (Rom 5 1) ERV has "let us have," m "some authorities read we have," ARV as AVm "many ancient authorities read let us have"; for "what great conflict I have" (Col 2 1), "how greatly I strive"; for "will have" (Mt 9 13; 12 7), "desire"; 27 43, "desireth"; for "would have" (Mk 6 19; Acts 10 10), "desired"; 16 27, "was about"; 19 30, "was minded to"; 23 28, "desiring"; He 12 17, "desired to"; for "ye have" (He 10 34), ERV has "ye yourselves have," m "ye have your own selves," ARV "ye have for yourselves," m "many ancient authorities read, ye have your own selves for a better possession" (cf Lk 9 25; 21 19); "having heard" for "after that ye heard" (Eph 1 13); "having suffered before," for "even after that we had suffered" (1 Thess 2 2); "and thus, having," for "so after he had" (He 6 15). HAVEN, hā'v'n ([1] חֹף, hōph [Gen 49 13, RVm "beach"; Jgs 5 17, RVm "shore," AV "seashore," AVm "port"]; elsewhere "sea-shore" [Dt 1 7; Josh 9 1; Jer 47 7] or "sea coast" [Ezk 25 16]; from root חָפַף, hāphaph, "to wash" or "to lave"; cf Arab. حَفَّ, haffa, "to rub"; and حَفَّاف, haffaf,

"border"; حَفُوف, Hufuf, in Eastern Arabia; [2] חֹף, māhōz [Ps 107 30]; [3] λιμήν, limēn [Acts 27 12 bis]; also Fair Havens, καλοὶ λιμένες, kaloi limēnes [Acts 27 8]: While the Gr limēn is "harbor," the Heb hōph is primarily "shore." There is no harbor worthy of the name on the shore of Pal S. of Haifa. Indeed there is no good natural harbor on the whole coast of Syria and Pal. The promontories of Carmel, Beirūt and Tripolis afford shelter from the prevalent southwest wind, but offer no refuge from the fury of a northern gale. On rocky shores there are inlets which will protect sail boats at most times, but the ships of the ancients were beached in rough weather, and small craft are so treated at the present time. HAVENS, hā'v'nz, FAIR. See FAIR HAVENS.

HAVILAH, hav'i-lā (חַוִּילָה, ḥavīlāh; Ḥavīlā, Hevilā):

(1) Son of Cush (Gen 10 7; 1 Ch 1 9).
(2) Son of Yoktan, descendant of Shem (Gen 10 29; 1 Ch 1 23).

(3) Mentioned with Shur as one of the limits of the territory of the Ishmaelites (Gen 25 18); of the same limits of the land of the Amalekites (1 S 15 7), where, however, the text is doubtful. It is described (Gen 2 11.12) as bounded by the river Pishon and as being rich in gold, bdellium and "shoham-stone" (EV "onyx"). The shoham-stone was perhaps the Assyr santu, probably the malachite or turquoise. The mention of a Cushite Havilah is explained by the fact that the Arabian tribes at an early time migrated to the coast of Africa. The context of Gen 10 7 thus favors a situation on the Ethiopian shore, and the name is perhaps preserved in the kolpos Aualites and in the tribe Abalilai on the S. side of the straits of Bab-el-Mandeb. Or possibly a trace of the name appears in the classical Aualis, now Zeila in Somaliland. But its occurrence among the Yoktanite Arabs (Gen 10 29) suggests a location in Arabia. South Arabian inscriptions mention a district of Khulan (Hulan), and a place of this name is found both in Tihama and S.E. of San'a'. Again Strabo's Chaulotatoi and Huwaila in Bahrein point to a district on the Arabian shore of the Pers Gulf. No exact identification has yet been made.

HAVOC, hav'ok: "Devastation," "to make havoc of" is the tr of λυμαινομαι, lumainomai, "to stain," "to disgrace"; in the NT "to injure," "destroy" (Acts 8 3, "As for Saul he made havoc of the church," RV "laid waste"; 1 Macc 7 7, "what havoc," RV "all the havoc," exolothreusis, "utter destruction").

RV has "made havoc of" (portheō) for "destroyed" (Acts 9 21; Gal 1 23), for "wasted" (Gal 1 13).

HAVVAH, hav'a (חַוְוָה, ḥavvāh): Heb spelling, rendered Eve, "mother of all living," Gen 3 20 RVm. See EVE.

HAVVOTH-JAIR, hav-oth-jā'ir (חֻצוֹת יַיִר, ḥavvōth yā'ir, "the encampments" or "tent villages of Jair"; AV Havoth-Jair, hā-voth-jā'ir): The word ḥavvōth occurs only in this combination (Nu 32 41; Dt 3 14; Jgs 10 4), and is a legacy from the nomadic stage of Heb life. Jair had thirty sons who possessed thirty "cities," and these are identified with Havvoth-jair in Jgs 10 3 ff. The district was in Gilead (ver 5; Nu 32 41). In Dt 3 13 f, it is identified with Bashan and Argob; but in 1 K 4 13, "the towns of Jair" are said to be in Gilead; while to him also "pertained the region of Argob, which is in Bashan, threescore great cities with walls and brazen bars." There is evident confusion here. If we follow Jgs 10 3 ff, we may find a useful clue in ver 5. Kamon is named as the burial place of Jair. This probably corresponds to Kamun taken by Antiochus III, on his march from Pella to Gephyron (Polyb. v.70, 12). Schumacher (Northern 'Ajlūn, 137) found two places to the W. of Irbid with the names Kamm and Kumeim (the latter a diminutive of the former) with ancient ruins. Kamm probably represents the Heb Kāmōn, so that Havvoth-jair should most likely be sought in this district, i.e. in North Gilead, between the Jordan valley and Jebel es-Zumleh.

HAWK, hōk (חָ, nā; Ḥapē, hīrāx, and ḡlāzē, glāz; Lat Accipiter nisus): A bird of prey of the genus accipiter. Large hawks were numerous in Pal. The largest were 2 ft. long, have flat heads, hooked beaks, strong talons and eyes appearing the keenest and most comprehensive of any bird. They can sail the length or breadth of the Holy Land many times a day. It is a fact worth knowing that mist and clouds interfere with the vision of birds and they hide, and hungry and silent wait for fair weather, so you will see them sailing and soaring on clear days only. These large hawks and the glede are of eagle-like nature, nesting on Carmel and on the hills of Galilee, in large trees and on mountain crags. They flock near Beersheba, and live in untold numbers in the wilderness of the Dead Sea. They build a crude nest of sticks and twigs and carry most of the food alive to their young. Of course they were among the birds of prey that swarm over the fresh offal from slaughter and sacrifice. No bird steers with its tail in flight in a more pronounced manner than the hawk. These large birds are all-the-year residents, for which reason no doubt the people distinguished them from smaller families that migrated. They knew the kite that Isaiah mentioned in predicting the fall of Edom. With them the smaller, brighter-colored kestrels, that flocked over the rocky shores of the Dead Sea and over the ruins of deserted cities, seemed to be closest in appearance to the birds we include in the general term "falcon." They ate mice, insects and small birds, but not carrion. The abomination lists of Lev 11 16 and Dt 14 15 each include hawks in a general term and specify several species as unfit for food. Job 39 26 reads:

"Is it by thy wisdom that the hawk soareth,
And stretcheth her wings toward the south?"

Aside from calling attention to the miraculous flight, this might refer to migration, or to the wonderful soaring exhibitions of these birds. See GLEDE; KITE; NIGHT HAWK; FALCON.

HAZAEI, ha-zā'el, hē'za-el, haz'a-el (חַזְאֵי, ḥazā'el and ḥazāh'el; Ḥazā'el, Ḥazā'el; Assyr haza'ilu): Comes first into Bib. history as a high officer in the service of Ben-hadad II, king of Syria (2 K 8 7 ff; cf 1 K 19 15 ff). He had been sent by his sick sovereign to inquire of the prophet Elisha, who was then in Damascus, whether he should recover of his sickness or not. He took with him a present "even of every

1. In Bib-lical History good thing of Damascus, forty camels' burden," and stood before the man of God with his master's question of life or death. To it Elisha made the oracular response, "Go, say unto him, Thou shalt surely recover; howbeit Jeh hath showed me that he shall surely die." Elisha looked stedfastly at Hazael and wept, explaining to the incredulous officer that he was to be the perpetrator of horrible cruelties against the children of Israel: "Their strongholds wilt thou set on fire, and their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash in pieces their little ones, and rip up their women with child" (2 K 8 12). Hazael protested against the very thought of such things, but Elisha assured him that Jeh had shown him that he was to be king of Syria. No sooner had Hazael delivered to his master the answer of the man of God than the treacherous purpose took shape in his heart to hasten Ben-hadad's end, and "He took the coverlet, and dipped it in water, and spread it on his face, so that he died; and Hazael reigned in his stead" (2 K 8 15). The reign which opened under such sinister auspices proved long and successful, and brought the kingdom of Syria to the zenith of its power. Hazael soon found occasion to invade Israel. It was at Ramoth-gilead, which had already been the scene of a fierce conflict between Israel and Syria when Ahab met his death, that Hazael encountered Joram, the king of Israel, with whom his kinsman, Ahaziah, king of Judah, had joined forces to retain that important fortress which had been recovered from the Syrians (2 K 9 14, 15). The final issue of the battle is not recorded, but Joram received wounds which obliged him to return across the Jordan to Jezreel, leaving the forces of Israel in command of Jehu, whose anointing by Elisha's deputy at Ramoth-gilead, usurpation of the throne of Israel; slaughter of Joram, Ahaziah and Jezebel, and vengeance upon the whole house of Ahab are told in rapid and tragic succession by the sacred historian (2 K 9, 10).

Whatever was the issue of this attack upon Ramoth-gilead, it was not long before Hazael laid waste the whole country E. of the Jordan—"all the land of Gilead, the Gadites, and the Reubenites, and the Manassites, from Aroer, which is by the valley of the Arnon, even Gilead and Bashan" (2 K 10 33; cf Am 1 3). Nor did Judah escape the heavy hand of the Syrian oppressor. Marching southward through the plain of Esdraelon, and following a route along the maritime plain taken by many conquerors before and since, Hazael fought against Gath and took it, and then "set his face to go up to Jerus" (2 K 12 17). As other kings of Judah had to do with other conquerors, Jehoash, who was now on the throne, bought off the invader with the gold and the treasures of temple and palace, and Hazael withdrew his forces from Jerus.

Israel, however, still suffered at the hands of Hazael and Ben-hadad, his son, and the sacred historian mentions that Hazael oppressed Israel all the days of Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu. So grievous was the oppression of the Syrians that Hazael "left not to Jehoahaz of the people save fifty horsemen, and ten chariots, and ten thousand footmen; for the king of Syria destroyed them, and made them like the dust in threshing" (2 K 13 1-7). Forty or fifty years later Amos, in the opening of his prophecy, recalled those Syrian campaigns against Israel when he predicted vengeance that was to come upon Damascus. "Thus saith Jeh . . . I will send a fire into the house of Hazael, and it shall devour the palaces of Ben-hadad" (Am 1 3, 4).

Already, however, the power of Syria had passed its meridian and had begun to decline. Events of which there is no express record in the Bib. narrative were proceeding which, ere long, made

2. In the Monuments it possible for the son of Jehoahaz, Joash or Jehoash, to retrieve the honor of Israel and recover the cities that had been lost (2 K 13 25). For the full record of these events we must turn to the Assyrian annals preserved in the monuments. We do read in the sacred history that Jeh gave Israel "a saviour, so that they went out from under the hand of the Syrians" (2 K 13 5). The annals of the Assyrian kings give us clearly and distinctly the interpretation of this enigmatic saying. The relief that came to Israel was due to the crippling of the power of Syria by the aggression of Assyria upon the lands of the West. From the Black Obelisk in the British Museum, on which Shalmaneser II (860-825 BC) has inscribed the story of the campaign he carried on during his long reign, there are instructive notices of this period of Israel's history. In the 18th year of his reign (842 BC), Shalmaneser made war against Hazael. On the Obelisk the record is short, but a longer account is given on one of the pavement slabs from Nimroud, the ancient Kalah. It is as follows: "In the 18th year of my reign for the 18th time I crossed the Euphrates. Hazael of Damascus trusted to the strength of his armies and mustered his troops in full force. Senir (Hermon), a mountain summit which is in front of Lebanon, he made his stronghold. I fought with him; his defeat I accomplished; 600 of his soldiers with weapons I laid low; 1,121 of his chariots, 470 of his horses, with his camp I took from him. To save his life, he retreated; I pursued him; in Damascus, his royal city, I shut him up. His plantations I cut down. As far as the mountains of the Hauran I marched. Cities without number I wrecked, razed, and burnt with fire. Their spoil beyond count I carried away. As far as the mountains of Baal-Rosh, which is a headland of the sea [at the mouth of the Nahr el-Kelb, Dog River], I marched; my royal likeness I there set up. At that time I received the tribute of the Syrians and Sidonians and of Yahus [Jehu] the son of Khumri [Omri]" (Ball, Light from the East, 166; Schrader, COT, 200 f). From this inscription we gather that Shalmaneser did not succeed in the capture of Damascus. But it still remained an object of ambition to Assyria, and Ramman-nirari III, the grandson of Shalmaneser, succeeded in capturing it, and reduced it to subjection. It was this monarch who was "the saviour" whom God raised up to deliver Israel from the hand of Syria. Then it became possible for Israel under Jehoash to recover the cities he had lost, but by this time Hazael had died and Ben-hadad, his son, Ben-hadad III, called Mari on the monuments, had become king in his stead (2 K 13 24, 25).

HAZAI'AH, ha-zā'ya (חַזַּיָּאֵה, hāzāyāh, "Jah sees"): Among the inhabitants of Jerus mentioned in the list of Judahites in Neh 11 5.

HAZAR, hā'zār (חָצָר, hāṣār, constr. of חָצָר, hāṣār, "an inclosure," "settlement," or "village"): Is frequently the first element in Heb place-names.

Hazar-addar (Heb hāṣār 'addār), a place on the southern boundary of Judah (Nu 34 4), is probably identical with Hazron (Josh 15 3), which, in this case, however, is separated from Addar (AV "Adar"). It seems to have lain somewhere to the S.W. of Kadesh-barnea.

Hazar-enan (Heb hāṣār 'ēnān, "village of springs": 'ēnān is Aram.; once [Ezk 47 17] it is called Enon), a place, unidentified, at 2. Hazar-enan the junction of the northern and eastern frontiers of the land promised to Israel (Nu 34 9 f; cf Ezk 47 17; 48 1). To identify it with the sources of the Orontes seems to leave too great a gap between this and the places named to the S. Buhl (GAP, 66 f) would draw the northern boundary from Nahr el-Kāsimīyeh to the foot of Hermon, and would locate Hazar-enan at Bāniās. The springs there lend fitness to the name; a condition absent from el-Hāṣār, farther east, suggested by von Kesteren. But there is no certainty.

Hazar-gaddah (Heb hāḡar-gaddāh), a place in the territory of Judah "toward the border of Edom in the South" (Josh 15 21.27).

3. Hazar-gaddah Onom (s.v. "Gadda") places it in the uttermost parts of the Daroma, overlooking the Dead Sea. This might point to the site of Masada, or to the remarkable ruins of Umm Bajjak farther south (GAP, 185).

Hazar-hatticon (RV HAZER-HATTICON; Heb hāḡer ha-tikhōn, "the middle village"), a place named on the ideal border of Israel

4. Hazar-hatticon (Ezk 47 16). The context shows that it is identical with Hazar-enan, for which this is apparently another name. Possibly, however, it is due to a scribal error.

Hazarmaveth (Heb hāḡarmāweth), the name of a son of Joktan attached to a clan or district in South Arabia (Gen 10 26; 1 Ch 1

5. Hazar-maveth Hadramaut, a broad and fruitful valley running nearly parallel with the coast for about 100 miles, north of el-Yemen. The ruins and inscriptions found by Glaser show that it was once the home of a great civilization, the capital being Sabata (Gen 10 7) (Glaser, Skizze, II, 20, 423 ff).

Hazar-shual (Heb hāḡar shū'al), a place in the S. of Judah (Josh 15 28) assigned to Simeon (Josh 19 3; 1 Ch 4 28). It was re-

6. Hazar-shual Sa'weh on a hill E. of Beersheba has been suggested; but there is no certainty.

Hazar-susah (Heb hāḡar sūṣāh, Josh 19 5), Hazar-susim (Heb hāḡar sūṣīm, 1 Ch 4 31). As it stands, the name means "station of a

7. Hazar-susah mare" or "of horses," and it occurs along with Beth-marcaboth, "place of chariots," which might suggest depots for trade in chariots and horses. The sites have not been identified. W. EWING

HAZAZON-TAMAR, has'a-zan-tā'mar (חֲצִצְרֹן תְּמָר, hāḡāḡōn tāmār; AV Hazezon Tamar): "Hazezon of the palm trees," mentioned (Gen 14 7) as a place of the Amorites, conquered, together with En-mishpat and the country of the Amalekites, by Chedorlaomer; in 2 Ch 20 2 it is identified with EN-GEDI (q.v.); and if so, it must have been its older name. If this identification be accepted, then Hazezon may survive in the name Wādī Husdāh, N.W. of Ain Jidy. Another suggestion, which certainly meets the needs of the narrative better, is that Hazezon-tamar is the Thamara of OS (85 3; 210 86), the Θαμάρω, Thamarō, of Ptol. xvi.3. The ruin Kurnub, 20 miles W.S.W. of the S. end of the Dead Sea—on the road from Hebron to Elath—is supposed to mark this site.

HAZERIM, ha-zē'rim, haz'ēr-im (חֲצִרִים, hāḡērīm): Is rendered in AV (Dt 2 23) as the name of a place in the S.W. of Pal, in which dwelt the Avvim, ancient inhabitants of the land. The word means "villages," and ought to be tr^d as in RV. The sentence means that the Avvim dwelt in villages—not in fortified towns—before the coming of the Caphtorim, the Philis, who destroyed them.

HAZEROTH, ha-zē'rōth, haz'ēr-oth (חֲצִרֹת, hāḡērōth, "inclosures"): A camp of the Israelites, the 3d from Sinai (Nu 11 35; 12 16; 33 17; Dt 1 1). It is identified with Ain Haḡrah ("spring of the inclosure"), 30 miles N.E. of Jebel Musa, on the way to the 'Arābāh. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

HAZEON-TAMAR, haz'ē-zon-tā'mar (חֲצִצְרֹן תְּמָר, hāḡāḡōn tāmār, Gen 14 7 AV; חֲצִצְרֹן תְּמָר, hāḡāḡōn tāmār, 2 Ch 20 2). See HAZAZON-TAMAR.

HAZIEL, hā'zi-el (חֲזִיֵּל, hāzī'el, "God sees"): A Levite of the sons of Shimei, of David's time (1 Ch 23 9).

HAZO, hā'zō (חֲזֹ, hāzō, fifth son of Nahor [Gen 22 22]): Possibly the eponym of a Nahorite family or clan.

HAZOR, hā'zor (חֲצֹר, hāḡōr; נַחֲשֹׁר, Nasōr, נַחֲשֹׁר, Nasōr, 1 Macc 11 67):

(1) The royal city of Jabin (Josh 11 1), which, before the Israelite conquest, seems to have been the seat of a wide authority (ver 11). It was taken by Joshua, who exterminated the inhabitants, and it was the only city in that region which he destroyed by fire (vs 11-13). At a later time the Jabin Dynasty appears to have recovered power and restored the city (Jgs 4 2). The heavy defeat of their army at the hands of Deborah and Barak led to their final downfall (vs 23 ff). It was in the territory allotted to Naphtali (Josh 19 36). Hazor was one of the cities for the fortification of which Solomon raised a levy (1 K 9 15). Along with other cities in Galilee, it was taken by Tiglath-pileser III (2 K 15 29). In the plain of Hazor, Jonathan the Maccabee gained a great victory over Demetrius (1 Macc 11 67 ff). In Tob 1 2 it is called "Asher" (LXX Ἀσέρ, Asēr), and Kedesh is said to be "above" it. Jos (Ant, V, v, 1) says that Hazor was situated over the lake, Semechonitis, which he evidently identifies with the Waters of Merom (Josh 11 13). It must clearly be sought on the heights W. of el-Hūleh. Several identifications have been suggested, but no certain conclusion can be reached. Some (Wilson and Guérin) favor Tell Harreh to the S.E. of Kedes, where there are extensive ruins. Robinson thought of Tell Khureibeh, 2½ miles S. of Kedes, where, however, there are no ruins. We may take it as certain that the ancient name of Hazor is preserved in Merj el-Haḡīreh, S.W. of Kedes, and N. of Wādī 'Ūba, and in Jebel Haḡīreh, E. of the Merj, although it has evidently drifted from the original site, as names have so often done in Pal. Conder suggests a possible identification with Hazzur, farther S., "at the foot of the chain of Upper Galilee . . . in a position more appropriate to the use of the chariots that belonged to the king of Hazor" (HDB, s.v.).

(2) A town, unidentified, in the S. of Judah (Josh 15 23).

(3) A town in the S. of Judah (Josh 15 25). See KERIOTH-HEZRON.

(4) A town in Benjamin (Neh 11 33) now represented by Khīrbet Hazzūr, not far to the E. of Neby Samwīl.

(5) An unidentified place in Arabia, smitten by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 49 28.33). W. EWING

HAZOR-HADATTAH, hā'zor-ha-dat'a (Aram. חֲצֹר הַדַּתָּא, hāḡōr hādattāh, "New Hazor"): "An Aram. adj., however, in this region is so strange that the reading must be questioned" (Di). One of the "uttermost cities . . . of Judah toward the border of Edom" (Josh 15 25). Eusebius and Jerome describe a "New Hazor" to the E. of Ascalon, but this is too far N.

HAZZELELPONI, haz-e-lel-pō'nī (הַצֵּלְלֹנִי, hazzēllepōnī): A feminine name occurring in the list of the genealogy of Judah (1 Ch 4 3); probably representing a clan.

HE, hā (ה): The fifth letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as h. It came also to be used for the number 5. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

HEAD, hed (רֹאשׁ, rō'sh, Aram. רִשָּׁא, rē'sh, and in special sense רִשְׁתָּא, gulgōleth, lit. "skull," "cut-off head" [1 Ch 10 10], whence Golgotha [Mt 27 33; Mk 15 22; Jn 19 17]; מְרִאשָּׁה, m'ra'shāh, lit. "head-rest," "pillow," "bolster" [1 K 19 6]; קֶדֶד, kodhēdōd, lit. crown of the head [Dt 28 35; 33 16.20; 2 S 14 25; Isa 3 17; Jer 48 45]; בָּרָזֶל, barzel, "the head of an axe" [Dt 19 5, RVm "iron"; 2 K 6 5]; לִהְבֵּה, lehābhāh, לִהְבֵּה, lahēbheth, "the head of a spear" [1 S 17 7]; κεφαλή, kephalē): The first-mentioned Heb word and its Aram. form are found frequently in their literal as well as metaphorical sense. We may distinguish the following meanings:

By a slight extension of meaning, "head" occasionally stands for the person itself. This is the case in all passages where evil is said to return or to be required

1. Used of Men upon the head of a person (see below).

The word is also used in connection with the serpent's head (Gen 3 15), the head of the sacrificial ram, bullock and goat (Ex 29 10.15.19; Lev 4 4.24), the head of leviathan (Job 41 7 [Heb 40 31]).

It is used also as representing the top or summit of a thing, as the capital of a column or pillar (Ex 36 38; 38 28; 2 Ch 3 15); of mountains (Ex 19 20; Nu 21 20; Jgs 9 7; Am 1 2; 9 3); of a scepter

3. The Head-Piece (Est 5 2); of a ladder (Gen 28 12); of a tower (Gen 11 4).

As a fourth meaning the word occurs (Prov 8 23; Eccl 3 11; Isa 41 4) in the sense of beginning of months (Ex 12 2), of rivers (Gen 2 10), of streets or roads (Isa 51 20; Ezk 16 25; 21 21).

4. Beginning, Source, Origin As a leader, prince, chief, chieftain, captain (or as an adj., with the meaning of foremost, uppermost), originally: "he that stands at the head"; cf "God is with us at our head" (2 Ch 13 12); "Knowest thou that Jeh will take away thy master from thy head?" (2 K 2 3); "head-stone," RV "top stone," i.e. the uppermost stone (Zec 4 7). Israel is called the head of nations (Dt 28 13); "The head [capital] of Syria is Damascus, and the head [prince] of Damascus is Rezin" (Isa 7 8); "heads of their fathers' houses," i.e. elders of the clans (Ex 6 14); cf "heads of tribes" (Dt 1 15), also "captain," lit. head (Nu 14 4; Dt 1 15; 1 Ch 11 42; Neh 9 17). The phrase "head and tail" (Isa 9 14; 19 15) is explained by the rabbis as meaning the nobles and the commons among the people; cf "palm-branch and rush" (9 14), "hair of the feet . . . and beard" (7 20), but cf also Isa 9 15. In the NT we find the remarkable statement of Christ being "the head of the church" (Eph 1 22; 5 23),

"head of every man" (1 Cor 11 3), "head of all principality and power" (Col 2 10), "head of the body, the church" (Col 1 18; cf Eph 4 15). The context of 1 Cor 11 3 is very instructive to a true understanding of this expression: "I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God" (cf Eph 5 23). Here, clearly, reference is had to the lordship of Christ over His church, not to the oneness of Christ and His church, while in Eph 4 16 the dependence of the church upon Christ is spoken of. These passages should not therefore be pressed to include the idea of Christ being the intellectual center, the brain of His people, from whence the members are passively governed, for to the Jewish mind the heart was the seat of the intellect, not the head. See HEART.

As the head is the most essential part of physical man, calamity and blessing are said to come upon the head of a person (Gen 49 26; Dt 31). For this reason hands are placed upon the head of a person on which blessings are being invoked (Gen 48 14.17.18; Mt 19 15) and upon the sacrificial animal upon which sins are laid (Ex 29 15; Lev 1 4; 4 29.33). Responsibility for a deed is also said to rest on the head of the doer (2 S 1 16; 3 29; 1 K 8 32; Ps 7 16; Acts 18 6). The Bible teaches us to return good for evil (Mt 5 44), or in the very idiomatic Heb style, to "heap coals of fire upon [the] head" of the adversary (Prov 25 22; Rom 12 20). This phrase is dark as to its origin, but quite clear as to its meaning and application (cf Rom 12 17.19.21). The Jew was inclined to swear by his head (Mt 5 36), as the modern Oriental swears by his beard. The head is said to be under a vow (Nu 6 18.19; Acts 18 18; 21 23), because the Nazirite vow could readily be recognized by the head.

6. Various Uses 33 16; Jgs 9 57; 1 S 25 39; 2 Ch 6 23; Ezk 9 10; 11 21; 16 43; 23

There are numerous idiomatic expressions connected with the head, of which we enumerate the following: "the hoary head" designates old age (see HAIR); "to round the corners of the head," etc (Lev 19 27; cf also Dt 14 1; Am 8 10), probably refers to the shaving of the side locks or the whole scalp among heathen nations, which was often done in idolatrous shrines or in token of initiation into the service of an idol. It was therefore forbidden to Israel, and its rigid observance gave rise to the peculiar Jewish custom of wearing long side locks (see HAIR). "Anointing the head" (Ps 23 5; 92 10; He 1 9) was a sign of joy and hospitality, while the "covering of the head" (2 S 15 30; Est 6 12; Jer 14 3), "putting the hand upon the head" (2 S 13 19) and putting earth, dust or ashes upon it (Josh 7 6; 1 S 4 12; 2 S 1 2; 13 19; Lam 2 10; cf Am 2 7) were expressive of sadness, grief, deep shame and mourning. In Est 7 8 Haman's face is covered as a condemned criminal, or as one who has been utterly put to shame, and who has nothing more to say for his life.

In this connection the Pauline injunction as to the veiling of women in the public gatherings of the Christians (1 Cor 11 5), while men were instructed to appear bareheaded, must be mentioned. This is diametrically opposed to the Jewish custom, according to which men wore the head covered by the talith or prayer shawl, while women were considered sufficiently covered by their long hair (1 Cor 11 15). The apostle here simply commends a Gr custom for the congregation residing among Gr populations; in other words, he recommends obedience to local standards of decency and good order.

"To bruise the head" (Gen 3 15) means to injure gravely; "to smite through the head" (Ps 68 21) is synonymous with complete destruction. "To shake or wag the head" (Ps 22 7; 44 14; 64 8; Jer 18 16; 48 27; Lam 2 15; Mt 27 39; Mk 15 29) conveys the meaning of open derision and contempt. "To bow down the head" (Isa 58 5) indicates humility, sadness and mourning, but it may also be a mere pretense for piety (Sir 19 26).

HEADBAND, hed'band. See DRESS.

HEADDRESS, hed'dres. See DRESS.

HEADSTONE, hed'stōn. See CORNER-STONE.

HEADSTRONG, hed'strong. See HEADY.

HEADTIRE, hed'tir. See BONNET; DRESS.

HEADY, hed'i: The tr in AV of προπητής, propētēs, "falling forward," trop. "prone," "ready to do anything," "precipitate," "headlong" (2 Tim 3 4, "heady, high-minded," etc, RV "headstrong"; in Acts 19 36, the only other place in the NT where propētēs occurs, AV has "rashly," RV "rash"). "Headstrong" signifies strong in the head or the mind, and heady, full of one's own head" (Crabb, Eng. Synonymes). "Heady confidence promises victory without contest" (Johnson).

HEAL, hēl (שָׁף, rāphā; θεραπεύω, therapeuō, ἰάομαι, idomai, διασώζω, diasōzō): The Eng. word is connected with the AS hælan, and is used in several senses: (1) Lit., in its meaning of making whole or well, as in Eccl 3 3. In this way it occurs in prayers for restoration to health (Nu 12 13; Ps 6 2; Jer 17 14); and also in declarations as to God's power to restore to health (Dt 32 39; 2 K 20 5-8). (2) Metaphorically it is applied to the restoration of the soul to spiritual health and to the repair of the injuries caused by sin (Ps 41 4; Jer 30 17). (3) The restoration and deliverance of the afflicted land is expressed by it in 2 Ch 7 14; Isa 19 22. (4) It is applied to the forgiveness of sin (Jer 3 22).

In the NT, therapeuō is used 10 t in describing Our Lord's miracles, and is tr^d "heal." Idomai is used to express spiritual healing (Mt 13 15; Lk 5 17; Jn 12 40), and also of curing bodily disease (Jn 4 47). Diasōzō, meaning "to heal thoroughly," is used in Lk 7 3 AV where RV renders it "save." The act of healing is called tasis twice, in Acts 4 22:30; sōzō, to save or deliver, is tr^d "made whole" by RV in Mk 5 23; Lk 8 36; Acts 14 9, but is "healed" in AV. Conversely "made whole" AV in Mt 15 28 is replaced by "healed" in RV.

Healed is used 33 t in the OT as the rendering of the same Heb word, and in the same variety of senses. It is also used of purification for an offence or breach of the ceremonial law (2 Ch 30 20); and to express the purification of water which had caused disease (2 K 2 21.22). Figuratively the expression "healed slightly" (ERV "lightly") is used to describe the futile efforts of the false prophets and priests to remedy the backsliding of Israel (Jer 6 14; 8 11); here the word for "slightly" is the contemptuous term, kālal, which means despicably or insignificantly. In Ezk 30 21, the word "healed" is the rendering of the feminine passive part., r-phū'āh and is better tr^d in RV "apply healing medicines." In the NT "healed" usually occurs in connection with the miracles of Our Lord and the apostles. Here it is worthy of note that St. Luke more frequently uses the vb. idomai than therapeuō, in the proportion of 17:4, while in Mt and Mk the proportion is 4:8.

Healer (שָׂרֵף, hābhash) occurs once in Isa 3 7; the word lit. means a "wrapper up" or "bandager."

ALEX. MACALISTER

HEALING, hēl'ing (מְרַפֵּא, marpē, מְרַפְּא, t'ālāh, מְרַפֵּא, kēhāh): In the OT this word is always used in its figurative sense; marpē, which lit. means "a cure," is used in Jer 14 19 twice, and in Mal 4 2; t'ālāh, which lit. means "an irrigation canal," here means something applied externally, as a plaster, in which sense it is used metaphorically in Jer 30 13; kēhāh occurs only in Nah 3 19 AV and is tr^d "assuagings" in RV.

In the NT 5 t the vb. is therapeuō; once (Acts 10 38) idomai; in the other passages it is either tama, as in 1 Cor 12 9-30, or tasis, as in Acts 4 22, derivatives from this vb.

HEALING, GIFTS OF (χαρίσματα ἰαμάτων, charismata iamōtōn): Among the "spiritual gifts" enumerated in 1 Cor 12 4-11.28 are included "gifts of healings." See SPIRITUAL GIFTS. The subject has risen into much prominence of recent years, and so calls for separate treatment. The points to be considered are: (1) the NT facts, (2) the nature of the gifts, (3) their permanence in the church.

The Gospels abundantly show that the ministry of Christ Himself was one of healing no less than of teaching (cf Mk 1 14 f with vs 32-34).

1. The NT When He sent forth the Twelve (Mk Facts 6 7.13) and the Seventy (Lk 10 1.9), it was not only to preach the Kingdom of God but to heal the sick. The unauthentic conclusion of Mark's Gospel, if it does not preserve words actually used by Christ Himself, bears witness at all events to the traditional belief of the early church that after His departure from the world His disciples would still possess the gift of healing. The Book of Acts furnishes plentiful evidence of the exercise of this gift by apostles and other prominent men in the primitive church (Acts 3 7 f; 5 12-16; 8 7; 19 12; 28 8 f), and the Ep. of Jas refers to a ministry of healing carried on by the elders of a local church acting in their collective capacity (Jas 5 14 f). But Paul in this passage speaks of "gifts of healings" (the pl. "healings" apparently refers to the variety of ailments that were cured) as being distributed along with other spiritual gifts among the ordinary members of the church. There were men, it would seem, who occupied no official position in the community, and who might not otherwise be distinguished among their fellow-members, on whom this special charisma of healing had been bestowed.

On this subject the NT furnishes no direct information, but it supplies evidence from which conclusions may be drawn. We notice

2. The that the exercise of the gift is ordina-Nature of rily conditional on the faith of the the Gifts recipient of the blessing (Mk 6 5.6; 10 52; Acts 14 9)—faith not only in God but in the human agent (Acts 3 4 ff; 5 15; 9 17). The healer himself is a person of great faith (Mt 17 19 f), while his power of inspiring the patient with confidence points to the possession of a strong, magnetic personality. The diseases cured appear for the most part to have been not organic but functional; and many of them would now be classed as nervous disorders. The conclusion from these data is that the gifts of healing to which Paul alludes were not miraculous endowments, but natural therapeutic faculties raised to their highest power by Christian faith.

Modern psychology, by its revelation of the marvels of the subliminal self or subconscious mind and the power of "suggestion," shows how it is possible for one man to lay his hand on the very springs of personal life in another, and so discloses the psychical basis of the gift of healing. The medical science of our time, by its recognition of the dependence of the physical upon the spiritual, of the control of the bodily functions by the subconscious self, and of the physician's ability by means of suggestion, whether waking or hypnotic, to influence the subconscious soul and set free the healing powers of Nature, provides the physiological basis. And may we not add that many incontestable cases of Christian faith-cure (take as a type the well-known instance in which Luther at Weimar "tore Melancthon," as the latter put it, "out of the very jaws of death"; see RE, XII, 520) furnish the religious basis, and prove that faith in God, working through the soul upon the body, is the mightiest of all healing influences, and that one who by his own faith and sympathy and force of personality can stir up faith in others may exercise by God's blessing the power of healing diseases?

There is abundant evidence that in the early centuries the gifts of healing were still claimed and practised within the church (Justin, Apol. ii.6; Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. ii.32, 4; Tertullian, Apol. xxiii; Origen, Contra Celsum, vii.4). The free exercise of these gifts gradually ceased, partly, no doubt, through loss of the early faith and spirituality, but partly through the growth of an ascetic temper which ignored Christ's gospel for the body and tended to the view that pain and sickness are the indispensable ministers of His gospel for the soul. All down the history of the church, however, there have been notable personalities (e.g. Francis of Assisi, Luther, Wesley) and little societies of earnest Christians (e.g. the Waldenses, the early Moravians and Quakers) who have reasserted Christ's gospel on its physical side as a gospel for sickness no less than for sin, and claimed for the gift of healing the place Paul assigned to it among the gifts of the Spirit. In recent years the subject of Christian healing has risen into importance outside of the regularly organized churches through the activity of various faith-healing movements. That the leaders of these movements have laid hold of a truth at once Scriptural and scientific there can be little doubt, though they have usually combined it with what we regard as a mistaken hostility to the ordinary practice of medicine. It is worth remembering that with all his faith in the spiritual gift of healing and personal experience of its power, Paul chose Luke the physician as the companion of his later journeys; and worth noticing that Luke shared with the apostle the honors showered upon the missionaries by the people of Melita whom they had cured of their diseases (Acts 28 10). Upon the modern church there seems to lie the duty of reaffirming the reality and permanence of the primitive gift of healing, while relating it to the scientific practice of medicine as another power ordained of God, and its natural ally in the task of diffusing the Christian gospel of health.

HEALTH, helth (שָׁלוֹם, shālôm, יְשׁוּעָה, y'shu'ah, רִפְאוּם, riph'ûh, רִפְיָה, 'arūkhāh; ἰατρολογία, sōlōria, ὑγιαίνω, hugiainō): Shālôm is part of the formal salutation still common in Pal. In this sense it is used in Gen 43 28; 2 S 20 9; the stem word means "peace," and is used in many varieties of expression relating to security, success and good bodily health. Y'shu'ah, which specifically means deliverance or help, occurs in the refrain of Ps 42 11; 43 5, as well as in Ps 67 2; in ARV it is rendered "help." Riph'ûh is lit. "healing," and is found only in Prov 3 8. Marpe' also means healing of the body, but is used in a figurative sense as of promoting soundness of mind and moral character in Prov 4 22; 12 18; 13 17; 16 24, as also in Jer 8 15, where RV renders it "healing." 'Arūkhāh is also used in the same figurative sense in Isa 58 8; Jer 8 22; 30 17; 33 6; lit. means "repairing or restoring"; it is the word used of the repair of the wall of Jerus by Nehemiah (ch 4).

The word "health" occurs twice in the NT: in Paul's appeal to his shipmates to take food (Acts 27 34), he says it is for their sōlōria, lit. "safety"; so ARV, AV "health." The vb. hugiainō is used in 3 Jn ver 2, in the apostle's salutation to Gaius.

HEAP, hēp (הָפַח, 'drēmāh, גָּל, gal, נֶדֶח, nēḥ, תֵּל, tēl): "Heap" appears (1) in the simple sense of a gathering or pile, as the tr of 'drēmāh, a "heap," in Ruth 3 7 of grain; Neh 4 2 of stones; in 2 Ch 31 6, etc., of the tithes, etc.; of hōmer (boiling up), a "heap"; in Ex 8 14 of frogs; of gal, a "heap"; in Job 8 17 of stones. (2) As indicating "ruin," "waste," gal (2 K 19 25; Job 15 28; Isa 25 2; 37 26; Jer 9 11; 51 37); m'ṭ (Isa 17 1); ṭ (Ps 79 1; Jer 26 18; Mic 1 6; 3 12); tēl, "mound," "hillock," "heap" (Dt 13 16; Josh 8 28; Jer 30 18 AV; 49 2). (3) Of waters, nēḥ, "heap," "pile" (Ex 15 8; Josh 3 13.16; Ps 33 7; 78 13); hōmer (Hab 3 15, "the heap of mighty waters," RVm "surge"). (4) A cairn, or heap of stones (a) over the dead body of a dishonored person, gal (Josh 7 26; 8 29; 2 S 18 17); (b) as a witness or boundary-heap (Gen 31 46 f, Gal'ād [Galeed] in Heb, also micpāh, "watch tower," Y'ghar-Sāhādūthā [Jegar-sahadutha] in Aram., both words meaning "the heap of witness"; see Gen 31 47.49 RV). (5) As a way mark, tamarūrim, from tāmar, "to stand erect" (Jer 31 21 AV, "Set thee up waymarks, make thee high heaps," RV "guide-posts," a more likely tr).

"To heap" represents various single words: hāḥāh, "to take," "to take hold of," with one exception, applied to fire or burning coals (Prov 25 22, "Thou wilt heap coals of fire upon his head," "Thou wilt take coals of fire [and heap them] on his head"); gāḥāh, "to add" (Dt 32 23); cāḥar, "to heap up" (Hab 1 10); kāḥac, "to press together" (with the fingers or hand) (Hab 3 5); rāḥāh, "to multiply" (Ezek 24 10); epišōrēdō, "to heap up upon" (2 Tim 4 3, they "will heap to themselves teachers after their own lusts"); sōrēdō, "to heap up" (Rom 12 20, "Thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head"); hāḥaurisō, "to lay up" (as treasure) (Jas 5 3 AV, "Ye have heaped treasure together," RV "laid up"); cāḥar, "to heap up," "to heap" or "store up" (Job 27 16, "silver"; Ps 39 6, "riches"; Zec 9 3, "silver"); sām, "to place," "set," "put" (Job 38 13 AV, "The hypocrites in heart heap up wrath," RV "They that are godless in heart lay up anger"). In Jgs 15 16 we have hāmōr, hāmōrōthāyim, "with the jawbone of an ass, heaps upon heaps," RVm "heap, two heaps"; one of Samson's sayings; hāmōr means "an ass," hōmer "a heap."

For "heap up words" (Job 16 4), RV has "join together"; for "shall be a heap" (Isa 17 11), "fleeth away," m "shall be a heap"; "heap" for "number" (Nah 3 3); ERV "heap of stones" for "sling," m as AV and ARV (Prov 26 8); "in one heap" for "upon a heap" (Josh 3 16); "he heapeth up [dust]" for "they shall heap" (Hab 1 10).

HEART, hārt (לֵב, lēbh, לִבָּב, lēbhābh; καρδία, kardia): The different senses in which the word occurs in the OT and the NT may be grouped under the following heads:

It represents in the first place the bodily organ, and by easy transition those experiences which affect or are affected by the body.

1. Various Meanings Fear, love, courage, anger, joy, sorrow, hatred are always ascribed to the heart—esp. in the OT; thus courage for which usually rūḥ is used (Ps 27 14); joy (Ps 4 7); anger (Dt 19 6, "while his heart is hot," lēbhābh); fear (1 S 25 37); sorrow (Ps 13 2), etc.

Hence naturally it came to stand for the man himself (Dt 7 17; "say in thine heart," Isa 14 13).

As representing the man himself, it was considered to be the seat of the emotions and passions and appetites (Gen 18 5; Lev 19 17; Ps 104 15), and embraced likewise the intellectual and moral faculties—though these are necessarily ascribed to the "soul" as well. This distinction is not always observed.

"Soul" in Heb can never be rendered by "heart"; nor can "heart" be considered as a synonym for "soul." Cremer has well observed:

3. Soul and Heart "The Heb nephesh ("soul") is never tr^d kardia ("heart"). . . . The range of the Heb nephesh, to which the Gr psuchē alone corresponds, differs so widely from the ideas connected with psuchē, that utter confusion would have ensued had psuchē been employed in an unlimited degree for lēbh ("heart"). The Bib. lēbh never, like psuchē, denotes the personal subject, nor could it do so. That which in classical Gr is ascribed to psuchē [a good soul, a just soul, etc] is in the Bible ascribed to the heart alone and cannot be otherwise" (Cremer, Lexicon, art. "Kardia," 437 ff, German ed.).

In the heart vital action is centered (1 K 21 7). "Heart," except as a bodily organ, is never ascribed to animals, as is the case sometimes with nephesh and rūḥ (Lev 17 11, nephesh; Gen 2 19; Nu 16 22; Gen 7 22, rūḥ). "Heart" is thus often used interchangeably with these two (Gen 41 8; Ps 86 4; 119 20); but "it never denotes the personal subject, always the personal organ."

As the central organ in the body, forming a focus for its vital action, it has come to stand for the center of its moral, spiritual, intellectual life. "In particular the heart and mind is the place in which the process of self-consciousness is carried out, in which the soul is at home with itself, and is conscious of all its doing and suffering as its own" (Oehler). Hence it is that men of "courage" are called "men of the heart"; that the Lord is said to speak "in his heart" (Gen 8 21); that men "know in their own heart" (Dt 8 5); that "no one considereth in his heart" (Isa 44 19 AV). "Heart," in this connection is sometimes rendered "mind," as in Nu 16 28 ("of mine own mind," Vulg ex proprio corde, LXX ap' emautou); the foolish "is void of understanding," i.e. "heart," (Prov 6 32, where the LXX renders phrenōn, Vulg cordis, Luther "der ist ein Narr"). God is represented as "searching the heart" and "trying the reins" (Jer 17 10 AV). Thus "heart" comes to stand for "conscience," for which there is no word in Heb, as in Job 27 6, "My heart shall not reproach me," or in 1 S 24 5, "David's heart smote him"; cf 1 S 25 31. From this it appears, in the words of Owen: "The heart in Scripture is variously used, sometimes for the mind and understanding, sometimes for the will, sometimes for the affections, sometimes for the conscience, sometimes for the whole soul. Generally, it denotes the whole soul of man and all the faculties of it, not absolutely, but as they are all one principle of moral operations, as they all concur in our doing of good and evil."

The radical corruption of human nature is clearly taught in Scripture and brought into connection with the heart. It is "uncircumcised"

6. Figurative Senses (Jer 9 26; Ezk 44 7; cf Acts 7 51); and "hardened" (Ex 4 21); "wicked" (Prov 26 23); "perverse" (Prov 11 20); "godless" (Job 36 13); "deceitful and desperately wicked" (Jer 17 9 AV). It defiles the whole man (Mt 15 19.20); resists, as in the case of Pharaoh, the repeated call of God (Ex 7 13).

There, however, the law of God is written (Rom 2 15); there the work of grace is wrought (Acts 15 9), for the "heart" may be "renewed" by grace (Ezk 36 26), because the "heart" is the seat of sin (Gen 6 5; 8 21).

This process of heart-renewal is indicated in various ways. It is the removal of a "stony heart" (Ezk 11 19). The heart becomes "clean" (Ps 51 10); "fixed" (Ps 112 7) through "the fear" of the Lord (ver 1); "With the heart man believeth" (Rom 10 10); on the "heart" the power of God is exercised for renewal (Jer 31 33). To God the bereaved apostles pray as a knower of the heart (Acts 1 24—a word not known to classical writers, found only here in the NT and in Acts 15 8, kardiognōstēs). In the "heart" God's Spirit dwells with might (Eph 3 16, eis tōn esō anthrōpon); in the "heart" God's love is poured forth (Rom 5 5). The Spirit of His son has been "sent forth into the heart" (Gal 4 6); the "earnest of the Spirit" has been given "in the heart" (2 Cor 1 22). In the work of grace, therefore, the heart occupies a position almost unique.

We might also refer here to the command, on which both the OT and NT revelation of love is based: "Thou shalt love Jeh thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might" (Dt 6 5); where "heart" always takes the first place, and is the term which in the NT rendering remains unchanged (cf Mt 22 37; Mk 12 30.33; Lk 10 27, where "heart" always takes precedence).

A bare reference may be made to the employment of the term for that which is innermost, hidden, deepest in anything (Ex 15 8; Jon 2 3), the very center of things. For "Deep-est" This we find in all languages. Cf Eph 3 16.17, "in the inward man," as above. J. I. MARAIS

HEARTH, hārth: Occurs 7 t in AV: Gen 18 6; Ps 102 3; Isa 30 14; Jer 36 22.23 bis; Zec 12 6; 4 t in RV: Lev 6 9; Isa 30 14; Ezk 43 15.16 ("altar hearth"); cf also Isa 29 1 RVm. It will be noted that the renderings of the two VSS agree in only one passage (Isa 30 14).

(1) The hearth in case of a tent was nothing more than a depression in the ground in which fire was kindled for cooking or for warmth. Cakes were baked, after the fashion of Gen 18 6, in the ashes or upon hot stones. In this passage, however, there is nothing in the Heb corresponding to AV "on the hearth." In the poorer class of houses also the hearth consisted of such a depression, of varying dimensions, in the middle or in one corner of the room. There was no chimney for the smoke, which escaped as it could, or through a latticed opening for the purpose (the "chimney" of Hos 13 3). While the nature of the hearth is thus clear enough, more or less uncertainty attaches to specific terms used in the Heb. In Isa 30 14 the expression means simply "that which is kindled," referring to the bed of live coals. From this same vb. (yāḥadh, "be kindled") are formed the nouns mōḥādāh (Ps 102 3 [Heb 4]) and mōḥ-dhāh (Lev 6 9 [Heb 2]), which might, according to their formation, mean either the material kindled or the place where a fire is kindled. Hence the various renderings, "firebrand," "hearth," etc. Moreover in Lev 6 9[2] the termination -dh of mōḥ-dhāh may be taken as the pronominal suffix, "its"; hence RVm "on its firewood."

(2) Two other terms have reference to heating in the better class of houses. In Jer 36 22.23 the word ('āh) means a "brazier" of burning coals, with which Jehoiakim's "winter house" was heated. The same purpose was served by the "pan (kīyyōr) of fire" of Zec 12 6 RV, apparently a wide, shallow vessel otherwise used for cooking (1 S 2 14, EV "pan"), or as a wash basin (cf Ex 30 18; 1 K 7 38, etc, "laver").

(3) Another class of passages is referred to the signification "altar hearth," which seems to have been a term applied to the top of the altar of burnt offering. The mōkdhāh of Lev 6 9 [2], though related by derivation to the words discussed under (1) above, belongs here (cf also Ecclus 50 12, "by the hearth of the altar," παρ' ἐσχάρῃ βωμοῦ, par' eschāra bōmōi). Again in Ezekiel's description of the altar of the restored temple (43 15,16), he designates the top of the altar by a special term (RVm ariel), which is by most understood to mean "altar hearth" (so RV). With this may be compared the symbolical name given to Jerus (Isa 29 1), and variously explained as "lion [or lioness] of God," or "hearth of God."

HEARTILY, hār'ti-li: Occurs (Col 3 23) as the tr of ἐκ ψυχῆς, ek psuchēs, "out of the soul." "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily as unto the Lord [who sees the heart and recompenses 'whatsoever good thing a man does'] and not unto men" (however they, your masters according to the flesh, may regard it); RV "work heartily," m "Gr from the soul."

In 2 Macc 4 37, we have "Antiochus was heartily sorry," psuchikōs ("from the soul").

Mt 20 12; see MIRAGE): The heat of the summer is greatly dreaded in Pal, and as a rule the people rest under cover during the middle of the day, when the sun is hottest. There is no rain from May to October, and scarcely a cloud in the sky to cool the air or to screen off the burning vertical rays of the sun. The first word of advice given to visitors to the country is to protect themselves from the sun. Even on the mountains, where the temperature of the air is lower, the sun is perhaps more fierce, owing to the lesser density of the atmosphere.

This continuous summer heat often causes sunstroke, and the glare causes diseases of the eye which affect a large percentage of the people of Pal and Egypt.

2. Causes Disease It is to be expected that in these times of heat and drought the ideal pleasure has come to be to sit in the shade by some cool flowing fountain. In the mountains the village which has the coolest spring of water is the most desired. These

3. Relief Sought considerations give renewed meaning to the passages: "as cold waters to a thirsty soul" (Prov 25 25); "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside still waters" (Psa 23 2). What a blessing to be "under the shadow of the Almighty" (Psa 91 1), where "the sun shall not strike upon them, nor any heat" (Rev 7 16)!

The middle of the day is often referred to as the "heat of the day" (1 S 11 11). It made a great difference to the army whether it

4. Midday Heat could win the battle before the midday heat. Saladin won the great battle at Hattin by taking advantage of this fact. It was a particular time of the day when it was the custom to rest. "They came about the heat of the day to the house of Ish-bosheth, as he took his rest at noon" (2 S 4 5). Jeh appeared to Abraham as "he sat in the tent door in the heat of the day" (Gen 18 1). The hardship of working throughout the day is expressed in Mt 20 12, "who have borne the burden of the day and scorching heat." Sometimes just after sunrise the contrast of the cold of night and the heat of the sun is esp. noticeable. "The sun ariseth with the scorching wind" (Jas 1 11).

In summer the wind is usually from the S.W., but in case it is from the S. it is sure to be hot.

"When ye see a south wind blowing, ye say, There will be a scorching heat" (Lk 12 55). The heat on a damp, sultry day, when the atmosphere is full of dust haze is esp. oppressive, and is referred to in Isa 25 5 as "the heat by the shade of a cloud." The heat of summer melts the snow on the mountains and causes all vegetation to dry up and wither. Ice and snow vanish in the heat thereof (Job 6 17), "Drought and heat consume the snow waters" (Job 24 19). But the "tree planted by the waters, that spreadeth out its roots by the river . . . shall not fear when heat cometh, but its leaf shall be green" (Jer 17 8).

The word is used often in connection with anger in the Scriptures: "hot anger" (Ex 11 8); "hot displeasure" (Dt 9 19); "anger of the 6. Figurative Uses Lord was hot against Israel" (Jgs 2 14 AV); "thine anger from waxing hot" (Psa 85 3 AVm); "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot" (Rev 3 15).

HEAVENLY, hev'n-li (οὐράνιος, ouránios, ἐπουράνιος, epouránios): Pertaining to heaven or the heavens. See HEAVENS. The phrase ἐπουράνια, tr^d "heavenly things" in Jn 3 12; He 8 5; 9 23, but in Eph "heavenly places" (1 3,20; 2 6; 3 10; 6 12), has shades of meaning defined by the context. In Jn 3 12, in contrast with "earthly things" (i.e. such as can be brought to the test of experience), it denotes truths known only through revelation (God's love in salvation). In He the sense is local. In Eph it denotes the sphere of spiritual privilege in Christ, save in 6 12, where it stands for the unseen spiritual world, in which both good and evil forces operate. It is always the sphere of the super-earthly. JAMES ORR

HEAVENS, hev'ns (שָׁמַיִם, shāmayim; οὐρανοί, ouranot): On the physical heavens see ASTRONOMY; WORLD. Above these, in popular conception, were the celestial heavens, the abode of God and of the hosts of angels (Psa 11 4; 103 19-21; Isa 66 1; Rev 4 2; 5 11; cf Dnl 7 10), though it was recognized that Jeh's presence was not confined to any region (1 K 8 27). Later Judaism reckoned seven heavens. The apostle Paul speaks of himself as caught up into "the third heaven," which he evidently identifies with Paradise (2 Cor 12 2). See HEAVENLY.

9. A Purified Universe

The formal conception of new heavens and a new earth occurs in Isa 65 17; 66 22; 2 Pet 3 13;

1. Escha- The idea in substance is also found in logical Idea Isa 51 16; Mt 19 28; 2 Cor 5 17; He 12 26-28. In each case the reference is eschatological, indeed the adj.

"new" seems to have acquired in this and other connections a semi-technical eschatological sense. It must be remembered that the OT has no single word for "universe," and that the phrase "heaven and earth" serves to supply the deficiency. The promise of a new heavens and a new earth is therefore equivalent to a promise of world renewal.

It is a debated question how old in the history of revelation this promise is. Isaiah is the prophet

2. Earliest explicit form, and that in passages National which many critics would assign to the Type post-exilic period (the so-called Triton-Isaiah). In general, until recently, the trend of criticism has been to represent the universalistic-cosmic type of eschatology as developed out of the particularistic-national type by a gradual process of widening of the horizon of prophecy, a view which would put the emergence of the former at a comparatively late date. More recently, however, Gressmann (Der Ursprung der israelitisch-jüdischen Eschatologie, 1905) and others have endeavored to show that often even prophecies belonging to the latter type embody material and employ means of expression which presuppose acquaintance with the idea of a world-catastrophe at the end. On this view the world-eschatology would have, from ancient times, existed alongside of the more narrowly confined outlook, and would be even older than the latter. These writers further assume that the cosmic eschatology was not indigenous among the Hebrews, but of oriental (Bab) origin, a theory which they apply not only to the more developed system of the later apocalyptic writings, but also to its preformations in the OT. The cosmic eschatology is not believed to have been the distinctive property of the great ethical prophets, but rather a commonly current mythological belief to which the prophets refer without

3. Different formally endorsing it. Its central from Myth- thought is said to have been the belief logical that the end of the world-process must Theory correspond to the beginning, that consequently the original condition of things, when heaven and earth were new, must repeat itself at some future point, and the state of paradise with its concomitants return, a belief supposed to have rested on certain astronomical observations.

While this theory in the form presented is unproven and unacceptable, it deserves credit for having focused attention on certain

4. Antiquity phenomena in the OT which clearly of Cosmical show that Messianic prophecy, and Conception particularly the world-embracing scope which it assumes in some predictions, is far older than modern criticism had been willing to concede. The OT from the beginning has an eschatology and puts the eschatological promise on the broadest racial basis (Gen 3). It does not first ascend from Israel to the new humanity, but at the very outset takes its point of departure in the race and from this descends to the election of Israel, always keeping the universalistic goal in clear view. Also in the earliest accounts, already elements of a cosmical universalism find their place side by side with those of a racial kind, as when Nature is represented as sharing in the consequences of the fall of man.

As regards the antiquity of the universalistic and cosmical eschatology, therefore, the conclusions of these writers may be registered as a

5. The Cos- gain, while on the two other points of mical De- the pagan origin and the unethical pendent on character of the expectation involved, the Ethico- dissent from them should be expressed.
Religious According to the OT, the whole idea of world-renewal is of strictly supernatural origin, and in it the cosmical follows the ethical hope. The cosmical eschatology is simply the correlate of the fundamental Bib. principle that the issues of the world-process depend on the ethico-religious developments in the history of man (cf 2 Pet 3 13).

But the end correspondent to the beginning is likewise a true Scriptural principle, which the theory in question has helped to reemphasize,

6. The End although there is this difference, that Correspond- Scripture does not look forward to a ent to the repetition of the same process, but to a Beginning restoration of the primeval harmony on a higher plane such as precludes all further disturbance. In the passages above cited, there are clear reminiscences of the account of creation (Isa 51 16, "that I may plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth"; 65 17, "I create new heavens and a new earth"; 2 Pet 3 13 compared with vs 4-6; Rev 21 1 compared with the imagery of paradise throughout the chapter). Besides this, where the thought of the renewal of earth is met with in older prophecy, this is depicted in colors of the state of paradise (Isa 11 6-9; Hos 2 18-21). The "regeneration" (palingenesis) of Mt 19 28 also points back to the first genesis of the world. The 'inhabited earth to come' (oikouménē mellousa) of He 2 5 occurs at the opening of a context throughout which the account of Gen 1-3 evidently stood before the writer's mind.

In the combination "new heavens and a new earth," the term "heavens" must therefore be taken

7. The story of creation, where "heavens"
Cosmical designates not the celestial habitation Heavens: of God, but the cosmical heavens, the
He 12: region of the supernal waters, sun
26-29 moon and stars. The Bible nowhere suggests that there is anything abnormal or requiring renewal in God's dwelling-place (He 9 23 is of a different import). In Rev 21, where "the new heaven and the new earth" appear, it is at the same time stated that the new Jerus comes down from God out of heaven (cf vs 1.2.10). In He 12 26-28 also the implication is that only the lower heavens are subject to renewal. The "shaking" that accompanies the new covenant and corresponds to the shaking of the law-giving at Sinai, is a shaking of "not the earth only, but also the heaven." This shaking, in its reference to heaven as well as to earth, signifies a removal of the things shaken. But from the things thus shaken and removed (including heaven), the writer distinguishes "those things which are not shaken," which are destined to remain, and these are identified with the kingdom of God. The kingdom of God, however, according to the general trend of the teaching of the epistle, has its center in the heavenly world. The words "that have been made," in ver 27, do not assign their created character as the reason why heaven and earth can be shaken, an exegesis which would involve us in the difficulty that among that which remains there is something uncreated besides God; the true construction and correct paraphrase are: "as of things that were made with the thought in the mind of God that those things which cannot be shaken may remain," i.e. already at creation God contemplated an unchangeable universe as the ultimate, higher state of things.

In Mt 19 28 the term palingenesia marks the world-renewing as the renewal of an abnormal state of things. The Scripture teaching,

8. Palin- therefore, is that around the center of genesis: God's heaven, which is not subject Mt 19:28 to deterioration or renewal, a new cosmical heaven and a new earth will be established to be the dwelling-place of the eschatological humanity. The light in which the promise thus appears reminds us that the renewed kosmos, earth as well as cosmical heavens, is destined to play a permanent (not merely provisional, on the principle of chiliasm) part in the future life of the people of God. This is in entire harmony with the prevailing Bib. representation, not only in the OT but likewise in the NT (cf Mt 5 5; He 2 5), although in the Fourth Gospel and in the Pauline Epp. the emphasis is to such an extent thrown on the heaven-centered character of the future life that the rôle to be played in it by the renewed earth recedes into the background. Rev., on the other hand, recognizes this element in its imagery of "the new Jerus" coming down from God out of heaven upon earth.

That the new heavens and the new earth are represented as the result of a "creation" does not necessarily involve a production ex

9. A Puri- nilo. The terms employed in 2 Pet fied Uni- 3 6-13 seem rather to imply that the verse renewal will out of the old produce a purified universe, whence also the catastrophe is compared to that of the Deluge. As then the old world perished by water and the present world arose out of the flood, so in the end-crisis "the heavens shall be dissolved by fire and the elements melt with fervent heat," to give rise to the new heaven and the new earth in which righteousness dwells. The term palingenesia (Mt 19 28) points to renewal, not to creation de novo. The Talm also teaches that the world will pass through a process of purification, although at the same time it seems to break up the continuity between this and the coming world by the phantastic assumption that the new heavens and the new earth of Isa 65 17 were created at the close of the Hexameron of Gen 1. This was inferred from the occurrence of the article in Isa 66 22, "the new heavens and the new earth."

Heaviness has always the sense of anxiety, sorrow, grief, etc; d'āghāh, "fear," "dread," "anxious care" (Prov 12 25, "Heaviness in the heart of a man maketh it stoop," RVm "or care"); kēhāh, "to be feeble," "weak" (Isa 61 3, "the spirit of heaviness"); pānīm, "face," "aspect" (Job 9 27 AV, "I will leave off my heaviness," RV "[sad] countenance"; cf 2 Esd 5 16; Wisd 17 4; Eccles 25 23); ta'ānīyāh, from ānāh, "to groan," "to sigh" (Isa 29 2, RV "mourning and lamentation"); tūghāh, "sadness," "sorrow" (Ps 119 28; Prov 10 1; 14 13); ta'ānūth, "affliction of one's self," "fasting" (Ezr 9 5, RV "humiliation," m "fasting"); kāthēphēia, "dejection," "sorrow" (lit. "of the eyes") (Jas 4 9, "your joy [turned] to heaviness"); lupē, "grief" (Rom 9 2, RV "great sorrow"; 2 Cor 2 1, RV "sorrow"); lupēomai (1 Pet 1 6, RV "put to grief"); for nūsh, "to be sick," "feeble" (Ps 69 20, RVm "sore sick"), and adēmoneō (Phil 2 26 RV "sore troubled"), AV has "full of heaviness." "Heaviness," in the sense of sorrow, sadness, occurs in 2 Esd 10 7. 8.24; Tob 2 5; lupē (Eccles 22 4, RV "grief"; 30 21, "Give not thy soul to heaviness," RV "sorrow"; 1 Macc 6 4); lupēd (Eccles 30 9, RV "will grieve thee"; pénthos (1 Macc 3 51, etc).

RV has "heavier work" for "more work" (Ex 5 9); "heavy upon men" for "common among men" (Ecc 6 1); for "were heavy laden" (Isa 46 1), "are made a load"; for "the burden thereof is heavy" (Isa 30 27), "in thick rising smoke."

HEBER, hē'bēr (הֶבֶר, hebher, "associate" or, possibly, "enchanter"; Ἑβερ, ēber): A name occurring several times in the OT as the name of an individual or of a clan.

(1) A member of the tribe of Asher and son of Beraiah (Gen 46 17; Nu 26 45; 1 Ch 7 31 f).

(2) A Kenite, husband of Jael, who deceptively slew Sisera, captain of the army of Jabin, a Canaanite king (Jgs 4 17; 5 24). He had separated himself from the main body of the Kenites, which accounts for his tent being near Kedesh, the place of Sisera's disastrous battle (Jgs 4 11).

(3) Head of a clan of Judah, and son of Mered by his Jewish, as distinguished from an Egypt. wife. He was father, or founder, of Soco (1 Ch 4 18).

(4) A Benjamite, or clan or family of Elpaal belonging to Benjamin (1 Ch 8 17).

(5) Heber, of Our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3 35 AV), better, Eber.

So, the name "Eber," עֵבֶר, ēbher, in 1 Ch 5 13; 8 22, is not to be confused with Heber, הֶבֶר, hebher, as in the foregoing passages.

EDWARD BAGBY POLLARD

HEBERITES, hē'bēr-its (הֵיבֶרִי, ha-hebhri): Descendants of Heber, a prominent clan of Asher, (Nu 26 45). Supposed by some to be connected with the Ḥabiri of the Am Tab.

HEBREW, hē'brōō, HEBREWESS, hē'brōō-es (עִבְרִי, ibhri, fem. עִבְרִיָּה, ibhriyah; Ἑβραῖος, Hebraios): The earliest name for Abraham (Gen 14 13) and his descendants (Joseph, Gen 39 14. 17; 40 15; 41 12; 43 32; Israelites in Egypt, Ex 1 15; 2 6.11.13; 3 18; in laws, Ex 21 2; Dt 15 12; in history, 1 S 4 6.9; 13 7.19, etc; later, Jer 34 9, "Hebrewess," 14; Jon 1 9; in the NT, Acts 6 1; 2 Cor 11 22; Phil 3 5). The etymology of the word is disputed. It may be derived from Eber (Gen 10 21.24.25, etc), or, as some think, from the vb. עָבַר, 'abhar, "to cross over" (people from across the Euphrates; cf Josh 24 2). A connection is sought by some with the apri or epri of the Egyp monuments, and again with the Habiri of the Am Tab. In Acts 6 1, the "Hebrews" are contrasted with "Hellenists," or Gr-speaking Jews. By the "Heb" tongue in the NT (Hebraistai, Jn 5 2; 19 13.17.20; 20 16) is meant ARAMAIC (q.v.), but also in Rev 9 11; 16 16, Heb proper.

LITERATURE

I. Title.—In AV and ERV the title of this book describes it as "the Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Hebrews." Modern scholarship has disputed the applicability of every word of this title. Neither does it appear in the oldest MSS, where we find simply "to Hebrews" (pros Hebraious). This, too, seems to have been prefixed to the original writing by a collector or copyist. It is too vague and general for the author to have used it. And there is nothing in the body of the book which affirms any part of either title. Even the shorter title was an inference from the general character of the writing. Nowhere is criticism less hampered by problems of authenticity and inspiration. No question arises, at least directly, of pseudonymity either of author or of readers, for both are anonymous. For the purpose of tracing the history and interpreting the meaning of the book, the absence of a title, or of any definite historical data, is a disadvantage. We are left to infer its historical context from a few fragments of uncertain tradition, and from such general references to historical conditions as the document itself contains. Where no date, name or well-known event is fixed, it becomes impossible to decide, among many possibilities, what known historical conditions, if any, are pre-supposed. Yet this very fact, of the book's detachment from personal and historical incidents, renders it more self-contained, and its exegesis less dependent upon understanding the exact historical situation. But its general relation to the thought of its time must be taken into account if we are to understand it at all.

II. Literary Form.—The writer was evidently a man of culture, who had a masterly command of the Gr language. The theory of Clement of Alexandria, that the work was a tr from Heb, was merely an inference from the supposition that it was first addressed to Heb-speaking Christians. It bears none of the marks of a tr. It is written in pure idiomatic Gr. The writer had an intimate knowledge of the LXX, and was familiar with Jewish life. He was well-read in Hellenic lit. (e.g. Wisd), and had probably made a careful study of Philo (see VI below). His argument proceeds continuously and methodically, in general, though not strict, accord with the rules of Gr rhetoric, and without the interruptions and digressions which render Paul's arguments so hard to follow. "Where the literary skill of the author comes out is in the deft adjustment of the argumentative to the hortatory sections" (Moffatt, Intro, 424 f). He has been classed with Lk as the most "cultured" of the early Christian writers.

It has been questioned whether He is rightly called a letter at all. Unlike all Paul's letters, it opens without any personal note of address or salutation; and at the outset it sets forth, in rounded periods and in philosophical language, the central theme which is developed throughout. In this respect it resembles the Johannine writings alone in the NT. But as the argument proceeds, the personal note of application, exhortation and expostulation emerges more clearly (2 1; 3 1-12; 4 1.14; 5 11; 6 9; 10 9; 13 7); and it ends with greetings and salutations (13 18 ff). The writer calls it "a word of exhortation." The vb. episteila (RV "I have written") is the usual expression for writing a letter (13 22). Hebrews begins like an essay, proceeds like a sermon, and ends as a letter.

Deissmann, who distinguishes between a "true letter," the genuine personal message of one man to another, and an "epistle," or a treatise written in imitation of the form of a letter, but with an eye on the reading public, puts He in the latter class; nor would he "consider it anything but a literary oration—hence not as an epistle at all—if the episteila, and the greetings at the close, did not permit of the supposition that it had at one time opened with something of the nature of an address as well" (Bible Studies, 49-50). There is no textual or historical evidence of any opening address having ever stood as part of the text; nor does the opening section bear any mark or suggestion of fragmentariness, as if it had once followed such an address.

Yet the supposition that a greeting once stood at the beginning of our document is not so impossible as Zahn thinks (Intro to the NT, II, 313 f), as a comparison with Jas or 1 Pet will show.

So unusual is the phenomenon of a letter without a greeting, that among the ancients, Pantaenus had offered the explanation that Paul, out of modesty, had refrained from putting his name to a letter addressed to the Hebrews, because the Lord Himself had been apostle to them.

In recent times, Jülicher and Harnack have conjectured that the author intentionally suppressed the greeting, either from motives of prudence at a time of persecution, or because it was unnecessary, since the bearer of the letter would communicate the name of the sender to the recipients.

Fr. Overbeck advanced the more revolutionary hypothesis that the letter once opened with a greeting, but from someone other than Paul; that in order to satisfy the general conditions of canonization, the non-apostolic greeting was struck out by the Alexandrians, and the personal references in 13 22-25 added, in order to represent it as Pauline.

W. Wrede, starting from this theory, rejects the first part of it and adopts the second. He does not base his hypothesis on the conditions of canonization, but on an examination of the writing itself. He adopts Deissmann's rejected alternative, and argues that the main part of the book was originally not an epistle at all, but a general doctrinal treatise. Then ch 13, and esp. vs 18 ff, were added by a later hand, in order to represent the whole as a Pauline letter, and the book in its final form was made, after all, pseudonymous. The latter supposition is based upon an assumed reference to imprisonment in 13 19 (cf Phil 2 22) and upon the reference to Timothy in 13 23 (cf Phil 2 19); and the proof that these professed Pauline phrases are not really Pauline is found in a supposed contradiction between 13 19 and 13 23. But ver 19 does not necessarily refer to imprisonment exclusively or even at all, and therefore it stands in no contradiction with ver 23 (cf Rom 1 9-13). And Timothy must have associated with many Christian leaders besides Paul. But why should anybody who wanted to represent the letter as Pauline and who scrupled not to add to it for that purpose, refrain from the obvious device of prefixing a Pauline greeting? Moreover, it is only by the most forced special pleading that it can be maintained that chs 1-12 are a mere doctrinal treatise, devoid of all evidences of a personal relation to a circumscribed circle of readers. The period and manner of the readers' conversion are defined (2 3 f). Their present spiritual condition is described in terms of such anxiety and hope as betoken a very intimate personal relation (5 11 f; 6 9-11). Their past conflicts, temptations, endurance and triumph are recalled for their encouragement under present trials, and both past and present are defined in particular terms that point to concrete situations well known to writer and readers (10 32-36). There is, it is true, not in He the same intense and all-pervading personal note as appears in the earlier Pauline letters; the writer often loses sight of his particular audience and develops his argument in detached and abstract form. But it cannot be assumed that nothing is a letter which does not conform to the Pauline model. And the presence of long, abstract arguments does not justify the excision or explaining away of undoubted personal passages. Neither the language nor the logic of the book either demands or permits the separation of doctrinal and personal passages from one another, so as to leave for residuum a mere doctrinal treatise. Doctrinal statements lead up to personal exhortations, and personal exhortations form the transition to new arguments; they are indissolubly involved in one another; and ch 13 presents no such exceptional features as to justify its separation from the whole work. There is really no reason, but the unwarrantable assumption that an ancient writer must have conformed with a certain convention of letter-writing, to forbid the acceptance of He for what it appears to be—a defence of Christianity written for the benefit of definite readers, growing more intimate and personal as the writer gathers his argument into a practical appeal to the hearts and consciences of his readers.

3. A Unity or a Composite Writing?

III. The Author.—Certain coincidences of language and thought between this epistle and that of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians

1. Tradition justify the inference that He was known in Rome toward the end of the 1st cent. AD (cf He 11 7.31 and 1 3 ff with Clem ad Cor 9.12.36). Clement makes no explicit reference to the book or its author: the quotations are unacknowledged. But they show that He already had some authority in Rome. The same inference is supported by similarities of expression found also in the Shepherd of Hermas. The possible marks of its influence in Polycarp and Justin Martyr are too uncertain and indefinite to justify any inference. Its name does not appear in the list of NT writings compiled and acknowledged by Marcion, nor in that of the Muratorian Fragment. The latter definitely assigns letters by Paul to only seven churches, and so inferentially excludes He.

When the book emerges into the clear light of history toward the end of the 2d cent., the tradition as to its authorship is seen to divide into three different streams.

(1) In Alexandria, it was regarded as in some sense the work of Paul. Clement tells how his teacher, apparently Pantaenus, explained why Paul does not in this letter, as in others, address his readers under his name. Out of reverence for the Lord (II, 2, above) and to avoid suspicion and prejudice, he as apostle of the Gentiles refrains from addressing himself to the Hebrews as their apostle. Clement accepts this explanation, and adds to it that the original Heb of Paul's epistle had been tr'd into Gr by Luke. That Paul wrote in Heb was assumed from the tradition or inference that the letter was addressed to Aram-speaking Hebrews. Clement also had noticed the dissimilarity of its Gr from that of Paul's epistles, and thought he found a resemblance to that of Acts.

Origen starts with the same tradition, but he knew, moreover, that other churches did not accept the Alexandrian view, and that they even criticized Alexandria for admitting He into the Canon. And he feels, more than Clement, that not only the language, but the forms of thought are different from those of Paul's epp. This he tries to explain by the hypothesis that while the ideas were Paul's, they had been formulated and written down by some other disciple. He found traditions that named Luke and Clement of Rome, but who the actual writer was, Origen declares that "God alone knows."

The Pauline tradition persisted in Alexandria, and by the 4th cent. it was accepted without any of the qualifications made by Clement and Origen. It had also in the same period spread over the other eastern churches, both Gr and Syrian. But the Pauline tradition, where it is nearest the fountain-head of history, in Clement and Origen, only ascribes He to Paul in a secondary sense.

(2) In the West, the Pauline tradition failed to assert itself till the 4th cent., and was not generally accepted till the 5th cent. In Africa, another tradition prevailed, namely, that Barnabas was the author. This was the only other definite tradition of authorship that prevailed in antiquity. Tertullian, introducing a quotation of He 6 1.4-6, writes: "There is also an Ep. to the Hebrews under the name of Barnabas . . . and the Ep. of Barnabas is more generally received among the churches than that apocryphal 'Shepherd' of adulterers" (De Pudicitia, 20). Tertullian is not expressing his mere personal opinion, but quoting a tradition which had so far established itself as to appear in the title of the epistle in the MS, and he betrays no consciousness of the existence of any other tradition. Zahn infers that this view prevailed in Montanist churches and may have originated in Asia. Moffatt thinks that it had also behind it "some Rom tradition" (Intro, 437). If it was originally, or at any time, the tradition of the African churches, it gave way there to the Alexandrian view in the course of the 4th cent. A Council of Hippo in 393 reckons "thirteen epp. of the apostle Paul, and one by the same to the Hebrews." A council of Carthage in 419 reckons "fourteen epp. of the apostle Paul." By such gradual stages did the Pauline tradition establish itself.

(3) All the evidence tends to show that in Rome and the remaining churches of the West, the epistle was originally anonymous. No tradition of authorship appears before the 4th cent. And Stephen Gobarus, writing in 600, says that both Irenaeus and Hippolytus denied the Pauline authorship. Photius repeats this statement as regards Hippolytus. Neither he nor Gobarus mentions any alternative view (Zahn, Intro, II, 310). The epistle was known in Rome (to Clement) toward the end of the 1st cent., and if Paul's name, or any other, had been associated with it from the beginning, it is impossible that it could have been forgotten by the time of Hippolytus. The western churches had no reason for refusing to admit He into the Pauline and canonical list of books, except only that they did not believe it to be the work of Paul, or of any other apostle.

It seems therefore certain that the epistle first became generally known as an anonymous writing. Even the Alexandrian tradition implies as much, for it appears first as an explanation by Pantaenus why Paul concealed his name. The idea that Paul was the author was therefore an Alexandrian inference. The religious value of the epistle was naturally first recognized in Alexandria, and the name of Paul, the chief letter-writer of the church, at once occurred to those in search for its author. Two facts account for the ultimate acceptance of that view by the whole church. The spiritual value and authority of the book were seen to be too great to relegate it into the same class as the Shepherd or the Ep. of Barnabas. And the conception of the Canon developed into the hard-and-fast rule of apostolicity. No writing could be admitted into the Canon unless it had an apostle for its author; and when He could no longer be excluded, it followed that its apostolic authorship must be affirmed. The tradition already existing in Alexandria supplied the demand, and who but Paul, among the apostles, could have written it?

The Pauline theory prevailed together with the scheme of thought that made it necessary, from the 5th to the 16th cent. The Humanists and the Reformers rejected it. But it was again revived in the 17th and 18th cents., along with the recrudescence of scholastic ideas. It is clear, however, that tradition and history shed no light upon the question of the authorship of He. They neither prove nor disprove the Pauline, or any other theory.

We are therefore thrown back, in our search for the author, on such evidence as the epistle itself affords, and that is wholly inferential.

2. The Witness of the Epistle Itself It seems probable that the author was a Hellenist, a Gr-speaking Jew. He was familiar with the Scriptures of the OT and with the religious ideas and worship of the Jews. He claims the inheritance of their sacred history, traditions and institutions (1 1), and dwells on them with an intimate knowledge and enthusiasm that would be improbable, though not impossible, in a proselyte, and still more in a Christian convert from heathenism. But he knew the OT only in the LXX tr, which he follows even where it deviates from the Heb. He writes Gr with a purity of style and vocabulary to which the writings of Lk alone in the NT can be compared. His mind is imbued with that combination of Heb and Gr thought which is best known in the writings of Philo. His general typological mode of thinking, his use of the allegorical method, as well as the adoption of many terms that are most familiar in Alexandrian thought, all reveal the Hellenistic mind. Yet his fundamental conceptions are in full accord with the teaching of Paul and of the Johannine writings.

The central position assigned to Christ, the high estimate of His person, the saving significance of His death, the general trend of the ethical teaching, the writer's opposition to asceticism and his esteem for the rulers and teachers of the church, all bear out the inference that he belonged to a Christian circle dominated by Pauline ideas. The author and his readers alike were not personal disciples of Jesus, but had received the gospel from those who had heard the Lord (2 3) and who were no longer living (13 7). He had lived among his readers, and had probably been their teacher and leader; he is now separated from them but he hopes soon to return to them again (13 18 f).

Is it possible to give a name to this person?

(1) Although the Pauline tradition itself proves nothing, the internal evidence is conclusive against it. We know enough about Paul to be certain that he could not have written He, and that is all that can be said with confidence on the question of authorship. The style and language, the categories of thought and the method of argument, all differ widely from those of any writings ascribed to Paul. The latter quotes the OT from the Heb and LXX, but He only from LXX. Paul's formula of quotation is, "It is written" or "The scripture saith"; that of He, "God," or "The Holy Spirit," or "One somewhere saith." For Paul the OT is law, and stands in antithesis to the NT, but in He the OT is covenant, and is the "shadow" of the New Covenant. Paul's characteristic terms, "Christ Jesus," and "Our Lord Jesus Christ," are never found in He; and "Jesus Christ" only 3 t (10 10; 13 8), and "the Lord" (for Christ) only twice (2 3; 7 14)—phrases used by Paul over 600 t (Zahn). Paul's Christology turns around the death, resurrection and living presence of Christ in the church, that of He around His high-priestly function in heaven. Their conceptions of God differ accordingly. In He it is Judaistic-Platonic, or (in later terminology) Deistic. The revelation of the Divine Fatherhood and the consequent immanence of God in history and in the world had not possessed the author's mind as it had Paul's. Since the present world is conceived in He as a world of "shadows," God could only intervene in it by mediators.

The experience and conception of salvation are also different in these two writers. There is no evidence in He of inward conflict and conversion and of constant personal relation with Christ, which constituted the entire spiritual life of Paul. The apostle's central doctrine, that of justification by faith, does not appear in He. Faith is less the personal, mystical relation with Christ, that it is for Paul, than a general hope which lays hold of the future to overcome the present; and salvation is accomplished by cleansing, sanctification and perfection, not by justification. While Paul's mind was not uninfluenced by Hellenistic thought, as we find it in Alexandria (as, e.g. in Col and Eph), it nowhere appears in his epp. so clearly and prominently as it does in He. Moreover, the author of He was probably a member of the community to which he writes (13 18 f), but Paul never stood in quite the relation supposed here to any church. Finally, Paul could not have written He 2 3, for he emphatically declares that he did not receive his gospel from the older disciples (Gal 1 12; 2 6).

The general Christian ideas on which He was in agreement with Paul were part of the heritage which the apostle had left to all the churches. The few more particular affinities of He with certain Pauline writings (e.g. He 2 2 || Gal 3 19; He 12 22; 3 14 || Gal 4 25; He 2 10 || Rom 11 36; also with Eph; see von Soden, Hand-Commentar, 3) are easily explicable either as due to the author's reading of Paul's Epp. or as reminiscences of Pauline phrases that were current in the churches. But they are too few and slender to rest upon them any presumption against the arguments which disprove the Pauline tradition.

(2) The passage that is most conclusive against the Pauline authorship (2 3) is equally conclusive against any other apostle being the author. But almost every prominent name among the Christians of the second generation has been suggested. The epistle itself excludes Timothy (13 23), and Titus awaits his turn. Otherwise Luke, Clement of Rome, Barnabas, Silas, Apollos, Priscilla and Aquila, Philip the Deacon, and Aristion have all had their champions.

(a) The first two, Luke and Clement, were brought in through their connection with Paul. Where it was recognized that a direct Pauline authorship could not be maintained, the Pauline tradition might still be retained, if the epistle could be assigned to one of the apostle's disciples. These two were fixed upon as being well-known writers. But this very fact reveals the improbability of the theory. Similar arguments from language and thought to those derived from the comparison of He with the Pauline writings avail also in the comparison of He with the writings of Lk and Clement. Both these disciples of the apostle adhere much closer to his system of thought than He does, and they reveal none of the influences of Alexandrian thought, which is predominant in He.

(b) Of all the other persons suggested, so little is known that it is impossible to establish, with any convincing force, an argument for or against their authorship.

(a) Barnabas was a Levite of Cyprus (Acts 4 36), and once a companion of Paul (Acts 13 2 ff). Another ancient writing is called "the Epistle of Barnabas," but it has no affinity with He. The coincidence of the occurrence of the word "consolation" in Barnabas' name (Acts 4 36) and in the writer's description of He (13 22) is quite irrelevant. Tertullian's tradition is the only positive argument in favor of the Barnabas theory. It has been argued against it that Barnabas, being a Levite, could not have shown the opposition to the Levitical system, and the unfamiliarity with it (He 7 27; 9 4), which is supposed to mark our epistle. But the author's Levitical system was derived, not from the Heb OT, nor from the Jerus temple, but from Jewish tradition; and the supposed inaccuracies as to the daily sin offering (7 27), and the position of the golden altar of incense (9 4) have been traced to Jewish tradition (see Moffatt, Intro, 438). And the writer's hostility to the Levitical system is not nearly as intense as that of Paul to Pharisaism. There is nothing that renders it intrinsically impossible that Barnabas was the author, nor is anything known of him that makes it probable; and if he was, it is a mystery why the tradition was confined to Africa.

(β) Harnack has argued the probability of a joint authorship by Priscilla and Aquila. The interchange of "I" and "we" he explains as due to a dual authorship by persons intimately related, but such an interchange of the personal "I" and the epistolary "we" can be paralleled in the Epp. of Paul (e.g.

Rom) where no question of joint authorship arises. The probable relation of the author to a church in Rome may suit Priscilla and Aquila (cf Rom 16 5 with He 13 22-24), but even if this interpretation of the aforementioned passages were correct, it is possible and probable that Luke, Barnabas, Apollos, and certainly Clement, stood in a similar relation to a Rom church. Harnack, on this theory, explains the disappearance of the author's name as due to prejudice against women teachers. This is the only novel point in favor of this theory as compared with several others; and it does not explain why Aquila's name should not have been retained with the address. The evidences adduced of a feminine mind behind the epistle are highly disputable. On the other hand, a female disciple of Paul's circle would scarcely assume such authority in the church as the author of He does (13 17 f; cf 1 Cor 14 34 f). And nothing that is known of Priscilla and Aquila would suggest the culture and the familiarity with Alexandrian thought possessed by this writer. Acts 18 26 does not prove that they were expert and cultured teachers, but only that they knew and could repeat the salient points of Paul's early preaching. So unusual a phenomenon as this theory supposes demands more evidence to make it even probable. (But see Rendel Harris, Sidelights on NT Research, 148-76.)

(γ) Philip the Deacon and Aristion, "a disciple of the Lord" mentioned by Papias, are little more than names to us. No positive knowledge of either survives on which any theory can be built. It is probable that both were personal disciples of the Lord, and they could not therefore have written He 2 3.

(δ) Apollos has found favor with many scholars from Luther downward. No ancient tradition supports this theory, a fact which tells heavily against it, but not conclusively, for someone must have written the letter, and his name was actually lost to early tradition, unless it were Barnabas, and that tradition too was unknown to the vast majority of the early churches. All that is known of Apollos suits the author of He. He may have learnt the gospel from "them that heard" (2 3); he was a Jew, "an Alexandrian by race, a learned [or eloquent] man," "mighty in the Scriptures," "he powerfully confuted the Jews" (Acts 18 24 ff), and he belonged to the same Pauline circle as Timothy and Titus (1 Cor 16 10-12; Tit 3 13; cf He 13 23). The Alexandrian type of thought, the affinities with Philo, the arguments from Jewish tradition and ceremonial, the fluent style, may all have issued from "an eloquent Jew of Alexandria." But it does not follow that Apollos was the only person of this type. The author may have been a Gentile, as the purity of his Gr language and style suggests; and the combination of Gr and Heb thought, which the epistle reflects, and even Philo's terms, may have had a wide currency outside Alexandria, as for instance in the great cosmopolitan cities of Asia. All that can be said is that the author of He was someone generally like what is known of Apollos, but who he actually was, we must confess with Origen, "God alone knows."

IV. Destination.—The identity of the first readers of He is, if possible, more obscure than that of the author. It was written to Christians, and to a specific body or group of Christians (see I above). The title "to Hebrews" might mean properly Palestinian Jews who spoke the Heb language, but the fact that the epistle was written in Gr excludes that supposition. It therefore meant Christians of Jewish origin, and gives no indication of their place of residence. The title represents an early inference drawn from the contents of the document, and the tradition it embodies was unanimously accepted from the 2d cent. down to the early part of the last cent. Now, however, a considerable body of critics hold that the original readers were Gentiles. The question is entirely one of inference from the contents of the epistle itself.

The readers, like the writer, received the gospel first from "them that heard" (2 3), from the personal disciples of the Lord, but they were not of their number. They had witnessed "signs and wonders," and the Readers "manifold powers" and "gifts of the Holy Spirit" (2 4). Their conversion had been thorough, and their faith and Christian life had been of a high order. They had a sound knowledge of the first principles of Christ (6 1 ff). They had become "partakers of Christ," and had need only to "hold fast the beginning of [their] confidence firm unto the end" (3 14). They had been fruitful in good works, ministering unto the saints (6 10), enduring suffering and persecution, and sympathizing with those who were imprisoned (10 32-34). All this had been in former days which appeared now remote. Their rulers and ministers of those days are now dead (13 7). And they themselves have undergone a great change. While they should have been teachers, they have become dull of hearing, and have need again to be taught the rudiments of the first principles of the gospel (5 12), and they are in danger of a great apostasy from the faith. They need warning against "an evil heart of unbelief, in falling away from the living God" (3 12). They are become sluggish (6 12), profane like Esau (12 16), worldly-minded (13 5). Perhaps their religion was tending toward a false asceticism and outward works (13 4,9). And now that this moral dullness and spiritual indifference had fallen upon them, they are being subjected to a new test by persecution from outside (10 36; 12 4), which renders the danger of their falling away from the faith all the more imminent. The author apparently bases his claim to warn them on the fact that he had been a teacher among them, and hoped soon to return to them (13 18 f). The same might be said perhaps of Timothy (13 23). Both author and readers had friends in Italy (13 24) who were with the author when he wrote, either in Italy saluting the readers outside, or outside, saluting the readers in Italy. In all this there is little or nothing to help to fix the destination of the letter, for it might be true at some time or other of any church.

The old tradition that the readers were Jews claims some more definite support from the epistle itself. The writer assumes an intimate knowledge of the OT and of Jewish ceremonial on their part. The fathers of the Heb race are also their fathers (1 1; 3 9). The humanity that Christ assumed and redeemed is called "the seed of Abraham" (2 16). All this, however, might stand in reference to a gentile church, for the early Christians, without distinction of race, regarded themselves as the true Israel and heirs of the Heb revelation, and of all that related to it (1 Cor 10 1; Gal 3 7 ff; 4 21 ff; Rom 4 11-18). Still there is force in Zahn's argument that "Hebrews does not contain a single sentence in which it is so much as intimated that the readers became members of God's people who descended from Abraham, and heirs of the promise given to them and their forefathers, and how they became such" (Intro to NT, II, 323). Zahn further finds a direct proof in 13 13 that "both the readers and the author belong to the Jewish people," which he interprets as "meaning that the readers were to renounce fellowship with the Jewish people who had rejected Jesus, to confess the crucified Jesus, and to take upon themselves all the ignominy that Jesus met at the hands of his countrymen" (ib, 324-25). But that is too large an inference to draw from a figurative expression which need not, and probably does not, mean more than an exhortation to rely on the sacrifice of Christ, rather than upon any external rules and ceremonies. Nor were the "divers and strange teachings" about marriage and meats (13 4,9) necessarily Jewish doctrines. They might be the doctrines of an incipient Gnosticism which spread widely throughout the Christian churches, both Jewish and gentile, toward the end of the 1st cent. There is otherwise no evidence that the apostasy, of which the readers stood in danger, was into Judaism, but it was rather a general unbelief and "falling away from the living God" (3 12).

It is the whole argument of the epistle, rather than any special references, that produced the tradition, and supports the view, that the readers were Jews. The entire message of the epistle, the dominant claims of Christ and of the Christian faith, rests upon the supposition that the readers held Moses, Aaron, the Jewish priesthood, the old Covenant and the Levitical ritual, in the highest esteem. The author's argument is: You will grant the Divine authority and greatness of Moses, Aaron and the Jewish institutions: Christ is greater than they; therefore you ought to be faithful to Him. He assumes an exclusively Jewish point of view in the minds of his readers as his major premise. He could scarcely do that, if they had been Gentiles. Paul, when writing to the mixed church at Rome, relates his philosophy of the Christian revelation to both Jewish and gentile pre-Christian revelation. Gentile Christians adopted the Jewish tradition as their own in consequence of, and secondary to, their attachment to Christianity. Even Judaizing gentile Christians, such as may be supposed to have belonged to the Galatian and Corinthian churches, adopted some parts of the Jewish law only as a supplement to Christianity, but not as its basis.

Von Soden and others have argued with much reason that these Christians were not in danger of falling back into Judaism from Christianity, but rather of falling away from all faith into unbelief and materialism, like the Israelites in the wilderness (3 7 ff), or Esau (12 16). With all its references to OT sacrifice and ceremonial, the letter contains not a single warning against reviving them, nor any indications that the readers were in danger of so doing (Hand-Commentar, 12-16). But it has been too readily assumed that these facts prove that the readers were not Jews. The pressure of social influence and persecution rendered Jews and Jewish Christians, as well as gentile Christians, liable to apostatize to heathenism or irreligion (Wisd 2 10,20; 2 Macc 4, 6, 7; Philo, De Migratione Abrahami, XVI; Mt 24 10,12; Acts 20 30; 1 Cor 10 7,14; 2 Thess 2 4; 1 Jn 2 18; 5 21; Pliny Ep. X, 96). Von Soden's argument really cuts the other way. If the writer had been dealing with gentile Christians who were in danger of relapsing into heathenism or of falling into religious indifference, his argument from the shadowy and temporary glories of Judaism to the perfect salvation in Christ would avail nothing, because, for such, his premises would depend upon his conclusion. But if they were Jewish Christians, even though leaning toward heathenism, his argument is well calculated to call up on its side all the dormant force of their early religious training. He is not arguing them out of a "subtle Judaism" quickened by the zeal of a propaganda (Moffatt, Intro, 449-50), but from "drifting away" (2 1), from "neglect" (2 3), from "an evil heart of unbelief, in falling away from the living God" (3 12), from "disobedience" (4 11), from "a dullness of hearing" (5 11), but into "diligence . . . that ye be not sluggish" (6 11 f), into "boldness and patience" (10 35 f), and to "lift up the hands that hang down, and the palsied knees" (12 12); and this he might well do by his appeal to their whole religious experience, both Jewish and Christian, and to the whole religious history of their race.

The question of the locality of these "Hebrews" remains a matter for mere conjecture. Jerus, Alexandria, Rome, Antioch, Colossae, Ephesus, Berea, Ravenna and other places have been suggested. Tradition, since Clement of Alexandria, fixed on Jerus, but on the untenable ground that the letter was written to Aram-speaking Jews. The undisputed fact that it was written in Gr tells against Jerus. So does the absence of all reference to the temple ritual, and the mention of almsgiving as the chief grace of the "Hebrews" (8 10). Jerus received rather than gave alms. Nor is it likely that all the personal disciples of the Lord would have died out in Jerus (2 3). And it could not be charged against the mother church that it had produced no teachers (5 12). These points also tell with almost equal force against any Palestinian locality.

Alexandria was suggested as an alternative to Jerus, on the supposition that those references to Jewish ritual which did not correspond with the Jerus ritual (7 27; 9 4; 10 11) might refer to the temple at Leontopolis. But the ritual system of the epistle is that of the tabernacle and of tradition, and not of any temple. The Alexandrian character of the letter has bearing on the identity of the author, but not so much on that of his readers. The erroneous idea that Paul was the author arose in Alexandria, but it would have been least likely to arise where the letter was originally sent.

Rome has lately found much favor. We first learn of the existence of the letter at Rome. The phrase "they of Italy salute you" (13 24) implies that either the writer or his readers were in Italy. It may be more natural to think of the writer, with a small group of Italian friends away from home, sending greetings to Italy, than to suppose that a greeting from Italy generally was sent to a church at a distance. It is probable that a body of Jewish Christians existed in Rome, as in other large cities of the Empire. But this view does not, as von Soden thinks, explain any coincidences between He and Rom. A Rom origin might. It could explain the use of He by Clement. But the letter might also have come to Rome by Clement's time, even though it was originally sent elsewhere. The slender arguments in favor of Rome find favor chiefly because no arguments can be adduced in favor of any other place.

V. Date.—The latest date for the composition of He is clearly fixed as earlier than 96 AD by reason of its use by Clement of Rome

1. Terminal Dates about that time. There is no justification for the view that He shows dependence on Jos. The earliest date cannot be so definitely fixed. The apparent dependence of He on Paul's Epp., Gal, 1 Cor and Rom, brings it beyond 50 AD.

But we have data in the epistle itself which require a date considerably later. The readers had

2. Conversion and History of Readers been converted by personal disciples of the Lord (2 3). They did not, therefore, belong to the earliest group of Christians. But it is not necessary to suppose a long interval between the Lord's ascension and their conversion.

The disciples were scattered widely from Jerus by the persecution that followed the death of Stephen (Acts 8 1). "We may well believe that the vigorous preaching of St. Stephen would set a wave in motion which would be felt even at Rome" (Sunday, Romans, xxviii). They are not, therefore, necessarily to be described as Christians of the 2d generation in the strict chronological sense. But the letter was written a considerable time after their conversion. They have had time for great development (5 12). They have forgotten the former days after their conversion (10 32). Their early leaders are now dead (13 7). Yet the majority of the church still consists of the first converts (2 3; 10 32). And although no argument can be based upon the mention of 40 years (3 9), for it is only an incidental phrase in a quotation, yet no longer interval could lie between the founding of the church and the writing of the letter. It might be shorter. And the church may have been founded at any time from 32 to 70 AD.

The doctrinal development represented in He stands midway between the system of the later

3. Doctrinal Development Pauline Epp. (Phil, Col, Eph) and that of the Johannine writings. The diverse and strange teachings mentioned include only such ascetic tendencies about meat and marriage (13 4.9) as are reflected in Paul's Epp. early and late. There is no sign of the appearance of the full-blown heresies of the Ebionites, Docetists, and Gnostics, which became prevalent before the end of the 1st cent. On the other hand the Logos-doctrine as the interpretation of the person of Christ (1 1-4) is more fully thought out than in Paul, but less explicit, and less assimilated with the purpose of Christianity, than in the Fourth Gospel.

It has been argued that the letter must have been written before the fall of Jerus in 70 AD, because

4. The Fall of Jerusale- in writing to a Jewish community, and esp. in dealing with Jewish ritual, the writer would have referred to that event, if it had happened. This point would be relevant, if the letter had been addressed to Jerus, which is highly improbable. But, at a distance, an author so utterly unconcerned with contemporary history could easily have omitted mention of even so important a fact. For in fact the author never mentions the temple or its ritual. His system is that of the tabernacle of the OT and of Jewish tradition. The writer's interest is not in historical Judaism, and his omission to mention the great catastrophe does not prove that it had not occurred. The use of the present tense of the ritual does not imply its present continuance. "The present expresses the fact that so it is enjoined in the law, the past that with the founding of the New Covenant the old had been abolished" (Peake, Hebrews, 39).

A point of contact with contemporary history is found in the fact that Timothy was still living

5. Timothy and active when He was written (13 23), but it does not carry us far.

Timothy was a young man and already a disciple, when Paul visited Galatia on his 2d journey about 46 AD (Acts 16 1). And he may have lived to the end of the century or near to it. It cannot be safely argued from the mere mention of his name alone, that Paul and his other companions were dead.

Two incidents in the history of the readers are mentioned which afford further ground for a somewhat late date. Immediately after

6. Two Persecutions their conversion, they suffered persecution, "a great conflict of sufferings; partly, being made a gazingsstock both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly, becoming partakers with them that were so used" (He 10 32 f). And now again, when the letter is written, they are entering upon another time of similar trial, in which they "have need of patience" (10 36), though they "have not yet resisted unto blood" (12 4). Their leaders, at least, it would appear, the writer and Timothy, have also been in prison, but one is at liberty and the other expects to be soon (13 19, 23). It has been conjectured that the first persecution was that under Nero in 64 AD, and the second, that in the reign of Domitian, after 81 AD. But when it is remembered that in some part of the Empire Christians were almost always under persecution, and that the locale of these readers is very uncertain, these last criteria do not justify any dogmatizing. It is certain that the letter was written in the second half of the 1st cent. Certain general impressions, the probability that the first apostles and leaders of the church were dead, the absence of any mention of Paul, the development of Paul's theological ideas in a new medium, the disappearance of the early enthusiasm, the many and great changes that had come over the community, point strongly to the last quarter of the century. The opinions of scholars at present seem to converge about the year 80 AD or a little later.

The theme of the epistle is the absoluteness of the Christian religion, as based upon the preëminence of Jesus Christ, the one and only mediator of salvation. The essence of Christ's preëminence is that He fully realizes in His own person the principles of revelation and reconciliation. It is made manifest in His superiority over the Jewish system of salvation, which He therefore at once supersedes and fulfils. The author's working concept is the Logos-doctrine of Philo; and the empirical data to which it is related is the religious history of Israel, as it culminates in Christianity. He makes no attempt to prove either his ideal first principles or his historical premises, and his philosophy of religion takes no account of the heathen world. The inner method of his argument is to fit Judaism and Christianity into the Logos-concept; but his actual is related to the ideal in the way of Plato's antithesis, of shadow and reality, of pattern and original, rather than in Aristotle's way of development, although the influence of the latter method may often be traced, as in the history of faith, which is carried back to the beginnings of history, but is made perfect only in the Christian consummation (11 40). In a number of other ideas the teleological movement may be seen cutting across the categories of shadow and reality (1 3; 1 10; 4 8 f.; 5 8 f.; 9 12; 10 12; 12 22).

The form of the argument may be described as either rabbinical or Alexandrian. The writer, after laying down his proposition, proceeds to prove it by quotations from the OT, taken out of their context and historical connection, adapted and even changed to suit his present purpose.

This practice was common to Palestinian and Alexandrian writers; as was also the use of allegory, which plays a large part in He (e.g. 3 7-4 11; 13 11 f.). But the writer's allegorical method differs from that of the rabbis in that it is like Philo's, part of a conscious philosophy, according to which the whole of the past and present history of the world is only a shadow of the true realities which are laid up in heaven (8 5; 9 23 f.; 10 1). His interest in historical facts, in OT writers, in Jewish institutions and even in the historical life of Jesus, is quite subordinate to his prepossession with the eternal and heavenly realities which they, in more or less shadowy fashion, represent. That the affinities of He are Alexandrian rather than Palestinian is further proved by many philological and literary correspondences with Wisd and Philo. Most of the characteristic terms and phrases of the epistle are also found in these earlier writers. It has been argued that He and Wisd came from the same hand, and it seems certain that the author of He was familiar with both Wisd and the writings of Philo (Plumptre in Expos, I, 329 ff, 409 ff; von Soden in Hand-Commentar, 5-6). In Philo the dualism of appearance and reality finds its ultimate synthesis in his master-conception of the Logos, and although this term does not appear in He in Philo's sense, the doctrine is set forth in Philonic phraseology in the opening verses (1 1-4). As Logos, Christ excels the prophets as revealer of God, is superior to the angels who were the mediators of the old Covenant, and is more glorious than Moses as the builder of God's true tabernacle, His eternal house; He is a greater Saviour than Joshua, for He brings his own to final rest; and He supersedes the Aaronic priesthood, for while they ministered in a "holy place made with hands, like in pattern to the true," under a "law having a shadow of the good things to come, not the very image of the things" (9 24; 10 1), He "having come a high priest of the good things to come, through the greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands . . . nor yet through the blood of goats and calves, but through his own blood, entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption" (9 11 f).

Yet it is possible to exaggerate the dependence of He on Alexandrian thought. Deeper than the allegorical interpretation of passages culled from the LXX, deeper than the Logos-philosophy which formed the framework of his thought, is the writer's experience and idea of the personal Christ. His central interest lies, not in the theoretical scheme which he adopts, but in the living person who, while He is the eternal reality behind all shadows, and the very image of God's essence, is also our brother who lived and suffered on earth, the author of our salvation, our "fore-runner within the veil," who "is able to save to the uttermost them that draw near unto God through him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them" (1 1-4; 2 14 ff; 2 10; 5 7-9; 4 14-15; 6 20; 7 25). As in Paul and Jn, so in He, the historical and ever-living Christ comes in as an original and creative element, which transforms the abstract philosophy of Hellenistic thought into a living system of salvation. Because of His essential and personal preeminence over the institutions and personalities of the old Covenant, Christ has founded a new Covenant, given a new revelation and proclaimed a new gospel. The writer never loses sight of the present bearing of these eternal realities on the lives of his readers. They are for their warning against apostasy, for their encouragement in the face of persecution, and for their undying hope while they "run the race that is set before [them], looking unto Jesus the author and perfecter of . . . faith" (2 3; 3 12 ff; 4 1 ff; 10 28 ff; 12 1 f. 22 ff).

LITERATURE

"The Gospel according to the Hebrews" was a work of early Christian literature to which reference is frequently made by the church Fathers in the first five centuries, and of which some twenty or more fragments, preserved in their writings, have come down to us. The book itself has long disappeared. It has, however, been the subject of many critical surmises and discussions in the course of the last century. It has been regarded as the original record of the life of Jesus, the Archimedes-point of the whole gospel history. From it Justin Martyr has been represented as deriving his knowledge of the works and words of Christ, and to it have been referred the gospel quotations found in Justin and other early writers when these deviate in any measure from the text of the canonical gospels. Recent discussions have thrown considerable light upon the problems connected with this Gospel, and a large literature has grown up around it of which the most important works will be noted below.

Speaking of Papias Eusebius mentions that he has related the story of a woman who was accused of many sins before the Lord, which is contained in the "Gospel according to the Hebrews." This does not prove that Papias was acquainted with this Gospel, for he might have obtained the story, which cannot any longer be regarded as part of St. John's Gospel, from oral tradition. But there is a certain significance in Eusebius' mentioning it in this connection (Euseb., HE, III, xxxix, 16). Eusebius, speaking of Ignatius and his epp., takes notice of a saying of Jesus which he quotes (Ep. ad Smyrn, iii; cf. Lk 24 39), "Take, handle me, and see that I am not an incorporeal spirit." The saying differs materially from the saying in St. Luke's Gospel, and Eusebius says he has no knowledge whence it had been taken by Ignatius. Jerome, however, twice over attributes the saying to the "Gospel according to the Hebrews," and Origen quotes it from the "Teaching of Peter." Ignatius may have got the saying from oral tradition, and we cannot, therefore, be sure that he knew this Gospel.

The first early Christian writer who is mentioned as having actually used the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" is Hegesippus, who flourished in the second half of the 2d cent. Eusebius, to whom we owe the reference, tells us that Hegesippus in his Memoirs quotes passages from "the Syriac Gospel according to the Hebrews" (HE, IV, xxii, 7). Irenaeus, in the last quarter of the 2d cent., says the Ebionites use only the "Gospel according to Matthew" and reject the apostle Paul, calling him an apostate from the law (Adv. Haer., i, 26, 2). There is reason to believe that there is some confusion in this statement of Irenaeus, for we have the testimony of Eusebius, Jerome and Epiphanius that it was the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" that was used by the Ebionites. With this qualification we may accept Irenaeus as a witness to this Gospel. Clement of Alexandria early in the 3d cent. quotes from it an apocryphal saying with the same formula as he employs for quotation of Holy Scripture (Strom., ii.9). Origen, Clement's successor at Alexandria, has one very striking quotation from the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" (Comm. in Joann., ii), and Jerome says this Gospel is often used by Origen.

Eusebius, in the first half of the 4th cent., mentions that the Ebionites use only the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" and take small account of the others (HE, III, xxvii, 4). He has, besides, other references to it, and in his widely known classification of Christian Scriptures into "acknowledged" "disputed," and "rejected," he mentions this Gospel which he says some have placed in the last category, although those of the Hebrews who have accepted Christ are delighted with it (HE, III, xxv, 5). Eusebius had himself in all probability seen and handled the book in the library of his friend Pamphilus at Caesarea, where Jerome, half a century later, found it and tr^d it.

Epiphanius, who lived largely in Pal, and wrote his treatise on heresies in the latter half of the 4th cent., has much to say of the Ebionites, and the Nazarenes. Speaking of the Ebionites, he says they receive the "Gospel according to Matthew" to the exclusion of the others, mentioning that it alone of the NT books is in Heb speech and Heb characters, and is called the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" (Haer., xxx.3). He goes on to say, that their "Gospel according to Matthew," as it is named, is not complete but falsified and mutilated, "and they call it the Heb Gospel" (Haer., xxx.13). The quotations which Epiphanius proceeds to make show that this Gospel diverges considerably from the canonical Gospel of Mt and may well be that according to the Hebrews. It is more likely that "the Gospel according to Matthew, very full, in Hebrew," of which Epiphanius speaks, when telling about the Nazarene, is the Heb "Gospel of Matthew" attested by Papias, Irenaeus, and a widespread early tradition. But as Epiphanius confesses he does not know whether it has the genealogies, it is clear he was not himself acquainted with the book.

Jerome, toward the end of the 4th cent., is our chief authority for the circulation and use of the "Gospel according to the Hebrews," although his later statements on the subject do not always agree with the earlier. He was proud of being "trilingual," acquainted with Heb as well as with Lat and Gr. "There is a Gospel," he says, "which the Nazarenes and Ebionites use, which I lately tr^d from the Heb tongue into Gr and which is called by many the authentic Gospel of Matthew" (Comm. on Mt 12 13). The fact here mentioned, that he tr^d the work, seems to imply that this Gospel was really something different from the canonical Mt which he had in his hands. In another place, however, he writes: "Matthew . . . first of all composed the Gospel of Christ in Heb letters and words, in Judaea, for behoof of those of the circumcision who had believed, and it is not quite certain who afterward tr^d it into Gr. But the very Heb is preserved to this day in the Caesarean library, which Pamphilus the Martyr, with such care, collected. I myself was allowed the opportunity of copying it by the Nazarenes in Berea who use this volume. In which it is to be observed that the evangelist, when he uses the testimonies of the OT, either in his own person, or in that of the Lord and Saviour, does not follow the authority of the LXX translators, but the Heb. Of those, the following are two examples: 'Out of Egypt have I called my Son' (Mt 2 15 AV); and 'He shall be called a Nazarene' (Mt 2 23)" (De Vir. Ill., iii). It certainly looks as if in the former instance Jerome meant the Gospel according to the Hebrews, and in the latter the well-authenticated Heb Gospel of St. Matthew. At a later time, however, Jerome appears to withdraw this and to introduce a confusing or even contradictory note. His words are: "In the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which was written indeed in the Chaldee-Syr (Aram.) language, but in Heb characters, which the Nazarenes use as the 'Gospel of the Apostles,' or as most people think 'according to Matthew,' which also is contained in the library at Caesarea, the narrative says" (Adv. Pelag., iii.2). As he proceeds, he quotes passages which are not in the canonical Mt. He also says: "That Gospel which is called the Gospel of the Hebrews which was lately tr^d by me into Gr and Lat, and was used frequently by Origen" (Catal. Script. Eccl., "Jacobus"). Jerome's notices of the actual Gospel were frequent, detailed and unequivocal.

Nicephorus at the beginning of the 9th cent. puts the Gospel according to the Hebrews in his list of disputed books of the NT along with the Apocalypse of St. John, the Apocalypse of Peter, and the Ep. of Barnabas. This list is believed to rest upon an authority of about the year 500 AD, and, in the stichometry attached, this Gospel is estimated to have occupied 2,200 lines, while the canonical Mt occupied 2,500.

Codex A of the 9th cent., discovered by Tischendorf, and now in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, has marginal notes affixed to four passages of Mt giving the readings of to Ioudaikon, the lost Gospel according to the Hebrews (Scrivener, Textual Criticism, I, 160; see also Plate XI, 30, p. 131).

All that survives, and all that we are told, of this work, show that it was of the nature of a Gospel, and that it was written in the manner

2. Its Character and Contents of the Synoptic Gospels. But it seems not to have acquired at any time ecclesiastical standing outside the very limited circles of Jewish Christians who preferred it. And it never attained canonical authority. The Muratorian Fragment has no reference to it. Irenaeus knew that the Ebionites used only the Gospel according to Matthew in Heb, although, as we have seen, this may be really the Gospel according to the Hebrews; but his fourfold Gospel comprises the Gospels of Mt, Mk, Lk and Jn, which we know. There is no reason to believe that it was the source of the quotations made by Justin from the Apomnemoneumata, or of quotations made anonymously by others of the early Fathers. Like the Synoptic Gospels, however, it contained narratives of events as well as sayings and discourses. It had an account of John the Baptist's ministry, of the baptism of Jesus, of the call of the apostles, of the woman taken in adultery, of the Last Supper, of the denial of Peter, of appearances of Jesus after the resurrection; and it contained the Lord's Prayer, and sayings of Jesus, like the forgiveness of injuries seventy times seven, the counsel to the rich young ruler, and others. One or two sayings have a gnostic tinge, as when Jesus calls the Holy Spirit His mother, and is made to express His unwillingness to eat the flesh of the Passover Lamb. There are apocryphal additions, even where incidents and sayings are narrated belonging to the canonical Gospels, and there are sayings and incidents wholly apocryphal in the fragments of the Gospel which have survived. But these superfluities do not imply any serious deviation from Catholic doctrine; they only prove, as Professor Zahn says, "the earnestness of the redactor of the Gospel according to the Hebrews to enrich the only Gospel which Jewish Christians possessed up to that time from the still unexhausted source of private oral tradition" (GK, II, 717).

The very title of the work suggests that it circulated among Jewish Christians. Those Christians of Pal to whom Jesus was the ecclesiastical center betook themselves, after the troubles which befell the Holy City, to the less frequented regions beyond the Jordan, and were thus cut off from the main stream of catholic Christianity.

3. Its Circulation and Language It was accordingly easier for the spirit of exclusiveness to assert itself among them and also for heretical tendencies to develop. The Ebionites went farthest in this direction. They denied the supernatural birth of Our Lord, and insisted upon the binding character of the Law for all Christians. The Nazarenes, as all Jewish Christians were called at first, observed the ceremonial law themselves, but did not impose it upon gentile Christians. And they accepted the catholic doctrine of the person of Christ. It was among a community of these Nazarenes at Berea, the modern Aleppo, that Jerome, during a temporary residence at Chalcis in Northern Syria, found the Gospel according to the Hebrews in circulation. No fewer than 9 t does he mention that this Gospel is their one Gospel, and only once does he connect the Ebionites with them in the use of it. Epiphanius draws a clear line of distinction between the Ebionites and the Nazarenes; and we can scarcely suppose that a Gospel which satisfied the one would be wholly acceptable to the other. There is reason to believe that the Heb Gospel of St. Matthew was most to the mind of the Heb Christians, and that it took different forms in the hands of the sects into which the Jewish Christian church became divided. Thus the Gospel of the Nazarenes was the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which in all probability had some affinity with the Heb Gospel of St. Matthew. The Gospel of the Ebionites, which seems to have been the same as the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, was something of a more divergent doctrinal tendency suited to the exclusive and heretical views of that sect. But it is not easy to reconcile the statements of Epiphanius with those of Eusebius and Jerome.

That the Heb tongue in which Papias says St. Matthew composed his Logia was the Aram. of Pal is generally accepted. This Aram. was closely akin to the Syr spoken between the Mediterranean and the Tigris. It was the same as the Chaldee of the books of Ezr, Neh, and Dnl, of which examples have so recently been found in the Aram. papyri from Elephantine at Assouan. Eusebius and Jerome are emphatic and precise in recording the fact that the Gospel according to the Hebrews was not only Heb or Aram. in composition, but written in the square Heb characters, so different from the Old Heb of the Moabite Stone and the Siloam inscription. That there was a Gr tr before the time of Jerome of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which was used by Origen, Clement of Alexandria, and others, is strenuously affirmed by Professor Harnack (Altchristliche Literatur, I, 6 ff) and as strenuously denied by Professor Zahn (GK, II, 648 ff). One reason why the book never attained to any ecclesiastical authority was no doubt its limited circulation in a tongue familiar, outside the circle of Jewish Christians, to only a learned few. For this reason also it is unlikely that it will ever be found, as the Epistle of Barnabas, the Shepherd, and other works have been.

It is natural to seek for traces of special relationship between the Gospel according to the Hebrews, circulating among communities of Jewish Christians, and the Gospel according to St. Matthew which grew up on the soil of Pal, and which was originally composed in the interest of Jewish Christians, and circulated at a very early period in a Heb recension, soon superseded by the canonical Gospel of Mt and now altogether lost. We have already seen that Irenaeus in all likelihood confused the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" with the Heb Gospel of St. Matthew; and that Jerome says the Gospel used by the Nazarenes was called by many the authentic Gospel of St. Matthew. Moreover, among the fragments that have survived, there are more which resemble St. Matthew's record than either of the other Synoptics. E. B. Nicholson, after a full and scholarly examination of the fragments and of the references, puts forward the hypothesis that "St. Matthew wrote at different times the canonical Gospel and the Gospel according to the Hebrews, or, at least, that large part of the latter which runs || to the former" (The Gospel according to the Hebrews, 104). The possibility of two editions of the same Gospel-writing coming from the same hand has recently received illustration from Professor Blass's theory of two recensions of the Acts and of St. Luke's Gospel to explain the textual peculiarities of these books in Codex D. This theory has received the adhesion of eminent scholars, but Nicholson has more serious differences to explain, and it cannot be said that his able argument and admirably marshaled learning have carried conviction to the minds of NT scholars.

If we could be sure that Ignatius in his Ep. to the Smyrneans derived the striking saying attributed to Our Lord, "Take, handle me, and

5. Time of Composition see that I am not an incorporeal spirit," from the Gospel according to the Hebrews, we should be able to fix its composition as at any rate within the 1st cent. The obscurity of its origin, the primitive cast of its contents, and the respect accorded to it down into the 5th cent., have disposed some scholars to assign it an origin not later than our Synoptic Gospels, and to regard it as continuing the Aram. tradition of the earliest preaching and teaching regarding Christ. The manifestly secondary character of some of its contents seems to be against such an early origin. Professor Zahn is rather disposed to place it not earlier than 130, when, during the insurrection of Bar-cochba, the gulf that had grown up between Jews and Jewish Christians was greatly deepened, and with an exclusively gentile church in Jerus, the Jewish Christians had lost their center and broken off into sects. The whole situation seems to him to point to a date somewhere between 130-50 AD. The data for any precise determination of the question are wanting.

There is a saying which Clement of Alexandria quotes from it as Scripture: "He that wonders shall reign and he that reigns shall rest"

6. Un-canonical Sayings and Incidents (Strom., ii.9). Origen quotes from it a saying of Jesus, reminding us somewhat of what of Ezk (8 3): "Just now My Mother the Holy Spirit took me by one of my hairs, and bore me away to the great mountain Thabor" (Orig., In Joann., ii; it is quoted several times both by Origen and Jerome). Jerome more than once quotes from it a saying of the Lord to His disciples: "Never be joyful except when ye look on your brother in love" (Hieron. in Eph 5 4; in Ezk 18 7). In his comm. on Mt (8 11) Jerome mentions that he found in the third petition of the Lord's prayer for the difficult and unique Gr word ἐπιούσιος, epiousios, which he tr* supersubstantialis, the Aram. word māhār, crastinus, so that the sense would be, "Tomorrow's bread give us today." Of unrecorded incidents the most notable is that of the appearance of the Risen Lord to James: "And when the Lord had given His linen cloth to the servant of the priest, He went to James and appeared to him. For James had sworn that he would not eat bread from that hour wherein he had drunk the cup of the Lord until he saw Him rising from the dead. Again a little afterward the Lord says, Bring a table and bread. Immediately it is added: He took bread and blessed and brake, and afterward gave it to James the Just and said to him, My brother, eat thy bread for the Son of Man has risen from them that sleep" (Hieron., De Vir. Illust., "Jacobus").

Jerome also tells that in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, there is the following passage: "Lo the mother of the Lord and His brethren said unto Him: John the Baptist is baptizing for the remission of sins; let us go and be baptized by him. But He said to them: What sin have I committed that I should go and be baptized by him? Unless perchance this very word which I have spoken is a sin of ignorance" (Hieron., Adv. Pelag., iii.2).

Rahmān, "the friend of the Merciful," i.e. of God, a favorite name for Abraham; cf. Jas 2 23). The city is some 20 miles S. of Jerus., situated in an open valley, 3,040 ft. above sea-level.

1. History of the City.—Hebron is said to have been founded before Zoan (i.e. Tanis) in Egypt (Nu 13 22); its ancient name was Kiriath-arba, probably meaning the "Four Cities," perhaps because divided at one time into four quarters, but according to Jewish writers so called because four patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Adam were buried there. According to Josh 15 13 it was so called after Arba, the father of Anak.

MOSQUE OVER THE CAVE OF MACHPELAH AT HEBRON.

This Gospel is not to be classed with heretical Gospels like that of Marcion, nor with apocryphal Gospels like that of James or Nicodemus. It differed from the former in that it did not deviate from any essential of catholic truth in its representation of Our Lord. It differed from the latter in that it narrated particulars mostly relating to Our Lord's public ministry, while they occupy themselves with matters of curiosity left unrecorded in the canonical Gospels. It differs from the canonical Gospels only in that it is more florid in style, more diffuse in the relation of incidents, and more inclined to sectional views of doctrine. Its uncanonical sayings and incidents may have come from oral tradition, and they do lend a certain interest and picturesqueness to the narrative. Its language confined it to a very limited sphere, and its sectional character prevented it from ever professing Scriptural authority or attaining to canonical rank. See also APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

HEBRON, hē'brun (חֶבְרוֹן, hebrōn, "league" or "confederacy"; Χεβρών, Chebrōn): One of the most ancient and important cities in Southern Pal., now known to the Moslems as el Khali (i.e. Khalil or

Abram came and dwelt by the oaks of MAMRE (q.v.), "which are in Hebron" (Gen 13 18); from here he went to the rescue of Lot and

1. Patriarchal Period brought him back after the defeat of Chedorlaomer (14 13 f); here his name was changed to Abraham (17 5); to this place came the three angels with the promise of a son (18 1 f); Sarah died here (23 2), and for her sepulcher Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah (23 17); here Isaac and Jacob spent much of their lives (35 27; 37 14); from here Jacob sent Joseph to seek his brethren (37 14), and hence Jacob and his sons went down to Egypt (46 1). In the cave of Machpelah all the patriarchs and their wives, except Rachel, were buried (49 30 f; 50 13).

The spies visited Hebron and near there cut the cluster of grapes (Nu 13 22 f). HOHAM (q.v.), king of Hebron, was one of the five 2. Times of kings defeated by Joshua at Beth-Joshua and horon and slain at Makkedah (Josh Judges* 10 3 f). Caleb drove out from Hebron the "three sons of Anak" (14 12; 15 14); it became one of the cities of Judah (15 54), but was set apart for the Kohathite Levites (21 10 f), and became a city of refuge (20 7). One of Samson's exploits was the carrying of the gate of Gaza "to the top of the mountain that is before Hebron" (Jgs 16 3).

David, when a fugitive, received kindness from the people of this city (1 S 30 31); here Abner was treacherously slain by Joab at the gate (2 S 3 27), and the sons of Rimmon, after their hands and feet had been cut off, were hanged "beside the pool" (4 12). After the death of Saul, David was here anointed king (5 3) and reigned here 7½ years, until he captured Jerus and made that his capital (5 5); while here, six sons were born to him.

3. The Days (3 2). In this city Absalom found a center for his disaffection, and repairing Monarchy there under pretense of performing a vow to Jeh, he raised the standard of revolt (15 7f). Jos mistakenly places here the dream of Solomon (Ant, VIII, ii, 1) which occurred at Gibeon (1 K 3 4). Hebron was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11 10).

Abraham's Oak.

Probably during the captivity Hebron came into the hands of Edom, though it appears to have been colonized by returning Jews (Neh 11

4. Later History 25); it was recovered from Edom by Simon Maccabaeus (1 Macc 5 65; Jos, Ant, XII, viii, 6). In the first great revolt against Rome, Simon bar-Gioras captured the city (BJ, IV, ix, 7), but it was retaken, for Vespasian, by his general Cerealis who carried it by storm, slaughtered the inhabitants and burnt it (ib, 9).

During the Muslim period Hebron has retained its importance on account of veneration to the patriarchs, esp. Abraham; for the same reason it was respected by the Crusaders who called it Castellum ad Sanctum Abraham. In 1165 it became the see of a Lat bishop, but 20 years later it fell to the victorious arms of Saladin, and it has ever since remained a fanatic Moslem center, although regarded as a holy city, alike by Moslem, Jew and Christian.

II. The Ancient Site.—Modern Hebron is a straggling town clustered round the Haram or sacred enclosure built above the traditional cave of MACHPELAH (q.v.); it is this sacred spot which has determined the present position of the town all through the Christian era, but it is quite evident that an exposed and indefensible situation, running along a valley, like this, could not have been that of earlier and less settled times. From many of the pilgrim narratives, we can gather that for long there had been a tradition that the original site was some distance from the modern town, and, as analogy might suggest, upon a hill. There can be little doubt that the site of the Hebron of OT history is a lofty, olive-covered hill, lying to the W. of the present town, known as er Rumeidy. Upon its summit are cyclopiian walls and other traces of ancient occupation. In the midst are the ruins of a mediaeval building known as Dér el-Arba'in, the "monastery of the forty" (martyrs) about whom the Hebronites have an interesting folklore tale. In the building are shown the so-called tombs of Jesse and Ruth. Near the foot of the hill are several fine old tombs, while to the N. is a large and very ancient Jewish cemetery, the graves of which are each covered with a massive monolith, 5 and 6 ft. long. At the eastern foot of the hill is a perennial spring, Ain el Judeideh; the water rises in a vault, roofed by masonry and reached by steps. The environs of this hill are full of folklore associations; the summit would well repay a thorough excavation.

A mile or more to the N.W. of Hebron is the famous oak of MAMRE (q.v.), or "Abraham's oak," near which the Russians have erected a hospice. It is a fine specimen of the Holm oak (Quercus coccifera), but is gradually dying. The present site appears to have been pointed out as that of Abraham's tent since the 12th cent.; the earlier traditional site was at Rāmet el Khalil. See MAMRE.

III. Modern Hebron.—Modern Hebron is a city of some 20,000 inhabitants, 85 per cent of whom are Moslems and the remainder mostly Jews. The city is divided into seven quarters, one of which is known as that of the "glass blowers" and another as that of the "water-skin makers." These industries, with the manufacture of pottery, are the main sources of trade. The most conspicuous building is the Haram (see MACHPELAH). In the town are two large open reservoirs the Birket el Kassasin, the "pool of the glass blowers" and Birket es Sultan, "the pool of the Sultan." This latter, which is the larger, is by tradition the site of the execution of the murderers of Ishboosheth (2 S 4 12). The Moslem inhabitants are noted for their fanatical exclusiveness and conservatism, but this has been greatly modified in recent years through the patient and beneficent work of Dr. Paterson, of the U. F. Ch. of S. Med. Mission. The Jews, who number about 1,500, are mostly confined to a special ghetto; they have four synagogues, two Sephardic and two Ashkenazic; they are a poor and unprogressive community.

HEBRON (הֶבְרֹן, hebrōn, "league," "association"):

- (1) The third son of Kohath, son of Levi (Ex 6 18; Nu 3 19.27; 1 Ch 6 2.18; 23 12.19).
- (2) A son of Maresah and descendant of Caleb (1 Ch 2 42.43). See also KORAH.

HEBRONITES, hēbrun-ites (הֶבְרֹנִי, hebrōnī): A family of Levites, descendants of Hebron, third son of Kohath (Nu 3 27; 26 58, etc.).

HEDGE, hej:

- (1) מִסְקָה, miskāh, "a thorn hedge," only in Mic 7 4; מִסְקָה, miskāh, "a hedge" (Isa 5 5); מִסְקַת הָדָק, miskat hādak, "a hedge of thorns" (Prov 15 19).
- (2) גִּדְדֵּר, gādhēr, and גִּדְדֵּרָה, gādhērāh, trd "hedges" in RV only in Ps 89 40, elsewhere "fence." GEDRAH (q.v.) in RVm is trd "hedges" (1 Ch 4 23).
- (3) נִצְצֵי, na'ācūc, "thorn-hedges" (Isa 7 19).
- (4) φραγμός, phragmós, trd "hedge" (Mt 21 33; Mk 12 1; Lk 14 23); "partition" in Eph 2 14, which is its literal meaning. In the LXX it is the usual equivalent of the above Heb words.

Loose stone walls without mortar are the usual "fences" around fields in Pal, and this is what gāḏher and gāḏhērāh signify in most passages. Hedges made of cut thorn branches or thorny bushes are very common in the plains and particularly in the Jordan valley.

HEDGEHOG, hej'hog (LXX ἐχίνος, echinos, "hedgehog," for חִפּוֹד, ḥippōd, in Isa 14 23; 34 11; Zeph 2 14, and for חִפּוֹז, ḥippōz, in Isa 34 15). See PORCUPINE; BITTERN; OWL; SERPENT.

HEED, hēd: This word, in the sense of giving careful attention ("take heed," "give heed," etc), represents several Heb and Gr words; chief among them שָׁמַר, shāmar, "to watch"; βλέπω, blēpō, "to look," ὁράω, horāō, "to see." As opposed to thoughtlessness, disregard of God's words, of the counsels of wisdom, of care for one's ways, it is constantly inculcated as a duty of supreme importance in the moral and spiritual life (Dt 4 9.15.23; 27 9 AV, etc; Josh 22 5; 23 11; Ps 39 1; Mt 16 6; Mk 4 24; 13 33; Lk 12 15; 1 Cor 3 10; 8 9; 10 12; Col 4 17, etc). JAMES ORR HEEL, hēl (חֵל, ḥēl): "The iniquity of my heels" (Ps 49 5 AV) is a literal tr, and might be understood to indicate the Psalmist's "false steps," errors or sins, but that meaning is very doubtful here. RV gives "iniquity at my heels." RVM gives a still better sense, "When the iniquity of them that would supplant me compasseth me about, even of them that trust in . . . riches"—treacherous enemies ever on the watch to trip up a man's heels (cf Hos 12 3). Of Judah it was said, "Thy heels [shall] suffer violence" (Jer 13 22) through being "made bare" (AV), and thus subject to the roughness of the road as she was led captive.

Figurative: (1) Of the partial victory of the evil power over humanity, "Thou shalt bruise [m 'lie in wait for'] his heel" (Gen 3 15), through constant, insidious suggestion of the satisfaction of the lower desires. Or if we regard this statement as a part of the Protevangelium, the earliest proclamation of Christ's final and complete victory over sin, the destruction of "the serpent" ("He shall bruise thy head"), then the reference is evidently to Christ's sufferings and death, even to all that He endured in His human nature. (2) Of the stealthy tactics of the tribe of Dan in war, "An adder in the path, that biteth the horse's heels" (Gen 49 17), by which it triumphed over foes of superior strength. (3) Of violence and brutality, "Who . . . hath lifted up his heel against me" (Ps 41 9; Jn 13 18), i.e. lifted up his foot to trample upon me (cf Josh 10 24). M. O. EVANS

HEGAL, hē'gā-l, HEGE, hē'ge (חֵגַל, hēghay; חֵגַל, hēghē, Hege [Est 2 8.15], and חֵגְהָר, hēghār, Hege [Est 2 3]): One of the officers of the Pers king Ahasuerus; a chamberlain or eunuch (keeper of women), into whose custody the "fair young virgins" were delivered from whom the king intended to choose his queen in the place of the discredited Vashti.

HEGEMONIDES, heg-e-mon'i-dēz, hej-e-mō-ni'-dēz (Ἡγεμονίδης, Hēgemonídēs): The Syrian officer placed in command of the district extending from Ptolemais to the Gerrenians (2 Macc 13 24). It is not easy to see how in AV and even in Swete's revised text the word can be taken as a mere appellation along with stratēgōn, the two being rendered "principal officer": one of the two could certainly be omitted (Swete, 3d ed, 1905, capitalizes Hegemonidēs). In RV the word is taken as the name of some person otherwise unknown.

HEIFER, hef'er (פָּרָה, pārāh, in Nu 19 [see following art.] and Hos 4 16; עֵגְלָה, 'eghlāh, elsewhere in the OT; δάμαλις, dāmalis, in He 9 13): For the "heifer of three years old" in AV, RVM of Isa 15 5; Jer 48 34, see EGLATH-SHELISHYAH. A young cow (contrast BULLOCK). The 'eghlāh figures specifically in religious rites only in the ceremony of Dt 21 1-9 for the cleansing of the land, where an unexpiated murder had been committed. This was not a sacrificial rite—the priests are witnesses only, and the animal was slain by breaking the neck—but sacrificial purity was required for the heifer. Indeed, it is commonly supposed that the rite as it now stands is a rededication of one that formerly had been sacrificial. In the sacrifices proper the heifer could be used for a peace offering (Lev 3 1), but was forbidden for the burnt (Lev 1 3) or sin (4 3.14) offerings. Hence the sacrifice of 1 S 16 2 was a peace offering. In Gen 15 9 the ceremony of the ratification of the covenant by God makes use of a heifer and a she-goat, but the reason for the use of the females is altogether obscure. Cf following article.

Figuratively: The heifer appears as representing sleekness combined with helplessness in Jer 46 20 (cf the comparison of the soldiers to 'stalled calves' in the next verse). In Jer 50 11; Hos 10 11, the heifer is pictured as engaged in threshing. This was particularly light work, coupled with unusually abundant food (Dt 25 4), so that the threshing heifer served esp. well for a picture of contentment. ("Wanton" in Jer 50 11, however, is an unfortunate tr in RV.) Hosea, in contrast, predicts that the "heifers" shall be set to the hard work of ploughing and breaking the sods. In Jgs 14 18, Samson uses "heifer" in his riddle to refer to his wife. This, however, was not meant to convey the impression of licentiousness that it gives the modern reader. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

HEIFER, RED. In Nu 19 a rite is described in which the ashes of a "red heifer" and of certain objects are mixed with running water to obtain the so-called "water for impurity." (Such is the correct tr of ARV in Nu 19 9.13.20.21; 31 23. In these passages, AV and ERV, through a misunderstanding of a rather difficult Heb term, have "water of separation"; LXX and the Vulg have "water of sprinkling." ERV, "water of impurity," is right, but ambiguous.) This water was employed in the removal of the uncleanness of a person or thing that had been in contact with a dead body, and also in removing ritual defilement from booty taken in war.

The general origin of the rite is clear enough, as is the fact that this origin lies back of the official sacrificial system of Israel. For the

1. Origin removal of impurity, ritual as well as and Significance of physical, water, preferably running the Rite water (ver 17; cf Lev 14 5 ff; 15 13), is the natural means, and is employed universally. But where the impurity was unusually great, mere water was not felt to be adequate, and various substances were mixed with it in order to increase its efficacy. So (among other things) blood is used in Lev 14 6.7, and dust in Nu 5 17 (see WATER OF BITTERNESS). The use, however, of ashes in Nu 19 17 is unique in the OT, although parallels from elsewhere can be adduced. So e.g. in Ovid Fasti, iv.639-40, 725, 733, in the last of these references, "The blood of a horse shall be a purification, and the ashes of calves," is remarkably close to the OT. The ashes were obtained by burning the heifer completely, "her skin, and her flesh, and her blood, with her dung" (the contents of the entrails) (ver 5; cf Ex 29 14). Here only in the OT is blood burned for a ceremonial purpose, and here only is burning a preliminary; elsewhere it is either a chief act or serves to consume the remnants of a finished sacrifice—Lev 4 12 and Nu 19 3 are altogether different.

The heifer is a female. For the regular sin offering for the congregation, only the male was permitted (Lev 4 14), but the female was used in the purificatory ceremony of Dt 21 3 (a rite that has several points of similarity to that of Nu 19). An individual sin offering by one of the common people, however, required a female (Lev 4 28), but probably only in order to give greater prominence to the more solemn sacrifices for which the male was reserved. A female is required again in the cases enumerated in Lev 5 1–6, most of which are ritual defilements needing purification; a female was required at the purification of a leper (in addition to two males, Lev 14 10), and a female, with one male, was offered when a Nazirite terminated his vows (Nu 6 14). Some connection between purification and the sacrifice of a female may be established by this list, for even in the case of the Nazirite the idea may be removal of the state of consecration. But the reason for such a connection is anything but obvious, and the various explanations that have been offered are hardly more than guesses. The most likely is that purificatory rites originated in a very primitive stage when the female was thought to be the more sacred animal on account of its greater usefulness. Of the other requirements for the heifer she must be “red,” i.e. reddish brown (Nu 19 2). Likeness in color to blood is at first sight the most natural explanation, but likeness in color to ripe grain is almost equally plausible. It may be noted that certain Egypt sacrifices also required red cattle as victims (Plutarch, De Isid. 31). The heifer is to be “without spot” (“faultless”), “wherein is no blemish,” the ordinary requirement for sacrifices. (The Jewish exegetes misread this “perfectly red, wherein is no blemish,” with extraordinary results; see below.) But an advance on sacrificial requirements is that she shall be one “upon which never came yoke.” This requirement is found elsewhere only in Dt 21 3 and in 1 S 6 7 (that the animals in this last case were finally sacrificed is, however, not in point). But in other religions this requirement was very common (cf Iliad x.293; Vergil, Georg. iv.550–51; Ovid, Fasts iv.336).

While the heifer was being burned, “cedar-wood, and hyssop, and scarlet” (i.e. scarlet wool or thread) were cast into the flames. The same

2. Use of Cedar and Hyssop combination of objects (although differently employed) is found at the cleansing of a leper (Lev 14 4), but their meaning is entirely unknown. The explanations offered are almost countless. It is quite clear that hyssop was esp. prized in purifications (Ps 51 7), but the use of hyssop as a sprinkler and the use of ashes of hyssop may be quite unrelated. Hyssop and cedar were supposed to have medicinal properties (see CEDAR; HYSSOP). Or the point may be the use of aromatic woods. For a mixture of cedar and other substances in water as a purificatory medium cf Fossey, Magie Assyrienne, 285. The scarlet wool offers still greater difficulties, apart from the color, but it may be noted that scarlet wool plays a part in some of the Bab conjurations (Assyr. Bibl., XII, 31). But, obviously, none of this leads very far and it may all be in the wrong direction. All that can be said definitely is that Lev 14 4 and Nu 19 6 show that the combination of objects was deemed to have a high purificatory value.

The ashes, when obtained, were used in removing the greatest of impurities. Consequently, they themselves were deemed to have an extraordinarily “consecrated” character, and they were not to be handled carelessly. Their consecration extended to the rite by which they were

3. Application and Sacredness produced, so that every person engaged in it was rendered unclean (Nu 19 7.8.10), an excellent example of the Ashes how in primitive religious thought the ideas of “holiness” and “uncleanliness” blend. It was necessary to perform the whole ceremony “without the camp” (ver 3), and the ashes, when prepared, were also kept without the camp (ver 9), probably in order to guard against their touch defiling anyone (as well as to keep them from being defiled). When used they were mixed with running water, and the mixture was sprinkled with hyssop on the person or object to be cleansed (vs 17–19). The same water was used to purify booty (31 23), and it may also be meant by the “water of expiation” in 8 7.

In addition to the similarities already pointed out between Nu 19 and Dt 21 1–9, the rites resemble each other also in the fact that, in both, 4. Of Non-Priestly and Non-Israelitish Origin laymen are the chief functionaries and that the priests have little to do (in Dt 21 1–9 they are mere passive witnesses). This suggests a non-priestly origin. The title “sin-offering” in Nu 19 9.17 (unless used in a unique sense) points to an original sacrificial meaning, although in Nu 19 the heifer is carefully kept away from the altar. Again, the correspondences with rites in other religions indicate a non-Israelitish origin. Such a ceremony may well have passed among the Israelites and have become prized by them. It contained nothing objectionable and seemed to have much of deep worth, and a few slight additions—chiefly the sprinkling (ver 4; cf Lev 4 6.17)—made it fit for adoption into the highest system. Some older features may have been eliminated also, but as to this, of course, there is no information. But, in any case, the ceremony is formed of separate rites that are exceedingly old and that are found in a great diversity of religions, so that any elaborate symbolic interpretation of the details would seem to be without justification. The same result can be reached by comparing the countless symbolic interpretations that have been attempted in the past, for they differ hopelessly. As a matter of fact, the immense advance that has been gained in the understanding of the meaning of the OT rites through the comparative study of religions has shown the futility of much that has been written on symbolism. That a certain rite is widely practised may merely mean that it rests on a true instinct. To be sure, the symbolism of the future will be written on broader lines and will be less pretentious in its claims, but for these very reasons it will rest on a more solid basis. At present, however, the chief task is the collection of material and its correct historical interpretation.

The later history of the rite is altogether obscure. As no provision was made in Nu 19 for sending the ashes to different points, the purification could have been practised only by those living near the sanctuary. Rabbinical casuistry still further complicated matters by providing that two black or white hairs from the same follicle would disqualify the heifer (see above), and that one on whom even a cloth had been laid could not be used. In consequence, it became virtually or altogether impossible to secure a proper animal, and the Mishnic statement that only nine had ever been found (Pārāh, iii.5) probably means that the rite had been obsolete long before NT times. Still, the existence of the tractate, Pārāh, and the mention in He 9 13 show that the provisions were well remembered. See also SACRIFICE.

5. Obscurity of Later History

HEIGHT, hit, HEIGHTS: The Eng. terms represent a large number of Heb words (gōbhah, mārōm, kōmāh, rūm, etc.). A chief thing to notice is that in RV "height" and "heights" are frequently substituted for other words in AV, as "coast" (Josh 12 23), "region" (1 K 4 11), "borders" (Josh 11 2), "countries" (Josh 17 11), "strength" (Ps 95 4), "high places" (Isa 41 18; Jer 3 2.21; 7 29; 12 12; 14 6), "high palaces" (Ps 78 69). On the other hand, for "height" in AV, RV has "stature" (Ezk 31 5.10), "raised basement" (Ezk 41 8), etc. In the NT we have hypsōma, prop. of space (Rom 8 39), and hypsos of measure (Eph 3 18; Rev 21 16).

JAMES ORR

HEIR, ār: In the NT "heir" is the invariable tr of κληρόνομος, klērōnomos (15 t), the technical equivalent in Gr, and of the compound συνκληρόνομος, sunklērōnomos.

1. The Word "Heir" "coheir," in Rom 8 17; Eph 3 6; He 11 9; 1 Pet 3 7 (in Gal 4 30; He 1 14, contrast AV and RV). In the OT "heir" and "to be heir" both represent some form of the common vb. יָרַשׁ, yārash, "possess," and the particular rendition of the vb. as "to be heir" is given only by the context (cf e.g. AV and RV in Jer 49 2; Mic 1 15). Exactly the same is true of the words יָרַשׁ "inherit," "inheritance," which in by far the great majority of cases would have been represented better by "possess," "possession" (see INHERITANCE and OHL on יָרַשׁ). Consequently, when God is said, for instance, to have given Palestine to Israel as an 'inheritance' (Lev 20 24, etc), nothing more need be meant than 'given as a possession.' The LXX, however, for the sake of variety in its rendition of Heb words, used klērōnomōs in many such cases (esp. Gen 15 7.8; 22 17), and thereby fixed on 'heir' the sense of 'recipient of a gift from God.' And so the word passed in this sense into NT Gr—Rom 4 13.14; Gal 3 29; Tit 3 7; He 6 17; 11 7; Jas 2 5; cf Eph 3 6; He 11 9; 1 Pet 3 7. On the other hand, the literal meaning of the word is found in Mk 12 7 (and ||s) and Gal 4 1—in the latter case being suggested by the transferred meaning in 3 29—while in Rom 8 17; Gal 4 7, the literal and transferred meanings are blended. This blending has produced the phrase "heirs of God," which, literally, is meaningless and which doubtless was formed without much deliberation, although it is perfectly clear. A similar blending has applied "heir" to Christ in He 1 2 (cf Rom 8 17 and perhaps Mk 12 7) as the recipient of all things in their totality. But apart from these "blended" passages, it would be a mistake to think that sonship is always consciously thought of where "heir" is mentioned, and hence too much theological implication should not be assigned the latter word.

The heirs of property in the OT were normally the sons and, chief among these, the firstborn.

(1) Dt 21 15-17 provides that the firstborn shall inherit a "double portion," whence it would appear that all the other sons shared equally. (It should be noted that in this law the firstborn is the eldest son of the father, not of the mother as in Ex 13 2.) Uncertain, however, is what Dt 21 15-17 means by "wife," and the practice must have varied. In Gen 21 10 the son of the handmaid was not to be heir with Isaac, but in Gen 30 1-13 the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah are reckoned as legitimate children of Jacob. See MARRIAGE. Nor is it clear that Dt 21 15-17 forbids setting aside the eldest son because of his own sin—cf the case of Reuben (Gen 49 3.4; 1 Ch 5 1), although the son of a regular wife (Gen 29 32). The very existence of Dt 21 15-17, moreover, shows that in spite of the absence of formal wills, a man could control to some extent the disposition of his property after his death and that the right of the firstborn could be set aside by the father (1 Ch 26 10). That the royal dignity went by primogeniture is asserted only (in a particular case) in 2 Ch 21 3, and both David (1 K 1 11-13) and Rehoboam (2 Ch 11 21-23) chose younger sons as their successors. A single payment in the father's lifetime could be given in lieu of heritage (Gen 25 6; Lk 15 12), and it was possible for two brothers to make a bargain as to the disposition of the property after the father's death (Gen 25 31-34).

(2) When there were sons alive, the daughters had no right of inheritance, and married daughters had no such right in any case. (Job 42 15 describes an altogether exceptional procedure.) Probably unmarried daughters passed under the charge of the firstborn, as the new head of the family, and he took the responsibility of finding them husbands. Nu 27 1-11; 36 1-12 treat of the case where there were no sons—the daughters inherited the estate, but they could marry only within the tribe, lest the tribal possessions be confused. This right of the daughters, however, is definitely stated to be a new thing, and in earlier times the property probably passed to the nearest male relatives, to whom it went in later times if there were no daughters. In extreme cases, where no other heirs could be found, the property went to the slaves (Gen 15 3; Prov 30 23, noting that the meaning of the latter ver is uncertain), but this could have happened only at the rarest intervals. A curious instance is that of 1 Ch 2 34.35, where property is preserved in the family by marrying the daughter to an Egypt slave belonging to the father; perhaps some adoption-idea underlies this.

(3) The wife had no claim on the inheritance, though the disposition made of her dowry is not explained, and it may have been returned to her. If she was childless she resorted to the Levirate marriage (Dt 25 5-10). If this was impracticable or was without issue she returned to her own family and might marry another husband (Gen 38 11; Lev 22 13; Ruth 1 8). The inferior wives (concubines) were part of the estate and went to the heir; indeed, possession of the father's concubines was proof of possession of his dignities (2 S 16 21.22; 1 K 2 13-25). At least, such was the custom in the time of David and Solomon, but at a later period nothing is heard of the practice.

(4) The disposition of land is a very obscure question. Nu 36 4 states explicitly that each heir had a share, but the continual splitting up of an estate through successive generations would have produced an impossible state of affairs. Possibly the land went to the eldest born as part of his portion, possibly in some cases it was held in common by the members of the family, possibly some member bought the shares of the others, possibly the practice differed at different times. But our ignorance of the facts is complete.

NOTE.—The dates assigned by different scholars to the passages cited have an important bearing on the discussion.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

HELAH, hē'lā (הֵלָה, hē'lāh): A wife of Ashhur, father of Tekoa (1 Ch 4 5.7).

HELAM, hē'lam (הֶלָם, hēlam, 2 S 10 16f; in ver 17 with הֶלֶק loale; LXX Αἰλάμ, Hailám): A place near which David is said to have defeated the Aramaean world under Hadarezer (2 S 10 16ff). Its site is unknown. Cornill and others introduce it into the text of Ezk 47 16 from the LXX (Ἡλάμ, Hēlám). This would place it between the territories of Damascus and Hamath, which is not unreasonable. Some scholars identify it with Aleppo, which seems too far north.

HELBAH, hel'ba (הֶלְבָּה, hēlbāh): A place in the territory assigned to Asher (Jgs 1 31). It may be identical with Mahalliba of Sennacherib's prism inscription. The site, however, has not been recovered.

HELBON, hel'bon (חֶלְבֹן, hēlbōn; Χαλβών, Chelbōn, Χεβρών, Chebrōn): A district from which Tyre received supplies of wine through the Damascus market (Ezk 27 18); universally admitted to be the modern Halbun, a village at the head of a fruitful valley of the same name among the chalk slopes on the eastern side of Anti-Lebanon, 13 miles N.N.W of Damascus, where traces of ancient vineyard terracing still exist. Records contemporary with Ezk mention mat helbunim or the land of Helbon, whence Nebuchadnezzar received wine for sacrificial purposes (Belinno Cylinder, I, 23), while karan hulbunu, or Helbonian wine, is named in WAI, II, 44. Strabo (xv.735) also tells that the kings of Persia esteemed it highly. The district is still famous for its grapes—the best in the country—but these are mostly made into raisins, since the population is now Moslem. Helbon must not be confounded with Chalybon (Ptol. v.15, 17), the Gr-Rom province of Haleb or Aleppo.

HELCHIAH, hel-ki'a. See HELKIAS.

HELDAI, hel'dā-i (הֶלְדַּי, hēlday):

(1) A captain of the temple-service, appointed for the 12th month (1 Ch 27 15). Same as Heled (הֶלֶד, hēledh) in || list (cf 1 Ch 11 30), and is probably also to be identified with Heleb, son of Baanah the Metaphathite, one of David's heroic leaders (2 S 23 29).

(2) One of a company of Jews who brought gifts of gold and silver from Babylon to assist the exiles under Zerubbabel (Zec 6 10).

HELEB, hē'leb (הֶלֶב, hēlebh, 2 S 23 29). See HELDAI.

HELED, hē'led (הֶלֶד, hēledh, 1 Ch 11 30). See HELDAI.

HELEK, hē'lek (הֶלֶק, hēlekh): Son of Gilead the Manassite (Nu 26 30; Josh 17 2). Patronymic, Helekites. (Nu 26 30).

HELEM, hē'lem:

(1) הֶלֶם, hēlem; LXX B, Βαλάμ, Baladām, omitting "son," A, υἱός Ἐλάμ, huiós Elám, "son of Elam" (1 Ch 7 35). A great-grandson of Asher, called Hotham in ver 32. The form "Elam" appears as the name of a Levite in 1 Ead 8 33.

(2) הֶלֶם, hēlem, "strength," regarded by LXX as a common noun (Zec 6 14). One of the ambassadors from the Jews of the exile to Jerus; probably the person called Heldai in ver 10 is meant.

HELEPH, hē'lef (הֶלֶף, hēleph): A place on the southern border of Naphtali (Josh 19 33); unidentified.

HELEZ, hē'lez (הֶלֶז, hēlez, "vigor"; LXX Σέλλης, Séllēs, Χέλλης, Chéllēs):

(1) 2 S 23 26; 1 Ch 11 27; 27 10. One of David's mighty men; according to 1 Ch 27 10, he belonged to the sons of Ephraim and was at the head of the 7th course in David's organization of the kingdom.

(2) LXX Chéllēs, 1 Ch 2 39. A man of Judah of the clan of the Jerahmeelites.

HELI, hē'li (Ἡλὶ, Hēlet for Ἠλὶ, 'ēli):

(1) The father of Joseph, the husband of Mary, in St. Luke's account of the genealogy of Jesus (Lk 3 23).

(2) An ancestor of Ezra (2 Ead 1 2).

HELIODORUS, hē-li-ō-dō'rus (Ἡλιόδωρος, Hēliodōros): Treasurer of the Syrian king Seleucus IV, Philopator (187-175 BC), the immediate predecessor of Antiochus Epiphanes who carried out to its utmost extremity the Hellenizing policy begun by Seleucus and the "sons of Tobias." Greatly in want of money to pay the tribute due to the Romans as one of the results of the victory of Scipio over Antiochus the Great at Magnesia (190 BC), Seleucus learned from Apollonius, governor of Coele-Syria (Pal) and Phoenicia, of the wealth which was reported to be stored up in the Temple at Jerus and commissioned H. (2 Macc 3) to plunder the temple and to bring its contents to him. On the wealth collected in the Temple at this time, Jos (Ant, IV, vii, 2) may be consulted. The Temple seems to have served the purposes of a bank in which the private deposits of widows and orphans were kept for greater security, and in 2 Macc 3 15-21 is narrated the panic at Jerus which took place when H. came with an armed guard to seize the contents of the Temple (see Stanley, Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, III, 287). In spite of the protest of Onias, the high priest, H. was proceeding to carry out his commission when, "through the Lord of Spirits and the Prince of all power," a great apparition appeared which caused him to fall down "compassed with great darkness" and speechless. When "quite at the last gasp" he was by the intercession of Onias restored to life and strength and "testified to all men the works of the great God which he had beheld with his eyes." The narrative given in 2 Macc 3 is not mentioned by any other historian, though 4 Macc refers to the plundering of the Temple and assigns the deed to Apollonius. Raffaele used the incident in depicting, on the walls of the Vatican, the triumph of Pope Julius II over the enemies of the Pontificate.

HELIOPOLIS, hē-li-op'ō-lis. See ON.

HELKAI, hel'kā-i, hel'ki, hel-kā'i (הֶלְכַּי, hēlkay, perhaps an abbreviation for Helkiah, "Jeh is my portion." Not in LXX B; LXX L, Χελκίας, Chelkias [Neh 12 15]): The head of a priestly house in the days of Joiakim.

HELKATH, hel'kath (הֶלְכָּת, hēlkāth [Josh 19 25]; hēlkāth [21 31]; by a scribal error hūlēk [1 Ch 6 75]): A town or district on the border of Asher, assigned to the Levites; unidentified.

HELKATH-HAZZURIM, hel'kath-haz'ū-rim, -ha-zū'rim (הֶלְכָּת הַצֻּרִים, hēlkāth ha-zūrim; Μερὶς τῶν ἐπιβουλῶν, Meris tōn epiboulōn): The name as it stands means "field of the sword edges," and is applied to the scene of the conflict in which twelve champions each from the army of Joab and that of Abner perished together, each slaying his fellow (2 S 2 16). Some, following LXX, would read הַקֶּלֶחַ הַצֹּדִים, hēkēlāh ha-ṣōdīm, "field of the crafty," i.e. "of the ambush." Thenius suggested הַקֶּלֶחַ הַצָּרִים, hēkēlāh ha-ṣārim, "field of the adversaries" (see also H. P. Smith, ICC, "Samuel," 271). Probably, however, the text as it stands is correct.

W. EWING

HELKIAS, hel-kī'as (הֶלְקִיָּאֵשׁ, hēlqiyāh; Ἑλκίας, Chelkias; AV Chelcias):

(1) Father of Susanna (Sus vs 2.29.63). According to tradition he was brother of Jeremiah, and he is identified with the priest who found the Book of the Law in the time of Josiah (2 K 22 8).

(2) Ancestor of Baruch (Bar 1 1).

(3) Father of Joiakim the high priest (Bar 1 7). The name represents HILKIAH (q.v.).

HELL, hel (see SHEOL; HADES; GEHENNA): The Eng. word, from a Teutonic root meaning "to hide" or "cover," had originally the significance of the world of the dead generally, and in this sense is used by Chaucer, Spenser, etc., and in the Creed ("He descended into hell"); cf. ERV Preface.

Now the word has come to mean almost exclusively the place of punishment of the lost or finally impenitent; the place of torment of the wicked. In AV of the Scriptures, it is the rendering adopted in many places in the OT for the Heb word sh'ol (in 31 out of 65 occurrences of that word it is so trd), and in all places, save one (1 Cor 15 55) in the NT, for the Gr word Hades (this word occurs 11 t; in 10 of these it is trd "hell"; 1 Cor 15 55 reads "grave," with "hell" in m). In these cases the word has its older general meaning, though in Lk 16 23 (parable of Rich Man and Lazarus) it is specially connected with a place of "torment," in contrast with the "Abraham's bosom" to which Lazarus is taken (ver 22).

In the above cases RV has introduced changes, replacing "hell" by "Sheol" in the passages in the OT (ERV retains "hell" in Isa 14 9.15; ARV makes no exception), and Word in RV by "Hades" in the passages in the NT (see under these words).

Besides the above uses, and more in accordance with the modern meaning, the word "hell" is used in the NT in AV as the equivalent of

3. Gehenna Gehenna (12 t; Mt 5 22.29; 10 28, etc.). RV in these cases puts "Gehenna" in m. Originally the Valley of Hinnom, near Jerus, Gehenna became among the Jews the synonym for the place of torment in the future life (the "Gehenna of fire," Mt 5 22, etc.; see GEHENNA).

In yet one other passage in the NT (2 Pet 2 4), "to cast down to hell" is used (AV and RV) to represent the Gr tartarōs, ("to send into

4. Tartarus Tartarus). Here it stands for the place of punishment of the fallen angels: "spared not angels when they sinned, but cast them down to hell, and committed them to pits [or chains] of darkness" (cf. Jude ver 6; but also Mt 25 41). Similar ideas are found in certain of the Jewish apocalyptic books (Book of En, Book of Jub, Apoc Bar, with apparent reference to Gen 6 1-4; cf. ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT).

On the theological aspect, see PUNISHMENT, EVERLASTING. For literature, see references in above-named arts., and cf. art. "Hell" by Dr. D. S. Salmond in HDB.

JAMES ORR

HELLENISM, hel'en-iz'm, HELLENIST, hel'en-ist: Hellenism is the name we give to the manifold achievements of the Greeks in social and political institutions, in the various arts, in science and philosophy, in morals and religion. It is customary to distinguish two main periods, between which stands the striking figure of Alexander the Great, and to apply to the earlier period the adj. "Hellenic," that of "Hellenistic" to the latter. While there is abundant reason for making this distinction, it must not be considered as resting upon fortuitous changes occasioned by foreign influences. The Hellenistic age is rather the sudden unfolding of a flower whose bud was forming and maturing for centuries.

Before the coming of the Hellenic peoples into what we now call Greece, there existed in those lands a flourishing civilization to

1. The Expansion of the Greek Peoples which we may give the name "Aegean." The explorations of archaeologists during the last few decades have brought it to light in many places on the continent, as well as on the islands of the Aegean and notably in Crete. When the Hellenic peoples came, it was not as a united nation, nor even as homogeneous tribes of a common race; though without doubt predominantly of kindred origin, it was the common possession of an Aryan speech and of similar customs and religion that marked them off from the peoples among whom they settled. When their southward movement from Illyria occurred, and by what causes it was brought about, we do not know; but it can hardly have long antedated the continuance of this migration which led to the settlement of the coast districts of Asia Minor and the islands of the Aegean from about the 13th to the 10th cents. BC. In the colonization of these new territories the Hellenic peoples became conscious of their kinship, partly because the several colonies received contingents from various regions of the motherland, partly because they were in common brought into striking contrast to the alien "Barbarians" who spoke other unintelligible languages. As the older communities on the mainland and on the islands began to flourish, they felt the need, arising from various causes, for further colonization. Among these causes we may mention the poverty of the soil in Greece proper, the restricting pressure of the strong tribes of Asia Minor who prevented expansion inland, a growing disaffection with the aristocratic régime in almost all Gr states and with the operation of the law of primogeniture in land tenure, and lastly the combined lure of adventure and the prospect of trade. Thus it came about that in the 8th and 7th cents. BC, two great movements of colonial expansion set in, one toward the Hellespont and to the shores of the Pontus, or Black Sea, beyond, the other westward toward Southern Italy, Sicily, and beyond as far as Gades in Spain. To the 7th cent. belongs also the colonization of Naucratis in Egypt and of Cyrene in Libya. Then followed a period of relative inactivity during the 5th cent., which was marked by the desperate conflict of the Greeks with Persia in the E. and with Carthage in the W., succeeded by even more disastrous conflicts among themselves. With the enforced internal peace imposed by Macedonia came the resumption of colonial and military expansion in a measure before undreamed of. In a few years the empire of Alexander embraced Thrace, Asia Minor, Egypt, and Asia eastward beyond the Indus. The easternmost regions soon fell away, but Asia Minor, Syria and Egypt long continued under Gr rule, until Rome in the 1st cent. BC made good her claims to sovereignty in those lands.

Throughout this course of development and expansion we speak of the people as Greeks, although it is evident that even such racial homogeneity as they may have had on coming into Greece must have been greatly modified by the absorption of conquered peoples. But the strong individuality of the Hellenic population manifested itself everywhere in its civilization. In the evolution from the Homeric kingship (supported by the nobles in council, from which the commonalty was excluded, or where it was supposed at most to express assent or dissent to proposals laid before it) through oligarchic or aristocratic rule and the usurped authority of the tyrants, to the establishment of democratic government, there is nothing surprising to the man of today. That is because Gr civilization has become typical of all western civilization. In the earlier stages of this process, moreover, there is nothing strikingly at variance with the institutions of the Hebrews, at least so far as concerns the outward forms. But there existed throughout a subtle difference of spirit which made it possible, even inevitable, for the Greeks to attain to democratic institutions, whereas to the Hebrews such a development was impossible, if not unthinkable. It is difficult to define this spirit, but one may say that it was marked from the first by an inclination to permit the free development and expression of individuality subordinated to the common good; by a corresponding recognition of human limitations over against one's fellow-man as over against Deity; by an instinctive dread of excess as inhuman and provoking the just punishment of the gods; and lastly by a sane refusal to take oneself too seriously, displaying itself in a certain good-humored irony even among men who, like Socrates and Epicurus, regarded themselves as charged with a sublime mission, in striking contrast with the Heb prophets who voiced the thunders of Sinai, but never by any chance smiled at their own earnestness. Even the Macedonians did not attempt to rule Greece with despotic sway, leaving the states in general in the enjoyment of their liberties; and in the Orient, Alexander and his successors, Rom as well as Gr, secured their power and extended civilization by the foundation and encouragement of Hellenic cities in extraordinary numbers. The city-state, often confederated with other city-states, displaced the organization of tribe or clan, thus substituting a new unit and a new interest for the old; and the centers thus created radiated Hellenic influence and made for order and good government everywhere. But in accordance with the new conditions the state took on a somewhat different form. While the city preserved local autonomy, the state became monarchical; and the oriental deification of the king reinforced by the Hellenic tendency to deify the benefactors of mankind, eventuated in modes of speech and thought which powerfully influenced the Messianic hopes of the Jews.

The life of the Greeks, essentially urban and dominated by political interests fostered in states in which the individual counted for much, was of a type wholly different from the oriental. Although the fiction of consanguinity was cultivated by the Hellenic city-state as by the Sem tribe, it was more transparent in the former, particularly in the newer communities formed in historical times. There was thus a powerful stimulus to mutual tolerance and concession which, supported as it was by the strong love of personal independence and the cultivation of individuality, led to the development of liberty and the recognition of the rights of man. A healthy social life was the result for those who shared the privileges of citizenship, and also, in hardly less degree, for those resident aliens who received the protection of the state. Women also, though not so free as men, enjoyed, even at Athens where they were most limited, liberties unknown to the Orientals. In the Hellenistic age they attained a position essentially similar to that of modern Europe. There were slaves belonging both to individuals and the state, but their lot was mitigated in general by a steadily growing humanity. The amenities of life were many, and were cultivated no less in the name of religion than of art, literature, and science.

As in every phase of Gr civilization, the development of art and letters was free. Indeed their supreme excellence must be attributed to the happy circumstances which suffered them to grow spontaneously from the life of the people without artificial constraints imposed from within, or overpowering influences coming from without: a fortune which no other great movement in art or letters can boast. Gr art was largely developed in the service of religion; but owing to the circumstance that both grew side by side, springing from the heart of man, their reactions were mutual, art contributing to religion quite as much as it received. The creative genius of the Hellenic people expressed itself with singular directness and simplicity in forms clearly visualized and subject to the conditions of psychologically effective grouping in space or time. Their art is marked by the observance of a just proportion and by a certain natural restraint due to the preponderance of the intellectual element over the purely sensuous. Its most characteristic product is the ideal type in which only enough individuality enters to give to the typical the concreteness of life. What has been said of art in the narrower sense applies equally to artistic letters. The types thus created, whether in sculpture, architecture, music, drama, history, or oratory, though not regarded with superstitious reverence, commended themselves by the sheer force of inherent truth and beauty to succeeding generations, thus steadying the course of development and restraining the exuberant originality and the tendency to individualism. In the Hellenistic age, individualism gradually preponderated where the lessening power of creative genius did not lead to simple imitation.

The traditional views of the Hellenic peoples touching Nature and conduct, which did not differ widely from those of other peoples in a corresponding stage of culture, maintained themselves down to the 7th cent. BC with comparatively little change. Along with and following the colonial expansion of Hellenism there came the awakening intellectual curiosity, or rather the shock of surprise necessary to convert attention into question. The mythology of the Greeks had contained a vague theology, without authority indeed, but satisfactory because adequate to express the national thought. Ethics there was none, morality being customary. But the extending horizon of Hellenic thought discovered that customs differed widely in various lands; indeed, it is altogether likely that the collection of strange and shocking customs which filled the quivers of the militant Sophists in the 5th cent. had its inception in the 6th and possibly the 7th cent. At any rate it furnished the fiery darts of the adversary until ethics was founded in reason by the quest of Socrates for the universal, not in conduct, but in judgment. As ethics arose out of the irreconcilable contradictions of conduct, so natural philosophy sprang from the contradictions of mythical theology and in opposition to it. There were in fact two strata of conceptions touching supernatural beings; one, growing out of a primitive animism, regarded their operations essentially from the point of view of magic, which refuses to be surprised at any result, be it never so ill-proportioned to the means em-

5. Philosophy of Nature and of Conduct Along with and following the colonial expansion of Hellenism there came the awakening intellectual curiosity, or rather the shock of surprise necessary to convert attention into question. The mythology of the Greeks had contained a vague theology, without authority indeed, but satisfactory because adequate to express the national thought. Ethics there was none, morality being customary. But the extending horizon of Hellenic thought discovered that customs differed widely in various lands; indeed, it is altogether likely that the collection of strange and shocking customs which filled the quivers of the militant Sophists in the 5th cent. had its inception in the 6th and possibly the 7th cent. At any rate it furnished the fiery darts of the adversary until ethics was founded in reason by the quest of Socrates for the universal, not in conduct, but in judgment. As ethics arose out of the irreconcilable contradictions of conduct, so natural philosophy sprang from the contradictions of mythical theology and in opposition to it. There were in fact two strata of conceptions touching supernatural beings; one, growing out of a primitive animism, regarded their operations essentially from the point of view of magic, which refuses to be surprised at any result, be it never so ill-proportioned to the means em-played, so long as the mysterious word was spoken or the requisite act performed; the other, sprung from a worship of Nature in her most striking phenomena, recognized an order, akin to the moral order, in her operations. When natural philosophy arose in the 6th cent., it instinctively at first, then consciously, divested Nature of personality by stripping off the disguise of myth and substituting a plain and reasoned tale founded on mechanical principles. This is the spirit which pervades pre-Socratic science and philosophy. The quest of Socrates for universally valid judgments on conduct directed thought to the laws of mind, which are teleological, in contradistinction to the laws of matter, which are mechanical; and thus in effect dethroned Nature, regarded as material, by giving primacy to mind. Henceforth Gr philosophy was destined, with relatively few and unimportant exceptions, to devote itself to the study of human conduct and to be essentially idealistic, even where the foundation, as with the Stoics, was ostensibly materialistic. More and more it became true of the Gr philosophers that they sought God, "if haply they might feel after him and find him," conscious of the essential unity of the Divine and the human, and defining philosophy as the endeavor to assimilate the soul to God.

The Homeric poems present a picture of Gr life as seen by a highly cultivated aristocratic society having no sympathy with the common-

6. Hellenic and Hellenistic Religion—Homeric religion as the religion of the Hellenic peoples in the Homeric age. Our first clear view of the Hellenic commoner is presented by Hesiod in the 8th cent. Here we find, alongside of the worship of the Olympians, evidences of chthonian cults and abundant hints of human needs not satisfied by the well-regulated religion of the several city-states. The conventionalized monarchy of Zeus ruling over his fellow-Olympians is known to be a fiction of the poets, having just as much—no more—foundation, in fact, as the mythical overlordship of Agamemnon over the assembled princes of the Achaeans; while it caught the imagination of the Greeks and dominated their literature, each city-state possessed its own shrines sacred to its own gods, who might or might not be called by the names of Olympians. Yet the great shrines which attracted Greeks from every state, such as those of Zeus at Dodona (chiefly in the period before the 7th cent.) and Olympia, of Apollo at Delos and Delphi, and of Hera at Argos, were the favored abodes of Olympians. Only one other should be mentioned: that of Demeter at Eleusis. Her worship was of a different character, and the great repute of her shrine dates from the 5th cent. If the Zeus of Olympia was predominantly the benign god of the sky, to whom men came in joyous mood to delight him with pomp and festive gatherings, performing feats of manly prowess in the Olympic games, the Zeus of Dodona, and the Delphian Apollo, as oracular deities, were visited in times of doubt and distress. The 7th and 6th cents. mark the advent—or the coming into prominence—of deities whose appeal was to the deepest human emotions, of ecstatic enthusiasm, of fear, and of hope. Among them we must mention Dionysus, the god of teeming Nature (see DIONYSUS), and Orpheus. With their advent comes an awakening of the individual soul, whose aspiration to commune with Deity found little satisfaction in the general worship of the states. Private organizations and quasi-monastic orders, like those of the Orphics and Pythagoreans, arose and won countless adherents. Their deities found admission into older shrines, chiefly those of chthonian divinities, like that of Demeter at Eleusis, and wrought a change in the spirit and to a certain extent in the ritual of the "mysteries" practised there. It was in these "mysteries" that the Christian Fathers, according to the mood or the need, polemic or apologetic, of the moment, saw now the propaedeutic type, now the diabolically instituted counterfeit, of the sacraments and ordinances of the church. The spirit and even the details of the observances of the "mysteries" are difficult to determine; but one must beware of accepting the hostile judgments of Christian writers who were in fact retorting upon the Greeks criticisms leveled at the church: both were blinded by partisanship and so misread the symbols.

If we thus find a true praeparatio evangelica in the Hellenistic developments of earlier Hellenic religion, there are parallel developments in the other religions which were adopted in the Hellenistic age. The older national religions of Persia and Egypt underwent a similar change, giving rise respectively to the worship of Mithra and of Isis, both destined, along with the chthonian mysteries of the Greeks, to be dangerous rivals for the conquest of the world of Christianity, itself a younger son in this prolific family of new religions. Space is wanting here for a consideration of these religious movements, the family resemblance of which with Christianity is becoming every day more apparent; but so much at least should be said, that while every candid student must admit the superiority of Christianity in moral content and adaptation to the religious nature of man, the difference in these respects was not at first sight so obvious that the successful rival might at the beginning of the contest have been confidently predicted. See GREECE, RELIGION OF.

As with other manifestations of the Hellenic spirit, so, too, in matters of religion, it was the free development of living institutions that most strikingly distinguishes the Greeks from the Hebrews. They had priests, but were never ruled by them; they possessed a literature regarded with veneration, and in certain shrines treasured sacred writings containing directions for the practice and ritual of the cults, but they were neither intended nor suffered to fix for all time the interpretation of the symbols. In the 5th and 4th cents. the leaders of Gr thought rebuked the activity of certain priests, and it was not before the period of Rom dominion that priests succeeded even in a small measure in usurping power, and sacred writings began to exercise an authority remotely comparable to that recognised among the Jews.

A most interesting question is that concerning the extent to which Gr civilization and thought had penetrated and influenced Judaism. During three centuries before the advent of Jesus, Hellenism had been a power in Syria and Judaea. The earliest writings of the Hebrews showing this influence are Dnl and the OT Apoc. Several books of the Apoc were originally written in Gr, and show strong influence of Gr thought. The LXX, made for the Jews of the Dispersion, early won its way to authority even in Pal, where Aram. had displaced Heb, which thus became a dead language known only to a few. NT quotations of the OT are almost without exception taken from the LXX. Thus the sacred literature of the Jews was for practical purposes Gr. Though Jesus spoke Aram., He unquestionably knew some Gr. Yet there is no clear evidence of specifically Gr influence on this thought, the presuppositions of which are Jewish or generally those of the Hellenistic age. All the writings of the NT were originally composed in Gr, though their authors differed widely in the degree of proficiency in the use of the language and in acquaintance with Hellenic thought. Their debt to these sources can be profitably considered only in connection with the individual writers; but one who is acquainted with the Heb and Gr literature instinctively feels in reading the NT that the national character of the Jews, as reflected in the OT, has all but vanished, remaining only as a subtle tone of moral earnestness and as an imaginative coloring, except in the simple story of the Synoptic Gospels. But for the bitterness aroused by the destruction of Jerus, it is probable that the Jews would have yielded completely to Hellenic influences.

HELM, helm. See SHIPS.

HELMET, hel'met. See ARMS, ARMOR.

HELON, hē'lon (הֶלֶן, hēlōn, "valorous"; LXX B, Χαλόν, Chailōn): The father of Eliab, the prince of the tribe of Zebulun (Nu 1 9; 2 7; 7 24. 29; 10 16).

HELP: With the sense of that which brings aid, support, or deliverance, "help" (noun and vb.) represents a large variety of words in Heb and Gr (noun 7, vb. 16). A principal Heb word is עֲזַר, 'azar, "to help," with the corresponding nouns עֲזָרָה, 'ezer, עֲזָרָה, 'ezrah; a chief Gr word is βοηθία, boēthēō (Mt 15 25; Mk 9 22.24, etc). True help is to be sought for in Jeh, in whom, in the OT, the believer is constantly exhorted to trust, with the renouncing of all other confidences (Ps 20 2; 33 20; 42 5; 46 1; 115 9.10.11; 121 2; Isa 41 10. 13.14, etc). In Rom 8 26 it is said, "the Spirit also helpeth our infirmity," the vb. here (sunantilambánetai) having the striking meaning of to "take hold along with one." In the story of Eden, Eve is spoken of as "a help meet" for Adam (Gen 2 18.20). The idea in "meet" is not so much "suitability," though that is implied, as likeness, correspondence in nature (Vulg. similem sibi). One like himself, as taken from him, the woman would be an aid and companion to the man in his tasks.

HELPMET, help'mēt. See HELP.

HELPS (ἀντιλήψεις, antilēmpseis, 1 Cor 12 28): In classical Gr the word antilēmpsis means "remuneration," the hold one has on something, then perception, apprehension. But in Bib. Gr it has an altruistic meaning. Thus it is used in the LXX, both in the OT Scriptures and in the Apocrypha (Ps 22 19; 89 19; 1 Esd 8 27; 2 Macc 15 7). Thus we obtain a clue to its meaning in our text, where it has been usually understood as referring to the deacons, the following word kubernēseis, trd "governments," being explained as referring to the presbyters.

HELPS (βοήθειαι, boētheiai, Acts 27 17). See SHIPS AND BOATS, III, 2.

HELVE, helv (ἑλψ, 'ēl, "wood," "tree"): The handle or wooden part of an ax. "The head [m "iron"] slippeth from the helve" (m "tree," Dt 19 5). The marginal reading suggests that "the ax is supposed to glance off the tree it is working on."

HEM (κράσπεδον, kráspedon): The classic instance of the use of "hem" in the NT is Mt 9 20 AV (cf 14 36), where the woman "touched the hem of his [Christ's] garment." The reference is to the fringe or tassel with its traditional blue thread which the faithful Israelite was directed to wear on the corners of the outer garment (Nu 15 37 ff; Dt 22 12). Great importance came to be attached to it, the ostentatious Pharisees making it very broad or large (Mt 23 5). Here the woman clearly thought there might be peculiar virtue in touching the tassel or fringe of Jesus' garment. Elsewhere the word is rendered BORDER (q.v.). See also DRESS; FRINGE.

HEMAM, hē'mam (Gen 36 22 AV and ERV). See HEMAN; HOMAM.

HEMAN, hē'man (חֶמָן, hēmān, "faithful"): The name of two men in the OT.

(1) A musician and seer, a Levite, son of Joel and grandson of the prophet Samuel; of the family of the Kohathites (1 Ch 6 33), appointed by David as one of the leaders of the temple-singing (1 Ch 15 17; 2 Ch 5 12). He had 14 sons (and 3 daughters) who assisted their father in the chorus. Heman seems also to have been a man of spiritual power; is called "the king's seer in matters of God" (1 Ch 25 5; 2 Ch 35 15).

(2) One of the noted wise men prior to, or about, the time of Solomon. He was one of the three sons of Mahol (1 K 4 31 [Heb 5 11]); also called a son of Zerah (1 Ch 2 6).

Ps 88 is inscribed to Heman the Ezrahite, who is probably to be identified with the second son of Zerah.

EDWARD BABGY POLLARD

HEMATH, hē'math. See HAMMATH (1 Ch 2 55).

HEMDAN, hem'dan (חֶמְדָּן, hemdān, "pleasant"): A descendant of Seir, the Horite (Gen 36 26). Wrongly trd "Amram" by AV in 1 Ch 1 41 (RV "Hamran"), where the transcribers made an error in one vowel and one consonant, writing hamrān (חֶמְרָן), instead of hemdān (חֶמְדָּן).

HEMLOCK, hem'lock. See GALL.

HEN, hen (חֵן, hēn, "favor"). In Zec 6 14, EV reads, "And the crowns shall be to Helem . . . and to Hen the son of Zephaniah." But as this person is called Josiah in ver 10, RVm "and for the kindness of the son of Zephaniah" is probably right, but the text is uncertain. See JOSIAH.

HEN (ὄρνις, ornis): Mentioned in the accounts of the different disciples in describing the work of Jesus (Mt 23 37; Lk 13 34).

HENA, hē'na (עֲנָה, hēna'; 'Ανά, And): Named in 2 K 19 13, as one of the cities destroyed by Sennacherib along with Sepharvaim. It does not appear in a similar connection in 17 24. The text is probably corrupt. No reasonable identification has been proposed. Cheyne (EB, s.v.) says of the phrase "Hena and Ivah" that "underlying this is a witty editorial suggestion that the existence of cities called עֲנָה and יְבָה respectively has passed out of mind (cf Ps 9 6[7]), for עֲנָה יְבָה, hēna' w- 'ivvāh, clearly means 'he has driven away and overturned' (so Tg, Sym)." He would drop out יְבָה. Hommel (Expos T, IX, 330) thinks that here we have divine names; Hena standing for the Arab. star-name al-han'a, and Ivvah for al-'awwā'u. See IVAH.

HENADAD, hen'a-dad (חֶנְאֲדָד, hēnādhād, "favor of Hadad"; LXX Ἡναδάδ, Hēnadād; Ἡναδάδ, Hēnadād; Ἡναδάβ, Hēnadāb; Ἡναλάβ, Hēnalāb [Ezr 3 9; Neh 3 18.24; 10 9]): One of the heads of the Levites in the post-exilic community.

HENNA, hen'a (Cant 1 14; 4 13): An aromatic plant.

HENOCH, hē'nok (חֵנוֹךְ, hānōkh; Ἐνώχ, Hēnoch; in 1 Ch 1 3 AV RV, "Enoch"; in Gen 25 4, AV and RV "Hanoch"; 1 Ch 1 33, AV "Henoah," RV "Hanoch"): The name of a Midianite, a descendant of Abram.

HEPHER, hē'fēr, HEPHERITES, hē'fēr-its (הֶפֶר, hēpher, הֶפְרִי, hēphri):

(1) LXX Ὁφερ, Hópher (Nu 26 32 f; 27 1; Josh 17 2 f), the head of a family or clan of the tribe of Manasseh. The clan is called the Hephherites in Nu 26 32.

(2) LXX Ἡφάλ, Hēphál (1 Ch 4 6), a man of Judah.

(3) LXX Ὁφερ, Hópher (1 Ch 11 36), one of David's heroes.

HEPHER (הֶפֶר, hēpher):

(1) LXX Ὁφερ, Hópher (Josh 12 17), a Canaanite town mentioned between Tappuah and Aphek, unidentified.

(2) In 1 K 4 10 a district connected with Socoh, and placed by Solomon under the direction of Ben-hesed of Arubboth, unidentified.

HEPHZIBAH, hef'zi-ba (הֶפְזִיבָּה, hēphzī-bāh, "my delight is in her"):

(1) LXX Ὁφειβά, Hopheibá, Ἀφειβά, Hapseibá, Ὁφσιβά, Hophsiβά, the mother of Manasseh (2 K 21 1).

(2) The new name of Zion (Isa 62 4); LXX translates Θελήμα ἐμός, Thélēma emón, "my delight."

HERAKLES, her'a-klēs (Ἡρακλῆς, Hēraklēs). See HERCULES.

HERALD, her'ald: The word occurs once (Dnl 3 4) as the tr of the Aram. word כְּרֹז, kārōz (cf κήρυξ, kēruix): "Then the herald cried aloud." See also GAMES.

HERB, hūrb, ūrb:

(1) קָדָה, yārāk, "green thing" (Ex 10 15; Isa 15 6); "a garden of herbs" (Dt 11 10; 1 K 21 2); "[a dinner, in portion of] herbs" (Prov 15 17).

(2) עֵשֶׂב, 'esebh; cf Arab. 'ushb, "herbage," "grass," etc; "herbs yielding seed" (Gen 1 11); "herbage" for food (Gen 1 30; Jer 14 6); tr "grass" (Dt 11 15; Am 7 2); "herbs" (Prov 27 25, etc).

(3) עֵשֶׂב, deshe', tr "herb" (2 K 19 26; Prov 27 25; Isa 37 27; 66 14 AV), but generally GRASS (q.v.).

(4) קָדָה, hācīr, vegetation generally, but tr GRASS (q.v.).

(5) עֵשֶׂב, 'esebh, 'ōrōth (pl. only), "green plants" or "herbs." In 2 K 4 39 the Talm interprets it to mean "colewort," but it may mean any edible herbs which had survived the drought. In Isa 26 19 the expression "dew of herbs" is in m tr "dew of light" which is more probable (see Dew), and the tr "heat upon herbs" (Isa 18 4 AV) is in RV tr "clear heat in sunshine."

(6) βοτάνη, botánē (He 6 7).

(7) λάχανα, láchana=yārāk (Mt 13 32). See also BITTER HERBS. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

HERCULES, hūr'kū-lēz (Ἡρακλῆς, Hēraklēs): The process of Hellenizing the Jews which began at an earlier date was greatly promoted under Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 BC). Jason, who supplanted his brother Onias in the office of high priest by promising Antiochus an increase of tribute, aided the movement by setting up under the king's authority a Gr palaestra for the training of youth in Gr exercises, and by registering the inhabitants of Jerus as citizens of Antioch (2 Macc 4 8 f). Certain of these Antiochians of Jerus Jason sent to Tyre, where games were held every five years in honor of Hercules, that is, the national Tyrian deity Melcart, identified with Baal of OT history. According to Jos (Ant, VII, v, 3) Hiram, king of Tyre in the days of Solomon, built the temple of Hercules and also of Astarte. Jason's deputies carried 300 drachmas of silver for the sacrifice of Hercules, but they were so ashamed of their commission that they "thought it not right to use the money for any sacrifice," and "on account of present circumstances it went to the equipment of the galleys" (2 Macc 4 18-20). HERD, hūrd. See CATTLE.

HERDSMAN, hūrdz'man (רֹעֶה, bōker; AV, ERV "herdman"): A cowherd (Am 7 14). The same word is used in Syria today. רֹעֶה, rō'eh, has its equivalent in the language of Syria and Pal (Arab. ra'i), and is a general term for any kind of a herdsman (Gen 13 7,8; 26 20; 1 S 21 7). רֹעֶה, rō'eh, occurs in one passage (Am 1 1); lit. it means one who spots or marks the sheep, hence a herdsman. Spotting the wool with different dyes is still the method of distinguishing between the sheep of different flocks. The herdsman is seldom the owner of the sheep, but a hireling. See SHEEP; SHEEP TENDING. JAMES A. PATCH

HERE, hēr, in composition:

Hereafter, hēr-aft'ēr (here [this present] and after) represents Heb 'āhar, "hinder part," "end" (Isa 41 23), "the things that are to come hereafter" ('āhār after, behind the present), with dēn, "this," 'ahārē dhēn, Aram. (Dnl 2 29,45), 'ahar, "after," "behind," "last" (Ezk 20 39), Gr ap' arti, "from now" (Mt 26 64), "Hereafter ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven," which does not mean "at a future time," according to the more modern usage of "hereafter," but (as the Gr) "from now," RV "henceforth"; Tindale and the chief VSS after him have "hereafter," but Wiclif has "fro hennas forth." Jn 1 51, "Hereafter ye shall see the heaven opened," etc, where "hereafter" has the same meaning; it is omitted by RV after a corrected text (Wiclif also omits); ēti, "yet," "still," "any more," "any longer" (Jn 14 30, RV "I will no more speak much with you," Wiclif, "now I schal not"); mēkēti, "no more," "no longer" (Mk 11 14, "no man eat fruit of thee hereafter," RV "henceforward"); apó tou nūn, "from now" (Lk 22 69, RV "From henceforth shall the Son of man be seated at the right hand of the power of God," Wiclif "aftir this tyme"); metá taúta (Jn 13 7, "Thou shalt know [RV "understand"] hereafter," Wiclif "aftirward").

Heretofore, hēr-tōō-fōr', Heb 'mōl, "yesterday," "neither heretofore, nor since" (Ex 4 10; cf 5 7,8,14; Josh 3 4; Ruth 2 11); 'ethmōl shilshōm, "yesterday," "third day" (1 S 4 7, "There hath not been such a thing heretofore.")

Hereunto, hēr-un-tōō', Gr eis touto, "unto," "with a view to this" (1 Pet 2 21, "For hereunto were ye called"): "hereunto" is supplied (Eccl 2

HEREDITY, hē-red'i-ti: Heredity, in modern language, is the law by which living beings tend to repeat their characteristics, physiological and psychical, in their offspring, a law familiar in some form to even the most uncultured peoples. The references to it in the Bible are of various kinds.

Curiously enough, little mention is made of physiological heredity, even in so simple a form as the resemblance of a son to his father, but there are a few references, such as, e.g., those to giants with giants for sons (2 S 21 18-22; 1 Ch 20 4-8; cf Gen 6 4; Nu 13 33; Dt 1 28, etc.). Moreover Dt 28 59-61 may contain a thought of hereditary diseases (cf 2 K 5 27). On the psychical side the data are almost equally scanty. That a son and his father may differ entirely is taken for granted and mentioned repeatedly (esp. in Ezk 18 5-20). Even in the case of the king, the frequent changes of dynasty prevented such a phrase as "the seed royal" (2 K 11 1; Jer 41 1) from being taken very seriously. Yet, perhaps, the inheritance of mechanical dexterity is hinted at in Gen 4 20-22, if "father" means anything more than "teacher." But, in any case, the fact that "father" could have this metaphorical sense, together with the corresponding use of "son" in such phrases as "son of Belial" (Jgs 19 22 AV), "son of wickedness" (Ps 89 22), "sons of the prophets" (Am 7 14m, etc.), "son of the wise, . . . of ancient kings" (Isa 19 11; this last phrase may be meant literally), shows that the inheritance of characteristics was a very familiar fact. See Son.

The question, however, is considerably complicated by the intense solidarity that the Hebrews ascribed to the family. The individual was felt to be only a link in the Conception chain, his "personality" (very vaguely of Heredity conceived) somehow continuing that of his ancestors and being continued in that of his descendants. After death the happiness (or even existence; see DEATH) of this shade in the other world depended on the preservation of a posterity in this. Hence slaying the sons of a dead man was thought to affect him directly, and it would be a great mistake to suppose that an act such as that of 2 S 21 1-9, etc., was simply to prevent a blood-feud. Nor was it at all in point that the children might repeat the qualities of the father, however much this may have been realized in other connections. Consequently, it is impossible to tell in many cases just how much of a modern heredity idea is present.

The most important example is the conception of the position of the nations. These are traced back to single ancestors, and in various cases the qualities of the nation are explained by those of the ancestor (Gen 9 22-27; 21 20, 21; 49, etc.). The influences that determine national characteristics are evidently thought to be hereditary, and yet not all of them are hereditary in our sense; e.g. in Gen 27, the condition of the descendants of Jacob and Esau is conceived to have been fixed by the nature of the blessings (mistakenly) pronounced by Isaac. On the other hand, Ezra (9 11, 12) thinks of the danger of intermarrying with the children of a degenerate people in an entirely modern style, but in Dt 23 3-6 the case is not so clear. There a curse pronounced on the nations for their active hostility is more in point than moral degeneracy (however much this may be spoken of elsewhere, Nu 25 1-3, etc.), and it is on account of the curse that the taint takes ten generations to work itself out, while, in the case of Edomite or Egypt blood, purity was attained in three. Hence it is hard to tell just how Ex 20 5, 6 was interpreted. The modern conception of the effect of heredity was surely present in part, but there must have been also ideas of the extension of the curse-bearing individuality that we should find hard to understand.

The chiefest question is that of the Israelites. Primarily they are viewed as the descendants of Abraham, blessed because he was blessed (Gen 22 15-18, etc.). This was taken by many with the utmost literalness, and physical descent from Abraham was thought to be sufficient (esp. Mt 3 9; Jn 8 31-44; Rom 9 6-13), or at least necessary (esp. Ezr 2 59; 9 2; Neh 7 61), for salvation. Occasionally this descent is stated to give superior qualities in other regards (Est 6 13). But a distinction between natural inheritance of Abraham's qualities and the blessing bestowed by God's unbounded favor and decree on his descendants must have been thoroughly recognized, otherwise the practice of proselytizing would have been impossible.

In the NT the doctrine of original sin, held already by a certain school among the Jews (2 Ead 7 48), alone raises much question

4. Heredity regarding heredity (cf 1 Cor 7 14). Otherwise the OT concepts are simply reversed: where likeness of nature appears, there is (spiritual) descent (Rom 4 12; Gal 3 7, etc.). None the less, that the Israel "after the flesh" has a real spiritual privilege is stated explicitly (Rom 3 1, 2; 11 26; Rev 11 13). HERES, hē'rēz, hē'res:

(1) הֶרֶז, har-heres, "Mount Heres" (Jgs 1 34 f), a district from which the Amorites were not expelled; it is mentioned along with Aijalon and Shallbim. In Josh 19 41 f we have then two towns in association with Ir-shemesh and many authorities consider that as heres = shemesh, i.e. the sun, and הֶרֶז, har, being perhaps a copyist's error for עִיר, ir, "city," we have in Jgs 1 34 a reference to Beth-shemesh, the modern 'Ain Shems. Conder thinks that Batn Harasheh, N.E. of Aijalon, a prominent hill, may be the place referred to. Budde thinks Har-heres may be identified with the Bit-Ninib (Ninib being the fierce morning sun) of the Am Tab; this place was in the district of Jerus.

(2) מַצְלֵחַ הֶרֶז, ma'zleh he-hārez, "the ascent of Heres" (Jgs 8 13, AV "before the sun was up"), the place from which Gideon returned to Succoth after his defeat of Zebah and Zalmunna. RV is probably a great improvement on AV, but both the text and the topography are uncertain.

(3) עִיר הֶרֶז, ir ha-heres, "City of Heres" EVm, "City of Destruction" (הֶרֶם, herem) EV, or "City of the sun" (הֶרֶשׁ, heresh) EVm. This is the name of one of the "five cities in the land of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jeh of hosts" (Isa 19 18). See IR-HA-HERES.
